By relying on a non-virtuous friend, one's own negativities will increase rapidly. Therefore one must definitely shun association with negative friends. By relying on a virtuous friend one's virtues and positive merits will increase rapidly. Thus one must definitely rely on a virtuous friend.

The literal meaning of the term for a Dharma teacher is 'virtuous friend'. So, one must rely on those who help to increase virtues within us, and not rely on those who increase negativities. These few lines have explained the disadvantages of relying on negative friends and the great advantage of relying on a virtuous friend in a clear way. We need to take the essence of this.

2.1.2.2.1.2.1.1.3. One will not receive benefit from them and they will harm one

The verse reads:

12. *Jealous of the higher and competing with the equal,
Pride towards those lower; conceited when praised.
If one expresses something unpleasant, they become angry.
When does one derive benefit from the childish?*
13. If one associates with the childish

*One will definitely acquire every non-virtue there is,
Such as praising oneself and criticising others,
And conversation taking pleasure in cyclic existence.*

As the commentary explains,

Further, the childish are jealous of those higher, compete with those that are equal and if they observe those that are lower, they are proud. When praised they generate conceit, but if one says something unpleasant they become angry.

Hence, when does one receive benefit from involvement with the childish? Not only does one not, but one will definitely acquire every kind of non-virtue by keeping company with the childish. One will definitely take on praising oneself and criticising others, or get in the habit of conversation that takes pleasure in cyclic existence, such as stories that deal with the king, the people in the country and so forth. Therefore, one should not associate with the childish.

This Tibetan verse is written in such an eloquent and poetic way it is good to reflect on the words in the verse itself. You could memorise it and reflect on it, Jealous of those higher, and competing with those that are equal, is quite clear. Pride towards those who are lower and being conceited when praised is also quite clear. Then if one expresses something unpleasant they become angry so when does one receive benefit from the childish? These are all very significant points as further explained in the commentary.

The attributes of the childish are that they are jealous of those who are higher, and this is something about which many people lament. Many have confided in me that they feel very jealous about work situations or relationships. Jealousy is one of the main factors that cause agony in the mind, especially in a work situation when others are doing better than oneself. Rather than feeling joyful for them it is easy to experience jealousy from which many kinds of faults and spiteful words can occur.

To compete with those who are equal refers to being competitive with one's peers. This is something that often occurs. And then with those who are less advantaged, or a bit lower in status, one develops pride and contempt for them. What is being presented here are the shortcomings of engaging in sentiments such as pride, jealousy, and a sense of competitiveness as these are the ones that causes us a lot of problems in everyday life.

One needs to relate these points to oneself, and not think it is referring to others as being childish, and that oneself is excluded from that. If one actually has these sentiments one must reflect, 'If I have these faults then it makes it very difficult for others to relate to me. Just as I find it difficult to relate to others who have these faults, then it is the same for others who have difficulty relating to me'.

By acknowledging these shortcomings we need to apply the antidote. There are antidotes for overcoming each of these negative states of mind, and one needs to resort to them. Jealousy is a dominant sentiment which causes a lot of problems. There are many who say the boyfriend is jealous of their girlfriend, or the girlfriend is jealous of their boyfriend, or in a work situation that they are jealous of their colleagues etc. A lot of jealousy occurs in everyday situations which causes a lot of problems. The antidote for overcoming jealousy is to rejoice. To contemplate how it is good that others have good things happening for them. If one can train one's mind to feel joy in these situations then basically that will help one to overcome jealousy.

I don't claim that I am a great practitioner, but I have protected my mind from jealousy and while there might be small occasions where jealousy might occur in the mind, I have not gone out of my way to cause disruption by back-biting, and so forth, out of jealousy. This is something I can say I have definitely not engaged in. This is how we need to protect ourselves. If we are jealous, we might go around spreading rumours or backbiting, so one really needs to protect oneself from this kind of behaviour. While the verses here are very clear, applying them in one's own practice is what one really needs to do.

2.1.2.2.1.2.1.2. Summary

14ab. Thus, the relationship between self and other Will create ruin.

As the commentary explains the meaning of these two lines:

Thus, through the mutual relationship between oneself and other childish ones, they become negative friends and one will be ruined.

The commentary explicitly mentions they become negative friends. The reason someone would be referred to as a negative friend is that by associating with them one's own negativity increases. That would be a clear sign that one is associating with negative friends. If by associating with someone one's virtues increase, then that is by default a virtuous friend. So while we protect ourselves from associating with negative friends, we need to ensure that we don't become a cause to be a negative friend for others. For example, in our conversations if we start talking about likes and dislikes and gossip, it increases the delusions in one's own mind and creates negativity in the other's mind. Then one is, by default, serving as a negative friend for others. This is why one needs to be mindful of one's speech.

2.1.2.2.1.2.2. The way of abandoning

*14cd. As they have not produced one's purpose
And one also does not become meaningful for them,*

15a. One should get far away from the childish.

The commentary explains:

As childish ordinary individuals have not produced one's purpose and one also does not become meaningful for them, one should retreat far away into isolation.

Having earlier presented the faults of relying on, or associating with the childish, the verse and commentary explain further that as childish ordinary individuals have not produced one's purpose, they have not helped to fulfil one's own purpose. One also does not become meaningful for them means that one cannot help them. If this is the case, one needs to resolve to go into isolation, which means finding an appropriate place to abide where there are no worldly distractions.

The following lines explain what to do when one goes into isolation.

They read:

*15bcd. If one meets them, make them happy through joy
Without creating great familiarity.
Act well in an ordinary way.*

*16. Like the bee takes the honey from the flower Take only the meaning of the Dharma and,
Like not having seen them before,
Abide without familiarity.*

The commentary states:

When occasionally meeting them, first make them happy through joy but then do not become greatly familiar. Act well, without attachment or anger, like an ordinary person just pointing the way.

Also when one goes to seek alms in the town, like the bee that takes the honey from the flower without being attached to its colour and so on, whilst being there physically, take only robes and food for the purpose of the Dharma. Abide without involvement in the distractions, and treat all people as if not having seen them before.

Thus when abiding in isolation, on occasions when one meets with ordinary people who may, for example, bring provisions etc., then the advice for that time is not to engage in lengthy conversation. Of course, make the people happy and joyful, but do not become too familiar. In this way one acts without attachment or anger towards them. Just briefly make one's point and keep one's conversation short. This is the way to avoid worldly talk, lest one gets involved in non-virtuous discussions.

When one is in isolation one still needs to eat and be clothed, so if one has no means oneself then one has to depend on alms and go out and beg. The manner of getting alms is explained with an analogy of a bee taking the essence from a flower without being attached to the colour etc. That is, when the bee actually lands on the flower it does not disturb it, it does not get distracted by the flower itself, it just takes the essence, the nectar, and flies off.

Likewise, whilst in the town, one just takes what one needs for one's purpose of Dharma, such as clothes and food, and then return to isolation. There have been times in the past, after I finished my studies, when I have aspired to go and stay in isolation, and do my practice. If that had occurred I would have gone out to seek alms, just as Shantideva is advising here. However I didn't get that opportunity in the past and now, at my age, I don't think it is possible to do it. But living simply in this way, and practising the Dharma, was something I aspired to.

The commentary advises:

Abide without involvement in the distractions, and treat all people as if not having seen them before.

In summary, when one goes out into a town, one should not allow oneself to become immersed and get caught up in frivolous activities and distractions which go on within it. Just go out for one's own purpose, to sustain oneself and for the Dharma practice. Then even if one meets people, act as if one has not known them, not seen them before, and avoid too much familiarity so that one does not get caught up in frivolous activities. This is the advice.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

20 October 2015

Based on the motivation that we have just generated let us engage in our regular meditation practice.

Now we generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will listen to this Mahayana teaching and put it into practice well.

2.1.2.2. THE METHOD FOR GENERATING THE ANTIDOTE

2.1.2.2.1. Abandoning attachment to the inner object of sentient being

2.1.2.2.1.2. Abandoning upon having understood the faults

2.1.2.2.1.2.2. The way of abandoning (cont.)

As we learnt last week, there is no benefit whatsoever for oneself or others in associating with the childish.

*14cd. As they have not produced one's purpose
And one also does not become meaningful for them,*

15a. One should get far away from the childish.

It was explained very clearly that one cannot serve the purposes of the childish. As we cannot benefit them and they cannot benefit us, it is best to resort to isolation to engage in our Dharma practice.

This of course has its own significant points. Of course teachers also advise some, who might be inclined to go into isolation, to remain with their students and disciples in order to teach as it would be much more beneficial for them to engage in propagating the Dharma. So for the purpose of the Dharma and benefiting sentient beings they follow their teacher's advice, forsaking their wish to go into isolation and help to propagate the Dharma. These lines from the root text are a general explanation of why one should rely on isolation in order to engage in the practice of Dharma, and they serve to remind and encourage us to engage in the real means of practising the Dharma.

2.1.2.2.2. Abandoning attachment to outer gain, praise and the like

Here there are two sub-divisions:

2.1.2.2.2.1. The faults of the object possessor

2.1.2.2.2.2. The faults of the object

2.1.2.2.2.1. The faults of the object possessor

This is further sub-divided into two:

2.1.2.2.2.1.1. The faults of pride

2.1.2.2.2.1.2. The faults of attachment

2.1.2.2.2.1.1. The faults of pride

We really need to take measures to overcome pride. When one is affected by strong pride, not only does it harm oneself, but it also affects others. No-one appreciates someone who is full of pride and contempt for others, and we often hear comments like, "Oh, he is just so proud"—such people are scorned. Having seen the faults of pride, it is good to then take measures to overcome one's own pride. It's fair to say that pride in others is never really appreciated. However, not taking any initiative to look into one's own pride and then to claim that others are being very proud, isn't really an honest and sincere approach.

This advice seems to be particularly applicable to those of high status, such as renowned lamas. It is indeed very useful advice for teachers who have a large following.

The verse reads:

*17. By saying "I have a lot of gain and praise,
I am very popular with others."
If one holds such arrogance
One will be frightened after death.*

Then the commentary reads:

If one says, "I have a lot of gain, I am praised and I am very popular with others" and holds such arrogance and conceit, one will go to the lower realms due to the faults of pride and attachment, and thus one will generate fear after death.

As clearly explained, if one is not mindful then gifts, offerings or praise can generate attachment to such things, along with pride. One could begin to think, "Oh I am admired by so many and there are many who praise me", which causes a mind of pride and conceit. In fact one needs to be particularly careful with how one uses the offerings made to one by others. It is explained in the teachings that when offerings are made with sincere faith, one needs to be very mindful to utilise them in a proper manner, and not to misuse those offerings. Personally, I am very careful about such offerings and so forth. They need to be used in an appropriate manner, and put it towards a good purpose as a means to accumulate more virtue or merit. That will then be beneficial for both oneself and the person making the offering. Basically, one needs to be really careful when obtaining and using offerings, ensuring that they are treated appropriately.

You will recall there are also detailed explanations in the lam rim teachings about the danger of making offerings and so forth that have been obtained through wrong livelihood. In addition to these extensive explanations in the lam rim, there are also explanations in the Vinaya, the text for monastics; as monastics we need to pay extra care to not misuse offerings.

In my own case, when someone, for example, cooks lunch for me, they might also bring a cake or some biscuits. Occasionally I ask for the cake or the biscuits to be left behind, and that they not be opened. That is because my intention is to offer them later. Some might wonder, "Why is Geshe-la not eating the biscuits or cake? Maybe he is saving it all for later". So not everyone understands my intention. I can't claim to engage in any great practices, but I do try to adopt these simple practices, just as the previous great masters did—they always made offerings of what was offered to them. Also I don't consume the offering of lunch mindlessly. I offer it and pay attention to dedicating the offering by thinking, "By consuming this meal may those who offered it be endowed with all resources, and be able to practise Dharma”.

The main point is that one needs to be very mindful about offerings. When others make offerings of gifts and so forth to oneself, there is a great danger of becoming quite attached to those offerings. Likewise, hearing praise can generate pride. If great teachers have a large following, there is the danger of feeling, “Oh, I’ve got a great following, and many people like me”. Now some of you might feel, “Oh I am not in that situation, I’m in no danger of generating pride with a large following and receiving gifts from others”. But the situation can change, and one may achieve that status, if not in this life, then in the future lives to come. Even though overcoming attachment to gifts and so forth is not an easy practice, contemplating the disadvantages of these faults, and training one’s mind now, can prepare oneself for the future, so that one will not be affected by these faults then.

As I have mentioned previously, at an ordinary level, one may not yet be free from these faults of attachment and pride and so forth. However recognising and acknowledging that they are faults can become an impetus to engage in purification practices i.e. confessing them and purifying them. So in that way we can minimise any negative effects.

2.1.2.2.1.2. The faults of attachment

The lines relating to this heading are:

18. *Thus, deluded mind,
You become attached to this and that,
And separated from this and that,
And suffer a thousand times.*
- 19ab. *Therefore, the skilful should not be attached,
From attachment fear is generated.*

The commentary explains:

Hence, a mind that is deluded with regards to projecting karma, to however many objects one becomes attached to if they are summed up, it will add up to a thousand-fold. The result surely is for great sufferings to arise. Therefore, by being skilful in what has to be abandoned and adopted, one should not generate attachment to gain and praise. Due to attachment, one will generate the fear of the lower realms.

The Tibetan word phen-pe-le translated here as projecting karma can also have a more literal meaning of actions that benefit oneself. So if we take the literal meaning, then what is being explained is that the mind of attachment is a mind that is deluded into thinking that the objects of attachment will benefit oneself. With that deluded mind, one’s attachment to the object increases more and more. One is not satisfied with being attached to one object; soon one wants two and then more. Furthermore, attachment towards the objects increases.

If they are summed up, the attachments will add up to a thousand-fold, and due to that one experiences the result of great sufferings. Of course, when attachment to an object has increased a thousand fold, then the consequences of the suffering to be experienced in the future will also naturally be great. The thousand-fold increase is not a fixed number, but an indication of the magnitude of the increase. One may think that one is attached to only one object, but in each moment of attachment to that object one is generating further attachment, thus attachment increases more and more. So what may seem like attachment to just one object becomes a thousand-fold attachment, which then brings about extensive suffering as a result. Therefore, by being skilful in what has to be abandoned and adopted, one should not generate attachment to gain and praise. In summary, due to attachment, one will generate the fear that is the lower realms.

These explanations of the verses are not all that obscure or difficult to understand. It’s a matter of contemplating them and trying to put them into practice as much as we can.

2.1.2.2.2. The faults of the object

This is sub-divided into two:

2.1.2.2.2.1. Desire objects are unreliable

2.1.2.2.2.2. Praise and criticism do not harm or benefit

2.1.2.2.2.2.1. Desire objects are unreliable

One needs to understand that the actual fault being presented here is a mind that relies on, and then develops attachment to objects of desire. The means to overcome this mental fault is to understand that the fault of the objects is that they are unreliable. Such objects of desire are never reliable, because they can change at any time. We often hear comments like, “That person is so unreliable — you just can’t rely on them”. Likewise objects of desire are also unreliable.

The lines of verse relating to this heading read:

- 19cd. *Because they have to be given up naturally,
One should generate firm realisation of this.*
20. *Although one may receive lots of gain
And also receive fame and pleasantness,
This accumulation of gain and fame,
One has to give them up without freedom.*

Then the commentary explains:

Though one may attain these objects of desire, they are unreliable. One needs to generate stable conviction and realisation that they will have to be given up naturally. Although one may receive a lot of gain, as well as fame and pleasantness, this accumulation of gain and fame will have to be given up without freedom at the time of death. The meaning is that at the time of death gain and fame will not follow one.

As explained in the commentary, though one may attain these objects of desire such as gain, praise and the like, they are all unreliable, regardless of their form. Whatever objects of desire one may obtain, one will not hold onto them; eventually a separation has to take place. Although they are inanimate, it’s as if the objects discard you, and you also have to discard objects. The more one contemplates this fact, the easier it becomes to not hold on to objects with strong attachment. Then, when the actual separation takes place, it will not cause mental agony or angst.

Of course, at the end of this life, at the time of death, we will definitely have to leave everything behind. But even before then, there are many times when we are separated from objects of attachment. So the more one contemplates these points now, and thinks about how the very nature of these objects of desire is that they are unreliable, the easier it will be for the mind to handle the separation that will inevitably occur.

As the commentary further explains, one needs to generate a stable conviction and realisation that they will have to be given up naturally. So one has to develop that mind to make it stable and strong. Furthermore, as just mentioned, although one may receive a lot of gain, as well as fame and pleasantness, this accumulation of gain and fame will have to be given up without freedom at the time of death.

Understanding that one needs to generate a stable conviction and realisation that objects of desire will have to be given up naturally is neither a subtle, nor an obscure point. We have all seen the agony and suffering that many experience when they are separated from objects of attachment, such as loved and dear ones at the time of death or otherwise because of a break up, or when they experience a great financial loss. Many people are not able to accept that separation, due to the strong grasping of attachment. So when separation occurs, they experience the agony of enormous suffering. Thus the advice being presented here is an instruction on how to prepare our minds, so that when separation does occur, we will not experience great mental distress.

It is, of course obvious that although one may receive a lot of gain and praise and experience pleasant situations and so forth, we will definitely, without any freedom or control from our side, have to give all of that up at the time of death. But if one has created extensive merit, then there is the possibility of obtaining wealth again in future lives. One can definitely create the causes to obtain such good conditions in the next life.

As explained in the teachings in great detail, by practising morality, one will create the causes to secure a body with all of the senses intact in a future life. By engaging in the practice of generosity, one will obtain good resources and wealth in future lives, and by practising patience one will create the cause to obtain a good retinue, or companions in future lives. So rather than being attached to objects, and engaging in immoral deeds to accumulate more wealth and so forth, one should practice the opposite of these deeds: the opposite to engaging in corrupt morality is to practise morality, and the opposite of miserliness is to practise generosity, and the opposite of anger is patience. So while we might not be able to prevent separation from the good conditions that we have now, such as our body and resources, we can at least engage in practices to secure such good conditions again in the future.

Contemplating the cause and effect sequence of how to obtain good conditions in the future encourages one to abide by the law of karma and engage in virtue. This is how we need to apply our understanding of the faults and disadvantages of attachment, and the importance of practising its opposite. There are stories of people who are so overly attached to their objects and possessions that they keep them hidden in their pillows and so forth. If one's mind is a bit more prepared by thinking about the faults and disadvantages of attachment, it will help to reduce a lot of the agony when separation takes place.

When I was in India, an Indian once asked me "Why do you always seem to be so joyful and happy?" My immediate response was "Because I lost everything, my country, my home, my family. I had to leave everything behind to escape to India". When I said that he was first taken aback and wondered how that was relevant. Soon enough, he seemed to get the point. He said, "Oh, what you mean is that you have given up attachment to all of these things, and that is what is making you happy now". It seems that he had derived a significant point from what I was saying. Even though I had to leave everything behind, I don't recall it causing great agony or mental distress. That is just a small account from my own experience of how we could have to discard everything at any time.

The main point of the practices that are being explained here is the need to reduce strong attachment and grasping at our own body, resources, wealth, fame and so forth. If one contemplates these points now, to that extent it can definitely help at the time of death, for example. When separation is imminent, it will help to relieve mental agony and distress, and while physically we might experience some discomfort of pain and so forth, mentally we can remain calm with a sense of joy.

2.1.2.2.2.2. Praise and criticism do not harm or benefit

21. *If there are others who criticise one
Then why be happy when one is praised?
If there are others who praise one
Then why be unhappy if one is criticised?*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

It is unsuitable to have attachment and anger for praise and criticism. What does one have to be happy about when one is praised directly, if one is secretly criticised by someone else, as there is interference to that happiness? What does one have to be unhappy about if one is criticised, when there is someone by whom one is praised?

As one does not become high or low through praise or criticism, one should abandon attachment and hate towards them.

These are very significant points for our practice as a means to overcome the eight worldly concerns.¹ If one is obsessed with the eight worldly concerns, one will be happy when praised, and unhappy when criticised. If one has worldly concerns of feeling glad when one is praised, and feeling unhappy at the slightest criticism, then that will cause much mental distress and angst. Therefore, as explained here, it is unsuitable to have attachment and anger for praise and criticism.

What does one have to be happy about when one is praised directly, if one is secretly criticised by someone else, is a really significant point to consider. Even though one may be praised directly by some, there are others who may secretly or indirectly criticise oneself. Thus, as a way to not become too attached to any praise one hears, it is good to remind oneself, "Oh, I might be offered praise now, but there are, of course, others who will be criticising me. So I shouldn't let that praise affect me too much". Likewise when one is criticised one can think, "Oh well, there are others who also indirectly praise me!"

This kind of thinking prevents criticism from weighing too heavily on one's mind, and having a negative impact.

As also mentioned many times in the past, when one is inclined to practise the mind training teachings to reverse the eight worldly concerns, one needs to practise an attitude of not being happy when praised, and happy when one is criticised. When one is able to transform our immediate responses to these kinds of attitudes, one will have a more stable mind, which will not be easily influenced by the slightest praise or criticism.

This is very practical advice. If someone criticises us we think, "OK, they might criticise me, but that's fine as there are others who praise me. So I shouldn't be too worried about the criticism, and not take it too personally". And if one is praised too much then one should also remember that criticism and the faults that one might engage in if one develops pride. More specifically, when one is praised then that can cause elation and happiness and then one develops strong attachment to that feeling, which is how praise can induce attachment. Whereas when one hears criticism, that can cause the mind to feel unhappy, and due to that unhappy state of mind, anger can arise.

Of course I have discussed these points many times in previous teachings, however I really want you to reflect on them. If one is inclined to put the Dharma into practice, then when one previously liked praise and disliked criticism, one needs to change that. The mind training teachings explain how to equalise these worldly concerns, and then change one's attitude to disliking praise and liking criticism. If one can reach that level of liking criticism and disliking praise, then one has entered the ranks of real Dharma practitioners.

As the lam rim teachings mention, a good Dharma practitioner is someone who has no concern for the worldly dharmas. Through training the mind, one can slowly transform one's attitude towards praise and criticism. From having once sought praise and so forth, and been overly attached to that, one reaches a point where, rather than disliking criticism, one will like it, and then use that for further development and so forth. When one trains one's mind, it is possible to achieve that transformation. So we need to incorporate these practices in our daily life.

Of course, as I have mentioned previously, these are not very profound or subtle points, and they can be easily understood just by reading the text. However, the reason why I take time to emphasise these points, and explain them a little bit further, is to encourage you to put them into practice. That's my intention.

2.1.2.3. THE FAULTS OF DISTRACTIONS

you know, is a good and sincere person, and very hard working. What we can do at this critical time is to generate a mind of love and compassion for him, rely on a powerful practice and dedicate it to the success of his surgery, so that he becomes well and strong again both physically and mentally, and that he continuously has the opportunity to engage in Dharma practice. This is how we can dedicate our prayers for him.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

27 October 2015

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

Let us now generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, in order to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

2.1.2.3. THE FAULTS OF DISTRACTIONS

This is divided into two:

2.1.2.3.1. Since it is difficult to be associated with the childish, one should not be attached to their distractions

2.1.2.3.2. Stating supporting quotes

2.1.2.3.1. Since it is difficult to be associated with the childish, one should not be attached to their distractions

The verse reads:

22. *Sentient beings have many wishes,
That even the conquerors cannot satisfy.
What need is there to mention someone inferior
Like oneself?
Therefore, give up worldly thoughts.*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

One cannot fulfil the various wishes of sentient beings. If even the conquerors cannot fulfil their wishes with their diverse enlightened activities, then what need is there to mention someone inferior like oneself who does not know their thoughts? Therefore, give up the thought of associating with worldly people.

The commentary explains how worldly friends cannot be relied upon. They have childish wishes, and as their minds are unstable and change all the time, their wishes also change all the time. The point here is that, because their minds are not easily satisfied, they cannot actually fulfil their wishes.

The commentary explains, one cannot fulfil the various wishes of sentient beings. If even the conquerors cannot fulfil their wishes with their diverse enlightened activities, then what need is there to mention someone inferior like oneself who does not know their thoughts? As worldly beings only have worldly concerns, such as attachment to the body, possessions, wealth and friends etc., it becomes very difficult to associate with them, and to try to please them. Whilst it is very difficult to fulfil their wishes, they in turn obstruct one from engaging in virtuous activities. The commentary's resolution to this is, therefore, give up the thought of associating with worldly people.

When one resolves to go into isolation as a way of engaging in virtuous practice, one needs to do so with a deep sense of disenchantment with the worldly concerns of worldly beings. As just mentioned, the concerns of worldly beings revolve around trying to please one's relatives and friends, acquiring possessions, status, wealth, attachment to the body etc. These are their main concerns.

The emphasis here is to strongly recognise the pointlessness of relying on childish beings: one cannot benefit them by fulfilling their worldly wishes, and it can harm oneself. If this understanding can be deeply established, then when one actually resolves to go into isolation, then there is no danger of turning back. Conversely, if one does not have this deep sense of disenchantment with worldly concerns, then while one may like being in isolation, at times it becomes a bit difficult. Then one may consider coming out of isolation and associating with worldly beings again out of attachment.

Going into isolation and fully engaging in meditation practice is really the way of a pure Dharma practitioner. While it is not easy to leave everything behind and go into isolation to fully focus on practise, generating such a wish and aspiring to do so is very beneficial. Even people from ordinary walks of life have shared with me the fact that they are a bit weary of the everyday concerns of work etc. They have told me that they'd like to leave everything behind and go somewhere where there are no phones, no business agendas or appointments, and no one to hassle them, and that just going to an isolated quiet place would be really nice. Of course even though this isn't possible for them in their present situation, it is something they find very attractive. When one wishes to do this for the purpose of Dharma, and all the conducive conditions come together, then it becomes a very meaningful thing to do.

By reflecting on the great advantages of being able to practise wholeheartedly and virtuously in isolation, even if one does not have the capacity to do it right now, one should make strong aspirations and prayers that one may be able to do so in the future. That will leave a very good imprint on one's mind so that even if it is not possible in this life, it lays the foundations for one to acquire all the necessary conditions to practise in isolation in future lives. There will be a time when all the necessary conditions come together for one to actually go into isolation.

One needs to understand the great significance of making aspirational prayers. The teachings state that when aspirational prayers are made deeply from one's heart, the content of that prayer can definitely materialise in the future.

The next verse continues to explain why the childish are not reliable and why they are difficult to associate with.

The verse reads:

23. *They criticise those who do not have gain
And are unpleasant to those with gain.
How can one be made happy by them
Who are naturally difficult to associate with?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

They criticise and put down those sentient beings that have not found gain, saying, "They have no merits." Those who have gain they criticise, saying, "They practise wrong livelihood". As they are difficult to associate with, how can one be made happy by the childish? As one cannot, one should not associate.

We would recognise what the commentary is presenting here! People who associate with others who are less fortunate or less successful than themselves, criticise them for having less wealth than is seemingly suitable. They say, 'Oh, how unlucky', or 'They are good-for-nothings' etc. However when others do have significant wealth they are again criticised, and people say for example, 'They must have cheated to get what they have' or 'They probably got that wealth through devious means'. These are the very worldly companions we associate with, and this is how they either look down upon others or scorn them.

The commentary points out, they criticise and put down those sentient beings that have not found gain, saying, "They have no merits," and so forth. Those who have gain they criticise, saying, "They practise wrong livelihood". Therefore, as they are difficult to associate with, how can one be made happy by the childish? This implies that as one cannot be made happy by those who have childish and worldly concerns, one should not associate with them.

2.1.2.3.2. Stating supporting quotes

This next part is from the sutras.

The verse reads:

24. *As the childish are not happy
If their purpose is not fulfilled,
Those gone thus teach:
Do not be friends with any of them.*

The commentary explains:

Those gone thus teach that as the childish are unhappy if their purpose is not fulfilled, which is more important to them than anything else, one should not associate and befriend them.

The ones gone thus, meaning the buddhas, taught that as the childish are unhappy if their purpose is not fulfilled, which for them is more important than anything else, one should thus not associate and befriend them. That is what the Buddha had advised.

An example from the Sutra of the Moonlight Lamp is quoted:

Ordinary individuals do not have friends;
Even if one says words endowed with Dharma;
They do not believe and show anger and hate;
These are the actions of the childish.

Further,

Although one relates well with the childish for a long time,
One can say that later they will become unfriendly and disagreeable,
Having understood the causes of the childish,
The skilled do not rely on the childish.

This is quite easy to understand so there is no need for further explanations.

2.1.2.4. THE BENEFITS OF RELYING ON ISOLATION

This is further subdivided into five:

- 2.1.2.4.1. Distinction of company
- 2.1.2.4.2. Distinction of place
- 2.1.2.4.3. Distinction of livelihood
- 2.1.2.4.4. Distinction of individual discernment
- 2.1.2.4.5. Distinction of non-distraction

2.1.2.4.1. Distinction of company

The commentary starts with the statement:

The skilled who have listened to much Dharma should stop associating with the childish and retire to the forest.

The verse reads:

25. *The animals, birds and trees in the forest
Do not say anything unpleasant.
When shall I abide together with Those whose company is delightful?*

The commentary then continues:

The animals, birds and trees in the forest do not say anything unpleasant. Generate the wish thinking, "When will I abide together with those whose company is delightful?"

The great advantage of going into isolation with just the company of animals and birds is that there is no worry about them criticising oneself, or saying unpleasant things. Likewise one need have no concern about displeasing them. However with ordinary childish beings one always has to be careful not to offend them. There is always doubt about whether what one has said could be taken the wrong way, or if what one has done has pleased them or not. It seems that apart from some exceptional cases, where people know each other very well, and can communicate without causing any sort of dispute or conflict, most people always have to be careful with each other. Even couples that have been together for many years still seem to need to be careful not to say the wrong thing, which could displease the other.

In contrast, when one lives in isolation amongst the animals and birds, one has no doubts whether one would be pleasing them or not. One can remain comfortable without those kind of doubts or fears, and that in itself is a very delightful atmosphere and conducive environment for one's practice. Thus, one generates this thought as an aspirational prayer, "When will I abide together with those whose company is delightful?"

Soon after we settled in India, after the escape, there were many very good monks who resolved to go into isolation and practise. Unfortunately many did not survive for long because of health conditions etc. There was one quite young monk named Kelsang in Dalhousie, who was 25 years old at that time, and a student of the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey-la, from whom he received many teachings on the lam rim and so forth. He was so inspired to go into retreat that he would go up into the cold mountainous area; altogether he went up for about 12 years. In winter he would come down for some time because it gets extremely cold, but then he'd go up into isolation again in the summer months, then come down to receive more teachings before going back into the retreat area. In this way he spent a long time in retreat mode.

Every three years he would go up for a period of time and then come out for a while, and then go back again for three years. It was on the fourth time, after he'd come out that I met him in Dharamsala and we had some tea together at a tea stall. There he told me that he was out to receive some rare teachings from His Holiness on the Six Yogas of Naropa, and then he was planning to go back into retreat again. He was from Amdo in the eastern part of Tibet. The late Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey-la told me in Varanasi that this monk was of good nature and had very good potential. In later years I didn't hear what happened to him, or know his whereabouts.

Some years ago I visited a serene and isolated place in Tasmania. The area is called Lorinna which is not far from Devonport. There were only two families there and I stayed in one of the cabins, and the family there looked after me. They had a small gumpa where I was staying. I remember there was a beautiful peacock and mountains in the distance, and further down some lakes. It was a very quiet and serene area. I remember the family looking after me had a son called Owen, who would bring me my meals. I stayed there for two weeks and did the White Manjushri retreat. I was a very happy to be alone in a quiet and serene atmosphere. The family would send me tea, hot water and other essentials. Apparently the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey had also visited that place, and I heard that a hundred people had come at that time. Anyhow, as described in the text, this is a serene and isolated place that I visited in Tasmania.

This verse describes specifically the distinction of company, so the next verse describes a suitable place.

2.1.2.4.2. Distinction of place

This refers to a suitable place.

The verses read:

26. *Abiding in a cave, empty temple
Or abiding at the foot of a tree,
When will I not look back
And be without attachment?*
27. *When shall I abide Without attachment and act independently
In naturally spacious places
Not held as 'mine'?*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

Abide as you desire in a cave, empty temple or at the foot of a tree. Having abandoned the family home and not wishing to take it back, generate the wish thinking, "When shall I abide in solitude without attachment and not look back?"

Generate the wish, thinking, "When can I act independently in naturally wide open places not held by someone else as 'mine', and become unattached to body and enjoyments."

The commentary explains the place or abode is to be in a cave, empty temple or at the foot of a tree. The Vinaya has a description of an ideal place for retreat as being in an area where there are plenty of trees.

Resorting to such isolated places is further explained as most ideal where having abandoned the family home and not wishing to take it back; one goes into isolation with a sense of resolve and commitment that one will not turn back until one achieves one's goals. One generates the wish,

"when shall I abide in solitude without attachment and not look back?" Here an aspiration is presented: may I be able to abide in such places, along with the following wish, "When can I act independently in naturally wide open places not held by someone else as 'mine', and become unattached to body and enjoyments." This again refers to leaving aside all worldly pleasures—attachment to one's body, wealth, relatives and friends etc.—and going into isolation with only the intention to engage in practice. It's good for one to read these lines periodically and generate this aspiration in one's mind.

First, the text describes the suitable company to be found in isolation, followed by the suitable place for one's practice in isolation. The next verse explains the distinction of livelihood—which is the type of livelihood one must rely upon. We can see that all of these are the means to practise less desire and contentment.

2.1.2.4.3. Distinction of livelihood

The verse reads:

28. *When will I abide without fear,
Despite not hiding my body,
With as little as a begging bowl,
Wearing clothes unneeded by anyone else.*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

Generate the wish thinking, "When will I abide without fear of robbers though not hiding this body in an inaccessible abode where there's no cause to be robbed, having only an earthen bowl, a little incomplete food and wearing clothes discarded by others?" Meditate on this again and again and also put it into practise.

This advice would be for fully ordained monks as it refers to, having only an earthen bowl, which is the simplest form of begging bowl. Other belongings of a fully-ordained monk would be a walking staff and a sieve. Because of their simplicity one can abide in places with no fear of robbers, and one does not have to resort to hiding one's body in an inaccessible abode, because one's belongings are so meagre there is no fear of robbers in relation to either one's body or possessions, such as the clothing discarded by others.

As explained distinctively in the Vinaya, the clothing of a fully-ordained monk is of two types; either clothes discarded by others, already used and old, and thrown away; or robes which have already been used by others. In either case they are very simple, not new or fancy clothes. With these meagre belongings, which are not valuable, one can reside in isolation without any sense of fear that robbers could come and take things away from oneself. Naturally one would abide in a very relaxed atmosphere without such fears.

As the advice here is about livelihood, it might be directed to the livelihood of going into isolation as a fully-ordained monk. The personal instruction is to live a life with contentment and few desires. We can see the value of having contentment and how having less desire would be a very relaxed and conducive way of living.

After finding an ideal, conducive place in relation to one's company, the place itself, and livelihood, one needs to resolve to meditate on this again and again, and put it into practice.

This advice is quite suitable for someone with a male form because maybe there would be less fear about going out into the wilderness alone. As a woman one might be a bit more hesitant, and one needs to be more careful in how to go about it. In the past I remember an American nun called Thubten Pemo who wanted to go up into a cave, and live in isolation. But she said she needed someone not too far away to help her. Which monk could go and serve her? How could monks decide that anyway? So that was difficult for her.

In either case, male or female, one must resort to strong determination to go out in the wilderness. That definitely requires courage. Without courage I think it would be very difficult to resolve to do it.

2.1.2.4.4. Distinction of individual discernment

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.2.4.4.1. Individually discerning the antidote against attachment to the body

2.1.2.4.4.2. Individually discerning the antidote against attachment to friends and relatives

2.1.2.4.4.1. Individually discerning the antidote against attachment to the body

This is presented in two verses, the first reads:

29. *Having visited the cemetery,
When will I equalise
My body with the bones of others,
As being subject to disintegration?*

The commentary explains the meaning:

Bringing to mind the impermanence of the body: Having visited the cemetery make prayers thinking, "When will my body equal the corpse and bones of those others that are subject to disintegration?"

Generate the recognition of decay as explained in the Mother of Conqueror Sutras.

This verse presents one of the best methods to overcome attachment to one's body—to go into cemeteries and observe the corpses as a reminder of what one's own body will eventually become. The only difference between the corpse you see there and your own body is that you happen to be living now. When death comes one's body will be no different to the state of the corpse's body one sees in the cemetery. By relating to the corpses, bringing to mind the impermanence of the body, having visited the cemetery, one resolves to think, "When will my body equal the corpse and bones of those others that are subject to disintegration?" and contemplate in this way.

One will generate the recognition of decay as explained in the Mother of Conqueror Sutras, refers to eight different ways of meditating on the imperfections of the objects, such as body. Look up the eight different methods yourselves; I've presented them in earlier teachings. Amongst the eight there are those who are attached to the body's shape, then one meditates on the decomposition or disintegration of the body's shape. Then for those who are attracted to the colour of the body, meditating specifically on the change of the corpses' colour etc. In this way the eight specific types of meditations unfold.

The next verse reads:

30. *Also, this very body of mine
Will cause even the coyotes
To stay away from it with its stink.
It will come like this.*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

Regarding generating the recognition of the impure body, also this very body of mine will cause even the coyotes, which crave the impure, to want to stay away from it and its stink of decay. Equalise your body with the corpse in the cemetery, thinking, "It will come definitely like this, it is its nature."

Here the commentary emphasises the impurity of that body to which one is so attached. The way to reduce this strong attachment is to think, this very body of mine will cause even the coyotes, which crave the impure, to want to stay away from it and its stink of decay. So even wild animals like coyotes and animals that normally devour corpses would be repulsed and not approach the corpse due to the stench and decay of putrefaction. One's own body is in that same nature. The only thing keeping our body fresh and lustrous now is the fact that it has a consciousness in it. But once the consciousness leaves, it is only a matter of days before one's own body is the same as explained here. One should resolve that it will definitely occur like this; it is its nature. The personal instruction here is recognising the means to overcome attachment to our body because often we succumb to strong attachment to it.

2.1.2.4.4.2. Individually discerning the antidote against attachment to friends and relatives

This is subdivided into three:

2.1.2.4.4.2.1. It is unsuitable to be attached to friends and relatives

2.1.2.4.4.2.2. The reason for that

2.1.2.4.4.2.3. Thinking of oneself as a guest that stays each day in a different place

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

10 November 2015

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

Now can generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, in order to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings, and put them into practice well.

2.1. Abandoning distractions

2.1.2. The way of abandoning it

2.1.2.4.4. Distinction of individual discernment (cont.)

2.1.2.4.4.2. Individually discerning the antidote against attachment to friends and relatives

This is subdivided into three

2.1.2.4.4.2.1. It is unsuitable to be attached to friends and relatives

2.1.2.4.4.2.2. The reason for that

2.1.2.4.4.2.3. Thinking of oneself as a guest that stays each day in a different abode

2.1.2.4.4.2.1. It is unsuitable to be attached to friends and relatives

This section of the text explains the disadvantages of being overly attached to friends, relatives, and close companions. Indeed, strong attachment to those closest to us seems to lead to a lot of mental agony. It is suitable to generate compassion for close ones, relatives and friends, but strong attachment is the cause of a lot of mental agony. Of course we may engage in relationships with the idea that we are going to derive happiness from that relationship, but it often leads to more suffering, more agony and more disturbance to the mind.

The faults of attachment are specifically explained in the following passages of the text. Really, the main point is that having an overly strong attachment to one's close and dear relatives can be a hindrance to one's practice. These faults are quite clearly explained in the text and are not very difficult to understand.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

31. *Although this body came as one,
If the flesh and bones, which were born at the same time,
Disintegrate and separate from each other,
Then what need is there to mention friends and relatives?*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

One should give up the craving of not wanting to be separated from friends and relatives. Even though this body came as a whole, if the flesh and bones, which were born at the same time, disintegrate and separate from each other, then what need is there to mention that one will be separated from friends that came unrelated, through the power of their own individual karma? Think that you will quickly be separated.

The commentary states that one should give up the craving of not wanting to be separated from friends and relatives. In addition to attachment to relatives, friends, and companions, which is, of course, a fault, the specific attachment being referred to here is attachment to not wanting to be separated from a partner in a close relationship. One needs to give up that craving. As presented here, the disadvantage of having this craving is that one will experience enormous mental suffering when separation inevitably takes place.

The reason for giving up this craving (which also serves as an antidote to it) is that even though this body came as a whole, the flesh and bones (which were born at the same time) disintegrate and separate from each other. Of course, the self and the body are inseparable during this lifetime. However, one is born with a body that will naturally disintegrate, and when that happens, the self and the physical body will separate from each other.

So what need is there to mention that one will be separated from friends that came unrelated, through the power of their own individual karma? This rhetorical question implies that as one will be separated from this very body that one is born with, there's no question then that one will be separated from close relatives and friends, and so forth. That will definitely happen.

Contemplating these points is the means to overcome that craving of not wanting to be separated from close friends and relatives. Thinking that you will quickly be separated will then help to overcome that craving. When one contemplates these points thoroughly and overcomes the strong craving of not wanting to be separated, then when the actual separation takes place, there won't be as much agony and suffering.

2.1.2.4.4.2.2. The reason for that

Having explained that it is unsuitable to be attached to friends and relatives, the text then explains why that is the case. So we can see how the text presents the material very meticulously, backing up explanations with sound reasoning.

The verse relating to this heading is:

32. *When one is born, one is born alone,
And when one dies, one dies alone.
Since others will not take our fortune and luck,
What is there to do with obstructing friends?*

The commentary explains:

Although one stays together for a short time, there is no need to grasp at that, because when one is born, one is born alone and when one dies, one dies alone. Since others will not take the sufferings of one's ripened results of the karmas that one created in relation to them, what good are those friends that obstruct the creation of virtue? As one is not benefited by them in the slightest, it is unsuitable to be attached to them.

As explained here in the commentary, although one stays together for a short time, there is no need to grasp at that. The reason for this is that when one is born, one is born alone and when one dies, one dies alone. Since others will not take the sufferings of one's ripened results of the karmas that one created in relation to them, what good are those friends that obstruct the creation of virtue?

While these points are quite clearly explained, we need to contemplate them carefully, and put them into practice so as not to create negativity and harm in relation to one's close ones, relatives and so forth. This is particularly important with Dharma friends, where we need to take particular care not to obstruct their creation of virtue. Indeed, rather than obstructing them, we need to be helping them to create more virtue. One needs to really pay attention to this point.

There are some who claim to be helping others but who are acting with a completely wrong motivation. Some say they are helping the other when in fact they are engaging in sexual misconduct. Behaving in this way is completely contrary to the Dharma, and such a person doesn't even come close to being a real practitioner. One is, in fact, just deluding oneself and the other.

As mentioned in Nagarjuna's Precious Garland, obstructing virtue is one of the heaviest negativities. Since we consider ourselves as Dharma practitioners, we need to pay great attention so that we do not obstruct the collection of virtue by other Dharma practitioners.

Individually, of course, we may engage in negativities, and when we recognise that we have created negativity, we need to acknowledge that. As I've mentioned previously, we acknowledge that we have engaged in the negativity, develop strong regret about having done so, and then engage in confession practices. If we find ourselves engaging in negativity, then that is the time to engage in purification practices by confessing those negativities. We also need to rejoice when we engage in virtue, and when we encourage others to also engage in virtue. Then we can rejoice in that too.

However the reverse of that is also practised where, as I've mentioned previously, people rejoice in the fact that they've created some negativity, and regret that they have accumulated virtue. That is the complete antithesis of Dharma practice. This is an example of one's wisdom eye being blinded. One needs to not be blinded, but to take the initiative to use one's wisdom and intelligence to engage in proper Dharma practice.

The main point being related here is that one should overcome attachment to close ones, such as relatives, friends, and companions, because that attachment can serve as a condition to create a lot of negativities. It can also obstruct the creation of virtue. However the result of that negativity can only be experienced by oneself—one can't share the negative consequences of one's negativities with another person. One has to experience those consequences by oneself.

Then the commentary concludes, as one is not benefited by them in the slightest, it is unsuitable to be attached to them. This is the real point that one needs to keep in mind.

2.1.2.4.4.2.3. Thinking of oneself as a guest that stays each day in a different abode

The analogy being presented here is that of discarding an abode in which one has resided temporarily. Another analogy is of how big gatherings of people will eventually disperse. For example crowds of people swarm around Victoria Market during the day, but by evening the market is completely empty. A recent example was His Holiness's visit to Uluru. I stayed at a guest house which, I was told, had over 200 guests at that time. But the next day, after His Holiness left, most of the guests had left and that abode was now empty. This idea also applies to families. For example, I've heard that there were ten children in the family who originally owned this building, and I heard from one young man who came here that there are very few decedents of that family. These examples show us how gatherings, abodes and so forth naturally disperse.

The verse relating to this reads:

33. *Just as those travelling
Perceive an abode,
Those on the road of existence
Should perceive the abode of birth.*

The commentary explains:

Just as guests travelling on the road perceive the guesthouse as an abode to stay in for one day, likewise it is inappropriate for those who travel on the road of existence due to karma, to have attachment for them that are of the same kind, blood relatives, and the abode of birth where one was born once.

The commentary begins with the analogy of guests travelling on the road finding a guesthouse as an abode to stay in for one day. Likewise, it is inappropriate for those who travel on the road of existence due to karma, to be attached to those who are of the same kind, blood relatives. As we have all been born in this abode of human existence it is as if we are all blood relatives, in the sense that we are all of the same species, i.e. humans. However the time will come when we have to depart this abode and go on to different types of existences. Due to their karma some might be reborn in the unfortunate realms such as the hungry ghost spirit realms; others might be reborn in the human realms again; and yet others find rebirth in the god realms. So in this way the different types of existence, which are similar to abodes, keep on changing.

The point here is there's no point being attached to this abode, as one will eventually have to discard it, and go on to dwell in a different abode.

2.1.2.4.5. Distinction of non-distraction

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.2.4.5.1. It is suitable for the skilled to rely on isolation

2.1.2.4.5.2. The benefits of relying on isolation

2.1.2.4.5.1. It is suitable for the skilled to rely on isolation

Here the skilled refers to those who have great wisdom. Having contemplated the disadvantages presented in the earlier points, they will earnestly seek isolation.

34. *Until this body will be carried
By four people,
While the world is mourning,
Remain in the forest.*

The commentary explains:

Since one is not beyond death at the end of one's life, one should remain in the forest and rely on isolation until one's body will be carried from one's home by four people while the world of one's friends is mourning.

The very fact that one is born means that one will have to inevitably experience death; that is the natural result of being born due to the influence of delusions and karma. Since that is the case then, as explained here, one goes into isolation as a way of applying all of one's time in practice and accumulating virtue before one's body is carried by four pallbearers to the cemetery.

If one were to take this explanation literally, then the best condition for practice is isolation, where one is not distracted. However if one were to take this as a personal instruction, then the main point is that one should dedicate one's time to engaging in the practice of Dharma and accumulating virtue, and not be overly influenced or consumed by distractions from one's close relatives and so forth. In particular, one should bring to mind that when one's life comes to its end, then it will have gone without any essence if one has not engaged in practice. That is the main point to recall here.

2.1.2.4.5.2. The benefits of relying on isolation

Again we can note here the very systematic and logical presentation of the text. Having explained that it is suitable for the skilled to rely on isolation, the logical sequence is to think about the benefits of relying on isolation.

Here there are three subdivisions:

2.1.2.4.5.2.1. There is no misery of mourning

2.1.2.4.5.2.2. Virtue does not decrease but increases

2.1.2.4.5.2.3. Hence, it is appropriate for one to rely on isolation

2.1.2.4.5.2.1. There is no misery of mourning

The verse relating to this heading is preceded by this rhetorical question:

If it is asked, "What are the benefits of remaining in the forest?"

Then the verse is presented:

35. *As there is no friend and no-one with resentment,
This body should remain alone in solitude.
Being regarded as dead even before death,
There will be no mourner when one dies.*

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse, which serves as an answer to the earlier rhetorical question:

Answer: In the forest there are no friends that generate attachment or hatred and there is no-one harbouring resentment against one because of wondering whether they have been harmed by one. Hence, one should remain in physical isolation. Having given up friends and relatives one will be regarded by them as already dead before death, and so there will be no attachment and no mourners when one dies.

As the commentary explains, in the forest there are no friends who generate attachment or hatred, so there is no-one harbouring resentment against one because of wondering whether they have been harmed by one. What is being clearly explained here is that when one goes into solitude to engage in practice then there are no immediate concerns about whether one will be offending others, or be harmed by others. One will be free from all the normal harms and conflicts that arise due to one's relations with others and so forth.

Therefore, as explained here, one should remain in physical isolation. Having given up friends and relatives one will be regarded by them as already dead. By remaining in solitude and engaging in the practice, even those who knew you before will not know exactly where you are. You often hear remarks like, 'Have you seen so and so?' To which others reply, 'Well, we don't know; they could be dead for all we know'. These kinds of remarks are appropriate when one has gone into solitude to engage fully in practice.

Thus there will be no mourners even at the time of death.

2.1.2.4.5.2.2. Virtue does not decrease but increases

The verse relating to this reads:

36. *There is nobody close by
That will mourn or harm.
Through this one will not be distracted
From the recollections of Buddha and so forth.*

As the commentary explains:

If one is remaining in solitude in the forest, as there is no friend or enemy close by that will mourn or harm, one does not have any distractions from the recollections of Buddha and so forth, and from meditating on the path to liberation and omniscient transcendental wisdom. Hence, the skilled will give up distractions and retire to the forest.

As explained here, virtue does not decrease but increases. If one remains in solitude in the forest, as there is no friend or enemy close by that will mourn or harm, means that there will be no one to mourn if one is dead, and no-one to harm oneself.

One does not have any distractions from the recollections of Buddha and so forth. There are six recollections:

1. Recollection of the Buddha;
2. Recollection of the Dharma;
3. Recollection of the Sangha;
4. Recollection of morality;
5. Recollection of generosity; and
6. Recollection of the deities.

Furthermore, contemplating suchness and acquiring the conditions for liberation and enlightenment are further practices that one engages in without distraction in isolation. Thus the skilled, (those with great wisdom) will give up distractions and retire to the forest, to remain in solitude in order to engage in practice.

2.1.2.4.5.2.3. Hence, it is appropriate for one to rely on isolation

Having explained the benefits of isolation, the conclusion is that it is appropriate for one to rely on isolation. The verse relating to this reads:

37. *Hence, in the extremely delightful forest
There is little difficulty but bliss and happiness.
Pacifying all distraction
I shall remain in solitude.*

The commentary explains:

Hence, by remaining in the extremely delightful forest, where physical and mental happiness increases, one has little difficulty as one obtains livelihood easily, and as there are no harms like sicknesses, happiness is generated. Therefore, one should pacify all distractions and abide in solitude. One will have less harm, and virtue will increase.

As explained clearly here, by remaining in the extremely delightful forest, i.e. the conducive conditions in the forest, where physical and mental happiness increases, one has little difficulty, because one obtains livelihood easily, and as there are no harms like sicknesses; as such happiness is generated. Thus, one should pacify all distractions and abide in solitude. By doing so one will have less harm, and virtue will increase.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷོ་མེམས་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འདུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

17 November 2015

Based on the motivation generated during the prayers, let us engage in our meditation practice. (Meditation)

We can now generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it's meaning into practice.

2.2. Abandoning incorrect conceptualisation

This is divided into two:

2.2.1. Meditating on disillusionment of desire

2.2.2. Meditating on joy for solitude

2.2.1. Meditating on disillusionment of desire

This is sub-divided into three:

2.2.1.1. Contemplating that the result of cultivating desire is fraught with dangers

2.2.1.2. Contemplating the impure nature of the body, and so forth

2.2.1.3. Contemplating that it will give rise to much that is unwished for

2.2.1.1. CONTEMPLATING THAT THE RESULT OF CULTIVATING DESIRE IS FRAUGHT WITH DANGERS

This is sub-divided into two:

2.2.1.1.1. Advice to strive in virtue

2.2.1.1.2. Contemplating the faults of desire

Having earlier presented the reason to seek solitude, this advice follows sequentially in that once in solitude one should then strive in virtue. These are very significant points.

2.2.1.1.1. Advice to strive in virtue

The verse reads:

38. *Giving up all other thoughts,
I shall strive single-mindedly
In placing the mind in equipoise
For the purpose of subduing it.*

The commentary then explains the meaning as follows:

Giving up all other thoughts such as attachment and harmful intent, and with only the one thought to meditate on the two bodhicittas, I shall strive to place my mind in single-pointed equipoise on virtue and then, to subdue the mind, strive to abandon the afflictions by meditating on the meaning of reality.

The commentary clearly presents that the condition of going into solitude means giving up all other thoughts, such as the eight worldly concerns, specifically, attachment. This includes attachment to one's own body, attachment to wealth and good resources, as well as attachment to dear ones such as relatives and friends. Giving up harmful intentions also includes ulterior motives, such as meditating for the sake of gaining renown as a great meditator. So having given up all such thoughts, the commentary encourages one to have only the one thought, meditating on the two bodhicittas— aspiring bodhicitta and engaging bodhicitta. I shall strive to place my mind in single-pointed equipoise specifically relates to having the single-pointed mind of focusing on virtue. Thus one's sole intention is to completely use one's time for the benefit of other sentient beings.

Only the one thought, refers to the sole thought of benefitting sentient beings, and single-pointed equipoise, refers to placing one's mind in virtue. So what one strives to achieve in solitude is single-pointed equipoise on virtue, which indicates developing calm abiding. Based on this, to further subdue one's mind one strives, to abandon the afflictions by meditating on the meaning of reality. This reveals that having developed calm abiding, one further applies the antidotes for overcoming the afflictions and subduing one's mind, by achieving 'special insight'. With the aid of special insight one meditates on the meaning of reality, through which one then strives to abandon the afflictions. Shantideva meticulously summarises here that the purpose of going into solitude is to achieve calm abiding, and based on that, achieve special insight and subdue one's mind by overcoming the afflictions.

The instruction here is given on the basis of having given up attachment and choosing solitude, and then applying the practice in this way. How do those of us, who do not yet have all the conditions for going into solitude, take this advice as personal instruction to apply to our own practice? The approach is to apply our mind, even if only for a few minutes (up to one hour is great but if not, at least five to ten minutes a day). If one could begin one's meditation by applying and maintaining a single-pointed mind on a virtuous object (for a few minutes or as long as is comfortable), then one can contemplate how all things are empty of inherent existence (with whatever understanding one has) and apply that in one's practice. If one maintains such a practice at one's own level, it will establish the conditions for developing calm abiding and cultivating special insight.

To expand on personal practice further, the first part is subduing one's mind by single-pointed focus on virtuous objects, followed by analytical meditation on the nature of reality or emptiness. Then generate the bodhicitta mind by contemplating the seven-step cause and effect sequence. If one is familiar with it then one can combine it with the 'exchanging self with other' technique. Having meditated in these ways to generate the mind of bodhicitta, one can then generate the aspiring mind to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings. After spending some time contemplating that, next acknowledge that just having the aspiration to achieve enlightenment is not enough—one needs to actually engage in the practices of a bodhisattva. Recall one's own vows (if one has taken bodhisattva vows) as a way to re-establish and enhance them. Meditate further on remembering the promise one made, and develop a keen determination to practice the six perfections. In this way one establishes a very good imprint in one's mind by putting these instructions into practice to the best of one's own ability.

In what has been explained here, one can notice that this practice also summarises the three higher trainings. The first part - the practice of morality - relates to giving up all other thoughts. Thus as one gives up attachment one generates renunciation. In this way, giving up attachments such as the eight worldly concerns establishes the training of morality. Based on that, developing single-pointed equipoise is the basis for developing calm abiding, which is training in meditation; then cultivating special insight becomes the training of wisdom. In this way the three trainings are encompassed in this practice.

The commentary presents a quote:

From the Sutra that was requested by the Fierce Householder:

And further, Householder, if ordained bodhisattvas remain in solitude why should I remain in solitude? Only remaining in solitude is not virtuous practice ... Investigate by thinking, 'for what reason shall I perfectly complete my virtuous practice by remaining in solitude?'

This is one of the many passages that indicate how the direct recipients of Shantideva's teaching are the ordained community. The sutra says, further, Householder, if ordained bodhisattvas remain in solitude why should I remain in solitude? highlighting that when an ordained bodhisattva goes into solitude, the reason for doing so needs to be contemplated. The commentary states only remaining in solitude is not virtuous practice, meaning that going into solitude is not all that difficult—with the right conditions anyone could do it. But seeking solitude to engage in virtuous practice is the main point. So even if one has given up a nice house, nice food and nice clothing and has borne hardships, if one just remains idly in solitude without placing one's mind in virtue and accomplishing the practice, then being in solitude doesn't serve much purpose. We are being encouraged here to really contemplate the real purpose for going into solitude. Having contemplated this, and as one reassures oneself that it is for the purpose of engaging in practice, then it becomes a supreme condition for actually engaging in practice.

I'll relate a personal experience about the early part of my life. Having left my home town to go to Lhasa, which is quite a significant journey, I remained three years in the monastery. It is a tradition that after three years monks can go back to their home after completing this minimal requirement. I was missing home and thinking of going back because of the hardships in the monastery and being so far away from home. But when I sought permission from my teacher he didn't give it, and suggested it was better to stay in the monastery. At that point I thought, 'Why would my teacher stop me from going back home?' Obviously it was not very comfortable for me in the monastery where food was scarce and the living conditions very poor. So I had to really think, 'Why would I stay on in a monastery? Why would my teacher prevent me from returning home?' Then it occurred to me that the only reason my teacher had for me to continue staying at the monastery would be for me to fully engage in the geshe study program of all the major texts. When that became apparent in my mind, and that this was the only reason my teacher had for preventing me from returning home, it encouraged me to fully commit myself to the monastery and engage in the geshe studies. Since then I have never turned back, and I didn't return home. For me, when the purpose became clear, it made it easier for my mind to bear the hardships.

We can apply this approach to any practice we engage in which may involve hardships e.g. the nyung nye practice. When someone does the nyung nye practice there are obvious difficulties such as abstaining from food and abstaining from drink for a day. So the body faces tiredness, heat and cold. With all hardships, if one doesn't constantly remember the purpose of doing the practice (such as the many benefits explained in the nyung nye practice) then it would be a case of experiencing a lot of pain, without obtaining much gain. But if one keeps the purpose in mind, and constantly reminds oneself that doing the practice is a way to gain extensive merit and dedicate it to others, then it serves the purpose.

If you are doing the nyung nye practice for the first time it may appear quite difficult. However in time one gets used to it and becomes encouraged when one sees the great benefits. The first time I did a nyung nye, abstaining from food was the least of my hardships. I did not find it difficult at all. I guess that was because I was never too keen on wanting good food or lavish meals anyway. It is definitely beneficial if one doesn't have strong attachment to food so that when one has to give it up it doesn't become too difficult. If one seeks out delicious meals, the thought of being deprived of them makes it difficult for your mind to consider giving them up. It would seem that having to give up any meal may be difficult for some. The stronger one's determination to renounce a lavish lifestyle and shun worldly desires, the easier it is to engage in a rigorous practice.

I recall Janette in Bendigo who liked to eat fish a lot. Apparently when she couldn't have fish for a while and saw some, she would start to tremble. This is not just a case of desire for fish. When anyone who has strong desire for food doesn't get a meal for a while, they start to tremble in anticipation of having one. The earlier quote is summarised in that explanation.

2.2.1.1.2. Contemplating the faults of desire

To give up desires for an object one firstly needs to contemplate the faults of desire itself. What are the faults of desire? This is presented next.

The verse reads:

39. *In this world and also in the one beyond
Desire objects generate great destruction.
Here one will be killed, bound and cut,
In the beyond, hells and so forth are established.*

The commentary explains:

Because of craving desire objects, they generate great destruction in this world, as well as in the one beyond. Here one will be killed, bound and cut, and in the world beyond hells and so forth will be established.

The commentary highlights that, Because of craving desire objects, they generate great destruction, where destruction also implies bringing about faults or suffering. In this world means in this life as well as in the one beyond. Here indicates in this very life one can clearly see that engaging in killing out of desire, brings about the consequence of being bound and cut and beaten and so forth. In this very life one can clearly see the obvious shortcomings of the cravings of desire. In the beyond, meaning the world beyond or the next life, the result is to be reborn in the lower realms such as the hells and so forth.

The commentary quotes a sutra to back up these explanations:

From the Sutra requested by the girl Supreme Moon:

Due to the cause of desire, sentient beings fall into the lower realms. Due to attachment, they become hungry ghosts and animals.

The meaning of this quotation from the sutra is quite clear.

2.2.1.2. CONTEMPLATING THE IMPURE NATURE OF THE BODY AND SO FORTH

And so forth in the title indicates the body shares an impure nature with other things also of this nature.

This is sub-divided into two:

2.2.1.2.1. Contemplating the faults in relation to the situation of the cemetery

2.2.1.2.2. Contemplating the situation in relation to animate phenomena

2.2.1.2.1. Contemplating the faults in relation to the situation of the cemetery

This is sub-divided into six:

2.2.1.2.1.1. There are no results that corpses experience

2.2.1.2.1.2. One is not beyond being cast aside in the cemetery in the end

2.2.1.2.1.3. It is unsuitable to protect others' or one's own body with greed

2.2.1.2.1.4. It is unsuitable to put on ornaments

2.2.1.2.1.5. It is suitable to be very afraid

2.2.1.2.1.6. Attachment to that wearing clothes is unsuitable

2.2.1.2.1.1. There are no results that corpses experience

This title tells us that corpses cannot experience any results.

In the following passages it is quite clear what is being presented; it is something that is quite obvious in our world system.

The verses read:

40. *The object of the many requests
Made initially by the male and female matchmakers,
For whose sake one is unafraid
Of negativity or bad reputation,*

41ab. *Puts oneself into danger
And exhausts one's resources,*

The commentary then explains:

One makes requests repeatedly to the male and female matchmakers saying, "Please organise it that she stays together with me to make a home," without being afraid of negativity and bad advice. If this woman's body, for which one fearlessly disregards harm, puts oneself into harm's way and exhausts one's resources, ...

The first part clearly explains, One makes requests repeatedly to the male and female matchmakers. In Tibetan matchmakers are called go-betweens. They are people who bring messages back and forth to make a match between potential couples. The requests are made by sending gifts or messages and making requests like, Please organise it that she stays together with me to make a home. From the male's perspective the request is made to the female, sending messages like, 'Make her consider staying with me'. Such requests are made with strong desire and without being afraid of the negativity and bad advice, or a bad reputation, regarding the relationship that may be happening. It continues with, if this woman's body, for which one fearlessly disregards harm, puts oneself into harm's way and exhausts one's resources, which is the consequence.

Again, this advice is targeted at the ordained community (in particular a fully ordained monk) to caution them against the pitfalls of a relationship with a woman. It very directly advises that by being attached to a woman's body, you are fearlessly disregarding the harm that you put yourself in, and put oneself into harm's way, with all the complications of a relationship etc. But also in a practical way, it will exhaust your own resources. The point here is that one has to spend a lot of money to beautify a wife, as she needs makeup, nice clothing, jewellery and perfume, all of which can be very expensive. These are expenses one would have to bear in order to present the woman with gifts and please her. Shantideva cautions those who might give up their practice, telling them to be careful!

It is clear that when one is under the strong control of attachment then it blinds one to the reality of the situation, and one makes a lot of mistakes. The great master Dharmakirti mentioned that when strong attachment occurs it obscures the faults in the other, and actually exaggerates their qualities. These are very significant points that obviously seem to be the case.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama has clearly explained that if one were to ask whether money can get you friends, the answer is 'Yes! With a significant amount of money you might get friends'. But once those friends acquire what they want they will leave you. His Holiness further explains that this is an indication that money cannot buy true and reliable friendship. He then goes on to explain that a reliable friendship is one which will help you regardless of your financial situation. For example when you are in distress or difficult times, those that help you at that time are true friends. This is a reliable and trustworthy friendship. His Holiness says that the kind of friendship we need is not one obtained through our money; rather through our inner qualities. By having inner qualities, one can gain true friendship through kindness etc.

The verses read:

41cd That, when one embraces it Makes one very joyful,

42. *If it is nothing but a skeleton
Without freedom or self,
That one strongly desires and grasps at intensely,
Why does one not go beyond misery?*

The commentary explains the meaning of these lines:

... the body that generates attachment and that one is so happy to embrace, is but a mere skeleton and nothing else, from the start without freedom or a self that protects it, and which one purposelessly desires strongly and grasps at intensely, then why does one not go beyond misery? One should abandon attachment and strive in the path to liberation.

The male is attached to the woman's body ... the body that generates attachment and that one is so happy to embrace. After a relationship is sought it feels like one possesses the other's body. The very body that one longs for and is happy to embrace is actually nothing but a mere skeleton and nothing else. In essence it is only a skeleton from the inside.

The phrase, from the start without freedom or a self that protects it, means that from the very beginning the relationship is in that nature, which one purposelessly desires strongly and grasps at intensely, then why does one not go beyond misery? When one contemplates the strong grasping at a body, which from its very beginning and in its very nature is nothing but a skeleton, and due to attachment produces so much suffering and agony, then why does one not go beyond misery? This rhetorical question implies that one should strive to go beyond misery, rather than being attached to the very object that causes the misery.

The conclusion here is that one should abandon attachment and strive in the path to liberation. In summary, if one has attachment and does not give up desire, this prevents one from going beyond misery and achieving liberation. If one wishes to strive for liberation one needs to give up attachment. Here the specific object of attachment is presented as a person of the opposite sex, but it actually means giving up all attachments.

Specific details of the explanation will be presented later on. This part mainly focuses on the technique of meditating on the imperfections of the body to which one is attached. The body here is presented as nothing more than a skeleton. To meditate on the imperfections of the body as an antidote to overcome attachment is more applicable to one's mind when using reasoning and logic rather than just taking it as 'Oh, this is what's been explained in the teachings so I have to meditate on the imperfections of the body'. Rather than taking it at face value and something one has to accept, if one bases one's conclusion on one's own investigation and reasoning, then the practice becomes acceptable and applicable to one's mind.

The reasoning that comes about through investigation is based on analysing the actual body that one is attached to. Initially one may be attached to the exterior such as the skin, but then one goes beyond the skin and what is beyond the beautiful skin is actually flesh, veins and sinews. Then one goes beyond that to fatty tissues etc. and then you go beyond that to the muscles. If you go further into the body in this investigation the reality is that you will come to the bones, and the bones are the skeleton. One does this investigation from the soles of the feet to the very top of the head, going through each and every part of the body. When one analyses the body in this way then the imperfections of the body appear as the nature and reality of the object. It is in this way that one gets the real sense of the imperfections of the body.

Applying the practice of meditation to focus on the imperfections of the body shows that a body which initially appeared attractive, becomes the object of meditation on the imperfection of the body. That is how it is done. As explained earlier, while initially there is an appearance of attractiveness, if one takes a step beyond that to mentally dissect and analyse the body, then one reaches the point where it appears as an actual skeleton.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

24 November 2015

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

Now we can generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings, along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, in order to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings, and put them into practice well.

2.2.1.2. CONTEMPLATING THE IMPURE NATURE OF THE BODY AND SO FORTH

2.2.1.2.1. Contemplating the faults in relation to the situation of the cemetery

We now move onto contemplating the imperfections of the body as a way of overcoming attachment to the body. Here the specific focus is on desire for a woman's body from a male perspective. However, as I've explained previously, it also applies to a woman who is attached to a man's body. These explanations apply to both men and women.

2.2.1.2.1.2. One is not beyond being cast aside in the cemetery in the end

No matter how attractive a body may appear, at the end it is taken to the cemetery and cast aside. That is its ultimate destination. So we can see that this is also a presentation of impermanence, in particular death and impermanence. Furthermore, it not only applies to the attractive bodies of others, but it also applies to one's own body. That is what we need to keep in mind.

There are two verses under this heading:

43. *When one first raises it with effort
And draws it to oneself, she looks down bashfully.
Whether one saw it before or not,
A veil covers her face.*
44. *Just as the face of the afflictions
When you see it is obvious to you now, then, after it is revealed
By the vultures, why do you want to leave?*

The commentary explains:

She looks down bashfully when one first raises her face due to desire and draws it to oneself. Whether one saw it before or not, before going to the cemetery, her face is covered by a veil. Just as the face of the afflictions is obvious to you now, at the time of death, when vultures remove the veil and one can see her face very clearly, why, at that time, do you flee and leave? Also at that time, it is suitable to be attached to it.

The explanation in the commentary relates to the way the bride is traditionally brought to the groom in India. I don't know if there's the same tradition here of the bride having a veil over her face. Because the bride's face is covered, the groom will naturally want to see her face, and when the veil is first lifted the bride will shyly look down. That was often how the bride and groom first met, so the groom has a strong longing to see his bride's face.

As the commentary continues to explain, at that first meeting the groom anticipates unveiling the bride's face with strong longing and desire, but on her death she will be taken to the cemetery. Then, regardless of whether her face is veiled at that time or not, it will be unveiled by vultures at the cemetery. The commentary asks, 'At that time, when its bare nature is clearly exposed to you, why don't you long to see it? If you were strongly attached to the woman it would be appropriate to look at her then, but you run away'. This shows us the contradictions that exist in a desirous, longing mind.

What is clearly being presented here is that contemplating its natural imperfections of an attractive body is actually a method of reducing strong attachment and desire. These are really significant points to contemplate. Being completely obsessed with very strong desire for another person definitely causes mental disturbance and agitation. Therefore, a mind filled with strong desire cannot be calm. So when strong desire and attachment arise, this method is presented as a way to overcome that desire. It would be wise to apply it as a way of appeasing one's mind.

As explained in the commentary, when one meditates on the imperfections of the body, one is actually meditating on the natural defects of the body. Having contemplated the obvious defects first, one then goes further contemplating the defects of the body as it decomposes after death when it decomposes. This is yet another method to overcome strong attachment.

As I've mentioned previously, attempting to meditate on the imperfections of the body, while still holding onto the object as being attractive deep inside one's mind, will not work. For this meditation to actually take effect, one has to develop a firm and stable understanding of the imperfections of the body, and contemplate that. Only after repeated meditation will one be able to let go of the strong attachment. Attempting to meditate on the imperfections of the body while still harbouring a view of the other's body as being clean and attractive, will not do much to remove desire.

This is really a presentation of the ways of overcoming faulty states of mind. Here a distinction needs to be made between seeing the object itself as being at fault or repulsive, and the need to work on one's own mind as a way to overcome strong attachment to that object. Indeed, as presented here, attachment arises when the object appears as attractive and appealing. That mind of attachment exaggerates the qualities of the object, making it appear as being extremely attractive and appealing, and that's when strong attachment arises. In contrast, when the defects of the body are exaggerated and it appears to be completely unattractive and unappealing, then aversion arises in the mind. In both cases, it is the faulty perception that leads to mental unrest, not the object itself.

The main culprit behind these faulty states of mind is, of course, ignorance. It is as if this ignorance compels the mind to judge the qualities of the object, making it perceive the object as being very attractive, thus leading to attachment. Likewise it is again ignorance that exaggerates the faults of the object, seeing it as being unattractive and thus leading to aversion.

There is a way to overcome these faulty states of mind. Meditating on the imperfections of an object helps to reduce attachment to it. That then enables the mind to settle down. When aversion arises on seeing an unattractive object, then meditating on love and developing compassion towards the object will help to overcome the faulty state of mind that sees only faults and imperfections. Then one can begin to see some of the qualities of the object, which will start to appear as being appealing.

These are really important points to consider, and put into practice. We have the knowledge and understanding of how these meditations can be applied, so if we fail to apply these techniques and instead become overwhelmed with strong attachment or strong aversion then that completely defies the whole purpose of these teachings. It would be a great pity if one doesn't use these methods, despite having access to them.

There's not much that someone who doesn't know anything at all about these methods and techniques can do with a strongly afflicted mind that can completely consume them. But as we do have these methods and techniques, we should use them. I am re-emphasising the points being presented here as a way to exhort you to try to put them into practice.

2.2.1.2.1.3. It is unsuitable to protect others' or one's own body with greed

The verse under this heading reads:

45. *When others look at it
You strongly protect it.
But when it is eaten by them,
Greedy one, why do you not protect it?*

The commentary explains:

When other men look at your woman, you jealously protect her from their glances. Greedy one, when this body of hers is eaten by vultures and so forth, why do you not protect it then? By being attached, it is suitable to be protected.

Again the commentary is using the example of a man being attracted to a woman, in particular his bride or partner. When others even just look at her, the man immediately notices that, and wants to protect her. If that is the case, then, as the commentary asks, 'why don't you protect her when her body is being eaten by vultures? As you are attached to her, it would be appropriate to protect her at that time as well'.

2.2.1.2.1.4. It is unsuitable to put on ornaments

The relevant verse reads:

46. *If vultures and others, upon
Having spotted it, eat this heap of flesh,*

One is making offerings with flower garlands, sandal

And ornaments to the food of others.

Then the commentary explains:

Further, if vultures, coyotes and others eat this heap of flesh upon having spotted it in the cemetery, then why is one making offerings with flower garlands, sandal and golden ornaments to their food? It is unsuitable to offer ornaments even when the body is alive.

This explanation is quite clear. The main thing is that when a beautiful body becomes a corpse, and vultures and coyotes and other creatures start to devour the body, then that beautiful body has become nothing more than food for those wild animals. If that is the case, 'why do you make offerings for beautifying the other's body with flower garlands and sandal and golden ornaments and so forth. It is as if you are offering ornaments to the food of wild animals'.

These passages present different ways to reflect upon the natural defects and imperfections of the body. The more one contemplates these logical reasons, the more that will help the mind to really begin to accept them. Rather than just accepting the words at face value, when one comes to a conclusion using logical analysis the mind becomes very strong and steady, and able to combat the faulty state of mind that exaggerates the qualities of the body, and sees it as being pure. When that occurs, then attachment is naturally reduced. This is how these meditation practices actually work.

2.2.1.2.1.5. It is suitable to be very afraid

The relevant verse reads:

47. *If one is afraid merely by seeing a skeleton,
Even if it does not move,
Then why is one not afraid
If some even move, like zombies?*

As the commentary explains:

If one runs away in fear because one merely sees an unmoving skeleton while being in the cemetery, then why is one not afraid when one sees them even moving about, like zombies, induced by the mind of motivation, while they are alive? It is suitable to be as afraid of them as of zombies, and it is unsuitable to be attached.

Again the explanation in the commentary is very clear. When one sees a body completely exposed, with the flesh eaten away and only a skeleton remaining, one might want to run away out of fear. In fact that skeleton is just lying there and not moving at all, and yet one generates strong fear and wants to run away.

So why is one not afraid when one sees them even moving about, like zombies. As explained in the commentary, the movements of living people are basically motivated by a state of mind. It is their motivation that directs their limbs into the act of moving. The commentary asks, 'So when you see them moving, why aren't you frightened of them?' A zombie is a dead body that suddenly stands up and starts to move, and of course if we saw one we would be very afraid, and want to run away. In Nepal the doorways are quite low because, it is said, this will prevent zombies from coming inside as they can only walk while standing up straight. Apparently there were a lot of zombies in Nepal at some point in the past.

The main point here is that if one were to see a zombie then there's no way one would feel attachment to that being. Rather one would run away out of fear. So it is suitable to be as afraid of ordinary people, as of zombies, and it is unsuitable to be attached. As explained here, when there's strong fear then there's no place for attachment and no place for anger. What are otherwise strong negative minds such as anger, attachment temporarily cease in the face of fear.

2.2.1.2.1.6. Attachment to that wearing clothes is unsuitable.

A faulty mind might be attached to a body because of the beautiful clothes it is wearing. This heading reflects on how there's no reason to be attached to clothes if it is actually the body that one is attached to.

I have seen on television women who have once been quite beautiful and who are now so thin that their body almost looks like a skeleton. Apparently some are successfully treated, and get back to normal, but I don't know what happens to the others. Looking like a skeleton is not attractive—people need to have some flesh on their body to look appealing.

Just a few days ago there was a report about a very tall but extremely thin young man playing basketball. I don't know what the story was about, perhaps because he was the tallest person, but he didn't look very appealing because he was so skinny.

It seems that there is a faulty state of mind which thinks that it is suitable to be attached to someone because they are wearing attractive clothes. There is this strong notion that if you are wearing nice clothes then others may start paying attention to you. If that is the case and if you want a boyfriend or a girlfriend, or you want others to notice you, then you should wear very nice clothes.

Some go to great measures to beautify their body before they go out, with clothes and make-up and so on, and that can take quite a long time. This reminds me of the time when I was staying with quite a wealthy and very nice family in Perth. The mother was quite interested in Buddhism, and the couple had two daughters and a son. Once when we were about to go out, the son commented on how his mother always seemed to take such a long time to get ready. The family might be ready to go but twenty minutes later she was still not ready. Even though she was no longer young she took time to beautify herself. But, I suppose that when you are from a well-known wealthy family, you want to present yourself well when you go out.

In general, I feel it is a good thing to make yourself presentable by being clean and wearing nice clean clothes. In a way it shows respect for others, and to a certain degree it is socially necessary.

Of course what is being systematically presented here are the various reasons that overcome different kinds of faulty states of mind. If, on seeing a body as being attractive one becomes attached to that body, then this text presents reasons showing how to overcome that faulty state of attachment.

Here the text is dealing with being attached to the attractive clothing on a body, and again presenting reasons that will show why it is not suitable to be attached to that clothing.

As the verse reads:

48. *If one is attached although it is dressed
Then why not desire it when it is undressed?
If one has no need for it,
Then why embrace it when it is dressed?*

The commentary explains:

When the body that one is attached to although being clothed, has been cast aside at the cemetery, why is one not attached now, despite it being undressed? One should be attached also then. If one has no need for it when being cast aside at the cemetery, then why embrace the dressed body? They are the same in being impure.

As the commentary explains, when the very body that one is attached to when clothed, is cast aside at a cemetery, why is one not attached to it at that time, despite it being undressed. What is being implied here is that the body that one was attached to when she wore beautiful clothes, is the same body that it is cast aside at the cemetery. 'So why are you are not attached to the body at that time?' This rhetorical question implies, that one should be attached also then.

As it is the same body then one should still be attached to that body. If one has no need for it when being cast aside at the cemetery, then why embrace the dressed body now? If one were to argue, 'well there's no reason to be attached to that body at the cemetery, because a body in the cemetery is not attractive. If one argues in that way, then 'why embrace that face and body now because it is the same in that it is also an impure body. There's no change in the impurity of the body, so why do you embrace it now?' As explained here, they are the same in being impure.

2.2.1.2.2. Contemplating the situation in relation to animate phenomena

That is subdivided into three:

2.2.1.2.2.1. It is unsuitable to be attached as the impure becomes obvious

2.2.1.2.2.2. Attachment is unsuitable, as one realises it in dependence upon reason

2.2.1.2.2.3. Hence, stop grasping at the pure

2.2.1.2.2.1. It is unsuitable to be attached as the impure is obvious

This is further subdivided into five:

2.2.1.2.2.1.1. It is unsuitable to be attached to objects of touch

2.2.1.2.2.1.2. Stopping the conception of purity

2.2.1.2.2.1.3. Body and mind are individually not the object of attachment

2.2.1.2.2.1.4. Contemplating these faults by relating them to oneself

2.2.1.2.2.1.5. Shape is not the object of attachment

2.2.1.2.2.1.1. It is unsuitable to be attached to objects of touch

The material under this heading explains ways of overcoming the faulty state of mind we have when we are attached to specific objects. The first verse reads:

49. *If from food alone arise
Saliva and excrement,
And if out of these one does not like excrement,
Why does one specifically like saliva?*

The commentary begins with this comment:

If one says, 'I like the saliva of a woman'.

Then, as an answer, the commentary explains:

Answer: As saliva as well as excrement and urine arise from the same very cause of food, why do you prefer the saliva and dislike the excrement? They are the same in arising from an impure cause and in being an impure result.

The commentary logically explains that if one were to be attached to the saliva of the woman then, as saliva excrement and urine all arise from the very same cause i.e. food, why do you prefer only the saliva and dislike the excrement? They are the same in arising from an impure cause and thus in being an impure result.

The next two verses directly relate to attachment arising from touching an object. These logical reasons overcome strong attachment to objects that are impure in nature. When one contemplates these points carefully and relates them to the actual nature of the body, then any strong attachment will definitely reduce, and ultimately one will overcome attachment to that body.

The second verse under this heading reads:

50. *Cushions made of cotton that are soft
To the touch one does not like.
Saying, 'It does not have any bad smell.'
The desirous are deluded regarding impure.*

As the commentary explains,

They discriminate between the cotton cushion that is soft to the touch and the feel of a woman. Saying that foul smells do not emit from a woman's body, when in fact it does, the desirous are deluded regarding the impure and thus act with attachment.

This is another presentation showing the absurd arguments posited by the mind of desire. If the desirous mind claims, 'I like the touch of the woman because it is soft', then the response presented here is, 'if that is your reason then why wouldn't you also be attached to cotton, which is also soft to the touch'.

The main point being presented here is that, saying that foul smells do not emit from a woman's body, when in fact they do, the desirous are deluded regarding the impure, and thus act with attachment.

The third verse under this heading reads:

51. *The corrupt desirous that are deluded
Say, "Though the cotton is soft to the touch,
One cannot have intercourse with it",
And become angry with it.*

As the commentary explains:

The corrupt desirous people say that although the cotton is soft when touched, one cannot have intercourse with the cotton, and become angry with it. Hence, they intensely grasp only at that which is distorted. It is unsuitable to be attached to objects of touch.

This is a very clear explanation. The main point is that it is unsuitable to be attached to objects of touch.

2.2.1.2.2.1.2. Stopping the conception of purity

The relevant verse reads:

52. *If there is no attachment to the impure
Then why do you embrace the midst of others,
Who are a bone cage bound by sinews,
Given a face with the mud of flesh?*

The commentary explains that:

If you say, 'I have no attachment for the impure', then why do you embrace the midst of women, who are but a bone cage bound by a net of sinews and given a face with the mud of flesh? It is unsuitable.

As clearly presented in the commentary, if one were to say 'I have no reason to be attached to the impure', then the contradictory nature of the mind of attachment is illustrated in this response, then why do you embrace the midst of women, who are but a bone cage bound by a net of sinews and given a face with the mud of flesh? As presented here quite vividly, when we really think about it the basic structure that supports the body is the skeleton. Over the skeleton are sinews interleaved among layers of flesh, which is given a face with the mud of flesh. If one were constructing a body, then mud would be used to sculpt the face.

The next verse reads,

53. *Yours alone, which possesses many impurities,
You utilise continuously, and
Out of a thirst for the impure
You desire also other bags of filth.*

And the commentary explains that,

Further, your very body, which possesses many impurities, you utilise continuously, and you also crave and are thirsty for the impurity of other impure bags. If you are not satisfied with your own body, then why do you desire the body of a woman? It is unsuitable.

As the commentary explains the meaning of the verse very clearly, we do not need to clarify it any further.

2.2.1.2.2.1.3. Body and mind are individually not the object of attachment

Having shown that the body in general is not a suitable object of attachment, this section shows how the body and the mind individually are unsuitable objects of attachment. The first verse under this heading reads:

54. *You say, "I like this flesh."
If you desire to touch and look at it,
Then why do you not desire the Inanimate flesh?*

The commentary explains:

You say, 'I do not like contact with cotton, but I do like the feel of the body of another'.

Answer: If you desire contact with, and to look upon the body of another, then why do you not desire the flesh of an inanimate dead body? You should like it but as you do not, it is unsuitable to be attached to the body.

This is showing the absurdity of saying 'I like the feel of a body, and there is no reason to be attached to cotton because it is an inanimate object'.

As your reason is that cotton is inanimate and a body is not, then why do you not desire the flesh of a dead body as well? So again the text is showing the absurdity of the reasons one might give for being attached to a body.

The second verse in the section reads:

55. *The mind you desire
You cannot touch or see,
That which you can touch or see is not mind.
What is meaningless copulation good for?*

The commentary starts with the following hypothetical argument:

Argument: 'I am attached to the mind of others'.

The commentary answers that argument:

Answer: You cannot touch or look at the mind you desire, and that which you can touch is not mind. Therefore, what good is it to embrace the meaningless body and be attached to it? As it is not good for anything, it is unsuitable to be attached.

As the commentary clearly explains, 'how can you say you are attached to the mind as an object of desire? It is something that cannot be touched. Moreover that which you can touch is not the mind. So why be attached to the mind?

2.2.1.2.2.1.4. Contemplating these faults by relating them to oneself

This is another very significant point. Having described the impurity of the bodies of others, one now applies all of these same reasonings to one's own body. Precious Garland also gives extensive explanations of the impurities of the body of others, and it too urges one to relate them to oneself.

The verse reads:

56. *That one does not realise the impure nature
Of the body of others is not very surprising,
But that one does not realise
That oneself is impure is very surprising.*

The commentary explains that:

That one does not realise the impure nature of the body of others is not very surprising, but that one does not realise the impure nature of one's own body that continually disintegrates into something impure, this is indeed surprising. This is an ironic statement. Once one understands the impure, it becomes unsuitable to be attached.

This is another very clear presentation. Being unaware of the impure nature of the bodies of others is not very surprising, but knowing that one's body continually disintegrates into something which is impure, yet not realising its impurity, is quite astonishing.

One is very familiar with the fact that one's body is slowly disintegrating, yet despite this, one does not realise that this disintegrating body is impure. The main point is that once one is able to realise that one's own body is impure in nature, then that understanding can be easily applied to the bodies of others as well.

2.2.1.2.2.1.5. Shape is not the object of attachment

The verse relating to this heading is:

57. *Why reject the fresh lotus
With petals unfolded by sunlight unobstructed
by clouds,
And take joy in the impure cage
With a mind grasping for the impure?*

As the commentary explains:

If the pure fresh lotus with petals unfolded by the clear sunlight unobstructed by clouds has all these qualities, then why reject it and take joy in the impure cage due to the grasping for the impure? Since it is unsuitable to like it, it is also unsuitable to be attached to its shape.

As clearly explained here, when a lotus first opens, with petals unfolded by the clear sunlight unobstructed by clouds, it has all these marvellous qualities. Rather than being intrigued by, and even attached to this natural beauty, one pays more attention to a body that is impure by nature. Why do you grasp at the impure? It is because of the faulty mind of attachment.

The conclusion is that since it is unsuitable to like it, it is also unsuitable to be attached to the shape of the body.

These explanations are not obscure and are easy to understand. So the main point is to contemplate them, and then put it into practice.

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

Once again we have this wonderful opportunity of being able to gather together and meet each other.

Over the break I travelled to India with some of you. I had a very fortunate time in India — it was a time like no other. An enormous crowd (I estimated it to be thirty-five thousand people) attended the teachings, and the arrangements were amazing. A free lunch was provided for all, along with free tea and bread in the morning teaching session and tea in the afternoon, and all of it was of good quality. Bottled water was available all the time; in various corners bottles of water were piled up like small hills, so you could take a bottle whenever you needed. Some were only half empty when they were discarded, which shows how plentiful the supply was. Those were just the good external conditions that were in place for the teaching sessions.

Of course the teaching was presented by His Holiness the Dalai Lama, a most extraordinary and unequalled teacher. And the topic of the teaching was the actual words of the Buddha himself. As His Holiness mentioned during the teachings, 'It is incredibly fortunate that we are together for these teachings. Because we are all followers of the Buddha, we definitely have a unique connection with him, and for that reason the Buddha is constantly looking down upon us with particular attention. With this understanding you should have no fears, and feel confident and relaxed'.

This is significant advice from His Holiness, and it is something that we need to always keep in mind throughout our lives. Then, if we can remember, 'As I have been a follower of the Buddha, he is definitely looking upon me with loving care and compassion' in the last moments of our life, just before death, this will provide the best conditions for a peaceful death. That, in essence, is what I can relay to you from the teachings in India that I attended.

In relation to my own conditions, I was definitely very comfortable while I was there. I felt very relaxed and didn't have any major complications or health problems, so I felt very good. It was only when I got back here that I realised how tired I was. For nearly five weeks I woke early, at around three o'clock, and sometimes two o'clock, to do my prayers. During teachings I usually don't eat much during the day, because I fear that it will cause drowsiness. But even though I was waking up very early and going to the teaching sessions two times a day, I noticed that my mind always remained fresh and clear. However all of that seems to have taken a physical toll, because when I got home I started to feel the impact of the previous weeks. But now I'm refreshed and doing well again.

I'm relaying this account of my trip to India as many of you might have been wondering about my time there, and how things went. I can definitely state that the time I spent in India and the positive effects of all the teachings that I received from His Holiness has had a very, very profound impact on my mind. As recently as last night there was a clear indication of this, when I had a very vivid dream of the Dalai Lama presenting a yellow robe to me. This was a very clear sign of the very auspicious time I spent in India.

The real significance of me relaying all of this to you is to remind you of the main purpose of why we are gathering here. We need to constantly remind ourselves that the main point is to gain the means for cultivating a good kind heart. Both you and the teacher (myself in this case) have to always remember that this is really the main purpose. In fact, when one attempts to generate that kind good heart at every opportunity it becomes the most meaningful action that one can engage in.

I have personally received a lot of profound instructions about methods for generating a kind and good heart from His Holiness the Dalai Lama. The significance of acquiring the means for generating a genuinely kind and compassionate heart is not all that obscure. When one thinks about it, it is quite clear that a kind heart is what ultimately contributes to one's wellbeing—it is one's real protector and guide. In every respect, the kind and compassionate heart is the most valuable asset that one can ever possess: it is the ultimate means for gaining personal happiness; it helps one to acquire all the good conditions for personal happiness; as well as removing the conditions for misery and suffering.

Furthermore, by engaging in study and learning how to develop a kind compassionate heart, we are acquiring the means to establish a real protector for ourselves. When that unflinching and trustworthy protector and saviour, that genuine, kind and compassionate heart, is established within us, we will be really genuinely relaxed and settled, and a happy person.

On the other hand, when one lacks these inner conditions for a true sense of happiness and wellbeing, then one constantly looks for an external companion to give that sense of happiness. That is why we are never really fulfilled. We are constantly searching for a trustworthy unflinching good companion or friend, and we are constantly unsettled because of our lack of success in this search.

That is where we take the wrong turn. If we actually believe that a trustworthy and unflinching protector and saviour and companion is somewhere out there, and that all we have to do is keep searching for them, then we are missing the point. Inevitably we won't find what we seek, and end up feeling lonely, and falling into despair. All of that will be eliminated once we establish a inner true friend and trustworthy companion.

For as long as we spend all our time and energy looking for external companions or external good conditions in the belief that this is where happiness lies, we will keep falling short of actually achieving a true sense of well-being and happiness, and experience one problem after another, and one difficulty after another. If we just change our approach and start spending quality time looking within, searching for, and developing the true unfailing inner friend and companion, then we will begin to notice that our life takes a turn for the better. A true transformation will start to come about and we will begin to become more and more relaxed, more settled, more self-reliant and confident, and genuinely content and happy in life.

When we endeavour to establish these good inner conditions or causes, it is certain that we will achieve positive results from our efforts. Here the positive causes are the development of love and compassion for others, taking their interests into account, which naturally brings about the positive result of experiencing personal wellbeing. As a way of nurturing and maintaining our sense of love and compassion for others, the practice of patience is indispensable. So we need to definitely practise patience as well. When we develop these qualities we will definitely experience the result that we seek.

I regularly emphasise this point again and again, and you should not take it lightly. I feel that I'm presenting something which will be most useful and valuable and meaningful for your own life. If you implement this advice, then it will definitely be incredibly beneficial for your life. If we take the initiative to look within ourselves, and evaluate what is essential for our wellbeing, then we will realise that we must never be separated from love and compassion at any cost. When we begin to acknowledge that love and compassion are indispensable, and that we need to nurture and always maintain it, then we will be keen to apply the methods to protect these qualities.

As mentioned regularly, meditation is a supreme technique that actually helps protect positive qualities from degeneration. Protecting a sense of happiness, a happy mind, a clear mind, and a positive attitude is essential for personal wellbeing. Those meditation practices are none other than the unmistakable methods for protecting one's mind. When we are able to protect our happy and clear state of mind, we will undoubtedly experience mental wellbeing.

At times, of course, we may experience some physical ailments. That is a given fact, and experiencing physical ailments is quite natural. But when we have secured positive inner conditions then, despite physical illnesses or any difficulties we may experience on a physical level, we can maintain a positive outlook and a happy state of mind.

There are, of course, times where we may feel a bit weighed down, and anxious and so forth. These feelings do of course come about, but what we need to recognise is that they are mostly related to unrealistic thoughts, which are called discursive or superstitious thoughts. When unnecessary doubts and fears take over our mind, and we give in to these discursive thoughts, then that is when our mind gets weighed down, and we end up being caught up in this cycle of unease.

However, when we take a strong stance in recognising that the main cause for our mental turmoil is none other than our own disturbing thoughts, then we can start to instil a state of mind where we don't allow disturbing thoughts, particularly irrational fears and doubts, to completely overwhelm us.

Thinking in this way helps to keep us focussed on the right track in life. The Buddha said that we should use this internal investigation as a mirror to see our own mind. The Buddha is quoted as saying that the Dharma serves as a mirror. We use an external mirror to see if our face has dirt on it that needs to be removed, because we cannot otherwise see our own face. Likewise the Dharma is said to be like a mirror that reflects the stains and dirt of our mind. Through seeing that clearly we can then attempt to remove those stains, which are the disturbing thoughts and delusions in our mind. This is paramount for any transformation that we wish to develop.

As I mention regularly, this internal investigation is done by none other than our own intelligence and wisdom. Ultimately it is our own wisdom that serves as the unfailing and consistent guide that helps us to follow the right path in our lives. We should always rely upon our own clear, discriminating wisdom.

I share all of this with you again, as a means of reminding you to reflect upon whatever practice you may be engaging in—whether it's meditation or engaging in the teachings, or studying the Dharma—and be mindful that all of these practices give us the means to clearly recognise and distinguish between what is useful and what is harmful. Then we can adopt what is useful, namely the qualities, and discard what is harmful, which is the delusions that lie within. If we can clearly distinguish between conducive conditions and conditions that are harmful, then it is most likely that we will be able to achieve what we are seeking to achieve.

Some lamas give the very practical advice of first asking the question, 'Why do I need to practise the Dharma?' The simple answer to that is, 'Because I wish for happiness and do not wish to experience any suffering'. This, in fact, encapsulates the real purpose of whatever virtues we engage in—it is because we wish to experience genuine happiness, and do not wish to experience any suffering.

The next question is 'Do I have the ability to practise the Dharma?' The answer is, as presented in the Lam Rim, that one definitely has that ability, because of having all of the necessary inner conditions. These are the physical conditions of a precious human rebirth with its eight freedoms and ten endowments. We also have the mental ability, which is a clear and discriminating wisdom. Therefore we have the necessary mental conditions.

With respect to external conditions we have the unmistakable teachers who present the teachings in a precise and clear manner. Of course these teachers need to have the qualifications of a perfect teacher, which is a full understanding and knowledge of the teachings. When we are able to recognise the Mahayana teacher and have faith in him, then that combination provides the intact external conditions to engage in the study and practice of the Dharma.

Thus one has the necessary internal conditions which encompass one's physical and mental conditions, as well as the external condition of having met with a perfect Mahayana teacher.

By reflecting on these points in the form of the questions and answers that are presented in the teachings, it is said that one will come to the conclusion that, because of having a precious human rebirth, we definitely have the ability to practise the Dharma. However it is not sufficient just to have all the right conditions. One needs to apply the teachings and actually engage in practising them right now. That conclusion comes from reflecting on the precious human rebirth as being extremely difficult to obtain, and very easy to lose.

Contemplating in this way, by raising hypothetical qualms and coming to conclusions based on presentations like that in the Lam Rim, for example, we develop very sound and logical reasons for not only recognising that we have the potential and the ability to practise the Dharma, but that we need to actually act upon it right now. The Buddha very meticulously emphasised death and impermanence as a means to exhort one to actually engage in the practice of Dharma.

One of the main reasons for reflecting like this is to counter laziness. One might recognise that one has good conditions, but laziness will prevent one from actually seizing the opportunity and acting upon it. The laziness that creeps into our life, of thinking that we could do it next month, or next year and so forth, arises from not contemplating death and impermanence.

Going back to the essential point of the need to develop the kind heart, the most purest and most altruistic kind heart that one can develop is bodhicitta. There is no more supreme altruistic mind than bodhicitta. This is what we need to focus on, and attempt to develop.

The most meticulous and thorough presentation of how to develop this precious awakening mind is none other than the text that we're studying now—The Bodhisattva's Way of Life by Shantideva. I can safely say that there is no more superior text explaining bodhicitta than what we are studying now. Keeping that in mind we can generate strong enthusiasm and joy about having the privilege of actually engaging in the study of this text, and trying to incorporate it into our lives. Indeed even just holding this text in our hands is said to be extremely fortunate.

This supreme altruistic mind of bodhicitta, the awakening mind, is based upon the genuine wish to benefit others. This genuine wish to benefit others stems from an unbiased love and compassion for others. When one cultivates a genuine unbiased love and compassion focussing on other sentient beings, then that actually becomes the basis on which to develop superior intention. This is the immediate preceding state of mind just before one actually develops the awakening mind itself, bodhicitta.

Superior intention is the state of mind where, based on love and compassion, one takes upon oneself the full responsibility of doing whatever is necessary to actually benefit all sentient beings. The reason why we do the tong len practice (giving and taking meditation), before each session is to further establish that potential within ourselves.

When one develops that superior intention of taking full responsibility for benefitting all sentient beings, to liberate them from all suffering, and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, one reflects upon whether one has the ability to do that right now. Then one clearly sees that only an enlightened being, a buddha, has this ability. When one resolves to achieve enlightenment oneself in order to benefit all sentient beings, then one is utilising the full conditions to develop the awakening mind.

We need to be reminded again and again that the whole purpose of studying this text is so that it establishes the conditions to actually develop the awakening mind, based on all the good conditions that were listed earlier.

As I've mentioned previously, in the technique of developing the awakening mind through the giving and taking practice, superior intention is not specifically mentioned. It is, however, encompassed within the actual practice of giving and taking. When one equalises oneself with others, and gives one's happiness to them, and takes their suffering upon oneself, then that is actually cultivating superior intention. Just because it's not explicitly presented as part of this technique, it doesn't mean that one doesn't need to develop superior intention. Indeed it is of paramount importance, because without developing superior intention, one cannot possibly develop bodhicitta.

Before we conclude the session for the evening let us recite the dedication chapter of The Bodhisattva's Way of Life for the late David Brooks who passed away last week. He was a long time friend of many of us. We can dedicate our merit for him to have a peaceful passage onto the next existence.

We can also include in our dedications whoever may be needing help and assistance at this time, those who are directly connected to us, Tara Institute, its members and students, and one's family and relatives. As we recite this text we will see that it includes all beings who are suffering in different ways. That is something we can keep in mind.

Based on the motivation we just generated in the refuge and bodhicitta prayer, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now we can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I will achieve enlightenment, and for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

Just as we did in our meditation practice, we need to periodically remind ourselves of the need to familiarise ourselves with love and compassion; that we need to increase the love and compassion in our hearts; and that we need to see this as an essential practice. Indeed, the giving and taking meditation practice that we have just engaged in is the essential practice of the bodhisattvas.

When engaging in the practice of equalising and exchanging self with others, one begins by contemplating again and again the shortcomings of cherishing oneself, and the great advantages of cherishing others. Through the use of many different reasons and analogies, and thinking of the many shortcomings of cherishing oneself, one contemplates the advantages of cherishing other sentient beings.

Having done that as a preliminary practice, one then engages in actually exchanging oneself and others by giving one's happiness to others and taking upon oneself the suffering of sentient beings. We need to understand that the actual practice of giving and taking is dependent on having contemplated the shortcomings of self-cherishing and the benefits of cherishing other sentient beings.

This, of course, is pith practice of bodhisattvas. As we are inclined to engage in the practices of the bodhisattvas we need to really think about how this practice is related to the bodhisattvas' deeds. We also need to understand how the giving and taking practice essentially encompasses the seven-fold cause and effect technique.

The main point to contemplate is the intent of the deeds of bodhisattvas, which is to benefit sentient beings. When one contemplates what sentient beings wish for, the answer is that they naturally wish for happiness and they don't want to experience any suffering. So benefitting sentient beings needs to be in accord with that wish to bring about happiness and remove their suffering.

When one contemplates in this way one comes to the point where one cannot leave it at a level of a mere wish. Rather, one has to take personal responsibility for ensuring that all sentient beings are placed in happiness, and that their suffering is removed. This is the point where one develops superior intention.

Then one naturally checks whether one has the ability to do that right now, one acknowledges that one does not, and realises that only an enlightened being has that ability. When one develops the unwavering aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the purpose of liberating all sentient beings from suffering and leading them to the ultimate state of happiness, then one has developed the altruistic mind of bodhicitta, the awakening mind. This is how we need to understand the practice of giving and taking as an optimum means for developing bodhicitta.

The preliminary stage of thinking again and again about the disadvantages and shortcomings of cherishing oneself is, of course, a way to gain personal happiness, although it may still be a temporary level of happiness. That is because unless and until one overcomes the manifest levels of delusions there is no way that one can experience a genuinely settled and happy mind.

Contemplating in this way one should then resolve, 'If I want to experience happiness, I have no choice but to combat the delusions that exist within my mind'. Lama Tsong Khapa gives very clear and precise instructions on antidotes to overcome the manifest level of these delusions. Contemplating and meditating on the imperfections of the object of attachment overcomes attachment; meditating on love overcomes manifest anger; and focusing on one's breath overcomes a discursive mind; meditating on the categories of the constituents is a way to overcome pride; and meditating on emptiness overcomes ignorance.

In presenting these antidotes, Lama Tsong Khapa's specific advice is that one needs to apply the antidote to whatever strong delusion one has at any given time. That is how we overcome intense delusions. So as beginners it is not advisable to choose any random object, but rather to focus on specific objects to overcome specific manifest or intense deluded states of mind.

When one genuinely wishes for others to be happy then one is generating love, and when one genuinely wishes them to be free from suffering then that is how one generates compassion for sentient beings.

So how do we implement this? Of course, when it refers to others in general we need to be skilful in presenting the ways and means for others to be happy and how to alleviate their suffering. When it comes down to individual beings, however, it depends on the individual circumstances. One of the most practical ways to extend one's love and compassion for other sentient beings is to present them with what they most need at that time, which will alleviate their immediate suffering, and provide the conditions that will endow them with happiness.

When, for example, someone is very hungry, the suffering they are experiencing at that moment is hunger. That will be alleviated by providing them with food and nourishment, and then they will be endowed with the happiness of being full again. That is a practical way to extend love and compassion towards that particular being at that particular time. Of course someone who is already full doesn't need food and if you insist on giving them food you would not benefit them at all. There is no purpose in doing that, as they are not experiencing the suffering of hunger at that time. Indeed, if you were to insist that they eat, then rather than alleviating suffering and bringing them happiness, you might cause them more suffering by giving them a stomach-ache.

There are many practical ways to benefit others, from giving material aid such as food and clothing when it is needed, or uttering soothing speech when they are feeling depressed and unhappy. Then there is the simple act of being with someone when they are in need of company; even pleasant gestures and facial expressions can bring about a certain level of happiness and alleviate a certain amount of suffering.

At our level we need to think about bringing benefit to others in practical ways. We need to really familiarise ourselves with love and compassion as an essential day-to-day practice, and then we can actually engage in benefitting others at our own manageable and practical level. If we are not familiar with love and compassion then the eagerness to benefit others will not arise. For example, some people just walk by, even though they can see that someone is really in need of food. If they don't have that sense of love and compassion they will not take the initiative to benefit such a person, whereas if you have love and compassion for them then you will extend your help by giving them food.

The practice of love and compassion might seem quite simple and it may even sound like a mediocre practice, but I personally feel that there is no greater practice than love and compassion. As I mentioned earlier, it encompasses the pith practice of the bodhisattvas.

When one practises love and compassion it becomes a means to cultivate more patience towards others, extending whatever is needed, in whatever capacity one has, to immediately benefit others. The companionship and camaraderie that one develops with others is based on love and compassion, so we can see that this love and compassion is really the basis for our own wellbeing and happiness. Conversely, the lack of love and compassion is the foundation of unwanted things, like conflict and disharmony with others. All of these unwanted situations in life come from a lack of love and compassion. These are the points that we need to contemplate.

I have previously related an anecdote about love and compassion that I witnessed in Landcox Park. On the weekend people come for picnics to Landcox Park, and they naturally throw the leftovers into the garbage bin. On Mondays the bins are cleared and one of the collectors routinely used to take out the edible scraps and give them to the birds. Whenever he came all the birds would flock around in anticipation of getting food. I immediately admired this man's generosity in taking the initiative to feed the birds. For me that was a clear example of extending love and compassion to animals. However I haven't seen this person coming in recently.

When we really think about it, birds flock around humans, and ants come into kitchens because they are hungry. The ants have no intention of marching into peoples' kitchens and harming them. What is attracting them is food. When one thinks in this way what may otherwise seem as a nuisance is an opportunity to practise some love and compassion, knowing that they are suffering and in need of assistance and help. With these practical examples we can see how love and compassion benefit other beings.

2. ABANDONING THE OPPOSING FACTORS TO CALM ABIDING

2.2. Abandoning unrealistic thinking

2.2.1. Meditating on disillusionment for desire

2.2.1.2.2. Contemplating the situation in relation to animate phenomena (cont.)

2.2.1.2.2.2. Attachment is unsuitable, as one can realise in dependence upon reason

This is subdivided into four:

2.2.1.2.2.2.1. Contemplating that it is impure because of being the source of the impure

2.2.1.2.2.2.2. Contemplating that it is impure because of being the result of the impure

2.2.1.2.2.2.3. Showing the impurity of the body with an example

2.2.1.2.2.2.4. Contemplating that one's own body is impure

It is through a false view of the body as being pure that one develops attachment to the bodies of others. So these contemplations on the impurity of the body are a way to overcome attachment.

2.2.1.2.2.2.1. Contemplating that it is impure because of being the source of the impure

This point is in accordance with the explanations given in the sutras. Because these points are quite clear we don't need to go into detailed explanations. The main condition for developing attachment to the body is by seeing it as attractive or appealing. The first reason to counter this shows how the body is impure because it is the source of impure products. When one contemplates how in fact there is nothing in reality that is really appealing then one will overcome attachment to the body.

The root text under this heading reads:

*58. If one does not desire contact
With a place and smeared by the impure,
Then how can one desire contact
With the body from which the impure came from?*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je gives this explanation of the meaning of the verse:

If one does not desire contact with a place that has been smeared with impure things, such as filth or vomit, then why does one desire contact with the body from which the impurity came? It is unsuitable.

As clearly explained here, if one does not want to come into contact with something such as a cloth or a place that is smeared with filth, then it is reasonable to contemplate why one would want to make contact with a body that is the source of the filth such as vomit and so forth.

If we think about our own clothing being smeared with, for example, excrement, then we would consider it to be so dirty that we would not even touch it. We would rather hold our nose so we can't smell it, and move it away with a stick. This clearly shows that we do not really like to come into contact with anything that we consider to be filthy.

So the first part of the explanation is that the body is impure because it is the source of that which is impure.

2.2.1.2.2.2.2. Contemplating that it is impure because of being the result of the impure

59. *If you do not have attachment for the impure,
Why do you desire to copulate with others
Coming from the impure field,
Generated by its impure seed?*

As just mentioned, we have no desire to be in contact with anything that is filthy, regardless of whether it is the source, or the product of what is impure. It is actually a matter of looking at the body in a different way. If we take a superficial view and don't think about it, the body may seem to be quite pure.

As the commentary explains:

If one does not have attachment for the impure, then why do you desire to copulate with the body of others that came from the impure field of the mother's womb, generated by the impure seed of the father's semen and mother's blood? It is unsuitable to be attached.

Normally we want to be clean, and we don't want to come into contact with anything that is filthy. Some may even be a bit snobbish, and say, 'I don't like anything that is unclean, and I certainly don't want to come into contact with anything that is unclean'. If we have the notion that we don't want to come into contact with anything that is filthy, we would naturally not want to be attached to anything that is filthy. Rather than attachment, we would actually want to keep our distance from it.

What is being presented here is if one does not have attachment for the impure then why do you desire to copulate with the other's body which is impure? If one truly does not want to come into contact with anything that is impure, then it would be absurd to be attached to it. We need to understand the logic being presented here. When we perceive something as being impure or unclean, we naturally don't want to come into contact with it. Attachment to something arises because we are not perceiving it as being unclean and impure. This is the logic that is being presented here.

The commentary poses the question why would one desire to copulate with the body of others that came from the impure field of the mother's womb. Here the mother's womb is presented as being analogous to a field where the crops are grown. The body that we (and others) possess is really none other than what has been cultivated from the seed, that comes from the father's semen and the mother's blood, (egg in western terms), which are also impure. Both the source, the field, and the seed, which matures into the body are from sources that are naturally impure.

So if you do not want to come into contact with anything that is filthy, then why would you desire to copulate with a body whose very source, along with itself, is impure? The response being presented here is that it is unsuitable to be attached.

Here we see the use of meticulous reasoning to overcome strong attachment to the body.

2.2.1.2.2.2.3. Showing the impurity of the body with an example

60. *You do not desire even a small
Insect born from filth, yet
The body in the nature of multiple impurities
You desire, despite being generated from filth.*
61. *Not only do you not disparage
Your own impurity,
You desire others' impure bags
Due to a thirst for the impure.*

The commentary on these two verses reads:

Further, you do not like even a small dirty insect that was born from filth. How can you desire the body that is in the nature of many impurities and was generated from the thirty-six impure substances? Not only do you not disparage your own impure object, you desire the impure bags that are the aggregates of others out of a thirst for the impure. This is unsuitable.

As quite clearly explained in the commentary if you do not like even a small dirty insect that is born from filth, then how can you desire a body that is in the nature of many impurities and was generated from the thirty-six impure substances?

The thirty-six impure substances referred to here are listed in other texts that you may have access to. Basically they refer to the organs such as the lungs, the stomach, the bones, the marrow, the lymphatic system, the intestines, and external things such as nails and teeth. When one reflects upon what really makes up the body, especially the internal organs, one finds that there is nothing that is very attractive to be found there.

What one considers to be really attractive basically comes down to the skin, which is just the surface of the body. Based solely on that one may develop infatuation and attraction to the body.

2.2.1.2.2.2.4. Contemplating that one's own body is impure

Having contemplated the bodies of others as being impure the text now turns to one's own body. This is divided into two sections.

2.2.1.2.2.2.4.1. Contemplating the impure body

2.2.1.2.2.2.4.2. If one is attached to it, then it is suitable to be also attached to the body in the cemetery

2.2.1.2.2.2.4.1. Contemplating the impure body

Contemplating the impure body is presented with this verse:

62. *Whether it is something pleasant like camphor
Or cooked rice or vegetables,
When it is put in the mouth and taken out again,
Even the ground becomes impure and dirty.*

Here the commentary explains:

When pleasant medicines like camphor or cooked rice and vegetables are put into one's mouth and taken out again, then even the ground where they are discarded is impure and dirty. Hence, it is unsuitable to have attachment.

This is another example of how, when pure substances such as fragrances and aromas and delicious food are chewed and then spat out, the place where they are discarded is immediately considered as being filthy. One would not wish to come into contact with such filth. Yet what is considered as being filthy now is none other than the delicious substances with beautiful aromas and so forth. By virtue of just being chewed and then spat out it becomes filthy. This is proof that the body itself is the source of filth.

As with the earlier point, the fact that anything that comes out of the body is impure is, in itself, proof that the body is impure.

2.2.1.2.2.4.2. If one is attached to it, then it is suitable to be also attached to the body in the cemetery

*63. If one has doubt even though
Such impurity is obvious
One should look at other
Impure bodies discarded at the cemetery.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

If one has doubts and thinks this body may be pure even though it is manifestly impure, then one should look at other bodies that have been discarded at the cemetery. Although one knows that once the body's skin is open it is very frightening, one continues to repeatedly take delight in one's own and women's bodies. This is unsuitable. One should abandon attachment by viewing one's body as equal to the corpse in the cemetery.

When one sees, for example, a dead body being dissected then it is very repulsive. There is no sense of attachment to a dead body whose skin has been opened. Even though that is quite obvious, one continues to take delight in the body—for men that is one's own male form as well as the bodies of women, for women that is one's own female body as well as the bodies of men.

It is obvious that there is nothing attractive when the skin of a body in the cemetery is opened up and the body is dissected.

By contemplating in this way one overcomes attachment to one's own body and the body of others. If one contemplates in the way that has been presented here, it will definitely have an effect of overcoming strong desire or attachment to the body.

2.2.1.2.2.3. Hence, stop grasping at the pure

2.2.1.2.2.3.1. The body cannot be cleansed by effortful means

2.2.1.2.2.3.2. The body is not beyond the nature of being frightening

2.2.1.2.2.3.3. Contemplating it as an object of disillusionment

2.2.1.2.2.3.1. The body cannot be cleansed by effortful means

This is subdivided into two:

2.2.1.2.2.3.1.1. The impure body cannot be made pure by scents such as sandal

2.2.1.2.2.3.1.2. There is no reason to be attached to an unrelated smell

We can start this section in the next session.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

23 February 2016

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

When one generates such a motivation, whatever positive action one engages in will indeed become a cause to benefit other sentient beings.

Having covered the subdivisions of the next outline last week, we come to the first of these categories which is:

2.2.1.2.2. Contemplating the situation in relation to animate phenomena (cont.)

2.2.1.2.2.3.1. The body cannot be cleansed by effortful means

2.2.1.2.2.3.1.1. The impure body cannot be made pure by scents such as sandal

The verse is presented with the hypothetical argument or query: "Although the body is impure it is suitable to be attached to it when scents such as sandal are applied to it."

This hypothetical query or question arises in conjunction with the notion the mind of attachment has, which is that, while one may agree that the body is impure by nature, it is still a suitable object to be attached to when beautiful scents like sandal and so forth are applied to it. This is how the mind of attachment works.

The verse and a half relating to this outline are:

65. *The scents applied to the body
Are among others, sandal, and nothing more.
Why be attached to another
Due to a scent separate from it?*

66ab. *If it naturally has a bad smell,
Is it not befitting not to be attached to it?*

The commentary explains:

The scent applied to the body can be, among others, camphor or sandal, and does not belong to the body. For what reason are you attached to the body of others due to a smell separate from that body?

The meaning of the next two lines are presented as a rhetorical question:

"If the body naturally has a bad smell, then is it not befitting not to be attached to it?"

The answer to this is:

"Indeed if one is attached to the body, it causes many sufferings."

As presented here, the faulty mind of attachment may present faulty reasons for being attached to a body. While acknowledging that a body may be impure in nature, the mind may trick one into believing that if that body were beautified with various scents — sandal, camphor, musk and so forth — it would become a suitable object of attachment.

However, as presented here, that reasoning is absurd. Since the body by its very nature is impure and has foul smells, why see it as a suitable object of attachment when scents that do not naturally occur in the body have to be applied to it? The fact that scents need to be applied to a body shows it doesn't have a naturally good smell; one has to apply these external scents to make it smell good.

As the commentary explains, the scent applied to the body can be, among others, camphor or sandal, and does not belong to the body, so when one smells the scent it is not coming from the body itself. Therefore, for what reason are you attached to the body of others due to a smell separate from that body? The commentary is basically showing the absurdity of being attached to an object due to an external factor making it smell nice.

The meaning of the next two lines is that due to the natural bad smells of the body, it is proper not to be attached to it. As the commentary explains, it is indeed proper not to be attached to the naturally foul smelling body because being attached to it causes many sufferings.

2.2.1.2.2.3.1.2. There is no reason to be attached to an unrelated smell

The next verse and a half relates to this heading.

66cd. *Why do those who crave the meaningless
Transitory world, apply nice scents?*

67. *As the scent belongs to sandal
How can it become that of the body?
Why be attached to something
Due to a scent that does not belong to it?*

The commentary that explains the meaning of this verse reads:

Those who crave for the meaninglessly transitory world apply scents such as sandal to their body in order to generate attachment for it. However, if the pleasant scent is a quality of the sandal, then how can it become a quality of the body? As it is not in any way a quality of the body, why be attached to something due to a scent that does not belong to it? It is unsuitable.

The presentation here is quite clear. The main point is to really reflect on and contemplate this meaning. The text is presenting the objects of meditation – the imperfections of the body — as a means to overcome attachment to the body. The explanation asks us to reflect on the act of applying scents to body out of attachment — out of pure vanity, wanting to beautify the body, just to become an object of attachment for others.

When we take the eight Mahayana precepts during the nyung-nye practice, for example, one of the precepts entails avoiding applying scents and perfumes. This specifically requires one to refrain, for the specified time, from applying scents and perfumes out of attachment to beautifying the body. This also implies that to apply scents and perfume without strong attachment is fine — for example, as part of one's daily personal hygiene routine. However, one must avoid doing this out of attachment when one takes precepts.

As stated here, those who crave for the meaninglessly transitory world apply scents such as sandal to their body in order to generate attachment for it — thus this implies that when one takes precepts, one must avoid this attitude.

However as explained further, if the pleasant scent is a quality of the sandal, then how can it become a quality of the body? So, if the nice smell coming from the body is, in fact, due to the sandal that was applied on the body, how can it be a quality of the body itself? That is a rhetorical question implying that it is not a quality of the body.

As it is not in any way a quality of the body, why be attached to something due to a scent that does not belong to it? It is unreasonable and thus unsuitable.

2.2.1.2.2.3.2. The body is not beyond the nature of being frightening

When the body is left in its natural state, it can indeed appear frightening. So it has to be beautified in order not to appear frightening.

The hypothetical query or argument presented to explain the meaning of the verse is that the body is an object of desire once hair, nails and so forth are cleaned up and made nice.

The body is not naturally beautiful — that's why we have to spend so much money on beautifying it. How much money do we spend just on beautifying the hair? Apparently a lot of money also goes into polishing fingernails to make them look nice! Then there are our teeth.

What is being pointed out here is the fact that one has to go to great lengths to beautify the body. If it was left in its natural state it wouldn't appear beautiful, but rather quite frightening.

The verse and a half which relates to this reads:

68. *If the nature of the naked body
With long hair and nails, yellow teeth
And anointed with the scent of foul smelling mud
Is only frightening,*
- 69ab. *And if it is like a weapon that harms me,
Why do I clean it with effort?*

The commentary explains:

If the hair and nails are long, the teeth are yellow and body has the smell of unpleasant smelling mud, then the naked body is frightening. If it harms me like a weapon that is killing me, then why do I clean it with effort? It is unsuitable.

If the body is left ungroomed, in its natural state — for example, if we were to let our hair grow extremely long and it became matted so that our body was covered just with our matted hair — it wouldn't be a pleasant sight. Furthermore, if our nails were not trimmed, they would grow really long and look frightening. If one didn't clean one's teeth, one's mouth would have a foul smell. It is quite frightening to picture a body with long matted hair, long nails and yellowish teeth. Then there are the unpleasant foul smells that ooze from the body if it's not cleaned. So the unkempt naked body can definitely look frightening — some might even run away thinking it was a ghost!

What we need to understand is that while we should not beautify the body out of attachment, we must of course clean the body and take care of it, for the sake of hygiene and of our health. Otherwise, the reality is that if the body is left in its natural state, it can be a frightening object.

The presentation here clearly shows that to make the body presentable and to further beautify it, one has to rely on external sources (to clean it, apply scents, and so forth). When one doesn't apply these external measures to beautify the body and it is left in its natural state, it emits natural foul smells and appears frightening. These are referred to as the body's natural imperfections.

When we cover up these natural imperfections, they are not apparent, we don't see them. But here the text presents logical reasons, based on the reality of the body, for the existence of its natural imperfections.

The text goes on to say that, if it harms me like a weapon that is killing me, then why do I clean it with effort? The analogy used here is that of polishing and cleaning a weapon that will be used to kill us; it would be absurd to take care of such a weapon. Similarly, if one beautifies the very object that causes one attachment, it is as if one is taking care of something that is destroying oneself. Thus it is unsuitable.

The reality is that we need to care for our body for hygiene and health reasons. For example, we need to bathe regularly, and of course nourish our body with food. So for our survival we need to engage in these deeds.

So, if we generate the proper motivation while engaging in actions involved with caring for our body, then those actions become meaningful — they can even become a practice. For example, when bathing and cleaning the body, one can think: "I'm cleaning away the stains and dirt to keep my body healthy so as to benefit other sentient beings". Further, when nourishing one's body with food and drink, as mentioned many times previously, it can become a means to create a great amount of merit by offering the food and drinks first. Then when one consumes it, one can be mindful one is consuming it to nourish one's body so that one can be of service to other sentient beings, that one is using one's body to achieve one's ultimate goals of liberation and enlightenment. So then that becomes a highly purposeful and meaningful practice.

As I have mentioned previously many times, we need to ensure that our everyday activities — such as eating, drinking, sleeping and walking — become a means to engage in virtue and accumulate merit. If we engage in these daily activities with mindfulness and a positive motivation, even seemingly normal activities become a means for one to accumulate virtue.

I personally see this as being much more practical than sitting down rigidly with closed eyes for a set time, and assuming that one is engaging in meditation. It is good to know that sitting down with closed eyes is not the only way to practise; with the proper motivation, one can transform normal activities into a means of accumulating virtue and collecting merit.

In fact, for an ordinary person practising at an ordinary level, I doubt whether sitting down with closed eyes and sitting rigidly would be a means to accumulate much virtue if the mind is distracted. I can say from my own experience that at a beginner's level it is extremely hard to have a concentrated and focused mind. Even if our body is sitting rigidly and our eyes are closed in a seemingly meditative posture, at best the mind may remain focused for a few moments, but then it can become completely distracted with thoughts of worldly concerns. So one is not engaging in the practice of accumulating virtue at that time. I'm not referring here to the great, advanced meditators who have reached a level where their concentration is sound and firm. They can actually keep their mind single-pointedly on a virtuous object for a prolonged period. Rather, at a beginners' level, I know from experience it is extremely difficult to have a really focused mind.

Therefore, a more practical approach would be engaging in practices such as prostrations, making offerings, and other practices involving more physical activity. When one does prostrations to purify one's negativities it becomes a highly meaningful and purposeful practice. With the proper motivation, the very physical activity of prostration in fact purifies a lot of negativity. This will then help the mind to become clearer and sharper. Such activities are a more practical means of engaging in practice, as I've shared in the past.

Also, out of worldly concern, one might sit rigidly in a meditative posture for an hour or two in the presence of others. That is possible. However, one needs to be careful that if one resorts to this as a way to impress others, in fact it only becomes a worldly dharma, not a real Dharma practice. One needs to be mindful of this.

2.2.1.2.2.3.3. Contemplating it as an object of disillusionment

The next two lines and the verse relate to this:

69cd. *Through efforts deluded with regard to self,
The crazed completely disrupt this place.*

70. *If one becomes disgusted with the cemetery
Because of seeing only skeletons,
Can one delight in the cemetery of the city
Filled with moving skeletons?*

The commentary explains:

In this way, through efforts deluded with regards to the self, people are crazed because they are mistaken with regards to the continuum due to afflictions. They completely disrupt this place and are everywhere.

If one becomes disgusted with the body in the cemetery due to seeing only skeletons, then how can one be delighted in the town that is a cemetery filled with skeletons moving around through motivational impulses? It is unsuitable to be delighted.

In other words, when people are deluded by ignorance, they perceive an inherently existent self when in fact there is no such self. Likewise, due to the deluded mind, even if an object doesn't have any attributes to make it appealing, people will see it as appealing and thus develop attachment to it. This is all the consequence of having a deluded mind.

Thus, as mentioned here, people are indeed 'crazed' with the delusions, particularly attachment. We can clearly see in the world that it's as if people are crazed with attachment, doing unthinkable things and going to great lengths to pursue their attachments.

They are crazed because they are mistaken with regards to the continuum due to afflictions. So, they completely disrupt this place and are everywhere. With a crazed mind — that is, one affected by the delusions — it is as if everything around it is polluted by that deluded mind.

Next the text says: if one becomes disgusted with the body in the cemetery due to seeing only skeletons, then how can one be delighted in the town that is a cemetery filled with skeletons moving around through motivational impulses? As explained here, if we saw a skeleton in a cemetery, it would be an object of fright and we would be repulsed by it, especially if some bits of flesh were still stuck to it.

Yet other human beings and the beings we are attached to are like live skeletons moving about due to some motivational impulse. Sometimes on TV we see shows with skeletons moving around, just like this. When we think about the structure of our body, it really is as if we are skeletons moving about. The only difference is that we are moved about by some motivational impulse from within the mind, whereas a dead body cannot move because it does not have these motivational impulses.

By using the analogy presented here — of not taking delight in seeing skeletons in a cemetery — one needs to reflect upon the unsuitability of having strong attachment to other living human beings. That is the main point being presented.

2.2.1.2.3. Contemplating that it will give rise to much that is unwished for

That is subdivided into two:

- 2.2.1.2.3.1. Showing
- 2.2.1.2.3.2. Explanation

2.2.1.2.3.1. Showing

The next verse relates to the showing or presenting, which is:

71. *Thus, this impure object
Is not obtained without a price,
As one works for it one is exhausted
And receives the harms of the hells, among others.*

The commentary which explains the meaning of this verse reads:

Thus, the impure body of a woman is not obtained without paying a price of wealth and so forth. As one builds up one's wealth for one's own body, among other things, in this life one will be exhausted due to hardship, and in the next life, one will receive the harms of the hells, among others.

As explained here explicitly with the example from a male's perspective, the impure body of a woman is not obtained without paying a price. If you're a male that is the reality — a woman's body is not something you get freely, it is something that you have to pay a price for. At the very minimum, you can't take a bride without presenting a ring!

Whether it may be from the man's or woman's perspective, the object of attachment does not come without a price. The commentary implies that there are many other prices one has to pay, apart from wealth, to obtain the object of one's attachment. In relation to the accumulation of wealth, as one builds up one's wealth for one's own body, among other things, in this life one will be exhausted due to hardship — this is where many seem to succumb to the strong pull of attachment to wealth.

Many people have the grand idea that if they were to acquire wealth, they would use it for a good purpose. While they may initially have such good intentions, as ordinary beings, these intentions soon get forgotten. In fact, when one actually does acquire some wealth, one may blindly pursue even more wealth. Far from using that accumulated wealth in a meaningful way for the purpose of others, one may not even use it for one's own kin, such as one's own children or relatives. Instead such a person may only use that wealth as a way to accumulate more, or to gain a more beautiful partner and so forth. We can see many examples of this — people using their wealth only to fulfil their desires, rather than using it in a meaningful way.

For those with a real, sustained Dharma motivation, when wealth is acquired it can be definitely used for a good purpose, to help and benefit others beginning with close relatives and so forth. But often it is hard for ordinary beings to maintain their initial good intentions and act upon them. The main point here is that if wealth is not utilised properly, it can be a source of one's downfall. While the text clearly explains this, it's good to also reflect on these points.

As explained here, when one exerts one's energy for the mere sake of gaining more wealth to satiate one's desires, one becomes exhausted due to the hardship. Apart from the loss of experiencing great hardship in this life, this exertion will not benefit, but will in fact harm one's next life.

2.2.1.2.3.2. Explanation

The explanation is subdivided into two subdivisions:

2.2.1.2.3.2.1. One does not attain one's wishes

2.2.1.2.3.2.2. One will be inseparable from many things one does not desire

2.2.1.2.3.2.1. One does not attain one's wishes

This is subdivided into four:

2.2.1.2.3.2.1.1. There is no time to rely on desire objects

2.2.1.2.3.2.1.2. One cannot rely on desire objects due to exhaustion

2.2.1.2.3.2.1.3. Difficulty meeting the desired object as it is far

2.2.1.2.3.2.1.4. One receives many undesired hardships as one will be under the control of others

2.2.1.2.3.2.1.1. There is no time to rely on desire objects

The verse relating to this is:

72. A child cannot increase wealth

And what happiness will it give in the prime of life?

After having spent one's life accumulating wealth,

What is one to do with desire in old age?

The commentary explains:

When one is a young child one cannot achieve wealth for the purpose of finding a woman and when one is in the prime of life one does not find a woman, so what happiness will wealth give then? Once in the prime of life, if one passes one's life with accumulating wealth, what is one then to do with one's desire in the end of one's life, when one is old, as one is not able to rely on desire objects then?

The first part of the explanation is obvious. When one is a young child one cannot achieve wealth for the purpose of finding a woman. That is true because a child may be hardly capable of accumulating wealth for their own purpose, such as to feed themselves.

Then in the prime of life, such as when one is in one's youth, one does not find a woman, easily. Having reached the prime of life in one's youth and middle age, one may exert oneself in accumulating expansive wealth. But then if one passes one's life with accumulating wealth, what is one then to do with one's desire in the end of one's life — at the end of one's life, even if one has desirable objects, due to old age one is not able to rely on or utilise those dire objects. So, at the end of one's life, again wealth does not serve its purpose of bringing one real happiness.

As mentioned earlier, the presentation and the meaning of the verses are not that obscure or difficult to understand. The main thing is to try and derive real meaning from it, then apply that understanding in one's practice.

This year I intend to go back to the normal schedule we've had in the past of doing exams and discussions in six-week blocks (of four-week teaching periods.) This is because when we reach the ninth chapter, in particular, it will be good to leave time for discussion to help students gain a better understanding of the chapter's material.

With this chapter that we are studying now, the eighth chapter, we can have the discussion after six teaching sessions, excluding the first one, because we didn't really have a teaching on the first session. So today would be the second teaching session in this block. Then after six teachings on the text, we'll have a discussion and exam. Then there might be two more sessions where we can complete the eighth chapter.

These verses and explanations, as I mentioned, are quite clear and don't rely too much on further discussion. However, while I might be going through these verses quite quickly, when we reach the point of discussing the exchanging-self-with-other technique of generating bodhicitta, then I will make a point to emphasise and explain that in further detail.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

1 March 2016

Based on the motivation that we have just generated in the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer we can now engage in our meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now you can generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and put them into practise well.

The wish to benefit others is crucial, so we need to give careful consideration to generating such a motivation. It is because of this genuine wish to benefit others that we have just engaged in the giving and taking meditation practice.

Finding that one's mind has become clearer, gentler and more positive as a result of one's meditation practice is a positive sign. Furthermore, when one finds that one's faith in the Dharma and one's guru is becoming stronger and firmer, that is a true sign of one's meditation practice taking positive effect. The hallmark of a positive effect of a practice is when the mind is transformed in such a positive way.

If one does not ensure one's practice actually brings about that result, then rather than experiencing a clearer and more positive state of mind, you may find that the mind is becoming duller and duller. There are those who comment that this has, in fact, been their experience, even though they had engaged in meditation practice for a long time. We need to understand that this is not the fault of the meditation practice itself, but rather the result of not having engaged in the meditation practice properly.

As I emphasised in my teaching last Sunday, we already have the basis of the fundamental practice of developing love and compassion within ourselves. It is not a practice that is alien and out of your reach, because you already have the basis within you. Personally, I have found that my attempts to engage in the practice of cultivating love and compassion have definitely benefited me. You have that basis within yourself and if you actually make an attempt to engage in this practice you will definitely reap the benefit. So I am giving you very practical advice, which many others have also found to be very useful. I'm certainly not claiming that I am engaging in some high level practice that is beyond the reach or capacity of others. You really do have the basis for practising in this way yourself.

You also need to give careful consideration to engaging in those practices for which you already have a basis, rather than trying to reach for high level practices that are beyond your capacity. You need to engage in practices that are within your reach and capacity right now. It would be pretentious to claim that you are doing high level practices when you are not, in fact, capable of doing them. That is contrary to Dharma practice. These are really important points to keep in mind.

Coming back to the text, we have previously explained the faults of attachment and the way to overcome those faults by examining the imperfections of objects of attachment such as the body.

2.2.1.2.3. CONTEMPLATING THAT IT WILL GIVE RISE TO MUCH THAT IS UNWISHED FOR

2.2.1.2.3.2. Explanation

2.2.1.2.3.2.1. One does not attain one's wishes (cont.)

2.2.1.2.3.2.1.2. One cannot rely on desire objects due to exhaustion

The relevant verse from the root text reads:

73. *A lowly desirous person
Is tired out from working all day long.
Upon coming home his exhausted body
Lies down like a corpse.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

A lowly desirous person such as a servant is tired out from working all day long and upon coming home in the night his exhausted body lies down like a corpse. He does not remember his attachment and cannot act on it.

This explanation quite clearly relates to the circumstances of most people engaged in worldly activities. Even though it refers to a lowly desirous person such as a servant it is, of course, addressing the situation of those who work like slaves at their job.

Even though they may not actually be servants or slaves, they have to rise very early in the morning to get to work. Driven by their desire for wealth and material possessions they spend all day slaving at their work, expending so much time and energy that when they return home in the evening they are exhausted. They are so tired their exhausted body lies down just like a corpse.

After a long day's work, they can't even think about engaging in an act of desire, let alone act upon it. Being driven by their desire to gain wealth, they engage in working all day long, and are so exhausted that they are not able to engage in any acts of desire. You might be able to relate this explanation to your own experiences.

2.2.1.2.3.2.1.3. Difficulty meeting the desired object as it is far

This indicates that it is very difficult to meet an object of desire when it is far away from you.

The verse relating to this reads:

74. *The deluded who go abroad,
They who suffer far away,
Although they desire women,
They do not even see a woman to embrace for many years.*

As the commentary explains:

They who are deluded and suffering, who go abroad into places far away from home, although they desire to meet a woman, they will not even see the woman they want to embrace for many years. What need is there to mention acting upon their desire?

They who are deluded, refers to those who are overcome by greed. They go abroad into places far away from home in order to acquire wealth; this can refer to those on business trips, and thieves who travel far away to steal. These people suffer because they are separated from loved ones who are far away. Although they may desire to have contact with a woman, they will not see the woman who they really want to embrace for many years. There is no need to mention acting upon their desire, indicates that there is no opportunity for them to engage in actions driven by desire.

These situations actually do occur, and they show the futility of being overly obsessed with the opposite sex. These are very useful points to consider as means to overcome excessive desire and lust.

2.2.1.2.3.2.1.4. One receives many undesired hardships as one will be under the control of others

The verse relating to this is:

75. *As those wishing to benefit self are deluded,
Although they sell themselves for a purpose,
They do not achieve it and are driven
By the meaningless wind of others' actions.*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

Those wishing to benefit self, as they are deluded with regards to the method, even though they sell their body for the purpose of gain, do not even get a bad wage. Driven without freedom by the wind of others' actions, which are without meaning for self, they experience suffering in this and the next life and do not achieve their desires.

Those wishing to benefit self relates to selfish personal gain. They are deluded with regards to the method means that they don't understand the correct way of obtaining what they want for themselves. Even if they sell their body for the purpose of gain, describes a situation where people work for such a low wage that it is as if they are selling their body to others. Furthermore, they might not be paid for a while or in a timely way. During that time they are labouring like a slave, experiencing a lot of hardship and difficulties, without actually gaining anything in return. They are entrapped by their situation.

The commentary further explains that they are driven without freedom by the wind of others' actions. They experience suffering in this and the next life yet they do not achieve their desires. If one is working like a slave for others without being paid regularly, one is in a situation of being driven without freedom by the wind of the actions of others. One may spend one's whole life without liberty or any gain.

Without meaning for the self means that one might not even gain what one wants to achieve, despite having put in so much effort.

So not only is there a lot of suffering in this life because people are driven by desire, but the consequences of that desire will also be experienced in the next lifetime. So this life is ruined as well as the next one as well, and we don't even achieve what we desire!

This is a presentation of the disadvantages of the mind of desire. Out of strong desire, either lust for the bodies of others or for material gain, we are hindered from engaging in more meaningful and purposeful activities.

So here we are being encouraged to pay heed to putting time and energy into the practice of the Dharma, which is much more worthwhile. The gains from that are much more purposeful and meaningful, so we are being advised not to completely be consumed by worldly desires.

The point, they do not achieve their desires, is that the whole purpose of engaging in work and so forth is to obtain what one desires. But even that is not obtained. We have all seen people who are consumed by their work for material gain and so forth, but who don't have the time to enjoy any of those gains.

As I have explained in the past, some people have related to me that although they have accumulated a sufficient amount of wealth they still feel that they need to go to work. They can't leave their job and when they do go to work there is a daily routine of anxiety and worries and problems. They don't seem to feel content with what they already have, and feel a need to acquire more, but that doesn't seem to bring them any sense of happiness. They are driven to accumulate more and more wealth – a million dollars is not sufficient, they want another million dollars and so forth.

Then there are those who, having reached a significant level of success in their life, start to realise that what they have isn't fulfilling. Despite all the wealth they have accumulated, they feel they are missing something – that their life is empty - and then a sense of despair begins to arise. They have spent so much time and energy accumulating their wealth and so forth yet they are not really contented or happy.

When worldly people comment about how they feel empty and lack contentment and inner happiness, you can't tell them that the reason they are not fulfilled is because of the desire in their mind, and that there will never be real contentment while that desire remains. They won't be inclined to hear about the disadvantages of desire and attachment and the advantages of engaging in the practice of Dharma. You can't do much for them other than just acknowledge their predicament, and sympathise with them.

However the point for us is that as we do have some understanding of the Dharma, and we also have the conditions to engage in the practice of Dharma, we need to make every attempt to put some time and energy into the practice of Dharma. We know that we should not allow ourselves to be completely consumed by the accumulation of wealth and the desire to accumulate more and more. As explained very clearly here, the end result of being consumed by desire is that one will not be fulfilled in this life, let alone experience happiness and joy in our future life. These are really important points to consider.

We need to attempt to put into practice the pith advice of the teachings, which is to have less desire and to practice contentment. If one has many desires and lacks contentment, one will eventually experience great distress and despair. As the great Indian master Asvaghosa mentioned, 'the greatest mental pain is the pain of discontentment', where one aims for more and more, even though one already has quite sufficient.

True wealth is found in contentment. As the great master Nagarjuna mentioned, 'the purpose of wealth is to feel content'. Indeed if one does not experience contentment then one is always going to be impoverished. No matter how much wealth one has accumulated, one feels that one does not have enough. In contrast, when one practices contentment one will feel a sense of satisfaction, and then one would have utilised one's wealth wisely, and it would have served its purpose.

2.2.1.2.3.2.2. One will be inseparable from many things one does not desire

This heading has five subdivisions:

2.2.1.2.3.2.2.1. One is without freedom and will quickly have to give up one's life

2.2.1.2.3.2.2.2. One will fall under the control of others and continually have many different sufferings

2.2.1.2.3.2.2.3. It obstructs liberation and exhausts the freedoms and endowments

2.2.1.2.3.2.2.4. Having contemplated the shortcomings, generating the mind wishing for liberation

2.2.1.2.3.2.2.5. Contemplating that attachment to sense objects is the source of all shortcomings

2.2.1.2.3.2.2.1. One is without freedom and will quickly have to give up one's life

There are two verses under this heading, the first of which reads:

76. *Some sell their bodies
And are ordered about without freedom.
When the companion becomes pregnant
Birth will be at the foot of a tree or a random isolated place.*

The commentary on this verse reads:

Some sell their bodies as servants and are ordered around without freedom by others. When on top of this their companion becomes pregnant, as there is no home, she has to give birth at the foot of a tree or some other random isolated place where she happens to be.

Some sell their bodies as servants and are ordered around without freedom by others, refers to the earlier point that there are those who engage in contracts where they effectively become a slave to others, often without receiving their due wages. If, in such a situation, their companion or partner becomes pregnant then, since they have no home, she might have to give birth at the foot of a tree or some other isolated place where she happens to be. Similar dire circumstances still occur in many parts of the world.

The following verse relates more specifically to the heading:

77. *The foolish who are deceived by desire
Say, "I desire and shall make a livelihood,"
They enter wars despite danger to their lives
And go into servitude for profit.*

Here, the commentary explains:

The foolish deceived by desire wish to achieve gain, planning to live a long life through gain. Though they are in fear of their lives, they go to war in order to obtain gain, thinking, "I shall live by gain." For profit, they go into servitude and experience many different sufferings.

The foolish deceived by desire indicates that those who under the control of desire are blinded to what is safe or good for them. Although their intention is to have a long life, with a good income and all the conditions intact, they risk their lives for gain. Under the strong influence of the desire for a profitable return, or influenced by family members and friends, they join the army, for example, in spite of knowing that they could be sent to war and risk their life. Their intention is to gain a good income, but they end up in servitude.

2.2.1.2.3.2.2.2. One will fall under the control of others and continually have many different sufferings

The verse relating to this heading reads:

78. *Some desirous even cut their bodies,
Some are impaled from beneath on wooden stakes,
Some are pierced by daggers,
And some are seen being burned.*
79ab. Through the suffering of accumulating, preserving and losing Understand wealth to be infinite destruction and faults.

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Some, for the purpose of their desire, cut their bodies. Some receive the sentence from a king to be impaled from below on a wooden stake. Some are pierced by daggers and swords and some are seriously burned by fire.

As the accumulation, protecting and lastly losing of wealth are all suffering, one should understand wealth to be the root of infinite destruction and faults.

Some, for the purpose of their desire, cut their bodies implies that some people engage in actions such as theft or robbery or sexual crimes out of desire for wealth or lust, and that when they are caught they will be punished. As the commentary explains, Some receive the sentence from a king to be impaled from below on a wooden stake. Some are pierced by daggers and swords and some are seriously burned by fire. So, the end result of engaging in criminal deeds driven by strong desires is suffering.

The commentary then reminds us that, As the accumulation, protecting and losing of wealth all lead to suffering, one should understand wealth to be the root of infinite destruction and faults. We have all seen criminals, some of whom are quite influential or wealthy, having to face punishment for their crimes. We see them on TV, engaging in lengthy legal battles over their crimes of sexual misconduct and so forth, and becoming completely consumed by their predicament.

Even those who are wealthy or famous are not spared from suffering when they act out of desire. One example that comes to mind is the well-known Australian comedian who migrated to England. When I saw this on TV I felt sorry for him. I wondered why they were bringing such an old man to trial and putting him into such difficulty. Then I was told that he been found guilty, and that it didn't matter what his age was, he still had to serve his sentence. This is a clear example of someone being deceived by desire, and having to experience the consequences.

2.2.1.2.3.2.2.3. It obstructs liberation and exhausts the freedoms and endowments

If one follows a mind of desire then not only will that obstruct the achievement of liberation, it will waste the freedoms and endowments, meaning the precious human life. The relevant lines of verse read:

79cd. *Those distracted by attachment to wealth
Have no opportunity for liberation from the sufferings of existence.*

80. *The desirous have these and many Other disadvantages and insignificant happiness,
Like the ox pulling the cart,
Eating occasionally a little grass.*

The commentary explains the meaning of these lines of verse:

Those with a mind distracted by many different objects due to attachment to wealth take rebirth again and again through the force of karma. Hence they have no opportunity to attain liberation by freeing themselves from the sufferings of existence.

The desirous who crave only the purposes of this life experience the faults of, among others, the many sufferings explained before and insignificant happiness. For example, like an ox that, while pulling the cart, can grab a bit of grass from time to time, to work to achieve happiness and clear away suffering only in this life is something even animals stronger than humans do; it is something the ox also does.

Having a mind distracted by many different objects is also a point that we need to reflect upon. As I have mentioned many times in the past, if one engages in the practice of meditation with a mind that is occupied with the distractions created by desire, then one will not achieve any significant focus on the object itself. You might assume a meditative posture, but if your mind is constantly distracted because of desire, you are not actually engaged in a genuine meditation practice. These are points that you really need to keep in mind. You need to ensure that you are fully engaged in your meditation practice.

On Wednesday night teachings I have emphasised that when engaging in meditation practice one needs to ensure that one completely withdraws from all objects of distraction, and places one's focus fully on the object itself. I have also emphasised that if you allow your mind to be occupied with distractions you will not be able to really focus on the object. This is the same point that Shantideva is making here. So what I have been emphasising on Wednesday evenings is backed up by Shantideva.

Indeed, when the mind is distracted by different objects due to attachment to wealth then, as a consequence one takes rebirth again and again through the force of karma. Hence they have no opportunity to attain liberation by freeing themselves from sufferings of existence. If one is driven by temporary pleasures and enjoyment then that will be a hindrance to achieving one's greater goal.

The desirous who crave only the purposes of this life experience the faults of, among others, the many sufferings explained before and insignificant happiness, indicates that there is no real long-lasting happiness, just fleeting pleasures.

Shantideva uses the example of an ox which, while pulling the cart, grabs a bit of grass from time to time. This is a very vivid example where we can imagine an ox experiencing the suffering of pulling a cart with a heavy load. Yet as it pulls along the heavy cart it seems to take pleasure in trying to grab a bit of grass at the side of the road. In comparison to the suffering it is experiencing from its heavy task, the pleasure of eating a bit of grass is very insignificant, just like the pleasure that we find in pursuing distractions such as wealth and so forth. The emphasis here is that if one allows one's mind to be distracted with these pursuits then that will be an obstacle to liberation and freedom from suffering.

The really important point here is to not allow ourselves to be deceived by small benefits or pleasures, which lead to great suffering in the future. The literal translation of the Tibetan word is not to follow 'that which brings small benefit but great suffering' in the end. By allowing ourselves to be deceived and consumed by fleeting pleasures we fail to understand the karmic consequences of long-lasting suffering in the future. The old man mentioned earlier, who is now in prison for his crimes, experienced only fleeting pleasures from his sexual misconduct. But the consequence is being imprisoned most probably for the rest of his life. We can learn a lot from this example.

When one engages in misdeeds such as sexual misconduct, theft and so forth then these are negative deeds in relation to the Dharma – not only has one broken the rules relating to moral conduct from the Dharma point of view but one has also broken the law. So one loses out twice – one will have to experience two sets of ill-effects; one from a Dharma point of view and the other from the legal system. There are legal consequences in this life, as well as negative consequences to be experienced in future lifetimes as well.

These are points for us to really consider. We need to be particularly mindful at times when we might be driven by desirous impulses. Contemplating and thinking about the disadvantages that will arise from these actions in this life, and most importantly in future lives, will help one to apply restraint, and not act upon those desirous and negative impulses.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

8 March 2016

Maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I will achieve enlightenment, and for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

Generating such a motivation, even for a few moments, will definitely establish a very strong positive imprint in our mind.

Following from our last session, we were explaining the verses under the following heading:

2.2.1.3.2.2.3. It obstructs liberation and exhausts the freedoms and endowments

Having covered the first verse and a half under this heading, now we come to the second verse which reads:

81. *For the purpose of insignificant happiness,
Which is not rare and even an ox can attain,
Those tormented by karma destroy
The difficult to find freedoms and endowments.*

The commentary explains:

... to work to achieve happiness and clear away suffering only in this life is something even animals stronger than humans can do; it is something the ox also does.

Those tormented by the actions of craving for false objects for the extremely insignificant happiness of this life, which is not rare and even an ox tries to achieve, exhaust and destroy the perfect freedoms and endowments found in this life, which are of great purpose and difficult to attain. Contemplating these faults one should strive to take the essence of this basis with the freedoms and endowments.

In other words, if we are not mindful and engage in meaningless worldly activities, we will allow our incredibly fortunate state of having the eight freedoms and ten endowments to completely go to waste. As explained in the commentary, the work or effort put into achieving some happiness and clearing away some temporary suffering merely in this life is something even animals can do. In fact, some animals can do it better than us, because they are stronger and have greater capacity to protect themselves from danger and maintain their security.

The main point is that if we are not mindful of how we spend our lives, we will merely focus on this life, mindlessly putting our efforts into attaining some temporary happiness and removing some temporary suffering. Even if we claim to know and practise Dharma, if we are not mindful, this is exactly what our situation will be. This logical explanation is a really significant point for us to contemplate.

As further emphasised, those tormented by the actions of craving for false objects for the extremely insignificant happiness of this life, which is not rare and even an ox tries to achieve, exhaust and destroy the perfect freedoms and endowments found in this life, which are of great purpose and difficult to attain.

These are significant points for us because at this time we have obtained such conditions as having the freedoms and endowments. When we think about our life so far, on the surface it may seem that we have led a life in the Dharma, but in fact we have spent most of our time and energy engaging in worldly or non-virtuous activities. We have spent a big part of our life idleness.

This is how our life is being exhausted moment by moment; every moment, our life is getting shorter. If we don't apply ourselves to the actual practice of Dharma and just give into worldly activities, our life will eventually come to an end without having achieved any great purpose. Being completely distracted by frivolous activities and sensual, or desire objects is what obstructs us from engaging in true Dharma practice.

While we have the conditions to engage in Dharma practice, we need to take the essence of this precious life. These freedoms and endowments are difficult to obtain. We are incredibly fortunate to have come in contact with the Mahayana teachings and unmistakable Mahayana teachers. Thus, we have access to the teachings of the Buddha, such as the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings, and the practices such as the three higher trainings of morality, meditation and wisdom. But if we don't utilise this opportunity now, while we have access to the teachings and practices, we are wasting these extremely rare and precious conditions.

Here the text is encouraging us to thoroughly investigate and ask ourselves, "Until now, how have I spent my life? What essence have I taken from it? What meaning or purpose have I achieved from my life thus far?" If one cannot find evidence of achieving much purpose in one's life, then one needs to start putting the teachings into practice.

If we were to develop a sense of disenchantment with this life's affairs and really engage in the practices of morality and so forth, we would definitely secure the results of the practice of the small scope – a good rebirth for our next lifetime – thus deriving significant purpose and meaning from our practice.

Better yet, we could develop a sense of renunciation, becoming disenchanted not only with this life's affairs, but with all of the pleasures and sufferings of cyclic existence. If one develops such disenchantment with cyclic existence and strives to obtain liberation and engages in practices with this intention, one will have secured the practice of the medium scope.

Further, even if we are unable to fully embrace the practice of achieving enlightenment right now, if we can develop a bodhicitta attitude based on love and compassion to the best of our ability, and engage in practices with a bodhicitta motivation, then we will have definitely secured a practice that is in line with the Mahayana practice of the great scope.

As explained in the teachings, this is how we need to take the essence of our precious human life. This is what is being explained when the commentary says contemplating these faults one should strive to take the essence of this basis with freedoms and endowments. When one's practice is free from the stains of merely focusing on this life's gains, it becomes purposeful.

A more specific example of a practice that can become more meaningful, is the meditation practice of giving and taking that we did earlier. When we do the tong-len practice of giving and taking on the basis of a pure altruistic motivation – a genuine wish to benefit others, which is free from the stain of self-interest – it then becomes highly purposeful and meaningful. The motivation for the practice needs to be accompanied with the determination “I will fully engage in benefiting sentient beings by leading them to the state of happiness and freeing them from all suffering, and I will do this myself.”

In our sessions here, we are actually studying a Mahayana text. However, whether our study becomes highly meaningful or mediocre depends on our motivation; if it is focused only on this life's interests, our study does not even become a Dharma practice. Therefore, as I regularly emphasise, our motivation is extremely important, both from the teacher's side as well as from the listeners' side. When a bodhicitta motivation is secured from both the teacher's and the listeners' sides, then our study becomes a proper Dharma practice.

Generating a positive motivation is a way of being clear about the goal we intend to achieve. Each time we generate a positive motivation, it helps reinforce the goals we have set ourselves. This is how we also need to understand the significance of cultivating a proper motivation.

Indeed, generating a proper motivation sets our conduct in a proper way. If someone presents a teaching, for example, with the motivation of merely acquiring fame and gain, that individual then would only be willing to teach those who are wealthy and who can pay more, and might not consider giving a teaching to someone who cannot afford to pay, or make grand offerings. When an individual chooses what kind of students they're going to teach based on how many offerings they will get, that clearly shows a flawed motivation. This is really important for us to keep in mind. While you might not be in immediate danger now, there will come a time in the future when you are in a position of presenting the Dharma and regarded as a spiritual teacher. So, it is important to prepare yourself now, as way to protect yourself from misleading others.

Of course, I'm not claiming that I'm doing high level practices or that I'm completely pure and stainless. However as far as my motivation is concerned, because of the danger of a stained motivation, I make every effort to generate the most positive motivation for presenting the teachings. I make a specific effort to present the teachings without seeking reward such as fame and gain, with the intention only that the teachings may be of benefit for whoever comes to listen to them. Generating such a motivation helps me. I don't personally feel that I have an attitude of seeking gain and fame; I don't really like that sort of approach. However, there are many who seem to make it a priority to become more famous or well known, to get more followers so they can gain more wealth and so forth. This is something I consider as poison, but maybe there are others who don't really see it like this.

Some may think I've gone astray and lack the proper approach. However I don't feel I've gone down the wrong path; when I present the teachings it only makes my mind happier and more joyful rather than feeling anxious and troubled. If one's motivation was tainted by seeking only fame and gain, then after some time they end up having a more troubled mind due to that corrupt mindset.

2.2.1.3.2.2.4. Having contemplated the shortcomings, generating the mind wishing for liberation

The verse under that reads:

82. *The desires are certain to disintegrate
And throw one into the hells and so forth,
Just merely a fraction of the effort of
The great effort endured*
83. *For the always meaningless,
Will achieve the very enlightenment.
The desirous have more suffering than those Practising the path to enlightenment, and no enlightenment.*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

In addition, the desired sensual happiness, such as that of a prince, is certain to disintegrate, and by being attached to it one falls to lower realms such as the hells. One can easily attain enlightenment with just a fraction of the difficulty and effort that one is subject to since beginningless time in attaining the always meaningless. Those attached to the vile, do not act in such a manner. The suffering of the desirous, desiring to attain their wishes, exceeds the suffering of those engaged in the practices to attain enlightenment, and they also do not have the desired result of enlightenment.

The main point here is the reality of impermanence. No matter how much one may have accumulated in terms of wealth or gain, it will naturally start to disintegrate; indeed, one's own life is coming to an end moment by moment. There is nothing we label as valuable that lasts or is permanent.

As related in the teachings, the end of all meeting is separation, the end of all accumulation is dispersion, and the end of all high status is to fall to the low. So meetings, such as relationships, eventually end in separation. And no matter how much wealth one accumulates, the end result is that it will be used up: it will be dispersed. Also, while high status in society may last for a certain period of time, the end result of it is returning again to a lower rank. We do not need to think of this situation necessarily happening only in this life. For example, while we may enjoy the high status of a human existence now, there's no certainty that we will not fall into a lower realm, such as the animal realm, in the next life. So, falling from a high status is a reality when we think of it happening over a period of time.

The main point here is that whatever worldly happiness we experience will eventually have to come to an end. There is no everlasting samsaric happiness.

Further, being attached to such worldly sensual pleasures will cause one to fall into the lower realms such as the hells. One can easily attain enlightenment with just a fraction of the difficulty and effort that one is subject to since beginningless time in attaining the always meaningless. In other words, although we have spent much time and energy in trying to achieve meaningless, fleeting pleasures over countless lifetimes, the effort it would take to become enlightened is only a fraction of that amount of time and effort. Thus, as the commentary exhorts, those attached to the vile – meaning those who are attached to the meaningless affairs of this life – do not act in such a manner. Contemplating the pitfalls of samsara and not being attached to samsaric pleasures will ensure that we do not act in such a manner.

As the text further explains, those who pursue their desires and worldly goals don't even achieve the ultimate, desirable goal – enlightenment — because of being completely consumed by worldly affairs.

2.2.1.3.2.2.5. Contemplating the faults of desire

The verse relating to this is:

84. *Contemplating the sufferings of hells and such,
Even weapons, poison, fire
High cliffs and enemies
Do not suffice as examples for the desirous.*

The commentary explains:

Having contemplated the sufferings of the lower realms such as the hells that arise from the negativity that one created for the purpose of desire, even examples such as weapons, poison, fire, high cliffs and enemies cannot suffice as examples for the harm of desire the desirous experience. Therefore, one should not be attached to sense objects.

Here, contemplating the sufferings of the lower realms such as the hells that arise from the negativity that one created for the purpose of desire is presented as an essential way to develop renunciation. As the teaching points out, without suffering one cannot develop renunciation. These are essential points. While we don't wish to experience suffering, contemplating and meditating on suffering encourage us to be free from cyclic existence.

Some examples of suffering we can relate to in this life include people being maimed by weapons; experiencing great agony after consuming poison; being scorched by fire; jumping from high cliffs and enduring great injuries; or having harm inflicted on them by their enemies. However, such sufferings are nothing compared to the sufferings experienced in the lower realms; all the extreme sufferings we can think of in relation to our human existence amount to nothing compared to the sufferings experienced in the lower realms as a consequence of desire. The conclusion in the commentary is therefore, one should not be attached to sense objects.

For example, we would consider it to be extreme suffering and a great calamity if someone perished in a fire. However, that person may have previously created positive karmas and had positive imprints in their mind that might, for example, result in them being reborn in the god realms in their next life. So while we are focused on the great misfortune and suffering experienced by the individual when consumed in the fire, we may not be able to see that shortly after they perish, they have the karma to be reborn in a higher realm such as the god realms, where they experience great pleasure.

On the other hand, there may be others who may have led quite a luxurious and seemingly comfortable life now but, as a consequence of desire, will experience the much more extreme suffering of the hell realms in their future life.

The suffering of perishing in a great fire may be uncomfortable in the moment, but that in itself – perishing in the fire – does not become a cause to take the individual to the sufferings of the lower realms, such as the hell realms. Whereas being attached to desire objects will be a cause leading one to such extreme suffering.

2.2.2. *Meditating on affinity for isolation*¹

If one were to contemplate the faults of desire, especially the consequences of desire, one would develop the strong wish to go into isolation where one is not consumed by desire and can practise non-attachment.

This heading is subdivided into two:

2.2.2.1. Showing

2.2.2.2. Explaining

2.2.2.1. SHOWING

This is presented with the first two lines of the next verse.

*85ab. Thus, one should be weary of desire
And generate a liking for solitude*

The commentary [missing in the draft text] explains:

As explained earlier, one develops disenchantment with desire and generates the joy for isolation and thus establishes mental stabilisation.

As explained, the text is encouraging us to rely on isolation in order to develop mental stabilisation, which is basically calm abiding.

2.2.2.2. EXPLAINING

There are three subdivisions:

2.2.2.2.1 The distinction of place and so forth

2.2.2.2.2. The quality of independence

2.2.2.2.3. The quality of satisfaction

The three subdivisions are meticulously presented: the distinction of place, meaning the explanation of what would be a conducive place for going into isolation; the quality of independence, meaning the great virtue of being independent when going into isolation; and the quality of satisfaction or contentment that one develops.

2.2.2.2.1 The distinction of place and so forth

The second two lines of the earlier verse, followed by the subsequent verse, are presented. These are preceded by this query or hypothetical question:

Query: In what kind of isolated place should one remain?

The verses which relate to that as an answer:

¹ This heading was introduced on 17 November 2015 as Meditating on Joy for Solitude. This was the second part of Abandoning Incorrect Conceptualisation.

85cd. Devoid of strife and afflictions.

The fortunate contemplate the purpose of others

86. *And wander about in the peaceful forest
On cool wholesome abodes of vast flat stones,
Joyful and refreshed by moonlight and sandal,
Quiet, where peaceful forest breezes move.*

As the commentary explains:

Answer: Just like the wheel-turning king who has no competition and enjoys the happiness of the senses, the yogi abides in the peaceful forest free from the distractions of outer strife, and the afflictions of attachment and anger by others. Like previous fortunate beings, practicing the good actions in a cool place refreshed by moonlight and anointed by sandal, on vast flat stones equalling wholesome abodes, joyful and without unpleasant sound to the mind, in a place beautified by the movement of a soft and peaceful forest breeze.

There the yogi does contemplations for the purpose of others, such as meditating on the mind of enlightenment, and wanders around. Relying in such a way on solitude the yogi's happiness is superior to any kind of worldly happiness.

Just like the wheel-turning king who has no competition means there is no one who experiences the joys or pleasures of the senses as much as the wheel-turning king. The wheel-turning king is the ultimate example of someone who experiences great sensual joys.

Beyond that, the yogi abides in the peaceful forest free from the distractions of outer strife, and the afflictions of attachment and anger by others – in other words, going into isolation naturally means the meditator is free from others' harms, and not subject to others' attachment or anger.

The commentary then mentions previous fortunate beings, which can refer to bodhisattvas, or those who have had the great fortune to have all the conditions intact to engage in practice in solitude. Like them, the yogi practises good actions in cool places refreshed by moonlight and anointed by sandal, on vast flat stones equalling wholesome abodes. Here the analogy is that of beautiful, shimmering, celestial palaces where the floors are lit by moonlight and the air is perfumed. These abodes are considered to be very luxurious and comfortable. Similarly, for an individual who has gone into solitude, the dwelling place in their mind would be as comfortable and beautiful as what is described here.

Then, on vast flat stones equalling wholesome abodes, joyful and without unpleasant sound to the mind, in a place beautified by the movement of a soft and peaceful forest breeze refers to the further qualities of being in solitude, where there is no sound like the hustle and bustle of towns or other distracting sounds to disturb one's mind. Also such a dwelling is beautified by a peaceful forest breeze. These are the qualities of the abode itself, which is isolation.

In such a place with all of these conducive conditions, the yogi does contemplations for the purpose of others, such as meditating on the mind of enlightenment. So the actual object of the meditation would be the mind of enlightenment, with the pure wish to benefit other sentient beings.

With such a motivation, the yogis wander about in solitude, and relying in such a way on solitude the yogi's happiness is superior to any worldly happiness. Indeed, when the mind of such an individual is really attuned, with all the external and internal conditions intact, they enjoy great happiness, which far exceeds any kind of worldly happiness that one may be familiar with.

These are points for us to acquaint our minds with and put into practice. While we may not have all the necessary conditions right now to go into solitude and remain in isolation, we can acquaint our mind with the great advantages of this. Even if we have the ability to have some quiet time for just one or two days to acquaint the mind with virtue and contemplate the Dharma, we are actually acquainting ourselves with acquiring the conditions in the future.

As also emphasised here, the yogi does contemplations for the purpose of others, meaning that for a Mahayana practitioner, the intention or motivation to be in solitude would be to benefit other sentient beings. With that positive motivation, of course, they will also personally experience great joy from being in solitude. With no desire objects, there's no immediate cause for the mind to follow distractions, so solitude becomes really conducive for the mind itself. This is where we can also understand how our mind gets so easily distracted when we are around desire objects.

This refers to the advantage of being independent when one goes into solitude. The verse relating to this is the next verse:

87. *Abiding as one wishes
In empty houses, at the foot of trees and caves,
Abandoning the suffering of keeping,
Enjoying without care and independently.*

The commentary explains:

Abiding in houses abandoned by others, at the foot of trees and caves for as long as one wishes, abandoning the suffering of keeping and protecting many possessions. They abide carefree, independently from fears and worries.

Of course, as mentioned here one needs to be careful not go into houses that are actually occupied by others, and do what you may call squatting! The text emphasises houses that are completely abandoned, where's there's no fear of others coming and disturbing one.

The reference to abiding in abandoned houses or at the foot of trees and caves for as long as one wishes refers to setting a fixed time, for example, if one wishes to do retreat. This is significant. Setting a fixed time will ensure one abides in isolation, in retreat mode, for that period. If one comes out of retreat prior to the fixed time, it might be like breaking the retreat commitment. The main point here is to set a time for oneself, with the intention of remaining in that retreat for the duration.

Then abandoning the suffering of keeping and protecting many possessions means that when one goes into solitude, one has only the basic, bare essentials. Because one does not have many belongings, one is free of the sufferings associated with having a lot of belongings. If one has many possessions, one has to worry about how to keep, preserve and protect them. Such worries and suffering are naturally reduced when one doesn't have many possessions. Therefore, such individuals abide carefree, independently from fears and worries of such frivolous ways and fears.

The significance of mentioning abandoned houses, caves and the foot of trees as abodes for one's isolation is to protect one from becoming attached to a certain place. If one goes into solitude and remains in one place for a long time, and then starts to become attached to that place, one's intention to make that place even better and more comfortable will become stronger.

So the way to actually practise abiding in solitude is, in summary, to practise having less desire and more contentment. To protect his disciples from attachment, the Buddha forbade fully ordained monks from having possessions, and required that they adopt meagre clothing. But for certain fully ordained monks who were prone to anger, the Buddha permitted them to have nice food and clothing. That is actually very skilful. If you provide someone who is prone to anger, or easily irritated and upset with nice things, food and so forth, this can help to calm their mind.

This is good practical advice for those living in partnership with others. If your partner is inclined to become easily upset and angry, then give them a nice meal to help calm them down. Or maybe buy them some nice clothing; this can also help their mind to settle down. This is practical advice that we need to put into practice. Often when a partner or companion is upset, rather than trying to find means to appease them, you might aggravate them more. This happens all too often. Rather than seeking ways to appease their anger so they don't become more upset and angry, one seems to make them even more upset. This is how conflict arises.

I notice that people often go out and start telling others about such problems, and may even exaggerate them, saying, "Oh my partner or companion is very upset and is always angry". So rather than trying to make the situation better and resolve it between themselves, one goes out and announces to others that one's partner is upset or is a very angry person. This doesn't help the situation.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

15 March 2016

Based on the motivation that we generated during the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we will now engage in our meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now we can set our motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and put them into practice well.

The very text that we are studying introduces bodhicitta – the mind of enlightenment – showing us how to develop and further nurture it. It is important to periodically remind ourselves of this aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, and to familiarise ourselves with bodhicitta again and again on a regular basis.

Generating the bodhicitta attitude as a motivation should not be confused with actually generating the mind of enlightenment. However, such a motivation definitely plants a seed that will develop at some time in the future – familiarising our mind with bodhicitta now will definitely leave a very strong imprint.

As His Holiness mentions, while chapter eight explains how to develop concentration and thus calm abiding, it is presented in the context of instructions on how to develop the mind of enlightenment. So the presentation is not just about how to develop calm abiding, but more specifically on developing bodhicitta. For those of us who are already familiar with the bodhicitta attitude, the following verses in the text show the optimum way to develop this mind of bodhicitta.

As I have mentioned previously, the first two chapters in the text are specifically related to the benefits of the mind of enlightenment, while the middle three chapters present techniques to prevent the degeneration of the mind of enlightenment, and chapters seven to nine specifically explain how to further develop the strength of the mind of enlightenment. So we can see the really meticulous organisation of the text. His Holiness the Dalai Lama praises this text as being one of the most supreme presentations of how to generate bodhicitta, develop it and further increase it. It is indeed a supreme text.

2.2.2. Meditating on affinity for isolation

2.2.2.2.2. The quality of independence

This heading relates to the quality of the satisfaction that one gains from being in solitude. The verse relating to this heading reads:

88. *Acting independently and without attachment,
Having no relation to anybody,*

*Enjoying the happiness of contentment,
This is difficult to find even for the powerful.*

Gyaltsab Je gives this explanation of the meaning of the text:

The happiness of independently enjoying place, possessions and so forth as one wishes without attachment to them, of abiding in a place with no relation to anybody, with the happiness of being content with meagre food and clothing, is a happiness that is even difficult to find for gods and influential humans. Hence, those skilled should make an effort to rely on solitude.

What is clearly presented here is the need to develop contentment, and in explaining the benefits of contentment, it is also showing the faults of not practising contentment. All the positive qualities that are presented here are the consequence of practising contentment, which is one of the main prerequisites for developing calm abiding. The happiness enjoying place, possessions and so forth means that when one is in solitude one is able to enjoy the place and its conditions. Independently refers to not having to rely on or be dependent on others, i.e. one is able to enjoy that place of abode because one does not have to depend or rely upon others.

It is possible to enjoy the place and possessions and so forth because one is not attached to them. When one overcomes attachment to one's own body, the place one dwells in and one's possessions then one is able to fully utilise and enjoy them. In contrast, when we are still attached to our body, possessions and place, then although we may claim otherwise, we are, in fact, not able to really enjoy our possessions and so forth because of that strong attachment. It is attachment that prevents us from fully enjoying the attributes of our body, possessions and place. In addition to enjoying the place and so forth, there is also the happiness of being content with meagre food and clothing.

Having no relation to anybody refers to not being constricted by others. Having no need to please relatives or friends or people of high or low status, one can completely focus on one's practice. Indeed, it is our strong attachment to relationships that keeps us circling in samsara as we try to please those to whom we are attached, and overpower those who try to oppose us. It is these kinds of relationships that keep us circling in samsara over and over again.

The joy that is being explained here is the joy of contentment. When one practises having few desires and contentment then it brings great satisfaction. We really need to pay attention to the great advice that is being presented here.

It may sound presumptuous, but from my own experience I can say that I have found real satisfaction with my attempts at having less desire and practising contentment. In my early twenties I spent some significant time practising having less desire and contentment. I arrived in India with no possessions and no money – just the clothes I wore. Yet over the next couple of years, despite real hardship, I was not unhappy because I practised contentment with my situation. My mind was happy, and as a result of practising in this way, I had no worries. I am not sure if I was swayed by the worldly dharmas, but I do recall feeling a great sense of satisfaction with this practice.

Although having less desire and practising contentment is a paramount practice for Dharma practitioners, anyone who practises contentment will definitely reap the benefit, and experience an inner sense of joy and satisfaction. Nagarjuna said that being contented is a true mark of wealth. As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary, finding the happiness of contentment is difficult even for the gods and powerful, influential humans. Nothing in samsara – wealth, pleasurable objects, sensual pleasures – will make them happy when they lack contentment in their heart.

In simple terms, practising contentment means being happy with what one has, and thinking, 'I am happy and contented with what I have, and I am happy and contented with the friends that I have, even they are few in number', regardless of whether we are in solitude or not. We can apply this practice to our everyday life, wherever we may be.

As the text indicates, when all the conditions come together for one to be able to go into solitude, then it should be utilised to further develop the mind of enlightenment. Indeed, there is no greater joy and satisfaction than in doing that.

Then the commentary concludes with this exhortation: Hence, those skilled should make an effort to rely on solitude.

One cannot underestimate the great value of contentment as that is what brings a true sense of satisfaction. When one is contented, any wealth one has will bring a sense of joy and happiness. Without contentment however, no matter how much wealth one has, there will be no satisfaction and no real happiness. Those who practice true contentment seem to be really happy wherever they may be. His Holiness the Dalai Lama has noticed that the focus of a certain order of Christian monks and nuns is contentment. They don't have any possessions or savings; they forsake everything and concentrate on a single-pointed focus on God. Even though they don't have anything, they seem to be really happy because they are contented. We can see from this example how the practice of contentment definitely brings a sense of joy to those who practise it.

When one is contented, one's living conditions and so forth will work out quite well. Whereas if one lacks contentment then that leads to dissatisfaction with one's surroundings and living conditions, and then conflicts and so forth arise. We really need to pay particular attention to this point.

However, the emphasis on practising contentment should not be misinterpreted as meaning that one has to get rid of all one's wealth and possessions. That is not the point. Rather, one needs to reduce attachment to wealth and possessions. If one does not explain this to others properly, and they misunderstand what you say, then they may get the impression of, "Oh, if you are a Buddhist then you have to completely divest yourself of all your wealth and possessions". Being contented is not suggesting that we have to live in very poor conditions. Far from that, it is actually saying that we should be contented and happy regardless of the situations we encounter, and that reducing attachment to one's possessions and wealth brings satisfaction and contentment.

3. THE WAY OF MEDITATING ON CALM ABIDING¹

This is the third major section of the chapter, and it has two subdivisions:

- 3.1 The way of meditating on equalising self and others
- 3.2. The way of exchanging self and others

Here we can note that the method for developing calm abiding is presented within the context of meditating on equalising and then exchanging self with others. There is no separate explanation of the way to develop calm abiding.

What is calm abiding?

We also need to take note that calm abiding (shi-ne in Tibetan) and mental stabilisation (sam-ten) refer to the same thing. As I have explained many times, the definition of calm abiding is the meditative equipoise that is able to single-pointedly focus on its object for as long as it wishes, which is combined with the bliss of physical and mental pliancy. Calm abiding is a meditative state of mind that is able to focus single-pointedly on an object for as long as one wishes, and this is associated with the bliss that arises due to physical and mental pliancy. The methods for developing calm abiding will be presented in more detail later on, but it is good to have some understanding of the topic at this point.

The reason why the explanation of calm abiding is embedded in the subject of the text, rather than being explicitly introduced and explained, is perhaps because the teaching was presented to listeners of sharp intellect. Because of that intellect we're able to derive an understanding of this topic from other sources of the Buddha's teachings.

Coming back to the method for developing calm abiding, having chosen an appropriate object one needs to focus on that chosen object without wavering. Focussing single-pointedly means focussing on that object without distraction, free from the obstacles of laxity and excitement.

One continuously engages in this single-pointed focus, free from the faults of laxity and excitement, again and again, and thus familiarises one's mind with the object. Then, having engaged in that mental training, the mind becomes free from defects like wandering off, or resistance to focussing on the object. Thus the mind becomes serviceable, and it is at this point that one obtains mental pliancy.

Because one is able to focus on the object without mental effort, it helps the wind energy to flow freely through one's body. Any physical resistance to sitting for too long, to the distractions caused by aches and pains and so forth subsides, and so the physical body also becomes serviceable. At that point one obtains physical pliancy.

¹ This section of the text was introduced on 29 September 2015. The other two major sections under the heading Explaining the Text of the Chapter, are Advice to Meditate on Mental Stabilisation, and Abandoning the Opposing Factors to Calm Abiding

Due to that physical pliancy there is no resistance whatsoever at a physical level, and one is able to sit for as long as one wishes. That induces a blissful feeling throughout the body, which is called physical bliss. Experiencing that physical bliss then induces a mental bliss.

When a meditator experiences this combination of physical and mental bliss, and further familiarises themselves with the object of focus, then they are able to focus unwaveringly on that object, free from all faults, and for as long as they wish. At that point the meditator has obtained calm abiding. This, in short, is what reaching calm abiding entails, and it is a significant result of the practice of meditation.

Although further explanations are presented later on, it is good to have this summary of what calm abiding means. This understanding will resolve any doubts about the benefits of engaging in the practice of meditation, or its end result that you or others might have – it is that physical and mental bliss of remaining in single-pointed focus on an object.

The three higher trainings

Following the attainment of calm abiding, one then obtains special insight, which is the real force that overcomes our delusions. In order to obtain special insight one has to have first obtained calm abiding. In other words, special insight cannot be developed without having previously developed calm abiding.

The first condition for being able to develop calm abiding is practising morality, which serves as the basis for the other two higher trainings of concentration and wisdom. So morality is really the fundamental basis. As you know, one of the qualities of a Mahayana teacher is that they are endowed with morality; this indeed is one of the most important qualities of a Mahayana teacher. The definition of morality and so forth is explained in detail in Liberation in the Palm of your Hand, so you can refer to that for more information.

Morality serves as the root of all virtues. Just like a seed is the basis from which all plants grow, morality is the basis for the development of all virtue. Practising morality acts as a restraint to engaging in the gross levels of external distractions.

Inner distractions can be divided into gross and subtle distractions. The gross level of inner distraction is basically laxity and excitement. As a means to overcome these gross inner distractions of laxity and excitement one applies the training of meditation.

Subtle inner distraction refers to grasping at true existence or grasping at a self. To overcome this grasping one needs to apply the wisdom realising emptiness. The wisdom realising selflessness, or the realisation of emptiness is the means to overcome the most subtle levels of inner distraction, and thus eliminate all distractions.

It is good to have this overview of how gaining an understanding of the three baskets of the teachings of the Buddha can be subsumed into the three higher trainings of morality, meditation and wisdom, and how that serves as a means to overcome gross and subtle distractions and obscurations. Having this overall view can be very helpful for understanding the structure of the Buddha's teachings.

Having given you an overview of what calm abiding entails, its benefits and so forth, we now return to the text.

3.1.1. Brief explanation

This section is explained in two verses.

*89. Having contemplated the qualities of solitude
In these and other aspects,
One should pacify disturbing thoughts
And meditate on the mind of enlightenment.*

The commentary on this verse explains:

Having contemplated in the aspects outlined before, and in other aspects, the qualities of remote places isolated from outer excitement and other distractions, one should then pacify the disturbing thoughts that are aspiring to sense and other objects, and meditate on the mind of enlightenment.

When the commentary states Having contemplated in the aspects outlined before, and in other aspects, the qualities of remote places isolated from outer excitement and other distractions, it is referring to places that are isolated from external distractions such as friends and relatives, and the hustle and bustle of daily life. So the abode needs to be an isolated place like a forest or a cave where you are free from external distractions.

The next type of isolation is isolation from inner distractions, which are the disturbing thoughts. As mentioned previously, it is not sufficient to exist in an isolated place free from external distractions if the mind is still distracted. No conducive external conditions can help if one is constantly affected by disturbing thoughts. Therefore, you need to be isolated from inner distractions, i.e. disturbing thoughts.

... and other aspects refers to being isolated from self-interest. The very purpose of going into isolation is to develop the mind of enlightenment. If you are affected by self-interest and a self-cherishing mind, there is no way that you can develop the mind of enlightenment, which is primarily the wish to benefit other sentient beings.

So one should pacify the disturbing thoughts that are aspiring to sense and other objects, and then use the external conditions to meditate on the mind of enlightenment. That is the real purpose of conducive conditions.

The second verse under this heading reads:

*90. At first, strive in meditating
On equalising self and others.
Since they are the same in happiness and suffering
Look after others like yourself.*

The commentary is presented in the form of hypothetical questions and answers.

Query: With which method should one meditate?

Answer: At first, strive in meditating on equalising self and others.

Query: How?

Answer: Since others have the same acceptance and rejection of happiness and suffering as oneself, and try to establish their happiness and clear their suffering in the same way as one tries to establish one's happiness and stop one's suffering, one should look after all sentient beings, cherishing them like oneself.

In response to the hypothetical query, With what method should one meditate? the commentary states, At first strive in meditating on equalising self and others. This is an essential point, because without first equalising oneself with others there is no possibility of being able to engage in the actual practice of exchanging self with others. So the practice of exchanging self with others has to be preceded by equalising oneself with others.

The hypothetical question following on from this is How?, and then the commentary goes on to explain that one needs to see all beings as being equal in wanting happiness, and not wanting any suffering.

All beings equally have this fundamental aspiration or wish to be happy and not to suffer. We might wonder how all beings can be equal, but when we think about it we see that regardless of whether they are rich or poor, whether they have high status or power like a king or minister, or if they are a simple person, all living beings, including animals such as cats or dogs are alike in wanting happiness, and not wanting to experience suffering. So as explained in the commentary, one needs to first strive in meditating on equalising self and others.

When the commentary explains that others have the same acceptance and rejection of happiness and suffering as oneself it is saying that as we too have this wish for happiness and want to avoid suffering, we are all alike. This is how we are equal. Since that is the case, we need to try to establish their happiness and clear their suffering in the same way as one tries to establish one's happiness and stop one's suffering. Without first generating the mind of equalising oneself with others, there is no possibility of developing love and compassion.

Thus, the commentary concludes, one should look after all sentient beings, cherishing them like oneself.

[Symbolically, there was a pause here as a lost frog that had made its way into the gompa was collected to be returned to an appropriate habitat. We recited the OM MANI PADME HUM mantra, followed by the Four Immeasurables.]

3.1.2. Extensive explanation

This has four subdivisions:

3.1.2.1. Explaining the meaning of equalising self and others

3.1.2.2. The way of meditating on equalising self and others

3.1.2.3. The benefits of meditating on it

3.1.2.4. If one meditates on equalising self and others, one can develop it

3.1.2.1. EXPLAINING THE MEANING OF EQUALISING SELF AND OTHERS

This hypothetical question precedes the verse.

Argument: As there are infinite different sentient beings, and it is not suitable to generate the mind thinking 'I' with regards to them, how can the acceptance of their happiness and the rejection of their suffering possibly be one's own?

The verses that we have covered are essential for our practice. Therefore, it is good to really familiarise ourselves with them, reading and rereading them and thinking about their meaning. Just reading them once or twice doesn't help to move the mind, and without that there will be no transformation. But by reading them again and again and thinking about their meaning we can derive real benefit from them – it can bring great solace.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

While maintaining the motivation generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayer, we will now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

We can generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

Generating such a motivation, even for a few moments, will definitely establish very strong positive imprints in one's mind.

This part of the text explains very profound ways of engaging in the actual practice of exchanging self with others, which becomes very meaningful when we put it into practise.

The earlier verses explained how one needs to overcome strong attachment to desire objects To overcome strong desire for sensual objects, one needs to rely on solitude. This pacifies one's physical and mental defects, making them serviceable for applying single-pointed meditation on developing bodhicitta.

3.1.2.1. EXPLAINING THE MEANING OF EQUALISING SELF AND OTHERS

Firstly, the commentary presents this hypothetical argument:

Argument: As there are infinite different sentient beings, it is not suitable to generate the mind thinking 'I' with regards to them. How can the acceptance of their happiness and the rejection of their suffering possibly be one's own?

What is being presented here, in the form of an argument or doubt, is that there are infinite different sentient beings, if one cannot possibly regard all sentient beings as oneself, then how could it be possible for one to accept their happiness and reject their sufferings?

The verse reads:

91. *Although there are many parts such as hands and so forth,
They belong to the same body that is the object of protection;
Likewise, the happy and suffering migrators
All equal oneself in desiring happiness.*

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse, which serves as an answer to the earlier hypothetical argument:

Answer: Although the body has many parts such as the feet and hands, they are all the same in being parts of the one body that is regarded as 'mine' by the person. Likewise, although there are many different migrators, such as gods and humans, their happiness and sufferings are not different. Focusing on how they are the same, one beholds all others as oneself, holds them as self, and thinks, "I shall establish that happiness and I shall clear away this suffering." This is the meaning of meditating that all of them are equal to oneself.

The first part of the commentary presents the analogy, although the body has many parts such as the feet and hands, they are all the same in being parts of the one body that is regarded as 'mine', which means that although there are many distinct parts to our body such as the arms, the legs, the head etc. the reason we cherish and protect all parts is because of clinging to them as 'mine'.

This is an analogy to illustrate that although there are an infinite number of distinct sentient beings, such as gods and humans etc., they are all the same in wanting to experience happiness, and not wanting to experience any misery or suffering. As there is no difference between one's own likes and dislikes and their likes and dislikes, if one begins to cherish all beings it is possible to regard their suffering as one's own suffering, and their happiness as one's own happiness. One then takes the initiative to establish their happiness and eliminate the suffering of all sentient beings.

As will be presented further on, the key point is to develop the mind that cherishes other sentient beings. When one develops this mind then it is possible to establish their happiness and remove their suffering, just as one would for oneself.

3.1.2.2. THE WAY OF MEDITATING ON EQUALISING SELF AND OTHERS

This is subdivided into two:

3.1.2.2.1. Refuting that the acceptance and rejection of happiness and suffering is unsuitable to be the same

3.1.2.2.2. Explaining the reason why it is suitable to meditate on it as equal

3.1.2.2.1. Refuting that the acceptance and rejection of happiness and suffering is unsuitable to be the same

What is being established here is that it is suitable to regard the acceptance of happiness and the rejection of suffering in others as being the same as, or equal to, oneself. Without first accepting this, there is no possibility of being able actually engage in the practice of exchanging self with other.

The practice of exchanging self with other depends upon first accepting others' suffering and happiness as being equal to one's own. What is being explained here is that not accepting this is unsuitable.

The next two verses explain this point. The next hypothetical argument presented is:

Argument: Since other's sufferings do not harm one's body, and one's own sufferings do not harm the body of others, it is invalid that the clearing away of their suffering equals the clearing away of one's own suffering.

This hypothetical argument represents a doubt that arises in most of us, where we think, 'How can I be equal to others?'

The next two verses provide the answer:

92. *If, 'One's sufferings
Do not harm the body of others.'
Yet, they are one's sufferings,
Holding them as mine, they are unbearable.*
93. *Similarly, others' sufferings
Do not fall upon oneself.
Yet, they are one's sufferings,
Holding them as mine, they are difficult to bear.*

The commentary further explains:

Answer: There is no fault. Even though one's suffering does not harm the body of others, and the suffering of others does not harm oneself, their suffering is one's own suffering. By grasping at oneself as 'self' one finds one's own suffering unbearable. Similarly, by meditating on holding other sentient beings as self, even though their sufferings do not fall upon oneself to experience, their sufferings become sufferings to be cleared by oneself, because by holding sentient beings as one's own self, if they experience sufferings, they become difficult to bear for oneself.

In relation to the earlier argument, what is being presented here as an answer is, even though one's suffering does not harm the body of others, and the suffering of others does not harm oneself, their suffering is one's own suffering, because one is affected by it. Of course others' physical suffering is obviously not one's own suffering. In other words, when someone else is suffering from a physical ailment, it is not as if we experience the actual pain of that ailment in our own body. While it is true that the suffering of someone else's body does not harm one's own body, nevertheless their suffering is akin to one's own suffering, because one is affected by it. Thus, one needs to overcome their suffering, which is the main point.

By grasping at oneself as 'self' one finds one's own suffering unbearable. This confirms that in relation to oneself, the suffering one experiences is due to a strong grasping at the self, and so one's suffering becomes unbearable.

Similarly, by meditating on holding other sentient beings as self, even though their sufferings do not fall upon oneself to experience, their sufferings become sufferings to be cleared by oneself. This acknowledges that while others' sufferings are not experienced by oneself, when others are experiencing suffering, if one holds them as self, then their suffering becomes one's own suffering.

In reality we do experience this. For example, when close and dear ones are experiencing pain and suffering, even though we do not actually experience their pain, it is unbearable to see them suffering, because of our strong bond with them. In contrast, if a stranger, or someone we feel indifferent towards, experiences pain and suffering, it doesn't affect us very strongly. That is something we can see through our own experience.

What is also apparent is that while we feel close to someone their suffering can be unbearable for us, however when they start to become distant their suffering becomes less unbearable to us. Once it was unbearable, but then it becomes less unbearable. We might even feel glad that they are suffering now.

The main point here is that just as one's own suffering is due to strong clinging to one's own self, clinging to others also produces suffering for oneself when they experience suffering. Their sufferings become suffering to be cleared by oneself. If this is the case, one cannot reject their suffering by saying, 'It's not my suffering. I don't experience this suffering so it doesn't concern me.' Rather one needs to resolve, 'Because this suffering affects me, it is a suffering that I need to overcome'. When one holds sentient beings as dear as oneself, then it becomes difficult for one to bear their suffering; this is the point. The logical reasons meticulously explained here, show that it is reasonable to clear away the sufferings of other sentient beings.

We have personal experience of this reasoning. When we are not able to bear the sufferings of others then we are more inclined to remove that suffering, and if their suffering is not unbearable, then we will not be inclined to do anything to clear away their suffering. We notice more readily that when those very close us are suffering, we take the needed action because it's unbearable for us to see them suffer. That's why we take the initiative to do something to remove their suffering. So even though their suffering is not one's own suffering, their suffering does become a concern because it is unbearable for us to see.

When we apply this on a practical level, first we need to feel that their suffering is unbearable, then that becomes the initiative for one to actually act to clear away the suffering of other sentient beings.

We need to relate this first to a close friend or relative, then we can understand this on a larger scale, in relation to all sentient beings. We will be able to see that this is very true and reasonable. These sentiments are very meaningful and a practical way to put good attitudes into practice.

While we many not yet be anywhere near developing actual bodhicitta, if we can practice by really seeing how, just like oneself, other sentient beings do not wish to experience any suffering, and wish to only experience happiness, then we will be able to recognise others as being exactly the same as ourselves.

We need to contemplate how 'It is reasonable for me to have concern for other sentient beings and take initiative to do something to help them be free from suffering and endowed with happiness'.

On a more practical level, one would take into consideration the genuine concerns of those that we live with, and those who we deal with every day, if one had a strong feeling for their wellbeing. The point is thT when you see the other suffering and you cannot bear it, you will take initiative to help clear away their suffering. Similarly, when the other is deprived of happiness, doing something to establish them in happiness is an initiative one would take. This is indeed a very practical and meaningful strategy to foster better relationships with others.

To make one's mind familiar with these positive attitudes one needs to take initiative to actually contemplate and meditate on this points. I can definitively share with you that in my regular practice, after reciting the Prayer of the Four Immeasurables, I pause for a while to contemplate on the sentiment I need to devote myself to, in order to bring about happiness for other beings and remove their suffering.

Just thinking on that, making that resolve in my mind and spending a few moments meditating on this is, I feel, akin to generating superior intention. And on the basis of developing superior intention, one can easily develop the aspirational mind of enlightenment.

While I cannot claim of doing great practices, these are the points I really pay attention to and try to spend some time on. As I mention regularly, just making this strong resolve in the morning 'today I will not intentionally harm any living being, I will only engage in benefiting other sentient beings', and spending a few moments on it in the morning, is very meaningful, and in itself quite a powerful practice. To start the day with this intention is indeed very meaningful.

3.1.2.2.2. Explaining the reason why it is suitable to meditate on it as equal

That is again subdivided into three:

3.1.2.2.2.1. Extensive explanation

3.1.2.2.2.2. Short summary

3.1.2.2.2.2. Refuting objections

3.1.2.2.2.1. Extensive explanation

This is then subdivided again into three:

3.1.2.2.2.1.1. Stating the reason

3.1.2.2.1.2. Establishing the pervasion

3.1.2.2.1.3. Clearing away obstructing thoughts of 'It is unsuitable to meditate on equalising self and others'

3.1.2.2.1.1. Stating the reason

The verse reads:

94. *I shall clear the sufferings of others
Because they are suffering, like my own
suffering.
I shall benefit others
Because they are sentient beings, like my body.*

The commentary explains:

Take the subject 'the sufferings of other sentient beings': they are suitable to be eliminated by oneself—because they are suffering, e.g. like one's own suffering.

It is appropriate for one to establish the benefit and happiness of others—because the other person is a sentient being, e.g. like establishing the happiness of one's body.

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse in the form of a syllogism.

- Take the subject 'the sufferings of other sentient beings' is the subject;
- they are suitable to eliminate by oneself is the predicate;
- because they are suffering is the reason;
- The example is, like one's own suffering.

In the example, one understands that it is suitable to remove one's own suffering for no other reason than it is suffering and unbearable.

It is the same when one establishes that upon others, i.e. it is suitable to eliminate the suffering of others because, like one's own suffering, their suffering is also unbearable. That's the first part of the syllogism.

The next part is the predicate, it is appropriate for one to establish the benefit and happiness of others, for the reason because the others are sentient beings. Again using oneself as an example, just by virtue of the fact that one is a sentient being, one naturally wishes to establish benefit and happiness for oneself. Likewise because others are also sentient beings, with the same wishes as oneself, it is appropriate to establish benefit and happiness for them as well.

The example is that just as one wants to establish the happiness of one's own body, it is the same for others; they wish to experience happiness, and that is the reason to establish it.

These points are meticulously presented as topics to contemplate and meditate upon. When one can read these verses, quote this reasoning, and then really reflect upon them, they are not difficult to hold as an object to meditate on, they are quite easy to relate to. Just contemplating it can bring great release to a stressful state of mind and make it more relaxed.

3.1.2.2.1.2. Establishing the pervasion

That is subdivided into two:

3.1.2.2.1.2.1. The actual pervasion

3.1.2.2.1.2.2. Clearing away obstructions

3.1.2.2.1.2.1. The actual pervasion

This statement is presented first in the commentary:

It follows that it is appropriate to equally reject and accept upon having focused on the happiness and suffering of self and others—

The verse then reads:

95. *When both self and others
Are the same in desiring happiness,
What difference is there to me,
Why do I strive only for my own happiness?*

The commentary then explains:

That is because when both self and others are the same in desiring happiness—then what difference is there between others and myself? There is no difference whatsoever. For what reason do I strive only for my own happiness? It is unsuitable not to strive for the happiness of others.

As presented here, when both self and others are the same in desiring happiness — then what difference is there between others and myself? Being a hypothetical question, it explicitly implies, that there is no difference whatsoever.

So therefore, for what reason do I strive only for my own happiness? Again this implies that there is no real reason to strive selfishly only for one's own happiness. It is unsuitable not to strive for the happiness of others. The main factor that prevents one from not striving for the happiness of other sentient beings, and only working to alleviate one's own suffering, is not yet being able to replace self cherishing with the attitude of cherishing other sentient beings.

When one is able to reverse self-cherishing, then it becomes possible for one to completely embrace the need to strive for the wellbeing other sentient beings.

In practical terms, understand that one must change one's attitude in whatever one does, particularly when engaging in accumulating virtue. Without a clear motivation directed towards others it just becomes a means to focus on one's own benefit.

However if one's attitude is that 'I'm engaging in this virtue not just for myself, but to create a cause to benefit all beings', then due to the power of the motivation, the virtues and positive deeds one engages in actually become a means to benefit other sentient beings.

We need to think in these practical terms rather than thinking that one has to actually engage with others, and become really busy in order to benefit others. Without this practical approach one may not even see that it's possible to actually benefit other sentient beings. If, at our level, one can just focus on the motivation to be of benefit to other sentient beings, and make sincere dedications, then whatever positive deeds one engages in become a cause to actually benefit other sentient beings.

For your daily practice, take heed of Shantideva's advice and remind yourself: I'll generate positive motivation to engage in positive deeds for the benefit of other sentient beings; and at the end I'll make sincere dedications. In this way, when one dedicates whatever virtues one accumulates, to the aspiration to ultimately benefit sentient beings to achieve enlightenment, then that definitely secures all one's own virtues to become a cause towards that end. These are really important points to understand on a personal level for one's personal practice.

The next verse reads:

96. *When both self and others
Are the same in not desiring suffering
What difference is there to me?
Why do I protect myself but not others?*

The commentary then explains:

When both oneself and others are the same in not desiring suffering, what difference is there between others and myself? There is no difference. For what reason do I work for my own happiness, and protect my own happiness from degenerating, but do not protect the happiness of others? It is suitable to work for the happiness of others, as both are equally the same.

The commentary highlights, when both oneself and others are the same in not desiring suffering, what difference is there between others and myself? Insofar as not wishing to experience suffering, there is no difference whatsoever.

This being the case, then the logical argument is that, for what reason do I work for my own happiness, and protect my own happiness from degenerating, but do not protect the happiness of others? Following these reasons, it is unsuitable just to work for one's own happiness. The conclusion presented here is that it is suitable to work for the happiness of others, as both are equally the same.

3.1.2.2.1.2.2. Clearing away obstructions

The verse reads:

97. *If, 'I do not protect them
Because their suffering does not harm me.'
Since also the future sufferings
Do not harm, why protect from them?*

The commentary explains the meaning of this verse with another hypothetical argument:

Argument: If one were to say, I do not protect sentient beings when they experience suffering because their suffering does not harm me.

Then it presents the answer:

Answer: This is highly unsuitable. Otherwise, it would also be unsuitable to accumulate wealth when young out of fear of suffering in old age, or to engage in the morning or in the day in a method to avoid suffering in the afternoon or tomorrow, since the later future suffering does not harm the earlier person. Even if one fears there could be suffering, it would be inappropriate to protect oneself.

The commentary answers the hypothetical argument I do not protect sentient beings when they experience suffering because their suffering does not harm me. We often hold on to the very narrow and self-centred view 'If the suffering doesn't concern me, I don't have to do anything about it. Why should I care about other beings' sufferings?'

The commentary explains that this is a misconception and that the reasoning is flawed. If it were the case then, it would also be unsuitable to accumulate wealth when young out of fear of suffering in old age.

The reasoning here is a way to refute the earlier argument that it is a common practice in youth to accumulate wealth to secure your wellbeing in old age. However, with this line of reasoning, one would have to say 'Oh, since the old person being deprived of wealth doesn't affect me in my youth, why would I need to accumulate wealth to make that old person more comfortable? In effect it is saying that the old person is not the same being as the young person, and that that they are completely different people. Although it is true that the old person's suffering doesn't affect the youth now, is it really unsuitable to accumulate wealth for the old person?

This is the same as the earlier argument: that one does not need to consider others' suffering because it doesn't harm oneself. This example overcomes that doubt.

We need to understand how the very meticulous reasoning presented here is a way to counteract that flawed reasoning, that we don't have to strive to work for other sentient beings to remove their suffering, because their suffering doesn't harm us. If that were so, then someone in their youth would not engage in accumulating wealth to relieve the suffering of their old age. Why? Because, according to the argument presented here, that older person's suffering doesn't affect the young person now.

Using this reasoning, you would not take measures in the morning to relieve the likely sufferings to be experienced in the evening. Why? Because the suffering you might experience later in the evening doesn't harm you now. Likewise you would not relieve sufferings for the next day because those sufferings don't harm you today.

Here we can see the meticulously logic showing that just because something doesn't affect one now, that no reason not to take measures to relieve one's sufferings in the future. Likewise, one should also strive to relieve the sufferings of all sentient beings even though they are separate from us, and don't affect us directly.

The commentary further explains, since the later future suffering does not harm the earlier person, then even if one fears there could be suffering, it would be inappropriate to protect oneself. So, the absurdity being pointed out here is, even if one were to fear one would suffer in the future, following that flawed reasoning it would be inappropriate to protect oneself. This points out the absurdity of that earlier hypothetical statement that one need not protect the other beings from suffering because it doesn't affect oneself.

Then this hypothetical argument is presented:

Argument: If one would not wonder in this life whether one could experience suffering in a later life, then one would have to experience sufferings in the later life. It is therefore appropriate to make an effort to prevent that situation.

Again, what is being presented is the absurdity that if one were to follow this flawed reasoning one would think that one does not need to work on relieving the sufferings of future lives because it doesn't affect one now. This follows from the previous hypothetical argument.

The verse reads:

98. *The conceptual thought thinking,
'I will experience this,' is wrong.
The dead person that takes rebirth
As another, is another.*

Basically, the meaning presented in the verse which serves as an answer is:

Answer: The conceptual thought thinking that the self of this life experiences sufferings in the later life is distorted. This would be like a dead person that takes rebirth as another person in a later life. This later person is not suitable to be the same as the earlier person.

This was a refutation of the unsuitability of one to eliminate the sufferings of another with the reasoning of the similarity of the earlier and later different moments. The meaning of the text is not that it is a refutation based on the ultimate.

The commentary indicates that the conceptual thought that the self of this life experiences sufferings in the later life is distorted, because, of course, there is a different person. The individual person of this life and the individual person in the future life are separate and distinct. What is further explained is the absurdity that a dead person that takes rebirth as another person in a later life, is not suitable to be the same as the earlier person.

This is a refutation of the unsuitability of one to eliminate the sufferings of another with the reasoning of the similarity of the earlier and later different moments. The meaning of the text is not that it is a refutation based on the ultimate.

The reasoning is that the need to remove the suffering of the future is not because they are the same person. Rather, because of the continuity from moment to moment, one does actually affect the later person. From moment to moment one affects the next moment. So in this way we actually see how they are related.

The verse reads:

99. *When something is suffering
And one protects another,
The suffering of the foot is not that of the hand
Why should it protect it?*

The commentary explains:

Further, when one part of the body needs to eliminate the suffering of another body part and protect that body part, since the suffering of a foot pained by a thorn is not the suffering of the hand, why should the hand eliminate this suffering of the foot? It would follow that it is unsuitable.

What is being presented here is that if the flawed reasoning is that one does not take the initiative to remove the suffering of another just because it is separate, then it is also true that if, the suffering of a foot pained by a thorn is not the suffering of the hand, why should the hand eliminate this suffering of the foot? This shows the absurdity of not following logic. While the foot is separate from the hand, if there is pain from a thorn in the foot, then even though the hand is separate from the foot, it can eliminate the suffering of the foot by taking out the thorn.

We can see how the reasoning in relation to the first hypothetical argument has been meticulously presented. If one sees that just because others' suffering is not one's own as a reason not to eliminate their suffering, then all this reasoning is presented to show this is a flawed conception.

The next reads:

100. *If, 'though unsuitable, here
It engages due to grasping at self.'
This unsuitable self and other,
What can they do? They are to be abandoned.*

The commentary explains it as an argument:

Argument: Even though it is inappropriate for one to eliminate unrelated suffering, here it is appropriate for one to eliminate the sufferings of the other because the bodies of earlier and later lives, and earlier and later moments of this body are all held by one person as mine due to familiarisation.

Then provides an answer:

Answer: What can that unsuitably held as independent self and other accomplish? They are suitable to be abandoned because the grasping at the self of person is mistaken and generates all faults.

This presents a way to back up the earlier hypothetical argument. In thinking it is not necessary to remove the sufferings of sentient beings because it is unrelated to oneself, the reason presented is that it is not the same here, because here the suffering to be removed is related to oneself from this life to the next life, and from earlier moments to the next moments, because this body is held by one person as mine due to familiarisation.

As a way to refute that counter argument, the commentary explains, what can that unsuitably held as independent self and other accomplish? This means that what you hold as being related from this life to the next life, and from earlier moments to the second moments, as an independently existent self. The 'experiencer' is seen as being one independently existent self that is experiencing the sufferings from this life to the next life, and from earlier moments to later moments.

If we hold onto the individual self, i.e. the person as an independently existent self, then what can that independent self accomplish for others? This means that you cannot actually accomplish anything by grasping at an independently existent self.

What is explained in conclusion is, they are suitable to be abandoned because the grasping at the self of person is mistaken and generates all faults. This very notion of an independent self that experiences suffering from earlier moments to the next moments, from one life to the next life, is in fact the misconception of grasping at an independent self which is the root, and fundamental cause, of all faults. It, generates all faults and thus is what has to be completely abandoned. Holding onto such misconceptions is completely wrong.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

12 April 2016

With the positive motivation that we generated during the Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer in mind, we can now engage in our meditation practice. Once the motivation is set, the practice becomes really worthwhile.

[meditation]

As usual, we can set the motivation for receiving teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Buddha's teachings, as there is no more supreme method than the Mahayana teachings. Then, having listened to the teachings, I will put them into practice well.

3.1.2.2. THE WAY OF MEDITATING ON EQUALISING SELF AND OTHERS

3.1.2.2.2. Explaining the reason why it is suitable to meditate on it as equal

3.1.2.2.2.1. Extensive explanation (cont.)

3.1.2.2.2.1.3. Clearing away obstructing thoughts of 'It is unsuitable to meditate on equalising self and others'

First the commentary presents this argument:

These two situations are not the same as two different people are unrelated, but the hands and feet of one person belong to the same group, and the old and young person and the earlier and later life belong to the same continuum. In the latter situation, it is appropriate for one to help the other, but in the first situation it is inappropriate.

These two situations are not the same as two different people are unrelated, refers back to examples that were presented in our last session: the hands can help the feet when they are sore, and the person in the earlier part of their life helps the person in the latter part of their life.

Here the argument is that the hands and feet of one person belong to the same group and the old and young person and the earlier and later life belong to the same continuum. In the latter situation it is appropriate for one to help the other, but in the first situation it is inappropriate.

There is also a connotation of refuting the non-Buddhist view that the same self goes from the morning until the evening, as well as from this life to the next life. In fact we regularly hold this misconception ourselves. We have no qualms about thinking that the person who wakes up in the morning is the same person in the afternoon and late in the evening, and that there has been no change from morning to night. We have this notion due to the misconception of viewing the person as being permanent. When one lacks an understanding of impermanence - specifically subtle impermanence - then it does appear that it is the same person. We instinctively think that the person who came in through the door earlier is the same person sitting on the cushion now, but in fact the moment of the person who came in through the door earlier has already ceased to exist, and there is a new moment of the person now. Thus, we are changing from moment to moment. This misconception that it is the same person from morning to night arises from not understanding subtle impermanence.

Then the following verse is presented as an answer to that qualm.

101. *That called continuum and collection
Are false, like the rosary and army,
There is no-one suffering,
What should they abandon belonging to whom?*

The commentary then explains the meaning of this verse:

Answer: It follows there is no independent group or continuum, because that called continuum and group are falsities labelled on the earlier and later parts of that possessing the continuity, and on the parts of the group; like the rosary and army that are a falsity labelled on their different parts.

As explained in the commentary, it follows that there is no independent group or continuum, because that called continuum and group are falsities labelled on the earlier and later parts of that possessing the continuity, and on the parts of the group. The examples given here are the rosary and army. What is labelled as rosary is completely dependent on the many beads that make up the rosary — you don't call one bead a rosary; likewise with an army — you don't call one soldier an army. A rosary is dependent on the many parts that are many individual beads, and an army is also dependent on the many parts that are many individual soldiers. This shows that there is no independently existent rosary or army, because each has to depend on many other parts.

A continuum is also dependent on earlier parts and later parts. For example, establishing morning depends on an afternoon and an evening — without an afternoon and an evening one cannot refer to morning. Likewise evening is dependent on earlier parts of the day, such as afternoon and morning. Establishing night depends on there being a morning. Since they are dependent on each other they cannot be truly existent. As they are designated or imputed phenomena they are a falsity and not truly existent. That is what is being clearly explained with these examples.

Next, the commentary presents a further hypothetical argument:

If you say 'Since they are contained by the mind of one person, they fall under the control of that person and therefore, even though they are different from the point of view of object and time, the suffering of one is eliminated by the suffering of the other'.

Then the answer to that argument is:

Because there is no self of the person that is suffering, there is also no happiness or suffering that is controlled by any controller. For this reason, there is no independent possessor engaging suffering and hence, all sufferings of self and others have no distinction. However, there is the suffering of self and other who are nominally dependent on each other, and therefore it is appropriate to eliminate one's suffering.

This again relates to the point that there is no independently existing self of the person who is suffering. Therefore there is also no happiness or suffering that is controlled by any independent controller.

The next two lines of the verse serve as an explanation of this point:

*102abc. Without a possessor of suffering
Everything is without distinction*

The explanation of these two lines, as presented in the commentary, is:

For this reason, there is no independent possessor engaging suffering, and hence all sufferings of self and others have no distinction. However, there is the suffering of self and other who are nominally dependent on each other, and therefore it is appropriate to eliminate one's suffering.

Since there is no independent possessor who has the experience of suffering, there is no distinction between the suffering of oneself and the suffering of others in that sense. As there is no independent possessor of that suffering, there is no difference between oneself and others. However, while there is no independent possessor of suffering, there is the suffering of self and others, who are nominally dependent on each other. So there is suffering, which arises in dependence on other causes and conditions and, as that is the same for oneself and others, it is appropriate to eliminate one's suffering, as well as the suffering of others.

Because suffering is nominally existent, it is possible and thus suitable to eliminate suffering. If suffering were to exist inherently and independently, in and of itself, or from its own side, then it would not be possible to abandon suffering. However, while suffering does not exist independently it does exist nominally, which indicates that it exists in dependence on its causes.

By identifying the causes of suffering one can eliminate the causes, and then suffering will naturally cease. This is the crux of the point, which is that because suffering is dependent on its causes, and not independently existent, one can overcome suffering. Thus it is possible and appropriate to abandon suffering.

When this is understood with respect to one's own suffering, then it can be related to the suffering of others. Just as one's own suffering is dependent on causes and conditions, and thus appropriate and suitable to be overcome, the suffering of others is also dependent on causes and conditions, and thus appropriate and suitable to be overcome.

3.1.2.2.2. Short summary

The relevant lines of verse read:

*102d. Because it is suffering, it is to be eliminated.
What use is this definiteness here?*

*103. The statement 'Why should one eliminate
The sufferings of others?', is not up for debate.
If one reverses, then one reverses all,
If not, then one is like sentient beings.*

Then the commentary explains the meaning of these lines:

Therefore, because the suffering of others is suffering, it is suitable to be eliminated by me. What use is the concrete division into self and other? Since one needs to eliminate all the suffering of others, there is no argument like, 'Since it does not harm me why should one reverse the suffering of others?' If one reverses one's sufferings because one does not desire them, then it is appropriate to reverse the suffering of everybody. If the sufferings of others are not to be eliminated, then one's own sufferings also become something not to be eliminated, like the sufferings of others. Therefore, because the suffering of others is suffering, it is suitable to be eliminated by me. What use is the concrete division into self and other? Since one needs to eliminate all the suffering of others, there is no argument like, 'Since it does not harm me why should one reverse the suffering of others?' If one reverses one's sufferings because one does not desire them, then it is appropriate to reverse the suffering of everybody. If the sufferings of others are not to be eliminated, then one's own sufferings also become something not to be eliminated, like the sufferings of others. Hence, one should put great importance into eliminating the sufferings of others by cherishing others as one cherishes oneself.

The first part of the explanation presents the absurdity of the very concrete distinction we make between self and other. What is being presented here is that as there is no difference between the need to eliminate suffering within oneself and the suffering of others, one needs to definitely consider removing the suffering of others.

If one reverses one's sufferings because one does not desire them then it is appropriate to reverse suffering of every living being. If the sufferings of others are not to be eliminated then one's own suffering also becomes something not to be eliminated, like the suffering of others. What is being explained here is that if one thinks there is no need to eliminate the sufferings of others, then the same reasons should apply to oneself as well; i.e. that there is no need to eliminate one's own suffering.

However the fact is that we do strive to remove any suffering that we experience. Hence, one should put great importance into eliminating the sufferings of others by cherishing others as one cherishes oneself. The point here is that the instinctive wish to remove one's own suffering arises because of self-cherishing. There is no reason for striving to overcome one's own suffering other than not wanting to experience that suffering. And this is true regardless of whether we are engaging in Dharma practice or in mundane activities — whenever we experience pain we recognise it as something to be overcome.

That instinctive wish to overcome suffering is due to self-cherishing. So if we can change that attitude to cherishing others just as one cherishes oneself, then removing the suffering of others will become as instinctive as removing one's own suffering.

So we can see that this is very precise advice, using reason and examples. We can see how the text is meticulously presenting the practice of equalising and exchanging self with others, and we need to incorporate these reasons and explanations into our actual practice.

To give an example to illustrate the point, when those close and dear to us suffer, we take the immediate initiative to remove their suffering. The wish to remove their pain and suffering arises in part because they are related to me, i.e. one has a strong notion that they are my husband, wife, child or relative. Because of that we feel “I need to remove their suffering”. So our compassion and love and wish to remove their suffering and establish them in happiness is mixed with a self-cherishing attitude. Although there is a level of self-cherishing, we take the initiative to remove their suffering. So we are extending our concern beyond our immediate self. By using this example we can understand that it is definitely possible to generate the wish to remove the sufferings of others by merely focusing on their suffering. The very gross level of self-cherishing focuses merely on one’s own needs. But here we see that although there is some level of self-cherishing, one is extending one’s focus beyond oneself onto the need to remove the suffering of one’s partner, children and so forth.

With this illustration we can see that since it is possible to extend our concerns towards those who are related to us, it is definitely possible to also extend a genuine wish to eliminate suffering and establish happiness for those who are not related to us. This wish can arise when one contemplates the fact that they are suffering and deprived of happiness.

Right now, of course, due to our habituation and strong self-cherishing attitude we may not yet be capable of extending the wish to eliminate suffering and establish happiness much further beyond ourselves. However, if we train ourselves in thinking like this, then through familiarity, it will eventually be possible to generate this attitude: Because others are suffering, I need to take initiative to eliminate their suffering, and because others are deprived of happiness I need to establish them in happiness.

This is a really profound method. As Shantideva explains, the main reason for taking the initiative to eliminate the suffering of others arises from contemplating the fact that they are suffering, and just like oneself, they do not wish to experience suffering; and the main reason to establish happiness for others is because they are deprived of happiness and are in need of happiness, just like oneself. If we really contemplate this point and train our mind in thinking along these lines, then the more we find this to be sound reasoning, the more our mind will be attuned to actually taking the initiative to eliminate the suffering of others, and establish them in happiness.

Of course at this stage in our training we will feel that we don’t have this capacity, and that we cannot do much. However, through training our mind by contemplating these points again and again, we are leaving a very strong imprint that carries on from this life to the next life. Because we have implanted a strong imprint of wanting to eliminate the sufferings of others and establish them in happiness, the attitude of cherishing others will be more spontaneous and natural in the next life. Further training in the next life will then strengthen that wish so that it becomes stronger and stronger.

We have to understand that as beginners we cannot expect to develop this in just one lifetime, so we need to establish the basis to engage in the training over many successive lives. By employing this method, even though we may not see an immediate transformation taking place, every effort we make will eventually be accumulated into obtaining a significant result. We need to understand the importance of not having immediate big expectations of our Dharma practice. Rather we need to see that every small effort that we make now leads to big results in the future. When we have this attitude then we will definitely experience the benefit of the practice in this life as well.

When we view our practice as progressing gradually along the path, we will see that whatever practice we engage in comes down to acquainting ourselves with the means of overcoming self-cherishing, and establishing the mind of cherishing others. This practice not only brings about benefit in this life but implants a positive imprint that helps to establish the basis to engage in this practice over many lives.

As we progressively improve from life to life, we are working towards reaching the ultimate state of perfection, where we have completely eradicated all our negativities or defilements, and acquired all possible qualities —the perfected state of enlightenment. Reaching that state comes about from the practice of familiarising our mind with cherishing others, and then working towards eliminating their suffering and establishing them in happiness to the best of our ability.

We establish the causes for obtaining our goal of liberation and enlightenment by continuing with our meagre efforts in the practices now; it is through continual practice that we accumulate the causes for reaching liberation and ultimate enlightenment. This is how we need to understand the ultimate purpose of our practice.

It might seem that this is a bit of a side-track, but I feel that these are very important points to keep in mind. Accepting that there has been past life and that there will be future life gives our Dharma practice a real purpose. We are not practising the Dharma for some immediate gratification. Rather, we are practising in order to establish the conducive conditions for future lives that will enable us to further progress along the path to liberation and enlightenment.

In order to establish that basis, we have to obtain a good rebirth such as a human rebirth. It is not possible to progress along the path if we take rebirth in a lower realm. It is only on the basis of a higher rebirth and higher status - such as a precious human rebirth - that we can further progress along the path.

Securing whatever practice of Dharma we do now will, at the very least, establish the basis for one to obtain a good rebirth in the next life, which further establishes the means to create the causes and conditions for obtaining liberation and enlightenment. It is important to understand this.

Contemplating in this way will definitely assist us as we approach our death. At that time the only thing that we can rely upon is the Dharma practice that we have established in our life. We are moving further and further away from our possessions and friends in this life, and getting closer and closer to the conditions of our next life, including possessions, Dharma friends and so forth. The reality is that we are approaching death, so it is really worthwhile to establish the causes for good conditions in our future life. When we contemplate in this way then we can see the real purpose of the Dharma.

So it is good to have a very clear picture of how we are progressing towards establishing good conditions for our next life, in accordance with the explanations in the Dharma.

As explained in the teachings, the practice that will prevent one from falling into the lower realms is the practice of morality. We are all capable of practising morality, and in fact, because we intentionally avoid engaging in the ten non-virtues we are already engaging in that practice. When we establish the practice of intentionally not engaging in the ten non-virtues, then that is the practice of morality. Then there is no question that we will be protected from falling to the lower realms in the next life. So we need to assure ourselves with the firm belief that due to practising morality and so forth, we will definitely be protected from falling into lower realms in the next life. Having strong faith in this way will further encourage us to continue to practise morality and so forth.

The practice that is a cause for one to acquire good conditions to sustain oneself in the next life, such as wealth and so forth, is the practice of generosity. That is also something that we are capable of practising now. Generosity is defined as the mind of giving. So we can definitely engage in the practice of generosity. Of course, we need to be generous with material things to whatever capacity we can give, but the main point is to familiarise ourselves with the mind of giving.

The cause that secures a good entourage of friends and companions in the next life is the practice of patience, which we can also practise now. That which helps one to create the causes to be able to accomplish what one sets out to do is the practice of joyous effort, while the practice of meditation develops sound concentration. As you will recall, the chapters of the text present the six perfections, and we need to practise them in order to secure good conditions for our next life.

The real protection against an unfortunate rebirth in the next lifetime is, as the teachings present, the Dharma. Here it is essential that we understand that the Dharma is a quality that is developed within one's own mind. For example, that which protects one from the lower realms is the morality that one observes now by avoiding the ten non-virtues and abiding by the ten virtues. The practice of morality is none other than within one's own mind stream. We make a decision to be moral and our observance of morality is what we develop within our own mind. That which prevents us from poverty is the generosity that we practise now, which is also developed within our own mind stream.

We shouldn't have lofty ideas about Dharma being an external protector. The Dharma is that which is developed within one's own mind. Ultimately, therefore, the real protector is something we have to establish within ourselves. It is essential that we understand that, otherwise we might be misled.

As presented in the teachings on the Three Jewels, the ultimate Dharma Jewel is true cessation and the true path. However true cessation and the true path are only found within the continuum of arya beings. So how can the Dharma Jewel protect us if it is only found within the continuum of arya beings?

We do, however, have a more immediate understanding of how the Buddha Jewel and the Sangha Jewel help us. The Sangha Jewel helps us when the Sangha give us direct assistance, advice and teachings and so forth. So we can see that we receive direct benefit from the Sangha Jewel. Because of our obscurations we may not be able to actually see the Buddha yet, but we are inspired by him and we definitely benefit from the advice and the teachings that he presented. So we can definitely see that we receive benefit from the Buddha Jewel.

However, it is a bit harder to see how the ultimate Dharma Jewel, the true path and true cessation within the continuum of aryas, actually helps us directly. While we may not have yet developed true cessation and the true path, we are nonetheless able to observe morality and practise generosity and patience and so forth. So these practices help us to protect ourselves, we need to view them as being the Dharma Jewel at our level. This is, I feel, a significant point for us to understand.

The beneficiary of the Dharma Jewel within the arya continuum, which is true cessation and the true path, is of course the aryas themselves, and other beings who are able to directly relate to the aryas, and receive teachings from them. The oral teachings of the Buddha are, of course, part of the Dharma Jewel, and that benefits us, since the transformation that slowly takes place within our mind is made possible by the advice and guidance we receive from the teachings of the Buddha.

Although the oral teachings of the Buddha are Dharma, they are not presented as the ultimate Dharma. The ultimate Dharma, which is the real protector, is true cessation and the true path, which are developed within one's own mental continuum.

It is good to understand how this works in relation to oneself.

3.1.2.2.2.2. Refuting objections

This is subdivided into two:

3.1.2.2.2.2.1. Refuting that bodhisattvas become overwhelmed by their own suffering through contemplating the suffering of sentient beings

3.1.2.2.2.2.2. The need to contemplate suffering

3.1.2.2.2.2.1. Refuting that bodhisattvas become overwhelmed by their own suffering through contemplating the suffering of sentient beings

Here the heading is presenting a significant doubt as to whether bodhisattvas become overwhelmed by their own suffering through contemplating the suffering of sentient beings.

This is something that we experience at our level. When someone who is close to us experiences difficulties, or hardships, or illness, we feel uncomfortable, and because of our unease and discomfort we take the initiative to help them. Even though their problems make us feel uncomfortable it gives us the initiative to benefit them.

While we experience some discomfort when others are ill and suffering, that is not what the bodhisattvas experience. They are never overwhelmed by the suffering of others, and they feel no sorrow.

Another significant point is that training one's mind and developing compassion, beginning with those who are close to oneself, is also one of the supreme ways of purifying one's own negative karma.

The verse that relates to this heading reads:

*104. If, 'Since sufferings increase due to compassion,
Why generate them with urgency?'
If one contemplates the suffering of migrators,
How can suffering increase due to compassion?*

The commentary on this verse begins with a hypothetical argument:

If you say 'out of compassion one makes all the sufferings of others one's own, then, one's sufferings become more. Thus, why generate suffering with intensity instead of abandoning it?'

The answer is:

When bodhisattvas contemplate the suffering of migrators, it follows that their suffering does not increase due to compassion, because this compassion eliminates all their feelings of suffering.

The commentary begins with the hypothetical argument, If, out of compassion, one makes all the sufferings of others one's own, then one's sufferings become more. Thus why generate suffering with intensity instead of abandoning it?

Bodhisattvas are constantly thinking about the sufferings of other sentient beings, and they are constantly contemplating how to eliminate the sufferings of sentient beings, so it would be absurd for them to be disturbed by that suffering. Thinking about the suffering of others does not cause bodhisattvas any suffering. On the contrary, it actually benefits them.

Initially when one contemplates the sufferings of others it may bring some discomfort, but when one actually forsakes that personal discomfort and thinks about the benefit of contemplating the suffering of others, then that makes the discomfort acceptable.

The commentary then explains that when bodhisattvas contemplate the sufferings of migrators it follows that their suffering does not increase due to compassion, because the compassion eliminates all their feelings of suffering.

In fact, contemplating the suffering of sentient beings actually counteracts one's own suffering. From our own limited experience we know that when we take a moment to contemplate the sufferings of others it can definitely help to eliminate our own suffering, because it takes our mind away from our own problems. When one thinks about the plight of others, it definitely helps one to alleviate any immediate discomfort one may be experiencing. If, even at our very ordinary level, we recognise the truth of this, then we can imagine how wholeheartedly and continuously working for the welfare of sentient beings will be a cause to bring great joy and happiness for bodhisattvas.

3.1.2.2.2.2. The need to contemplate suffering

The point here is that because contemplating the suffering of others can ultimately benefit oneself and help others, there is a definite need to contemplate suffering.

We can leave this for the next session.

A further practical point about how developing compassion for other beings can help to alleviate one's own suffering and bring more mental ease, is that it can definitely reduce anger towards others, as well as reduce jealousy, competitiveness and pride.

These defilements within our mind can cause us a lot of sorrow and angst, but by developing compassion we can reduce anger and relieve jealousy and so forth. When we feel compassion for someone then, rather than feeling jealous, we feel glad when things go well for them, and when things don't go well for them we feel sorry for them. Without compassion, however, the opposite will occur: we start becoming angry and upset when things go well for them, and if things don't go well, we might even be glad.

So we can see how, even at our level, generating some feeling of compassion definitely alleviates negative emotions. And of course the effect on bodhisattvas who continuously benefit other sentient beings will be far greater than anything we experience.

As mentioned in the teachings, the antidote to harmfulness is compassion. When one generates compassion then any thoughts of harm will definitely be overcome. When one does not have harmful intention then one is in a happy state of mind; because there is no intention to go out of the way to hurt and harm others, one's mind will be very comfortable and relaxed. So we can see that how a mind that does not harbour ill-will and harmfulness is a happy mind, and as a consequence the person is a happy person.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

19 April 2016

Based on the motivation we have generated, we can now spend a few minutes for our meditation practice.

[meditation]

As usual, we can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: for the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings, and put them into practice well.

3.1.2.2. THE WAY OF MEDITATING ON EQUALISING SELF AND OTHERS

3.2.2.2.2 Explaining the reason why it is suitable to meditate on it as equal

In the text we are covering the need to contemplate suffering. This point follows from an earlier qualm that, if one generates compassion for others it will cause one suffering, so what purpose does it serve? The response presented here is that, for bodhisattvas, the more they contemplate the suffering of others, the stronger their compassion becomes. For bodhisattvas, generating compassion serves to eliminate their own suffering, rather than causing them more suffering. As I mentioned previously, whenever we feel compassion for another person, at that time there is no possibility of feeling anger towards them. As this was explained earlier, I don't need to go over it again. For those who are keen to put what they hear into practice, when a point is repeated, there is no problem as it is a pleasure for them to hear it again. But for those who do not put what they hear into practice, it may sound like an unnecessary repetition and hurt their ears!

The main point here however is that, although this advice is intended for bodhisattvas, the practices that enabled them to become bodhisattvas were taken step by step. This is also the approach we need to take. Instead of thinking 'Oh, these practices were intended only for bodhisattvas', if we put whatever level we can now into practice, then gradually, we will reach the stage of becoming a bodhisattva.

The step by step presentation here is in itself a guide to developing our practice and, most importantly, it provides us with a means to skilfully present the teachings to others, ensuring we do not present anything unsuitable for their current level of practice and state of mind. One may think one has to present all the profound and extensive teachings to others; however, instead of benefiting them, this might overwhelm them and cause more confusion. We need to remember how, when we were beginners in the Dharma, everything was new and at times seemed overwhelming. Then as we progressively began to understand, slowly, slowly, things became clearer and clearer to our mind. Thus, we need to present the Dharma to others in gradual steps.

The two verses that relate to this heading are:

105. *If through one suffering
Many sufferings became non-existent,*

*Then it is only suitable for self and other
That suffering is generated out of affection.*

106. *Even though Supushpa Chandra
Knew the suffering caused by the king,
He did not eliminate his own suffering,
In order to exhaust the suffering of many.*

The commentary explains:

If it were the case that one insignificant suffering eliminates the many samsaric sufferings of the infinite migrators then, since it has a great purpose, it is only suitable for oneself and others to generate this suffering out of affection.

As it is stated in The King of Concentration Sutra, even though the bodhisattva Supushpa Chandra knew that he would receive the harm of being killed by the king, he did not eliminate his own suffering but accepted it, as he saw that this would alleviate the suffering of many sentient beings, and proceeded to the town. He did not listen to his entourage, who tried to stop him.

The main point here is that if one's own experience of suffering becomes a cause to eliminate great suffering for other sentient beings, then it is worthwhile to endure that suffering and willingly take it upon oneself. As the root text states If through one suffering presents the fact that when just one suffering becomes a means to eliminate the suffering of infinite migrators, then it becomes worthwhile to willingly accept it, because it serves a great purpose.

This presentation also gives us an insight into the great qualities of bodhisattvas, who willingly endure extensive difficulties and hardships for the benefit of sentient beings. The capacity of bodhisattvas to extend themselves in such great ways to benefit sentient beings, of course, comes from love and compassion. Thus we can see that love and compassion are the basis for bodhisattvas to acquire all their great qualities. When the commentary continues it is only suitable for oneself and others to generate this suffering out of affection, the main point is that when one's intentional acceptance of suffering becomes a means to generate compassion for other sentient beings, then it is suitable for one to experience that suffering.

The example presented here is from The King of Concentration Sutra. It relates the story of a great bodhisattva by the name of Supushpa Chandra, who resided mostly in isolation and didn't spend much time in towns and so forth. This bodhisattva knew it was time for the people in the town where the king ruled to hear the teachings. However, through his clairvoyance, he knew that if he did so, the king would become enraged and punish him with death. The bodhisattva knew that if he did not go into the city to give teachings, those people would not be free from suffering and obtain happiness. On the other hand, if he gave Dharma teachings, they would be able to be liberated from suffering and obtain happiness. So with this insight, the bodhisattva went into the city to present the teachings to the people for seven days. He taught continuously during the day and in the evenings he circumambulated a reliquary stupa. He didn't have to partake of food and drink because, having reached a high level of concentration, he was sustained by the food of concentration, so therefore didn't need to eat and drink. After the bodhisattva gave the teachings, as he foresaw, the king became enraged and gave orders to kill him. However, it is said that later the king developed great regret and built a reliquary stupa as means to purify his heavy negative karma.

As the commentary explains, even though the bodhisattva Supushpa Chandra knew he would receive the harm of being killed by the king, he did not eliminate his own suffering, meaning he disregarded his own suffering as he saw that this (that is, giving Dharma teachings) would alleviate the suffering of many sentient beings, and proceeded to the town. He did not listen to his entourage, who tried to stop him: his entourage also knew that the king would be enraged and punish him. However, he didn't listen to them but went ahead. This shows his great compassion. One of the greatest sufferings anyone can experience is the treat to one's life, yet out of compassion, the bodhisattva still went into the town for the sole benefit of other beings. Hearing stories like this, of great bodhisattva's deeds, should instil admiration within us and encourage us to make aspirational prayers such as: 'May I also be able to engage in extensive deeds like the great bodhisattvas to benefit sentient beings'. When I read stories like this myself, it instils in me the strong aspiration, 'May I be able to follow these examples of the great bodhisattvas to benefit sentient beings, if possible in this life, and in many lives to come'. At our level, making a strong aspiration is of great significance, as it leaves a strong imprint in our mind. This is one way we can put these teachings into personal practice.

3.1.2.3. THE BENEFITS OF MEDITATING ON IT

There are five subheadings:

3.1.2.3.1. Those dedicated only to the purpose of others do not have great sufferings

3.1.2.3.2. Working for the purpose of others as its happiness is superior

3.1.2.3.3. One's pride will be pacified

3.1.2.3.4. Not depending on reward and ripened results

3.1.2.3.5. For those reasons it is suitable to meditate on equalising self and others

We can derive some meaning from these headings themselves:

Those dedicated only to the purpose of others do not have great sufferings. Here, the text is being honest, admitting that while there might be some suffering when one dedicates to the purpose of others, it would not be so great compared to other sufferings.

Working for the purpose of others as its happiness is superior. Because the happiness one derives is superior, it is appropriate to work for others for that purpose.

One's pride will be pacified. As mentioned earlier, when one has compassion for others, negative afflictions such as anger, and as mentioned here, pride, will not occur. Thus when anyone exhibits pride or contempt for others, it is a clear sign they don't have compassion for others. When one has compassion for others, there is no room for contempt or pride to arise.

Not depending on reward and ripened results. This refers to benefiting others with no ulterior motive of receiving a reward or gaining the ripened result of that action at some time in the future. Rather, the text indicates that we should benefit others solely from the intention to alleviate their suffering and bring them happiness, and not for one's own personal gain.

For those reasons it is suitable to meditate on equalising self and others. In relation to this, we can reflect on how the teachings explain that, of the two different techniques for developing bodhicitta – the seven-fold cause and effect technique and the exchanging self with other technique presented here, – this technique is said to be much more profound and powerful. The explanation here is that we willingly take others' suffering upon ourselves for the purpose of benefiting sentient beings. That is what makes it very powerful.

3.1.2.3.1. Those dedicated only to the purpose of others do not have great sufferings

We usually have this doubt: 'If I work for the purpose of others I might suffer greatly'. This way of thinking prevents us from developing strong compassion. For bodhisattvas, this would not be a concern, but for us at our level, it seems to be a great concern. As a way to remove that doubt, the following advice is presented.

*107. When the continuum becomes thus acquainted
One takes joy in pacifying the suffering of others.
Like ducks entering a lotus pond
One will even enter the hell without respite.*

The commentary to this explains:

If one's continuum becomes habituated to the meditation of equalising self and other as explained before, then one takes joy in pacifying the sufferings of others. In order to destroy the sufferings of others one will disregard one's own sufferings and happily enter even the hell without respite just like ducks into a lotus pond. One will not have any mental suffering working for the purpose of others.

Thus, one familiarises one's mind with the practice of equalising self and other again and again by contemplating the great benefits and virtues of the practice. Then, through repeated contemplation and familiarisation, one reaches a point of feeling confident that exchanging one's own happiness for the happiness of others is possible. As beginners and ordinary beings, we may initially feel daunted by the prospect of exchanging our own happiness for the happiness of others, i.e. exchanging the focus from oneself to solely focusing on the wellbeing and happiness of others. But that is because we have not acquainted our mind with this practice. The point presented here is that, through acquaintance, it becomes possible to develop this state of mind.

The actual meditation of equalising self and other involves exchanging one's previous focus – of working solely for one's own happiness, and eliminating suffering just for oneself – to that of working solely for the happiness of others and removing their suffering. This is the state of mind that one needs to familiarise oneself with. When one actually reaches that state through acquaintance, then one takes joy in pacifying the sufferings of others.

Furthermore, in order to destroy the sufferings of others one will disregard one's own sufferings and happily enter even the hell without respite. The example given here is like ducks entering a lotus pond. If there is a beautiful pond with lotuses, ducks will have no hesitation – they will immediately want to enter the pond where the water is nice and cool. We can see for ourselves how ducks will waddle together and joyfully head straight for water. This example illustrates how, when bodhisattvas see the sufferings of others, they willingly and joyfully attempt to help those who are suffering.

The last line of the commentary for this verse is one will not have any mental suffering working for the purpose of others. We might have some experience ourselves of experiencing physical suffering without our mind being greatly affected and disturbed, thus enabling us to avoid mental suffering.

3.1.2.3.2. Working for the purpose of others as its happiness is superior

108. *If one liberates sentient beings
One has an ocean of joy.
Is this not superior?
What use is it to desire liberation?*

The commentary explains:

If one liberates sentient beings from cyclic existence then one will be filled by an ocean of joy that accomplishes all one's wishes, and one will be satisfied. Is this not superior? What use is it to desire liberation only for oneself? Remembering that all sentient beings have been one's mother, one should strive for their purpose.

This shows again that what brings the greatest joy for bodhisattvas is when they see other beings free from the suffering of cyclic existence. Bodhisattvas are indeed blessed and noble beings – their only wish is for sentient beings to be free from suffering. When they see other beings free from suffering, it fills their mind with an ocean of joy and accomplishes their wishes, so they are satisfied. Here, the rhetorical question, Is this not superior? is presented to indicate that this is indeed a superior state of mind. Then the commentary asks another rhetorical question: What use is it to desire liberation only for oneself? If that state of mind is indeed superior, then what use is it to desire liberation just for oneself? This part of the commentary concludes, remembering that all sentient beings have been one's mother, one should strive for their purpose. When one remembers the kindness of one's own mother then relates it to all beings having been one's mother, it becomes an impetus for one to naturally and spontaneously want to bring them happiness and remove their suffering, as a way to repay their kindness. This is the point of contemplating the kindness of beings as having been one's mother.

The first step in the seven-fold cause and effect sequence of developing bodhicitta is recognising all beings as having been one's mother. When one reflects upon one's own mother's kindness and really brings it to heart then, as we expand the scope of that meditation, it becomes possible to see all beings as being extremely kind as well. So, based on the recognition of one's own mother's kindness in this life, one can then relate that to all beings, and see them as being as kind as one's mother because of the kindness they have shown to us in the past.

The main point is that one would be able to relate to other sentient beings in the same way as one would relate to one's own mother. When one sees one's own mother who has been kind, one feels great joy and naturally wishes her to be happy; likewise it is possible to relate to all other beings in the same way.

As a meditation practice, contemplating the passages and points here even for few minutes can really settle one's mind. It will definitely have good effect.

3.1.2.3.3. One's pride will be pacified

We need to take this presentation as a personal instruction and reflect on how, when one engages in the actual practice, one's pride will be pacified. In contrast to this, when one learns a bit about the teachings and Dharma, if it serves as means to increase one's pride and a sense of contempt over others, then it has defeated the purpose. This is when the Dharma becomes poison instead of being a remedy, which is really unfortunate. All of the Buddha's teachings are said to be a means to overcome pride. So when those very teachings become a cause for one's pride to increase, then one will not have benefited from the teachings. This is a real loss. So it is important for us to constantly try our utmost not to allow pride to take over our mind.

109ab. *Thus, though one works for the purpose of others
There is no vanity or astonishment.*

The commentary explains:

Thus, as one takes great joy in the purpose of others, even though one works for the purpose of others, one will not be vain, thinking 'I have nurtured them with kindness,' or feeling astonished with one's deeds.

Referring again to the bodhisattva practices, when one takes great joy in the purpose of others while wholeheartedly benefiting them without any ulterior motive, there is no sense of vanity such as the thought, 'I have nurtured them with great kindness'. This counteracts our normal worldly way of thinking. Normally, we may think 'Oh, I have done such wonderful things for others', 'I have gone out of my way to do great things for them'. Such thoughts of vanity arise due to the self-cherishing mind. When we say 'I have nurtured them with kindness', there is a strong emphasis on the 'I' which focuses very much on one's own sense of fulfilment. In addition, we also have a feeling of astonishment with our own deeds, 'oh, all the wondrous things that I have done'. Such feelings need to be eliminated. One would not have such feelings when one works solely for the purpose of others.

Thus, when one is free from self-interest and solely works for the benefit of others, this completely counteracts any sense of pride; likewise with anger, jealousy, a sense of competitiveness and so forth.

3.1.2.3.4. Not depending on reward and the ripened results

109cd. *As one singularly takes joy in others' purpose,
There is no hope for a ripening result.*

As one only likes to accomplish the purpose of others there is no hope for a ripening result.

Again, this is emphasising that when one works solely for the purpose of others, it should be without any self-interest of seeking a reward, or hope of a ripening result either in this life, or in future lives. Often we lament, 'I have done so much for them, but look how they treat me' [laughter]. If one were free from self-interest, there would no such complaint or lamentation.

3.1.2.3.5. For those reasons it is suitable to meditate on equalising self and others

110. *Therefore, just as one protects oneself
From slight unpleasantness,
One should generate the mind of compassion
And protect others.*

Since it is appropriate to meditate on equalising self and others, one should generate a mind of compassion and protect others from their undesired suffering just as one protects oneself from even just a few unpleasant words.

Having explained the benefits of equalising and exchanging self with others, the commentary continues since it is appropriate to meditate on equalising self and others. What comes next in the Tibetan text is the line just as one protects oneself from even just a few unpleasant words. We all can relate to this. When someone utters something that offends us, or others accuse us of something we feel we haven't done, we immediately become defensive saying 'How could you say this to me? How could you accuse me?' Even the slightest remark like this can hurt us, and we become protective of ourselves. So, just as one has that natural inclination to protect oneself, one should generate the mind of compassion and protect others from undesired suffering. The main point here is that one should develop the mind of compassion that extends to other sentient beings, and wishes to protect them from suffering.

3.1.2.4. If one meditates on equalising self and others, one can develop it

This is a significant point to counteract our qualms or doubts about whether this practice is possible or not. We might at this point think, 'Exchanging self with others sounds noble, but how could I possibly achieve it or meditate on it?' Here, the text is saying that if one meditates on it, meaning that if one acquaints one's mind with that, then it is definitely feasible.

As a way to explain the verses, the commentary presents this hypothetical doubt or argument:

Argument: Since one does not generate the thought that thinks of the other's body or eye as 'my body' or 'my eye,' how could one generate the awareness that accepts and rejects others' happiness and suffering as one's own?

The answer to this is presented in the next two verses:

111. *Although others' drop of semen and blood
Does not become an object¹,
Through familiarisation,
One says, 'mine' and knows it as such.*

112. *Likewise, why does one not hold
The body of others by saying, 'mine?'
By replacing one's body with that
Of another, there is no difficulty in this regard.*

As the commentary explains, the meaning of these verses serves as an answer:

Answer: Without familiarisation, then this would be correct. But, if one is able through familiarisation to know and grasp at the drop of the father's and mother's semen and blood as one's own object, saying 'this is mine,' then why should one not be able to hold the body of others as one's own through familiarisation? One should be able to. If one meditates, then one generates the mind thinking of it as one's own. Hence, having contemplated the benefits of eliminating the sufferings of others one should strive to eliminate them.

Then, if one purposely stops cherishing one's body and meditates on substituting another, it will be without out difficulty, like meditating on cherishing self.

What is being explained here is that through familiarisation, one holds onto the concept of one's body, which is none other than the product of the father's semen and the mother's blood [or ovum]: in other words, separate substances. We have no qualms about holding onto this body as my body. We not only call it 'my body' but we also have strong clinging to it. This comes from familiarisation or habituation, which makes us instinctively grasp at this body as 'my body'. Habituation is similar to what we call instinct. A newborn baby instinctively recognises its mother; we can also see examples of animals having a strong sense of clinging to the mother and immediately recognising them.

Then, as we grow up, we identify strongly with our own body as being 'mine'.

Thus if, through familiarity, we can hold as 'mine' an object such as one's body, which originates as substances from others, then why should one not be able to hold the body of others as one's own through familiarisation? While the text may literally seem to be advising one to hold others' bodies as 'mine', it actually means that, just as we cherish our own body, it is possible to cherish other beings. That is the main point. Again we have a rhetorical question, 'why is it not possible?', meaning that indeed it is possible if one meditates or familiarises one's mind by cherishing others just one cherishes oneself. Hence, having contemplated the benefits of eliminating the sufferings of others one should strive to eliminate them.

In conclusion, thus, if one purposely stops cherishing one's body and meditates on substituting another, it will be without out difficulty, like meditating on cherishing self. So just as we now have a natural and spontaneous attitude towards cherishing oneself, through familiarity it will be possible for us to cherish other beings. So we will be able to substitute cherishing oneself with cherishing other sentient beings.

Having explained the benefits and the possibility of exchanging self for others, one may question, what is the method of exchanging self and others?

3.2. The way of exchanging self and others

Here there are two main sections:

3.2.1. In brief

3.2.2. Extensive explanation

3.2.1. In brief

Again, there are two subdivisions:

3.2.1.1. The way of exchanging self and other

3.2.1.2. The reason why it is suitable to meditate on it

3.2.1.1. THE WAY OF EXCHANGING SELF AND OTHER

113. *Understanding that self is faulty
And that others are an ocean of qualities,
Meditate on completely rejecting self-grasping
And on accepting others.*

Since cherishing oneself is the source of all shortcomings it is faulty and needs to be abandoned with great purpose, and since cherishing other sentient beings is the source of all that is good, it has an ocean of qualities. Understanding this, one should meditate on completely abandoning cherishing self and accept cherishing others.

Here, the text specifically presents the faults of cherishing oneself and the qualities of cherishing others. Without recognising the faults of cherishing oneself and the benefits of cherishing others, there is no way one would even consider generating this mind of exchanging self with others. So, to engage in the practice, one needs to remove the obstructions, which are cherishing oneself and neglecting others.

Since cherishing oneself is the source of all shortcomings it is faulty and needs to be abandoned with great intent which means with great purpose – and since cherishing other sentient beings is the source of all that is good, it has an ocean of qualities. As I have expounded in other teachings, the shortcomings one experiences now are said to have all come from cherishing just oneself. There is no gain but only loss when one solely cherishes oneself, whereas cherishing other beings is the source of all that is good.

We can readily relate this to our current situation. For us, having a sound body, and all the other good conditions intact is the result of cherishing others. For example, not causing harm to others, such as taking their life, is the cause for one to have a sound human body. And by having engaged in acts of generosity in the past, one now experiences good conditions and resources. Thus, we can see that all the good qualities we have now are the result of having engaged in virtue: first of all, refraining from harming others; and then having the intention to benefit them. So, leaving aside the ultimate benefit of obtaining liberation and enlightenment, and the benefits of a fortunate rebirth in future, even now we can directly relate to the positive consequences and the benefit to oneself of cherishing others.

3.2.1.2. THE REASON WHY IT IS SUITABLE TO MEDITATE ON IT

Argument: Since sentient beings are of infinite number, it is impossible to hold them as self.

This doubt may occur to us because there is an infinite number of sentient beings. How could one possibly cherish them all as one cherishes oneself? The verse that serves as an answer to this doubt is:

*114. Just as the hands and so forth
Are asserted as parts of the body,
Why does one not assert
Embodied beings as limbs of migrators?*

Answer: Even though the hands and feet are different, because they are parts of the body one desires to protect them. Likewise, although embodied sentient beings are many, if one meditates on cherishing them, then why should one not wish to cherish the migrating beings, just like cherishing the limbs of one's body? It is suitable to desire so.

When we separate the body into different parts, there are quite a lot of them. For example, when we talk about our hand, each of the hands has five fingers so altogether there are ten fingers; our feet have ten toes, and so on. There are many parts to the body, yet we protect them all equally because they are part of 'my body'. Likewise although embodied sentient beings are many, if one meditates on cherishing them, then why should one not wish to cherish migrating beings just like cherishing the limbs of one's body? It is suitable to desire so. In relation to the infinite number of sentient beings, the way that I understand it is that, in meditation, we extend our aspiration to all sentient beings; in our mind, we extend to all beings the wish to benefit and cherish them. However, in practice, one can only benefit those in our vicinity, the beings we come into contact with. If we think that in order to cherish other beings, we have to physically benefit them, then that would be impossible. For example, if we think that helping others means giving them money, the number of human beings alone on the planet now is more than 7 billion! I wonder if anyone has enough money to give even one dollar to each human? It would be hard enough to find someone in Australia who could give one dollar to each of the 24 million living here.

So, as I understand it, the way to practise is that first we develop the keen wish to benefit others. Then, whoever we meet, and whoever is in our vicinity, we will be able to help to the best of our ability. This is something we are capable of doing. We can extend help to those around us. So while we develop the thought of cherishing others in our mind and extend it to all beings, at a practical level, we benefit those with whom we come into contact. This is how we put exchanging self with others into practice. We need to remember, however, to train one's mind not to forsake any living being.

Just like we protect our limbs, we need to protect other sentient beings, for the very reason that just like oneself they do not wish for any suffering and wish to experience happiness. That, in itself, becomes a reason why all sentient beings are like parts of our self. They are exactly the same, they have the same sentiments as we do, wishing to experience happiness, and not wishing to experience any suffering. With that in mind, we can extend our attitude of cherishing all other beings.

We recite the Tara Praises this evening to dedicate for Ross's success in his treatment. It is good for us as Dharma friends to pray and extend our prayers to help each other. This is something really significant and worthwhile for us to do.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

26 April 2013

While maintaining the motivation generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

During the meditation practice we would have been further strengthening our motivation. However, just as a reminder, let us generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

Generating such a motivation, even for a few moments, will definitely establish very strong positive imprints in our mind.

We have been covering a very meticulous presentation of how to engage in the practice of exchanging self and other. Just last Wednesday I spent about an hour contemplating these points and it occurred to me what a very profound presentation it is. The term exchanging self and other refers to changing an attitude of cherishing just oneself to an attitude of cherishing others.

Earlier, the text described this in terms of exchanging one's happiness and suffering. Previously one focused only on one's own happiness and removing only one's own suffering, and this is exchanged with a focus on establishing others in happiness and removing their suffering.

Following that, the text explained how, just as one previously cherished one's own body as being very precious and held it as 'mine', one can, through familiarity and training, exchange that view with one that cherishes others in the same way.

Although it's not specifically mentioned in the text, I feel that it is appropriate to include the accumulation of virtue and the shunning of negativity into the practice of exchanging self with other as well. Whereas previously one would have engaged in accumulating virtues just for oneself, and shunned negativity just for one's own purpose, this is exchanged with accumulating virtue and purifying negativity for the sake of other sentient beings.

So you can see how, when we really think about these very meticulously presented points, we can expand our way of thinking with this very profound practice.

These are of course the actual practices of bodhisattvas, but they are also intended for us to engage in according to whatever capacity we have now. When we think about these profound practices we also gain an insight into the incredibly noble and amazing deeds of the bodhisattvas. They are perpetually engaged in these very practices solely to benefit other sentient beings, so their presence is truly marvellous.

Of the two techniques of developing bodhicitta, the seven-point cause and effect sequence, which has been presented in other teachings, and this technique of exchanging self and other, it is the one presented here that is said to be much more vast and profound.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama praises this often. He praises the Bodhisattvacharyavatara as being the most supreme text presenting the methods for developing bodhicitta and explaining the deeds of bodhisattvas. In particular he praises this practice of exchanging self and other as the most profound method for developing bodhicitta.

It is good to really take this to heart. We have the opportunity to understand and engage in these practices, so it is important that we don't waste it.

3.2.1. Extensive explanation

This presented with the following three subdivisions:

- 3.2.1.1. Explaining the way of exchanging self and other
- 3.2.1.2. The way of following up in thought
- 3.2.1.3. The way of following up in action

3.2.1.1. EXPLAINING THE WAY OF EXCHANGING SELF AND OTHER

This is subdivided into two:

- 3.2.1.1.1. Extensive explanation
- 3.2.1.1.2. Brief summary

3.2.1.1.1. Extensive explanation

This has three further subdivisions:

- 3.2.1.1.1.1. Meditate on cherishing others
- 3.2.1.1.1.2. Abandoning cherishing self with effort
- 3.2.1.1.1.3. Contemplating the faults of holding self as the most important, and the benefits of holding other as the most important

We can see how profound the topic is just from these outlines. The very meticulous presentation also shows us how to engage into the practice in a gradual way.

3.2.1.1.1.1. Meditate on cherishing others

There are five ways of meditating on cherishing others.

- 3.2.1.1.1.1.1. It is possible to exchange self and other, and vanity is pacified
- 3.2.1.1.1.1.2. Advice to make an effort to meditate without hope for a ripening result
- 3.2.1.1.1.1.3. Giving even greater purpose to the benefit of others
- 3.2.1.1.1.1.4. If one meditates, one is able to generate it
- 3.2.1.1.1.1.5. Meditate on exchanging self and other because both self and other wish to be freed from suffering

3.2.1.1.1.1.1. It is possible to exchange self and other, and vanity is pacified

This hypothetical doubt is raised:

Argument: I am not able to meditate on exchanging self and other.

This relates to the doubt 'I'm not able to meditate on exchanging self and other' that we may have.

The following lines of verse respond to that doubt:

115. *Just as one generates through familiarity
The awareness of 'mine' for a body lacking self,
Why should one not generate the awareness of 'mine'
For other sentient beings through familiarisation?*

116ab. *Thus, producing the purpose of others
Vanity and grandiosity do not arise,*

The commentary explains the meaning of these lines as follows:

Answer: Through familiarity, one generates the grasping at 'mine' for the body, even though the body lacks a self. Likewise, why should one not be able to generate the awareness of 'this is mine' through familiarising oneself with cherishing other sentient beings? If one meditates, one can definitely generate it.

As this meditation on holding all sentient beings as self accomplishes the purpose of others, one does not generate feelings of vanity and grandiosity.

As the commentary explains, while in reality our body lacks a self, we instinctively hold the body as self because of our familiarity with that view. That being the case, as the commentary explains, why should one not be able to generate the awareness of 'this is mine' through familiarising oneself with cherishing other sentient beings? This rhetorical question implies that if one meditates, one can definitely generate this awareness. Just as one instinctively cherishes oneself now, it is definitely possible to cherish other sentient beings through becoming familiar with the thought of cherishing them.

When the commentary states, as this meditation on holding all sentient beings as self accomplishes the purpose of others, one does not generate feelings of vanity and grandiosity, it is saying that because one is totally dedicated to benefitting others, there is no room for vain and grandiose thoughts such as 'Oh, I am so important as I am doing such a great service for others'. That sort of pompous pride will not arise.

3.2.1.1.1.2. Advice to make an effort to meditate without hope for a ripening result

This means that one's practice is to be done without any hope for a good result for oneself. So working for other sentient beings should be free from any thoughts about the ripening of good karma in the future.

The following verses and explanations in the commentary are quite clear. The verse relating to this heading reads:

*116cd. Similar to not expecting a reward
When eating food¹.*

*117. Hence, when protecting self
From some small unpleasantness
Meditate on the mind of protection
And compassion for migrators.*

As the commentary explains:

For example, it is similar to not expecting a reward for eating one's food. Since it has infinite benefits, one should meditate on compassion and protecting migrators from suffering just as one would protect oneself from even small unpleasant words.

The example presented states that one doesn't eat a meal in expectation of a reward. One eats the meal just for the sake of needing to eat. In the Tibetan text the first part of the presentation is one protects oneself from even a small unpleasant word. This means that we instinctively protect ourselves from criticism or even the slightest unpleasant words from others. So, just as one protects oneself, one should also protect other sentient beings in the same way, with the understanding that there's infinite benefit in doing so.

The point of meditating on compassion and protecting migrators from suffering is that just as one protects oneself from the slightest suffering, likewise out of compassion one needs to protect other sentient beings from experiencing suffering. The point is that it has to be based on compassion, because without compassion for others, one would not generate the wish for them to be free from suffering.

What is being presented here in simple terms, is that if we wish to know how to protect other sentient beings, then the method is to protect them with a compassionate heart, just like we protect ourselves.

The example presented here is that just as we protect ourselves from hurtful words, likewise we need to protect others. We also need to take the initiative to protect other sentient beings from our own harsh and hurtful words. If we don't like hearing even the slightest unpleasant remark, then this is exactly the same for other sentient beings. So we need to be very careful not to utter hurtful words to other sentient beings. Why? Because just as we are hurt, they are also hurt.

We find many instances of how unskilful and harsh speech causes a lot of hurt and disharmony. Therefore we really need to pay attention to this point. These practices aren't just some sort of explanation to be heard and perhaps forgotten; rather, if we actually apply them in our own practice, then we can derive the intended benefit from these teachings.

3.2.1.1.1.3. Giving even greater purpose to the benefit of others

The verse relating to this outline reads:

*118. The protector Chenrezig
Blessed therefore even his name,
Out of great compassion,
To eliminate migrators' sufferings of cyclic existence.*

The commentary then explains:

Since one needs to protect sentient beings from even small suffering, the protector Chenrezig blessed out of great compassion even his name to eliminate also the slightest of the frightening sufferings in cyclic existence: 'By thinking of my name may the frightening sufferings of cyclic existence become non-existent.'

In the Array of Stalks Sutra it explains it as remembering the name trice.

As explained here, Chenrezig (or Avalokiteshvara), is said to have made extremely powerful aspirations when he was a trainee on the path. When he was a bodhisattva training on the path to enlightenment, out of great compassion and not being able to bear the sufferings of sentient beings, he made very powerful aspirations such as, 'May even merely hearing my name become a means to eliminate the sufferings of sentient beings'.

Due to that combination of great compassion and such powerful aspirations, along with great wisdom, it is said that when Avalokiteshvara became enlightened, merely reciting his name brings great solace for sentient beings. As the commentary says, this is mentioned in the Array of Stalks Sutra. Reciting Avalokiteshvara's name is a very powerful mantra, and many people take it upon themselves to recite the Chenrezig mantra regularly as a means to generate compassion and help to eliminate the sufferings of other sentient beings.

I've mentioned previously how, at our level, we also need to take heed of the importance of making strong aspirational prayers. If we think, 'Oh, I'm good for nothing; I cannot possibly achieve anything', then the more we think in that way the less competent we will feel. Regardless of our actual state now, we can definitely have the capacity to generate the grandest aspirations to benefit other sentient beings.

¹ Needs to be read in the context of the first part of the verse.

Such aspirations have great significance. Enlightened beings are equal in being free from all faults, having an omniscient mind and compassion for all beings. However it is said that due to the strong aspirational prayers to benefit other beings when they were training on the path, and the merit accumulated at that time, when they become enlightened they are able to serve specific purposes to benefit sentient beings.

By thinking of my name may the frightening sufferings of cyclic existence become non-existent. Because of the combination of such strong aspirations based on great compassion, having accumulated extensive merits, and generating the great wisdom of omniscience, mantras such as the name of Chenrezig become a very powerful means to eliminate the suffering of sentient beings.

This is actually the meaning of the Tibetan word jin-lab that is translated as blessing. Jin means to bestow, and lab has a connotation of transforming the mind. So when people say 'I received blessings from a deity or holy objects such as statues and so forth', we need to understand that the real blessing is received when the mind transforms into a more positive and peaceful state.

3.2.1.1.1.4. If one meditates, one is able to generate it

While the word meditate is used here, the connotation of the Tibetan term is familiarity. So when one becomes familiar with it one is able to generate it, or if one meditates on it one is able to generate it. The next verse is preceded by this hypothetical doubt or argument:

Argument: Although there are many benefits, it is difficult to meditate on exchanging self and other.

At this stage one may acknowledge that there are many benefits from engaging in the practice of exchanging self with other, but think that it is very difficult to practise. One may feel, 'How could I practise it?'

The next verse is one of those verses that is quoted often, which people find to be very significant and powerful advice.

119. *Do not be turned off by difficulty.
Through the force of familiarity
The one whose name instilled fear when hearing
it,
Becomes the one without whom one is joyless.*

The commentary explains:

Answer: One should not be turned off by the difficulty of meditating on it because if one meditates, then one can realise it. Through familiarisation even the enemy whose mere name instilled fear in us when hearing it, becomes later a friend without whom we are joyless.

This presentation is clearly intended to counteract a very familiar mindset that we have that prevents us from engaging in various practices and virtues: 'Oh, it's too hard; too difficult'. The presentation here is that even though something may be difficult, one can master whatever one wishes to accomplish through familiarity.

We need to refer to these points again and again. We can acknowledge our limitations and faults and shortcomings, but we do have a mind, which carries the potential to change and further develop. When we become familiar with something, it is possible to change and adopt it. That is the point we need to remind ourselves of.

If one meditates on or becomes familiar with something then one can generate or realise it. The example to illustrate this is an enemy whose name initially instilled fear in oneself – just hearing their name instils fear. Yet even with such an enemy, if one attempts to gradually and slowly become familiar with them, then it becomes possible that the enemy will turn into a friend. One can become so close to them that one feels unhappy if they're not present.

Here a complete transformation has taken place: an individual considered to be an enemy, whose presence once instilled a lack of joy and unhappiness, and whose absence caused happiness, becomes so close that without their presence one feels unhappy and joyless. In the past I've shared with you that I've had personal experience of this transformation into friendship through acquaintance and familiarity.

The reverse of this is also true. You might be so close to someone that you could not bear to be separated from them. But later on, even after having been together for ten or fifteen years, now you cannot bear to be in their presence and it makes you unhappy if they're close by. This is due to familiarity with focusing on their faults. When one starts to focus on the faults of others, the mind becomes more and more acquainted with seeing only faults, and that's when the other becomes an arch enemy who one cannot bear to see.

As the great master Atisha very succinctly said: proclaim your faults and hide your qualities; proclaim the qualities of others and hide their faults. This is very profound advice that we need to put into practice.

Indeed, if one starts to become acquainted with seeing the faults of the other, one may reach a point where one doesn't see any qualities. One even starts to actually look for faults in the other, which may very well be just a projection of one's own faults onto them. In either case one may reach a point where one does not see any quality in the other, which causes animosity and anger.

3.2.1.1.1.5. Meditate on exchanging self and other because both self and other wish to be freed from suffering

This is again a very logical presentation of how it is reasonable to exchange self with others because oneself and others all wish to be free from suffering.

The verse relating to this is:

120. *They who wish to rescue quickly
Self and others
Should practise the secret advice
Of exchanging self and other.*

The commentary explains:

For those reasons, they who wish to rescue quickly self and others from the faults of existence and peace should practise exchanging self and other, which is the secret Mahayana advice on the ultimate meaning of meditation, which is kept from those who are not a vessel.

In the first sentence, the faults of cyclic existence refers to samsara, and peace refers to the personal liberation of the lower vehicles. Those who wish to rescue quickly self and others should practise exchanging self and other, which is the secret Mahayana advice. Here secret Mahayana advice doesn't refer to secret tantric teachings, but rather a secret not to be disclosed to those who have very strong self-interest and thus are not able to relate to these teachings. This also relates to the self-interest of the practitioners of the lower vehicles.

As mentioned further, the ultimate meaning of meditation is kept from those who are not a vessel. Here an unsuitable vessel refers the hearers and solitary realisers whose ultimate goal is to achieve personal liberation. For those who have a very strong self-interest these teachings will not be suitable, because they would not be able to relate to, and practise them.

The ultimate meaning of meditation on exchanging self with other, as presented here, is that it serves as the very foundation of the practice of generating and developing bodhicitta. It is likened to the life-wood, which is the central piece of wood placed in a statue or stupa. Just as the life-wood serves as the central piece of a statue, the practice of bodhicitta is the very centre and life force of the Mahayana and the lamrim teachings.

It is as presented in the beginning of the Three Principal Aspects of the Path:

The essential meaning of the Victorious One's teachings,
The path praised by all the holy victors and their children,
The gateway of the fortunate ones desiring liberation

3.2.1.1.1.2. Abandoning cherishing self with effort

This is subdivided into two:

3.2.1.1.1.2.1. Self-cherishing is the cause for all fears

3.2.1.1.1.2.2. It is that which induces all harmful actions

3.2.1.1.1.2.1. Self-cherishing is the cause for all fears

The verse relating to this heading is:

121. *Out of those that generate fear for a small object
Due to attachment to their body,
Who would not abhor, like an enemy,
This body that generates fear.*

The commentary further explains:

If due to attachment to one's body, without having exchanged self and others, one generates great fear for even small objects of fear such as scorpions and poisonous snakes, then who that is skilled would not abhor this body like an enemy? It is unsuitable to cherish it.

The commentary explains that, due to attachment to one's body, which is without having exchanged self and others, one generates great fear for even small objects of fear such as scorpions and poisonous snakes. We have an instinctive fear of these creatures because of our strong self-cherishing. As that is the case, then who that is skilled, meaning who that is knowledgeable, would not abhor this body like an enemy? This is referring to cherishing the body. Obviously we need to have a body, but the implication here is that cherishing it is not suitable.

3.2.1.1.1.2.2. It is that which induces all harmful actions

Here 'that' refers to cherishing one's body, which is another way of being attached to one's body. This is what induces harmful actions. The relevant lines of verse are:

122. *Desiring to practise the ritual of curing
The afflictions of the body's hunger, thirst
And the like, one kills birds, fish,
Animals and hides in ambush.*

123ab. *They who, for profit and praise
Even kill their father and mother*

The commentary which relates to these lines is:

Those who cherish self, and out of the desire to practise the ritual of curing the body's afflictions of hunger, thirst and the like, will burn in the hells without respite because they kill birds, fish and animals, ambush travellers and steal the wealth of others.

In order for the cherished body to receive profit and praise, they even kill their father and mother.

The commentary clearly explains the negative consequences of strong self-cherishing out of the desire to protect one's body. The ritual of curing the body's afflictions, refers to protecting one's body from hunger, thirst and so forth. To do this individuals engage in negativities such as killing birds, for food, or fish and animals, ambush travellers and steal the wealth of others. Then as a consequence of these deeds they will burn in the hells without respite. Their negative deeds definitely ripen into this suffering.

As further explained, in order for the cherished body to receive profit and praise, they even kill those who have been very kind to them, like their own father and mother. This refers to actual events that have occurred in the past; the king who was killed by his son. There is also another story of the son who killed his mother as a way to gain profit. In fact these events also occur today.

We saw the recent tragedy in Nepal where the whole royal family was assassinated by a prince. He would have been influenced by his uncle or someone else saying, "If you kill your father then you can become king". These unthinkable acts that are perpetrated on those who have been extremely kind to oneself arise from self-cherishing. The desire for gain and profit blinds the perpetrator to the fact that they are harming those who have been extremely kind to them.

We hear on the news about children killing their parents, or parents killing their children and we need to understand that these are the results of the fault of self-cherishing. We cannot think, 'Oh this will never occur to me!' These extreme situations were caused by self-cherishing, and are a reminder that we need to be mindful and careful about our own self-cherishing.

While we can use these explanations to be cautious and mindful about protecting ourselves from a self-cherishing mind, it can also become a means to generate compassion for others when they engage in such negative deeds. Because we know that they are blinded by their own self-cherishing, we extend our compassion to those who engage in such negative deeds. The teachings present many methods for thinking about the faults of self-cherishing.

The remaining lines of verse under this heading read:

123cd. *Or steal offering from the Triple Gem
Burn in the hell without respite*

124. *Hence, who that is wise would not view
This body that is desired, protected
And made offerings to,
As an enemy, and deride it?*

The commentary further explains:

Further, they will steal offerings from the Triple Gem and thus they will also burn in the hells without respite. Thus, who that is skilled will not view this body that is desired, protected and made offerings to on the basis of cherishing it, as an enemy, who will not deride it? One needs to stop all forms of self-cherishing.

They will steal offerings from the Triple Gem, and thus they will also burn in the hells without respite refers to the consequences of cherishing oneself or one's body. Thus, who that is skilled will not view this body that is desired, protected and made offerings to on the basis of cherishing it, as an enemy? Who will not deride it? These are rhetorical questions which imply that one really needs to see self-cherishing as an enemy. The conclusion is that one needs to stop all forms of self-cherishing.

We need to understand this explanation in its proper context. Protecting and making offerings to one's body as a means of sustaining one's body in order to benefit others is of course most suitable. The Four Hundred Verses mentioned that by understanding this body as being a vehicle to benefit others, one needs to sustain, and nourish it. One definitely needs to protect this body, which has been acquired through the practise of morality, as a means to benefit others. The longer we can sustain this body, the more opportunity we will have to practise morality and so forth.

3.2.1.1.3.1.3. Contemplating the faults of holding self as the most important and the benefits of holding other as the most important

This is subdivided into two:

3.2.1.1.3.1.1. A list of the faults and benefits of cherishing self and other

3.2.1.1.3.1.2. It is appropriate to abandon self-cherishing

3.2.1.1.3.1.1. A list of the faults and benefits of cherishing self and other

Here there are two subdivisions:

3.2.1.1.3.1.1.1. Extensive explanation

3.2.1.1.3.1.1.2. Short summary

3.2.1.1.3.1.1.1. Extensive explanation

This is subdivided into five:

3.2.1.1.3.1.1.1.1. From the point of view of generosity

3.2.1.1.3.1.1.1.2. From the point of view of harm

3.2.1.1.3.1.1.1.3. From the point of view of praise and fame

3.2.1.1.3.1.1.1.4. From the point of view of inducing action

3.2.1.1.3.1.1.1.5. From the point of view of benefit and happiness

3.2.1.1.3.1.1.1.1. From the point of view of generosity

The verse relating to this is:

125. *Saying, 'If I give, what shall I use?,'
Is the way of ghosts; the egotistical thought.
Saying, 'If I use, then what will I give?,'
Is thinking about others; the Dharma of gods.*

The commentary explains:

The way of ghosts, the egotistical thought, where out of miserliness one thinks, 'If I give my wealth to others, then what will I use?' generates fear. The thought of, 'If I use it, then what will I give to others?' is only about the welfare of others. It is the Dharma of the gods and gives rise to all that is good and perfect.

Everyone is afraid of ghosts, and here they are used as an illustration of something that causes fear. The egotistical thought, where out of miserliness one thinks, 'If I give my wealth to others, then what will I use?' generates fear. This fear of having nothing left if we were to give to others is a thought that brings about miserliness. This prevents generosity, and thus prevents one from accumulating the virtue and merit that, in the long run, will be beneficial for oneself. That is a thought that should generate fear!

Whereas the thought of, 'If I use it, then what will I give to others?' is the thought that equals the beneficial thoughts of the gods. There are those who are concerned that if they consume too much themselves they will have nothing left to give to others; such genuine concern arises from a mind of cherishing others and wishing to benefit them. So they don't use too much for themselves for the fear of not having enough to share with others. Some even have a hard time eating, thinking 'If I eat this then how could I feed others, who are much more disadvantaged than me?' There are people who think like this, and these noble thoughts are equal to the gods.

3.2.1.1.3.1.2. From the point of view of harm

The verse reads:

126. *If one harms others for the purpose of self
One will fall into the hells and the like.
If one harms self for the purpose of others
One will attain all good perfections.*

The commentary explains:

If one inflicts harm on others, such as killing, in order to attain happiness for oneself, one will fall into the hells and the like. If one harms and gives up one's body and wealth for the happiness of others, then one will attain all good perfections.

This is basically an account of cause and effect, and the consequences of karma. As mentioned here, if one inflicts harm on others, such as killing, in order to attain happiness for oneself, then while the intention might be happiness the consequence will be falling into the hells and suffering. Rather than happiness, one will in fact, only experience suffering.

From a worldly perspective, giving up one's body and wealth for the happiness of others may be even seen as a foolish act. "How foolish of them to give away their body and wealth to others". But when done with the proper intention, with the mind of cherishing other sentient beings, then one will only attain the good perfections. So the benefit of cherishing others is, as explained here, good consequences and results.

While these explanations are quite clear, the main point is to take them as a personal instruction and put them into practice; then they will become more meaningful. Often people comment, 'Oh, I've studied Buddhism for a while but how should I practise?' The answer is 'Put into practice what has been presented here'. When we actually put this reasonable and practical advice into practise, then that is when we derive the greatest benefit from the teachings.

Even spending some time reading and contemplating the meaning of this text, will definitely bring great solace to one's mind, making it calmer and more subdued. So, there is great benefit in doing that.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

3 May 2016

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

During the meditation practice we will have further strengthened our motivation. Generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

Generating such a motivation, even for a few moments, will definitely establish very strong positive imprints in our mind.

3.2.1.1.1.3. Contemplating the faults of holding self as the most important and the benefits of holding other as the most important

3.2.1.1.1.3.1. A list of the faults and benefits of cherishing self and other

3.2.1.1.1.3.1.3. From the point of view of praise and fame

The verse reads:

127. *Due to the wish to attain it oneself
One will have lower rebirth, inferiority and stupidity.
If one transfers it to others,
One will attain honour in a happy rebirth.*

The commentary explains:

Wishing to be elevated by praise and fame, one will take a lower rebirth in the next life. Even if one takes rebirth as a human, one will be of low caste, bad appearance and stupid. If one habituates oneself in transferring the wish for elevation to others, one will have a happy rebirth in the next life where one will receive perfect praise and honour.

Wishing to be elevated by praise and fame relates to wishing to be elevated by praise and fame just for oneself. When one has this attitude, the text explains the result is that one will take a lower rebirth in the next life. Then even if one takes rebirth as a human, one will be of low caste and bad appearance, which means not having an appealing appearance, and have a stupid mind.

What needs to be understood from this explanation is that when the focus of wishing for elevated praise and fame is merely for oneself, and while it may not seem like such a bad thing, what occurs when one focuses mainly on oneself when pursuing elevated praise and fame, is that a lot of afflictions arise in one's mind and thus one creates negativity. For example, out of jealousy one criticises those who are doing well or doing better than oneself; one sees others as one's rivals and a sense of competitiveness arises; one has contempt towards others and puts them down and feels a sense of pride toward those who appear to be inferior to oneself. This is how we create negativity as a result of pursuing praise and fame merely for oneself. If the intention of pursuing praise and fame is a means to benefit others, that's different. But here the commentary emphasises the consequences of the negativities that occur when one pursues this aim only for oneself.

Most of our faults actually arise from a wish to become famous or well known or to be praised. This becomes a downfall for us because in pursuit of fame and praise a lot of the other negativities follow.

We need to take heed here of Shantideva's very succinct and precise advice on how to engage in a practice that will benefit oneself ultimately and not harm oneself. Again, many may wonder about what's wrong with being famous or being praised, but the key point to understand is that when the focus is merely on one's own gratification, one's own selfish gain, then the pursuit of that incurs many negativities.

The consequences are explained in that, one will take rebirth in the lower realms in the next life, and even if one were to be reborn as a human then all of the following disadvantages would occur. This is similar to what Shantideva mentioned earlier in the text when he said, 'while wishing to be free from suffering, beings run towards the very causes of suffering. And although they wish for happiness, they destroy their own happiness like an enemy'. These same points are being presented here, which is in essence a succinct presentation of karma.

When one focuses just on oneself, then even though one wishes for a good outcome, the actual consequences one experiences are negative. But if one practices the opposite (explained next in the commentary) and, if one habituates oneself in transferring the wish for elevation to others, i.e. wishing praise and fame for others, one actually transfers the focus to others and the consequences are that one will have a happy rebirth in the next life, where one will receive perfect praise and honour.

When one engages in the practice of offering praise to others, and wishing fame for them, this stops a lot of negativity from arising in our minds, because there's no chance for jealousy etc. to arise when one truly wishes others to have praise and fame. For example, when others are doing well one would be very happy for them, because that is exactly what one has wished for.

Jealousy arises when one is not happy with others' good fortune, when good things happen for them such as praise and fame. If we are keen to actually practise Dharma we need to put into practice offering praise and fame to others. At first glance this concept may sound strange, however one will begin to understand that when one engages in a selfish pursuit one creates a lot of negativity, and if one practises the opposite and wishes wellness for others, then that is when one actually practises virtue. This is the main point.

We need to understand this very good advice, given to us in very simple terms. It points out that if you harbour feelings based on selfish interest, it will only bring about negative results rather than good ones. However, if you harbour good attitudes and positive states of mind, this allows one to accumulate virtuous deeds, which ultimately brings about good results for yourself. This is the very compassionate advice being presented to us by Shantideva.

3.2.1.1.1.3.1.4. From the point of view of inducing action

This heading refers to the type of actions one takes.

The verse reads:

128. *If one commands others for the purpose of self,
One will experience being a slave and the like.
If oneself works for the purpose of others,
One will only experience being a lord and master.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

If one enslaves others, taking their freedom, for the purpose of self, then one will experience later inferior status; being a slave and the like. If one works and commands oneself for the happiness and benefit of others, one will later be a lord and master, and experience higher status, having a good appearance and the like.

Again this explanation relates to the disadvantages of cherishing just oneself and the great advantages of cherishing others. We can see that this situation, enslaving others and taking their freedom, for the purpose of self, occurs a lot even in these times, where people completely take advantage of others. Employers at times take complete advantage of their employees, making them work for many extra hours with minimal or no extra pay.

So at this time and age there are still those who are enslaved, basically working for almost nothing, required to do too much work and under too much pressure. Unfortunately we see this taking place. So when this is done out of self-cherishing, the consequence is that, one will experience later, an inferior status, and being a slave and the like in the future oneself.

The opposite is, if one works and commands oneself for the happiness and benefit of others, one will later be a lord and master, and experience higher status, having a good appearance and the like. This explains that good attributes will come about naturally and spontaneously without exerting oneself, when one puts oneself into the service of other sentient beings with an attitude of cherishing them.

You may feel like this explanation doesn't relate to you now because you're not a master enslaving others and making them work, thus there is no danger of these negativities. But one needs to keep in mind that this can occur at any time. If one reaches such a position of being in charge under whatever circumstances, then this is when the danger of misusing power and taking control of others can occur. Therefore one needs to be mindful and engage in practices now so that in the event one gains power one will avoid mistreating others.

A prevalent fault or downfall is where we become obsessed with getting higher status, wanting to be recognised, and having a high calling. When we think about the various types of problems we have, and the different suffering we experience, it really does stem from a strong clinging on to me: my individual happiness; I want things to be my way; I have to achieve my goals; I want everything to be perfect just for me.

When we harbour such attitudes, the stronger we hold the feeling of wanting things to go well just for me, harbouring the attitude of – me, me, me all the time, then when things don't go our way and our expectations are not met, we feel totally overwhelmed with disappointment and suffering. All the problems we experience are really due to a singular focus just on oneself.

If you were to make an attempt to actually shift your focus and think about the welfare of others, how they also need happiness and want to be free from suffering, and contemplate their sufferings, then the moment you actually shift your focus you will find from your own experience that you get an immediate release. Your mind becomes much more expansive, and as your own problems start to become less significant you get a release from your own problems.

If one doesn't pay attention, and continuously thinks about one's own problems and difficulties, and whether things have been going according to your own wishes, then the problems just perpetuate, and it's one problem after another. However, while we may not have overcome the root of our problems yet, when we shift our focus onto others, even that temporary release we get gives us some solace and some space to think more clearly. We gain courage and insight from that experience, and this gives us the impetus to practise further. This is how we see the benefit of the practice.

We experience difficulties and problems that are clearly created by our own self-cherishing mind. In this abundant country we all have a nice place to live in and have food at our table every day. None of us here have to worry about not getting our next meal, or not finding a place to stay. So in terms of the general external conditions for our sustenance, everything is adequate. However we all have complaints of one sort or another and how things are not right. This shows that the problems are caused by an ego-centric self-cherishing mind not getting its own way and never satisfied; in essence, being obsessed with one's own needs and wanting things to be one's own way.

In a relationship between two people, if one partner starts to have an attitude that things have to be their way, when the other makes a suggestion they reject it feeling it 'doesn't accord with my wishes'. When one person asserts their strong, opinionated mind then that's the moment conflict arises. Conversely, the moment a partner says, 'If it's OK with you then it's fine with me' and is happy with that, the potential friction immediately subsides and there is no room for conflict or agitation.

We can see clearly from this example that the moment there's a strong opinionated mind where a person won't accept something the other wants, because it doesn't accord with their own personal wishes, then that creates conflict. We can learn something from the simple statement: 'if it's OK with you then it's fine with me' because the opposite 'even if it's fine with you, it's not ok with me' is how problems begin. This is the point to keep in mind.

To share one incident, last Thursday on my regular visit to the sea-baths, as I was bathing there, one elderly person came to me and commented, 'you're a Buddhist monk aren't you?' And I said yes. Then he said 'I've actually seen you on many occasions from a distance and seen you are very joyful and happy. It occurred to me that it might be because you are a Buddhist. I thought if I could be like you, who always seem to be happy and joyful, then that would be really good. I'd be fulfilled if I could be happy as you are'. Then he said, 'I actually started going to a Buddhist centre to go to some teachings'. Actually it turns out to be one of the Kadampa centres.

So although he didn't confirm that he's a Buddhist he said he'd started to go to a Buddhist centre. He was showing a genuine interest, and that is the point. The moral of this incident is that when people use their intelligence, they want to follow the example of someone who is happy and joyful, rather than wanting to be rich and famous.

Previously I've also shared a story about a merchant who sells fruit and his comments to me. I used to occasionally go to Southland and have coffee at a particular cafe. Opposite to where I sat down and had coffee was a merchant selling fruit; I think he was of Italian background. He would smile at me and occasionally come up and greet me and say 'Hello, how are you?' Once when he greeted me, I asked him 'How are you?' he said 'Oh, not so good'. I asked him if business was going well. I thought maybe he had financial problems. He said 'No, business is going quite well, but I'd rather be like you. That would be nice'.

I have many such stories about people just coming up to me and sharing their thoughts and telling me about their life. Someone came up to me in the Southland Shopping Centre once and said 'I haven't seen anyone as nice and as happy as you', and shook my hand.

All these anecdotes illustrate the main point presented here which is that if one starts to really familiarise one's mind with cherishing others, then that's something that brings a great sense of joy within oneself. It attracts others and they seem to acknowledge you and be happy in your presence. These are the positive results we start to gain when we make a genuine attempt to practise cherishing others and overcome self-cherishing.

3.2.1.1.1.3.1.5. From the point of view of benefit and happiness

The verse reads:

129. *Whatever happiness is found in the transitory worlds
Came from the wish for the happiness of others.
Whatever sufferings are found in the transitory worlds
Came from the wish for self to be happy.*

The commentary explains:

In short, whatever happiness there is in the transitory worlds, it all came from the wish for others to be happy and from working for others. Whatever sufferings there are in the transitory worlds, they all came from the self-cherishing that wishes happiness for the self. Therefore, one should stop the self-cherishing with effort.

The commentary again emphasises the point that all the happiness seen in the world is actually the result of working for the sake of others, from cherishing others. Whereas whatever sufferings one experiences in the worlds actually comes from the self-cherishing mind, which is in essence presenting the natural cause and effect sequence of karma – how one experiences the results of all the karma one creates.

3.2.1.1.1.3.1.2. Summary of the meaning¹

Shantideva is saying here: I do not have to elaborate too much on the faults of self-cherishing and the advantages of cherishing others; the following example clearly illustrates the difference between the two.

The verse reads:

130. *What need is there to say a lot?
The childish work for their own benefit
And the Able One works for the benefit of others,
Look at the difference between the two.*

The commentary goes on to explain:

What need is there for extensive elaborate explanations? The childish receive all they do not wish for because they cherish their own well-being, while the Able One works for the welfare of others and perfect all that is good. Just look at the difference between these two and generate belief.

The point the commentary explains here is that without having to use elaborate and extensive explanations, by simply looking at the difference between the childish, or ordinary beings, and the Able One, who is the Buddha, we can see the clear difference.

It indicates that once the Buddha was an ordinary being like us, with all the faults and shortcomings we now have. However through engaging in the practice, particularly the attitude of cherishing others and developing bodhicitta, this path led the Buddha to become a renowned enlightened being. We can see how the Buddha is completely free from all these faults and endowed with all great qualities. Whereas we ordinary beings are still harbouring self-cherishing attitudes, and experiencing all the shortcomings and sufferings of the negative consequences of our actions.

This clearly shows the disadvantages of self-cherishing and the great advantages and benefit of cherishing other sentient beings. When one looks at it in this way one will be able to generate belief, meaning that one will strongly believe in the advantages of cherishing others and the disadvantages of cherishing oneself.

3.2.1.1.1.3.2. It is appropriate to abandon self-cherishing

This is subdivided into four:

3.2.1.1.1.3.2.1. The unseen faults

3.2.1.1.1.3.2.2. The faults that one can see

3.2.1.1.1.3.2.3. A summary of the faults

3.2.1.1.1.3.2.4. It is suitable to give up self-cherishing

3.2.1.1.1.3.2.1. The unseen faults

The verse reads:

131. *If one does not perfectly exchange
One's happiness for the suffering of others
One will not achieve enlightenment*

¹ Last week this heading was introduced as 3.2.1.1.1.3.1.2. Short summary

And one will also lack happiness in cyclic existence.

The commentary explains:

If one does not exchange perfectly the happiness of self for the suffering of others and reverse from the initial attitude of working for the happiness of self and eliminating the suffering of self, by cherishing others, i.e., working for their happiness and striving with effort to eliminate their suffering, then one will not achieve enlightenment.

One may think, 'Even if I do not achieve enlightenment and remain in cyclic existence that would be OK', but one will also lack perfect happiness in cyclic existence.

The first part of this explanation states, if one does not exchange perfectly the happiness of self for the suffering of others and reverse from the initial attitude, which as explained earlier, is giving one's happiness to others and taking the suffering of others upon oneself. The commentary then further explains the exchange of one's own happiness for the suffering of others where it reads that, and reverse from the initial attitude of working for the happiness of self and eliminating the suffering of self, by cherishing others, i.e., working for their happiness and striving with effort to eliminate their suffering, meaning that if one does not engage in that then one will not achieve enlightenment.

From this one may start thinking that, Even if I do not achieve enlightenment and remain in cyclic existence that would be OK, but one will also lack perfect happiness in cyclic existence. If one were to think 'it's fine to remain in cyclic existence joyfully and with happiness', as mentioned here, one will also lack perfect happiness in cyclic existence. Thus one will not experience any true happiness while remaining in cyclic existence.

The phrase, lacking perfect happiness in cyclic existence, refers to uncontaminated true happiness. We experience general happiness as humans, and the god realms also have a certain level of happiness, but the happiness the text is referring to here is ultimate happiness.

I wonder if there's a difference in the term 'happy' and 'happiness'. There was a comment made in the Happiness conference by one speaker who said 'I don't really know what happiness means'. That just brought to my mind that maybe happiness is something that is a little bit more obscure, whereas happy, we can talk about being happy or sad.

3.2.1.1.1.3.2.2. The faults that one can see

This refers to the most obvious faults one can relate to even in this life.

The verse reads:

*132. Leaving aside the world beyond,
Servants and helpers will not work and
Masters will not pay wages,
One will not even achieve the purpose of this life.*

The commentary explains:

If one does not meditate on giving up self and cherishing others, then, leaving aside the faults of future lives, also in this life one's servants and helpers will not work and the master one did work for will not pay wages. One will not achieve even the purpose of this life.

The meaning of this verse is that, if one does not meditate or familiarise on giving up self and cherishing others, then, leaving aside the faults of future lives, which means leaving aside the consequences to be experienced in future lives, even in this very life, the disadvantages would be for example that, servants and helpers will not work and the master one did work for will not pay wages. So one will not achieve even the purpose of this life.

This example illustrates that the master needs workers (or employees) to work for them, and if they don't work, the master's purpose will not be fulfilled. Also, as the servants' goal in life is to achieve wages to live, if they are not paid then their purpose is not achieved. In short, if you don't change your attitude these are the consequences to be experienced. My interpretation of this example is that if from the workers' side they only work with minimal interest, and are negligent and not putting their heart into it in order to fulfil the master's wishes, and are only interested in getting their wages, then of course the master will be unhappy and not pay their wages. Therefore the servants will lose their wages and lose the goal they wished to achieve. Whereas if they changed their attitude and took a genuine interest in their work and did it wholeheartedly to fulfil their duties, with the attitude of making the other happy, they would naturally get their wages. That is something that one would gain as a by-product of the work. So from the servants' side if they changed their attitude toward the work, and did it more willingly and wholeheartedly, then they'll fulfil their own purpose too.

If the master is miserly about paying the wages and tries to avoid paying the workers in a timely manner, then of course the servants won't be happy either. Therefore if the master maintains that attitude they will lose their workers or servants and their purpose will not be fulfilled. However if their attitude changes and wages are given willingly and in a timely manner, then that would make the servants happy and the master would fulfil their own purpose. The example is about the need to change one's attitudes to gain the ultimate benefit.

3.2.1.1.1.3.2.3. A summary of the faults

The verse reads:

*133. One gives up the perfect bliss and happiness
That establishes the seen and unseen happiness.
Due to the cause of harming others,
They are deluded and take on frightening suffering.*

The commentary explains:

As one does not put great purpose into the welfare of others one has given up exchanging self and other; the method for achieving happiness in this life and in future lives. Thus, one has thoroughly abandoned perfect happiness. The childish that are deluded with regards to what is the method for happiness and suffering, due to the cause of inflicting the harm of suffering onto others, have taken into their continuum frightening and difficult to bear suffering.

It is quite clearly explained here that, as one does not put great purpose into the welfare of others one has given up exchanging self and other; which is the method for achieving happiness in this life and in future lives. If one does not put great purpose into the welfare of others and gives up exchanging self and other, then the consequences are that, one has thoroughly abandoned perfect happiness, as one has actually abandoned the very cause of one's happiness.

So, the childish that are deluded with regards to what is the method for happiness and suffering, due to the cause of inflicting the harm of suffering onto others, have taken into their continuum frightening and difficult to bear suffering. It's as if they've taken upon their own suffering by accumulating the causes of suffering.

Earlier there was mention of being mistaken about what one wishes for, and the causes for achieving it. While one may wish for something, one often fails to engage in the appropriate causes to achieve it.

3.2.1.1.1.3.2.4. It is suitable to give up self-cherishing

The first verse reads:

134. *Whatever harm there is in the transitory worlds,
Whatever danger and suffering come into existence,
If all that arises from self-cherishing,
Then what does this demon of self-cherishing do for me?*

The commentary to this verse reads:

If all the human and non-human harm in the transitory worlds, all the mental fears and physical sufferings that come into existence, arise from self-cherishing, which has taken the self as object, then what good is this great demon of self-cherishing for oneself? It causes all that one does not desire, and one should abandon it.

This reiterates what was presented earlier but provides more detail on how all the fears of humans and non-humans in this world, such as the mental fears and physical sufferings that come into existence, arise from self-cherishing. So we can see that even the fear generated by a small insect, like an ant for example, when you start shaking something near it, it immediately starts running away to protect itself, due to its self-cherishing.

It is said that this is true for every kind of fear and every kind of mental or physical agony we experience – all arise from self-cherishing. This verse further emphasises the faults of self-cherishing.

If one has caused others fear or pain etc., as a consequence it returns as your experience of mental agony. All fear stems from the self-cherishing mind.

It emphasises that, as all the fears and unwanted sufferings arise from that, then what use is self-cherishing to oneself? This is a rhetorical question implying that there is no use whatsoever.

The next verse reads:

135. *If one does not give oneself up completely,
One will not be able to abandon suffering;
For example, if one does not let go of fire
One is unable to stop being burned.*

The commentary explains:

If one does not completely give up cherishing oneself then one will not be able to eliminate the suffering of all sentient beings. For example, like not being able to stop being burned if one does not let go of fire in one's hand.

The example here shows that if you have something hot and burning in your hand, such as fire, if you don't let go of it then your hand will be burned. If you want to protect your hand from the burning you have to let go of the fire. The moment you let go your hand is protected from being burnt.

What is being explained here is that as long as one holds on to self-cherishing, one will not be able to eliminate the suffering of other sentient beings. In order to eliminate others' suffering one actually has to let go of one's own self-cherishing attitude. As soon as one does it will be possible to eliminate their sufferings. This is the point. When it's so hard to give up self-cherishing it's no wonder that it's so difficult to become a buddha.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Engaging in the tong len meditation practice is highly meaningful. Of course, it is good to reflect on the actual meaning of the practice. The text that we are studying here meticulously and succinctly presents logical reasons to think about why we need to benefit others. Basically it is because we have not thought to benefit others that we have experienced so much loss, so many problems; all because of the lack of that positive attitude.

What has one gained from merely focusing on one's own purpose until now? Nothing but more problems and difficulties! Our present condition is the result of thinking only about fulfilling our own purpose. This clearly shows the great disadvantage of thinking in this way. We can see that the great enlightened beings, on the other hand, have achieved the ultimate state of enlightenment because of having solely contemplated the purpose of others.

In terms of the practice, as we recall from earlier presentations, we first generate the mind that wishes to benefit others, followed by the wish to achieve enlightenment; whereas, in terms of actually achieving the goal one first attains enlightenment, whereby one is able to fulfil the purpose of others.

As presented in the seven-fold cause and effect sequence for developing bodhicitta, the preceding causes – particularly developing great love, great compassion and the superior intention – are all methods for developing the wish to fulfil the purpose of others. Based on having developed these minds one then generates the mind of bodhicitta, the determination to achieve enlightenment to fulfil the purpose of all living beings. Thus one must first fulfil one's purpose – which is to attain enlightenment – so that one is able to completely fulfil the purpose of other sentient beings, which is to be free from all suffering and established in the ultimate state of happiness.

Based on this systematic and logical presentation we need to utilise the good conditions we have right now to familiarise the mind with the wish to benefit others, to fulfil their purpose. As mentioned earlier in the text (verse 130), leaving aside elaborate explanations, one can understand the disadvantage of cherishing oneself by looking at the difference between ordinary sentient beings and the Buddha.

Referring back to the seven-fold cause and effect sequence, the six causes are preceded by the foundation practice, the development of equanimity. Equanimity is where one generates an unbiased mind towards all living beings. One further strengthens this basis by generating the mind that recognises all beings as having been one's mother, followed by remembering their kindness, and then generating the wish to repay that kindness. These first three of the six causes are the foundation for fulfilling the purpose of others.

Next, one strengthens the wish to benefit all mother sentient beings by contemplating that the best way to repay their kindness is to remove all their sufferings and establish them in the ultimate state of happiness. When one develops the intense mind of genuinely wishing all beings to be endowed in happiness, this is known as heart-warming love. Then, when one wishes all beings to be completely free from suffering, one will have developed great compassion.

One further enhances that great love and compassion by going beyond the mere wish for others to be endowed with happiness and free from suffering, and actually taking personal responsibility to free all beings from suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness. This is when one develops superior intention. Having developed superior intention, one questions whether one has the ability to free all beings from suffering right now. It becomes evident that one is lacking that ability. When one further investigates who may have that ability, one sees it is not the foe destroyers who have reached the state of self-liberation – such as the hearers and solitary realisers – neither do bodhisattvas who have reached even the highest level, such as the tenth ground. It becomes clear that it is only the Buddha, the fully enlightened being, who has the full capacity and ability to fully benefit sentient beings.

At this stage, one makes a strong resolve to achieve enlightenment for the purpose of all sentient beings, to free them from suffering and lead them to ultimate happiness. When one develops that mind unceasingly and spontaneously, one has actually developed bodhicitta. This is how we need to understand the stages.

Most of you already know this presentation quite well, but I am reminding you so that you put it into practice; that is what I feel is most essential. The main point is to integrate what you have learned into your practice. While I cannot claim to have advanced a great deal in my practice, I can assure you that from the very beginning of my attempts at study, I have always been keen to try and put whatever teachings possible into practice. As a consequence of that, I naturally have a strong inclination to put whatever I learn into practice, rather than just gaining knowledge from the teachings of the texts.

When students comment 'I have done a lot of study, now what should I practise?', this is a clear sign that, from the start, their study was never really done with the intention of doing practice. If one intended to put one's study into practice as a priority from the very start then, as one studied, one would have naturally found ways to put what one learned into practice. As one's knowledge of the teachings progressed, one's means for developing one's practice would have naturally increased. The main point here is to put whatever one has understood into practice: do not leave it for later on, but apply it in one's daily practice right now.

As you will have noticed, I have emphasised again and again in Study Group on Tuesday nights, and also on Wednesday evenings the need to put whatever one understands into practice. This is my only concern. I don't have any great concern that you won't understand or learn, but I am reminding you to put your understanding into practice.

As I mentioned in a recent teaching at the Drol Kar Centre, I practice what you already know. I am not engaged in any profound practices that are beyond your conception and understanding. We are not deprived of the lack of understanding of the Dharma, but we do lack the habit of putting it into practice. Indeed, all of you have already gained quite a good understanding of the Dharma, in relation to others in this country who have no access to the Dharma. What may be lacking though, is actually putting your understanding into practice.

When we put our understanding into practice, it will definitely help subdue our mind, and when the mind is subdued, the mind is much happier and gentler. Otherwise there could be the great fault that the knowledge we have gained only becomes a means to increase our delusions, such as pride, anger or attachment. What could be worse than for a follower of the Dharma to be obsessed with attachment? As practitioners, we need to be mindful of this. If one has attachment to one's own beliefs, and aversion towards others' views for example, that is a big downfall, whether it is towards other religious seekers or others in general. This is what poisons the mind. Individuals who hold this sort of mindset cannot be called true practitioners. I am constantly careful about falling victim to these kinds of negative states of mind myself. I feel it is really important that, as true Dharma seekers, we remain mindful of not allowing the knowledge we have gained to become a poison for our mind, rather than a remedy to subdue the mind and overcome the delusions.

Now we come to the next heading in the text. More elaborate explanations were given last time about the preceding verse, which explains that if one does not completely give up the focus on oneself, one will not be able to abandon suffering. The example given is that if one does not let go of fire, one is unable to stop being burned. These are good, practical analogies given to illustrate the need for us to abandon suffering.

3.2.1.1.2. Brief summary

3.2.1.1.2.1. The way of exchanging self and other

136. *Thus, to pacify harm to oneself
And to pacify the suffering of others
One should offer oneself to others
And hold others as oneself.*

The commentary explaining this verse is:

Since disregarding others and cherishing self is the source for all that is undesired, one should give up cherishing self and cherish others as oneself, offering oneself for the purpose of all sentient beings, so as to pacify harm to self and the sufferings of others.

The commentary explains the meaning quite clearly. To emphasise the points we need to put into practice, the first part mentions: Since disregarding others and cherishing self is the source for all that is undesired. In other words, cherishing oneself is the source of all our misery and shortcomings. In relation to experiencing difficulties and problems, we often hear people ask, 'Why me? Why am I suffering?' If one is really keen to know, then when one investigates it becomes clear that one's problems arise because of self-cherishing. In fact, it is the combination of self-grasping and self-cherishing: it is said that self-grasping is likened to a king and self-cherishing is like the king's minister. Just as a minister would follow the king's every command, similarly the self-cherishing mind follows every command given by the self-grasping mind.

In this way, the self-cherishing mind engages in a lot of negative deeds under the command of the self-grasping mind. As a consequence one experiences a lot of suffering, problems and difficulties. So, as mentioned here, this mind is the source of all that is undesired, thus one should give up cherishing self, and instead cherish others as oneself, offering oneself for the purpose of all sentient beings. Spending some time contemplating these points by reading this verse and reflecting on the meaning becomes a practice in itself. I would consider this a real form of meditation. Putting it into practice is what we need to do after gaining some understanding.

This explanation is presented quite succinctly. First, the faults of self-cherishing are explained as the source of all that is undesired and all our problems. This is followed by the actual practice of exchanging self and other: one gives up cherishing self and instead cherishes others. Just as one cherished oneself previously, one exchanges that by focusing on others. That is the actual exchange that one does in the practice of exchanging self with others.

The next verse under the same heading reads:

137. *I say 'I am under the control of others.'
Mind, understanding this with certainty
You shall from now on think about nothing else
But accomplishing the welfare of all sentient beings.*

'Mind, you should understand with certainty that from now on I am under the control of others. From today onwards you shall think only about accomplishing the welfare of sentient beings and not about other things such as accomplishing only the purpose of self.'

Having presented the need to exchange self with others and to engage in the practice of cherishing others, the text reprimands one to be really mindful. Once one has committed to cherishing other sentient beings more than oneself, then one puts oneself in the service of others, allowing one to be under their control. Here it is suggesting pointing the finger at oneself, saying, From today onwards I shall only think about accomplishing the welfare of sentient beings and not about other things such as accomplishing only the purpose of self. The advice here does not suggest going around instructing others, but rather taking this practice upon oneself. It is about adopting this mindset and making the resolve oneself to serve other sentient beings. This is really a pith instruction for bodhisattvas' practice, so we need to be inspired to follow the example here and put it into practice as much as we can. When we take this advice as personal instruction, it serves its purpose: it becomes meaningful by enhancing one's practice of compassion.

The points presented here again emphasise how one should integrate Dharma practice in one's own mind. If the practice is left on one side, and oneself on the other side, then one falls short of really utilising what is being presented here.

3.2.1.1.2.2. Stopping wrong actions upon having done the exchange

Having made a resolve to exchange oneself with others, one needs to back that up by stopping all wrong actions. This is what is being presented next.

138. It is unsuitable to accomplish the welfare of self

With eyes and the like that belong to others.

It is unsuitable to mistreat them with the eyes

And the like that are for their purpose.

If one dedicates oneself as a servant for sentient beings then it is unsuitable to use one's eyes and the like to mistreat them. It is unsuitable to look angrily at sentient beings with the eyes that belong to them or to use these eyes to achieve only one's own welfare. One needs to achieve their purpose.

Since it is unsuitable to mistreat sentient beings with eyes and the like that belong to them, if one recognises that one mistreats them with the three doors, one needs to restrain oneself again and again upon contemplating the faults.

As the commentary explains, after having exchanged self with others, one needs to dedicate oneself to being a servant of sentient beings. This is in line with comments I have made on Wednesday night that, as far as my motivation is concerned, I see myself as someone who is in the service of you, the listeners. While I may be sitting up here on the throne, as far as my motivation and attitude are concerned, I am down there with you, serving you. We can see that Shantideva is emphasising this point here.

When one has entrusted oneself as a servant to other sentient beings, one should not mistreat them, for example, by looking inappropriately at them: it is unsuitable to look angrily at sentient beings with the eyes that belong to them. In other words, having dedicated oneself to benefiting others, one does not use one's eyes to give them dirty looks, or use one's limbs, arms or legs to make inappropriate gestures, by hitting, pushing or kicking others and so forth. If one has taken to heart the commitment to cherish other sentient beings, these ways of mistreating others are totally inappropriate.

Instead, one should use one's eyes to only look compassionately and gently upon others. As mentioned in one of the earlier verses, the mere sight of other sentient beings should immediately cause one to recall that 'it is by this very sentient being that I shall become enlightened'. Shantideva mentions how when one sees other sentient beings one should look upon them with a compassionate attitude. If we are not careful, when we have a disagreement with someone or when someone happens to pass by, it is easy to give them a dirty look or make an inappropriate gesture. We need to be mindful of this. As the commentary continues, when one recognises one has mistreated them with the three doors – that is through one's physical actions, one's speech or one's mind – at that time one should restrain oneself again and again upon contemplating the faults. This is how we need to guard our three doors.

While not mentioned here specifically, mistreating others occurs when we engage in any of the ten non-virtues, so a succinct way to remember how to guard our three doors is to restrain oneself from the ten non-virtues – such as not engaging in covetousness, harmful intention or harbouring wrong views, in relation to the mind. Whenever one notices any of these states of mind arising, one should recognise it and restrain oneself.

It is good to note again the difference between restraint and protection. When any of one's three doors are already engaged in a harmful activity, one needs to apply restraint. Protection, on the other hand, means not allowing one's mind to go towards that negativity from the very beginning. As the text on moral conduct, the Vinaya explains, among the restraints, restraining one's mind is supreme, because when one restrains one's mind, one naturally refrains from all the non-virtues of body and speech. When one is not able to restrain one's mind, one finds oneself engaging in physical and verbal misdeeds.

To give an illustration, if one is unable to restrain one's mind from the influence of anger, due to that angry mind one would not hesitate to use harmful speech against others, hit, or even kill them. However, if, from the very beginning, one doesn't allow the anger to dominate the mind, this will naturally protect one from verbal and physical misdeeds. When we derive the essence of the text, we can then find ways to put that meaning into practice.

3.2.1.1.2.3. Practising faultlessly

139. Then, having to put sentient beings first,

Whatever is observable on one's body

By stealing from it

One uses it for the benefit of others.

For this reason, having to put the purpose of sentient beings first, one views without forgetfulness the food, clothing and others that one observes on one's body by stealing from it - that is giving up grasping at these objects as mine, one uses them for their benefit, as a servant would use the food, clothing and other resources of the master.

As the commentary explains, after one has made the resolve to serve other sentient beings, whatever one normally uses them for to sustain one's body such as food, clothing and the like, as if stealing from one's own body, one uses it only to serve other sentient beings. As the commentary further clarifies, this means giving up grasping at these objects as 'mine'. So while one still needs to use resources, one uses it with the attitude that it is for the purpose of other sentient beings. For example, when the servants of a king partake of the clothing, food and so forth that are provided to them by the king, they have no sense that they own those things. The servants' food and so forth are provided to sustain them as a way to further serve the king. Likewise, when we partake of food and so forth, we need to do so with the attitude that this is a means to serve sentient beings. Even offering one's food and drink is in line with what is being explained here, keeping the attitude always that one is nourishing oneself in order to serve other sentient beings.

The advice presented here is very beneficial, even in everyday life. If we were able to really have consideration for others, always engage in appropriate gestures in relation to them, and always see oneself as their servant, then from one's own side one will only be engaged in positive interactions. There is no doubt this will create the basis for good relationships and good communication with others.

Of course, there are times when in spite of engaging in the means to benefit others, they are still not happy and may show a lack of respect, appreciation and even distance themselves from one. However although they harbour such attitudes, if one actually puts this advice into practice then at least from one's own side one will not have done anything wrong, and there is no reason for one to feel bad. So regardless of how others treat you, if you engage in the practice as presented here, it makes one's life really meaningful.

I have heard that some couples make agreements to treat the other as 'number one'; some even demand the other 'you have to treat me as number one'. If both sides treated the other as number one, then that would be a good mutual relationship. But if one demands the other to treat them as number one, but in return they don't treat the other as number one, then that is not fair. The main point here is that if there is mutual concern, where both treat the other as a priority, a benefit can be derived.

Indeed, we can see many instances of those who take the initiative to go beyond their own selfish needs and think about others. Some parents have commented that one of their children always shares with others and has concern for others. That child is naturally seen as being very considerate and good. Within families, we can see those who have consideration for other members of the family and have genuine concern about the others' welfare; a family member takes the initiative for the well-being of the family as a whole, whereas others are always thinking about their own selfish needs. Even in worldly society, when someone is seen as selfish and only thinking of themselves, they are not held in high esteem. So we can see that the advice presented here relates to everyday life as well.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

17 May 2016

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayer, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

The hallmark of having meditated on exchanging self and other is that the love and compassion in our heart increases. So it is good to check as to how effective the practice has been by gauging how much love and compassion has increased.

While there are subtler levels of suffering that one can focus on, in general it is obvious how sentient beings are experiencing great suffering and are deprived of happiness. Not bearing to see sentient beings deprived of happiness and wishing them to be happy is what is called love, and not being able to bear sentient beings' suffering and wishing them to be free from suffering is compassion. Meditating again and again on cultivating these attitudes, and thus familiarising one's mind with them, brings about a real transformation in one's mind.

When one realises how, despite developing this noble wish, sentient beings are still continuing to lack happiness and experience suffering, a deep sense of personal responsibility for establishing them in happiness and freeing them from suffering begins to develop. One sees that it is crucial to take up the responsibility for establishing sentient beings in ultimate happiness and freeing them from all suffering, because merely wishing them to be happy and free from suffering has not brought about any change to their situation.

For that mind of taking personal responsibility to generate spontaneously, one needs to have first familiarised one's mind with the development of love and compassion. This means meditating again and again on love and compassion, and acquainting oneself with these states of mind. Without first familiarising oneself with love and compassion, the initiative to take on the responsibility for leading all beings to happiness and freeing them from all suffering will not arise.

The most supreme method for enhancing love and compassion is the technique of giving and taking, which is the meditation practice we have just engaged in. Familiarising ourselves with this practice means meditating on giving and taking again and again. Without familiarising and acquainting ourselves with the wish to give, for example, we won't be able to give. Even though we may have the ability to do so, what prevents us from giving is the lack of familiarity with the mind of giving. Similarly, taking the suffering of others upon oneself is also based on familiarising one's mind with that practice. Even if we have the ability to take responsibility to help others to be free from suffering, if we don't do so it is because we lack that familiarity. So familiarising one's mind again and again with the practice of giving and taking is essential.

Indeed, the practice of giving and taking is really the core practice of the bodhisattvas. It is through acquaintance with this practice that one enhances and strengthens the mind of love and compassion to the point of taking on the personal responsibility for bringing happiness to others, and removing their suffering. Then one will be able to develop what is called the superior intention, which is the mind developed just prior to generating actual bodhicitta.

If, after having meditated on the seven-point cause and effect sequence, one has not yet developed the superior intention, then by engaging in the practice of giving and taking, one will definitely be able to develop this mind. As this is such a powerful practice to benefit others, we can see why it is a core practice of bodhisattvas.

From the very outset the very purpose or goal of meditating on the seven-point cause and effect sequence is to benefit other sentient beings, i.e. to free them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness. That goal is then further enhanced throughout the developmental stages of the awakening mind.

On a personal level it is important to try to gauge whether our practice has produced any fruit, and the extent to which an unbiased love and compassion towards all beings has developed. As we develop our practice we need to further strengthen it, not leaving it at a mere wish. Rather than just wishing, for example, 'it would be nice if I could do the giving and taking practice', it means really developing the sentiment 'I need to be fully taking on that responsibility' from the depths of one's heart. That is the key point.

An example of the difference between a mere wish to practise, and the actual practice is, for example, gauged by our reaction when seeing someone who is deprived of food and who is really hungry. If you have the ability to help alleviate such a person's immediate suffering of hunger by giving them some food, but do not actually take the initiative to do so, then although you may wish them to be free from the suffering of hunger, you have not actually put that wish into practice. That would be a clear sign that your practice has remained mere words, and that you have not really taken it to heart.

This may appear to be a very simple practice. However it is at this level initially that we need to begin our practise. At our level now we don't have the ability to engage in high-level practices like the bodhisattvas, who are able to give away their flesh, their blood and their bodies to others. But we do have the ability to practise giving food to those who are hungry.

Having attempted to meditate on love and compassion, and engage in the practice of giving and taking, it is reasonable to ask whether there has been any actual transformation taking place within our minds. One way to gauge whether a transformation has taken place would be to look at whether our attitudes have changed. For example, prior to our attempts to engage in developing love and compassion, when we saw a disagreeable person experiencing difficulties or undergoing some sort of suffering, we might have spontaneously thought 'Oh, that serves them right. They deserve to suffer'. Rather than wishing for them to be free from suffering, we added on more suffering in the sense of thinking that it serves them right.

Likewise when a disagreeable person lacked happiness we would have felt that it served them right, and that they were not entitled to any happiness. So rather than wishing others to be established in happiness, we wanted them to lack happiness, and rather than wishing for the other to be free from suffering we might have even wished them to experience more suffering. This is the extent of the negative mind and attitude that we might have harboured previously.

Having then taken the initiative to voluntarily engage in the practice of developing love and compassion one focusses on all beings in an unbiased manner, seeing them equally deserving happiness, and to be free from suffering. One meditates on this point and familiarises oneself with it again and again. The hallmark of this practice having taken effect is when we see that same disagreeable person suffering later on, we feel 'Oh, how wonderful it would be if they would be free from this misfortune or suffering'. And when we see those who are deprived of happiness, we begin to feel how unfortunate it is that they lack happiness, and how wonderful it would be if they could be established in happiness.

When that attitude arises readily, then that is the true sign that a transformation has taken place. At our level we are not yet able to actually generate bodhicitta. However, through familiarity we can definitely acquaint our mind with love and compassion, and develop that to the point of sincerely wishing others to be happy and free from suffering. That is such a wonderful state of mind to be in, and such a radical change from our earlier ways of thinking.

Developing such a mind of unbiased love and compassion towards others, wishing them to be endowed in happiness and free from suffering, regardless of who they are – whether they are disagreeable, or an object of earlier disagreements – will definitely bring great benefit to both oneself and others.

So whilst we have not yet developed the awakening mind of bodhicitta, this incredibly positive transformation of our previous attitude to one of unbiased love and compassion is a very sound foundation for developing bodhicitta. It is good to keep this mind.

When we really think about the benefits of developing such attitudes we can unhesitatingly accept that love and compassion is the root of all happiness, and that it is the very essence of one's life.

In terms of happiness in the world in general, at a societal level and within a community, love and compassion is definitely the basis for true wellbeing. The person who has a mind of love for others will not have any intention to harm others, because the intention to harm cannot arise when there is love for others. Without such an attitude one could defiantly harm others, but when there is true love and compassion, the attitude of harming others cannot arise. The only thought that would arise would be the wish to benefit them. When that attitude is prevalent, how could there be harm and violence in a community?

We need to constantly check the extent to which our love and compassion has developed and increased. With this habit of investigating and employing constant vigilance over our state of mind, our practice will stabilise and become more durable. By practising in his way we are also securing our own happiness. As I've regularly emphasised, the consequence of losing love and compassion is equivalent to the loss of our own happiness. It would be pitiful if we allowed that to happen.

Maintaining a genuine sense of wellbeing and happiness is directly related to generating love and compassion, and then maintaining and further enhancing that love and compassion. This practice will be really meaningful because it is done with logic and reason through tested experiences. Then we will have utilised our intelligence and wisdom appropriately.

If one doesn't utilise one's intelligence to further enhance love and compassion as a basis for one's own happiness and for the wellbeing for others, then our intelligence will not only have gone to waste but could potentially even be harmful. So we need to pay careful attention to this.

Leaving aside the importance of love and compassion on a large scale, we can see the consequences for a couple when love and compassion weakens. That is when harmful intentions start to develop. It may start slowly with bickering and hurting each other with words and so forth, but as that love and compassion and genuine concern further declines, then more extensive harm starts to occur.

3.2.1.1. EXPLAINING THE WAY OF EXCHANGING SELF AND OTHER

3.2.1.1.2. Brief summary

3.2.1.1.2.3. Practising faultlessly (cont.)

Now we need to come back to the text, otherwise we will not cover much of it.

The following explanations give very precise instructions on how to engage in this practice of exchanging self and other. The commentary on verse 139 reads:

For this reason, having to put the purpose of sentient beings first, one views without forgetfulness the food, clothing and others that one observes on one's body by stealing from it - that is giving up grasping at these objects as mine, one uses them for their benefit, as a servant would use the food, clothing and other resources of the master.

The commentary meticulously explains how to put love and compassion into practice for the reasons that have been presented earlier. For the purpose of putting sentient beings first, one views without forgetfulness the food, clothing, and resources one uses for one's body by stealing from it. [Other translations use the word 'snatching' instead of stealing.] As the commentary explains, stealing or snatching from the body means giving up grasping at these objects as mine. So one develops the mind of giving up grasping at these objects, one's resources and so forth, which are used to sustain one's body as 'mine', and uses them for the benefit of other sentient beings.

Reflecting on these passages is really a form of meditation, and will really help the mind to settle down. I guarantee that if you are in a disturbed state of mind, then contemplating these points will help to settle down your mind, and pacify it. It is good to sit down at times to read the text, and reflect on its meaning.

3.2.1.2. THE WAY OF FOLLOWING UP IN THOUGHT

The earlier verses have indicated the necessity of practising exchanging self with other. Having reached the point of actually practising exchanging self with other, this next section explains how to follow it up in thought.

This section is divided into two:

- 3.2.1.2.1. Indicating
- 3.2.1.2.2. Explaining

3.2.1.2.1. Indicating

The verse relating to this is:

*140. Having made those lower and the like into self
And having made self into others,
With a mind free of discursive thoughts
Meditate on jealousy, competitiveness and pride.*

The commentary explains:

Bodhisattvas focus on other sentient beings that are lower, equal and superior and take them as self and hold the self as other. Having thus exchanged the focus of grasping at self and others, one should induce certainty and meditate, if the meditating bodhisattva's name is Devadatta, with a mind free from doubting discursive thoughts on jealousy for Devadatta, competitiveness if equal and pride if lower.

As presented here, bodhisattvas focus on other sentient beings that are lower, equal and superior and take them as self and hold the self as other. Basically the practice that is being presented here is a way to overcome these faulty states of mind of jealousy, a sense of competitiveness, and pride.

When the bodhisattvas engage in practice they use every means and method to apply antidotes to counteract such faulty or negative states of mind. What is being presented here is how to use occasions where one actually feels jealous as a means to overcome jealousy. Likewise, with using occasions when competitiveness arises as an opportunity to apply an antidote for overcoming a sense of competitiveness, and using occasions where pride arises, to apply an appropriate antidote to overcome the negative or faulty state of mind of pride.

Jealousy is a mind that is unhappy about the success of others, unable to bear seeing success, good qualities and achievements of others. With equals, there's a sense of competitiveness where one feels uncomfortable when one's equals are doing better, or there is a sense of, 'I should be better than them'. With those who are lower or inferior to oneself in some field, one has a sense of pride, and feelings of contempt for them. These are really faulty states of mind that are the causes of negativity. The implication here is that we need to apply antidotes to overcome these faulty states of mind.

The commentary also presents an illustration of how to counteract these three faulty states of mind. To counteract jealousy, one engages in the practice of putting oneself in the place of the other, and assuming the higher place. To overcome the mind of contempt and pride over those who are lower, one places oneself in the lower state. So exchanging one's own position with the object of the deluded thought is the way of counteracting these negative states of mind: if it is jealousy of one who is higher, then putting oneself in that state; if it is contempt for the lower, then taking the lower position oneself; and it's the same with competitiveness i.e. exchanging oneself with the other.

Of course there's no room for these negative states in the minds of actual bodhisattvas. That's because they've already engaged in the practice of seeing the faults of such negative states of mind. When the bodhisattvas were in the early stage of their practices, if there was even the slightest hint of jealousy they were able to immediately recognise that, and immediately see the shortcomings of jealousy, which counteracted that jealousy. Likewise there is not much room for pride to arise in a bodhisattva's mind. At early stages of their practice if there was the slightest chance for pride to arise, they were able to apply the methods and means to immediately counteract and overcome this negative state of mind.

Of course the practices presented here are for trainees on the bodhisattva path.

3.2.1.2.2. Explaining

Explaining is subdivided into four:

- 3.2.1.2.2.1. The way of meditating on jealousy for the higher
- 3.2.1.2.2.2. The way of meditating on competitiveness for the equal
- 3.2.1.2.2.3. The way of meditating on pride for the lower
- 3.2.1.2.2.4. The results of the meditation

3.2.1.2.2.1. The way of meditating on jealousy for the higher

The way of meditating on jealousy for the higher is subdivided into two:

- 3.2.1.2.2.1.1. The way of meditating
- 3.2.1.2.2.1.2. The way of practise after the meditation

3.2.1.2.2.1.1. The way of meditating

This is how we need to meditate on jealousy. The relevant lines of verse read:

*141. He is praised but I am not,
We do not find gain like him,
He is praised but I am criticised,
He is happy but I have suffering,*

*142ab. I have to do the work
While he abides happily;*

Then the commentary explains:

When the bodhisattva Devadatta meditates on exchanging self and other, Devadatta is praised by others, but having taken sentient beings as self, one is of lower qualities and will not be praised. One does not find necessities for happiness in the same way as Devadatta and although the bodhisattva Devadatta is praised, we sentient beings, are criticised. He is happy and we sentient beings have suffering. We have to do the work of carrying, but Devadatta abides happily.

This is a clear explanation of how jealousy is developed in the mind when another is praised, such as when Devadatta is praised by others. Having taken sentient beings as self, one is of lower qualities and will not be praised, refers to feeling jealous because we, oneself and others, are not praised. Another example is when the other finds the necessities for happiness, and we sentient beings are criticised.

We are jealous because he is happy and we sentient beings have suffering. We have to do the work of carrying, but Devadatta abides happily. Jealousy develops from thinking, 'How come they get all the good things? That's not fair!'

When we see how jealousy arises, we can see that just avoiding such states of mind overcomes jealousy, and thus it serves as an antidote for overcoming jealousy. This presentation also applies to the way in which pride is developed; the same contemplation also counteracts pride very effectively.

While these are analogies of how jealousy and so forth arise, they do not apply to actual bodhisattvas. Rather they are part of training in how to counteract jealousy and so forth.

The remaining lines of verse presented under this heading are:

- 142cd. *He is great in the world
But I am known for my lack of qualities.
- 143. *What should one do without qualities?
We are all endowed with qualities.
There are those that are lower than him
And there are those with regard to whom I am higher.

The commentary then explains:

This bodhisattva is greatly renowned in the transitory worlds for his ethics, listening and so forth, but I am known for inferiority and a lack of qualities. Through effort you achieved qualities but what should we, the sentient beings without qualities, do? We sentient beings shall all practise to become endowed with qualities.

That we are low and he is high is posited relative to each other. Thus there are occasions in relation to others with superior qualities that these bodhisattvas are inferior, and there are occasions in relation to the other inferior sentient beings that I am superior. Therefore there is no need for us sentient beings to be discouraged and we should practise with effort for complete enlightenment. One should meditate on holding others as self, by thinking in this way.

The first part of the commentary indicates that this bodhisattva is greatly renowned in the transitory worlds for his ethics, listening and so forth. The jealous mind thinks, 'Oh, this bodhisattva is renowned for his ethics and his learning and so forth, but I'm only known as inferior and lacking qualities'. Through effort you achieved qualities but what should we, the sentient beings without qualities do? is a lamentation: 'We don't have any qualities, so we are shunned'. One way to overcome such sentiment is to think that if we sentient beings practise, we will all become endowed with qualities.

The earlier part of the commentary is a presentation of an attitude that can wear you down. You feel, 'Oh, he's so renowned, and I don't have any qualities', and when you think in that way then your mind becomes weighed down by a lack of confidence and so forth. The line we sentient beings shall all practise to become endowed with qualities, shows us that as we have the ability we can gain qualities. This is a sentiment that will uplift the mind and make it courageous.

As a way of overcoming a mind concerned about him being high and me being low the commentary says, we are low and he is high is posited relative to each other. This presentation shows us that, there is, in fact, no ultimate high position, and no ultimate low position. What is considered as being high or low is all relative to each other. That is the main point here. As specifically explained here, because it is relative, there are occasions in relation to others with superior qualities that these bodhisattvas are inferior, and likewise, there are occasions in relation to the other inferior sentient beings where I am superior.

Therefore there is no need for sentient beings to be discouraged and we should practise with effort for complete enlightenment. This is followed by the conclusion that, one should meditate on holding others as self, by thinking in this way.

This section has dealt with the qualities of hearing, listening, learning, and so forth. Next comes this hypothetical argument:

Argument: You are lower than the bodhisattva Devadatta due to degenerated ethics and view.

Having indicated ways of overcoming feelings of despondency because others have other higher qualities, this hypothetical argument relates to the thought, 'Oh, I'm still lower than the bodhisattva Devadatta due to degenerated ethics and view. His ethics and view are so much better, and that's why I'm lower'. In response to this, these two lines of verse are presented:

- 144ab. *Ethics, view and faults
Are out of our control as they are powered by the afflictions.

The commentary answers the hypothetical question saying:

Answer: The degenerated ethics and view, faults due to lifestyle and so forth, i.e., degenerated view and action, are due to the power of the adventitious mental afflictions and not faults I created purposely under my own power.

As explained here very precisely, degenerated ethics i.e. behaviour and so forth and faulty view, faults due to lifestyle and so forth, are due to the power of the adventitious mental afflictions and not faults I created purposely under my own power. We need to remind ourselves of these essential points again and again in relation to both others and ourselves. It is not the individual being who is at fault, rather the faults are due to the influence of the mental afflictions. It is the afflictions that are at the fault rather than the individual person, whether it is oneself or others.

This is in line with the explanation in Aryadeva's Four Hundred Verses where it indicates that the Buddha does not see other individual beings as faulty; rather he sees the delusions within their mind as the fault. These are essential points. When one reprimands oneself one needs to understand that, 'It is due to the delusions in my mind that I'm engaging in such negative behaviours, or holding faulty views. So if I overcome these delusions, then all will be rectified, and all will be good.

It is, of course, due to delusions that we engage in behaviour that is clearly harmful to ourselves and others. No-one with any intelligence wants to engage in behaviours and acts that are clearly harmful. Yet, uncontrollably, we still engage in such actions or deeds because of the strong influence of the delusions.

When the delusions are overcome then such negative behaviours and faulty views will all naturally subside. The point here is that it is within our own hands: if we do not want to experience the consequences of ill-behaviours and faulty views, then we need to overcome the delusions. Then the negative consequences will pass us by.

The emphasis here is on the power of the adventitious mental afflictions. The Tibetan word lu-pur-wa - translated here as adventitious - has the connotation that it arises intermittently or occasionally. So by implication these mental afflictions are not permanent, i.e. due to certain conditions they arise, but when the conditions are not met they are not there. Thus, because they arise occasionally, they are not a permanent entity of the mind and can be totally removed.

Amongst several analogies presented in Maitreya's *Uttaratantra*¹, one is that the delusions are like clouds in the sky, in that they arise occasionally and are thus adventitious. Proof that the clouds are not a permanent entity of the sky is seen when the wind blows the clouds away, and the real entity of a clear and blue sky becomes evident.

Another analogy to illustrate that the delusions are adventitious that is presented in the same text, is that they are like murky water. If the particles of the dirt that make the water appear murky were to be one with the entity of water, then they would be inseparable, and the murky water will always remain murky. However the fact that the dirt particles are adventitious means that after some time the dirt settles down, and the water becomes clear.

The delusions are adventitious in the sense that they are not intrinsically one with the mind; they arise due to certain causes and conditions. The main point is that the delusions can be separated from the mind, and therefore the mind can be freed from the delusions.

A contemporary analogy is desalination projects, which are possible because of the fact that salt can be separated from seawater. If the salt and water were not separable then there could be no such projects. I have heard that desalination is quite expensive. The point of the analogy is that if salt and seawater were one entity then the water and salt could not be separated. Likewise, if the delusions were of one entity with the mind then they could not be separated from the mind, and one would always be affected by them.

The main point here is that mental afflictions are adventitious, which means that they can be separated from our mind.

Based on the motivation we generated during the Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer, we can now engage in the meditation practice without being distracted.

[meditation]

We can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings based on the bodhicitta attitude, which in essence is to engage in the teaching for the sole benefit of other sentient beings.

3.2.1.2.2.1.2. The way of practising after the meditation

This part of the commentary follows earlier explanations that identified the kind of thoughts that constitute jealousy, competitiveness and pride etc. to show how a bodhisattva uses the exchange of self with other to apply antidotes to these thoughts when they arise. We need to take this as personal instruction, as harbouring negative states when associating with others and feeling jealous or competitive or proud, which is feeling contempt for others, makes oneself unhappy and others uncomfortable. Therefore, since there are no redeeming qualities in such negative states of mind, we definitely need to find a way to overcome them. The methods presented here are not difficult to understand, or even to adopt, as a way to counteract negative states of mind. When the teachings present the way to counteract such negative states of mind so simply and clearly, if we don't apply them how else will we ever overcome these negative states of mind? What other methods can we hope to find?

We need to take heed of this advice to find the means to counteract negative states of mind because of the distress they cause to oneself and others. When negative states of mind have been clearly identified within oneself it is a matter of applying the antidotes to overcome them. For example, jealousy is a mind unhappy with others' success; competitiveness is a mind unhappy when others do well with the wish to compete with them, and pride is a mind where one feels one is better than others and condemns them. It makes us uncomfortable when others harbour such negative feelings towards us, so we need to take the initiative to overcome our negative feelings as a way for others not to feel uncomfortable around us. It clearly causes discomfort in one's immediate surroundings and with one's associates. In a community or a workplace, there are many who lament that they feel uncomfortable because a colleague is jealous of them or is competing with them. When others act out of jealousy towards us, it means that they are unhappy with our status or whatever good deeds we may be engaged in. They are jealous because they are unhappy with our success, and a sense of competitiveness also arises. Those who complain that they feel uncomfortable when others express such feelings or attitudes should check whether they themselves have such sentiments towards others. When we ourselves think that others are making us feel uncomfortable, it is good to actually check within ourselves: Am I holding such negative attitudes or not?

We need to understand that putting this advice into practice is a way to avoid causing trouble for others, or hurting others. On top of that, if one can benefit them, then it becomes a practice in line with the deeds of a bodhisattva. So while these are presented as practices for bodhisattvas, if one engages in positive deeds with the attitude of benefiting others, combined with bodhicitta - the mind of enlightenment - then a practice such as generosity becomes a deed of a bodhisattva similitude. When one practises morality combined with the bodhicitta attitude, it becomes a similitude of a bodhisattva deed. Likewise, even reciting a mantra such as OM MANI PADME HUM, combined with the attitude of bodhicitta, becomes a similitude of a bodhisattva deed. The deeds of a bodhisattva have been explained extensively in the earlier part of the text. In summary, it is positive deeds such as practising the six perfections combined with the attitude of the awakening mind. Thus, we need to understand that to be inspired to engage in a bodhisattva's deeds, one needs to secure the bodhicitta attitude in one's mind.

When others express negative attitudes toward us, such as jealousy, we should see the faults and not be affected by it, and also take the initiative to overcome it within ourselves. We clearly need to recognise the faults of jealousy and how jealousy affects us, knowing that from beginningless time this attitude has created negative deeds that have propelled us into cyclic existence again and again. When others express such negative attitudes towards us, having clearly seen it as a fault within us, we should find the antidote within ourselves.

This becomes the means to understand that the other is also blinded by the fact of not recognising the faults of jealousy, and how jealousy harms their own mind. When one sees that, rather than their jealous mind harming oneself, one feels compassion for the other knowing that harbouring such negative attitudes only harms themselves. Thus, rather than retaliating and being upset, one can feel compassion for them. This is how we need to engage in the practice in order to derive the real benefit. As mentioned earlier, these are not obscure practices but something which is really possible, and which changes one's attitude. I personally find these practices meaningful. They are very positive states of mind that I try to make part of my normal way of thinking to counteract negative states of mind. It definitely benefits my mind. I find that practising in such ways lessens negative states of mind within myself, and brings a great sense of joy and happiness within my mind. I don't feel any urge or need to go out of my way to cause others trouble. So while it benefits me, it also prevents me from hurting and causing trouble for others, so there is benefit all round. As the great master Atisha mentioned, the best quality is to benefit others. Thus, benefiting others is the best quality that one could ever have. This is very succinct and profound advice; indeed when one engages in any ways or means to benefit others, one is practising true Dharma. This is good to keep in mind.

The first two lines in the verse read:

144ab. Ethics, view and faults

the afflictions.*

I emphasised in our last session that we can apply this knowledge to the very crucial points being presented here – how not to see one's faults as a condemnation but rather arising due to the afflictions within oneself – to others' faults as well. These are meticulously explained.

Keep these points in mind when the mind is entangled with self-loathing and self-guilt. All this can be overcome by recognising that it is the delusions that are at fault, not oneself as an individual person. This is really profound advice on how to feel courageous, as a way to combat the delusions and not to see oneself as the enemy and beating oneself up. One must understand the crucial point of what causes the real trouble and identify these afflictions. As the teachings state, these are out of our control as they are powered afflictions: when we are dominated by them it is as if we have temporarily lost control over our own mind; and this is indeed the case. The Buddha said that, 'an uncontrolled mind is an unhappy mind' the reverse of which is, a controlled mind is a happy mind. When one has control over one's own mind, specifically control over the afflictions, they don't dominate one's mind and thinking, so one definitely has a happy state of mind. This is meticulous advice and something we need to try and apply in our own life. That is what I am encouraging you to do.

This is the second year we have been studying the very profound text The Bodhisattva's Way of Life from the beginning. This has such great, profound advice for you who have been coming regularly, paying attention, and working hard to try and understand the teachings. I am not saying that I am really skilled in presenting the material, but I have shared whatever understanding I have with the best motivation. With our combined efforts we have definitely worked hard in covering and studying this text. So now if we were to apply some of this advice and put it into practice then that would have made it really worthwhile. Of course, just coming along, listening to the teachings and studying the text itself has been incredibly virtuous. Understanding this is a great way to implant positive imprints in our mind, so it is definitely a deed to rejoice in. But, the main thing is to try and put it into practice, as this is how we derive the real benefit from the teachings. What I am also saying is that I rejoice in your great attentiveness in listening to the teachings.

This is a way to confirm with you that I only rejoice and feel great joy for all the understanding you may have gained. I need to say this, lest there be occasions where one might wonder if the teacher is starting to feel jealous of the understanding one has gained. As a teacher, there is danger for such feelings to occur, so it is important to guard one's own mind. I can definitely assure you that I don't feel any jealousy at all for your understanding, I only feel great joy and happiness. The more you gain understanding and are able to practice, the more joy and happiness it gives me.

3.2.1.2.1.2. The way of practise after the meditation

[Familiarity would be a more specific term in this case.] So far the focus has been on how to familiarise your mind with overcoming negative states such as jealousy, competitiveness and pride. The text next explains how to practise after that familiarisation.

The last two lines of the earlier verse and the next verse are presented:

144cd. *I need to be restored as much as possible,
And I also need to accept harm.*

145. *However, I am not helped by him,
So why does he criticise me?
What are his qualities doing for me?
And he has qualities!*

The commentary clearly explains the meaning:

'Bodhisattva Devadatta, if you have compassion, then you have to work as much as possible to repair my faults and I need to accept the harm of the austerities to establishing qualities, then why does he even criticise us? What are the qualities of that bodhisattva doing for me? Even though the bodhisattva Devadatta himself has qualities, they have no benefit for us sentient beings.

As a way to further familiarise oneself, using the example of a bodhisattva called Devadatta who places himself as other, the commentary explains if you have compassion, then you have to work as much as possible to repair my faults. The faults refer to the degeneration of ethics or the degeneration of views. If you have compassion, implies that rather than merely criticising, you should be working to repair the faults of degenerate ethics and views within me. Likewise, if out of compassion you make genuine attempts to repair my faults, from my side I will accept the harm or difficulties of the austere practices to establish the qualities. For example, there might be occasions where you have to reprimand a person with scolding to prevent them from doing something negative. This is an example of harm or difficult austere practices to repair those faults. What is presented here is that, when out of compassion, certain means and methods are used to point out one's faults, one should make the promise to willingly accept them, because if one does not there will be no way to correct one's faults. This sheds light on how a teacher would guide a student, showing the means by which it is done out of compassion. When a student is willing to accept and learn through stern measures, they see the hardships as a way to get rid of faults and gain more positive personal qualities; there has to be mutual effort put in. From the teacher's side there is genuine effort out of compassion, but the student must bear some difficulties and hardships to acquire the qualities. Nothing can be acquired without putting in some effort. This is another point to understand.

Engaging in the practice this way becomes the means to achieve enduring patience of definitely thinking about the Dharma. This type of patience is required when engaging in austere Dharma practices where one encounters hardships and difficulties. In willingly accepting and enduring those difficulties, understanding that they are only for one's betterment, one generates the mind of patience.

As the commentary further explains, If we sentient beings do not come into the benefit of having our faults repaired by Devadatta, then why does he even criticise us? This is saying that if his qualities are not used to benefit us then what use are they?

In other words, if your qualities and compassion are not used to benefit us, then why even criticise us? This implies that if words are not said out of compassion, as a means to benefit, then it may just as well be critical remarks. In summary, the essence of the practice is that if we cannot benefit others then at least we should not harm them. The commentary goes on with, what are the qualities of a bodhisattva doing for me, implying that if they are not applied as a means to benefit one, then what use are those qualities? Even though the bodhisattva Devadatta himself has qualities, they have no benefit for us sentient beings implies that when there are actual good qualities, then they should be used to benefit others in the best possible way, rather than feeling contempt for others and so forth.

The next verse reads:

146. He that does not have compassion

*For migrators abiding in poisonous bad migrations,
Purposely wishes to outdo those proficient
Out of exaggerated qualities.*

The commentary explains:

Further, this Devadatta, who has no compassion for the migrators in the lower realms, who are like being held in the mouth of poisonous snakes and ferocious animals, due to degenerated ethics and views, not only does he not benefit us sentient beings, but he purposely wishes to outdo us proficient sentient beings out of his exaggerated view of his own qualities. It is inappropriate to exaggerate and criticise.

Having placed the mind on sentient beings and taken oneself, the bodhisattva, as others, contemplate that it is unsuitable for him to harm oneself.

Again relating to Devadatta as another, the commentary explains the need of compassion for migrators in the lower realms, who are like being held in the mouth of poisonous snakes and ferocious animals. The plight of samsara is illustrated with the grave situation where the danger of perishing from either a poisonous bite or being eaten by ferocious animals is prominent. At any moment one could be captured by their fangs of death. If beings are in the lower realms this is all due to degenerated ethics and views, so by understanding that, when Devadatta (oneself as another) does not benefit us, and criticises us and tries to outdo us with his own exaggerated view of his own qualities, that is totally inappropriate. The point being emphasised is that if one exaggerates one's own qualities and feels contempt for others and criticises them, then there is no worth whatsoever in those qualities.

To summarise this point, Gyaltsab Je concludes:

Having placed the mind on sentient beings and taken oneself, the bodhisattva, as others, contemplate that it is unsuitable for him to harm oneself.

He is emphasising here that having engaged in the practice of exchanging self with other, placing oneself as other and others as oneself, then harming others would be like harming oneself, which is unsuitable. When one places oneself as another, then one could not initiate harm to the other, for that would be like harming oneself.

3.2.1.2.2.2. The way of meditating on competitiveness for the equal

This is subdivided into four:

3.2.1.2.2.2.1. Competing for gain and praise

3.2.1.2.2.2.2. Competing for renown of qualities

3.2.1.2.2.2.3. Competing for the number of qualities

3.2.1.2.2.2.4. Being happy about bringing harm to others

3.2.1.2.2.2.1. Competing for gain and praise

This again is another common fault. What needs to be clarified here is that while a sense of competitiveness is seen as a negative attitude, looking up to others as a role model is a virtue. Here in Australia there is emphasis on the need to have a good role model to inspire oneself. From the Dharma point of view, the Sangha Jewel would be the role models we'd see as exemplary, and also who we'd wish to follow in terms of study and practice etc. Using a contemporary context like academic study, the role models would be those who have gone through all the stages of study and reached proficiency, and who may have good academic careers. These people would be role models in their area of study for those trying to attain a similar sort of achievement.

Another illustration would be if one has a good friend who is doing very well in their studies, and one started to feel like one should put more time and energy into one's own study, just like one's friend, then this is not an instance of feeling competitive, it is using the friend as a role model.

Competitiveness arises when one feels one should be better than one's equals on the same level. This sort of attitude, of wanting to do better than the other, is a sense of competitiveness, which is the non-virtue being presented here.

The main point is to differentiate between seeing others as a role model - and a way to inspire one's study and practice, which is fine - and competitiveness, which is the sense of wanting to be better than them.

The verse reads:

*147. Looking at those equal to me,
To be superior
I thoroughly establish
Our gain and praise, even through dispute.*

The commentary explains it in this way:

We shall compete with the bodhisattva Devadatta, who is equal to us in being a sentient being, for status and the like. So that we sentient beings are superior in gain, praise and the like to the bodhisattva Devadatta, we establish our praise and gain even through dispute with the bodhisattva.

When saying, we shall compete with the bodhisattva Devadatta, who is equal to us in being a sentient being, the connotation of equal here shows that we don't have a sense of competitiveness with someone known to be superior to us, rather it is with those we consider equal to ourselves. Thus it relates to those who surround us, like fellow Dharma students, colleagues, classmates, siblings etc.

For someone one considers an equal, the commentary says, we shall compete... for status and the like'. So that we sentient beings [oneself] becomes superior in gain, praise and the like to the bodhisattva Devadatta, we establish our praise and gain even through dispute with the bodhisattva. This indicates that in order to excel, one may do whatever is necessary, such as dispute, to compete with the other to become superior to them. Apply this practice as a way to overcome such attitudes.

3.2.1.2.2.2.2. Competing for renown of qualities

The verse reads:

*148. I shall make my qualities clear
By any means to all the transitory worlds,
And I shall take care
That nobody hears about his qualities.*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

I shall proclaim and make clear our qualities by any means to all the transitory worlds and further I shall take care that nobody hears about the qualities of this bodhisattva.

Again, having exchanged oneself with the other, in relation to others one should proclaim their qualities and hide their faults; and in relation to oneself, one should proclaim one's faults and hide one's qualities. This practice highlights that as ordinary beings, we make our qualities clear to the whole world, whilst doing everything possible to hide our faults. But when bodhisattvas exchange themselves with the other, they proclaim their own faults and hide their qualities.

The practice of proclaiming others' faults whilst hiding one's qualities and proclaiming one's own qualities whilst hiding one's faults, seems a common practice in Australian politics. We can see that even if the opposition has a good project it is not mentioned, but criticised in every way.

We can see that the practice of ruining another's reputation or proclaiming their faults, especially in politics, becomes a real cause for dispute and confusion. We can see it really confuses people's minds because they are left not knowing who to believe anymore. In Australia we are very fortunate that people are generally good-natured and quite intelligent, so it doesn't bring much chaos. However there are many instances in other countries where this behaviour can cause chaos; not only confusion but chaos, because people get really upset and angry. When they hear about the faults of the opposition they believe it is all true, and this causes a lot of angst, which can cause protests or retaliation etc. So we can see this is a malevolent practice that can cause distress in people's minds.

3.2.1.2.2.3. Competing for the number of qualities

This verse relates to the point I mentioned earlier and reads:

149. *I shall hide my faults,
I shall be made offerings to and he not
I am obtaining today much gain and I shall be praised, but he should not have these.*

The commentary starts by explaining:

I shall hide our, i.e. sentient beings' faults, but clearly proclaim his faults and in this way we the sentient beings become an object of offering for others and he will not.

Here we can see how, if we engage in bringing out the faults of others and hiding our own faults, the others will not receive offerings, because they will not be regarded as worthy, while we, who have hidden our faults, will receive offerings.

The commentary continues:

I shall strive in this way. I am obtaining today much good food, clothing and the like, and others should praise me, but he shall not receive these benefits.

I shall strive in this way indicates how a competitive mind arises by constantly trying to proclaim others' faults when they have qualities, and proclaiming one's own qualities while hiding one's faults. This is how the negative state of mind works. The competitive mind says, I am obtaining today much good food, clothing and the like, and others should praise me, but he shall not receive these benefits. Normally one would like this out of a sense of competitiveness with others. But here it is used as a way to counteract this approach by placing oneself in the other's position then applying this to oneself i.e. exchanging oneself with the other.

3.2.1.2.2.4. Being happy about bringing harm to others

When actually practiced in this way, we can see how all modes of competitiveness with others, and wishing them harm, is what actually brings misfortune, dispute and distress in the world.

The verse reads:

150. *I shall watch joyously for a long time
How he is being treated inappropriately,
I shall take care that he is the laughing stock
Of all migrators and that they abuse each other.*

The commentary explains:

I shall watch joyously for a long time how this bodhisattva Devadatta is being treated inappropriately and is being crushed. I shall take care that this bodhisattva is a laughing stock for all migrators and they abuse each other by criticising each other's faults.

Having exchanged self and other one thus praises sentient beings and stops to exaggerate one's qualities.

The mind explained here, I shall watch joyously for a long time how this bodhisattva Devadatta is being treated inappropriately and is being crushed is indeed a negative state of mind. Feeling joyous when something bad happens to someone you don't like, or when they are suffering in some way, is not good. Furthermore the commentary says I shall take care this bodhisattva is a laughing stock for all migrators and they abuse each other by criticising others' faults, so again, when this negative mind arises it harbours an attitude towards others where one feels contempt, or a sense of competitiveness. A way to overcome that is this practice presented by Gyaltsab Rinpoche who summarises the point as having exchanged self and other one thus praises sentient beings and stops to exaggerate one's qualities.

3.2.1.2.2.3. The way of meditating on pride for the lower

This has four subdivisions:

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་མ་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

31 May 2016

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

It would be good to adopt this meditation practice as part of our regular daily practice.

Now let us generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the purpose of all other sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings, and then put them into practice well.

Generating such a motivation, even for a few moments, will definitely establish very strong positive imprints in our mind.

3.2.1.2.2.3. The way of meditating on pride for the lower

3.2.1.2.2.3.1. The aspect of meditating on pride

The verse is preceded with this statement:

A bodhisattva should meditate on pride by holding someone with superior qualities to themselves as self.

Then the verse reads:

151. *This afflicted one is known
To compete with me;
How could he equal me
In hearing, wisdom, body, caste and wealth?*

The commentary explains:

If this inferior afflicted bodhisattva Devadatta proclaims that he wants to compete with us sentient beings, then: 'How could he equal me in hearing, wisdom, body, caste and wealth? He does not equal us in any way.' Meditate thus on pride.

This is a presentation on how to overcome pride, which is, as explained earlier, a conceited mind that looks down with a sense of contempt on those who one considers to be inferior. Pride is a faulty state of mind that needs to be overcome and, as the self-cherishing mind is the basis for pride, this presentation is ultimately about overcoming the self-cherishing mind.

As presented in earlier sessions, when exchanging oneself with someone who is superior, one imagines what it would be like to be superior, and that the superior person holds the lower position of oneself. When one exchanges oneself with someone of lesser wisdom etc., then one places oneself in the inferior's place and places the inferior as oneself. With equals there is a sense of competitiveness, and again one places oneself as the other, and the other as oneself. These are ways to counteract the faulty states of mind of jealousy, pride, and competitiveness respectively.

The presentation here shows how the faulty state of mind of pride arises, and the kinds of sentiments it brings up. As the commentary states, If this inferior afflicted bodhisattva Devadatta proclaims that he wants to compete with us sentient beings, then: 'How could he equal me in hearing, wisdom, body, caste and wealth?' Pride is generated by thinking that one is superior to others either in having more knowledge than others, or having more wisdom or understanding than others, or having a better body and physique than others, or by being of higher caste or status, or by having more wealth than others. Through contemplating these characteristics one generates a sense of pride that one is better than the other.

This shows clearly how the mind of pride arises in relation to the status one believes one has. When one contemplates the fault of pride by seeing how such a conceited mind is generated, then he does not equal us in any way. Meditate thus on pride, means meditating on pride in this manner as a way to overcome pride.

Thus pride arises as a result of seeing oneself as superior to those who are inferior or disadvantaged in some way.

3.2.1.2.2.3.2. The benefits of meditating on pride

This is presented with the following verse:

152. *Having thus heard of my qualities,
Well known by all,
Enjoy the bliss and happiness
That makes one's hair stand on end in joy.*

The commentary explains:

As I say, 'As they are unequal, enjoy the bliss and joy that makes one's pore's hair stand on end, derived from hearing about my qualities that are far superior to the well-renowned Devadatta.

When others hear of the great qualities of a bodhisattva, such as their vast understanding of the teachings, having great wisdom and so forth, this causes such great admiration that one's hairs stand on end. This is an indication of how just hearing about these great qualities can move one's mind to the point where it causes a physical reaction.

This is a concise explanation of the way the great qualities of a bodhisattva bring such great joy to the minds of others.

3.2.1.2.2.3.3. The way of acting upon having done the meditation

The verse relating to this reads:

153. *However much gain he has,
When I engage in the action
I shall give him only enough to live by,
And take the remainder by force.*

The commentary explains:

Although he has gain of food and clothing, if I engage in benefiting sentient beings today I shall give him just enough food and clothing to survive on, and the remainder I shall take by force.

As explained clearly, although he has gain of food and clothing, if I engage in benefiting sentient beings today I shall give him just enough food and clothing to survive on and the remainder I shall take by force. Through pride one may engage in acts of giving others only as much as they need, and taking away by force anything that remains. This is another example of the fault of pride, which is being used as a way to encourage us to use whatever we have as a way to benefit sentient beings. If whatever gain one may have is used to benefit sentient beings, then that gain is worthwhile and well used.

3.2.1.2.2.3.4. Contemplating the disadvantages of lacking such a pride

This section explains contemplating the disadvantages of lacking pride. The following two lines relate to this:

*154ab. I shall take him away from happiness
And continuously expose him to my harm*

The commentary explains:

I shall take this bodhisattva away from his bliss of leisure and order him to carry my suffering. I shall continuously expose him to the harm of eliminating the suffering of sentient beings.

This is a further example of the fault of pride. As explained clearly, I shall take this bodhisattva away from his bliss of leisure and order him to carry my suffering. I shall continuously expose him to the harm of eliminating the suffering of sentient beings.

3.2.1.2.2.4. The result of the meditation

This section is divided into four:

3.2.1.2.2.4.1. Contemplating the faults of cherishing self

3.2.1.2.2.4.2. The source for understanding the infinite benefits of cherishing others

3.2.1.2.2.4.3. Explaining that it is only beneficial

3.2.1.2.2.4.4. Advice to strive in cherishing others

3.2.1.2.2.4.1. Contemplating the faults of cherishing self

This heading is presented in the following six lines:

154cd. It causes me harm in all of the Hundreds of cyclic existences.

*155. 'Mind, because you wish to act for self,
Although hundreds of eons pass,
With this great hardship
You will only accomplish suffering.'*

The commentary explains:

The cherishing of self that wishes oneself to have perfection causes the harm of the hells and other lower realms while circling in cyclic existence in all of the hundreds of lifetimes. 'Mind, you have caused me great hardship that is meaningless even if hundreds of eons pass. You have caused me thus only the suffering of cyclic existence.' The bodhisattva Devadatta should regard himself in such a way.

This explanation in the commentary relating to the faults of self-cherishing is quite clear so there is no need for much elaboration. As explained previously, the self-cherishing mind is a mind that thinks about only having the best for oneself, with everything going one's way for one's own personal benefit. When the commentary states, the bodhisattva Devadatta should regard himself in such a way, the connotation is that the bodhisattva called Devadatta needs to think about how the fault of self-cherishing arises in this way.

Devadatta should reprimand his mind thus: Mind, you have caused me great hardship that is meaningless even if hundreds of eons pass. That mind of course is the self-cherishing mind, and 'all you have done is cause me great hardship that is meaningless'. The sufferings that we encounter as a result of trivial worldly activities and gains are, as explained here, meaningless. Any hardship or difficulties that one has endured would not have brought any real happiness. Therefore they have been meaningless, and even after hundreds of eons they have brought no lasting joy. And, as mentioned further, you have caused me thus only the suffering of cyclic existence.

Of course if the suffering experienced is from enduring hardships and difficulties for the practise of the Dharma, then that would be meaningful. Enduring hardships for the Dharma would serve a great purpose and definitely have great meaning. However hardship and difficulties experienced merely for the sake of worldly pleasures and so forth are not a cause for true happiness, but a cause for even more suffering in the cyclic existence.

As a way to reprimand oneself, the commentary begins with mind, you. It is good to reprimand oneself on a personal level as part of one's own practice, and it is appropriate to use your own name. 'You [my name], look at what you have done so far with your self-cherishing mind. Whilst I wish for happiness, you have only brought me unimaginable sufferings in cyclic existence. Now it is time you brought me benefit'. When the mind is in a positive state it will be a mind that benefits oneself. Referring to the mind in this way differentiates one's self-cherishing mind from oneself.

3.2.1.2.2.4.2. The source for understanding the infinite benefits of cherishing others

The verse relating to this reads:

*156. Therefore, engage intensively
In the purpose of others,
And, as the words of the Able One are infallible
You will see the benefits later on.*

The commentary explains:

Thus one engages intensively into accomplishing the benefit of others upon cherishing others. Since the words of the Buddha are infallible with regards to their subject, one will see later on the result of enlightenment, a quality of cherishing others, based on viewing cherishing of self as the enemy.

Having presented the faults of cherishing oneself, the benefits of cherishing others are now presented. Again, this is a very reasonable and logically sequenced presentation.

Having contemplated the great disadvantages of cherishing oneself, one engages intensively in accomplishing the benefit of others upon cherishing others. The explanation of the benefits begins with the statement, since the words of the Buddha are infallible with regards to their subject. As the Buddha's teachings are true to their words and are infallible, they cannot be contradicted. Therefore, as the Buddha explained, one will see later on the results of enlightenment, which is a quality obtained by cherishing others, based on viewing cherishing oneself as the enemy.

3.2.1.2.2.4.3. Explaining that it is only beneficial

The verse relating to this heading is preceded with this hypothetical argument:

Argument: Although one has worked for the welfare of others for a long time one has not seen such a benefit.

If one has not seen any benefit from some kind of work or practice, then doubting its value is a very significant doubt. The following verse shows the way to overcome such a doubt.

157. *If one had earlier
Carried out these actions,
It would be impossible to have an occasion
Without the happiness of complete enlightenment.*

The commentary explains answer to the doubt:

Answer: If you had earlier carried out the action of exchanging self and others then it would be impossible to experience occasions of suffering, without the happiness of enlightenment complete with the two purposes. Regretting having passed time with meaningless actions one should strive in meditating on the mind of enlightenment.

The commentary clearly explains that if you had earlier carried out the action of exchanging self and others then it would be impossible to experience occasions of suffering. In other words, if one had carried out the practices of exchanging self with other, and thus cherishing others, one would not be suffering now. Without the happiness of enlightenment complete with the two purposes indicates that the ultimate result of cherishing others is perfecting the purposes of oneself as well as the purpose of others. If one is experiencing suffering now, then that is a clear sign that one has not engaged in the practice of exchanging self with others.

Having contemplated this one develops great regret about having passed time with meaningless actions, so one should strive in meditating on the mind of enlightenment. In essence, one regrets having wasted such time in the past by not engaging in the practices.

3.2.1.2.2.4.4. Advice to strive in cherishing others

Again this is introduced with a hypothetical argument:

Argument: If you say, 'I am not able to habituate myself by meditating on exchanging self and other.'

The verse to indicate the explanation of that is:

158. *Hence, meditate on others
Just as you hold as mine
The drop of semen and blood,
Which belongs to others.*

The commentary explains:

Answer: Since the welfare of others has such benefits one should meditate on cherishing other sentient beings by holding them as self, just as one has familiarised oneself with holding this body as mine, which is established out of the impure semen and blood of father and mother, who are other. By meditating in such a way complete the meditation of exchanging self and other.

The hypothetical doubt says I am not able to habituate myself by meditating on exchanging self and other. While one may see the benefits that have been explained earlier, one may still feel: 'How could I ever meditate in such a way? How could I actually engage in the practice of exchanging self with others? It's hard to familiarise oneself with exchanging self and other, and thus I'm not able to familiarise myself with such practice'.

As a response to that, the commentary says, since the welfare of others has such benefits, one should meditate on cherishing other sentient beings by holding them as self. This can be accomplished through familiarisation. For example, although our bodies came from others we hold this body as mine, it is established out of the impure semen and blood of father and mother. Although we have no qualms about cherishing this body as mine, it is actually a body that has been produced by substances received from others, i.e. one's father and mother. Through familiarisation one holds this body as being mine, even though it is produced from substances from others. Thus it is possible to adopt this way of thinking through familiarisation.

By meditating in such a way complete the meditation of exchanging self and other.

3.2.1.3. THE WAY OF FOLLOWING UP IN ACTION

This is subdivided into two:

3.2.1.3.1. Actual

3.2.1.3.2. One should take control of one's mind when following up the exchange of self and other in action

3.2.1.3.1. Actual

This has three subdivisions:

3.2.1.3.1.1. Giving one's perfections to others

3.2.1.3.1.2. Sincerely accepting oneself to be lower for the purpose of others

3.2.1.3.1.3. A summary of how to practise

3.2.1.3.1.1. Giving one's perfections to others

This is further subdivided into two:

3.2.1.3.1.1.1. Actual

3.2.1.3.1.1.2. It is suitable to be jealous of oneself

3.2.1.3.1.1.1. Actual

The verse presented under this heading is:

159. *Having given others great consideration,
Whatever you observe on your body,
Having snatched it away,
Put it to use for others.*

The commentary explains:

Having familiarised one's mind in this way 'I shall give the welfare of others great practical consideration' and having trained in this motivation, bodhisattvas advise themselves: 'Having considered whether one is harming others or not, whatever desired objects one observes on one's body, having snatched them away, give up the grasping at mine and put them to use for others.'

What is being explained here is that one first needs to familiarise one's mind with the practice of exchanging self with other. As presented earlier, that is done by thinking of the faults of cherishing oneself in many ways, and thinking about the benefits of cherishing others in many ways. Then, having familiarised one's mind with these thoughts over a long time, one needs to put them into practice. One cannot possibly put anything into practice without first having familiarised one's mind with the practice, and that is the point that is being presented here.

As explained further, the way to engage in the practice is to recall how the bodhisattvas advise themselves, as a way of checking their state of mind. What one checks is whether one is harming others or not. This means checking 'Am I harming others or am I benefitting them?', and then constantly maintaining that awareness of how one is conducting oneself.

As a way of putting that into practice, one snatches away whatever desired objects one observes on one's body. This indicates that one snatches away from oneself one's possessions, clothing and food, and uses them to benefit other sentient beings. In other words, not feeding and clothing one's body just to maintain oneself, but rather using it for the purpose of others. Furthermore, one gives up grasping at mine and puts them to use for others. When one has a strong self-cherishing mind, then one considers possessions such as food and so forth as mine. Giving away these possessions means giving up strong self-cherishing, and using these possessions for the purpose of benefitting others.

3.2.1.3.1.1.2. It is suitable to be jealous of oneself

This is another technique to change one's attitude. As a way to overcome the self-cherishing mind one develops a sense of jealousy towards oneself.

The verse that relates to this is:

160. *'I am happy, others not,
I am high, others low
I receive benefit, others not,'
Why are you not jealous of self?*

The commentary explains:

Further, one should also meditate on jealousy: 'I am happy but other sentient beings are not happy, I am superior from the point of view of enjoyments and the like but others are inferior in this way. I practise virtue that benefits me but others do not and therefore I am blissful and others are not. What is the use of that?' Why is one not jealous towards myself who is higher? It is suitable to be jealous.

As the commentary quite clearly explains the meaning of this verse, there is no need to further elaborate on it.

When one acknowledges that one is happy and one has a high status, receives benefits, and so forth, then self-cherishing may arise. Reprimanding oneself if there is any self-cherishing will be an impetus to use these qualities to benefit others. If one actually instils more compassion for those who one sees as being deprived of the qualities that one has, such as happiness, high status, and so forth, then rather than feeling conceit over these qualities, they become even more reason to benefit others.

For those with strong self-cherishing, one's qualities only lead to conceit and pride, but they are a means to benefit others for those who overcome the self-cherishing mind.

We can use the remaining time to recite the dedication or tenth chapter of the Bodhisattvacharyavatara.

Of course our dedication can be focussed on those who are experiencing sickness and other difficulties and problems in general. We can also dedicate it to the welfare of all sentient beings, particularly those with whom one has a direct relationship, such as one's parents. For those whose parents who are still with you, dedicate it for their wellbeing so that they are free of extreme sufferings, illness and so forth, and that they have a happy state of mind. Those whose parents have passed away you can dedicate the recitation for their wellbeing wherever they've been reborn, and for them to continuously experience good conditions. As we have a strong connection with our parents, dedicating our practice in this way will definitely bring them benefit.

When one takes refuge, for example, one envisions all sentient beings around oneself, with one's parents on either side. That is because of the connection that we have with them.

It is good to keep the specific meaning and purpose of the practice in mind. The direct biological connection we have with our parents is not just some hypothetical connection. Because of the biological connection, when we make prayers and aspirations for our parents and siblings, it definitely has a benefit.

The concise motivation that we generate is: I will engage in this recitation to bring benefit for all sentient beings, bringing them happiness and relieving them from all suffering.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

7 June 2016

Based on the motivation that we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice.

(Pause for meditation)

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines, 'For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will engage in and listen to the teachings'. Generating this motivation is also a reminder of the goal that we're seeking to achieve, which is Buddhahood – thus it refreshes our mind to reflect on what Buddhahood actually entails.

As we attempted in our short meditation practice, we must try to incorporate the giving and taking practice in our daily lives, as way to transform and subdue our minds. If we don't use these profound practices and techniques as a means to subdue our mind, then we won't find any other methods – there are no other means.

Following on from where we left off in our last session, we are now on the third sub-heading, which is:

3.2.1.3.1. Actual (cont.)

3.2.1.3.1.2. Sincerely accepting oneself to be lower for the purpose of others

Here there are three subdivisions:

3.2.1.3.1.2.1. Analysing one's faults

3.2.1.3.1.2.2. Confessing having harmed sentient beings

3.2.1.3.1.2.2. Diligently take the lower place

It is good to derive an understanding from the outline itself. As presented, it is very reasonable to accept oneself to be lower than others, for if we can't practise taking a lower position, then there's no way that we can actually benefit others.

When we engage in reading a Dharma text, it is good to try to derive an understanding from every angle of the presentation, such as from the outline itself. Indeed we can derive the text's essential meaning just from the outline, which is intended to summarise the main point being presented. Here, the main point is accepting oneself to be lower for the purpose of benefiting others. Contemplating this point for a while can move our mind, and thus one derives more benefit from what is being presented in the text.

3.2.1.3.1.2.1. Analysing one's faults

161. *I shall separate from my happiness
And attach the suffering of others to me.
Say, 'Why do you act like this at any time?'
Investigate your own faults.*

I shall separate myself from all my happiness such as food, clothing and so forth, and give them to others. I shall attach the sufferings of others to myself and accept them. Bodhisattvas should investigate their faults by asking themselves from time to time, 'Why did I do this?'

The first two lines refer to the practice of giving and taking, the meditation practice we attempted to engage in earlier. Essentially the point of the practice, as it says here, is to separate myself from all my happiness such as food, clothing and so forth, meaning one will not cherish these things and instead give them to others. In the practice of giving and taking, this is the practice of giving: giving all of the goodness one has. Then I shall attach the sufferings of others to myself – this is the taking part. These are the two immaculate presentations of the giving and taking practice.

Next, the text explains that bodhisattvas should investigate their faults by asking themselves from time to time 'Why did I do this?' In other words, those training as bodhisattvas should investigate their minds by regularly asking themselves about the intentions behind their thoughts and actions. The main point of this practice is to detect any faults that may arise in the trainee's mind.

We need to take this as a personal instruction; we need to be familiar with the practice of checking our mind for any faults that may arise. Even just reading these words and contemplating them for a few moments, and then investigating the mind can be an essential meditation practice.

Occasionally one may feel a bit down, unhappy and so forth. At that time, rather than letting our unhappy, depressed mind carry on unchecked, it would be far better to take some time to read a text like this. We can first make strong supplications to Shantideva, seeking the blessing to be able to gain the understanding and realisation of these essential points. Spending a few moments contemplating these words would really help the mind to become more settled, to experience a sense of happiness and peace.

When we apply this technique and contemplate the meaning of the text, it will definitely stop negative states of mind, such as feeling melancholic or feeling down. When this positive effect takes place, we will begin to notice a great difference in our present way of thinking and attitude, compared to before we met the Dharma. We will notice how, previously, we succumbed to negative states of mind, feeling as if there was no way out of our depressed state. But now, having met with the teachings and having contemplated them, we can see that a shift has taken place, and that our mind has become more expansive. This is the benefit of having access to the teachings and the Dharma. But if we don't put this advice into practice, we will not get much benefit from it.

Initially, there is the fault of not knowing the Dharma. But once we know the Dharma and understand it, the next fault we need to overcome is not putting it into practice. We need to overcome both these faults in order to derive benefit from the teachings.

3.2.1.3.1.2.2. Confessing having harmed sentient beings

We should pay attention here to the meticulous presentation of the subject matter. Having taken the advice to investigate one's mind, one checks whether there are any faults or not. In summary, the faults would be in relation to whether one has harmed sentient beings. If we detect any faults, we need to do what is presented here next – confess to having harmed sentient beings. As soon as we detect that we have engaged in some negative mind or actions that have harmed sentient beings, we need to immediately confess that as a way to purify it.

162. *Although others have created wrongs,
I shall make them my faults.
Although I have committed a small fault,
I shall make it known to many beings.*

163ab. *By proclaiming the renown of others
I will play down my own renown.*

Although others commit faults such as harming one, bodhisattvas should make these their own faults and carry the burden of experiencing the results themselves. Although one has committed small faults with regards to sentient beings, one should make them known to many beings and accept one's faults.

If I hear of the fame of others and hear that they are being talked about pleasantly, I will praise them even more and play down my own renown.

As explained in the first part of the commentary, although others commit faults such as harming one, bodhisattvas should make these their own faults and carry the burden of experiencing the results themselves. This is a profound way of implementing the understanding of karma. If one experiences harm from anyone, that harm is none other than the result of one's own previous karma. If we had not created the karma to experience harm, then no one would be able to harm us. If one implements that understanding of karma, then one can see harm from others as being one's own fault: that is, if someone harms us, it is basically the ripening of our own previously created negative karma.

We can also implement our understanding of the practice of patience here, particularly the patience of not retaliating. When others harm us, normally the intention to retaliate arises: we feel that this harm is unjust, that the other is harming us without any particular cause or reason from our side. But again, if we implement our understanding of karma – that the harm we experience from others is the result of the ripening of karma that we have created previously – then this can prevent us from immediately seeing the other as being at fault, and thus prevent us from generating the wish to retaliate and become angry with them. We should take the initiative to put this into practice, as it is the optimum way to protect one's mind. In the event that others cause us harm, even if it's just hurtful words, then our mind will not be disturbed and will remain peaceful if we employ the practice of patience of not retaliating. That is how we get the benefit.

We can also relate to a good analogy presented in Geshe Chekawa's Seven-Point Mind Training teachings, which I think we did in a course last year, of an arrow hitting a target. As explained in the analogy, if there were no target set up, there would be no way for the arrow to hit the target, so the arrow hitting the target is based on the fact that a target was set up. It's as if it is the target's fault that the arrow hit it, because if the target hadn't been set up, the arrow wouldn't have been able to hit it. So this analogy shows how we experience the results of karma ourselves – if we hadn't created the karma, we wouldn't experience the harm. When we create the karma of harming others in the past, we 'set up the target', and the harm we now experience from the other is like the arrow hitting the target. Contemplating in this way, one takes the initiative to carry the burden of experiencing the results oneself.

The commentary continues, although one has committed small faults with regards to sentient beings, one should make them known to many beings and accept one's faults. This is again presenting the practice of proclaiming one's faults, even though they are minor. Rather than finding excuses or trying to hide our faults, we should proclaim them and make them known. This protects one from concealing these faults and creating more negativity and incurring more faults in future. These are very profound practices, so we should put them into practice.

In a confession ceremony for the ordained, there is a part where the abbot asks: 'Have you seen the faults as faults?' to which the response is, 'Yes, I have'. This is followed by, 'will you commit to refrain from the faults again in the future?', and again the intended response is 'Yes, I will'.

The commentary further explains:

If one hears of the fame of others and hears that they are being talked about pleasantly one praises them even more and plays down one's own renown.

Here again, it is profoundly explained that when bodhisattvas hear of others' qualities, they will take the initiative to even further expand on those qualities, and play down their own. A perfect example is His Holiness the Dalai Lama, who always says, 'I am just an ordinary human being and I don't have many qualities' – taking a lower position from his side, while praising others to great extent. Indeed he goes to great lengths to praise the goodness of others, such as their respective faiths and good deeds. This is a clear sign that His Holiness is putting the bodhisattva deeds into practice.

In relation to the earlier point, even if one's own faults are small, a bodhisattva will take the initiative to proclaim those faults and make them known to all, rather than conceal them, so that others are not misled and deceived. And if others have some renowned qualities, the bodhisattva will make that even more widely known.

If we can incorporate these practices to some extent into our own lives, it will bring great solace to the mind. If we can make it a habit to praise others' qualities, and when others' qualities are talked about, to agree with that, it will help one's own mind be free of negative attitudes such as jealousy, and will bring much more peace to one's mind.

In fact, we need to be very mindful when others' qualities are mentioned, because how are we to know who is, or is not, a bodhisattva? A bodhisattva may be anywhere at any time. We need to be very careful on this point.

3.2.1.3.1.2.2. Diligently take the lower place

163cd. *I shall order myself to achieve
Every purpose, like the lowest of servants.*

164. *Since his nature is faulty,
Do not praise partial adventitious qualities,
Just as nobody knows, although they are there,
Any of their qualities.*

I shall order myself to achieve every purpose of sentient beings without pride, like the lowest of servants that is ordered to carry the greatest of burdens.

Think of yourself as being in the nature of having faults and if the thought arises to praise oneself for at least some small partial qualities of listening and so forth, think: Just as nobody can see the qualities of the bodhisattvas they look at, I shall not praise even a partial adventitious quality. I shall not proclaim my qualities.

What is being explained here is that, for the purpose of benefiting sentient beings, one needs to relinquish any sense of pride when engaging in activities to serve them. When doing activities that may be considered lowly, such as taking care of the elderly or sick, there might be occasions where one has to clean them after they have defecated, for example. If one generates the mind, 'I can't do that. It is not my job. I am not the sort of person who would do this sort of thing', that sense of pride will prevent one from engaging in that service. So, if one is in a position of caring for the elderly or one's own parents, one carries out any task to serve them without any sense of pride, not hesitating to clean up a mess, or clean dirty sheets. One will be willing and glad to do that. This is an example of how, when one takes this teaching to heart and does not hold a sense of pride, one is able to engage in any activity without thinking it too lowly. If one has a sense of pride, it will prevent one from engaging in practical ways of benefiting others according to their needs. It can really prevent a lot of beneficial deeds and acts that we can do for others.

The commentary then says think of yourself as being in the nature of having faults. This is again a means of overcoming pride. As soon as one thinks, 'I am someone who has faults', it will lessen any contempt for others or pompous feelings about oneself. If the thought arises to praise oneself, or that others should praise one for smallest partial quality of listening, or the small good deeds one has done, or the partial good qualities one has, then one should think, 'Just as nobody can see the qualities of the bodhisattvas they look at, I shall not praise even a partial adventitious quality of mine. I shall not proclaim my qualities.' This is the practice one needs to adopt.

3.2.1.3.1.3. A summary of how to practise

165. *In short, whatever harm you inflicted on others,
For the purpose of self,
May that harm fall upon me
For the purpose of sentient beings.*

In short, mind, whatever harm you have inflicted on sentient beings since beginningless time for my purpose, may that harm fall upon me in order to accomplish the purpose of sentient beings.

Here, the commentary explains that one reprimands one's own mind, saying that since beginningless time one has inflicted so much harm upon others. Keeping this in mind one makes the aspiration, may that harm fall on me, in order to accomplish the purpose of sentient beings. This is implementing the earlier practice of giving and taking, where one takes the suffering upon oneself. It is another way of seeing the appropriateness of taking the harm of sentient beings upon oneself.

The next verse is prefaced by the hypothetical query, one may think: 'I cannot carry the burden of others' suffering. The verse which serves as an answer to that is:

166. *One should not make it aggressive
And wrathful
But bashful, shy and controlled
Like a young bride.*

One may think: 'I cannot carry the burden of others' suffering.'

Answer: 'The bodhisattva should not make their mind aggressive and wrathful but bashful, shy and controlled like a young bride.'

Query: How then should the mind abide?

Answer: Like a new bride it should be bashful, afraid of the criticism of others and of controlled behaviour. In the Great Commentary it is translated as rough.

The commentary's presentation of this hypothetical doubt is reasonable, because earlier it was advised that one should take the harm of all sentient beings upon oneself for the purpose of benefiting them. However one may then think, 'How can I carry that burden of others' suffering?' and feel overwhelmed. Thus the text explains that, The bodhisattva should not make their mind aggressive and wrathful but bashful, shy and controlled like a young bride.

I don't know if it's the tradition here in the west, but in Tibet, when a new bride is brought out of the house to meet the groom, she is very shy and bashful. This example illustrates how one should be timid when it comes to faults, always being mindful to maintain the quality of shyness, knowing that if one were to engage in a fault, it would be really shameful. As the commentary further explains, like a new bride it should be bashful, afraid of the criticism of others and of controlled behaviour.

All eyes look upon a new bride, seeing every minor mishap or mistake, so in order to prevent that, she would have a controlled demeanour. Likewise, to prevent one from engaging in faults, one should engage in the practice of what is called shame and embarrassment. Shame is felt in relation to one's own mistakes. If one knows about one's faults, it would be a really shameful admission, so one practises shame. Whereas embarrassment – some translations use the term consideration for others – relates to one not bringing about disgrace to others. Practising refraining from faults ensures that we do not embarrass others.

The earlier point that one should be like a new bride 'bashful, afraid of criticism of others and having controlled behaviour' incorporates the two points just mentioned: practising shame and embarrassment. In fact, without incorporating these two aspects of shame and embarrassment, there is no way one could properly avoid incurring faults.

To further illustrate this point, as explained in the Thirty-Seven Practices of Bodhisattvas, both shame and embarrassment are essential to protecting one's commitments and vows and not incurring faults. Consider how it is not befitting for oneself to break the vows and commitments one has taken. One reminds oneself, 'I should not engage in this great misdeed'. By having shame for one's misdeeds, one avoids creating negativity. Further, when one thinks about all the gurus, buddhas and bodhisattvas being witnesses, engaging in this negativity would be inappropriate in the presence of these great beings, who always know what one is doing. By thinking about how this misdeed would be a disgrace to all one's gurus, buddhas and bodhisattvas, one will avoid it – this would then be practising what is called embarrassment.

Of course, this is why, when we take vows and commitments, we envision all the buddhas and bodhisattvas being present, as a way to remind oneself in the future that all buddhas and bodhisattvas have been witness to one taking those commitments and vows. So if one were to breach these commitments and vows, it would be a disgrace to all those buddhas and bodhisattvas. Contemplating this helps us to refrain from misdeeds and negativities; if we have engaged in negativities, this reminds us to practise confession.

It is good to bring that awareness of the presence of the buddhas and bodhisattvas at all times when engaging in practices, such as offering water bowls, when we visualise that these great beings are actually present, and offer them the offering substance. I personally feel a bit uncomfortable when I offer cold water in the winter, so I try to make it a little bit warm! This is mentioned in some of the practices, where in very hot weather, one imagines that the argham or drinking water is cooling; then, when it is cold, imagine that the water – or the substance one transforms into nectar – is warm. Otherwise, we will just go through the rituals, saying argham, padyam, and so on, but not really have much feeling for what we are doing, and not derive real benefit from it. Of course, it won't make much difference to the objects of our offerings, the buddhas and bodhisattvas, but from one's own side it is a good way to take the initiative and make offerings that would be appropriate at the time. Some who may not be aware of why this practice is done might be critical saying, 'How come you are offering warm or hot water in the water bowls?'

3.2.1.3.2. One should take control of one's mind when following up the exchange of self and other in action

Here again, the commentary outline is meticulously presented. When engaging in the practice of exchanging self and others, one should be mindful of having control over one's state of mind.

This is subdivided into four.

3.2.1.3.2.1. How to subjugate abiding with excitement

3.2.1.3.2.2. The faults of working only for one's own purpose

3.2.1.3.2.3. Investigating the faults of the body

3.2.1.3.2.4. Taking control of one's mind

3.2.1.3.2.1. How to subjugate abiding with excitement

167. Do this and abide like this.

Do not act like that

Take control of it like that

If it transgresses then subjugate it.

One should think about the benefit of others and abide with one's actions accordingly. Like taming a horse, make yourself suitable to practise virtue. 'Mind, if you do not desire to act in this way, then I shall take control of you with mindfulness and introspection.' If the mind transgresses these antidotes then subjugate and subdue the mind.

The analogy here likens making oneself suitable to practise virtue to the task of taming a wild horse: when an untamed horse is finally tamed, it becomes really serviceable. You can then put that horse to any task and it can perform the task well. This analogy shows us how to control the mind and make it serviceable through the technique of developing calm abiding.

When we engage in the practice of focusing the mind, we will eventually reach a state where the mind becomes serviceable. At this point, you can put the mind to the task of maintaining a single-pointed focus on an object. This is what is being mentioned here. If the unruly mind starts to misbehave and refuses to listen to one's commands, one should reprimand it by saying, 'Mind, if you do not desire to act in this way then I shall take control of you with mindfulness and introspection'. The two mental factors presented here as the most essential tools for taming the mind are mindfulness and introspection. Earlier, the text presented shame and embarrassment as the two essential tools that provide the means for us to conduct proper physical behaviour. As presented in many other teachings, mindfulness and introspection are the two most essential tools we require to control the mind.

I regularly emphasise these two states of mind, mindfulness and introspection, as most essential for maintaining the integrity of one's positive thoughts and a virtuous frame of mind. As explained in the teachings there is no way that one can have adequate control over one's mind without these two essential tools.

As I have presented many times previously, mindfulness is the state of mind that maintains a constant awareness of the object and does not forget it. Introspection is the state of mind that maintains vigilance over whether the mind is maintaining that focus or not. If it is found that the focus on the object is not maintained, it will bring the focus back. That is the function of introspection. These are the two essential tools to be incorporated within our practice in meditation and outside of it. The commentary concludes here, if the mind transgresses, then apply the antidotes and subdue and subjugate the mind.

The next verse relating to this heading is:

168. Mind, if you do not act like this,

Despite having been advised,

Then all faults arise from you.

Hence you need to subjugate it.

'Mind, if, despite advising yourself in this manner, you do not act accordingly with the excuse that you are under the control of the afflictions, you need to subjugate it, because the self-cherishing mind becomes the basis upon which all present and future faults rely upon.'

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse quite clearly: as a way to reprimand one's mind, one engages in a dialogue with it. I have previously shared my opinions and advice on how talking to oneself is a way to be mindful. Here my advice is being backed up by this presentation, which advises one to reprimand one's mind by saying, 'Mind, if, despite advising yourself in this manner, you do not act accordingly with the excuses that you are under the control of the afflictions, you need to subjugate it...'.

Often we might think, 'Yes, I do agree I need to control my mind, I have no qualms about that, I see the value of it, but my mind is influenced by attachment and anger and there is nothing I can do about it'. So sometimes one uses the afflictions as an excuse not to subdue the mind.

The advice being presented here is that when the self-cherishing mind acts cunningly like that, using excuses, saying 'Oh well, the afflictions are too strong and powerful so I can't do anything about it', 'I cannot help feeling angry and attached', then at that point you need to become even sterner with your self-cherishing mind. The meaning of subjugate here is of being stern. First, we need to try to talk to the mind kindly, but if that doesn't work, then we may have to take stronger measures and be stern with it. That is how the advice to be stern is being presented.

What is clarified in the text is that the referent mind is the self-cherishing mind, as it reads - because the self-cherishing mind becomes the basis upon which all present and future faults rely upon – so it is the self-cherishing mind that needs to be tamed and subjugated. We try to tame it gently first with nice words and try to appease it, but if the self-cherishing mind is still reluctant and tries to put up a fight, finding excuses to go on causing you trouble, you have to subjugate it.

The ways of subjugating it are presented next; not allowing it to find excuses and using other logic presented in the next verse, which will be covered in the next session. The essence of this is that one says to oneself: 'Previously, I did not recognise you as being a devious, faulty state of mind, and you had complete control over me. You did whatever you wanted and brought me only trouble. But now I have seen you for what you are. You are a troublemaker! You can't fool me anymore, and I am going to now take control over you. I am not going to allow you to control me any longer and destroy me as you did in the past. In the past, I did not know any better, but now I am a different person. Now I know how you have been devious and have cunningly harmed me.'

So in this form of dialogue, just as we would have with someone else when we argue with or admonish them. It is quite common, in a conflict, for people to start off by trying to talk and negotiate. Occasionally, however, one might say, 'OK, I've reached the point where there are no more words or explanations left to be said, and I cannot reason with you anymore'. That is when that person might start using force, being stern. This is the approach to apply to overcome one's faulty, self-cherishing mind.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱུང་རྒྱུ་མེམས་དཔའི་ལྷོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

14 June 2016

Based on the motivation generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

The practice we've engaged in is incredibly worthwhile, so we should familiarise ourselves with it again and again. The teachings present that initially the way to engage in the practice of the ton-glen is to familiarise oneself with the words. Thus we recite the verse and contemplate the meaning. It is essential to engage in this practice as much as possible as it serves as an optimum means to overcome negative states of mind that cause so much turmoil.

3.2.1.3.2. One should take control of one's mind when following up the exchange of self and other in action

Verse 168 highlights the need to subjugate the self-cherishing mind. By reading these words, and reflecting on the meaning, the way to take personal instruction from it is to acknowledge the fault of one's own self-cherishing mind.

The suggestion here is to look within oneself to pinpoint the faults caused by one's own self-cherishing mind; not to find fault in others. Faults include afflictive minds such as anger, attachment, jealousy, pride and competition. The self-cherishing mind is the cause for all of these negative minds to arise. When one takes the initiative to look within, and acknowledge the self-cherishing mind as the actual cause of all one's mishaps, one begins to really embrace the reality of this. That's when our mind begins to shift and a real transformation takes place.

3.2.1.3.2.2. The faults of working only for one's own purpose

This is subdivided into three:

3.2.1.3.2.2.1. Giving up establishing only one's own purpose after understanding the faults

3.2.1.3.2.2.2. Putting it to work for the purpose of others

3.2.1.3.2.2.3. Short summarising explanation

3.2.1.3.2.2.1. Giving up establishing only one's own purpose after understanding the faults

The next verse and a half read:

169. *The time when you destroyed me
Is past; it was another time.
Now that I see, wherever you go
I shall destroy your arrogance.*

170ab. *I will destroy the thought of:
'I still do have my own purpose.'*

The commentary explains:

The time when I did not see that you—my self-cherishing—are the root of my problems and when you destroyed me, is past and another time. It was when I did not understand this. Now that I see you as the root of all faults, you will be powerless in generating faults as I shall destroy your arrogance wherever you go.

If there is the thought 'I still have the power to achieve only my own purpose', I shall destroy and completely eradicate that thought.

This passage shows that the way to subjugate the self-cherishing mind is by having a dialogue with it: the time when I did not see that you — my self-cherishing — are the root of my problems and when you destroyed me, is past and another time. What is being explained here is that up until now one has experienced continuous difficulties and problems by not having recognised the self-cherishing mind as the root cause of all faults. It goes on, it was when I did not understand this, meaning that when I did not previously see the self-cherishing mind at fault I was influenced by it and became a victim to it. This created many negativities, the consequences of which I had to experience.

Now that I see you as the root of all faults implies that through the aid of the Mahayana teachings in general, and in particular through this incredible text by Shantideva, I now clearly see self-cherishing as the root of all faults. Without relying on such a text as this it would be very difficult to recognise the self-cherishing mind as a fault. As such, studying and contemplating this text is a most powerful way to reveal the self-cherishing mind as the main cause of all faults. The commentary concludes thus, you will be powerless in generating faults as I shall destroy your arrogance wherever you go.

To re-emphasise the point I made earlier, when it indicates now that I see you as the root of all faults, the referent 'I' here is oneself, not others. It is not suggesting that we lecture others saying 'you need to recognise self-cherishing as the root of all your faults', rather it is directed to oneself, seeing one's own self-cherishing as the root of all faults. Having accepted the self-cherishing mind as the cause of all faults, the commentary recommends a stern affirmation dealing with it: you will be powerless, 'you', meaning the self-cherishing mind, will not have power over me. 'You' will not dominate me anymore and be a cause for more faults because I shall destroy your arrogance wherever you go. This means that having seen 'you' as a fault, I am not going to give you power anymore, and I'll completely destroy you. This is the way to subjugate the self-cherishing mind.

To ensure the self-cherishing mind is made powerless, the commentary further emphasises, If there is the thought 'I still have the power to achieve only my own purpose'. Here we can see that the dialogue with the self-cherishing mind is presented very meticulously as if you were dealing with someone you're attempting to overpower. 'If you still think you've got some power over me to achieve your own purpose I shall destroy and completely eradicate this thought'. One takes a strong stance in not giving the slightest chance for the self-cherishing mind to become dominant.

When we contemplate these points, we see that it is through the dominance of the self-cherishing mind that we have engaged in so many misdeeds and pursued actions with only our own self-interest in mind. It has prevented one from engaging in benefitting others because the self-cherishing mind only seeks to engage in activities which benefit one's own self interests. Thus, recognising that, one takes a stance to completely eradicate it.

It is good to take note that the faults of the self-cherishing mind are presented here in a similar way to the faults of grasping to the self. While there is a distinction between them, the faults that incur from these two states of mind are actually the same. This analogy can help us to understand the distinction between self-grasping and the self-cherishing mind; self-grasping is like a king, whereas the self-cherishing mind is like the minister who carries out every command of the king. The incurred faults are the same because they ultimately come from the same source. The Lam Rim confirms this presentation.

3.2.1.3.2.2.2. Putting it to work for the purpose of others

The next six lines of the two verses read:

170cd. I shall sell you to others and thus Offer my ability without any mind of regret.

171. *If, due to lack of conscientiousness,
I do not offer you to others
You will definitely hand me over
To the guardians of hell.*

The commentary explains:

Know that I have sold you to others and thus offer without any mind of regret my ability to sentient beings in any way they desire. If I do not offer you to sentient beings due to lack of conscientiousness and think of my own purpose alone, then you will definitely hand me over to the guardians of hell through the karma of negative actions. Hence, my dear self-cherishing, I will destroy you.

The opening line says, know that I have sold you to others. Again, in dialogue-form, you tell the self-cherishing mind, know that I have sold you - meaning that one has given oneself completely up for the benefit of other sentient beings. I offer myself without any mind of regret my ability to sentient beings in any way they desire, is saying that having engaged in the practices of exchanging self with other, one has completely given oneself to others. Having exchanged oneself with others, one takes others' benefit into account rather than one's own self-centred needs.

The next part of the explanation explains further and refers to the consequences of not offering oneself to other sentient beings, if I do not offer you to sentient beings due to lack of conscientiousness and think of my own purpose alone, then you, (the self-cherishing mind), will definitely hand me over to the guardians of hell through the karma of negative actions.

This dialogue with the self-cherishing mind is effectively saying that 'if you claim that you have concern for my welfare then it is best to offer me to sentient beings, because if you don't, then due to a lack of conscientiousness, and starting to think only of one's own purpose again, you (self-cherishing) will actually be handing me over to the guardians of hell where I'll experience extreme sufferings. The best option therefore is to offer myself to other sentient beings. Hence, my dear self-cherishing, having seen the faults I will destroy you. This again emphasises the main point.

3.2.1.3.2.2.3. Short summarising explanation

This is presented with two verses, and the first reads:

172. *Therefore, because you offered me thus,
I suffered for a long time.
By remembering the past with vengeance,
Destroy the thought of only self-purpose.*

The commentary explains:

Therefore, since previously you offered me to the hell guardians, in this way I experienced suffering for a long time. Now I remember my previous grief and with the thought of reaping vengeance I will destroy you, the thought of sole self-purpose, which is the root of all faults.

The explanation here is quite clear; it is from the faults of the self-cherishing that one has to experience the ill effects of the sufferings of being reborn in the hells etc. for a long time. In recalling that, one takes a stance and resolves, 'having seen the faults that you have created in the past, I will completely destroy you'. Once you have reached the point of recognising self-cherishing as the root of all one's problems, then the explanation given here will be very clear.

The next verse reads:

173. *Hence, if one desires joy
One should not make oneself happy.
Hence, if one wishes to protect oneself
One should always protect others.*

The commentary explains:

Hence, if you desire to have perfect joy and happiness for a long time, then you should not make yourself happy on the basis of cherishing self. Hence, if you wish to protect yourself from suffering, you should always protect other sentient beings on the basis of cherishing them.

This means that if for all the logical reasons presented earlier, if you desire perfect joy and happiness for a long time, then you should not make yourself happy on the basis of cherishing the self, as this approach only leads to experiencing the opposite - unhappiness and faults. Therefore, if you desire to have real joy and happiness, you need to avoid engaging in your own purpose with the self-cherishing mind.

Accepting, with all the logical reasons presented previously, that one wishes to protect oneself from suffering, the text further exhorts, if you wish to be protected from suffering, then you should always protect other sentient beings on the basis of cherishing them. This is the succinct summary of the disadvantages of cherishing oneself and the advantages of cherishing other sentient beings.

Again the dialogue is meticulously presented in a similar manner to resolving a conflict with an unreasonable and irrational person. When it states, hence, if 'you' desire to have perfect joy, it is saying to the self-cherishing mind that if it really wants to make oneself happy, experiencing perfect joy and happiness, then it should not be on the basis of cherishing self.

Furthermore, if it wishes to protect one from suffering, then one should always protect other sentient beings on the basis of cherishing them.

The way that we relate to the self-cherishing mind, is that it appears as though it is actually protecting us, by taking care of one's needs and fulfilling one's desires. Thus, we believe in, and are completely submissive to, the demands of the self-cherishing mind. As such we are not to blame for blindly following it without question.

However having now seen the disadvantages and faults of self-cherishing, one needs to take a stance and not allow it to dominate and control oneself.

It would be very useful if we can remember this dialogue whenever we feel the self-cherishing mind starting to take over and dominate us. The way to overcome negative states of mind is to adopt the opposite positive state of mind, which serves as an antidote to overpower it. For example, the mind of grasping at the self is overcome by understanding selflessness. For other manifest levels of delusions, for example miserliness, one should think about the disadvantages of miserliness and the advantages of generosity, the mind of giving. When we start thinking about the advantages of generosity, then miserliness will naturally reduce.

Likewise when a mind of anger manifests, we need to think about the virtues of patience. The combination of thinking about the disadvantages of anger and the advantages of patience makes one begin to see the real value of patience and the faults of anger, and then the mind of anger naturally subsides. Similarly, to overcome the mind of harmfulness, we need to think about the advantages of morality, refraining from harming others, then the mind of harmfulness will be overpowered. When the faulty mind of laziness occurs, one needs to overcome it by contemplating the virtues of enthusiasm or joyous effort. In thinking about the benefits of joyous effort, the mind of laziness starts to decrease and one naturally starts to feel enthusiastic again. The teachings indicate that the fault of laziness is that whoever is consumed by it will not accomplish whatever they set out to do; laziness prevents one from achieving one's goal. Similarly they will not attain any results in Dharma. Thus, by applying joyous effort one overcomes laziness.

Likewise if one is consumed by corrupt wisdom one needs to apply the correct wisdom or intelligence as a way to overcome it. If one is consumed by distractions, one needs to practise concentration, which will help to overcome the distracted mind.

Thus, when one thinks about the benefits of these virtuous states of mind they become specific antidotes for overcoming the opposite faulty state of mind, and one naturally becomes encouraged. By thinking in this way and applying it to the best of our ability, we get the benefit. If we were not presented with these means from the teachings, then we cannot resort to doing anything about it and will continue to be at the mercy of the negative states of mind.

The way to deal with the afflictions that arise in our mind is succinctly explained in the Eight Verses of the Mind Training, where it reads: "as soon as afflictions arise, endangering myself and others, may I firmly face and avert them".

The great masters of the past advise us to protect ourselves from the destruction caused by the afflictions by nipping them in the bud. So as soon as an affliction arises, one should immediately recognise it and apply the antidote.

Previous masters have presented the ways and means of engaging in practices to overcome faulty states of mind, from their own experience. Having applied the antidotes and seen the results clearly, they have found them to be great means to overcome the afflictions. As such we need to try to apply this ourselves and find the means to overcome the afflictions in our own mind.

3.2.1.3.2.3. Investigating the faults of the body

This is subdivided into three:

3.2.1.3.2.3.1. The fault of not knowing contentment

3.2.1.3.2.3.2. The fault of being motionless

3.2.1.3.2.3.3. The fault of being deluded

3.2.1.3.2.3.1. The fault of not knowing contentment

This is further subdivided into two:

3.2.1.3.2.3.1.1. The faults of craving the body

3.2.1.3.2.3.1.2. Thus, it is appropriate to meditate on non-attachment for the body

3.2.1.3.2.3.1.1. The faults of craving the body

The commentary starts with a hypothetical argument:

Argument: Since one wishes to work for others one should support the body on the basis of craving.

The verse reads:

174. *However much we work
At supporting this body,
That much it falls
Into a state of extreme fragility.*

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse by providing an answer to the hypothetical question:

Answer: This is unsuitable. However much we work at supporting this body with food and such, on the basis of cherishing it that much through craving, while not achieving the slightest of one's wishes, one will in fact receive great suffering. It will be very hard to support it because one falls into the very stage of extreme fragility that makes it hard for it to bear even small sufferings.

This hypothetical argument is a continuation of the dialogue with the self-cherishing mind. Here the self-cherishing mind is saying that since one wishes to work for others one should support the body on the basis of craving. In other words, it is saying that craving and providing ones self with beautiful clothes, nice food, and taking care of one's every need is good, because it supports one in benefitting others.

This is a strategic move from the self-cherishing in saying 'oh, I'm being considerate. There's a reason why I'm craving these good things, such as nice food and clothing etc. – it is to help others.' This perspective does occur to us. We may start thinking that if it's for the benefit of others then it must be fine to crave good things.

The answer of course is that it is unsuitable to crave things in order to take care of the body. The commentary explains that it is unsuitable because we work at supporting this body with food and such, on the basis of cherishing it. This means that we will strive to support the body with the most pleasant food we can possibly acquire - the most tasty, the most nicely presented, nice smelling, nice tasting and with clothing that looks nice, and feels soft and pleasant on one's body - while all the time the mind of craving just wants the best for the sake of gratification.

So while not achieving the slightest of one's wishes, one will in fact receive great suffering. The point here is that when the mind of craving desires the best of everything (food, clothing, dwelling etc.), whilst it does not achieve even the slightest of its wishes, one will instead experience great suffering. This is the point emphasised here. It is very true that through the mind of craving we are so used to wanting the best for ourselves that when the slightest thing goes wrong, it causes so much discomfort and unhappiness in the mind.

To further emphasise the point the commentary explains that it will be very hard to support it, meaning support the body with craving, because one falls into the very stage of extreme fragility that makes it hard for it to bear even small sufferings. So as a consequence of craving the best for oneself, when the slightest thing goes wrong, we immediately cannot bear it and so experience great suffering. Then, when something goes well, we feel elated. So we go through these extremes of either elation or disappointment and unhappiness. The state of going through these extremes comes from the strong craving we have for sustaining ourselves.

The next verse reads:

175. *If the desires of
That fallen thus cannot be fulfilled
By all the whole world,
Then who can fulfil its wishes?*

As the heading indicated, these are the faults arising out of craving for the body.

The commentary again explains the meaning with a hypothetical question:

Question: If asked, how will it be then?

The meaning of the verse is presented in the answer:

Answer: Having increased the craving of that fallen thus, even all the enjoyments on this earth cannot fulfil their desires. If that is so, then who can fulfil the desires of this craving? There is no satisfaction in craving sense objects. For example, the King Mandhata had use of the four continents and half of Indra's seat, yet he was not satisfied.

The commentary's question queries how would it feel in that fallen state of not being able to be satisfied and feeling fragile. How would it be when one falls into that state of fragility?

The commentary explains, having increased the craving of that fallen thus, even all the enjoyments on this earth cannot fulfil their desires. It explains that there is no way to fulfil the desires. If by experiencing sensual desires one could be satiated and feel content, then it may be reasonable. But the fact being explained here is that those desires cannot be fulfilled.

The passage, if that is so, then who can fulfil the desires of this craving? implies that there is no-one or nothing that can fulfil the desires of craving. To illustrate this point it explains, for example, the King Mandhata had use of the four continents and half of Indra's seat, yet he was not satisfied.

This shows how a king, with access to much wealth, could still not be satisfied. A point to be emphasised in the next verses is that if one doesn't practice contentment there'll be no end to one's desires and no amount of wealth etc. would make one feel satisfied.

The next two lines from the verse read:

176ab. *One cannot, yet desire generates afflictions
And degenerated thoughts.*

The commentary explains:

One cannot fulfil desire, yet by craving desire objects the afflictions such as anger and attachment are generated, thoughts belonging to the virtuous side degenerate and only mental unhappiness is produced.

A hypothetical question asks, who can fulfil these wishes or desires? And the response explains, that one cannot fulfil desire, yet by craving desire objects the afflictions such as anger and attachment are generated. So while the desires cannot be fulfilled, in craving for them, afflictions such as anger and attachment are generated. All the faulty states of mind are generated, and while afflictions are generated, positive thoughts on the virtuous side degenerate and only mental unhappiness is produced. This is the consequence of craving.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

21 June 2016

As usual we can spend some time in meditation.
[meditation]

Now let us generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines; For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

In our meditation session we attempted to familiarise our mind with love and compassion, which is essential if we are to fully develop these attitudes. Indeed these very positive states of mind are essential assets for personal wellbeing. Acknowledging this, we need to ensure that we are never separated from love and compassion, which of course is done by familiarising our mind with them again and again. To remind you, love is a state of mind that cannot bear to see others being deprived of happiness, and wishing them to be endowed in happiness; compassion is the state of mind of not being able to bear seeing others suffering, and thus wholeheartedly and sincerely wishing them to be free from every type of suffering.

When we understand this spontaneous wish for others to be happy and free from suffering, we can see that is the basis for a genuine concern for others, which contributes to their wellbeing. We know the value of love and compassion when others express genuine concern for us, wanting us to be happy and free from suffering. From our own experience we know that when we feel this great affection from others we respond in a very positive way; it makes us feel appreciated and very comfortable and trusting. If it brings such wellbeing to us, then we can understand that it will be the same for others as well. So when we really think about the value of love and compassion, we can see its essential value as the best companion that one could ever have.

The way to really familiarise our mind with love and compassion is by constantly investigating how best to further develop these states of mind. How does it develop and how is it expressed? How does love increase? How can compassion increase? Investigating in this way, we need to find the best conditions to increase the mind of love and compassion within ourselves. How is it received by others? How does it make oneself feel? The more we investigate along these lines, the more we will see the core value of love and compassion, and the more we will be inclined to embrace and develop it further.

The reason why I emphasise these points again and again is so that we can all see the value of love and compassion. However the most important thing is to actually put it into practice. Indeed, for us who consider ourselves practitioners, there is no more important practice than developing love and compassion, not to mention it being the essence of the Mahayana practice. If one wishes to subdue one's mind, there is no greater practice than acquainting one's mind with love and compassion. If one wishes to overcome delusions, to purify negativities and accumulate merit, there is no greater practice than developing love and compassion.

If you want your Dharma studies to serve as a means to subdue your own mind, then it essential to embrace the importance of developing love and compassion and treat it as your core practice. But if you treat the Dharma like a normal academic study for grades and qualifications, as a means to further increase pride, and a sense of competitiveness with others, to increase anger, jealousy, attachment and so forth, then you need not develop love and compassion. If one's Dharma study becomes a means to further increase the delusions, then rather than overcoming them, it completely defeats the real purpose of that Dharma study.

We need to really understand the crucial benefits of love and compassion – if there was no-one with love and compassion, then there would be no-one to provide help in times of real difficulty and strife. Indeed, the only person who does come to one's aid is someone who has a genuine concern for one's wellbeing, and thus genuine love and compassion. Those who lack love and compassion will not come to one's aid. So we can see how love and compassion serve as the basis for the wellbeing of all.

Of course I am not implying that you are not making any effort to develop love and compassion; I am just emphasising these points as a way to further encourage you, based on my own meagre attempts of putting this into practice myself. I am not claiming that I have developed any great realisation of love and compassion, but nevertheless I take it as the essence of my practice. On a daily basis, I spend significant time trying to develop these states of mind. For example, when doing the prayer of the Four Immeasurables in any practice, I spend some time thinking about each of these points, followed by developing a mind of superior intention, and then I try to really focus on that for a while.

I try to do my best to put these noble intentions into practice on a daily basis, and I see a definite benefit even from my meagre attempts. I find that it can really move my mind, which brings me great solace. I feel it is worthwhile to share this experience with you as a reminder. As someone who is getting on in years I am sharing the experiences and value I have gained from my practices over the years; although you might already be quite advanced and more skilled than me. It may well be the case where the students are more advanced than the teacher!

There are people who come up to me and say, "Oh, I want to be like you". These are just ordinary people who I don't normally associate with or are even people I know. I'd like to respond by saying, 'If you really want to be like me then you could try doing the practices that I do'.

The practice of love and compassion is not unique to Buddhism; indeed it is common to all religions and universally embraced as being an essential quality. Every religion has the message of serving others, being good to others, and bringing benefit to others. All religions commend serving others, being kind, acting morally and so forth, in order to benefit others, make them happy, and release them from fear and suffering. While I am not sure if they would extend that notion to all living beings, it definitely applies to all humankind. Without love and compassion how could one ever bring about happiness for others, and generate the wish to remove their suffering? Because of their intention to benefit others, to bring them happiness and remove their suffering, we can see that love and compassion is definitely expressed and practised in other religions. As Lama Tsong Khapa mentioned, if one wishes to benefit others, one has to have the wish for others to be happy and free from suffering. So he is effectively saying that without wishing other's to be happy and be free from suffering, there is no way that one will generate the intention to benefit others. Thus, there is no way that one can truly benefit other sentient beings without generating unconditional love and compassion.

Therefore developing the mind of love and compassion is essential for benefiting others. In essence, we need to recognise that our most valuable inner asset is the basis for developing love and compassion. If one's love and compassion increases then one can be sure that one's practice is hitting the mark, and that one is deriving the essence from one's practice. As Lama Tsong Khapa also mentioned, the true sign of one's practice taking effect is when one notices that love and compassion is increasing in one's heart. Then delusions will decrease, and the mind becomes more subdued, and one generates stronger faith in the deities, one's guru and the buddhas, and thus the mind becomes more attuned to the Dharma. These are all clear signs of one's practice taking real effect.

3.2.1.3.2.3. Investigating the faults of the body

3.2.1.3.2.3.1.2. It is appropriate to meditate on non-attachment for the body.

We can see that the advice given here specifically applies to the ordained community. Indeed, when Shantideva first gave this teaching it was to an assembly of ordained Sangha. So the very profound advice presented here is for ordained Sangha to put it into practice. The relevant lines of verse begin with:

176cd. They who are independent from everything
Do not experience a cessation of their perfection.

The commentary on these two lines explains:

A person with less desire and with knowledge of contentment, who is independent from everything such as body or possessions, will not experience the cessation of the qualities of their perfections. It is impossible for them to lack the necessities of life.

This emphasises that when one practises less desire and has an understanding of contentment, then one actually experiences an unceasing abundance of the qualities of the perfections, wealth and so forth. By implication, those with strong desire and a lack of contentment will be deprived of real wellbeing, specifically they will be deprived of a happy state of mind. This is really very direct advice.

If desire and attachment and a lack of contentment were to bring about an abundance of things, and wellbeing and enjoyment and a happy state of mind, then we would have to be the perfect example of that. But are we contented? Do we lack for nothing? Do we have an abundance of happiness and joy and perfections? In fact we are not experiencing any great sense of joy or happiness at all.

Indeed, as explained in the teachings, the more we crave, the more we want. The analogy presented in some teachings is it is like trying to scratch an itch; the more you scratch, the more you feel the itch. Likewise, when one lacks contentment and has a lot of desires, then that only brings more turmoil and dissatisfaction. The point being presented here is that those who have less desire and who practise contentment are much happier and joyous.

We can see that this is really relevant for ordained communities of monks and nuns. We can see that those who practise sincerely, such as Christian monks and nuns, definitely have less desire and a great deal of contentment. Apparently monks and nuns in some Christian orders have no personal belongings at all, not even a bank account, and they rely upon whatever the community has. They live a very simple life. I personally know a nun who used to live here.¹ She is a bit older than me and I used to see her in the past, although I haven't seen her for a while. She told me that she became a nun when she was seventeen years old, and then dedicated her life to service for others and caring for them. I was very inspired, and told her, 'You can feel totally confident that you have led a very, very good and admirable life'. We can see that when you put being contented and having less desire into practice, it does indeed bring a great sense of joy.

The Kadampa Mind Training teachings give these specific instructions. 'There are four conditions for arya beings to practise simplicity: less desire, knowing contentment, easy sustenance, and easy fulfilment'.

'The first is not to desire abundant and nice things for one's livelihood, and to abandon all wants.' This implies not having strong craving for, or attachment to, things in general, and one's belongings in particular. Again, this advice is being specifically directed to ordained Sangha.

'The second is to be content with bare necessities.' Knowing contentment means being content with the bare necessities.

'The third is to be sustained by meagre robes, bedding and food.' This refers to being happy with meagre belongings such as one's robes, begging bowl and other things of poor quality, and with what is just enough to sustain oneself.

'The fourth is to be satisfied with meagre alms, material gain and respected service.' The three previous points referred to sustenance in relation to actual things, like belongings and so forth. This specifically refers to being content with offerings and praise and service.

This is a description by the Kadampa masters of how to be content with meagre belongings, and meagre sustenance, such as food and alms and service. The lay community can also learn from this advice. Through being content with the basic requirements for sustenance, life becomes much easier, and there are fewer disturbances in life. We can see that the more we need, the more hectic our life becomes, and that is because we are not content with just meagre sustenance. We want more and more things, and that brings more and more turmoil. These are very important points.

If one does not apply the antidote for overcoming desire, then the consequence is that desires will just increase more and more, to the point where they cannot be satiated. When one allows desire to run rampant then there is no fulfilment. The only outcome is to desire more and more, and thus one never finds an opportunity to feel contented and happy. So although these instructions are specifically for ordained Sangha, they can also be applied to the lay community.

The main advice is to practise contentment with one's life. Although you may not be able to practise to the extent of ordained Sangha, you can generate the mind 'I am quite content, and I am happy with what I have', and not aim for more than meeting one's basic needs. By practising in that way, even just a bit, one begins to feel quite grateful and content with what one has, or what one is earning. That brings a sense of ease and can reduce a lot of stress and anxiety. So this is a very worthwhile practice to implement.

The next verse under this heading reads:

177. Therefore one should not give
The physical desires a chance to increase.
Not apprehending anything attractive
Is a wholesome phenomenon.

As the commentary explains

Therefore, since the desire that craves enjoyment for the sake of the body increases further and further if one does not rely on the antidote, one should not give craving for sense objects a chance. The non-apprehension of an attractive object to which the mind would be attached to is a wholesome phenomenon that is the supreme wealth.

This is similar to the advice in the Kadampa text, which mentions that the best wealth is to be content with what one has. Really, the essence of what is being presented here is that the very purpose of wealth is to be satisfied with it. Contentment is the supreme wealth. That is the point.

3.2.1.3.2.3.2. The fault of being motionless

The verses under this heading are:

178. Its final conclusion is to separate,
It is motionless but moves through the force of others.
The impure body is terrible,
Why hold on to it as your own?

179. Irrespective of whether one is alive or dead,
What does this illusory machine do for me?
What difference between it and a heap of earth?
Alas, you do not eliminate pride.

The commentary explains:

This body will reach the final conclusion of becoming ashes, at which point it ceases. It cannot move by itself but has to move through another, i.e., the thoughts. Since the physical aggregate of impure flesh, blood and so forth is the source for many terrible frightful dangers, why do you hold on to it as your own?

Since one even needs to experience the sufferings of the lower realms if one holds on to it as one's own, irrespective of whether one is dead or alive, what does this illusory machine of a body do for one? It does not have the slightest use. What difference is there between an immovable heap of earth and this body? Oh dear, since you cannot bear craving for the body, alas, why do you not eliminate the pride that is a smug mind arising in relation to the body? Abandon pride in all its aspects!

The body will reach the final conclusion of becoming ashes refers to the disintegration of the body into ashes when it is cremated, which is a reminder of death and impermanence. It cannot move by itself but has to move through others, refers to the importance of thoughts or the mind. Indeed the body cannot function without the mind.

Furthermore, the physical aggregate of impure flesh, blood and so forth are the source of many terrible frightful dangers. Pointing out the faults of the body like this reduces strong attachment to the body. So if this body is nothing more than just a combination of flesh and bone and so forth, and is the source of frightful sufferings, why hold on to, or grasp at it?

Since one needs to experience the sufferings of the lower realms if one grasps on to it as one's own refers to the fact that when one grasps at the body strongly, then that produces the sufferings of the lower realms. The implication of whether one is dead or alive, what does this illusory machine of a body do for one? is that ultimately the body is of no use. So what difference is there between an immovable heap of earth and this body?

Then as words of lamentation, the commentary says, Oh dear, since you cannot bear craving for the body, alas, why do you not eliminate the pride that is a smug mind arising in relation to the body? Abandon pride in all its aspects!

3.2.1.3.2.3.3. The fault of being deluded

This is subdivided into four

3.2.1.3.2.3.3.1. Deluded with regard to what is good and what is harmful

3.2.1.3.2.3.3.2. Deluded with regard to what is high and what is low

3.2.1.3.2.3.3.3. Refuting arguments in this regard

3.2.1.3.2.3.3.4. Although craving for the body is the source for many faults, it needs to be protected to take the essence of the freedoms and endowments

3.2.1.3.2.3.3.1. Deluded with regard to what is good and what is harmful

The verse relating to this reads:

180. By following the advice of the body
One accumulated needless suffering
And generated attachment and anger.
What to do with that which is like a piece of wood?

The commentary explains:

Mind, by following the body's advice for admiration and praise, you accumulated many needless sufferings. Although supporting the body that generates much attachment and anger in relation to benefit and harm, since this body is like a piece of wood that cannot repay the kindness, what use is attachment to it? It is unsuitable.

The explanation in the commentary is presented as a dialogue with the mind. Saying that you – mind - put so much time and effort into sustaining and caring for this body but a lot of attachment and anger arises as a result. There is attachment to what seems conducive for the body, and anger or aversion to that which is not conducive. So in the process of trying to care for this body one engages in actions influenced by strong attachment and aversion or anger. Therefore, in caring for one's body one has accumulated a lot of negativities. But the body itself is like a piece of wood, meaning that having put so much effort into sustaining the body, what do we get in return?

This explanation is not hard to understand; the main point is for us to try to put it into practice.

Then the commentary explains:

Although one has supported it with enjoyments, it is suitable to be even the food for vultures and the like. Since it has no attachment or anger towards the benefit or harm it receives, why does one have attachment for it? It is unsuitable.

As clearly explained here, although one has supported it with enjoyments i.e. various types of sensual pleasures, in the end it is only suitable as food fit for the vultures and the like. This means that at the end, one's dead body is fit only for food for animals. Furthermore it has no attachment or anger towards the benefit or harm. The body itself does not express any attachment or aversion; it has no sentiments when it receives benefit or harm. So 'Mind, why do you have attachment and aversion? If the body has no sentiments when it is benefited or harmed why, mind, do you respond in that way?' This is a logical rhetorical dialogue with the mind to reduce attachment and desire.

When we actually contemplate these points and see their logic and reasoning then it can definitely help to reduce any strong attachment we have to our body. That is the significance of this point.

With the remaining time we will read Chapter 10 of The Bodhisattva's Way of Life dedicating it to our friend Catherine Waters' mother, who passed away recently, and to others who have requested prayers.

We often pray for the kin of those associated with Tara Institute. Even though they don't come along themselves, parents of students are often very appreciative of the changes they see in their children since they have become Buddhists.

In the past I have given an elaborate explanation of how to visualise benefit for all sentient beings in general, and one's parents in particular. There are many whose parents may not be with us at this time, but there is definitely significant benefit in dedicating this practice to one's parents, and others who have requested prayers. Basically, to dedicate means to develop a strong wish for whatever aspirations one has to actually become true. So the simplest way for us to generate the most positive aspirations is to recite the tenth chapter, and strongly wish for all these aspirations to be fulfilled exactly as intended.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

28 June 2016

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can engage in our meditation practice.
[meditation]

We can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: "For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I will need to achieve enlightenment. For that purpose, I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well to further develop my meditation practice".

When one generates such a motivation, whatever positive action one engages in will actually become a cause to benefit other sentient beings.

3.2.1.3.2.3.3. The fault of being deluded (cont.)

3.2.1.3.2.3.3.2. Deluded with regard to what is high and what is low

The verse relating to this is:

182. *Angry when derided due to something
And happy when praised due to something;
But if it has no awareness of this,
For what does one exhaust oneself?*

The commentary explains:

One becomes angry when this body is criticised due to a fault, and one is happy if it is praised due to a quality. But if the body has no awareness of this praise and criticism, mind, to what end do you exhaust yourself with attachment and anger? It is pointless.

The point here is that, when the body is criticised it makes one's mind unhappy, so one becomes angry. When the body is praised, due to attachment one's mind becomes happy and elated. Therefore, being overly attached to the body makes the mind either angry due to criticism, or makes the mind elated due to strong attachment.

However, the body itself has no awareness of the praise and criticism that the mind experiences. Because the body itself is not a consciousness, it is not able to have this distinct awareness: basically the body itself is an inanimate object which does not experience praise or criticism. So why unnecessarily strain the mind with anger or attachment when the body is criticised or praised? When the mind is unhappy, that is when it is most prone to becoming angry. Whereas, when the mind is feeling elated and joyous – by experiencing worldly pleasures – that's when one is most vulnerable to developing attachment.

The teachings on equalising and overcoming the eight worldly dharmas explain that, when difficulties arise, one should welcome them so that one's mind does not become unhappy. This prevents anger from arising. And when good conditions arise, one should be wary and not become too elated, because that will cause attachment to arise.

The practice of equalising and overcoming the eight worldly concerns is, in fact, a profound practice. Some of you may take it lightly and think 'Oh, the eight worldly dharmas. That's a common teaching'. In fact, I personally consider the practice of counteracting the eight worldly dharmas as very important, the pith of one's practice.

As I have explained previously many times, the way to counteract the eight worldly dharmas is by 'equalising and exchanging'. So when you experience conditions that would normally cause you to feel happy and elated, you practise not being joyous; and when you experience problems that cause you distress, you actually welcome those problems and become happy with that situation. This is how you counteract the eight worldly concerns; this is what you need to understand. Indeed as the Lam Rim explains, until one has overcome the eight worldly dharmas, one will not be able to practise the Dharma purely.

3.2.1.3.2.3.3.3. Refuting arguments in this regard

The verse which relates to this heading is:

183. *If, 'I desire this body
And I am friends with it.'
As everybody likes their body
Why does one not like them as 'mine'?*

[While we see the terms argument and answer here in this translation, they are not in the actual Tibetan text. I think the translator has put them there for emphasis.]

Argument: Although the body itself does not understand this, I desire this body, and find it attractive because we are both friends. Therefore I like it.

The next part of the commentary serves as the answer:

Answer: As all sentient beings desire their body, why does one not regard the body of others and its happiness as mine? It is unsuitable to be attached to one's body and deride the body of others.

As mentioned earlier, the body itself has no way of comprehending or understanding praise and criticism. After we accept that point, the commentary offers a further rationale as to why one would desire the body: I desire this body, and find it attractive because we are both friends. Therefore I like it. This is how we normally think and relate to our body; we consider it as a close friend and good companion. So, our worldly mind works to find excuses for attachment to the body.

As the commentary further explains, why does one not regard the body of others and its happiness as mine? Since you say you desire and like your body because it is your friend, then since all sentient beings similarly desire and like their bodies, so why do you not consider their bodies as mine as well? If one finds a reason to be attached to one's body because one likes it, then it would be reasonable to cherish other's bodies as well and not deride it.

This reasoning relates to the earlier presentation of the practice of exchanging self with other. When one takes up the practice of equalising and exchanging self with other, one carries the attitude towards others' bodies that one previously had towards one's own body. There's no difference. If one finds one's body attractive, by that same reason, one should find others' bodies attractive as well and cherish them. Thus, since one engages in the practice of equalising and exchanging oneself with others, it is unsuitable to be attached to one's body and deride the body of others.

3.2.1.3.2.3.4. Although craving for the body is the source for many faults, it needs to be protected to take the essence of the freedoms and endowments.

It is good to derive the meaning from the heading itself, as clearly presented here. Although craving for the body is the source of many faults – one should overcome desire and attachment to one's body because it is the source of many faults – however, it needs to be protected to take the essence of the freedoms and endowments. Because of the great purpose - of what we can achieve having obtained this body with the freedoms and endowments - one has to protect it.

The verse relating to this outline:

*184. Therefore, without attachment
I shall give up this body to the purpose of migrators.
Then, although it has many faults,
I shall protect the body in its actions.*

As the commentary explains:

Therefore, as it is unsuitable to have attachment for one's body, without attachment I shall practise generosity with my body for the purpose of migrators.

From the Four Hundred Stanzas:

One views the body of course as an enemy,
Yet one looks after it.
From living long according to the rules
Many merits will be generated.

Since one achieves a lot of the purpose of others in dependence on this body, although it has many faults, it needs to be protected for the purpose of others, just like worldly beings grasp on to a chariot and use it to carry a burden.

As presented in the commentary, while overcoming attachment to one's body, one sees the purpose of benefiting others, so one needs to protect one's body and engage in the practices of generosity, and so forth.

As I have said before, whenever we nurture our body by partaking of food and drink, we can practise generosity by always first offering it to one's gurus and the Three Jewels. When partaking of food and drink and so forth, we need to always remember: By nurturing my body, I will use it for the benefit of the Buddha's doctrine and of sentient beings". Furthermore, we can utilise this body to engage in the practices of great purification, such as doing prostrations and so forth; and in the practices of collecting merit, such as making extensive offerings and so forth.

The meaning of the verse from Aryadeva's Four Hundred Stanzas is quite clear. When one uses one's body as a means to accumulate merit and avoid non-virtue – such as avoiding the ten non-virtues and engaging in the ten virtues, and thus benefiting sentient beings — then this body serves a purpose.

In my personal practice, I always think of how, by nurturing this body so that it can be used to benefit other sentient beings, it will be worthwhile for me to live as many years as possible by sustaining and feeding it, but without the mind of attachment. As soon the mind of attachment arises, whatever one does to nurture one's body becomes a non-virtue. But if one can constantly remind oneself that the purpose of nurturing and sustaining the body is to benefit sentient beings then, as mentioned in the teachings, whatever actions one does, accompanied by the bodhicitta attitude, will become an optimum means to accumulate merit.

The line in the Four Hundred Stanzas that refers to living according to the rules basically refers to observing morality. Observing morality serves as the ground or basis for our spiritual development. Just as we need fertile ground to grow crops, one needs to observe morality as a way to generate all the other qualities and realisations. If one leads an ethical life by practising morality and has a long life, one can accumulate a lot of merit and benefit other sentient beings.

The commentary further explains that this body needs to be protected for the purpose of others, just like worldly beings grasp onto a chariot and use it to carry a burden. In this analogy, the chariot itself may not have much actual value, but because it is useful for carrying and transporting a burden, human beings will value and look after it. Similarly, while the body itself may not have much value, as a way to benefit other sentient beings, it can be utilised to achieve a great purpose.

3.2.1.3.2.4. Taking control of one's mind

3.2.1.3.2.4.1. Reversing the obstacles to virtue

3.2.1.3.2.4.2. Generating the method of striving in the antidote

3.2.1.3.2.4.3. Placing the mind in single-pointed equipoise on a virtuous object

3.2.1.3.2.4.1. Reversing the obstacles to virtue

*185. Therefore, being fed up with childish actions,
I follow those proficient.
Mindful of the advice on conscientiousness
I stop sleep and fogginess.*

As the commentary reads:

Therefore, being fed up with the actions of the childish, who engage in the obstructing conditions for calm abiding such as craving for sense objects, covetousness, harmful intent and the like, I follow the buddhas and bodhisattvas, who are proficient in what has to be done and what has to be abandoned. Mindful of the advice to be conscientious of virtuous dharmas I strive in pacifying and abandoning the obstacles to calm abiding such as sleep, fogginess and the like, as explained in the Letter to a Friend:

Mental excitement, regret, harmful intent and fogginess,
Sleep, aspiration for sense objects and doubt,
These five obscurations are the thief that robs
The wealth of virtue.
Hence know them well.

As explained clearly here, having reflected on the earlier points, one generates a sense of disenchantment for the actions of the childish or worldly beings who engage in obstructing conditions for calm abiding, such as craving for sense objects, covetousness, harmful intent and the like, so I follow the buddhas and bodhisattvas, who are proficient in what has to be done and what has to be abandoned. One develops this mind of completely overcoming such cravings. So mindful of the advice to be conscientious of virtuous dharmas I strive in pacifying and abandoning the obstacles to calm abiding such as sleep, fogginess and the like.

The need for being conscientious was explained extensively in Chapter Four. The advice here is a way to further overcome the obstacles to calm abiding, such as sleep, fogginess and the like – one practises as explained in [Nagarjuna's] Letter to a Friend.

3.2.1.3.2.4.2. Generating the method of striving in the antidote

As a way to overcome these obstacles, one needs to generate the mind of applying the antidote. The verse relating to this heading is:

186. *Like the great compassionate ones
I shall start suitable actions.
If I do not practise continuously day and night,
Then when shall I leave suffering behind?*

As the commentary explains:

Think: Like the great compassionate ones I shall start suitable practices that generate the power of the antidote. If I do not practise continuously day and night, then when shall I leave suffering behind?

One should strive in meditating on the common and uncommon kinds of calm abiding.

This is clearly presented, so there is no need for further explanation. 'Think' here means one makes the resolve: like the great compassionate ones I shall start suitable practices that generate the power of the antidote for overcoming all the obstacles to developing calm abiding.

If I do not practise continuously day and night, then when shall I leave suffering behind? This rhetorical question implies that if one wishes to leave suffering behind, one needs to practise continuously, day and night.

Then, one should strive in meditating on the common and uncommon kinds of calm abiding — 'common' here being the calm abiding practices common to some of the non-Buddhist schools and tenets, while the uncommon ones belong specifically to the Buddhist presentation.

3.2.1.3.2.4.3. Placing the mind in single-pointed equipoise on a virtuous object

187. *Therefore, to eliminate the obscurations
I take the mind away from wrong paths
And place it continuously in equipoise
On a correct object.*

The commentary explains:

Therefore, in order to eliminate all afflictive obscurations and obscurations to knowledge, one needs to generate superior insight. Before that, one needs in turn to achieve calm abiding, and therefore I turn my mind away from all wrong paths, such as disturbing thoughts of sense objects, which obstruct the generation of calm abiding. By way of the eight abandoning recognitions I shall place the mind continuously in equipoise on a correct object.

Having contemplated the reasons presented earlier, one strives to eliminate both the afflictive obscurations – which include the six root delusions of attachment, anger, pride, ignorance, wrong views and doubt, and the seeds of those delusions, as well as the obscurations to knowledge, which are the latent imprints of the obscurations.¹ To do that one needs to generate superior insight in order to overcome the seeds of the delusions, as well as their imprints. Before that, one needs to in turn achieve calm abiding, and therefore I turn my mind away from all wrong paths.

The point here is that one needs to generate superior insight, which is to be presented in the next chapter, and before that, one needs in turn to achieve calm abiding. So, having been presented with all the conditions for developing calm abiding, I turn my mind away from all wrong paths, such as disturbing thoughts of sense objects.

Further, one turns one's mind away from all wrong paths, such as the disturbing thoughts of sense objects, which obstruct the generation of calm abiding. The actual method for developing calm abiding is referred to here; by way of the eight abandoning recognitions I shall place the mind continuously in equipoise on a correct object. The eight abandoning recognitions are as presented in the Lam Rim.² As I have presented earlier, the definition of calm abiding is: a concentration that is able to focus single-pointedly on a chosen object for as long as one wishes, and which is combined with the bliss of physical and mental pliancy. Then Gyalsab Rinpoche advises:

In short: How to attain the common calm abiding is explained extensively in the Hearer Grounds and the way of attaining the uncommon calm abiding is explained in this text and in Master Kamalashila's Stages of Meditation. Understanding the method from these texts and by contemplating the benefits of meditating on calm abiding and the disadvantages of not meditating on calm abiding, one should strive in meditating on calm abiding by way of the eight stages of calm abiding and so forth.

The eight stages of calm abiding and so forth are presented very clearly in Lama Tsong Khapa's great and medium Lam Rim texts.

Indeed, many years ago [when I taught on the extensive Lam Rim], I presented in detail what calm abiding means, its definition, and how to develop it, as well as what special insight entails. Of course, if I were to repeat those presentations it might serve some purpose, especially to refresh the mind of the older students, and for the newer students. However, since it has been presented earlier, you can refer to that. I will not go into further detail here.

In fact, when His Holiness the Dalai Lama teaches he often says, "I will repeat this point again, even if you have heard it before". His intention is for the newer students to be able to comprehend and understand it, and for older students not to just go to sleep thinking they've heard it already! These are important points His Holiness is mentioning; there is always a need to hear these points again, so this repetition serves a purpose.

Basically, as presented here it is the three higher trainings that are the basis for our development. Morality, which includes the precepts we take, is the very basis, like the ground or foundation. The next training is meditation, specifically the development of calm abiding. Finally, the training in wisdom enables us to develop special insight. Again, we will not go into much more detail now.

¹ Also known as obscurations to omniscience

² Liberation in the Palm of Your Hand, pp. 653-66

The summarising verse by Gyaltsab Je himself succinctly presents these points.

SUMMARISING VERSE

The destruction of the two obscurations from the root
With superior insight to which reality is obvious,
Depends in turn on immovable concentration.
Hence, one should first become proficient in attaining calm abiding.

Here, the two obscurations refer to the deluded obscurations and the obscurations to omniscience. To completely overcome them from the very root, we need to develop superior insight to which reality is obvious; with superior insight one obtains the direct perception and realisation of emptiness. Thus, developing superior insight becomes the ultimate means to destroy the two obscurations. Achieving that, in turn, depends in turn on developing immovable concentration, or indestructible concentration. Hence, one should first become proficient in attaining calm abiding. So this is the point of this pith instruction.

II. THE NAME OF THE CHAPTER

This is the eighth chapter called Explaining Mental Stabilisation from the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas.

This is the commentary on the eighth chapter called Explaining Mental Stabilisation from the commentary on the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

This concludes the Eighth Chapter. In the next sessions, we will continue with the Ninth Chapter. I think the Ninth Chapter is a bit longer than the Eighth Chapter, with a few extra verses, but otherwise almost the same length. I have also taught on the Ninth Chapter, as many of the older students are aware.

So far we have done very well with going through the text, and my intention is to try to complete the text this year. If we can do that, it would be good.

The exam we can leave for August, when I'm doing a retreat. It will be good to do the exam at that time. Also, there's the seminar coming up in August, so it's good for you to do your preparation for that now.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་སྐྱོད་མེད་པའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བརྒྱལ་མོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

5 July 2016

As usual, let us spend some time in our meditation practice. [meditation]

As done regularly, we can generate the motivation for receiving these teachings along these lines: for the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings, and put them into practice well.

Familiarising our mind with the wish to benefit others is indeed a very noble intention, which serves a great purpose. To do this one can generate the very strong intention "I will not harm any living being, and I will extend benefit to any living being that I come across". As we familiarise our minds with this intention, our way of thinking becomes more and more imbued with that sentiment. Then it is definitely possible to reach a stage where we actually embrace the quality of only benefiting others and not harming others in the slightest.

Leaving aside the fact that this noble intention is a cause for enlightenment and buddhahood, just on a human level how wonderful it would be to be someone who does not harm any living being, and whose only intention is to benefit other sentient beings! And it is definitely possible to become such a person. Through familiarity, this motivation will carry on from one life to the next. As we progress through each life, familiarising ourselves more and more with this noble intention, we will definitely become an embodiment of love and compassion.

The reality is that we will not live forever. In fact we are getting closer by the day to the end of this life, which means getting closer to our next life. At death we don't disappear into nothingness; we will actually take rebirth again. So if we ensure familiarity with this noble intention through our practice, then we can secure being reborn as human again with these noble intentions. If we have this inborn quality in our next life then that will be wonderful. This is how we can prepare for our next life, which will come much sooner than we think. It will also ensure that our practice becomes a pure Dharma practice.

As explained in the presentation on refuge, there are two types of refuge: causal refuge and resultant refuge. The resultant refuge is the future states of one's own liberation and enlightenment. No-one else can bestow these resultant states of liberation and enlightenment on us; we have to create the causes to achieve that resultant state ourselves.

Although aspiring for enlightenment in order to benefit sentient beings is a noble intention in itself, that aspiration has to be in relation to one's own resultant state of enlightenment. The significant point here is that one aspires to achieve the resultant state of enlightenment oneself in order to benefit other sentient beings.

[To explain the context of the next chapter we need to return to the subdivisions introduced in chapter 1.¹

CHAPTER 9: THE WAY OF TRAINING IN WISDOM THAT IS THE NATURE OF SUPERIOR INSIGHT

What is the nature of superior insight? More specifically, what is the entity of superior insight? What does it actually mean?

We have just completed the chapter with the presentation on calm abiding. What is the nature or entity of calm abiding? As presented earlier, the entity or nature of calm abiding is a concentration that is obtained by relying on the nine stages of developing mental stabilisation, and which is able to focus on a chosen object for as long as one wishes, accompanied with the bliss of physical and mental pliancy.

The nature of special insight is, based on calm abiding, an analysis on the focused object, which induces the bliss of physical and mental pliancy. Some mistakenly refer to special insight as a state of mind that sees something more or extra than calm abiding. This is a wrong interpretation. Both focus on the same object: calm abiding is merely stabilising the mind single-pointedly on the object and that single-pointed focus on the object induces the bliss of physical and mental pliancy; while abiding on the object single-pointedly special insight is able to simultaneously analyse and investigate the object, which induces the bliss of physical and mental pliancy.

The chapter has two parts

I. Explanation of the chapter

II. Explanation of the title

I. EXPLANATION OF THE CHAPTER

The explanation of the chapter is subdivided into three:

1. Showing that those wishing to attain liberation need to generate the wisdom realising suchness
2. The method of how to generate the wisdom realising suchness
3. Therefore an advice to strive in generating this wisdom

1. SHOWING THAT THOSE WISHING TO ATTAIN LIBERATION NEED TO GENERATE THE WISDOM REALISING SUCHNESS⁸

This is subdivided into two.

- 1.1. General meaning
- 1.2. Auxiliary meaning

1.1. General meaning

In the Tibetan version of the text the verse is not quoted directly under this heading, and the words 'argument' and 'answer' are not specifically used in Tibetan text. These have been added by the translator of the text. We need to pay careful attention to the material in this heading as it explains a succinct point.

Argument: Because we need to attain enlightenment, to pacify all suffering in the continuum of others, we need to realise suchness. But if one wonders why would one need to realise suchness to merely pacify the sufferings in one's own continuum?

The answer to that hypothetical query is:

Answer: The protector Nagarjuna said,
For as long as there is grasping at the aggregates,
For that long there is grasping at 'I'.

This, of course, is a well-known quote from Nagarjuna's Precious Garland, which we studied some years ago. As I explained at the time, it is used in many teachings, and we see it here again. It is a very important point.

As the commentary explains, Nagarjuna is saying that:

For as long as there is true-grasping at [or grasping at the true existence of] the aggregates, for that long one will not stop the transitory view grasping at inherent 'I' and 'mine'.

Nobody here asserts that hearer and self-liberator arhats have not completely abandoned the transitory view, but as one needs to stop true-grasping at the aggregates to that end, it is asserted that they realise the non-true existence [some translations use the term 'lack of true existence'] of the aggregates.

This master [referring to Shantideva] also asserts as well that one needs to realise suchness in order to pacify the sufferings of cyclic existence, which is explained further below.

As explained here, for as long as there is true-grasping at the aggregates, which is grasping at the true existence of phenomena, one will have the transitory view grasping at the inherent existence of 'I' and 'mine', which basically refers to grasping at the inherent existence of the individual self. What is being explained is that without overcoming the wrong conceptions of holding onto the inherent existence or the true existence of phenomena, one cannot possibly overcome the wrong conception of grasping at the inherent existence of the individual self or 'I'.

Grasping at true existence of the aggregates is the misconception that perceives the aggregates as being truly existent. This is our normal perception of the aggregates. Rather than seeing the aggregates as being an entity that is dependent on many parts, their causes and conditions, we perceive them as being independently existent, existing from their own side, without depending on anything else for their existence.

As the aggregates appear to us in this way we apprehend the aggregates as being truly existent without depending on causes or conditions or parts and so forth. Believing in that perception is called true-grasping at the aggregates. Grasping at the aggregates as being truly existent then leads onto grasping at the self and 'I' and what belongs to me as 'mine'.

The complete verse from Precious Garland, part of which was quoted earlier reads:

For as long as there is grasping at the aggregates,
For that long there is grasping at 'I'.
For as long as there is grasping at the 'I'
One creates the karma.

We need to understand how grasping at a truly existent 'I' produces grasping at 'mine'. From 'mine' comes my friends and my enemies and strangers. Strong grasping at my friend then produces the state of mind of attachment, and through that strong attachment a lot of negativities are created. Thoughts of 'my enemy' give rise to anger or aversion, and out of that aversion or anger one also creates a lot of negativity. In relation to strangers one generates a mind of indifference and lack of interest for their wellbeing.

As the commentary further explains

Nobody here asserts that hearer and self-liberator arhats have not completely abandoned the transitory view, but because one needs to stop true-grasping at the aggregates, to that end it is asserted that they realise the non-true existence [or lack of true existence] of the aggregates.

In order to overcome grasping at the true existence of the 'I,' one has to overcome grasping at the true existence of the aggregates. As indicated in the commentary, arhats have definitely overcome grasping at the true existence of the aggregates. One needs to try to understand this explanation as best as one can, because this really is the pith of the unique presentation that makes the Buddhist tenets different from non-Buddhist tenets.

In Buddhist doctrine the view is selflessness while the conduct is non-violence. Other doctrines practise non-violence, but the view of selflessness is unique to the Buddhist tenets, and within Buddhism there are different presentations of this view of selflessness. There was no presentation of the view of selflessness before the Buddha's time in this world.

The way to understand selflessness is that all things that are produced can be understood as having causes. Most would understand that the suffering that everybody experiences must have its causes; there must be reasons and causes for suffering. Some might assert random suffering without a cause, but most logicians and realists would accept that there are causes for suffering.

⁸ The numbering recommences with the new chapter
Chapter 9

As presented in the Lam Rim, the suffering that one experiences depends on karma, karma depends on afflictions, and afflictions in turn depend on the ignorance of grasping at true existence. So when we look into the causes of suffering we find that the root of all suffering is grasping at a self.

Having identified the root cause of suffering, which is grasping at a self, what then needs to be examined is whether grasping at a self can be eliminated. If grasping at the self can be eliminated, then by default the product of that grasping at the self, which is suffering, will also naturally cease. This is how it should be understood.

In this investigation, one investigates whether this state of mind of grasping at a self is a correct perception, or whether it is a false perception. The way to understand that this grasping at a self is a faulty perception - and thus is not based on any truth - is that it is not supported by reality. Once it is understood that the self does not exist in the way that it is perceived by the self-grasping mind, then it can be asserted as being a faulty perception. Then one comes to understand that the grasping at a self is a faulty state of mind, or false perception, because what it perceives does not exist in that way.

When one understands that what is perceived does not exist as perceived then, at that point, one is coming to an understanding of selflessness. The self that is perceived by the self-grasping mind does not exist, and therefore it is void of a self.

One thus comes to understand that the wisdom realising selflessness is what destroys the faulty mind of grasping at a self. When that realisation of selflessness and emptiness becomes very vivid and strong, then that becomes the antidote that overcomes this false perception of grasping at a truly existent or inherently existent self. When that faulty perception of grasping is completely eradicated, then the very root cause of our sufferings is completely eradicated. Then the negativities, afflictions and so forth that arise from that misconception will all cease as well. This is how one needs to understand the view of selflessness and emptiness as being the ultimate antidote for overcoming the afflicted states of mind and all that they produce i.e. suffering and so forth.

One needs to actualise this understanding of selflessness and emptiness in relation to one's own grasping at one's own individual self. Grasping at a truly existent self needs to be overcome on a personal level. Thus the selflessness and emptiness of one's individual being has to be understood. Gaining just a mere intellectual understanding may have some weight, but it does not really serve as means to completely eradicate and overcome the erroneous view of grasping at a self. In order to overcome the erroneous view of grasping at a self, one needs to fully actualise and realise selflessness in relation to oneself. That then becomes the ultimate antidote for overcoming all the mental afflictions. This is the uniqueness of the Buddha's presentation of the ways and means to overcome suffering.

In this way one can understand how suffering is something that can be overcome, because it depends on causes and conditions. When those causes and conditions are overcome, then suffering naturally subsides. If suffering were to occur randomly without any causes and conditions there would not be much one could do to avert it. But because it depends on causes and conditions, which can be identified, one can apply the antidotes for overcoming those causes. Then one can eradicate suffering. So this is how it should be understood.

Of course the logical assertions for establishing selflessness and emptiness will be presented further on. As the commentary presents:

Those that wish to understand this presentation more extensively should do so in dependence on the great commentary by the great divine omniscient Lama Tsong Khapa, who is the guide of all the worlds, on the Introduction to the Middle Way.

Of course, we studied Introduction to the Middle Way in previous classes.

Please dedicate the recitation of the Tara Praises recitation to David Hope, an old student and Member who worked very hard for Tara Institute in its early years. Apparently he is going to be having surgery soon.

Because of his connection with Tara Institute, the students of Tara Institute and myself, when we dedicate our prayers for the successes of his treatment, it can definitely be of benefit. Keep that in mind.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

12 July 2016

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

Now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and for that purpose I will listen to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

Generating such a motivation, even for a few moments, will definitely establish very strong positive imprints in our minds.

It is essential that we regularly pay attention to the noble intention to benefit others, uphold this intention as most essential at all times, and not be separated from it. One should even resolve that 'I will not allow the noble intention to benefit others to ever degenerate; I will never allow my mind to be separated from this intention'. This approach would be most beneficial.

When we ensure we uphold this noble intention at all times, and make every attempt to strengthen and maintain it, that in itself becomes one way of fulfilling the purpose of studying this text on the bodhisattvas' deeds. The text presents profound ways of practising this noble intention and generating bodhicitta. If we can put time and effort into studying these profound instructions, it can actually help us generate this noble intention, maintain it, and provide a purpose for studying this text.

To adopt a practical approach to generating a virtuous mind, and as a means to accumulate extensive virtue, consider the example of saving money. If we took the initiative to save one dollar a day, by the end of the month we would definitely have saved thirty dollars. Think about accumulating a stock of virtues in the same practical way by undertaking small virtuous deeds daily. If we can ensure we put effort into accumulating some virtue daily, then after some time that will accumulate to become a great stock of virtuous merit.

The buddhas and great masters have given very practical advice as a means to accumulate virtues and shun negativity. The Buddha said: 'Don't neglect small virtues thinking that there is no benefit; don't adopt small misdeeds thinking that there is no harm'. One should not discard small deeds, good or bad. If we think 'Oh, that's such a small positive deed there's no point adopting it', or 'Oh, it's such a small negative deed there's no problem adopting it', then we are disregarding the power of good deeds, and the gravity of negative deeds.

An analogy presented by the Buddha is drops of water filling a container; where one drop at a time will fill even a large container. This analogy reinforces the point that the small virtues we accumulate can become great virtue in the end. An analogy to illustrate how even small harms can cause great destruction is the way a tiny spark can cause a huge fire. Even though a spark may be very small, when placed on a stack of hay it can ignite and very soon large flames can completely burn down a stack of hay as huge as a mountain. This is a practical example used to caution us not to underestimate the power of even small good deeds, or the destruction of small negative deeds.

This is how the incomparably kind Buddha gave advice so we can achieve these goals. If we pay attention we can see how significant and beneficial this approach is for us. I'm sharing these points to encourage you to put into practice whatever you have learned, beginning with adopting small virtues and shunning small misdeeds. The very purpose of studying the Dharma is to use it as a means to subdue our minds. If that is the purpose, then without practising the Dharma there is no way to subdue the mind.

When we actually pay attention and start practising what we know, we will definitely begin to see a significant change over time. Contemplating the great value of virtue, and the need to acquaint ourselves with virtue again and again, becomes a means to remind oneself to protect whatever virtuous positive mind one has at any cost. This is essential.

The commentary reads:

While various commentaries on this text present it to teach that hearers and self-liberators do not realise the selflessness of phenomena, this being a mistaken meaning of the text is clearly cognised and shall be explained.

As I have presented this previously, as a way to reflect on the meaning of this point, I'd like you to present the reason why it says here that it is a mistake to assert that hearers and self-liberators do not realise the selflessness of phenomena. In other words, why do hearers and self-liberators definitely need to realise the selflessness of phenomena? Majola, you can give an explanation.

Majola: One has to realise both - the selflessness of the person and the selflessness of phenomena - not only selflessness of person.

Geshe-la: But this doesn't relate to the main point. The text isn't referring to the selflessness of person; it's talking about the selflessness of phenomena. This is reflected at the start of the text. Damien, you can try to explain the reason? So, basically why do the hearers and self-liberators need to realise selflessness of phenomena? This is the main point.

Damien: Because they conceive the aggregates to be inherently existent it's not possible to realise the selflessness of the 'I'. They have to realise the selflessness of phenomena because if they adhere to conceiving that phenomena are inherently existent or truly existent, then they cannot possibly realise the selflessness of person.

Geshe-la: This doesn't relate to the main point being presented here either! I've explained many times previously why hearers and self-liberators definitely have to realise the selflessness of phenomena. Why is that so? This is the main point here. It is stated here in the commentary that other commentaries mistakenly present that the Bodhisattvacharyavatara teaches that hearers and self-liberators do not realise the selflessness of phenomena, is mistaken. In other words, it is saying that they have to realise the selflessness of phenomena. Right?

Damien: Because they are liberated.

Geshe-la: It is not referring to those who have attained liberation; it is referring to hearers and self-realisers in general!

I have worked hard to explain these points to you in the past but you seem to have not retained any of the points that I have explained previously! I've mentioned many times – over 100 times – that grasping at the self of phenomena is a deluded obscuration. So is this clear; do you understand the point? It seems that you still haven't understood the point! Perhaps Denis would be better at explaining it!

Denis: In answer to the question I would say that the antidote to ignorance is the realisation of emptiness, which is the lack of inherent existence of self and phenomena.

Geshe-la: That is a much better explanation.

The grasping at the self of phenomena is a deluded obscuration, and in order to overcome it one has to realise the selflessness of phenomena. Without realising the selflessness of phenomena one cannot possibly overcome the deluded obscurations. So, according to the Prasangika, grasping at a truly existent self of phenomena is a deluded obscuration.

What is being presented in this phrase is that while various commentaries on this text, i.e. the Bodhisattvacharyavatara, teach that hearers and self-liberators do not realise the selflessness of phenomena, this being a mistaken meaning of the text is clearly cognised. This means that it is clearly understood that this is mistaken, which will be explained. It is clearly saying that hearers and self-liberators definitely have to realise the selflessness of phenomena.

The first line in the verse reads, the Able One explained all these different branches for the purpose of wisdom. The commentary explains:

These branches can refer merely to calm abiding which is explained in the eighth chapter, or it can refer to all the remaining perfections starting with generosity. There are these two systems, and although the first system is feasible from the point of view of the relation of the earlier and later chapters, here it is better to follow the second system.

So these branches can specifically refer to how to develop calm abiding (as explained in the eighth chapter), but it can also refer to all the other perfections. What is being presented here is that it is better to follow the system which relates it to all the other perfections. Prior to explaining the meaning of the whole verse, the commentary first explains what 'these branches' refers to.

Having said that, it is good to relate these branches to the other perfections such as generosity and so forth, this doubt is then raised:

The doubts with regards to, 'the branches of generosity and so forth were taught for the purpose of wisdom' are eliminated as follows.

The commentary continues:

In general generosity and the other perfections do not need to precede the realisation of suchness by way of listening and contemplation ...

This is quite clear. Then it further explains:

because although one needs to build up merit to realise emptiness, the practices of a bodhisattva, such as explained here, do not have to be preliminaries.

The commentary clearly says that in order to realise emptiness one definitely has to accumulate merit, but the perfections of generosity i.e. generosity accompanied with bodhicitta, and so forth, do not have to be the specific preliminaries.

As further explained:

This is similar to the two modes of realising suchness through listening and contemplating as explained by the master Shantarakshita.

The commentary then goes on to explain that:

One also does not need them as preliminaries to generate a mind-transforming experience of emptiness, because then they would also have to precede other realisations such as an experience of impermanence. One also does not need them as a preliminary for the generation of superior insight realising emptiness from meditation, because although they do not first engage in the practices of a bodhisattva, hearers and self-liberators realise suchness in the way that was mentioned earlier.

Next a hypothetical doubt is presented:

If you say: They were taught for the purpose of wisdom, because the wisdom realising emptiness is the substantial cause for the dharmakaya, and the methods of generosity and the other perfections are the simultaneously acting conditions, and one needs the benefit of generosity and the other perfections to achieve the result of wisdom.

Although one does need these causes and conditions to obtain the dharmakaya, (a buddha's truth body) the hypothetical doubt raises the issue as to whether the branches of generosity and so forth were taught specifically for the purpose of wisdom for this reason.

The answer encapsulates why this not the case:

Answer: In that case one could also turn it around and say that wisdom was taught for the purpose of the other perfections.

Because the other perfections are also needed to achieve the rupakaya, (a buddha's form body) one could say that wisdom was taught for the purpose of the other perfections. When you turn it around it should also apply, but that is clearly not the case.

Having refuted the earlier hypothetical assertions that the branches of generosity etc. were taught for the purpose of wisdom, now the commentary explains the actual reason.

Thus, without the wisdom realising emptiness one cannot exhaust the seeds of either of the two obscurations, and although one does not need to be adorned with infinite merit to eliminate merely the seeds of the afflictive obscurations, one does need infinite merit to eliminate the seeds of the obscurations to knowledge. As this text is mainly from the point of view of eliminating the obscurations to knowledge it says, 'these branches are taught for the purpose of wisdom'.

The purpose of presenting wisdom here is because it serves as a means to overcome the obscurations to knowledge. In order for wisdom to become a means to eliminate the obscurations to knowledge, it definitely has to be backed by the other perfections based on bodhicitta. In this way we need the practices of the perfections of generosity, ethics, patience, and so forth.

While the realisation of emptiness is needed to overcome both the deluded obscurations as well as the obscurations to knowledge or omniscience, one does not need the backing of extensive merit such as the six perfections to overcome the deluded obscurations. The main emphasis presented here is that the wisdom realising emptiness is not specifically the means to overcome the deluded obscurations, but rather to abandon the obscurations to omniscience. Therefore, the branches, i.e. the perfections of generosity and so forth, are definitely needed as a way to accumulate the extensive merit to overcome the obscuration to omniscience.

The deluded obscurations are, for example, grasping at the true existence of self and phenomena. The imprints of these the delusions, including these misconceptions of grasping to the self of person and phenomena, are said to be the obscurations to omniscience.

The Prasangika specifically explain that due to the imprints of the delusions one still has the appearance of true existence, and these mistaken appearances are actually the obscuration to omniscience.

Let's clarify the difference between deluded obscuration and obscuration to omniscience. With every delusion, such as attachment, there is a distinction between the seed of the delusion and the imprint of the delusion. The seed of delusion is defined as that which serves as a cause for a similar delusion to occur in the next instance. Given the definition of a seed, then for as long as one has the seed of attachment, that attachment will be perpetually generated until the seed of attachment is completely abandoned.

Although one has abandoned the seed of attachment, one still has the imprint of attachment. This is also true for all the other delusions, and it is the imprints of the delusions that cause the mistaken appearance of true existence. Even when one has abandoned the seeds of delusions, there's still an appearance of true existence, up until the point that one completely abandons the imprints of all delusions.

So according to the Prasangika view, all sentient beings' sense faculties will necessarily have this mistaken appearance of true existence because, by definition, a sentient being is a being who has not overcome the imprints of the delusions.

An illustration of when the sense faculty itself is influenced by a mistaken perception of true existence, and how this causes a mistaken appearance, can be seen on a grosser level with the mind of sleep. During sleep we have what is called the sleep consciousness to which all dreams appear. In the dream state we see horses, elephants, houses etc. which are mistaken appearances because they do not really exist. In dreams they appear to the mind as actually existing, but in fact they do not really exist as they appear; they are non-existent.

In syllogisms, the example used for things lacking true existence is that they are like a dream. Things in a dream appear to be real but they actually don't exist. Likewise, truly existent phenomena do not exist.

It is said that it is only a buddha's mind that does not have any mistaken appearances, because a buddha has completely eliminated the very imprints of all the delusions. Thus, for a buddha's mind there is no mistaken appearance whatsoever. For example, an arhat who has overcome the seeds of delusions still has mistaken appearance of true existence, because they have not yet abandoned the imprints of the delusions. So until one achieves buddhahood one has not overcome the mistaken appearances.

Further, the commentary explains that:

It is master Nagarjuna's position that true-grasping is an afflictive obscuration, and this master asserts the same.

It is just as explained.

Next there is a presentation further explaining why calm abiding, in this context, is also a specific prerequisite (or means) to develop special insight.

The commentary explains:

From the Sutra Perfectly Condensing Dharma:

If one places the mind in equipoise one knows the absolute, just the way it is.

Also from the Compendium of Trainings:

The Able One said, 'in equipoise one knows the absolute, just the way it is'.

From these quotations we can see the specific reference that the way of obtaining special insight in order to know existence just the way it is, is dependent on having first developed calm abiding. So we can see why there are commentaries that take this literally and thus don't refer to the other perfections as a cause for developing special insight.

The commentary concludes:

'Equipoise' refers to calm abiding, and 'knowing just as it is' refers to superior insight, and therefore the perfection of meditative stabilisation explained in the eighth chapter is a causal branch for the wisdom explained here.

1.2. Auxiliary meaning

In the text, verse one comes under this heading:

1. The Able One explained all these branches For the purpose of wisdom; Therefore, those who wish to pacify suffering Need to generate wisdom.

The commentary explains:

As one wishes to pacify the sufferings of cyclic existence of self and others, one needs to generate the wisdom realising selflessness. The earlier explained branches of generosity and the other perfections, that is, all the collection of causes, was taught by the Buddha for the purpose of generating the wisdom realising emptiness.

In the first sentence, the word 'selflessness' relates specifically to the selflessness of phenomena. Of course it also covers the selflessness of person, but here it specifically relates to the selflessness of phenomena, as explained previously. When one gets the main point, from then on one can relate to the rest of the explanations in the text and derive the essential meaning. That's the way to study the text; first understand the main point then the rest will follow logically.

According to this system, the wisdom realising selflessness relates to the wisdom realising emptiness. Thus, the selflessness mentioned here relates to the way grasping at an inherently existing self is the root cause for all the delusions and sufferings. Because it is the root cause of all delusions it is the root cause of all sufferings. Is this understood? So if one wishes to pacify the sufferings of cyclic existence of self and others, one needs to definitely generate the wisdom realising selflessness. Why? Because one needs to overcome grasping at an inherently existing self.

When the commentary refers to the earlier explained branches of generosity, it is referring to the earlier chapters e.g. chapter three and four onwards. In summary, the branches of generosity and the other perfections refers to all the collections of causes, which was taught by the Buddha for the purpose of generating the wisdom realising emptiness.

Having eliminated the presented doubts, one can now gain a clear understanding that while, in general, it is not necessary for the perfections of generosity and so forth to precede gaining the wisdom realising emptiness, they are presented first here, because the ultimate intent of this text is to generate the wisdom realising emptiness that serves as an antidote to the obscurations to omniscience.

We can see how the commentary meticulously presents the meaning of the first verse by providing a comprehensive and complete approach; first eliminating any doubts that may arise in understanding the point being presented here, followed by the actual explanation of the verse.

It is good for us to have gone through this process to uphold an accurate understanding of what is presented here. If we allow various personal doubts to surface then there's no end to it, but to eliminate specific doubts as means to get a clearer understanding of the meaning presented here is really good. The main point is thus emphasised: As one wishes to pacify the sufferings of cyclic existence of self and others, one needs to generate the wisdom realizing selflessness. All these branches were explained by the Able One for the purpose of wisdom. So this is clear.

2. THE METHOD OF HOW TO GENERATE THE WISDOM REALISING SUCHNESS

This is subdivided into three:

- 2.1. The presentation of the two truths
- 2.2. Establishing that even just to attain liberation one needs to realise emptiness
- 2.3. Explaining extensively the reasoning that established emptiness

2.1. The presentation of the two truths

This has two subdivisions:

- 2.1.1. Actual
- 2.1.2. Refuting objections of the no-need and no ability regarding emptiness

Again we can see the meticulous way the text is presented with these headings to clarify the structure.

2.1.1. Actual

This is subdivided into three:

- 2.1.1.1. The division of the two truths
- 2.1.1.2. The definition of the two truths
- 2.1.1.3. Identifying the person who has understood both

2.1.1.1. THE DIVISION OF THE TWO TRUTHS

The first two lines of the next verse come under this heading:

*2ab. The illusory¹ and the ultimate
These are asserted as the two truths;*

The commentary reads:

The Compendium of Trainings quotes the Sutra of the Meeting of Father and Son,

The Tathagata comprehended thus the illusory and the ultimate and exhausted the possibilities for that to be known into illusory truth and ultimate truth.

Because the Tathagata sees perfectly in emptiness, knows perfectly in emptiness, manifests as well in emptiness, therefore he is called all-knowing transcendental wisdom.

As the commentary presents, that to be known, refers to objects of knowledge i.e. all existence, since whatever exists has to necessarily be perceived by an awareness. That which is to be known is understood by the Tathagata, the all-knowing one, as illusory truth and ultimate truth. The Tathagata has, exhausted the possibilities for that to be known, meaning that he sees that there is no other way for something to exist than either as an illusory truth or an ultimate truth. There is no possibility of a third way of existence for objects of knowledge.

It further mentions, because the Tathagata sees perfectly in emptiness, knows perfectly in emptiness, manifests well in emptiness, therefore he is called all-knowing transcendental wisdom. The reason the Buddha is posited as omniscient or all-knowing is because he directly and simultaneously perceives the illusory truths and ultimate truths that encompass all existence or objects of knowledge. Only a buddhas' mind is able to perceive both truths directly and simultaneously at one time. So that's why a buddha is omniscient.

[A part missing from the translation of the commentary, which explains the meaning of these quotations, is inserted here.]

The commentary reads:

From the above quote comprehended thus indicates the basis for division of objects of knowledge. Exhausted, indicates the definite division into two truths. And because the Tathagata fully comprehends both truths, he is posited as all-knowing.

The quote says, the Tathagata comprehended thus, which indicates the basis of the division of objects of knowledge. This means that when objects of knowledge are divided, they are divided into two; illusory truth and ultimate truth. And the object of knowledge itself is the basis of the division of the two truths.

Thus, the explanations stating that the intention of the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Deeds is that ultimate truth is not an object of knowledge or that it cannot be known by any awareness are wrong explanations.

The meaning here is quite clear. Then it further explains:

The nature of the division is into a twofold division of illusory truth and ultimate truth.

An example of the two divisions of the two truths would be the aggregates and the person itself. The aggregates and person are examples of illusory truth and the lack of true existence of the aggregates and person are examples of ultimate truth.

It continues:

Although there can be different connotations to a division, here, it is to be of one nature but to be of a different isolate.

And explains:

As both have a nature, it is impossible for them not to be of one or different nature.²

Both illusory truth and ultimate truth have a nature, and because of this they have to be in relation to each other, they have to be either of one or of a different nature.

² Trans: There is a difference between saying one nature and of one nature. For two phenomena to be of one nature they need to have two different natures, or entities. The two truths are not only two different natures, but two clearly distinct mutually exclusive natures, which are yet of one nature.

Ed2: It is difficult to find an exact translation for the Tibetan term ngo-wo, translated as 'nature' in the commentary. Other translations use the word 'entity' rather than 'nature'.

¹ See the discussion of the use of this term in the Translator's Introduction to the commentary.

The commentary further explains:

If the subject is of different nature from the lack of true existence, then the faults outlined in the Elucidations of the Thought apply; such as that it would become truly existent. Moreover, if they are not different, then the faults explained there apply as well.

The aggregates, and the lack of true existence of the aggregates, for example, are of one nature.

The next point explains, Moreover, if they are not different, then the faults explained there apply as well. Using the example of the aggregates, if the aggregates and their lack of true existence were to be the same, to be one and not separate, then there is falsity there because each has distinct terms.

If we say 'one nature' it may sound like they are actually the same, but this is not saying that they are exactly one.

The commentary explains:

Therefore, they are of one nature but of different isolate, just like produced and impermanent.

The conclusion is that they are of one nature, but of different isolates, just like produced phenomena and impermanence.

This sheds light on The Heart Sutra when it says, 'form is emptiness, emptiness is form'. It is presenting exactly the same point; that they are of one nature but of different isolates. There are different terms for form and emptiness because they are different isolates, however they are of the same nature. That is why The Heart Sutra explains that form is emptiness and emptiness is form.

Likewise produced phenomena and impermanence. When you say something is produced, it also implies it is impermanent. When you say something is impermanent it also implies it is produced. Again, both are of the same nature, but are different isolates.

The commentary continues:

So, the basis for division, object of knowledge, is comprehensively divided into the two truths. The nature of the two divisions is that the meaning found by a nominal prime cognition is illusory truth, and the meaning found by an ultimate prime cognition is ultimate truth.

Before our next session please read a bit and try to go over the points I've mentioned this evening, because I will test you again in the next session.

The point of the presentation is that you start to accumulate understanding, so that when this is taught next time, it is readily accessible to you. If the earlier explanations have not sunk in, then it has not served its purpose.

A classic example of this is presented in the teachings with a saying 'Like a yeti catching marmots!' Apparently a yeti, which is an ape-like creature, attempts to catch and eat marmots. These small animals always look around, then hide under the ground as soon as something comes along. So when the yeti tries to catch marmots for its meal, it goes to the marmot nest and attempts to catch the young ones. After catching one, the yeti sits on it, but then gets up to catch another one. When it stands up the first one escapes. So the yeti keeps catching one marmot after another, but at the end, there is only one left. Let's hope this example doesn't apply to your retaining the meaning of the teachings, letting go of an earlier understanding each time a new one is presented. If you employ mindfulness on the teaching, you will be able to remember the points.

Let it also not be like the example of a leaky vase as presented in the Lam Rim teachings, where when you have a leak in the vase, then no matter how much water you put in, it just goes out the hole.

Another example from the Lam Rim is to be free from faults like a stained or dirty vase. If you put a nice substance like delicious food into the vase it will be contaminated by the stains. This analogy illustrates how one should be free from the fault of stained motivations, which are basically negative intentions. This means that while one is receiving the Dharma, if one's motivation is stained, or one has negative intentions, then although the presentation is a cause for liberation and enlightenment, because of the stained intentions it misconstrues that information and uses it in an incorrect way, and so actually prevents it from becoming a cause for liberation and enlightenment; that is because it is stained by negative intentions.

A third example from the Lam Rim is not to be like an upturned vase. You cannot pour anything into an upside-down vase. As much as you pour, nothing goes in. This is analogous to being at a teaching place but with one's mind completely distracted outwardly. When in meditation, the mind is going on the market, on friends, on home, on many things. The mind completely goes outside. Completely empty; not emptiness but just empty like the leaky and upturned vase with nothing inside. The main point again is to read the text and prepare yourselves.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་མ་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

19 July 2016

As usual let us spend some time in our meditation practice. [meditation]

It would be good to generate a motivation for receiving the teachings. As everyone already has some understanding of the bodhicitta attitude, reaffirm the altruistic thought of bodhicitta: In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment myself, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

It is very important that we put into practice what we already understand. We are familiar with generating such positive motivations, and we have familiarised our mind with the bodhicitta attitude. When we put it into practice regularly, then we start to become more and more accustomed to it, which is how we begin to embody that sentiment.

Conversely we could put that understanding aside thinking, "Oh, I've understood that" or "I've already learned that so now I want to learn something different, perhaps something more profound". Of course, there's nothing wrong with practising something new and become familiar with it. However, putting aside what we already know and jumping into something completely new, thinking that it is more profound, is a shortcoming. Often when people hastily engage in something more advanced they are not able to maintain or keep up with it. Then, after a while they become discouraged and put all practice aside! This shows the danger of neglecting what one already knows well, while trying to achieve something grander.

We can gain an understanding of the process of how to progress in Dharma practice from the very title Lam Rim, which means the graduated path to enlightenment. What does graduated mean? It implies actualising the path to enlightenment step by step.

The way to approach personal practice is encapsulated in advice that the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey-la once gave to Jampa Ignyen (Dr Ian Coghlan) when Geshe-la was in Sydney. Jampa Ignyen had apparently approached Geshe-la for some advice about practising calm abiding. As Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey mentioned to me later, his advice to Jampa Ignyen was "Well, it is good to endeavour to understand and practise something that you are not yet familiar with. However wouldn't it be better to actually work on maintaining what you already have?" Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey-la was referring to his ordination vows. Others, having heard that advice later, commented that it was very relevant and practical advice that was right to the point. Venerable Fedor also mentioned that this was really good advice. Indeed, upholding vows and commitments is the very foundation of one's practice and an integral part of it.

2.1.1.2. DEFINITION OF THE TWO TRUTHS

It is essential to understand the two truths, as they are the basis for understanding the entire structure of the teachings. This is the second time that we have covered the ninth chapter in our study group. This is the second time we have studied the entire Bodhisattvacharyavatara teaching. As you will recall, I taught chapters one to eight on Wednesday evenings.¹ Then, because it was perhaps a little too advanced for some newer students who might be coming on Wednesday evenings, the ninth and tenth chapters were presented to study group.² When we think about it, we have been incredibly fortunate to have been able to go through this incredible and profound text, not just once, but twice! I feel that having the opportunity to present and cover such a profound text serves my purpose for being here. Likewise, being able to listen to the teachings and study the text is your great fortune.

We covered the two truths when we studied the *Madhyamaka*³, Middle Way text, and we have also mentioned them in the previous nine chapters. For those who are studying this text for the second time, it is good to recall the explanations that are given in the Madhyamaka (Middle Way) text and compare that with the explanations given here in the Bodhisattvacharyavatara.

You will also recall that the entire text of the Four Hundred Verses, which presents the intent of Nagarjuna's Fundamental Treatise on the Middle Way, explains the stages of the path based upon the two truths.⁴ The first eight chapters are on the stages of the path based on conventional or illusory truth and the ninth and subsequent chapters are an explanation on the stages of the path based on ultimate truth. The Madhyamaka, which also presents the intent of the Fundamental Treatise on the Middle Way, explains the extensive teachings based on illusory truth, and the profound teachings based on ultimate truth.

It is good to have an understanding of the unique structure of the entire path leading to enlightenment:

- The basis is the two truths,
- The path encompasses method and wisdom and
- The result is the two bodies of a buddha.

Through gaining an understanding of the two truths, and by cultivating method and wisdom, one obtains the two resultant bodies of a buddha. The entire structure can also be understood on the basis of the Four Noble Truths. I feel that studying these texts to gain this understanding is one of the best ways to accumulate extensive merit and purify negative karma. Indeed, what better way would there be for accumulating merit and purifying negative karma than contemplating the entire path to enlightenment? It will also leave an exceptionally profound imprint on one's mental continuum.

As mentioned earlier, the definitions and explanation of the two truths are presented in the Madhyamaka in detail. You already have the transcripts and it's good to revise them and familiarise yourself with the presentations there. Incorporating the explanation from the Madhyamaka into the explanation presented here is a good way to gain a deeper understanding of these two truths. It is incredibly meaningful to gain a good understanding of the two for use in one's own practice and meditation, and for explaining and presenting it to others.

2.1.1.2. DEFINITION OF THE TWO TRUTHS

The definition of the two truths in the Bodhisattvacharyavatara, is presented in the second two lines of verse 2.

2cd. The ultimate is not an object engaged by awareness, Awareness is stated to be illusory.

Before we go further, how would you interpret these lines? Is it sufficient to take the meaning literally as presented, the ultimate is not an object engaged by awareness, awareness is stated to be illusory, or is there another interpretation?

Student: It's saying that the ultimate is not an object of a mistaken awareness. This refers to the normal dualistic awareness which cannot engage in ultimate reality.

That was a good and accurate explanation. To make it clearer, you need to add that a mistaken dualistic awareness is not able to directly perceive the ultimate.

If we were to take these lines the ultimate is not an object engaged by awareness, and awareness is stated to be illusory literally, then it would sound as if the ultimate cannot be engaged by any awareness, because awareness itself is illusory. So interpreting the meaning literally is incorrect.

The explanation of the two truths is covered in two parts:

2.1.1.2.1. The refutation of the school of others

2.1.1.2.2 The presentation of our school

2.1.1.2.1 The refutation of the school of others

This refutation of the other schools is quite clear:

Opponents such as the Red Ones from Toelung, using the first line "the ultimate is not an object engaged by awareness" as a statement, and the later line as a reason, have asserted that ultimate truth is unsuitable to be the object of conceptual or non-conceptual consciousness, because if it is awareness of the object of awareness, then there is a pervasion that this object is illusory truth, as shown in the lower lines. This is completely unsuitable, because if one accepts the non-existence of awareness in the meditative equipoise of a superior, then one supports the texts of Those Putting Themselves Afar.⁵ They posit that while there is consciousness up to the point of death, the continuity is severed upon death, and you would accept likewise that while there is awareness up to and including the last moment of the path of preparation, that it does not exist while in meditative equipoise on the mode of abiding.

Further, if one does not accept a directly cognised meaning, an object of knowledge that can purify stains, then the elimination of stains becomes impossible, and one will become somebody that singularly or completely denies that a person can be posited as a buddha or bodhisattva.

If one accepts such a phenomenon, then to have ultimate truth as phenomenon but to not have an awareness that realises it, becomes a contradictory illusory phenomenon. If one asserts that the ultimate is never comprehended, then, since the ultimate cannot comprehend itself, it has nothing that understands it, and thus becomes baseless. If it is like that, then what is the purpose of positing the division of the two truths?

Further, if the illusory is empty of being true, then there is nothing to harm the acceptance that the truth of emptiness is ultimate truth, but lacking that, illusory truth becomes truly existent.

From the *Refutation of Arguments*⁶:

If the mere lack of nature is reversed,
Then it is established as existing in this very nature.

What is being refuted here is the misinterpretation of the lines the ultimate is not the object of awareness, and awareness is illusory. If it is understood to mean that because awareness itself is illusory the ultimate cannot be perceived, then that is completely wrong. These are actually the words of Lama Tsong Khapa, from notes that Gyaltsab Je made when he received teachings from Lama Tsong Khapa. So they are very profound.

It is good to read the text by yourselves, trying to derive an understanding by going through it slowly, reading it and re-reading it to familiarise yourself with it. If you always have to rely on someone else to explain the text to you, then that would deprive you of the opportunity to gain an understanding for yourself. Try not to be discouraged and daunted if you don't understand the meaning the first time you read it, because every time you read it you will get a deeper and more profound understanding. It is quite normal not to gain a complete understanding the first time you read a text. But if you read it many more times, each time you will gain a deeper understanding. This is the proper approach for studying a Dharma text.

Now we come to the actual presentation of our own system or school.

2.1.1.2.2 The presentation of our school

The commentary reads:

The first line shows the definition of ultimate truth and the second line shows the definition of illusory truth.⁷

[Here the translator of the commentary has translated the Tibetan term kun-dzob denpa as illusory truth. The literal translation of the Tibetan words kun-dzob is all-obscuring or concealing and denpa is truth. I personally feel that the usual translation – conventional truth – does capture the intended meaning i.e. truth by mere convention but ultimately not true. However illusory or deceptive truth can also carry that meaning.]

The commentary continues:

Both the earlier and later awareness are dualistic awareness, and not mere awareness, which is from the point of view of the way of comprehension.

⁶ Nagarjuna

⁷ ed2: Here the translator of the commentary has translated the Tibetan term kun-dzob denpa as illusory truth. The literal translation of the Tibetan words kun-dzob is all-obscuring or concealing and denpa is truth. I personally feel that the usual translation – conventional truth – does capture the intended meaning i.e. truth by mere convention but ultimately not true. However illusory or deceptive truth can also carry that meaning.

Thus it has to be related like this: The examples, the lack of inherent existence of the person and the aggregates, exemplify ultimate truth, and the awareness that is a prime direct perception comprehending them does not engage in the object explicitly by way of them appearing in a dualistic manner but are known by the prime direct perception comprehending them.

This point, both the earlier and later awareness are dualistic and not mere awareness, which is from the point of view of the way of comprehension, is as explained previously.

Then the commentary gives the actual explanation of ultimate truth. Persons and the aggregates are illusory truths and the lack of inherent existence of the person and the aggregates are examples that exemplify ultimate truth. As further presented here, the awareness that is a prime direct perception comprehending them does not engage in the object explicitly by way of them appearing in a dualistic manner but are known by the prime direct perception comprehending them. Basically what is being explained here is that the lack of inherent existence of a person and the aggregates as perceived directly by an awareness without any dualistic appearance is ultimate truth.

So, the definition of ultimate truth is: that which is realised in a non-dualistic manner by a direct valid cognisor that realises it directly.

And the definition of conventional truth is: that which is realised in a dualistic manner by a direct valid cognisor realising it directly.

In the past I presented the differences between the definitions of conventional and ultimate truth as presented here in the Bodhisattvacharyavatara and those that are presented in the Madhyamaka.⁸

According to the Bodhisattvacharyavatara, both ultimate truth and the conventional truth are presented as being directly perceived by an awareness, and the significant criterion for both conventional and ultimate truth is that they are cognised directly.

According to the Madhyamakavatara the definition of a conventional truth is: the meaning found by valid cognisor engaged in a nominal analysis, as well as being a nominal cognisor with regard to the found meaning.

The definition of ultimate truth is: the meaning found by a valid cognisor engaged in ultimate analysis which becomes a valid cognisor engaged in ultimate analysis with regard to that object.

So the Bodhisattvacharyavatara is presenting a more general meaning of the two truths, but that explanation is not pervasive. Whereas the definition presented in the Middle Way text is more inclusive, as it includes all of the elements of the actual definition of conventional and ultimate truth.

As mentioned earlier, according to the Bodhisattvacharyavatara, the definition of conventional and ultimate truth is that they are both related to a direct perception, whereas the definition in the Middle Way text includes both conceptual and direct perceptions.

In order to understand the differences between the definitions and explanations it is good to refer to the teachings in the Madhyamaka text.⁹

Before I go onto the explanation of dualistic appearance perhaps Damien could explain what lack of dualistic appearance means.

Damien: Not having dualistic appearance means the object and the mind cognising the object are not one.

What about conventional appearance? Does that mind seeing the object and subject as being one have conventional appearance?

Damien: With all conventional appearances the object is seen as different to the mind.

The Tibetan term nyi-nang-nup basically means lacking dualistic appearance. There are three types of dualistic appearances:

1. The appearance of conventional or illusory truth
2. The appearance of true existence
3. The appearance of the subject and object as being distinct.

For an arya being in meditative equipoise it is said that all three types of dualistic appearances have completely ceased. In other words, the wisdom directly perceiving emptiness lacks all three types of dualistic appearances. Therefore, as I have explained many times, to the meditative equipoise directly realising emptiness the lack of a vase, for example, is the emptiness of the vase. The lack of a dualistic appearance of subject and object is actually the perception of ultimate truth or emptiness.

This reminds me of the time when Tara Institute was located in St Kilda and I was walking on the pier with Ven. Gyatso one day, someone came up to us and said that he was meditating on emptiness. He said, "Oh, I meditate on nothing. In my meditation I have nothing in mind". He also said, "That makes me feel very happy and very joyful". In fact, although nothingness is not actually emptiness, this would be similar to the state of where all dualistic appearance - i.e. conventional appearance, true appearance, and object and subject being distinct - has completely ceased, and only ultimate truth or emptiness is apparent to that awareness.

This is further explained in the commentary with a quote from the Madhyamaka text:

It is like stated in the Introduction to the Middle Way
Mistaken identities such as hairs, etc. [6.29]
Imagined due to defective faculties,

Due to the affliction of disease such as a high fever there is a defective faculty that perceives hairs falling out and so forth. These defective faculties are an example of something that is false and not actually existent. The Madhyamaka verse continues:

Similarly to pure eyes seeing their nature
One should know suchness here.

Just like the mistaken appearance of falling hairs and so forth do not occur to pure eyes that have not been affected by an illness, and which see the nature of the object unmistakably, similarly, the pure awareness (i.e.

Chapter 9

⁹ See teaching of 10 June 2003.

the wisdom directly realising emptiness) of an arya being who is in meditative equipoise, sees suchness or the true nature of phenomena just as it is. Then, as Gyaltsab Je's commentary further explains:

The examples of the person and the aggregates are called illusory truths because the awareness that is a prime direct perception realising it explicitly has to do so in a dualistic manner.

Here we see the meaning of the illusory truth actually being presented. This is exactly as explained earlier.

Thus the line the ultimate is not an object engaged by awareness presents the definition of ultimate truth, and the line awareness is stated to be illusory presents the definition of illusory truth.

The commentary explains that:

The examples of the person and the aggregates are called illusory truths because the awareness that is a prime direct perception realising it explicitly has to do so in a dualistic manner.

This is an explanation of illusory truth in accordance with the line awareness is stated to be illusory.

Then:

One should become acquainted with a more elaborate analysis of this from the commentary on the Introduction to the Middle Way composed by Je Rinpoche himself.

Therefore, the need to know thus in detail the detailed definitions of the two truths pervades also the two transcendental wisdoms of a buddha. This is so because although the transcendental wisdom of a buddha knowing suchness understands the world of multiplicity, and the transcendental understanding of the world of multiplicity understands suchness, the understanding of suchness is like water into water, and the understanding of the world of multiplicity is in a dualistic manner.

These explanations have been presented in the past.

What does the wisdom of a buddha knowing suchness and that which understands the world of multiplicity relate to?

Student: Is it the world of multiplicity conventional reality?

Geshe-la: And knowing suchness?

Student: Ultimate reality

That is indeed the case. The wisdom of a buddha knowing suchness relates to knowing ultimate truth, and understanding the world of multiplicity relates to conventional or illusory truth. So as explained here, a buddha's mind that knows suchness also understands the world of multiplicity, and the transcendental understanding of the world of multiplicity understands suchness. The understanding of suchness is like water into water and the understanding of the world of multiplicity is in a dualistic manner. Even though they understand that a buddha's awareness perceives the world of multiplicity and vice-versa, the way of understanding it is slightly different.

Next:

An argument by an opponent who does not understand the meaning of the commentary on the Introduction to the Middle Way at all: It is illogical to assert that a buddha's transcendental wisdom appears to itself as there are only two ways for it to appear.

The argument here is that it is not possible for a buddha's awareness to appear to itself. If a buddha's transcendental wisdom were to appear to itself then there are only two ways for it to appear – either as being one with each other or separate. As explained here:

If it appears as different, then, since it is impossible for a buddha's transcendental wisdom to be mistaken with regards to the appearing object, one would need to accept that it is different from itself.

If the transcendental wisdom that appears to a buddha's mind were to be separate from the buddha's transcendental wisdom itself, then that would be absurd. That is because it implies that a buddha's transcendental wisdom is not a buddha's transcendental wisdom, because it is separate to itself.

Furthermore,

If it appears as water into water, then it would irrefutably be ultimate truth.

Gyaltsab Je's explanation, which serves as an answer, is:

A buddha's transcendental wisdom realises everything that is established as one entity with itself but is of different isolate on the basis of appearance, and regardless of whether it realises the name implicitly or not, it realises itself although not appearing to itself.

The explanation is that a buddha's transcendental wisdom realises everything that is established as one entity with itself but is of different isolate (similar to the aspects of being produced and impermanent) realised on the basis of appearance. Regardless of whether it realises the name implicitly or not, it realises itself although not appearing to itself.

What is being established is that a buddha's transcendental wisdom does appear to itself. But you cannot say that things appear implicitly to a buddha's mind, because whatever appears in the buddha's mind has to appear directly. There is no implicit appearance for a buddha's mind. Therefore it has to be established that all objects of knowledge, i.e. all existence, appears to a buddha's mind directly.

The way to establish this is that the transcendental wisdom i.e. a buddha's mind, appears directly to a buddha's transcendental wisdom or mind, however it appears as being separate. It appears directly but as being separate to the buddha's transcendental wisdom. But it's not actually separate because, as presented in the earlier argument, if it appears to be separate then it has to be separate. So, the conclusion is that while the Buddha's mind is not separate from itself, it does however appear as if it is separate. This is the point to be understood. For example, the characteristics of impermanence and production, although being of one nature, are different isolates and so they appear as being separate.

A further explanation to establish one's own system, is presented:

If it is the prime direct perception apprehending blue of an ordinary individual, then it does not appear to itself, as it is impossible for it to be a self-knowing direct perception.

In this system a self-knowing direct perception is not being accepted. It is established that when the colour blue appears, the impermanence and the characteristic of being produced and all of that also appear to that same perception.

As further explained:

It is also unsuitable to be posited as realising, on the basis of appearance, the other parts that are established as being of one entity with it. It is singularly an implicit realisation in dependence on the explicit realisation of blue, and one should know that such an implicit realisation is impossible for a buddha.

As mentioned previously, for a buddha there is no implicit realisation – everything is realised directly. In relation to the awareness perceiving blue: it is said that for an ordinary person the awareness perceiving blue perceives that blue directly, and the awareness itself indirectly. Of course you cannot say that a buddha perceives it indirectly, because there is no indirect or implicit realisation for a buddha.

These, of course, are points that I presented earlier in the Madhyamaka teachings, so it is good to refer to them.

2.1.1.3. IDENTIFYING A PERSON THAT HAS UNDERSTOOD BOTH

This is referring to both conventional or illusory truth and ultimate truth, and is sub-divided into two:

2.1.1.3.1. Divisions from the point of view of a person that wishes to understand the two truths

2.1.1.3.2. Explaining the difference of high and low awareness

2.1.1.3.1. Divisions from the point of view of a person that wishes to understand the two truths

The lines relating to this are:

*3ab. Regarding this, two aspects of transitory beings are seen,
Yogis and ordinary beings.*

Then the commentary reads:

A person who wishes to comprehend the two truths is a transitory being, i.e., a person labelled in dependence on the aggregates. This is again seen in two aspects: a yogi with the concentration of the union of calm abiding and special insight, who realises all phenomena as being empty of inherent existence, and ordinary beings asserting real existence. This is from the point of view of emphasis. Those that realise emptiness through listening and contemplating, and those whose minds have not been affected by a tenet are included in these classes.

As explained here two aspects of transitory beings are seen. A person who wishes to comprehend the two truths is a transitory being. In the Tibetan word jig-ten, jig is 'transitory'. While ten is translated here as 'being' the literal translation of 'ten' is 'dependent'. Thus, a person is characterised as an entity who is transitory i.e. that changes from moment to moment, and is dependent upon the five aggregates.

Therefore the definition of a person is one who is labelled in dependence on the aggregates. And as further presented there are two different types of beings:

- yogis, who, with the concentration of the union of calm abiding and special insight, realise all phenomena as being empty of inherent existence.
- ordinary beings are beings who assert real existence, where real refers to functionalities, and existence refers to those functionalities and so forth as existing truly, or having true existence. This includes those asserting real appearance, i.e. actually establishing true existence, such the lower schools – the Vaibhashika and so forth.

As further explained in the commentary, this is from the point of view of emphasis on how it is defined or categorised: those who realise emptiness through listening and contemplating, and those whose minds have not been affected by a tenet are included in these classes.

2.1.1.3.2. Explaining the difference of high and low awareness.

We can leave this for our next session.

In preparation, it is good to familiarise yourselves with the explanations in the commentary and complement that with the explanations in the Madhyamakavatara. It is good to refer to the notes you have and the transcripts of the Madhyamaka teachings. When you refer to both texts the explanations will help to enhance your understanding of the main meaning.

འགྲུབ་ལྷན་པའི་སྐྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

26 July 2016

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: "For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and for that purpose I will listen to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well." Generating such a motivation, even for a few moments, will definitely establish very strong positive imprints in our mind.

2.1. The presentation of the two truths

2.1.1. Actual

2.1.1.3. IDENTIFYING A PERSON THAT HAS UNDERSTOOD BOTH (CONT.)

2.1.1.3.2. Explaining the difference of high and low awareness

This is quite straightforward, and should be quite easy to understand. The verse under this heading is the second line from the earlier verse and the next two lines:

- 3cd. *The ordinary transitory being
Is outdone by the yogic transitory being,*
4ab. *And yogis are outdone as well through distinctions
Of awareness by the one above.*

The commentary explains:

Ordinary transitory beings who assert partless particles, partless moments of consciousness and functionalities as existing truly are transitory beings, as well as yogis. The yogic person who realises the transient world as lacking inherent existence outshines the lower tenets that propound realism, and among the yogis who have attained a union of calm abiding and special insight, the higher ones outdo the lower ones. With reasoning the Madhyamikas refute the Cittamatras' assertion of truly existing mind, which is in turn refuted with reasoning the assertion of partless particles by the Sautrantikas.

Here, ordinary transitory beings refers to the Realists, such as the Sautrantika. They assert partless particles i.e. particles which cannot be divided, partless moments of consciousness (i.e. consciousness that cannot be divided into earlier and later moments), and functionalities, as existing truly.

The verse and commentary further state that the ordinary transitory being is outdone by the yogi or yogic transitory being. And yogic transitory beings such as the Madhyamikas, who realise the transient world lacking inherent existence, outshine the lower tenets that propound realism. This is quite straightforward.

Where the commentary next says that among the yogis who have attained a union of calm abiding and special insight, the higher ones outdo the lower ones, the literal translation of the Tibetan word is to 'harm' the lower ones. The context of 'harm' here should not be misinterpreted: it does not refer to any malicious intent. Rather, the intended meaning here is that the assertions of the lower schools are harmed i.e. outshined by the higher schools through logic and reasoning.

The commentary thus explains that the higher ones harm, i.e. outdo, the lower ones through logic and reasoning: with reasoning the Madhyamikas refute the Cittamatras' assertion of truly existing mind, which [referring to the Cittamatras] in turn refutes with reasoning the assertion of partless particles by the Sautrantikas. Thus, through reasoning and logic, the assertions of proponents of the higher schools, that is the Madhyamikas, outshine those of the Cittamatras, and the Cittamatras' proponents, in turn, outshine those of the Sautrantika and Vaibhashika schools.

Next, a hypothetical doubt is raised and resolved:

If one wonders whether the yogis who realise emptiness outdo each other or not: Also among the yogis who have realised emptiness, those on the higher grounds such as on the second ground and so forth, harm, i.e., outshine, those on the lower grounds, such as on the first ground and so forth, due to a distinction of their awareness.

Thus, what is being explained is that because of their qualities, those on the higher grounds naturally outshine those on the lower grounds. For example, bodhisattvas on the first ground are said to have twelve hundred qualities, and bodhisattvas on the second ground have twelve thousand qualities. The qualities of each of the grounds above are multiplied by a thousand times. This was covered in detail when we were doing the Madhyamaka teachings. Thus, bodhisattvas on higher grounds, because of their significant extra qualities, naturally outshine the bodhisattvas on the lower grounds.

Those who recall the explanations in the Madhyamaka will be able to immediately understand the presentation here. With that earlier understanding what is presented will not be new and complicated, but for those who have not done that study it will be something completely new. So it is important to refresh what you had learned by reading your notes from the Madhyamaka teachings. For example, as I presented in detail during the Madhyamaka teachings, those on the first ground have hundred-fold qualities such as being able to see a hundred fields of the buddhas, being able to ripen the minds of one hundred disciples, taking a hundred births and so forth.

The second ground is multiplied by a thousand, so being able to see a thousand fields of the buddhas, being able to ripen the minds of one thousand disciples, and so forth. These qualities are progressively multiplied on each of the higher grounds. This is how, with the extra qualities obtained on the higher grounds, these bodhisattvas naturally outshine the beings on the lower grounds.

If we were to think about it in terms of the paths, then bodhisattvas on the path of accumulation are outshined by bodhisattvas who have reached the path of preparation. Then bodhisattvas on the path of preparation would be outshone by those who have obtained the path of seeing, and are outshined by the bodhisattvas on the path of meditation, and they in turn are outshined by bodhisattvas on the path of no-more-learning. For each ground and path, the later bodhisattvas outshine the ones on the lower grounds and paths. This is how we need to understand how the higher ones outshine the lower ones.

What follows next in the commentary are the actual words of Lama Tsong Khapa, which would have been taken down as notes by Gyaltzab Rinpoche. So these are very profound points being presented here:

In addition, one should understand the implicit meaning, that also from the point of view of one continuum, an increased awareness through meditation of the higher grounds can harm the seeds that are to be abandoned, whereas the lower grounds cannot harm them.

So, while the earlier context of 'outshining' referred to beings of different continuums, or higher beings outshining lower beings, here the text clarifies that this principle applies even within the mental continuum of one individual being. We can understand that, as the qualities gained as one's realisations of meditation increase, and as one gains higher grounds, one is able to harm the seeds that are to be abandoned on that particular ground, which cannot be abandoned whilst on the lower grounds.

For example, the uninterrupted path of seeing can harm the seeds that are to be abandoned on the path of seeing, but cannot harm the seeds that are to be abandoned on the path of meditation, which has not been obtained yet. Thus, within the mental continuum of one individual being, the seeds that are to be abandoned on that particular path cannot be abandoned whilst abiding on a lower path.

The significant point of the statement, whereas the lower grounds cannot harm them, is that while the qualities obtained on the higher grounds would outshine the qualities obtained on the lower grounds, the qualities obtained on the lower grounds cannot possibly outshine those obtained on the higher grounds. In other words, by explicitly presenting here that the qualities of the higher ground outshine those of the lower, the implicit meaning is that the qualities of the beings on the lower ground cannot possibly outshine the qualities of the beings on higher grounds.

The commentary further explains:

The purpose of stating these scriptures is to gain the certainty that awareness is divided into awareness that realises the illusory and awareness that realises the ultimate. If an awareness realising the ultimate is not harmed by a prime cognition realising the illusory, then what need is there to mention it being harmed by the grasping at partless particles?

As explained clearly, what is to be realised by awareness falls into the category of either illusory truth or ultimate truth. So what is being explained here is that if it is an awareness that is a prime cognition realising a truth, then it has to be either an awareness realising illusory (or conventional) truth or an awareness realising ultimate truth. But of course awarenesses do not necessarily have to realise either of the two truths. For example the mind grasping at true existence is an awareness, but it doesn't realise either of the truths.

Then it further mentions if an awareness realising the ultimate is not harmed by a prime cognition realising the illusory, then what need is there to mention it being harmed by the grasping at partless particles?

A concluding statement is then presented:

The purpose [of presenting all this] is to understand that the awareness realising the ultimate harms all extreme views.

This is the main point: the awareness realising the ultimate completely extinguishes all extreme views.

The commentary then explains:

Further, it is to understand that a mistaken assertion by the lower is refuted with logic by the higher.

This has been presented previously.

Through the distinction of their awareness, yogis of the Vaibhashika and Sautrantika harm with logic the assertion of permanent functionalities accepted by the non-Buddhist schools, the acceptance of partless particles by the two Asserting Meaning¹ is harmed with logic by the Mind Only, and the acceptance of truly existent mind by the Mind Only is harmed with reasoning by the Madhyamaka.

Here, we are succinctly reminded of the incredibly skilful means by which the Buddha taught his disciples, leading them from views of the lower tenets up to the highest tenets. The main point here is to understand that a mistaken assertion by the lower is refuted with logic by the higher.

To give an example of overcoming wrong views and assertions with reasoning and logic, some proponents of non-Buddhist schools would accept sound as being permanent. Thus a logical syllogism to prove that this is incorrect would be: The subject 'sound' is impermanent – because it is produced". For someone who initially had the wrong view of sound being permanent, when the reasoning of that syllogism becomes apparent to their mind, they would be able to replace that mistaken view with the understanding that sound is impermanent, because of the reason that it is produced.

In this way, each misconception, such as grasping at permanence in general and grasping at true existence, can be overcome with correct reasoning to prove that it is a mistaken conception. When logical syllogisms are presented in the teachings, we need to study them and get an understanding of them. Then we must utilise this understanding to overcome the wrong conceptions that we personally hold, rather than just using them for theoretical debate. It is much more meaningful for one to apply this understanding to one's own misconceptions; we all grasp at permanence, holding things as being permanent, and likewise we all grasp at true existence.

When these reasons are applied to one's own mental continuum as a way to overcome misconceptions, they act as antidotes. For example, we can all relate to the shortcomings of anger. That which serves as an opponent or antidote to anger is patience. The more we practise patience, the weaker our anger becomes.

So if, when we engage in study, we relate it to our own mental continuum, we will really begin to taste the true essence of the teachings. This will not be apparent to one right away; when we read the text, the understanding will not dawn upon us immediately. However gradually, time after time, if we are persistent, things will become clearer and clearer. Then we can apply our understanding to our practice. That would be the proper way.

The explanation ends here with:

The earlier explanation is the view of the Great Commentary.

2.1.2. Refuting objections of no-need and no ability regarding emptiness

That is subdivided into two:

2.1.2.1. Actual

2.1.2.2. Defending one's position

2.1.2.1. ACTUAL

The verse under this heading is preceded by the argument:

Argument: If you say, it is not valid that the yogi who realises that all phenomena lack inherent existence harms ordinary tenets, because there is no evidence for the lack of inherent existence. If there is no inherent existence, then there would be no point in training in generosity and so forth to attain the result of enlightenment.

Then the first two lines of the verse are presented as the answer:

*4cd. Through examples asserted by both,
There is no investigation towards a result.*

Answer: It follows that it is not the case that there is no evidence for the lack of inherent existence, because for both Madhyamaka and Realists, the lack of inherent existence is established in dependence on examples that were well known and accepted as being false, such as dreams and illusions.

Further:

If there is no inherent existence, it does not follow that training in generosity and the other perfections is pointless. Although generosity and so forth, which are practised in order to attain the result of enlightenment, are not truly established, one engages in them without investigation or analysis while holding them with the wisdom realising them to be false, like an illusion. If the remaining perfections are not held by the wisdom realising the lack or absence of inherent existence, then they do not gain the name 'having gone beyond' [which is another term for perfection] and they, as well as their objects, need to be guided up to the city of enlightenment.

What is being presented here in the commentary, which serves as the answer to the earlier argument, is that basically it is not true that there is no evidence for the lack of inherent existence. What the Madhyamikas are saying is that for both we the Madhyamikas and you the Realists, it follows that it is not the case that there is no evidence for the lack of inherent existence because for both Madhyamika and Realists the lack of inherent existence can be established in dependence on examples which we both accept as being false, such as dreams and illusions.

So the lack of inherent existence can be established by examples, such as dreams and illusions. Since we both [i.e. the Realists and Madhyamikas] agree that these are examples of falsity, these examples can be used as reasons to prove the lack of inherent existence.

The second part of the earlier argument said: If there is no inherent existence, then there would be no point in training in generosity and so forth to attain the result of enlightenment.

However this is not the case. As explained here, although generosity and so forth, which are practised in order to attain the results of enlightenment, are not truly established, one engages in them without investigation or analysis while holding them with the wisdom realising them to be false, like an illusion. Using the example of an illusion, one can establish the lack of inherent existence of the training in generosity and so forth.

If, without going into specific investigation or analysis, the remaining perfections are not held by the wisdom realising the lack or absence of inherent existence, then they do not gain the name 'having gone beyond' [or do not bear the name 'perfection'] and they, as well as their objects, need to be guided up to the city of enlightenment.

The point here, as I've explained previously many times, is that not only the perfection of wisdom, but all the earlier perfections need to also be combined with wisdom – otherwise it would be as if they were blind. The earlier practices such as generosity, morality and so forth cannot, in themselves, become a means to achieve full enlightenment without the wisdom realising emptiness. Without the wisdom realising emptiness they are like a blind person who cannot go to a faraway destination by themselves. Thus, the earlier practices of generosity and so forth, need to be complemented with the wisdom realising emptiness, whereby they become the perfection of generosity and so forth.

For example, when generosity is complemented with the wisdom realising emptiness, it is practised with the understanding that all three – the individual who is being generous, the substance that is being given, and the recipient of the generosity – are empty of inherent existence. With that realisation, generosity becomes a perfection of generosity. These particular characteristics are similarly applied to the rest of the perfections. The reason the perfections practised in this way are referred to as practices that are 'gone beyond' is that they lead to the state of enlightenment which is to go beyond samsara. They, as well as their objects, need to be guided up to the city of enlightenment.

The point here is that when we really pay close attention to what is being explained and really contemplate it, the meaning will become clearer and clearer as we read through the text.

As part of an argument, the commentary further says:

Argument: If also you accept that fire, that which can perform the function of cooking and burning, and other functionalities and their functions, are established by direct perception, then our debate is pointless, because we both call that truly existent. If you do not accept this, then you receive the harms of being contradicted by direct perception and the like.

This argument is from a lower school, the Realists, who are proponents of true existence. They argue, if you – meaning the Madhyamikas – accept that functionalities like fire, which can perform the function of cooking and burning, and other functionalities and their functions, are established by direct perception then our debate is pointless. Here, the Realists are saying that the true existence of a fire is demonstrated by the fact that it can cook, burn and so forth, which is established by direct perception. The Realists argue we both call that truly existent. If you do not accept this, then you receive the harms of being contradicted by direct perception and the like.

However, that which serves as part of the answer here is:

Answer: This argument is based on the view that the two truths contradict each other, i.e., if functionalities do not exist inherently, they become completely non-existent, and if they do exist, then they have to exist inherently.

In other words, it is because you fail to know this subtle distinction, that you raise your argument.

The next verse under the earlier heading is:

5. *Transitory beings see objects
And think they exist perfectly,
Not like an illusion; therefore here
The yogi and the transitory being disagree.*

The commentary explains the meaning:

Both Madhyamika and Realist worldly beings² see fire and the like with prime cognition and accept them, but the Realists think of and accept them as being wholly perfectly established objects, and do not comprehend them as being illusory-like and lacking true existence. The Madhyamikas do comprehend them as such, and therefore also in this regard do the Madhyamika yogis and the Realist worldly beings have a dispute.

While the commentary says that both Madhyamika and Realist worldly beings see fire and the like with prime cognition i.e. the eye consciousness and accept them, it points out that the difference is that the Realists don't comprehend them as being like an illusion and as lacking true existence. On the other hand, the Madhyamikas do comprehend them as such, meaning that the Madhyamikas comprehend fire and the functions of fire and so forth as being like an illusion, and lacking true existence.

And therefore also in this regard do the Madhyamika yogis and the Realist worldly beings have a dispute, meaning that this is where the actual debate or disagreement in perceiving the fire lies.

2.1.2.2. DEFENDING ONE'S POSITION

This is subdivided into three:

2.1.2.2.1. Refuting realists such as the Sautrantika in general

2.1.2.2.2. Refuting the Mind Only in particular

2.1.2.2.3. Refuting the argument that the path realising emptiness has no use or purpose for a Madhyamika

2.1.2.2.1. Refuting realists such as the Sautrantika in general

This is further subdivided into two:

2.1.2.2.1.1. Refuting harm through direct perception

2.1.2.2.1.2. Refuting harm through quotations

2.1.2.2.1.1. Refuting harm through direct perception

The argument presented here under the heading first is:

Argument: If you say, if the five sense objects are not established inherently, then it would contradict them being seen with direct perception.

The argument is that if the five sense objects are not established inherently, this would contradict them being seen with direct perception.

The first two lines of the next verse are:

6ab. The mere direct perception of forms and so forth Exists through renown and not by prime cognition.

The commentary then provides the answer to this argument:

Answer: This is not valid. The prime direct perception of form and the other objects is merely a prime cognition of the renowned illusory aspect. It does not establish their suchness, and does not become a prime cognition in relation to their suchness. In that case, as even ordinary individuals would see suchness, there would be no need to generate a superior path. Also, the quote from the King of Concentration Sutra, "the eye, ear and nose are also not prime cognition" is to be understood as refuting them being prime cognitions of suchness.

As clearly explained here, the earlier argument is not valid because the prime perception of form and the other objects is merely a prime cognition of the renowned illusory aspect, meaning that they're accepted as prime cognition of conventional appearance, but this does not establish their suchness.

Further, and does not become a prime cognition in relation to their suchness means that, if it were the case that prime cognition of form and other objects related to the object's suchness, then as even ordinary individuals would see suchness, or emptiness, there would be no need to generate a superior path. If, through their prime cognition, ordinary beings could realise the ultimate nature of things — suchness or emptiness — there would be no need for the superior path. That is what is being presented quite clearly.

The commentary then shows how one should understand the quote from the King of Concentration Sutra in its proper context. The quote itself reads: the eye, ear and nose are also not a prime cognition. If one were to take that literally, it would sound as if the sutra is saying that the eye, ear, nose and remaining five sense faculties are not prime cognitions. But, as the commentary explains, this is to be understood as refuting them to being prime cognitions of suchness or emptiness.

A further explanation of the next verse is presented again with the argument from the Realists:

Argument: If forms and the other objects do not exist inherently [as the Madhyamikas assert] then how can they be renowned, and although being renowned, how are they false?

This argument is presented to contradict the Madhyamikas. It posits that if objects do not exist inherently (as the Madhyamikas assert) but are renowned conventionally, then how can they be false? If they're renowned as conventionally existent, how can they be false at the same time? That's what the Madhyamikas assert: while objects are true conventionally, they're called illusory truths, because ultimately they do not exist in the manner in which they appear.

² Gyaltsab Je: Or one relates the earlier worldly beings only to the Realists.

The next two lines are presented:

*6ab. They are false, just as impurity and so forth
Are renowned as purity and so forth.*

These two lines of verse serve as an answer to the argument that if an object is renowned, how can it be false?

The meaning of these two lines is presented in the commentary:

Answer: Functionalities are false in the same way as the impure body of a woman, among other things, is renowned to be pure and so forth.

What is renowned in the world, or known conventionally, is that the body is pure and thus desirable. But in reality the body is not pure; there are many impure substances within the body. So, although the body is perceived as pure by worldly people, this perception is false, because the body is not pure. Other functionalities are false in the same way. This is the point emphasised here.

2.1.2.2.1.2. Refuting harm through quotations

This is subdivided into three:

2.1.2.2.1.2.1. Showing the sutras which state that compounded phenomena are impermanent and so forth to be interpretative

2.1.2.2.1.2.2. Refuting them to be definitive

2.1.2.2.1.2.3. Refuting that one is in contradiction

2.1.2.2.1.2.1. Showing the sutras which state that compounded phenomena are impermanent and so forth to be interpretative

The argument presented here is:

Argument: If you say if forms and other objects are not established inherently, then it is contrary to the sutras stating that they are impermanent.

The next two lines that serve as an answer to this:

*7ab. For the purpose of introducing transitory beings
The protector showed functionalities.*

The commentary explains the meaning of these two lines that serve as an answer to the argument:

Answer: There is no contradiction as the Protector showed forms and the other functionalities to be impermanent in order to lead the transitory beings gradually to emptiness.

2.1.2.2.1.2.2. Refuting them to be definitive

The line from the verse:

7c. They are not momentary in suchness.

From the commentary:

These functionalities are not momentary in suchness because in suchness they are not established as one or many.

Here, the older students will recall the presentation in the Madhyamakavatara, which I've covered numerous times, of the reasons that prove the lack of inherent existence. It is said that inherent existence has to be either established as being inherently one or inherently separate. The reasoning that I've presented previously is presented here.

This reasoning is presented in the Madhyamaka text, as well as in The Four Hundred Verses, and Precious Garland, which we have also studied. These texts have presented this reasoning, so you can refer to them.

2.1.2.2.1.2.3. Refuting that one is in contradiction

This has five divisions:

2.1.2.2.1.2.3.1. Refuting that they are not even established as illusory

2.1.2.2.1.2.3.2. Refuting that the build up of the accumulations would be invalid

2.1.2.2.1.2.3.3. Refuting that taking rebirth would be invalid

2.1.2.2.1.2.3.4. Refuting that the division into virtue and negativity would be invalid

2.1.2.2.1.2.3.5. Refuting that the distinctive individual realisation of samsara and nirvana would be invalid

We will conclude here. You'll be aware that the next session will be a discussion?

Now, generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings.

2.1.2. Refuting objections of no-need and no ability regarding emptiness

2.1.2.2. DEFENDING ONE'S POSITION

2.1.2.2.1. Refuting Realists such as the Sautrantika in general

2.1.2.2.1.2. Refuting harm through quotations

2.1.2.2.1.2.3. Refuting that one is in contradiction

2.1.2.2.1.2.3.1. Refuting that they are not even established as illusory

The last line of the earlier verse and the first line of the next verse is presented.

7d. If said to be contradictory even with the illusory;

8a. The yogis are not at fault in the illusory

The commentary first presents the argument of the opponent:

Argument: Even on the illusory level, it would be contradictory for compounded phenomena to be impermanent because in the world functionality in the morning is renowned to also exist permanently in the evening. There is no contradiction ...

The Sautrantikas' argument here is that, besides impermanence being doubtful in an ultimate sense, even at an illusory or conventional level, it would be contradictory for compounded phenomena to be impermanent. The reason presented here for that argument is because in the world functionality in the morning is renowned to also exist permanently in the evening. This is indeed how we normally think. For example, when we meet someone again we think, 'This is the same person I saw earlier'. And when we refer to things, we treat the thing that we perceive now as the same thing that we saw earlier.

Normally, if we meet someone later in the day after having seen them that morning, we would say, 'I saw you this morning'. This means that we perceive and believe that the person we see now has not changed in any way from the person we saw in the morning. We make these comments because our perception is that nothing has really changed. But on the subtler level of impermanence, things are changing moment by moment. From the point of view of subtle impermanence, we are seeing someone newly and fresh at every moment, thus you are not seeing the same person you saw in the morning. The person you saw in the morning has already ceased and what you are seeing now is a new continuum of the person.

This reminds me, on an occasion of a visit I made to Geshe Loden's centre, one official guest – who was not a Buddhist – came up to me and said, 'I saw you last year and you were very jovial and happy. And this year I see you again, and you haven't changed a bit. You are the same jovial, happy person'. And he thanked me, saying 'I really appreciate that you are here'. Others have even made comments to me such as, 'You look the same, even after twenty years!' [laughter] So that shows the normal perception of how things don't seem to change.

The commentary then presents what serves as the answer:

Answer: Although forms and the other sense objects are renowned in the world as permanent, the fault that their impermanence is not established by prime cognition does not exist, because they are established as impermanent and so forth, i.e. suffering, empty and selfless by the illusory nominal prime cognition of yogis.

The answer presented here is suggesting that what the opponent is saying is true on one level: from a worldly point of view, that is indeed how we normally perceive things. Although forms and the other sense objects are renowned in the world as permanent indicates the perception of an ordinary being – that the objects they perceive are permanent. However, the Madhyamikas respond that the fault that their impermanence is not established by prime cognition does not exist, or is not true. This means that the way ordinary beings perceive things as being permanent does not contradict or nullify the prime cognition that perceives impermanence. That is the point. This is because forms and so forth are established as impermanent, suffering, empty and selfless by the illusory nominal prime cognition of yogis. These yogis have the prime cognition that perceives them as being impermanent and so forth.

The next argument is then presented:

Argument: This is in contradiction to the statement that seeing impermanence and the other characteristics is to see it as such.

The remaining lines of verse 8 that serve as an answer show there is no contradiction.

8bcd. It is seen as such in comparison to the world.

Otherwise the thought of a woman's impurity

Would be harmed by the world.

Answer: It is the mere assertion that in comparison to the grasping by worldly beings at purity, happiness, permanence and a self, that this is seen as such.

Here this is seen as such refers to seeing the world as being pure, happy and permanent and with a self, when in reality it is not like that. The Madhyamikas assert that merely seeing impure things to be pure, suffering as happiness, and impermanent things as permanent, is just in accordance with how they are perceived by worldly beings.

The commentary continues:

Otherwise, if being renowned by the world would be the measure for prime cognition, then it would follow that the yogi meditating on impurity, who has gained conviction regarding the impurity of the woman's body, would be harmed by the worldly grasping at the purity of the woman's body.

Thus, if the measure of prime cognition were to be how it is perceived by worldly beings, then it would follow that when the yogi who is meditating on impurity or the imperfections of the body to the point where they have gained the conviction regarding the impurity of a woman's body (for a female yogi it would be the other way round), that prime cognition would be harmed by the worldly grasping at the purity of the woman's body and so forth. But the yogi's perception is not nullified or contradicted by the worldly perception.

The main point is that, just because the worldly perception of things is renowned and accepted as normal, that doesn't harm yogic prime cognition. The example given here is that of a yogi meditating on the impurities of the body - such as a male or female body - indeed all contaminated bodies including the impurity of one's own body. An ordinary being perceives the body - males in regard to a woman's body, women in regard to a male's body - as being completely pure and clean, with no imperfections or faults. However, a yogi who has meditated and developed a conviction about the impurities of the body will perceive it otherwise: he or she will see the impure body in its natural state, with its natural faults and imperfections. Thus, just because something is renowned as being pure in the worldly view doesn't mean that it is actually pure, likewise just because in the worldly view things are seen as permanent, it doesn't mean that they are actually permanent and so forth.

2.1.2.2.1.2.3.2. Refuting that the build-up of the accumulations would be invalid

The argument presented here is an objection to the Madhyamika assertion that things lack inherent existence. According to the Realists, if things lack inherent existence then one cannot possibly establish the functionality of karmic cause and effect and establish anything within the existence of samsara and liberation.

Argument: If there is no inherent existence, it contradicts the explanation that one accumulates merit through making offerings and such to the conquerors.

This is an objection expressed by the Sautrantikas. We need to pay close attention to the following presentations - which are presented in the format of a debate - questions and answers between the Madhyamikas and the lower schools. The ninth chapter of this text by Shantideva is renowned as the chapter that presents emptiness. The correct view of emptiness is established by eliminating all the hypothetical objections and doubts of the lower schools. Thus one comes to gain the correct understanding of the view of emptiness. At the same time, on a practical level, Chapter 9 also presents many logical reasons to establish the validity of the cause and effect of karma.

We need to pay particular attention to the lower schools' point of view where they say that if things lack inherent existence one can't establish the cause and effect sequence of karma. If things do not exist inherently, they argue, how can you posit the functionality of the cause and effect sequence of karma?

What is being established in this chapter - very meticulously, logically and profoundly - is the functionality of the cause and effect sequence of things and events, not in spite of, but precisely because of their lack of inherent existence. This is the unique position of the Prasangika Madhyamaka school: things perform their function, and the cause and effect of karma is established, because they lack true existence. So while both Sautrantika and Prasangika agree upon the functionality of things, the unique position of the Prasangika is that they lack inherent existence.

The lower schools' views are in accord with our normal worldly perception. The presentations here can gradually help us understand how things exist while lacking inherent existence. If we spend ample time thinking about these points carefully and get a sense of the uniqueness and validity of the Prasangika presentation, we will gain a much deeper and more profound understanding of emptiness.

In the following passages the opponents argue that, according to the Prasangika view, one cannot establish samsara or nirvana; this is subsequently refuted. The refutation establishes that samsara and nirvana exist while lacking inherent existence. The essence of this refutation is presented in the Heart Sutra with the passage 'form is empty, emptiness is form'. This is a profound point and I have presented the meaning over a hundred times. I have explained it many times because it is the essential point regarding the correct view. So we need to get a really good, sound understanding of this point.

In fact, these are the essential points to understand if we wish to meditate on emptiness. It is extremely important to gain the understanding of how the deed, action and performer all equally lack inherent existence; understanding this is essential.

When we engage in meditation practice with this understanding our practice will indeed become a means to enhance our wisdom. The mind will become sharper, and we will gain more - and more profound - insights. Whereas if we are not careful and just focus on an object and try to develop a single-pointed focus on it - in other words, if we don't have a clear basis for gaining a profound understanding of the object we are focusing on - it can actually become a cause for the mind to become duller, rather than becoming sharper. If that were to occur, it would be a real pity if one has spent so much time and energy in the meditation, but it has resulted in the mind becoming duller. We need to be really careful about these points.

In order to succeed in our practice and achieve our goals we must have the aid of both method and wisdom. The need for both method and wisdom is presented in the Middle Way text, the Madhyamakāvataṛa, in the verse that gives the analogy of a crane that can fly and migrate far beyond the ocean with the aid of both wings. If one of the wings is injured or maimed, it could not possibly make that long-distance journey. In this analogy, the ocean is the ocean of samsara. In order to cross over the ocean of samsara to reach the pristine state of enlightenment, we need the two wings of method and wisdom. Both are needed. Neither method nor wisdom alone is sufficient.

After the argument is presented, then comes the first two lines from the verse:

*9ab. Merits from the illusory like conqueror
Equal the ones from a truly existent.*

Answer: There is no contradiction. That one accumulates merit through making offerings to the conquerors that are illusory-like and lack true existence is just like your assertion that one accumulates merit through making offerings to a truly existent conqueror. Regardless of whether they are suitable to exist truly or not, one accumulates merit in accordance with the object.

The commentary shows that the preceding argument doesn't hold ground. According to the Madhyamika's position, one accumulates merit through making offerings to the conquerors that are illusory-like and lack true existence; while they appear to be truly existent to ordinary perception, they in fact lack any true or inherent existence. Thus, if one makes offerings to the conquerors who are illusory-like, one will still receive merit. It is similar to the Sautrantika's assertion that one accumulates merit through making offerings to a truly existent conqueror.

The last line of the commentary presents a really succinct point, which is regardless of whether they are suitable to exist truly or not... In other words, you, the Sautrantika, say that they exist truly and we, the Madhyamika, say that they don't exist truly, but regardless of who is right or wrong here, the fact remains that one accumulates merit in accordance with the object, that is, a holy object. So by making offerings, one can definitely accumulate merit. This is an essential point to keep in mind for our own practice.

2.1.2.2.1.2.3.3. Refuting that taking rebirth would be invalid

This is again according to the lower schools' position. Their argument is that if, for example, sentient beings are illusory, how could they take rebirth? The next two lines under this heading are:

*9cd. If sentient beings are like an illusion,
Then how can they be reborn after death?*

The commentary first presents the Realists' position, which is:

Argument: If sentient beings are like an illusion and lack true existence then, just like the illusory sentient being does not regenerate after disintegration, how are they reborn upon death?

That commentary presents the answer in relation to the meaning of the next verse:

Answer: We do not accept that sentient beings and illusions are the same in each and every aspect, but we accept that they are the same in existing truly or not. If the fault only relates to that, since you also accept dreams and illusions to be false, then your question is like asking if the basis for deception appears as a horse, then why doesn't it appear as a donkey.

The Prasangika Madhyamika position is that things and events, particularly sentient beings, are illusory-like, in that while they lack true existence, they appear as being truly existent or inherently existent. Insofar as they do not exist in the way they appear, they are like illusions of conjured horses and elephants. When an illusionist conjures horses and elephants, they appear yet they do not actually exist. This is the analogy used here.

The Realist opponent says, If sentient beings are like illusions like you say and lack true existence, then just like an illusory sentient being does not regenerate after disintegration, how are sentient beings reborn upon death? This argument is very clever and intelligent because it is effectively saying that, after the magician's spell wears off the conjured horses and elephants do not recur again. Once the illusion has disappeared, it won't recur. This is a fact. In using that reasoning, the Realists are saying: therefore, if sentient beings were like illusions, they couldn't be reborn again after death just like an illusory sentient being doesn't regenerate after the illusion ceases. The answer to this is that they are not exactly the same.

In essence what the Sautrantikas are saying is that just as an illusion would not reappear or re-establish again after it disappears, likewise sentient beings being would not be reborn again after death. Their argument is presented here as a rhetorical question: 'How could they be reborn after death if they were an illusion?'

The Madhyamikas respond: we do not accept that sentient beings and illusions are the same in each and every aspect, but we accept that they are the same in existing truly or not. Further, they say that 'If the fault only relates to that, since you also accept dreams and illusions to be false, then your question is like asking if the basis for deception appears as a horse, then why doesn't it appear as a donkey?' In this case the basis for deception is a horse, not a donkey. The magician has not cast a spell to see a donkey – the spell produces only the illusion of a horse.

So while the basis for the illusion (in this case a horse) is seen, because the spell to see a donkey has not been cast, the illusion of a donkey is not seen. So the Prasangika are saying, your question regarding how sentient beings can be reborn if they are like an illusion, is similar to asking, 'How come an illusory donkey is not seen when one sees an illusory horse, since they are both similar in being an illusion? According to your question, it would imply that when one sees the illusory horse one would have to also see an illusory donkey!'

This will become clearer as we go further into the text.

So the next verse, which relates to this is:

*10abc. For as long as the conditions come together.
For that long even the illusion exists
Just because of a long continuity?
Sentient beings are truly existent?*

The commentary further explains:

Thus, for falsities, as long as the conditions are present, for that period of time the illusion exists.

As presented here, all illusory truths are presented as falsities because the definition of a truth is that if there is no discrepancy between what appears and what actually exists, then it is a truth. Whereas if there is discrepancy between what appears to you and its actual existence, it is false. Therefore, all illusory phenomena are said to be falsities because there is a discrepancy in how they appear and how they actually exist – or they appear as truly existent, but in fact lack true existence; or they appear as inherently existent but in fact lack inherent existence. Therefore, for all falsities such as illusions, for as long as the conditions are present, then for that period of time the illusion exists.

To conclude the earlier paragraph of the commentary:

Similarly, for as long as the conditions of ignorance and so forth are complete, sentient beings will take rebirth.

This is the answer being presented by the Madhyamika.

The next counter argument from the Realists is:

Argument: It is not the same, as sentient beings exist from beginningless time.

What is being presented here is that while an illusion doesn't last for long, sentient beings in fact have existed from beginningless time. So because of their duration, say the Realists, you cannot say that sentient beings are like illusions. In other words, the argument is that because sentient beings have existed from beginningless time and thus for a long duration, it cannot be established that they are unreal like an illusion. Illusions are not true, argue the Realists, because they are very short-lived. That is what is being presented here.

The Madhyamika answer to that is:

Answer: It follows it is invalid to assert the distinction that sentient beings exist truly merely because they exist for a long time, and that illusions are false because they exist for a short while; if that was the case, then one would need to also accept a difference in the true and untrue existence of dreams and illusions as they have a difference in length.

Thus, if the criteria for something to be true or false were dependent on duration, then even illusions and dreams have different durations. Some illusions may last for a short while, but some can last for much longer. So, according to your, i.e. the Realists', assertion, the delusions that last for longer would be true, and the ones that lasted for a short time would be false. As the commentary further explains:

For in dreams, there are remembrances of an eon or just one day and so forth.

In dreams you might have a remembrance of a whole eon or just one day. Thus you Realists would have to assert that the dream of a long period of time, say, over one eon, would be true, and the dream about just one day would be untrue. But that is absurd and could not be the case.

2.1.2.2.1.2.3.4. Refuting that the division into virtue and negativity would be invalid

Here the argument from the Realists against the Madhyamikas is:

Argument: If they are like an illusion in that they lack inherent existence, then that would contradict that the killing and the like of sentient beings are negativities.

What they are saying is that if sentient beings are like an illusion, then you would not create negative karma by engaging in the act of killing them.

The verse which relates to this reads:

*11. The killing and the like of an illusory being
Is not a negativity because there is no mind.
Relative to those endowed with an illusory mind
Merits and negativities arise.*

Answer: Regarding the killing and the like of an illusory person, if one pierces them with a weapon with the intent to kill on the basis of perceiving it as a human and the like, then one creates the negativity of action, but there is no actual karma of killing as it does not possess mind.

An illusory person would not be an actual person, but a magical illusion that appears like a person. If one pierced this illusory person with a weapon with the intent to kill on the basis of perceiving it as human, then one creates the negativity of action. This is a good point to keep in mind; while there is negative karma created in relation to engaging in the action of piercing this illusory human with the intent to kill, there is no actual killing. So one does not incur the karma of killing, as that object does not possess a mind. Because it is not an actual person, there is no act of killing. This is because the negative karma of killing is only complete when that person's life force has been severed. But the life force cannot be severed from an illusory person because as there is no consciousness there is no life force present.

The concluding statement presents a significant point:

By benefiting sentient beings endowed with an illusory mind, such as humans and so forth, one creates merit, and by harming them, one creates negativity.

Then the next argument is presented:

Argument: For those being the same in lacking inherent existence, how can there be a difference in generating a mind or not?

So the Realists then argue that, if you Madhyamikas say an illusory person and an actual person are the same in lacking inherent existence, how come one has a mind and one doesn't have a mind? How does that difference come about?

The verse relating to that is:

*12. Since mantras and the like do not possess the power
An illusory mind does not arise.
The illusion that arises from manifold conditions
Is also manifold.*

*13ab. That one condition can do it all
Is totally non-existent anywhere.*

The commentary related to this reads:

Answer: Because the illusory substances and mantras cannot generate an illusion with mind, the illusory horse and elephant do not have mind. The illusion that arises from various conditions also appears in various ways. The 'also' does not eliminate sentient beings.

That one needs various conditions for various results is because it is impossible for one condition to generate all results. That one condition cannot generate all results is totally non-existent anywhere.

What is being presented here in the commentary is that illusory substances – here, the word ‘substance’ would include medicines and mantras – cannot generate an illusion with regard to the mind. So the illusory horse and elephant do not have mind. In order for the magician to conjure horses and elephants, certain conditions have to be intact. It is said that the magician uses certain substances which, if used upon objects, will cause illusions to appear. Or it could be mantras. It is said that some magicians use mantras, which in the West we would call spells. When a spell is put on the people watching the spectacle, their eyes will see illusions. So the illusion is due to these conditions, such as the substances of medicines and spells, which are used by the magician to conjure the horses and elephants. These substances, however, do not have the power to produce a mind in the conjured illusions.

Thus, while a magician has the power to perform a magical illusion, he or she does not have the power to make mind or consciousness. If, through substances, mind and consciousness were to be able to be made, then by now scientists would have made many new minds. If, through spells or the power of mantras, it were possible to make minds, then magicians and yogis would have produced many beings. But that is not possible. This is a very significant point.

So while illusory substances such as the medicines and the mantras are the conditions for generating an illusion, they are not the conditions to produce a mind. And the reason why a mind cannot be produced is that the specific cause for a mind or consciousness is lacking. When the specific cause is lacking, that particular result cannot be produced. Mind has its own substantial causes for it to exist, which is a previous moment of mind. When the substantial cause for a mind is lacking, a mind cannot be produced. Therefore, mind does not exist in an illusion.

Furthermore, the commentary says:

The illusion that arises from various conditions also appears in various ways.

So there are various types of illusions – such as horses and elephants – because of the various types of causes, such as the different substances of medicines and mantras. However, while the different types of illusions are produced by different causes, one cause cannot possibly produce many different results.

Then the commentary continues:

The ‘also’ does not eliminate sentient beings. That one needs various conditions for various results is because it is impossible for one result to generate all results. That one condition can generate all results is totally non-existent anywhere.

The significant point here is that just because there is a cause for an illusion to arise and various causes for various types of illusions to arise, the notion that one cause can produce many results – such as an illusion, as well as a mind – is completely absurd; it is not possible.

What we take as personal instruction here is that, if we wish to experience certain types of result, we have to create the corresponding causes. It is not possible to obtain various results from just one cause.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

As usual, let us engage in our regular meditation practice.

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: 'For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in, and listen to the teachings and put them into practice well'. This is very meaningful.

I understand that the seminar on Sunday went very well, so I am very glad about that. It seems that there were quite a few participants, including some who might have been quite new to the topic. So it was good on two levels: for those who hear about it for the first time, and for others to refresh and deepen their understanding.

I consider that sharing our knowledge and benefitting others in this practical way is real Dharma. Indeed, the optimum purpose of our studies is to put them into practice to benefit others. It's not that we are lacking the ability to benefit others. We do have the ability, so to actually utilise that ability to benefit others would be very meaningful.

As Geshe Chengawa presented, the Dharma comes down to two main points: benefitting others and not harming others. Last year these points were presented as part of practising patience as a way to benefit others. We need to incorporate the practice of patience into our practice of not harming others, and particularly when benefitting others. There might be occasions where others may not appreciate our attempts to benefit them, or they might retaliate with some sort of harm. When this happens patience is indispensable so that we don't become daunted and give up the intention to benefit others. So we definitely need to practise patience. The entire teachings of the Buddha, either when combined into the Three Baskets - vinaya, sutra and abhidharma - or sutra and tantra, come down to these two essential points: benefitting others and not harming others.

It is essential that we make every effort, to the best of our ability, to benefit others and not harm others, and to incorporate this into our daily lives. Familiarising ourselves with these sentiments, and reminding ourselves of them again and again is essential. We become familiar with this practice by actually putting it into practice in whatever way we can. It is through the familiarity with benefitting others in accordance with our capacity and ability that we are actually able to put it into practice. Right now many of us have the ability and potential to benefit others, but our lack of familiarity with that attitude prevents us from actually benefitting others. Likewise, we have the ability to refrain from harming others, but because we are not familiar with that, we find ourselves engaging in harming others. We will be able to utilise our abilities to benefit others, to the best of our capacity, and refrain from harming others when we familiarise ourselves again and again with this practice. We really need to pay attention to this point.

As I mentioned earlier, in essence benefitting others and not harming others is Dharma practice. I really feel that ultimately all Dharma can be combined into these two aspects, and thus we need to ensure that every practice we do is integrated with these two essential points. In the Vinaya sutra, the Buddha mentioned that the person who harms others is not a person who practises virtue. So we need to keep that in mind. If one considers oneself to be someone who practises virtue, then one needs to refrain from harming others at all costs. We need to remind ourselves of these passages from the sutras again and again.

In Shantideva's very meticulously presented text that we have been studying, you will recall that there are passages where Shantideva quotes the Buddha as saying: "Benefiting sentient beings is in turn benefitting me; harming sentient beings is in turn harming me". This is essential advice from the Buddha. If we respect the Buddha then the best way to honour him, as the Buddha himself mentioned, is to benefit other sentient beings. The best way to refrain from showing disrespect to the Buddha is by refraining from harming and not respecting other sentient beings. This is really profound and practical advice for us to put into practice, which is the best way to remember the kindness of the Buddha.

These sentiments, which were presented by the Buddha himself, illustrate the great compassion that the Buddha has for all beings. He does not discriminate between sentient beings - indeed his only intention is to benefit them all. The Buddha reached this state of infinite compassion for all beings as a result of having familiarised himself with these attitudes prior to actually reaching the state of buddhahood. These are the attitudes that he familiarised himself with as a trainee on the path, and achieving buddhahood is a result of having perfected these positive attitudes of wishing to benefit all beings and not harm any living being. Reaching the state of having infinite compassion for all beings is a result of the practices that the Buddha engaged in as a trainee on the path.

What we need to learn from this is that it is exactly the same for ourselves. If we now, to the best of our ability, really develop these attitudes (wishing to benefit other sentient beings and not harm any sentient being even in the slightest way) and put them into practice, then, as we perfect these attitudes, and as they become more and more a part of our way of thinking, it will be possible to reach the state where that is our sole intention. Then we will be able to confidently say: "if you harm others, then that is equivalent to harming me" and "if you benefit others, then that is equivalent to benefiting me". These are actual states of mind that can be developed.

As Lama Tsong Khapa mentions in all of his texts on the stages of the path - the great treatise, and the middling and small treatises on the stages of the path to enlightenment - the practice for a beginner is to avoid one negativity at a time and engage in one virtuous deed at a time. They will accumulate to the point of completely abandoning all negativities and achieving all supreme qualities. This indicates that setting a very high goal of wishing to achieve the state of enlightenment and focusing only on the end result, while neglecting to actually engage in these small practices now, is completely missing the point. If we wish to achieve that state of enlightenment in the future, then the only way for a beginner trainee is to engage in this practice of accumulating virtues one at a time, and abandoning negativities one at a time.

2.1.2.2.1.2.3.5. Refuting that the distinctive individual understanding of samsara and nirvana would be invalid

Here the commentary reads:

The Madhyamika accept that there is no ultimate birth or death, that the lack of inherent existence is natural liberation, and that the birth, death and so forth established by karma and afflictions are cyclic existence.

This presents the Madhyamika view that the lack of inherent existence of all aspects of cyclic existence such as birth, sickness, aging and death is natural liberation. Thus, the term natural liberation refers to the lack of inherent existence of birth, sickness, ageing and death, and so forth. These conditions are established by karma and afflictions and this is what is referred to as cyclic existence or samsara.

In the text each of the other schools of Buddhist thought present their arguments to refute this assertion of the Madhyamika. Earlier the arguments of the Vaibhashika (Realists) were presented and refuted. Here, the objections of the Sautrantika (the followers of sutra) are being presented and refuted. Next the views of the Cittamatra (Mind Only) schools will be presented and refuted. As I have already covered the teachings on the tenets, it would be good for you to refer to those teachings as a way to understand the particular assertions of these proponents – the Realists, the followers of sutra, the Mind Only school and then the Madhyamika or Middle Way school, which has two sub-schools - the Autonomist or Svatantrika and the Consequentialist or Prasangika schools.

In relation to the Madhyamika assertion of natural nirvana and cyclic existence, the commentary then says: Regarding this a Sautrantika opponent argues ...

The argument is presented in the following lines of the root text:

13cd. *If nirvana is the ultimate,
And samsara the illusory,*

14. *Then also the Buddha would circle,
What would be the point of the bodhisattva's practice?*

Then the commentary explains the meaning of this verse, which is the argument of the Sautrantikas:

If the ultimate or natural liberation is actually liberation, then although the emptiness of inherent existence of cyclic existence is ultimate liberation, the continuity of circling, that is in an illusory way, through birth and death, is cyclic existence. In that case, there would be a common basis for cyclic existence and liberation, which would mean that even buddhas circle in cyclic existence. If that were the case, then it would be pointless for bodhisattvas to practise the bodhisattva trainings in order to attain enlightenment.

What the Madhyamika propose is that the lack of true existence of samsara - which includes birth, sickness, ageing and death - is the natural abiding nirvana, or liberation. This means that from time immemorial samsara has always existed in the nature of the naturally abiding liberation. That is because samsara has always lacked true and inherent existence.

The Sautrantika argument is: if the ultimate or natural liberation is actually liberation – this is in relation to the Madhyamika's assertion that the lack of true or inherent existence of samsara is the naturally abiding liberation – then although the emptiness of inherent existence of cyclic existence is ultimate liberation, the continuity of circling (in an illusory way) through birth and death, is cyclic existence. Thus, there would be a common basis for cyclic existence and liberation, which would mean that even buddhas circle in cyclic existence. If that were the case then it would be pointless for bodhisattvas to practise the bodhisattva trainings in order to attain enlightenment. This is the argument presented by the Sautrantika.

The Madhyamikas explain that there is a difference between naturally abiding nirvana and the nirvana that is obtained as a way of abandoning the adventitious defilements.

The key point to be understood here is whether or not natural liberation is actual liberation. And what is being explained is that naturally abiding nirvana or liberation is not the actual liberation that is obtained through having practised the path and abandoned the defilements. Thus, the argument presented by the Sautrantika is not feasible.

As an answer to the Sautrantika the text says:

Answer: There is no such fault because ...

These lines from the root text are presented:

14cd. *If the continuity of the condition is not cut off,
Then the illusion will also not be reversed.*

15ab. *If the continuity of the condition ceases
Then it will not arise even conventionally.*

The commentary then explains the meaning of these lines:

...there is a difference between natural liberation and the liberation purified of the adventitious. The natural liberation does not depend on meditating on the path because it is the suchness of all, irrespective of whether one meditates on the path or not.

The liberation free from the adventitious stains needs to be attained by ceasing to take rebirth in cyclic existence through the continuity of birth and death. Although it lacks inherent existence, if one does not cease the continuity of the conditions, one cannot even reverse an illusion, not to mention cyclic existence. If one does cut the continuity of the conditions of ignorance and so forth, then cyclic existence will not even arise in an illusory way.

The answer begins with there is a difference between what is referred to as natural liberation and the liberation that is purified of the adventitious defilements.

That is followed by the explanation that natural liberation does not depend on meditating on the path because it is the suchness or nature of all, irrespective of whether one meditates on the path or not. This implies that the natural liberation is something that has always abided. If there was a beginning to cyclic existence, then from the very beginning naturally abiding nirvana would be present at all times, because that is its very nature.

Then the text explains further that the liberation that is free from the adventitious stains needs to be attained by cutting off the taking of rebirth in cyclic existence through the continuity of birth, ageing, sickness and death.

The commentary further explains that although it, meaning the continuity of birth and death and so forth, lacks inherent existence, if one does not cut, or stop, the continuity of the conditions, one cannot reverse even an illusion.

What is being meticulously presented here is that although cyclic existence lacks inherent existence that does not nullify the fact that one will experience the sufferings of birth, sickness, ageing and death. Unless and until the continuity of those conditions of birth, sickness, ageing and death are completely stopped, one will have to continuously experience these sufferings. When it says that one cannot reverse an illusion, not to mention cyclic existence this means that for as long as the conditions for an illusion are there, the illusion will appear. The only way for an illusion to disappear is when the conditions for the illusion cease to exist. Cyclic existence is exactly the same: birth, sickness, ageing and death will remain for as long as the conditions for them to be regenerated remain. Lacking inherent existence doesn't mean that one will not experience the consequences of the conditions that were created earlier.

Adventitious stains refers to all the delusions; delusions are referred to as being adventitious because they are not one entity with the mind itself. This means that when the proper conditions are in place, they will cease to exist. The analogy that is given to portray adventitious delusions is clouds in an otherwise clear sky. With the conditions of strong wind, even dark and heavy clouds will be blown away, and the natural clear sky will become apparent again. Likewise, when the conditions for the delusions are abandoned, then the pure nature of the mind will become apparent. This is to be understood.

Next the text says: if one does cut the continuity of the conditions of ignorance and so forth, then cyclic existence will not even arise in an illusory way. This implies that, leaving aside 'ultimately', samsara will not be present even 'as illusory' or 'conventionally' when the conditions for samsara are eliminated.

Then the concluding statement reconfirms the refutation of the Sautrantika objections.

The earlier objection needs to be answered by making a distinction between ultimate liberation and liberation ...

Here liberation is the state of being free from the delusions through engaging in the path. That is actual liberation.

... rather than answering it in any other way because the opponent accepts that the buddhas do not circle and that sentient beings do.

2.1.2.2.2. Refuting the Mind Only in particular¹

This is presented in two sections:

1. Expressing the view
2. Refuting it

1. EXPRESSING THE VIEW

This refers to the view of the Mind Only

*15cd. If even the mistaken is non-existent
What takes the illusion as its object?*

Thus they are objecting:

Mind Only: If all phenomena lack inherent existence and even the mistaken consciousness apprehending the illusion does not exist, then what is the mind of which the illusion becomes the object of? As it does not exist, even the illusion becomes non-existent.

The Madhyamika answer is:

Answer: This again is the debate that if it exists, it has to exist inherently.

The argument of the Mind Only school is that if all phenomena lack inherent existence and even the mistaken consciousness apprehending the illusion does not exist, then what is the mind of which the illusion becomes the object? Because the Madhyamika assert the lack of inherent existence and true existence, the Mind Only school says that if all phenomena lack inherent existence as you propose, then even the mistaken consciousness apprehending the illusion does not exist.

What one needs to understand from this objection is that the Mind Only school assert that the mind exists inherently and that there is no external existence. Because the Madhyamika assertion that all phenomena lack inherent existence harms the their own assertion that the mind exists inherently, the Mind Only argue that if all phenomena lack inherent existence, as the Madhyamika claim, then the mistaken consciousness apprehending the illusion also does not exist. If that is the case, they say then what is the mind of which the illusion becomes the object of?

For the Mind Only school, if the mind apprehending the illusion does not exist inherently, then that is the same as saying that it doesn't exist. Thus they say, according to the Madhyamika, if the apprehending mind does not exist, then even the illusion would have to be non-existent.

The commentary presents a brief answer from the Madhyamikas pointing out that the reason for the Mind Only School objection again comes down to the argument that if it exists, i.e. if things exist, it has to exist inherently. The Mind Only argue that if all phenomena doesn't exist inherently, then that would mean that the mind (which they in fact believe exists inherently) also doesn't exist. If the mind that apprehends the illusion does not exist inherently, then by default one would have to say that what has been apprehended (the illusion itself) also does not exist. That is the absurdity that the Mind Only school presents.

2. REFUTING IT

This refers to refuting the previous argument of the Mind Only school that if the mind apprehending the illusion does not exist inherently, then that would imply that the illusion itself does not exist. The refutation is presented in these two subdivisions:

¹ This explanation contains many subdivisions so to simplify things the numbering restarts here. It will return to the overall numbering structure at verse 30, which is the beginning of the next major heading.

2.1. Similar counter argument

2.2. Refuting the answer

2.1. Similar argument

The counter argument by the Madhyamikas uses a similar argument to the one presented earlier by the Mind Only:

*16ab. When for you the illusion is non-existent,
At that time, what becomes the object?*

The commentary explains:

If the object held by you, the Mind Only, existed in the way it appears when it is held, i.e., as an outer object, then it would exist externally. In that case, that is similar to an illusion and the mind taking it as its object, become non-existent. If it does not exist in the way it appears, it does not exist inherently, and in that case, according to you, it would have to be non-existent. If there is no apprehended illusory object appearing as an external object, at that time what is taken as an object at that time? Even the apprehenders of the five objects of forms, sounds and so forth become non-existent.

The counter argument begins with the Mind Only assertion that there is no outer or external object: The Madhyamika argue - If the object held by you, the Mind Only, existed in the way it appears when it is held as an outer object, then it would exist externally. In that case, it is similar to an illusion and a mind taking it as its object being non-existent.

The Mind Only argument is that if the mind didn't exist inherently then the illusion itself would not exist.

So, the Madhyamikas present a similar counter argument: In saying that things do not exist externally, you would also be implying that they don't exist.

The commentary further explains: If it does not exist in the way it appears, it does not exist inherently, and in that case, according to you, it would have to be non-existent. This is the point. If there is no apprehended illusory object appearing as an external object, at that time what is taken as an object at that time? Even the apprehenders of the five objects of forms, sounds and so forth become non-existent.

So the counter argument turns on the Mind Only argument asserting that if things were to lack inherent existence, and if the mind apprehending an illusion lacks inherent existence, then the illusion itself would be non-existent.

Similarly, the Madhyamika say, if you say there's no external existence, then the mind apprehending these external objects such as sounds, forms and so forth, would also be non-existent; you say that they do not exist externally, yet they are perceived as being external objects.

2.2. Refuting the answer

This is subdivided into two:

2.2.1. Expressing the view

2.2.2. Refuting it

2.2.1. Expressing the view

16cd. In case: "It exists in another way.

The aspect is mind itself."

The Mind Only say:

Mind Only: Although it does not exist in the very way it appears, as an external object, it exists in a different way, because the aspects of form and the like are the substance of mind itself.

The Mind Only are saying that it does not exist in the way that it appears. Just as the Madhyamika would say that things appear as existing inherently but do not exist in that way, the Mind Only are saying that it does not exist in the very way that it appears, as external objects. While things like forms, sounds and so forth appear as being external objects, they do not exist in that way. They exist in a different way, because the aspects of form and the like are the substance of the mind itself. So the Mind Only assertion is that form does not exist externally, rather it is a partial substance of the mind itself. Thus the Mind Only School, unlike the Madhyamika, would not say that the consciousness apprehending form arises in relation to form, but rather the consciousness apprehending form arises from seeing another partial imprint of the mind itself appearing as form. Therefore what appears as being form or sounds and so forth (the external five sense objects) are actually a similar substance to the mind, arising from the same imprint, and one partial aspect of that substance appears as these five sense objects, so that is how it appears.

In essence the Mind Only school asserts that forms and so forth do not exist externally, but rather they are a substance of the mind itself.

2.2.2. Refuting it

The refutation of the Mind Only position is subdivided into two sections.

2.2.2.1. The non-dual mind is not seen by anything

2.2.2.2. Refuting a self-knower through the answer to the question

2.2.2.1. THE NON-DUAL MIND IS NOT SEEN BY ANYTHING

The non-dual mind refers to the Mind Only assertion that there's no duality in what is being apprehended and the apprehender, basically the subject and object. They say that there is a non-duality of subject and object because both are aspects of the mind itself.

The Madhyamika response is that if a non-dual mind were to exist it would have to be seen by a consciousness, but it is not seen by any consciousness.

*17ab. When the mere mind is an illusion,
At that time what is seen by what?*

The commentary reads:

If at a time when the mere mind appears like an illusion, and it does not exist as an external object, what prime cognition sees the mind that lacks external existence? There is nothing that sees it.

As clearly presented here, if at a time when the mere mind appears like an illusion, and it does not exist as an external object then what prime cognition sees the mind that lacks external existence? The answer to this rhetorical question, by default, also refutes the self-knower.

2.2.2.2. REFUTING THE SELF-KNOWER THROUGH THE ANSWER TO THE QUESTION

The argument of the Mind Only:

The Mind Only argue: Consciousness can be of two types: In the aspect of being directed outwards and in the aspect of only being directed inwards. The latter is the self-knowing direct perception. All consciousnesses are the object of that self-knower.

Following on from the earlier question, what prime cognition sees the mind that lacks external existence?, the Mind Only School present their position that consciousness can be of two types: a consciousness in the aspect of being directed outwards and perceiving things that appear as external phenomena, and a consciousness in the aspect of only being directed inwards.

Of these two types of consciousnesses, the latter is the self-knowing direct perception. This assertion of a self-knowing consciousness – a consciousness that knows itself – is one of the unique presentations of the Mind Only school. For them, all consciousnesses are the object of the self-knower.

What has to be clarified is that it is not as if two separate consciousnesses are posited by the Mind Only. Rather it's the same consciousness that has two aspects: one aspect that focuses externally or outwardly, and one aspect that focuses inwardly. In other words, one aspect of the consciousness apprehends objects and the other aspect apprehends the subject, or the mind itself.

Saying that there are two types of consciousness may sound like there are two different consciousnesses, but in fact one consciousness is posited as functioning in two different ways. The latter, the consciousness in the aspect of only being directed inwards is the self-knowing direct perception and all consciousnesses appear to that.

This is refuted by the Madhyamika under the following four headings:

2.2.2.2.1. Refuting this with quotation

2.2.2.2.2. Refuting this with logic

2.2.2.2.3. Refuting the arguments for the existence of a self-knower

2.2.2.2.4. Refuting that imputed objects are based on truly existent functionalities

2.2.2.2.1. Refuting this with a quotation

This section starts with the statement by the Madhyamika:

It is not feasible for this very mind to experience and know itself in a non-dual manner.

Then these lines are presented:

*17cd. Even the protector of the worlds said
That mind does not see mind.*

*18ab. The edge of a knife does not cut itself
It is the same for mind.*

The commentary explains that:

Even the protector of the worlds stated this in the Sutra of the Precious Crown Ornament, with examples such as the edge of the knife cannot cut that very knife itself, and that mind does not see mind.

This relates to the Mind Only assertion of self-knowing mind. Their definition of the self-knowing mind is an initial, infallible cogniser that is free from conceptuality, bears the aspect of an apprehender and only looks inward. So it is a cogniser that only looks inward which means it only apprehends the mind itself; free from conceptuality means it apprehends the mind in a non-dualistic manner. So, they posit the self-knower that is neither a primary consciousness nor a mental factor. It exists like a separate entity from the mind, whose only function is to be merely aware of the mind.

The Mind Only assert that the self-knower experiences the mind in a non-dual manner. We covered the Mind Only view when I taught the tenets, so you can refer to earlier notes and transcripts.

As I have explained previously, the self-knower is asserted as a cogniser that apprehends itself in a non-dual manner, however it is not a mind that perceives non-duality, for the only mind that can perceive non-duality is the wisdom realising emptiness. As the self-knower is not a mind realising emptiness or suchness, it therefore cannot actually perceive or realise non-duality.

As explained in the commentary, even the protector of the worlds stated this in the Sutra of the Precious Crown Ornament with examples such as the edge of the knife cannot cut the very knife itself, and similarly, the mind does not see mind.

The commentary then further explains the meaning of this analogy:

For example, just like the edge of the blade no matter how sharp, cannot cut itself in any way, and similarly the mind cannot see the mind.

Those who accept a self-knower accept that the very apprehending aspect knows itself. As there is not even one atom of difference in the arising aspect of the knower and that known, they need to accept them as one without any extra other part.

If that is the case, the Madhyamika say:

If one accepts such a self-knower, then one needs to accept examples such as that the blade of the knife cutting itself, or that prime cognition comprehends the object of comprehension independently of such an object.

This quotation from the Sutra of the Precious Crown Ornament refutes the Mind Only position.

2.2.2.2.2. Refuting this with logic

This is subdivided into two:

2.2.2.2.2.1. Refuting the example

2.2.2.2.2.2. Refuting the meaning

2.2.2.2.2.1. Refuting the example

Here there are two examples, the first of which is the example of candlelight.

The lines of verse relating to this are:

18cd. If, 'It is like a candle Perfectly illuminating itself.'

19. The candle light is nothing to be illuminated Because darkness does not obscure.

After these lines, the Mind Only argument is presented:

Argument: Just as the candlelight perfectly illuminates itself and other objects, in the same way does the consciousness know itself and others.

The Madhyamika's answer to that is:

Answer: The example is not established because the candlelight is not illuminated by itself. It does not need to and cannot illuminate itself. Otherwise, darkness should also obscure itself and others, which is not valid. If darkness obscured darkness, then one could not see darkness, just as one cannot see the vase covered by a cloth. One should try to extensively understand these arguments, in the way they are outlined in the Root Wisdom.

Although it is not in fact the case, the Mind Only say that just as the candlelight perfectly illuminates itself and other objects, in the same way consciousness knows itself as well as others. They use the analogy of candlelight to assert that the consciousness knows itself as well as others.

Then the Madhyamika refute that, by saying: The example is not established. The example you use cannot be established, because the candlelight is not illuminated by itself. So the very example that you present is not valid or established, because candlelight does not illuminate itself. It does not need to and it cannot illuminate itself.

If a candle could illuminate itself, then by default you would have to say that darkness should also obscure itself, which is absurd. If darkness obscured darkness, then one could not see darkness, just as one cannot see the vase covered by a cloth. Indeed, if a vase is covered by a cloth, then you cannot see it because it is obscured by the cloth. So if darkness obscured itself that would imply one could not see darkness because it is obscured. That is absurd.

The commentary concludes with: one should try to extensively understand these arguments in the way they are outlined in the Root Wisdom. The seventh chapter of this text contains a few verses that explain these analogies.

The second example is the example of the crystal, which we can cover in our next session.

If you pay attention, and read up on this topic and try to understand the views of the proponents, then it becomes a bit clearer. Otherwise at first glance it might seem hard to understand.

This will become clearer as we go further into the text.

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: 'For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and put them into practice well'. When we develop this strong motivation from the depths of our heart then our actions become most purposeful.

As well as generating a positive motivation, it is also good to engage in regular meditation practice to help settle the mind. A settled, more focused mind is an essential tool for whatever other practice or virtuous activity we wish to engage in, because that activity becomes more meaningful when the mind is focused.

Refuting the Mind Only in particular

2.2.2.2.1 Refuting the example (cont.)

Refuting the example of the crystal

- 19cd. *Unlike a crystal, blue does not depend
On something else to be blue;*
20. *Likewise, some are seen to depend on others,
And yet some are also not.
That which is not blue cannot produce itself
As blue out of its own nature.*

One needs to understand that the debates presented here are specifically between the proponents of the Mind Only school and those of the Madhyamika school who are refuting each other's positions.

The example being particularly refuted here is one used by the Mind Only school to assert a self-knower. The Mind Only school is asserting that there is a self-knower because, when the mind apprehends blue – when we recall having seen blue in the past – that recollection that one has seen blue is proof that there is a self-knower. This is because, at the time of seeing blue, it is the self-knowing mind that apprehends the mind perceiving the colour blue, and this allows you to remember that you have seen the object blue at the same time as the object possessor, which is the mind that perceives blue.

The Madhyamika school refute that by saying that one doesn't need to have a self-knower to remember the mind apprehending blue, as well as the object blue itself. Rather, this is remembered through the connection formed at the time of perceiving blue. Because of the connection that was made earlier between the object possessor, or the mind that perceives blue, and the object blue, one can now recall having seen blue.

These assertions and debates are very meticulous ways of explaining how the mind works. For example, when we perceive something, how is it perceived? How does memory work? How do we recall or recollect things? Each of the schools has its own presentation, and it is by analysing and looking into these different presentations that one gets a clear understanding of how the mind works. This is a really significant point, and it is debated meticulously here.

So the Mind Only school uses the example of a crystal to present a self-knower. The Madhyamikas refute that, as presented, with the above verses. The subsequent argument initially presented by the Mind Only school is:

Argument: That the white crystal is generated as blue through the force of the basis is in dependence on other, rather than through its own nature.

The example presented in this argument by the Mind Only school is that of a clear crystal. When a clear crystal is placed on a blue base, that crystal will appear blue when one looks at it. If it is placed on a yellow base, the crystal will appear to the eye consciousness as yellow. Likewise, if it is placed on a red base, it will appear red, and so forth. The analogy rightly shows that the colour of the clear crystal – that which is reflected – is dependent on the colour of its base. That is quite clear.

The Mind Only argument further says:

The blue of the lapis lazuli is blue out of its own nature, and not in dependence on others. Likewise, the knowing of forms and so forth exists in dependence on the other mind, but the knowing of mind by mind itself exists independently from some separate knower.

The Madhyamika's refutation of this assertion of the Mind Only school is presented:

Answer: It follows that the example of the blue of the lapis lazuli being generated as blue independently from something else is not valid because blue does not by its own self generate itself in the nature of blue, which it would need to in order not to be generated from a cause as blue.

So the Madhyamika refute this assertion by saying that the blue in the lapis lazuli is not produced by itself and it doesn't exist by its own nature, because if that were the case, it would need not need to depend on, or be generated by a cause. So what is being presented in the answer is that because the colour blue in the lapis lazuli is dependent on causes, it cannot be generated by itself, by its own nature.

The Mind Only school uses the assertion that 'the blue of the lapis lazuli arises from its own nature' as an example of the mind knowing itself. But the Madhyamikas refute that by showing the absurdity of blue arising by itself, without having to depend on causes.

Although the Cittamatrins (Mind Only) are not claiming that the blue of the lapis lazuli does not depend on causes – they wouldn't assert that – the Madhyamikas are saying that if blue were to exist by its own nature, from its own side, then logically it would have to be the case that it could not depend on causes. So the Madhyamikas are refuting the Mind Only by default, saying that if you accept that something exists from its own side or by its own nature, then that would imply that it does not depend on causes.

The Mind Only school, of course, with its own system of logic, is presenting quite a meticulous argument by saying that, just as the blue colour of lapis lazuli exists by its own nature and doesn't depend on something else, similarly, the mind knows itself and doesn't have to depend on something else. This is on the basis of the Mind Only school asserting that there is true existence or existence by its own nature.

As I have presented previously many times, the Mind Only assert that dependent phenomena and thoroughly established phenomena exist truly, while imputed phenomena do not exist truly. This is presented in the teachings of the tenets, so you should apply that understanding here.

2.2.2.2.2 Refuting the meaning

21. *If the statement, 'the candle flame illuminates'
Is made upon knowledge by consciousness,
Then the statement 'awareness is luminous'
Is made upon knowledge by what?*

If one says, 'Although the candle does not illuminate itself, but rather it merely illuminates', and says likewise 'it is known by consciousness' then, in that case, consciousness does not illuminate itself. Instead one has to say 'consciousness merely illuminates'. By which different substance is consciousness known that you make this statement? This is invalid.

When the Mind Only school asserts although the candle does not illuminate itself, this is in relation to the earlier Madhyamika refutation that, if light illuminates itself, this would imply that dark obscures itself, and that would be absurd. Now the Mind Only proponents are saying, 'OK. We accept that the candle does not illuminate itself – it merely illuminates. So that is the nature of the candle light, it merely illuminates.' Then they ask the Madhyamikas: By which different substance is consciousness known that you make this statement? This is invalid.

They further state:

If it would be known by a consciousness of different substance, it would become infinite. Hence, it is not known by self or by another.

Here, the Mind Only school is asserting a counter argument to the Madhyamika position by saying that, if you assert a different substance, or a different mind that knows the mind, and you say that the mind doesn't know itself, then that different substance that knows the mind would need a different substance to know that, and a further substance to know that, and so on. So there would be the fault of infinite regression and the absurdity would be that the mind is not known by itself nor by another.

In other words, the Mind Only school is saying that there would be nothing to know the mind; the mind would not be known if it is not known by itself and not known by another. This is what is presented next, and subsequently refuted by the Madhyamika.

22. *To remark about it being illuminated or not illuminated,
When it is not seen by anything,
Is pointless even though expressed,
Like the poise of a barren woman's daughter.*

The argument is saying:

As there is no knower seen by any consciousness, then although one may make statements regarding whether consciousness is illuminated or not, they are meaningless as the basis for the distinction is not established by prime cognition. If it is impossible for the daughter of a barren woman to exist, then it is meaningless to talk about her poise.

Here, the Mind Only school is saying, 'You Madhyamikas may refute us by saying that consciousness does not illuminate itself and so forth, but according to you, making statements about whether consciousness is illuminated or not is meaningless, as the basis for the distinction is not established by prime cognition'. The analogy presented here is like making comments about a daughter of a barren woman.

The literal analogy given is that of a mule. Apparently mules cannot have offspring. Thus, the absurdity being presented here is that, if the daughter of a barren woman doesn't even exist, then to talk about her poise, such as her looks, shape and elegance is meaningless.

2.2.2.3 REFUTING THE ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF A SELF-KNOWER

Here there are three sub-headings:

2.2.2.3.1 Example of how memory is generated even though there is no self-knower

2.2.2.3.2 Refuting other reasons used to establish a self-knower

2.2.2.3.3 Refuting that other-knowers would be impossible if there were no self-knower

As a response to the Mind Only school's reasoning for the existence of a self-knower through examples, the Madhyamika presents another example to refute that there is a self-knower. As mentioned earlier, if there is no self-knower, there wouldn't be other knowers as well, so the Madhyamika refute this by showing the impossibility of a self-knower.

2.2.2.3.1 Example of how memory is generated even though there is no self-knower

The Mind Only school presents this verse:

- 23ab. *If there is no self-knower,
How can one remember consciousness?*

Mind-Only: If there is no self-knower, then how could there be recollection of the object possessor consciousness? There cannot be.

If one can infer the experience through the reason of recollection, and the recollection when one thinks, 'I previously saw blue' comes subsequent to the experience, then, when one says, 'I saw blue', one establishes the experience of the object through the recollection of the object, and that very experience of the object is the apprehension of blue.

The reasoning that refutes other possibilities as to what is it that experiences the apprehension of blue also establishes the self-knower.

The Mind Only proponents assert: If there is no self-knower, then how could there be recollection of the object possessor consciousness? There cannot be. They are arguing that without a self-knower, how could one remember that one has seen something? An object possessor is the consciousness that apprehends the object. What I explained earlier is now being presented here.

The Mind Only school argue: If one can infer the experience through the reason of recollection and the recollection when one thinks, 'I previously saw blue' comes subsequent to the experience, then, when one says, 'I saw blue', one establishes the experience of the object through the recollection of the object, and that very experience of the object is the apprehension of blue.

They further state:

When one says, 'I saw' one establishes the experience of the object possessor through the sign of the recollection of the object possessor, and that experience of the object possessor is the self-knower.

This is how the Mind Only proponents assert a self-knower.

That which serves as an answer by the Madhyamikas is in the last two lines of the verse:

- 23cd. *One remembers in relation to the experience of something else,
Like the poison of a rat.*

Madhyamika: The memory of the object possessor does not establish the self-knower. If the apprehension of blue experiences the other object of blue then, when one says, 'I previously saw this blue', the memory of the object possessor is generated from the memory of the relation between the object and the object possessor. It is not generated from the experience of the object possessor, just like the marmot does not experience the poisoned bite at the time but does remember it later.

For example: When the marmot in winter is bitten by a rat, although the poison of the rat enters its body, it only experiences the bite and not the poison. Later, when it wakes up due to hearing thunder, it remembers that at the time of the bite it had been poisoned, but without having earlier experienced the poison at the time.

Then the analogy is further explained:

The marmot being bitten is similar to the experience of the object by the apprehension of blue. Being poisoned at the same time as the bite is like the experience of the object possessor at the time of holding the object. That the object possessor does not experience itself at this time is like the non-experience of poison at the time of being bitten. Subsequently remembering the bite is like remembering the object. The memory of the object possessor through the memory of the object, along with the object possessor not having experienced itself earlier, is like the memory of the poison through the power of merely remembering being bitten, and without having experienced being poisoned at the time.

First of all, the Madhyamika asserts that the memory of the object possessor does not establish the self-knower. If the apprehension of blue experiences the other object of blue then, when one says, 'I previously saw this blue', the memory of the object possessor is generated from the memory of the relation between the object and the object possessor. It is not generated from the experience of the object possessor ...

This is in relation to the Mind Only assertion that one recollects by experiencing the object possessor the mind knowing itself. The Madhyamika says this is not the case. The analogy presented here is just like the marmot does not experience the poisoned bite at the time, but does remember it later. The marmot is an animal that hibernates in the winter. I think what is translated here as a rat may be more like a small mouse that has a poisonous bite.

When the marmot in winter is bitten by a rat [or a small poisonous mouse], although the poison of the mouse enters its body it only experiences the bite and not the poison. This refers to the fact that, when it is hibernating, the marmot would experience the pain of the bite, but would not yet experience the actual poison transmitted with that bite. That hasn't taken effect on the marmot's body, so it doesn't actually know that yet. It only experiences the bite and not the poison. Later, when it wakes up due to hearing thunder, it remembers that it had been poisoned at the time of the bite, although it had not experienced the poison at that time.

A marmot is an animal that hibernates underground for about six months a year in the winter months, so when another small animal like a poisonous rat or mouse bites it, apparently it has an awareness of the bite because of the pain of the bite. It experiences the pain of the bite, but because the poison has entered its body but has yet to be activated, the poison remains dormant. Later, when Spring comes along and the thunderstorms wake up the hibernating animal, at the time the marmot wakes up the poison apparently gets activated, and that is when it feels the actual pain and suffering of the poison.

So although the poison entered the marmot's body at an earlier time, it was not experienced at that time because the poison had not yet been activated. Later, however, when it wakes up and experiences the pain of the poison being activated and spreading throughout its body, it feels the pain and then has the recollection, 'I was poisoned when I was bitten earlier'. Even though it doesn't recollect having been poisoned earlier, due to the delayed effect it now has a recollection that it must have been poisoned earlier. This is an analogy to show how recollection or remembrance comes about.

We can all relate to this example. We might have been out in some wilderness area and something might have stung us and we thought, 'Something has bitten me'. It could be a poisonous animal, like a rat or a mouse, but initially we would only experience the pain of the sting or the bite, and not pay much attention to it and move on. But then, later, after the poison starts to spread, the actual pain of the poison is felt. Even though one may have forgotten about the bite, later one will think that the poison is very painful and one can feel it spreading over a greater area, such as up one's leg.

So even though one would not have known at the time of the bite that one had been poisoned, later on, because of the pain spreading and knowing that it is the effect of the poison, one would reflect, 'I must have been poisoned earlier'.

The text refers to the marmot waking up due to hearing thunder and remembering that at the time of the bite it had been poisoned, but without having experienced the poison at that time. This analogy is basically refuting that there has to be a self-knower: that even though at the time one didn't know one had been poisoned, later one has the recollection of this.

The analogy is explained as follows: The marmot being bitten is similar to the experience of the object by the apprehension of blue; the experience of the bite itself is analogous to the experience of the object by the consciousness perceiving blue at that time.

Being poisoned at the time of the bite and not knowing one has been poisoned is like the experience of the object possessor – that which perceives the blue – at the time of holding the object, which in this case is the colour blue. The object possessor does not experience itself at this time, just like the poison is not experienced at the time of being bitten. So in this analogy, the object possessor not experiencing the poison at the time of being bitten shows how one does not need a self-knower to remember the object possessor. Subsequently remembering the bite is like remembering the object, the memory of the object possessor through the memory of the object – the memory of the object possessor through the memory of the object, along with the object possessor having earlier experienced itself, is like the memory of the poison through the power of merely remembering being bitten, and without at the time having experienced being poisoned.

The analogy is elaborately explained to show how there is no need to have a self-knower in order to remember the object possessor at a later time. Gyaltsab Je gives the following statements:

This reasoning to establish memory without a self-knower appears to me as having been composed by a fully qualified scholar, and as excellent. It seems it has not been adopted correctly by those practising the words of the Introduction to the Trainings.

Actually these would be the words of Lama Tsong Khapa himself, recorded in notes taken by Gyaltsab Je Rinpoche. So it is actually Lama Tsong Khapa who is saying this. The final statement here is:

Because in general the answer given to, 'it is incorrect that the later consciousness remembers because the earlier consciousness did not experience itself', is 'the pervasion is not established', it says that the assertion, 'the Introduction to the Trainings does not refute a nominal self-knower' is not the position of the great bodhisattva.

2.2.2.3.2 Refuting other reasons used to establish a self-knower

24. If, 'It can illuminate itself because that endowed with other conditions can see.' By applying the formulated eye balm, The vase is seen, but not the eye balm.

Mind-Only: Having accomplished the mind of calm abiding, one can see the mind of others, then one can illuminate one's mind as one's object. For example, like being able to see the close mountain if one can see the far away needle.

Answer: Although one can see underground treasures such as vases by applying the substance made out of a medicinal eye balm, one does not see the eye balm itself. This reason harms the position of the self-knower, and does not support it.

Further: It is explained like this because, as they are the same in arising from the same illuminating cause, it follows that not only are that illuminating and that illuminated not established as one, they are certainly also not established as of one entity. This is so because at the time when the underground vase is seen due to applying the medicinal eye balm created through a secret mantra for seeing underground treasures, not only is the illuminated vase not one with the illuminating eye balm, they also do not become one entity.

Hence, not only is it unsuitable as a reason establishing a self-knower, it harms the existence of a self-knower.

The Mind Only are saying that, having established calm abiding and with other conditions such as achieving the higher mental concentrations, then due to acquiring clairvoyance, one is able to know others' minds. If one can know others' minds, which in comparison to one's own mind are external and far away, then one can definitely assert that one knows one's own mind which is close. The example given here is like being able to see a nearby mountain if one can see a needle far away in the distance.

So the Madhyamika then refute this example that the Mind Only use, which is that if you can see something far away, then by default that would imply one could definitely see what is near. The Mind Only use that example to assert, therefore, that there is a self-knower. The Madhyamika's counter-argument to establish that the Mind Only school assertion is not valid is:

Answer: Although one can see underground treasures such as vases by applying the substance made out of a medicinal eye balm ...

This eye balm is a substance that is a combination of medicinal plants and the mantras recited over it. It is said that when one applies the eye balm to one's eyes, it enables one to see treasures underground. Although the treasures underground are seen, one does not see the eye balm itself.

So the Madhyamika present a meticulous example here. If the Mind Only say that if something far away is seen, then by all means one has to see something near, then how about a situation where one applies this eye balm to the eyes to see treasures underground? One would be able to see the underground treasures, but not the eye balm itself. This is a very good example.

This reason harms the position of the self-knower, and does not support it.

Further: It is explained like this because, as they are the same in arising from the same illuminating cause, it follows that not only are that illuminating and that illuminated not established as one, they are certainly also not established as of one entity.

The analogy is further explained:

This is so because at the time when the underground vase is seen due to applying the medicinal eye balm created through a secret mantra for seeing underground treasures, not only is the illuminated vase, ...

... illuminated vase meaning here a vase that is clearly seen

...

... not one with the illuminating eye balm, they also do not become one entity.

Hence, not only is it unsuitable as a reason establishing a self-knower, it harms the existence of a self-knower.

In relation to the analogy presented earlier, the Madhyamika says to the Mind Only that not only is it unsuitable as a reason to establish a self-knower, it actually harms the existence of a self-knower. So what the Mind Only asserts as being an example harms the very assertion of a self-knower.

2.2.2.3.3 Refuting that other-knowers would be impossible if there would be no self-knower

The Mind Only school then says that if there was no self-knower, it would be absurd to know other external phenomena. This is what the Mind Only school uses as a counter-argument and will be refuted next.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

6 September 2016

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

Let us generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in the practice of listening to the Mahayana teachings, and then put them into practice well.

Generating such a motivation, even for a few moments, will definitely establish very strong positive imprints in our mind.

Just as we have attempted in our short meditation session it is essential to incorporate meditation into our daily life.

Accumulating virtue and reducing familiarity with non-virtue through meditation¹

The literal meaning of meditation is to familiarise the mind with a virtuous object. So focusing on a virtuous object is the actual meditation practice. The reason why we find it so hard to actually engage in a proper meditation practice is because we are controlled by our thoughts, and these thoughts are in turn controlled by the delusions. That is why we find it very hard to maintain a focus on virtuous objects.

When we understand meditation practice in this way then we are able to incorporate the essential aspects of the path such as the four noble truths, the two truths and so forth into that practice. Indeed, when we realise how distracted our mind is, we can see how meditation practice reminds us of the first two noble truths – the truth of suffering and the truth of origination.

When we are able to maintain our focus on a virtuous object, then due to that familiarity we will be inclined to focus more and more on virtuous objects, even in our daily life. At a beginner's level however, we find that our minds are very easily influenced by non-virtuous objects, and that it is extremely difficult to maintain a focus on a virtuous object. Focussing on non-virtuous objects seems spontaneous and natural as it doesn't require any effort, and maintaining a focus on a virtuous object is very hard, like leading an old horse. This is because one's mind has become habituated to focussing on non-virtuous objects and distractions. That pattern has to be reversed, and the only way to do that is by putting an effort into really maintaining our focus on a virtuous object.

Then we will gradually find that our mind is more and more inclined to focus on virtuous objects as opposed to focusing on non-virtuous objects, and this indicates that the meditation practice has begun to take root within us. To reach our goal, we need to develop more and more familiarity with focussing on the virtuous objects at our everyday level. If someone has meditated for a long time and still finds it very hard to focus on virtuous objects, then that goes to show that they have actually been missing the point, and there have not yet been any positive results from their meditation.

When we apply a correct understanding within the meditation practice itself, then it can serve as an optimum means to be able to accumulate more virtue and positive karma. That is what we really need to aim for. If we don't understand how meditation helps us to engage in virtue consistently, then even if we focus on an object for a certain period of time in meditation, we will find that when we come out of meditation we will go back to a completely distracted mind that is focussed on non-virtuous objects. Then the meditation practice really hasn't served much of a purpose.

Being able to maintain a focus on a virtuous object for even half an hour is very difficult now, because of our lack of true familiarity with the practice. And even if we are able to remain focused on an object without distraction for a while, we find ourselves still following distractions when we come out of our meditation. So our meditation practice hasn't served its ultimate purpose.

In simple terms, what we are intending to acquire for our wellbeing is the accumulation of virtue, and to reduce our familiarity with non-virtue and with creating non-virtuous karma. The way to achieve that is by becoming more and more familiar with focussing on virtue. When we are able to maintain a focus on virtue, then the conducive conditions for personal wellbeing will naturally be acquired. Of course we will see the benefit of this in this life, but we are also preparing for our future lives.

If we find ourselves engaging more and more in virtue, then we are naturally creating the causes to acquire favourable conditions in our future lives. Whereas if we find ourselves accumulating more non-virtue, then we are distancing ourselves from good conditions, not only in this life, but in our future lives as well. This, in simple terms, is what the outcome will be. Since we want good conditions, not only in this life but also in our future lives, we need to ensure that we actually engage in the ways and means to achieve that. This is how we need to understand meditation practice.

Incorporating understandings gained from the teachings into meditation practice

Understanding meditation in its entirety ensures that, from the very beginning, our meditation practice hits the mark of being an aid to accumulating virtue. On that basis we can then incorporate our meditation practice into all other aspects of our understanding of the teachings. When we understand that meditation practice encompasses the entire Dharma, then we will be able to relate to many other aspects of the teachings that we have studied to that practice. For those who have not done much study, meditation will be limited to focussing the mind on one object. Of course that in itself brings some solace to their mind as they get some peace and benefit from their meditation. But they will not be able to expand that understanding to the entire range of the teachings.

Whereas we here have all received many teachings, which encompass the entire range of the teachings on the extensive path, as well as the profound path. The extensive path of the teachings such as karma, the four noble truths, as well as the entire stages of the path can all be incorporated into our meditation practice. Likewise, when we incorporate into our meditation practice our understanding that, while practices such as the six perfections and so forth exist conventionally, they lack inherent existence and are thus empty of true existence, then that includes the profound teachings of the Buddha.

When we keep in mind this really expansive view of how meditation practice ultimately encompasses the full range of the teachings, then we will see much more value in the meditation practice that we do. Also, when we familiarise ourselves with this practice and develop a more focussed mind, then that serves as the basis for achieving the highest level of concentration, which is calm abiding. As explained in the teachings, when calm abiding is achieved, then one is able to focus single-pointedly on any virtuous object for as long as one wishes. When the focus is placed on one virtuous object it will be as firm as a mountain, and when expanded one will be able to apply it to all virtuous objects.

This is how we need to understand the value of meditation practice.

Overcoming attachment and anger through meditation

Furthermore, if our meditation practice doesn't incorporate an understanding of karma, then we've completely missed the point of the teachings. Our practice is based on incorporating an understanding of how our karma works. If our meditation practice serves as a means to prevent one from acting upon non-virtuous negative states of mind such as anger, then it has taken root. But if one claims to be a meditator, and succumbs to anger as soon as the conditions for anger arise, then one has completely missed the point again. The teachings also explain that all the teachings of the Buddha can be incorporated into a means for overcoming negative states of mind such as anger, and attachment.

Likewise it is really essential that our meditation practice hits the mark of overcoming attachment. As the great masters have explained in very succinct and concise teachings, if one finds the meditation on seeing the imperfections of an object doesn't work to overcome attachment, then that is a sign that one is still holding onto the object of attachment from the depths of one's heart. If within the depths of one's heart one still grasps at the object as being appealing, then no matter how much one tries to focus on the imperfections of the object, one will find it doesn't work to overcome the attachment. If it doesn't take much at all to remember the object of attachment as being appealing, then that is a clear sign that one has been grasping at it for a very long time. That is why it doesn't take much effort for the attachment to surface. According to the advice of these great masters, when we meditate on the imperfections of an object, we need to attempt to really generate a true sense of understanding of the natural imperfections of the object, from the depths of our hearts. Only then does it become an antidote.

As I've mentioned previously, the very succinct advice that the Sakya Pandita offers is that attempting to meditate without hearing the teachings first is like trying to climb a rocky cliff without any fingers.

Both method and wisdom are necessary

Each of the five paths has two different stages; meditative equipoise and post-meditative equipoise. Why are both meditative equipoise and post-meditative equipoise stages needed?

As explained earlier, meditative equipoise is where one applies a particular antidote to overcome the delusions; whilst the post-meditative equipoise state is where one applies the technique to other practices such as listening, and engaging in the practice of the remaining perfections as a way to purify negativities and accumulate merit. If only meditation were a sufficient cause for enlightenment, then there would be no need for a post-meditative state. Even on the tenth bhumi or ground, there is still the distinction between the state of meditative equipoise and post-meditative equipoise. That is because, even on the final ground, merit still has to be accumulated as a means to overcome the subtlest imprints of the delusions. Just as on the previous grounds, the bodhisattva on the tenth ground needs to come out of their meditative equipoise in order to accumulate further merit, and then finally goes back into meditative equipoise focussing on emptiness, and thus obtains enlightenment within that final state of meditative equipoise.

This clearly shows that both merit and wisdom are required in order to achieve the state of enlightenment. As Lama Tsong Khapa mentions in a text he composed, 'In the beginning I engaged in extensive listening, in the middle all the teachings appeared as instructions, and in the end I put them into practice day and night. I dedicate this to the flourishing of the Buddha's teachings'.

The great Kadampa masters have explained that the way to engage in practice is through extensive listening to the teachings, contemplating the meaning and then finally this is incorporated into the practice of meditation as a way to acquire wisdom. As mentioned earlier, without having received instructions through hearing it is futile to try to engage in a practice, as one will not be able to achieve much in the way of results. So we need to understand the importance of the combination of all of these aspects.

I've mentioned a few points that we need to really keep in mind. Essentially the practice one engages in should ultimately subdue one's mind and make it kinder and more gentle. That is why we engage in our studies and in personal practice. It is what I attempt to do regularly, and the message I'm giving to you is that I see it as being essential. The study that we are engaged in is really profound. As a technique to help subdue the mind, one could say that there's no greater text than the one we're studying. If it doesn't work to subdue your mind then I can safely say nothing else could.

I'm not implying that you are not already making attempts to put it into practice. All I'm doing is encouraging you to further enhance your intentions and practice to ensure that your study and practice is fruitful. That is all I am concerned about. So you should not think that I'm reprimanding you, or saying that you're not doing well. I'm just encouraging you. In presenting the teachings over all these years I feel that I have given you the material to work on. Now I'm encouraging you to actually use it as a way to gain some benefit from that.

As a way of complimenting you on your positive efforts I can tell you of the person who attended a seminar one or two years ago. He went to the morning session where he found that people were presenting in a very nice and gentle manner. People showed great understanding and knowledge, which they presented very clearly in a very kind manner. He was very impressed and very pleased with that, and when he shared that with me, that in turn made me feel very happy. The seminars have improved a lot in the way they've been conducted and how information is shared and so forth. That, in itself, shows that there have been positive improvements.

2.2.2.2.3.3. Refuting that other-knowers would be impossible if there were no self-knowers

This is subdivided into two:

2.2.2.2.3.3.1. Actual

2.2.2.2.3.3.2. Refuting that the illusory workings of the mind are inexpressible as being the very mind or other from it

2.2.2.2.3.3.1. Actual

This section begins with the argument:

Argument: If there is no self-knower, then there is no memory, and therefore the experience of objects and the consciousnesses of seeing, listening and the like become non-existent.

The argument that is presented here by the Mind Only school is an argument against the Madhyamika who do not assert a self-knower. The Mind Only argue that if there is no self-knower, then there is no memory, and therefore the experience of objects and the consciousnesses of seeing, listening and the like, the five sense consciousnesses, would all be non-existent. This is their argument.

25. *Just as the consciousnesses of seeing and listening,
Are not to be refuted here,
That which becomes the cause of suffering,
The formulation of true existence, is to be refuted.*

Then the commentary explains the verse, which serves as an answer by the Madhyamikas.

Answer: The reason conventionalities of sight by eye consciousness, hearing by ear consciousness and knowing by mental consciousness are not something to be abandoned is because they do not need to be abandoned as suffering is not generated merely through them, and also arhats possess these nominalities. They cannot be abandoned, because this would have to happen either through logic or through quotation, which would in turn also have to be refuted. If these are refuted, it is a mistake because one would adopt a nihilistic view.

Thus, because the formulation of these phenomena as truly existent is the cause of suffering, that becoming the cause of suffering is that which is to be abandoned, as it is the root of cyclic existence. If one does not reverse the root of cyclic existence, one does not stop cyclic existence, and because the true-grasping at forms, sounds and the like is shown to be the root of cyclic existence, it clearly shows that hearers and self-liberators realise the selflessness of phenomena.

The assertions made by the Karakpas and the like, that while the mere appearance to the sense consciousnesses are not objects of negation, but that if they are held as permanent or impermanent, existent or non-existent and so forth, then they are objects of negation, is a comeback response of the Chinese Abbot.

It first explains that conventionalities of sight by eye consciousness, visual objects that are seen by the sight consciousness, hearing by ear consciousness and knowing by mental consciousness are not to be abandoned conventionally. In other words, on a conventional level these consciousnesses are not to be abandoned. The reason, as Gyaltsab Je explains, is that suffering is not generated merely through them, and also arhats possess these nominalities. Saying that conventionalities of sight by eye consciousness, hearing and so forth are not to be abandoned carries the implication that they do need to be abandoned as truly existent. That is the point.

In saying that the arhats possess these nominalities, the commentary is explaining again that, on a conventional level, arhats have not abandoned a nominal eye consciousness, ear consciousness, and so forth, but that they have abandoned them as truly existent.

Then the commentary further says, they cannot be abandoned, because this would have to happen either through logic or through quotation, which would in turn also have to be refuted. What is being explained here is that if they are to be abandoned nominally, then it would have to be either through logic or through quotation. If they were abandoned through either logic or quotation, then the logic and the quotation themselves would also have to be abandoned because they are nominally existent. So this absurdity is being presented.

As explained further, if these are refuted, either conventionally or nominally, it is a mistake because one would have to adopt a nihilistic view. In other words, refuting the conventionalities of the sense consciousnesses would be adopting a nihilistic view.

If you relate this explanation to its context in the text, then you will derive an understanding of the logic being presented here.

The commentary further explains that because the formulation of these phenomena as truly existent is the cause of suffering, that becoming the cause of suffering is that which is to be abandoned, as it is the root of cyclic existence. This is the main point: it is the causes of cyclic existence that have to be abandoned.

The succinct point being presented here is that if one does not reverse the root of cyclic existence, one does not stop cyclic existence. Furthermore, because true-grasping at forms, sounds and the like is shown to be the root of cyclic existence, it clearly shows that hearers and self-liberators realise the selflessness of phenomena. These points were presented previously. The reason why hearers and self-liberators have to realise the selflessness of phenomena, is because without gaining that realisation they cannot overcome the very root of cyclic existence.

The reasons presented here are points to really think about, and apply on a personal level. That is because the formulation of these phenomena as truly existent is the cause of suffering, and that becoming the cause of suffering is that which is to be abandoned. If one wishes to overcome suffering, then the cause of suffering, which is grasping at true existence, has to be overcome. Cyclic existence is within the mental continuum of all living beings. So it is the grasping at true existence within one's own mental continuum that is the root cause of cyclic existence.

The way to overcome the root of cyclic existence within one's own mental continuum is by gaining the realisation of the lack of inherent existence, i.e. selflessness. As grasping at a true self is the root of cyclic existence, the realisation of selflessness within one's own mental continuum is the means to overcome the very root cause of cyclic existence.

This is really the essential point. As we gain a clearer understanding of what selflessness is, and as our correct understanding increases, then we move closer to achieving the goal of overcoming the root of cyclic existence. Conversely, if we befriend grasping at true existence within our own mental continuum, by making it feel welcome and comfortable, then we are never going to be able to overcome grasping at true existence. If we don't ensure that our practices become the means to overcome grasping at true existence, then they could actually strengthen that grasping. For some this actually happens – rather than reducing grasping at a truly existent self, the grasping increases. So we need to be careful and protect ourselves from that.

I think the rest of the commentary can be understood without further explanation.

2.2.2.2.3.3.2. Refuting that the illusory workings of the mind are inexpressible as mind itself or other from it

The first two lines of verse relating to this read:

*26ab. If, 'There is no illusion apart from mind
And I do not hold them as not being separate'.*

Then the commentary presents the Mind Only assertion:

Mind Only: Because there is no outer existence there is no illusion, i.e., forms and the like, of different substance from the mind. And because of the earlier fault of 'at that time what is seen by what?', I do not hold them as not being separate.

The Mind Only say, because there is no outer existence there is no illusion, i.e., forms and the like, of different substance from the mind. So therefore they are not different substance from the mind, and because of the earlier fault which was raised as 'at that time what is seen by what?', I do not hold or assert them as not being separate as well.

Then the next four lines of verse present the Madhyamika's answer:

*26cd If it is a functionality, then how is it non-other?
If asserted to be non-other, then there is no functionality.*

*27ab. Just as illusions, though untrue, are
The perceived object, perceivers are too.*

The commentary says:

Madhyamaka: If forms and the like exist truly, they need to be true in the way they appear. In that case, as they appear as outer objects, they need to exist as outer objects. If they are outer functionalities, then how are they not of different substance from mind itself? It follows they are.

The Mind Only respond to that saying:

Mind Only: They are not of different substance.

Then the Madhyamika further reason:

Madhyamaka: It follows there is no true phenomenon because appearances are accepted to be false, and they do not exist in a different way. Although the illusions of forms and the like, which appear as outer objects but do not exist truly, are that perceived by the mind, and likewise, although the six consciousnesses are that which perceives, they are the same in not existing truly.

Therefore, the earlier fault of, 'If even the mistaken is non-existent' does not apply to the Madhyamaka, and this method would suit you, the Mind Only, well too.

The way of refuting the Mind Only assertions is by turning their own assertions back on them. The Mind Only school asserts that forms and the like exist truly, while the Madhyamika say that things lack true existence.

The Madhyamika counter the Mind Only argument by saying that if they do exist truly, they need to be true in the way that they appear. According to the Madhyamika, the criteria for something to be true is that it exists as it appears. If it does not exist in the way that it appears then it is false. So the Madhyamikas are reasoning with the Mind Only system, saying that if form and the like exist truly, they need to be true in the way they appear. In that case, because they appear as outer objects, they need to exist as outer objects. So the Madhyamikas are saying: 'If you say that they are true, then it would have to exist in the way that they appear, and since they appear as outer objects, then they would have to be outer objects. And according to you, Mind Only, that would be an absurdity, because you assert them as being one with the mind.

Furthermore, if they are outer functionalities, then how are they not of a different substance from the mind itself? So the Madhyamikas are arguing that there is a contradiction in that if they are outer functionalities or outer phenomena, then how could they be one with the mind itself as you Mind Only assert. Because using your own logic it follows that they have to be separate.

Then the Mind Only respond saying, they are not of different substance.

The Madhyamikas say that it follows there is no true phenomenon because appearances are accepted to be false, and they do not exist in a different way.

Furthermore, although the illusions of forms and the like, which appear as outer objects but do not exist truly, are that perceived by the mind, and likewise, although the six consciousnesses are that which perceives, they are the same in not existing truly. The main point is that according to the Madhyamika both the perceiver and that which is perceived are the same in existing conventionally, and the same in not existing truly.

The concluding statement is that, therefore, the earlier fault of, 'If even the mistaken is non-existent' does not apply to the Madhyamika, and this method would suit you, the Mind Only, well too. So, the Madhyamika say, the fault, if even the mistaken is non-existent, does not apply to us in accordance with what we assert. Then the Madhyamikas conclude by saying to the Mind Only, 'It would actually suit you well if you were to adopt this understanding'.

2.2.2.2.4. Refuting that imputed objects are based on truly existent functionalities.

What is being refuted here is one of the fundamental assertions of the Mind Only school, which is that all imputed phenomena have to have a truly existent base. They say that without a truly existent base, other imputed objects such as space and so forth cannot exist. That is the assertion that is being refuted here.

What the Mind Only school assert is that dependent phenomena, also translated as other-powered phenomena, have to rely on a truly existent base for their existence.

The Madhyamika say that the very term other-powered or dependent phenomena itself indicates that they have to depend on others for their functionality. Therefore they cannot be truly existent.

Both schools are referring to the same basis, that of other-powered or dependent phenomena, which are all things within samsara and nirvana. The Mind Only school say that all things within samsara and nirvana are dependent on a basis which is truly existent, and that is what is being refuted or negated by the Madhyamika school in this part of the text.

The first lines of verse under this heading read:

27cd. If, 'Cyclic existence is based on functionalities, Otherwise it would become like space',

28ab. If non-functionalities are based on functionalities

How can they perform an action? Then under this verse the Mind Only assertion is presented:

Mind Only. The false and imputed phenomena of cyclic existence and beyond are each based on a truly existent functionality, because everything deceptive is based on a truly existent basis. For example, even when a tree stump is mistaken for a human the tree stump itself exists truly. Likewise, cyclic existence is based on a truly existent basis. If it were not, then it would become a non-functionality, like space.

The meaning of this debate is put forth in the Compendium of Trainings like this, and to explain it in any other way is not the meaning.

Then the Madhyamikas respond to that:

Madhyamaka: If the false non-functionalities of samsara and nirvana depend on a truly existent basis of deception, then how could they produce the results of bondage and liberation? It follows they could not - because the truly existent basis does not exist. This reason is put forth in the Compendium of Deeds.

As quite clearly presented here, the Mind Only say that the false and imputed phenomena of cyclic existence and beyond are each based on a truly existent functionality, because everything deceptive is based on a truly existent basis. Even what is deceptive has to have a truly existent basis.

The example that they use to illustrate the point is: even when a tree stump is mistaken for a human, the tree stump itself exists truly. When you see a tree stump in the distance it may appear as if there is a human there, which is a deceptive appearance. However the basis of that deceptive appearance, which is a tree stump, actually does exist. They say that this is a sign that it exists truly. Another example that is also used in the teachings is a striped rope that appears to be a snake. Again, they say that while the appearance of a snake is deceptive the striped rope does actually exist. Therefore, they say, that is a reason why things exist truly.

With that illustration they then say, likewise, cyclic existence is based on a truly existent basis. If it were not, then it would become a non-functionality, like space. So they consider space as a non-functional phenomenon.

The Madhyamikas reply that if the false non-functionalities of samsara and nirvana depend on a truly existent basis of deception, then how could they produce the results of bondage and liberation? It follows they could not - because the truly existent basis does not exist. This reason is put forth in the Compendium of Deeds. So this meticulous reasoning is presented in the Compendium of Deeds.

Then come these two lines of verse:

*28cd. Your mind becomes completely isolated,
Without any support.*

This is the actual reasoning that is presented.

The commentary explains:

According to your Mind Only system the mind becomes an isolated self illuminating self-knower, without the supportive distortion into apprehender and apprehended and the like. This follows because, since you accept the appearance of object and object-possessor as being distant as not existing the way it appears, there is no outer existence, and because the appearances of forms and so forth as consciousness were refuted earlier. In this case the appearances of forms and such become objects distinct and unrelated to consciousness, and although the appearances of forms are tainted, they cannot taint the substance of consciousness.

This is actually quite a clear explanation if you go through it slowly. Basically, the Mind Only are saying that apprehender and apprehended are one and there is no distinction between them. However, according to the Madhyamika system of course there is a distinction. So that is what is being presented in this explanation.

So the next verse under the same heading is:

*29. When the mind is devoid of that perceived
Everyone will have gone thus.
In that case, what is the benefit
Of that imputed as mere mind?*

The commentary explains:

If this is accepted: It follows that when the mind is free from the dualistic appearance of apprehender and apprehended, then all sentient beings become thus gone ones and effortlessly attain liberation - because all minds are free from the appearances of apprehender and apprehended.

If however one accepts this position, then it follows that there is not the slightest need to comprehend the lack of apprehender and apprehended as being of different substance, which is labelled mere mind, in order to achieve the omniscient transcendental wisdom.

The explanation is that it follows that when the mind is free from the dualistic appearance of apprehender and apprehended, then all sentient beings become thus gone ones and effortlessly attain liberation. According to the Mind Only system the apprehension of form and the mind apprehending form being of different substance is the grasping to self of phenomena. So according to them, if things did exist externally then this is how it would have to exist, i.e. apprehender and apprehended being distinct and of different substance. Thus, they assert that the apprehender and apprehend are devoid of being distinct.

So the Madhyamikas are saying: at the time when the mind is free from the dualistic appearance of apprehender and apprehended, then all sentient beings by default would already be thus gone ones or enlightened buddhas effortlessly, and attain liberation - because, according to you, Mind Only, all minds would have be free from the appearances of apprehender and apprehended. Since, according to you all minds are free from the appearances of apprehender and apprehended, then this would mean that sentient beings are effortlessly and spontaneously liberated. Again according to the Mind Only, form and the apprehension of form being devoid of being different substance, is the selflessness of phenomena. Thus the Madhyamikas conclude: then it follows that there is not the slightest need to comprehend the lack of apprehender and apprehended as being of different substance, which is labelled mere mind, in order to achieve the omniscient transcendental wisdom.

We can conclude here for the evening. Once you are able to apply the logical reasoning in its proper place then it will be easy to understand and read the text. It just requires the application of logic.

As usual let us spend some time for our meditation practice. (meditation)

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: for the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose, I will engage in listening to the teachings and put them into practice well.

2.1.2. Refuting objections of no need and no ability regarding emptiness

2.1.2.2.3. Refuting the argument that the path realising emptiness has no use or purpose for a Madhyamaka¹

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.2.2.3.1. Argument

2.1.2.2.3.2. Answer

This is the continuation of the debate between the Mind Only and Madhyamika schools. The main point of disagreement is that the Mind Only proponents assert that there is no external existence, while the Madhyamika proponents assert that there is external existence. That is the basis of the argument between the two.

Specifically, Mind Only proponents assert that the subject and object – for example, form and the consciousness apprehending that form – are one in nature, not separate or distinct. Madhyamikas, on the other hand, would say that there are external forms and so forth that are perceived as existing and functioning externally.

When we mention Madhyamika here, we are specifically relating to the Prasangika-Madhyamika, i.e. Consequentialist Middle Way School. We make a distinction here because the Madhyamika School also includes the Svatantrika-Madhyamika school, amongst whom there are those who assert external existence.

This presentation in debate form is a useful way of understanding the subject we are studying. At a personal level, it enhances our intelligence or wisdom by increasing our ability to reason and analyse things.

Within the four different schools of Buddhist tenets in general, and within the Middle Way School in particular, we consider ourselves to be followers of the Prasangika-Madhyamika or Consequentialist system. If we do indeed hold that we are followers of the Prasangika-Madhyamika, then we need to understand the logical reasoning that characterises this system. We must really understand what it means, what its assertions are, and how its proponents use logic to assert their views.

Within the four Buddhist schools of tenets, proponents of the Mind Only School and the Madhyamika or Middle Way School are followers of the Mahayana tradition, i.e. the Great Vehicle. We need to understand that the proponents of the four schools of tenets are differentiated by the different views they hold, whereas the distinction between the Theravada or Lower Vehicle, and the Mahayana or Greater Vehicle is based on the respective followers' conduct and practices.

Within the Mahayana, there is also the Perfection of Wisdom Vehicle and the Tantra Vehicle and the distinction here is again not based on views, but rather on the practices of each vehicle.

2.1.2.2.3.2.1. Argument

30. Although knowing it to be like an illusion

How can the afflictions be opposed?

Even the creator himself

Generates attachment for the illusory woman.

This verse is the argument presented by the Mind Only. The commentary then explains this verse:

Mind-Only: Although you may comprehend that all phenomena lack inherent existence, like an illusion, it will only cause exhaustion if it serves no purpose with regard to abandoning the afflictive and other obscurations. Even if it is asserted to serve a purpose, how can it reverse the afflictions? It follows it cannot – because one who can see that even the creator of the illusory woman, who realises it to be empty of an external woman, generates attachment by thinking of the illusory woman as something suitable to be enjoyed, and one has nothing beyond the initial realisations of emptiness through listening and contemplation.

When the Mind Only say, Although you may comprehend that all phenomena lack inherent existence, like an illusion, this is referring to the Prasangika-Madhyamika's unique assertion that all phenomena lack inherent existence. Both the Svatantrika-Madhyamika and Mind Only schools, on the other hand, assert that there is inherent existence.

Here, the Mind Only proponents are debating the Prasangika-Madhyamika assertion that things lack inherent existence, saying it serves no purpose with regard to abandoning the afflictive and other obscurations. In other words, the Mind Only are saying to the Madhyamika, "Your assertion that things lack inherent existence and are like an illusion cannot help abandon the afflictive and other obscurations, so what purpose does it serve? Since it doesn't serve any purpose, then making such an assertion and gaining that understanding merely causes exhaustion. There is no point."

What follows next is a meticulous argument presented by the Mind Only School. It is good to get a sense of how they prosecute their argument after having said that, if the Madhyamika view that things lack inherent existence doesn't serve any purpose, then it is merely a cause of exhaustion. The Mind Only continue to argue that: "If it is asserted that the Prasangika-Madhyamika view serves a purpose then how can it reverse the afflictions? How can this assertion that things lack inherent existence and are like an illusion reverse the afflictions?"

Then the Mind Only School presents an example to illustrate that this view could not bring about the result of abandoning the afflictions: It follows it cannot – because one who can see that even the creator of the illusory woman, who realises it to be empty of an external woman, generates attachment by thinking of the illusory woman as something suitable to be enjoyed ... In simple terms, the Mind Only School is arguing that, when a male magician or illusionist conjures, for example, a beautiful woman, while the magician or illusionist may know it is an illusion, that doesn't prevent him from developing attachment to the illusion when he sees it as a very attractive and beautiful woman. Attachment and the desire to enjoy that illusion as if it were a real woman would still arise. Thus the Mind Only School is presenting a meticulous argument, saying that whilst the magician knows he is seeing an illusion, that doesn't prevent the afflictions, such as attachment, from arising, so the Prasangika-Madhyamika view that things are like an illusion does not serve a purpose, in terms of overcoming the afflictions.

¹ This heading was introduced on 26 July 2016. The heading numbering returns to the sequence used in the chapter as a whole.

The Mind Only proponents further argue that Prasangika-Madhyamika proponents have nothing beyond the initial realisations of emptiness through listening and contemplation.

In other words, the Mind Only is saying: "Your [Prasangika-Madhyamikas'] realisation of emptiness is nothing more than what you have gained from just hearing and contemplating, but lacks the realization gained from meditating. Your presentation of emptiness is merely based on listening and contemplating. Thus your presentation of emptiness cannot overcome the afflictions."

The Prasangika-Madhyamika School's answer is presented in the following three subdivisions.

2.1.2.2.3.2. Answer

This has three sub-divisions:

2.1.2.2.3.2.1. The reason why the illusionist generates attachment

2.1.2.2.3.2.2. Showing that meditating on the wisdom realising emptiness can overcome the afflictions and their imprints

2.1.2.2.3.2.3. Showing that one will receive the perfect complete result of abandonment.

The first part of the Prasangika-Madhyamika's answer responds to the Mind Only School's argument that the illusionist would still develop attachment to the illusory woman.

This answer can also help us understand how we develop attachment towards other objects. If one goes through the explanation slowly and tries to understand the point, the explanations given here are actually not too difficult to comprehend. For many of you to whom I have previously presented these teachings, this is basically a way to refresh these points.

2.1.2.2.2.1. The reason why the illusionist generates attachment.

The verse relating to the first part of the answer is:

31. *The creator has not abandoned the afflictive imprints
Regarding objects of knowledge.
Hence, when seeing them
The imprints of emptiness are weak.*

And the commentary explains: The illusionist that is the creator of the illusion has not abandoned in the slightest the afflictive imprints, i.e. true-grasping, with regards to the object of knowledge which is the illusory woman. Because they grasp at true existence, when they see the object, the imprints of realising emptiness are weak, and as a result they generate attachment.

If someone were to answer, 'The earlier has not abandoned the afflictions because his realisation of the illusory woman being empty of being a woman is only a partial emptiness, but in my system they are abandoned because the pervasive emptiness is realised', then this answer would be invalid.

Realising that the illusory woman is empty of being a woman is not a partial realisation of emptiness in relation to the subtle object of negation. If one has identified the object of negation, and then realised its non-existence on one phenomenon, then one can also understand it on other phenomena. This can be understood as explained in other places.

Thus in general, with regards to mistaken perceptions, to stop the non-conceptual mistaken perception of falling hairs due to the vitreous humour, it is not enough for the mental consciousness to understand the absence of falling hairs, which by itself does not stop the appearance of falling hairs. Rather one needs to clear the disease from the eye.

With regards to conceptual mistaken perceptions such as the grasping at the mottled rope as a snake due to adventitious conditions, the mere realisation of the rope will stop the mistaken perception. One does not need to meditate longer on this understanding.

Even the buddhas do not see a beginning of true grasping in the continuum of all migrators. The mental continuum has been intimately acquainted with true grasping since beginningless time; it is as if it has been 'baked in' to the continuum. Without even mentioning the seeds, just to stop coarse manifest self-grasping, it is not enough to merely realise the lack of true existence. Even if one realises the lack of true existence directly, it only abandons the intellectually acquired afflictions and their seeds, but not the innate ones. For that reason, the manifold presentation of the path of having to meditate for a long time on the path of meditation and the like was taught.

It is accepted that the conclusion of the realisation of emptiness is the elimination of the afflictions, and the realisation of emptiness can bring this about, but not immediately. It is not accepted that the afflictions need to be eliminated immediately upon the realisation of emptiness. The statement, 'How is that needed?' contains the answer.

The illusionist who creates the illusion of a woman has not abandoned the afflictive tendencies of true-grasping with regards to the object of knowledge of the illusory woman, and grasps at that object as truly existent. Hence, when he sees the illusory woman as empty of being a woman his imprints of realising emptiness are weak, and he does not have the ability to harm true-grasping as he does not possess anything that contradicts true-grasping.

The afflictive tendencies can refer to true-grasping, its seeds or the obscurations to knowledge, but here it is the earlier.

In showing the earlier Mind Only hypothetical statement as invalid, the Prasangika-Madhyamika proponents explain that realising the illusory woman as empty of being a woman is not a partial realisation of emptiness, in relation to the subtle object of negation. The point here is that earlier, when the Mind Only School presented the argument against the Prasangikas, they assumed the Prasangikas were asserting that the illusory woman was empty of the external woman, meaning that emptiness is the object not being an external woman.

The Prasangika School is now refuting this, saying that realising the illusory woman as being empty of an external woman is not, according to their view, even a partial emptiness. Earlier, the Mind Only School had argued that seeing the illusory woman as being empty of an actual external woman in itself would not overcome attachment and the other afflictions. Now the Prasangikas are saying that the illusory woman being empty of an external woman is not even a partial emptiness in relation to the object of negation.

The Prasangikas further explain that when the actual object of negation is realised in relation to one phenomenon, one can also realise it in relation to other phenomena, as explained in other places. Here, 'other places' refers to other texts. As you will recall, Aryadeva's Four Hundred Verses clearly explains that when the emptiness of one object or phenomenon is realised then, without needing much further investigation and reasoning, when that realisation is applied to all other objects, the emptiness of all other objects can be realised.

The commentary continues: Then, in general with regard to mistake perceptions, to stop the non-conceptual mistaken perception of falling hairs due to the vitreous humour ... The latter refers to an eye condition involving the vitreous humour in the eyeball. When someone sees falling hairs when in fact there is no falling hair, then that is an example of a non-conceptual mistaken perception.

The commentary says that, in order to overcome that non-conceptual mistaken perception, it is not enough for the mental consciousness to understand the absence of falling hairs. In other words it is not enough to think, "Although I see falling hairs, there are no actual falling hairs". Just that thought alone will not prevent the mistaken perception of falling hair. To overcome that non-conceptual mistaken perception, one has to actually cure the disease, for example, by taking some medicine or applying ointment that can stop the mistaken perception of seeing falling hairs. So it is not only a matter of the mind knowing that the perception is mistaken.

Having presented mistaken perception in relation to non-conceptual perception, the Prasangika then present conceptual mistaken perception, using the example of grasping at the mottled rope as a snake due to adventitious conditions. Due to adventitious conditions here means immediate conditions. As explained in the teachings, there are three immediate conditions required for a rope to be seen as a snake: the rope itself must be mottled, which means it has a pattern that makes it look like a snake; it is coiled like a snake; and the time of the day is such that it prevents you from seeing it clearly from a distance, for example, at dusk. So, under those conditions, a mottled rope could appear as a snake.

So, although initially one might feel fear as a result of seeing the object as a snake, all that is needed to overcome that mistaken perception is the mere realisation that it is a rope. One does not need to meditate longer on this understanding.

These examples show that both non-conceptual and conceptual mistaken perceptions can be overcome. If the non-conceptual mistaken perception is due to a condition like an eye disease, then all that is required to prevent the non-conceptual mistaken perception is to cure that eye disease. With a conceptual mistaken perception, all that is required to remove that mistaken conception is to understand, for example, that the object is actually a rope and not a snake.

As the Prasangikas explain further: Even the buddhas do not see a beginning of true grasping in the continuum of all my migrators. So while the Mind Only School asserts that there is true existence, according to the Prasangika, the grasping at true existence is what is to be overcome or abandoned. This abandonment, grasping at true existence, has existed within the mental continuum since beginningless time. Even the buddhas cannot see the beginning of this grasping at true existence within the mental continuum of sentient beings.

As the commentary further explains, the mental continuum has been intimately acquainted with grasping at true existence since beginningless time. It is as if it is 'baked in' to the continuum. The original Tibetan word translated as 'baked' can also mean well-ripened – in other words, it is as if self-grasping has become inseparable from the mind itself. So, leaving aside the prospect of overcoming the seed of self-grasping, even to just stop the coarse manifestation of self-grasping, it is not enough to merely realise the lack of true existence. This is the point being made here. Even overcoming the grosser or coarser manifest levels of self-grasping cannot be done just by the mere realisation of the lack of true existence.

Further, while it is not enough to merely realise the lack of true existence, to even stop the coarser manifestations of self-grasping, the commentary says: Even if one realises the lack of true existence directly, it only abandons the intellectually acquired afflictions and their seeds, but not the innate ones.

The conclusion here is that, for this reason, the manifold presentation of the path of having to meditate for a long time on the path of meditation and so forth was taught. When one attains the path of seeing on the five paths, that is when one gets the direct realisation of emptiness; the lack of inherent existence is realised at that point. However, as mentioned here, the initial direct realisation of emptiness can only overcome the intellectually acquired afflictions, but it doesn't overcome the innate ones.

Therefore, even after realising emptiness directly on the path of seeing, one has to go further. When reaching the path of meditation, even meditation itself is divided into nine different stages. All of these stages on the path of meditation relate to different levels of overcoming the subtle afflictions.

We can accept that the conclusion of the realisation of emptiness is the elimination of the afflictions completely. The Prasangika-Madhyamika proponent is saying here: "I accept the conclusion that, having meditated on the realisation of emptiness — after having initially realised it directly, then further meditating on it again and again, perfecting that understanding of directly realising emptiness, and removing subtler levels of the afflictions gradually — at the end of this, there is a total elimination of the afflictions. That is what I accept.”

Thus the Prasangikas are asserting that the realisation of emptiness brings about the elimination of the afflictions, but not immediately. It is not accepted that the afflictions need to be eliminated immediately upon the realisation of emptiness. This a counter-argument to the Mind Only School's earlier assertion that when the illusionist merely sees the illusory woman as empty of actually being an external woman, that doesn't help to overcome the afflictions, specifically attachment to the illusory woman. So the Prasangika proponent is saying here: “I never stated that realising emptiness initially will immediately overcome all afflictions. It has to be further developed.”

This is a very important point. We can take it as a personal instruction because, leaving aside the debate with the Mind Only School, we definitely have this thought: “If I gain some understanding of emptiness, I might be able to really overcome all my afflictions and all my problems”.

In relation to the meaning of these lines: The creator has not abandoned the afflictive imprints. Regarding objects of knowledge, the object of knowledge is the illusory woman. The commentary explains the Prasangika view that: The illusionist that creates the illusion of a woman has not abandoned the afflictive tendencies of true-grasping with regards to the object of knowledge of the illusory woman, and grasps at that object as truly existent. Hence, when he sees the illusory woman as empty of being a woman his imprints of realising emptiness are weak, and he does not have the ability to harm true-grasping as he does not possess anything that contradicts true-grasping. The afflictive tendencies can refer to true-grasping, its seeds or the obscurations to knowledge, but here it is the earlier. This means that when we talk about the imprints of grasping at true existence, it can refer to the obscurations to knowledge, but here it is referring to the actual tendency to grasp at things as truly existent.

So the part of the Prasangika's response is:

2.1.2.2.3.2.2. Showing that meditating on the wisdom realising emptiness can overcome the afflictions and their imprints.

When one gains an understanding of the topic from the outline itself, one can comprehensively understand the presentation. Here, the sub-heading ‘Showing that meditating on the wisdom realising emptiness can overcome the afflictions and their imprints’ is the next part of the Prasangika response to the Mind Only School's earlier assertion that the illusionist still has attachment to the illusory woman while realising it to be empty. Here, the Prasangika School argues that meditation on the wisdom realising emptiness can gradually overcome the afflictions.

This section is further sub-divided into two:

2.1.2.2.3.2.2.1. General presentation

2.1.2.2.3.2.2.2. Specific presentation

2.1.2.2.3.2.2.1. General presentation

32. *Meditating on the imprints of emptiness
Abandons the imprints of phenomena;
Meditating on that called ‘completely non-existent’
Subsequently abandons even that.*

The commentary explains the meaning of this verse as follows:

By meditating on the imprints of emptiness, i.e. realising the lack of inherent existence of functionalities, the imprints of grasping at functionalities as truly existent are abandoned. By meditating on that called ‘completely non-existent’, i.e. by meditating on the lack of true existence as lacking true existence, subsequently even the true-grasping at the lack of true existence is abandoned.

If one only abandons the coarse object of negation, then one needs to subsequently abandon true existence, because true-grasping will only be abandoned from the time one has attained the cessation of the subtle object of negation from the point of view that true existence means an existent that does not exist as merely being posited by name. This will be explained later.

By meditating on the imprints of emptiness, i.e. realising the lack of inherent existence of functionalities, the imprints of grasping at functionalities as truly existent are abandoned. The mistaken conception to be abandoned is holding on to true existence. Thus, one meditates on the opposite, which is the lack of true existence, or lack of inherent existence. Meditating on the lack of inherent existence, and familiarising the mind with the lack of inherent existence through further meditation, will overcome the imprint of grasping at functionalities, of thinking that they are truly existent.

The next part is: By meditating on that called ‘completely non-existent’, i.e. by meditating on the lack of true existence as lacking true existence, subsequently even the true-grasping at the lack of true existence is abandoned. So even grasping at the lack of true existence can be abandoned through the meditation as well.

2.1.2.2.3.2.2.2. Specific presentation

33. *When it is said that nothing exists
The investigated functionality is not observed.
At that time the non-functionality lacks a basis,
How can it linger before one's awareness?*

The commentary explains this:

When it is said that any functionality lacks true existence, if the investigated functionality existed truly, it should be observable, but it is not. Therefore, when it is realised as lacking true existence, then the truly existent non-functionality lacks a truly existent basis. As a result, how could the refuted true existence then linger before one's awareness? As there is no suchness without subject, if the lack of true existence existed truly, it would have to be established as the nature of the subject, but that has already been refuted as being in the nature of true existence.

The first sentence of the commentary is quite clear. If a functionality – a thing or event – existed truly, then when it is investigated, it should be observable, i.e. one should be able to observe its true existence. But this is not the case. That, in itself, proves that things lack true existence.

Therefore, when it is realised as lacking true existence, then the truly existent non-functionality lacks a truly existent basis. This is contradicting the earlier point where the Mind Only School asserts that even something that is false has to have a true basis. However, according to the Prasangika School, even the basis lacks true existence – the very basis of the lack of true existence itself lacks true existence. As a result, how could the refuted true existence then linger before one's awareness? Being a rhetorical question, this is saying it cannot, there is nothing left that is truly existent when the very basis also lacks true existence.

If you pay attention and read these sections carefully, it should become clearer.

For the older students, the explanations presented here would be quite apparent and clear, because they have studied them previously so many times, and I have explained them many times before. So if you still don't get much of an understanding by reading it now, then the earlier explanation has not served much purpose.

However, for the newer students, of course, this topic initially appears to be quite complicated and perhaps difficult to comprehend right away. But you can refer to other teachings that present explanations such as, if something exists truly, how does it exist and why does it lack true existence? This is explained in The Heart Sutra and you can read commentaries on The Heart Sutra that explain this topic, as well as other commentaries and texts, including other commentaries on this text itself. By reading different explanations, one can get a more comprehensive understanding.

Also, the earlier teachings I gave on the tenets present the different assertions of the different schools, and thus they can become clear in one's mind.

This is where the older students can help out the newer students. If newer students have any questions or doubts, you need to approach older students so that they can share their knowledge and understanding. That is assuming that the older students are not still fumbling with their misunderstanding! [laughter]

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

Generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: For the sake of all other mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in the practice of listening to the Mahayana teachings and then put them into practice well.

Generating such a motivation, even for a few moments, will definitely establish very strong positive imprints in our mind.

2.1.2.2.3.2.2. Showing that meditating on the wisdom realising emptiness can overcome the afflictions and their imprints

2.1.2.2.3.2.2.2. Specific presentation (cont.)

There are two verses under this heading, the first of which was covered last time. The second reads:

34. *When objects and non-objects
Do not linger before one's awareness,
And since there is no other possibility,
They are totally pacified in non-existence.*

The commentary explains:

Thus, when no truly existent functionality or non-functionality lingers before one's awareness, and as there is no other aspect of true existence at this time, one realises that all objects of true-grasping are non-existent and then all elaborations become pacified. In the perception of a person who realises emptiness directly, all dualistic elaborations with regards to emptiness are pacified and although the realisation of emptiness, conceptually or with a meaning generality has not stopped dualistic appearance, it has stopped the elaborations of true existence with regards to the meaning it ascertains. This verse and the lower five verses elaborately show the reality of the result.

The explanation starts with when no truly existent functionality or non-functionality lingers before one's awareness. Here functionality refers to the category of compounded phenomena, impermanence and so forth, while non-functionality refers to permanent phenomena such as non-obstructing space.

This section of the text shows the absurdity of the Mind Only presentation in that if things were to exist truly, as the Mind Only say they do, then they would have to exist either as functional phenomena or non-functional phenomena. These are the only two possibilities - functional or non-functional. Here functional and non-functional can also be related to the basis of imputation and the emptiness of that base, or in other words, conventional illusory phenomena or ultimate phenomena. If something exists it has to exist in one of these two categories.

When the commentary refers to no truly existent functionality or non-functionality lingering before one's awareness, it is saying that if true existence were established it would have to be established either as a functionality or a non-functionality. And since true existence doesn't appear before the awareness in either in these two ways, there is no other aspect of true existence that it could be. This leaves no other possibility for it to exist, as it does not appear to the valid awareness in any other way.

One realises that all objects of true-grasping are non-existent and then all elaborations are pacified in the perception of a person who realises emptiness directly. If truly existent phenomena were to exist then they would have to appear either as functional phenomena or non-functional phenomena; or as the basis of imputation, or the emptiness of that base. When one realises that it does not appear in any of these ways, then one sees that the object of true grasping is non-existent. What is being explained here is that grasping at true existence is a mistaken conception. Whatever appears to the mind that grasps at true existence does not actually exist in the way that it appears, because it is a mistaken conception.

When one realises that, then that is the dawning of the realisation of emptiness. As the commentary mentions, all elaborations are then pacified in the perception of a person who realises emptiness directly. When one realises that all objects of true-grasping are non-existent, then all elaborations are pacified.

This is a very significant point. When the objects of true grasping are seen as non-existent, then, as mentioned earlier, all the elaborations are pacified. There's this statement in the teachings which says 'the non-seeing is the ultimate seeing'. This is the same point being made here. When one realises that the apprehended object of true grasping doesn't exist, then one sees emptiness.

Further on the commentary states, in the perception of a person who realises emptiness directly, all dualistic elaborations with regard to emptiness are pacified. We had a lot of discussion earlier about how all dualistic appearances are pacified for a being who is in meditative equipoise realising emptiness directly. For such a being there's no dualistic appearance whatsoever – such as conventional appearance, or the appearance of the subject and object as being distinct, or true existence. So the three types of dualistic appearances have completely subsided.

Furthermore, although the realisation of emptiness, conceptually or with a meaning generality, has not stopped dualistic appearance, it has stopped the elaborations of true existence with regard to the meaning it ascertains. As opposed to the direct perception of emptiness, when one gains a conceptual understanding of emptiness, or the realization of emptiness with a meaning generality, although the true existence of objects is not perceived it has stopped the elaborations of true existence with regard to the meaning it ascertains, there's still the perception of the object and subject as being distinct. That is because emptiness is not yet perceived directly but rather through a generic image. Thus, the dualistic appearance of subject and object being distinct is still present.

When the commentary mentions the elaborations of true existence with regard to the meaning it ascertains, it means that although all dualistic appearances have not subsided, the appearance of true existence in relation to the particular object that it is seeing subsides.

To explain how a conceptual mind perceives objects, think of how, when we see the colour blue with our eye consciousness, there's nothing that obstructs us from seeing the colour blue. We see it nakedly – blue - as it is, without any obstruction. When we close our eyes however and bring up the image of blue in our mind, we see the colour blue but not directly, we are rather see or perceive it through a generic image – or meaning generality. So we're not seeing blue directly. This is the difference between direct perception and perceiving an object conceptually.

What is being presented here in summary is the stages of ascertaining the ultimate reality of phenomena up to the point of directly realising emptiness. That process of gaining the realisation of emptiness directly is a gradual one where one first obtains the conceptual understanding of emptiness. With a conceptual understanding of emptiness, one ascertains a vivid and clear understanding of what emptiness is, but there is still something that obstructs one from seeing it directly. One is able to see emptiness only through the generic image and not directly. Therefore one has to meditate further to familiarise oneself with the meditation of realising emptiness. When one further develops that then eventually one obtains the actual direct perception of emptiness.

If we take someone who enters the Mahayana path from the very beginning, (i.e. not having entered either of the two lower vehicles' paths), then on the first two paths, the path of accumulation and the path of preparation the bodhisattva has only a conceptual understanding of emptiness, and has not yet developed the direct realisation of emptiness.

Whenever a bodhisattva obtains calm abiding focussing on emptiness, then they have reached the path of accumulation.

When that bodhisattva, on further meditating on emptiness, develops the special insight on emptiness, then they reach the path of preparation.

The bodhisattvas on these paths still only have a conceptual understanding of emptiness. When that conceptual understanding which perceives emptiness through a generic image or meaning generality is further developed, and becomes a union of calm abiding and special insight directly perceiving emptiness, the bodhisattva then has obtained the path of seeing.

It is said that one with a definite lineage and sharp faculty who has not entered the Mahayana path yet, and who is inclined to become a bodhisattva, first obtains the realisation of emptiness and then develops bodhicitta. But one of duller faculty will generate bodhicitta first and then gain the realisation of emptiness. Those with sharp faculty who have not entered the path first ascertain as to whether enlightenment is possible or not, whether liberation is possible or not, and whether it is possible to overcome the delusions or not. And then only by seeing and ascertaining that it is possible, and working towards achieving that, they develop bodhicitta because they realise that it is possible to overcome all delusions and thus see the possibilities of attaining enlightenment.

The older students will recall that this was explained in detail when we covered the Madhyamaka teachings.¹ Whenever this topic comes up in any teaching then one has to be able to relate it to this understanding. If we start to think that there's possibly a different explanation, then one has missed the point.

Gyaltsab Je then mentions:

A Red One from Toelung argues: On the basis of thinking that the meaning of this commentary, and of the abbot of the two truths, is that at the time of the manifesting of the mode of abiding, no object of knowledge or consciousness exists: 'I do not know consciousness without an object of knowledge and prime cognition without an object of comprehension. I accept the lack of true existence to exist truly.'

Gyaltsab Je further mentions:

Gyaltsab Je: It is very clear that they do not understand the position of the great pioneer², while oneself is under the influence of a mere personal investigation, to be conceited with the presumption that one has realised the meaning of the middle way is a great mistake.

2.1.2.2.3.2.2.3. Showing that one will receive the perfect complete result of abandonment

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.2.2.3.2.2.3.1. Showing with example that although there are no conceptual thoughts the hopes of the disciples will be fulfilled

2.1.2.2.3.2.2.3.2. Refuting arguments with regard to this

This is a very meticulous presentation of an argument questioning how the Buddha could benefit sentient beings if there are no conceptual thoughts.

2.1.2.2.3.2.2.3.1. Showing with example that although there are no conceptual thoughts the hopes of the disciples will be fulfilled

What is presented first here is this carefully constructed argument:

Argument: If buddhas have pacified all conceptual consciousnesses, then they also do not think, 'I shall show the Dharma to those to be subdued' and therefore it is invalid to say they fulfil the purpose of sentient beings by showing the Dharma and through other actions or enlightened activities.

The first verse under this heading serves as an answer:

*35. Like the wish-fulfilling jewel and wish-granting tree Fulfil hopes
Similarly, through the power of prayer
The body of the conqueror appears to disciples.*

The answer in the commentary reads:

Answer: There is no fault. Although they have no conceptual thoughts, the wish-fulfilling jewel grants humans their wishes and wish-granting trees fulfil the hopes of gods when supplicated.

¹ See the teaching of 15 October 2002 for example.

Similarly, the conquerors appear to those to be subdued through the power of their accumulated merit to meet them. Although the buddhas do not have conceptual thoughts, their form bodies appear and teach the Dharma through the power of previous prayers such as, 'May I be able to fulfil the purpose of sentient beings effortlessly and simultaneously.'

To establish the example, the commentary responds to the opening argument saying there is no fault. The example is the wish-fulfilling jewel, which has no conceptual thoughts. A wish-fulfilling jewel is a mythological jewel, representing the most precious and supreme object that humans could possess. When humans supplicate this wish-fulfilling jewel, all their wishes will be fulfilled. Likewise, for the gods a wish-fulfilling tree is the most precious object they can possess because when the gods make supplications to the wish-fulfilling tree, all of their wishes are fulfilled. Both the wish-fulfilling jewel and the wish-fulfilling tree are devoid of a consciousness, so of course they don't have any conceptual thoughts. The specific meaning of this is that it is not as if they have an intentional thought of wishing to benefit humans or gods, but nevertheless they do fulfil the wishes of the humans and gods.

To explain the meaning of the analogy the commentary states, similarly, the conquerors appear to those to be subdued through the power of their accumulated merit to meet the conquerors. This is a very, very significant point in relation to our personal conditions right now. What is being illustrated here is that due to the aspirational prayers of the buddhas and the merit of the sentient beings, sentient beings are benefitted by the conquerors. When we relate that to our own situation and our own conditions, we can see that meeting with perfect Mahayana teachers is due to the teachers' aspirational prayers, as well as our own merit. So we need to consider ourselves as extremely fortunate to have met these good conditions right now.

Although buddhas do not have conceptual thoughts, their form bodies appear and teach the Dharma through the power of previous prayers such as, 'May I be able to fulfil the purpose of sentient beings effortlessly and simultaneously.' The resultant state of buddhahood is a result of the practices and unimaginably extensive aspirational prayers that have been made by bodhisattvas while engaging on the path. This also shows us the importance of the power of the aspirational prayers, which we really need to acknowledge.

At this point the Tibetan version of the commentary then states, the conquerors appear to those to be subdued through the power of their accumulated merit to meet them. It is not really clear in the translation, but through the combination of the previous aspirational prayers of the bodhisattvas, the buddhas enacting those aspirational prayers, and due to the merit accumulated by the disciples, they are benefitted through the actions of teaching and so forth.

Having presented this explanation a counter argument is then presented:

Argument: Because a long time has passed since these prayers were made they cannot generate a result in the present, and as the ones praying were bodhisattvas, it is invalid to posit the enlightened activities of the conquerors as their result.

This is again a very clever argument. Since the aspirational prayers were made by bodhisattvas on the path, they must have been made a long, long time ago. So how could those aspirational prayers made such a long time ago have taken effect now in the aspect of the buddhas' deeds?

We can see that the arguments being presented here are not really all that different to the questions and doubts that we normally have.

The next two verses serve as an answer:

36. *For example, although having passed
After having established an offering tree to the garuda,
And though a long time has passed since then,
Poisons and so forth will be pacified.*
37. *Having established an offering tree to the conquerors
In accordance with the bodhisattva practices,
Although the bodhisattva has gone beyond
misery,
They fulfil all purposes.*

The commentary explains:

Answer: There is no fault. For example, the Brahmin may have passed upon having established an offering tree to the poison pacifying garuda, and although a long time has since passed, the offering tree can even now still pacify poisons. Similarly, the bodhisattvas have established an offering tree to the conquerors by way of building up the two accumulations in accordance with the bodhisattva practices, and although the bodhisattvas have manifested the non-abiding nirvana, this does not contradict them fulfilling all the temporary and ultimate purposes of sentient beings. This debate arises from not knowing placement through continuity.

The commentary begins the explanation with the statement: there is no fault. The example to illustrate the point is a mythological story of a Brahmin who, in order to protect villages from harmful snakes and so forth, took it upon himself to make great offerings to a garuda, which is a mythological bird that devours snakes. From the mass of offerings that he established through his prayers and practices, he made the offering tree i.e. great mass of offerings, to the garuda. And even though a long time has passed since then, that mass of offerings still has that ability to continuously pacify poisons. This analogy is used to counter the earlier argument that there can be no effects if a long time passes.

Then, as further explained, similarly, the bodhisattvas have established an offering tree, a great mass of offerings, to the conquerors by way of building up the two accumulations in accordance with the bodhisattva practices. Although the bodhisattvas have manifested non-abiding nirvana, meaning that when bodhisattvas reach the ultimate state of enlightenment, this does not contradict them fulfilling all the temporary and ultimate purposes of sentient beings.

As the commentary further mentions, this debate arises from not knowing placement through continuity. Basically, this argument arises from failing to understand that a benefit that occurs on a continuous basis has a continuous effect.

2.1.2.2.3.2.2.3.2. Refuting arguments with regard to this

The first two lines of the verse are presented:

*38ab. How can one become endowed with a result
From having presented offerings to one lacking mind?*

This is then followed by the argument from the commentary:

Argument by a hearer: How can one achieve the result of merit by making offerings to a buddha, who lacks conceptual mind? They also do not possess the thought of having received the offering.

This is an argument by a follower of the hearer vehicle who says, how can one achieve the result of merit by making offerings to a buddha, who lacks conceptual mind? This is implying that since a buddha does not have a conceptual mind that can know that they have received an offering and so forth, then how can one be sure that one actually receives the benefit of that offering?

Then the next two lines of the verse serve as the answer:

*38cd. Because it is taught that it is the same,
Whether they remain or have gone beyond sorrow.*

The answer from the commentary:

Answer: It follows it is valid that merits are received by making offerings to the buddhas although they lack conceptual consciousness. Why? Because it teaches in the Maitri Lion's Roar Sutra that it is equally meritorious to make offerings to the body of a buddha that is actually present, as it is to the relics of a buddha who has passed beyond sorrow.

As presented in the commentary, when hearers say that it is not valid to make offerings to a buddha, who lacks conceptual mind, so it follows it is valid that merits are received by making offerings to the buddhas although they lack conceptual consciousness. And the reason is because it is taught in the Maitri Lion's Roar Sutra. Since we both agree that the Buddha's words in the sutras are a valid source that we can rely upon, there is a quotation from a sutra that explains our argument.

The quotation from the sutra reads,

Aside from the benefits of circumambulating,
Making offerings to those present and
To the relics of those gone beyond sorrow,
There is no difference in the merits
To a mind of equal faith.

As clearly mentioned in the quotation, when those who generate faith equal to the faith of the buddhas make offerings to images of the Buddha, they receive the merit equal to making the actual offering to the Buddha, because of that faith.

These are very, very significant and important points for our personal practice. Rather than doing some regular practice and making offerings mindlessly, we need to remember that we are making an offering to the actual Buddha. When we remember that, then it makes our practice much more powerful, and much more worthwhile because, as mentioned here, one receives the same benefit as if one had made the offering directly.

The main point is that when one makes an offering to a reliquary, or an image or representation of the Buddha as if it were the actual Buddha, then the benefit one gains from that is equal; meaning that the blessings one receives from the representation of the Buddha will be the same as receiving an actual blessing from the Buddha.

As you would recall, one of the refuge commitments is to regard all representations of the buddhas as being an actual buddha, and to have respect for any representation of the Buddha as being the actual Buddha. That is part of our refuge practice. Therefore these are significant points showing us the way to accumulate extensive merit when we engage in practices of making offerings and so forth. That is a significant point for us to recall.

Under the same heading the next four lines of verse are:

*39. Whether illusory or ultimate,
The result is taught in the scriptures.
For example, like having a result
Relative to a true buddha.*

The commentary explains their meaning:

The Buddha taught in the scriptures that one will receive a result by making offerings to the buddhas and so forth regardless of whether they exist conventionally or ultimately. For example, it is just as you assert. This can be seen in your assertion of the results with regard to a true buddha. The important meaning or point is that, while treating the analysis into the meaning of suchness with equanimity for the moment, regardless of whether they are true or false, one will receive the result in accordance with the functionality. This is the important meaning.

Again these are very pertinent points. Earlier we saw that the Realists – the Vaibhashikas and Sautrantikas – accept true existence. Regardless of whether one accepts the buddhas as being truly established or truly existent, or whether they lack true existence, the point is that by relying on the buddhas, making offerings and so forth, the resultant benefit is the same. The commentary goes on to say it is just as you assert. This can be seen in your assertion of the results with regard to a true buddha. Basically this is saying that gaining extensive results by making offerings to a true or truly existent buddha is similar to our earlier presentation.

The commentary further mentions that the important meaning or point is that, while treating the analysis into the meaning of suchness with equanimity for the moment. What it is saying here is: let's just put aside for the time being whether something exists truly or not, the main thing is that one will receive the result in accordance with the functionality. One will actually definitely receive the result of making offerings to the buddhas and so forth.

2.2 Establishing that even just to attain liberation one needs to realise emptiness

There are two subdivisions.

2.2.1. Argument

2.2.2. Answer

These are points that were raised earlier. As I've also emphasised, the unique presentation of the Prasangika is that one definitely needs to realise emptiness to obtain even liberation. Before we actually go into the explanation here, I'd like to check with you, why is it necessary to realise emptiness?

Student: It is my understanding that if any realisations of compassion or other such realisations weren't on the basis of emptiness they would not be accurate realisations. So we would always have new problems coming up, because those other realisations wouldn't have [inaudible].

Basically what you are saying in a roundabout way is another point that is also mentioned in the teachings, which is that compassion and so forth is not a direct opponent to the delusions, and therefore cannot overcome the delusions. That is the point here – in order to achieve liberation one has to overcome the opponent to obtaining liberation, which is this grasping at a self. It is only that which directly opposes grasping to a self - which is selflessness - that can become a cause to obtain liberation.

Can someone else give an explanation of what liberation means?

Student: Being free from afflictive obscurations.

I want the specific meaning of that word 'liberation'. What is one being liberated from?

Many students answer together.

The word liberation has a connotation that one is bound by something. To be liberated would have a connotation of being liberated from something to which one has been bound, right? Here that specific binding factor is karma and delusions. It's the karma and delusions that bind us to our contaminated aggregates. Our contaminated aggregates are cyclic existence and what binds us to our own cyclic existence of the contaminated aggregates is delusions and karma.

To give a specific illustration to clarify the point: If someone is bound to a tree with strong rope or chains then the tree is analogous to our samsaric aggregates. Basically, when we talk about samsara in relation to ourselves, our aggregates are our samsara; the person tied to the tree is analogous to our consciousness, and the strong rope or chains that bind that person to the tree are delusions and karma. When the chains are unshackled, then the person is free. Likewise, when karma and delusions are overcome, then we are freed from that which binds us to contaminated aggregates.

On a personal level we need to understand that samsara refers to our contaminated aggregates. Even in Tibetan, the term samsara can be misunderstood as being a place, and this has carried over into English. When samsara is referred to as a place then it is specifically referring to the abode of samsara.

The actual samsara is one's own aggregates. When the teachings refer to circling in samsara, they are referring to circling from the most unfortunate realm of the hells without respite, up to the highest form of the cyclic existence, which is called the peak of existence. Beings move through many different realms uncontrollably, i.e. bound by delusions and karma to these existences, from the lowest of the cyclic existence to the hell without respite, up to the peak of existence, and every other existence in between. We have no control because we are bound by delusions and karma. So when we talk about samsara, it is good to have a clear understanding that it is our personal samsara, to which we are bound by our own delusions and karma.

When one is not bound by delusions and karma, yet is reborn in the abode of samsara, it has come about through aspirational prayers to benefit sentient beings. Bodhisattvas are still in the abode of samsara but they are not there involuntarily due to karma and delusions. Rather, due to their aspirational prayers, they are there as a way to benefit sentient beings in samsara.

2.2.1. Argument

The argument is presented in these two lines:

*40ab. One becomes liberated by seeing truth,
Why should one see emptiness?*

Other translations of the last line say, What does emptiness do? That is the argument.

This is a presentation from a hearer opponent:

Hearer opponent: By meditating on the direct perception of the four noble truths' 16 aspects of impermanence and so forth, one will attain the result of a liberated arhat. Why should one realise the emptiness of true existence of all phenomena for this? It is without purpose and even unsuitable.

Then Gyaltsab Je explains:

Gyaltsab Je: For this hearer opponent not only does one not need to realise emptiness to attain enlightenment, they do not even accept the concept of selflessness of phenomena. These, who do not accept the Mahayana sutras to be the words of the Buddha, are the main opponent. To refute them, and to refute on the side also those that, while positing the Mahayana sutras as valid, assert that one does not need to realise the selflessness of phenomena to attain the result of an arhat, I state these sources which, refuting these opponents, establish that only the wisdom realising emptiness is the path to be liberated from existence.

2.2.2. Answer

The answer is presented in these three subdivisions:

2.2.2.1. Establishing that only the wisdom realising emptiness is the path to liberation from existence

2.2.2.2. Establishing it as the path to the non-abiding nirvana

2.2.2.3. Advising that it is suitable for those wishing for liberation to meditate on emptiness

2.2.2.1. ESTABLISHING THAT ONLY THE WISDOM REALISING EMPTINESS IS THE PATH TO LIBERATION FROM EXISTENCE

This is again subdivided into two:

2.2.2.1.1. Establishing this with the Mahayana sutras

2.2.2.1.2. Establishing this with logic

2.2.2.1.1. Establishing this with the Mahayana sutras

The lines from the verse under this heading are:

40cd. Because it is taught in scripture that Without this path there is no enlightenment.

This is the point where the actual answer is presented, and there's quite a bit of it. So it will be good for you read it as preparation for next time.

In other parts of the text Gyaltsab Je attempts to just give a literal explanation of the verse by inserting all of the words of the verse into the explanation. Here we can see that much more explanation is presented, and this is actually Lama Tsong Khapa's own words, as they are from notes taken when Lama Tsong Khapa himself was teaching. So these are actually very significant points.

In the following verses Shantideva will be establishing the Mahayana sutras as valid teachings of the Buddha. These are very significant points that will be presented, and so it is good to be familiar with them.

In the Middle Way teachings establishing that the Mahayana teachings are valid words of the Buddha is explained in the part on identifying the lineage of bodhisattvas. I'll not go through the explanation now but if you can prepare by reading the text, then it will become clearer when I go through the text in our next session.

We can conclude here for the evening. Once you are able to apply the logical reasoning in its proper place then it will be easy to understand and read the text. It just requires the application of logic.

Addendum

Final revision of the commentary on verse 29 from the teaching of 6 September 2016

29. *When the mind is devoid of that perceived
Everyone will have gone thus.
In that case, what is the benefit
Of that imputed as mere mind?*

The commentary explains:

If this is accepted: It follows that when the mind is free from the dualistic appearance of apprehender and apprehended, then all sentient beings become thus gone ones and effortlessly attain liberation - because all minds are free from the appearances of apprehender and apprehended.

If however one accepts this position, then it follows that there is not the slightest need to comprehend the lack of apprehender and apprehended as being of different substance, which is labelled mere mind, in order to achieve the omniscient transcendental wisdom.

The explanation is that it follows that when the mind is free from the dualistic appearance of apprehender and apprehended, then all sentient beings become thus gone ones and effortlessly attain liberation. According to the Mind Only system the apprehension of form and the mind apprehending form being of different substance is the grasping to self of phenomena. So according to them, if things did exist externally then this is how it would have to exist, i.e. apprehender and apprehended being distinct and of different substance. Thus, they assert that the apprehender and apprehend are devoid of being distinct.

So the Madhyamikas are saying: at the time when the mind is free from the dualistic appearance of apprehender and apprehended, then all sentient beings by default would already be thus gone ones or enlightened buddhas effortlessly, and attain liberation - because, according to you, Mind Only, all minds would have be free from the appearances of apprehender and apprehended. Since, according to you all minds are free from the appearances of apprehender and apprehended, then this would mean that sentient beings are effortlessly and spontaneously liberated. Again according to the Mind Only, form and the apprehension of form being devoid of being different substance, is the selflessness of phenomena. Thus the Madhyamikas conclude: then it follows that there is not the slightest need to comprehend the lack of apprehender and apprehended as being of different substance, which is labelled mere mind, in order to achieve the omniscient transcendental wisdom.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །སྤྱང་རྒྱལ་མེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འདུག་པ་བརྟུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

27 September 2016

As usual let us begin with our practice of meditation, based on the motivation that we had generated during the recitation of the refuge and bodhicitta prayer. Indeed, whenever one engages in meditation practice it would be good to first begin by generating refuge and bodhicitta.

That requires not just reciting the words but actually spending some time generating a strong mind of going for refuge and trying one's best to generate a bodhicitta motivation. If one regularly spends some time doing this, then with familiarity one's practice will surely improve.

If one goes straight into meditation without first generating a proper motivation, such as taking refuge and generating bodhicitta, then the practice will not have much effect. We have recited these prayers thousands of times, but if we have not taken much initiative to really understand the implication of taking refuge and what it really means to generate the bodhicitta motivation, thus gaining some affinity with this, then all the recitations we've done so far would not amount to much benefit. I have mentioned many times before that generating a proper mind of refuge should not be underestimated; it is a really essential practice that subsumes the essential points of the entire path.

To incorporate a real understanding of refuge, one needs to spend significant time thinking about the two causes of going for refuge. The first is generating a fear of the sufferings of cyclic existence in general, and the sufferings of the lower realms in particular. The second cause is to generate the mind of complete trust and reliance on the objects of refuge, the Three Jewels. If one takes the time to generate the first cause in one's mind, it will familiarise our mind with genuine renunciation. Then, when one contemplates the second cause, one sees that the object of refuge has the full potential to protect one from having to experience the sufferings of the lower realms and cyclic existence. When one places one's full confidence and reliance in the objects of refuge e.g. in the Buddha, by saying 'You have the full ability to protect me. I definitely don't want to experience unimaginable great sufferings, so please bless my mind to be able to engage in the practices of developing renunciation as a way to be free from all sufferings'. Contemplating how all beings are also suffering and have the equal right to be free from suffering, and generating bodhicitta right after this, is the means to ensure our refuge becomes the Mahayana refuge.

Therefore, we do not just wish for ourselves to be free from suffering but for all living beings to be free from all sufferings of the lower realms and cyclic existence. For that purpose, with the understanding that the objects of refuge have the full ability to free oneself and all beings from all suffering, one makes supplications to request blessings for oneself and all beings to be free from all suffering.

To make this more meaningful it would be more effective at times adopt ordinary language, as if we were speaking to a close friend, saying for example, 'I know that you, the Buddhas, Dharma and Sangha, have the full ability to help me and all sentient beings, so please grant me your blessings to subdue my mind.' When one thinks like this in ordinary terms, it can inspire us and have a stronger effect on our mind. At our ordinary level it's good to apply whatever means that work for our mind.

Another significant point about taking wholehearted refuge is that it is the foundation for receiving all other vows, e.g. pratimoksha or self-liberation vows. The teachings explain that the real foundation for receiving the vows is generating a mind of renunciation, and this in turn is based on refuge.

Going back to the two causes of generating refuge, when one wholeheartedly thinks about the suffering of cyclic existence, and particularly the suffering of the lower realms, one develops a strong sense of fear about having to experience that suffering; the greater the fear the stronger the determination to be free from the sufferings will naturally be. So when one develops that strong aspiration to be free from these sufferings, one naturally develops the second cause, one naturally develops the second cause, which is the mind that confidently understands that the objects of refuge have the ability to help one to be free. This in turn helps one to develop strong renunciation in one's mind.

More significantly, the causes for obtaining higher status in our next life involve the practice of ethics, which is to observe the vows that we have taken. This then protects one from being born in the lower realms. When one practises moral discipline and keeps the vows with the strong intention to be free from the lower realms, this becomes the cause for one to obtain a higher rebirth in the human or god realms in the next life. When one practices moral discipline with the intention that it be the cause to be free from cyclic existence in all the six realms, that then becomes the cause for one to attain liberation.

The teachings explain that when one incorporates these sentiments while taking refuge, it will ensure that the effects become really sound. Further, when taking refuge is preceded with the intention that it will be the cause for all living beings to be free from all suffering, then it becomes the specific Mahayana refuge, and a cause for enlightenment. In this way we can understand how the refuge practice incorporates the entire path. It is because refuge combines so many essential points of the path that His Holiness the Dalai Lama often emphasises that the act of going for refuge is an essential practice.

Actually, taking refuge is not unique to Buddhism. All religions have the practice of taking refuge that precedes whatever other practices or rituals they engage in. For example, before starting a ceremony Christians make the sign of the cross, representing the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. Every tradition has an act of refuge essential to their faith. If we consider ourselves Buddhists then it is important to understand what our objects of refuge are, what they entail, what it actually means to take refuge and so forth. As mentioned earlier, when we expand our understanding of going for refuge, it actually combines all the essential points of the path.

If our understanding of refuge is limited to just the recitation of the refuge prayer, then it would be not much more than that, just a recitation. If we fail to incorporate the actual understanding, then when we recite the prayer, it will be like 'Oh yes, I'll just recite this refuge prayer that I know from memory'. But then we will find that this doesn't really move our mind. If this happens, it's a sign we have not paid much attention to the actual meaning of refuge.

As mentioned earlier, the essential part of refuge is thinking about the two causes. If one takes time to contemplate the two causes of going for refuge in depth, it will move one's mind to the point where one really feels compelled to go for refuge wholeheartedly. This means one has contemplated the actual reality, not just imagined the sufferings of the lower realms and the suffering of cyclic existence in general, but contemplates the prospect of having to actually experience them personally.

Reflecting on this will move one's mind to the point where one feels the desperate urgency to be free from having to experience all those unimaginable sufferings, with the understanding that the objects of refuge have the full ability to help free oneself. Then the practice of going for refuge won't just be words, but a real act of going for refuge from the depths of one's heart.

I have noticed that Christian priests are also referred to as 'Father'. There might be different subtleties; grosser level and subtler level connotations of what 'Father' means. The priest himself can't be referred to as God so maybe it is more suitable for him if he refers to himself as 'Father'.

A student says that Christianity is patriarchal and all the higher positions go to men.

That seems to have changed in recent years. Now apparently women can also become priests. I noticed soon after I came to Australia that the gender discrimination was very prominent. Even in the same jobs men were paid much more and women were paid less. This must be true in other countries too, however I did notice that this was prevalent here. Equality and women's rights are significant issues to consider and will be beneficial for future generations.

(Meditation)

Now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I definitely need to achieve enlightenment, so for this purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and put them into practice well.

The extent to which one makes this a commitment, prior to engaging in the teachings, will ensure the practice becomes more meaningful and purposeful.

2.2. Establishing that even just to attain liberation one needs to realise emptiness

There are two subdivisions:

2.2.1. Argument

2.2.2. Answer

2.2.1. Argument

The commentary begins by presenting the argument of a hearer opponent, who is a proponent of the Hinayana or Lower Vehicle tenets.

Firstly, it is good to understand the difference between a hearer who is a proponent of the Hinayana tenets and a hearer who has entered the path. A hearer who has entered the path doesn't necessarily have to be a proponent of the tenets of the Lower Vehicle, as there are also hearers who are proponents of the Mind Only School's tenets as well as the Middle Way School's tenets, i.e. the Svatantrika and Prasangika views. Hearers who are proponents of the Lower Vehicle tenets can, of course, definitely enter the path because they are able to develop renunciation. However, as they hold the views of Lower Vehicle tenets, they will not be able to advance further than the path of accumulation, because to attain the path of preparation and onwards one has to have the correct understanding of emptiness.

According to the Prasangika, all hearers and solitary realisers who are on the path of preparation, all the way up to becoming an arhat, have to necessarily be proponents of the Prasangika view because they would have gained the realisation of emptiness. That is because without the correct understanding of emptiness, followed by the actual realisation of emptiness, one could not possibly obtain the path of seeing and onwards. According to the Prasangika, anyone who realises emptiness would necessarily have to be a proponent of the Madhyamika Prasangika view.

So, a hearer who has realised emptiness would be a hearer who is on the Hinayana path and a proponent of the Mahayana tenet. This means that a proponent of the Mahayana tenets doesn't necessarily have to be a Mahayanist. Further, this means that someone who is a proponent of the Mahayana vehicle hasn't necessarily entered the Mahayana path.

We claim to hold the views of the Mahayana tenets, but we may not have entered the path of the Mahayana vehicle yet. The criterion for entering the Mahayana path is generating actual bodhicitta. Unless one has developed bodhicitta, which is the hallmark or doorway to the Mahayana path, there is no way one can enter the Mahayana path. Therefore one needs to know the distinction between a proponent of the Mahayana, and an actual Mahayanist who has entered the Mahayana path. This clarifies the distinction between hearers who are Hinayana proponents, and hearers who are proponents of Mahayana tenets.

One also needs to understand that there is a distinction between the uncommon Hinayana sutras and the common teachings shared by the Hinayana and the Mahayana. There are hearers who adhere only to the uncommon Hinayana teachings, and hearers who adhere to the shared teachings, which are common to both the Hinayana and the Mahayana. So, the hearer opponent referred to in the commentary refers specifically to one who adheres to the Hinayana tenets.

Their argument is:

*40ab. One becomes liberated by seeing truth.
Why should one see emptiness?*

Hearer opponent: One will attain the result of a liberated arhat by meditating on the direct perception of the four noble truths' sixteen aspects of impermanence and so forth.

This opponent posits that by meditating on the direct perception of the four noble truths and the sixteen aspects, one becomes liberated. One needs to understand here that they are referring to the coarse understandings of the four noble truths.

For example, in relation to the four aspects of the truth of suffering i.e. impermanence, suffering, empty and selfless there is no specific difference in grossness and subtlety of impermanence between the Hinayana proponent's view and the Prasangika view. Impermanence is basically the same insofar that functional things are momentary – i.e. changing from moment to moment. So, there is no further subtlety than that.

With suffering, however, there some differences, but particularly in relation to emptiness and selflessness there is a huge difference of grossness and subtlety between the lower schools and the Prasangika. So this hearer proponent is essentially saying that by meditating on the direct perceptions of the four noble truths and the sixteen aspects, (which are only on the coarse level) one can become liberated. I have explained the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths in detail when we did the teachings on the Middle Way.¹

As further stated in the commentary:

Why should one realise the emptiness of true existence of all phenomena for that? It is without purpose and even unsuitable.

Here again we need to understand that the proponents of the Hinayana tenets, i.e. the Sautrantika and Vaibhashika, do not accept the selflessness of phenomena. Gyalsab Je further clarifies this in the comment relating to the opponents' views using the words of Lama Tsong Khapa.

2.2.2. Answer

The commentary beings by stating:

Answer: For this hearer opponent not only does one not need to realise emptiness to attain enlightenment, they do not even accept the concept of selflessness of phenomena. These, who do not accept the Mahayana sutras to be the words of the Buddha, are the main opponent.

As explained here, the main opponents are those who do not accept the Mahayana sutras. This implies that some proponents of the Lower Vehicle do not accept the Mahayana as the true words of the Buddha. The commentary further explains:

To refute them and to refute on the side also those who, while positing the Mahayana sutras as valid, assert that one does not need to realise the selflessness of phenomena to attain the result of an arhat.

Again, while some may assert the Mahayana sutras as the words of the Buddha, they do not, however, assert that one has to realise the selflessness of phenomena or emptiness to attain the result of becoming an arhat.

I state these sources which, refuting these opponents, establish that only the wisdom realising emptiness is the path to be liberated from existence.

The point here is that positing any sutra as valid (in this case a Mahayana sutra) means it has to be infallible in relation to the meaning that is presented. Hence, to present the Mahayana vehicle as valid requires accepting whatever is presented in the Mahayana vehicle to be infallible. Some may accept the Mahayana vehicle as valid on one hand, but then say that one doesn't need to realise the selflessness of phenomena to attain the result of an arhat to be liberated, which is a contradiction. These include not only the lower schools of the Sautrantika and Vaibhashika but also the Mind Only schools, and within the Middle Way school the Svatantrika as well, for they do not adhere to the correct understanding of the view of selflessness of phenomena.

The answer to the opponents' arguments is subdivided into three headings, which are meticulously presented.

2.2.2.1. Establishing that only the wisdom realising emptiness is the path to liberation from existence

That is, in order to be free from cyclic existence one cannot do without the wisdom realising emptiness.

2.2.2.2. Establishing it as the path to the non-abiding nirvana

Further, even to attain non-abiding nirvana i.e. full enlightenment, the realisation of emptiness is essential.

2.2.2.3. Advising that it is suitable for those wishing for liberation to meditate on emptiness

2.2.2.1. ESTABLISHING THAT ONLY THE WISDOM REALISING EMPTINESS IS THE PATH TO LIBERATION FROM EXISTENCE

This is divided into two:

2.2.2.1.1. Establishing it with Mahayana sutras

2.2.2.1.2. Establishing it with logic

The detailed explanation of this is presented in the Middle Way teachings that I have explained in the past.²

2.2.2.1.1. Establishing it with Mahayana sutras

40cd. Because it is taught in scripture that Without this path there is no enlightenment.

It follows one definitely needs to realise emptiness to attain the result of a hearer or self-liberator arhat. For what reason? Because in the Sutras of the Wisdom Gone Beyond it teaches that without meditating on this chapter realising emptiness one cannot attain any of the three types of enlightenment.

In the Great Commentary on the Introduction to the Bodhisattva Practices it quotes the Perfection of Wisdom sutras as saying that those with a recognition of functionalities cannot attain liberation, and that all those perfectly enlightened in the three times, as well as the results from a stream enterer up to a self-liberator are attained only in dependence on this perfection of wisdom. The scriptures refer not only to the highest enlightenment.

² See 2005 teachings.

Further: I am not going to cite the innumerable quotes from the sutras showing that hearers and self-liberators realise the selflessness of phenomena. In these two lines Mahayana sutras were stated as an argument out of an understanding that some of those following the hearer's path accept the reasons of Mahayana sutras.

If one thinks, 'Is it not devoid of reason to state arguments to those that do not accept Mahayana quotes as valid' then there is no fault. The opponent does not need to immediately establish the three modes of all arguments. The pervasion of the argument is also established here, just as it is below through the reason of similarity and normality.

It establishes the point of this reason that the wisdom realising emptiness is the path to attain the three types of enlightenment. Although it is not established as the word of the Buddha by establishing the pervasion, there is no fault in relating the proof to quotation. Master Shantideva cited these texts also because he knew it would refute the wrong conception of thinking of isolated Mahayana sutra as not the words of the Buddha.

The commentary opens with a response to the Lower Vehicle hearer opponent who states that one does not have to realise emptiness in order to attain liberation. It confirms that one definitely does need to realise emptiness to attain the result of hearer or self-liberator arhat.

It notes that if one were to ask the reason, it is explained in the Sutras of the Wisdom Gone Beyond which teach that without meditating on the path realising emptiness one cannot attain any of the three types of enlightenment i.e. the hearer's enlightenment, the self-liberator's enlightenment or the bodhisattva's enlightenment.

It further explains:

In the Great Commentary on the Introduction to the Bodhisattva Practices it quotes the Perfection of Wisdom sutras as saying that those with a recognition of functionalities cannot attain liberation ...

What is referred to here as the 'recognition of functionalities' is the recognition of true existence or grasping at a self. Then the commentary further explains ... and that all those perfectly enlightened in the three times, as well as the results from a stream enterer up to a self-liberator are attained only in dependence on this perfection of wisdom.

This means that enlightened beings such as the buddhas and all those perfectly enlightened in the three times, as well as the results from a stream enterer up to a self-liberator, are attained only in dependence on this perfection of wisdom.

These include once returner, never returner and all the stages of the hearer's path, as well as the self-liberator's path all the way to the self-liberator arhat. All these are only attained in dependence on the perfection of wisdom, i.e. the realisation of emptiness.

The emphasis here is that the scriptures refer not only to the highest enlightenment. As quoted earlier, this refers to the Buddha of the three times, as well as the result of the stream enterer up to the self-liberator arhat. These are all mentioned in the teachings as those who depend on the perfection of wisdom, or the realisation of emptiness.

It does not just refer to the highest enlightenment as needing to understand the realisation of emptiness, but all of these earlier mentioned stages.

Then Gyaltsab Je mentions:

I am not going to cite the innumerable quotes from the sutras showing that hearers and self-liberators realise the selflessness of phenomena.

Here he is indicating that there are many citations from other texts as well.

In these two lines Mahayana sutras were stated as an argument out of an understanding that some of those following the hearer's path accept the reasons of Mahayana sutras.

In referring to the two lines from the root text, the commentary further mentions:

In these two lines Mahayana sutras were stated as an argument out of an understanding that some of those following the hearer's path accept the reasons of Mahayana sutras.

This indicates that some followers of the hearer's path do accept the reasons of the Mahayana sutras. As such it implies this argument is for those who do not accept the Mahayana as the Buddha's words. Of course those who accept that the Mahayana teachings are the Buddha's words do not need to use any of the arguments presented here.

The next is:

Is it not devoid of reason to state arguments to those that do not accept Mahayana quotes as valid, then there is no fault. The opponent does not need to immediately establish the three modes of all arguments. The pervasion of the argument is also established here, just as it is below through the reason of similarity and normality.

As an answer to that argument the commentary says:

The opponent does not need to immediately establish the three modes of all arguments.

In other words, the opponent does not need to have to completely accept all the valid reasons of that argument right away.

The pervasion of the argument is also established here, just as it is below through the reason of similarity and normality.

The reasons of similarity and normality are presented next, along with the pervasiveness of these reasons.

The commentary further explains:

It establishes the point of this reason that the wisdom realising emptiness is the path to attain the three types of enlightenment. Although it is not established as the word of the Buddha by establishing the pervasion, there is no fault in relating the proof to quotation.

The master [Shantideva] also cited these texts because he knew it would refute the wrong conception of thinking the Mahayana sutras are not the words of the Buddha. It establishes the point of this reason that the wisdom realising emptiness is the path to attain the three types of enlightenment. Although it is not established as the word of the Buddha by establishing the pervasion, there is no fault in relating the proof to quotation.

2.2.2.1.2. Establishing it with logic

This is subdivided into two:

2.2.2.1.2.1. Establishing it by way of similarity

2.2.2.1.2.2. Establishing it with common reason, which earlier mentioned normality.

2.2.2.1.2.1. Establishing it by way of similarity

*41ab. If the Mahayana is not established
Then how are your texts established?*

Argument: The Mahayana Sutras are not established for me because I do not regard them as the words of the Buddha, and I do not accept them to be valid. Stating them as an argument to establish that the realisation of emptiness is also the path for the hearers and self-liberators makes the argument equal to the proposition.

Answer: How do you establish the quotes belonging to the Hinayana basket, which you accept to be valid, as the words of the Buddha?

The reply to this by the opponent is as follows:

Reply: The Hinayana sutras are the words of the Buddha because we both accept them to be the words of the Buddha.

The opponent says here that presenting to me that the Mahayana sutras are valid, and quoting citations to prove it, doesn't work for me, because I don't even accept the Mahayana sutras as valid from the beginning.

The next lines of verse read:

*41cd. Since they are established for both of us.
Initially they are not established for you.*

This is the reasoning of similarity.

*42ab. The conditions through which you generate faith
Are the same for the Mahayana.*

The commentary explains the meaning of these lines.

The reasons are exactly the same here because immediately upon birth, and before you established the meaning of the scriptures with logic, also the Hinayana basket was not established as valid for you. But later, through the condition of accepting them to be valid scriptures the Great Treatise and so forth, which shows the pure method within in the Vinaya and the Sutra, as well as not contradicting the Abhidharma, the method for comprehending the words and meanings, you generated faith in the sutras. The arguments with which you established that valid scripture as believable apply equally to the Mahayana Sutras.

The commentary states that the reasons presented are exactly the same as a Mahayana proponent refuting the Hinayana proponent who does not accept the Mahayana as the words of the Buddha, particularly The Perfection of Wisdom. Having asked 'How do you accept the baskets of the Hinayana as being the valid words of the Buddha?' they respond by saying 'because we both accept them'. Then the commentary mentions here:

Immediately upon birth, and before you established the meaning of the scriptures with logic, also the Hinayana basket was not established as valid for you.

What you state now as the Hinayana basket being valid words of the Buddha was not something you could establish right from the beginning. To see them as valid you had to go through a process of learning about them, studying them, and then it dawned on you that they were actually valid. However, before engaging in studies to gain understanding, they would not have appeared to you as being valid.

How they accept them to be valid scriptures is done by:

Accepting them to be valid scriptures of the Great Treatise and so forth, which shows the pure method within in the Vinaya and the Sutra, as well as not contradicting the Abhidharma.

So in relation to the three baskets of the Hinayana sutra, it is related that the earliest disciples of the Buddha gathered as a council to establish that they had heard it from the Buddha themselves. Then due to that and further engaging in training, such as applying the training of the three higher trainings of morality, contemplation and meditation and wisdom in this way, they tested out the teachings, as mentioned here:

The method for comprehending the words and meanings through reason, you generated faith in the sutras.

They established the reasons for validity through earlier accounts of how the sutras came into being, as well as having tested out the treatises through reason and logic. Then they are accepted as valid.

'Just as that is the case for you', the Prasangika school says:

The arguments with which you established that valid scripture as believable apply equally to the Mahayana sutras.

This is equally true for the Mahayana sutras. When you engage in understanding and practice, test them out with reason and logic, then you'll establish the teachings of the Hinayana basket as valid words of the Buddha. It is exactly the same for the Mahayana sutras.

The next lines of verse read:

*42cd. If true because two others assert it, then
The Vedas and so forth also become true.*

43a. If you say, 'The Mahayana is in question',

The commentary explains here:

If this is not the case, and something becomes valid because two random people accept it, then it follows that also the Vedas and so forth are true, because there are two parties that accept them to be true.

Argument: Because you also accept the Hinayana sutras that I accept as the words of the Buddha, we do not have any dispute there. But because I do not accept the Mahayana sutras to be the words of the Buddha, we have a dispute in that regard.

The explanation here is quite clear. If it is not the case that something becomes valid because two random parties accept it, then it follows that the Vedas, which are non-Buddhist tenets, are also true because two parties accept them to be true.

The opponent presents the argument:

Argument: Because you also accept the Hinayana sutras that I accept as the words of the Buddha, we do not have any dispute there.

The opponent says that 'there is no dispute with the baskets of the Hinayana teachings because you accept it and I accept it. But because I do not accept the Mahayana sutras as the words of the Buddha we have a dispute'. So what the opponent is presenting here is that the very fact that there is a dispute over the Mahayana teachings indicates that it is questionable whether they are the words of the Buddha.

What is being presented as an argument is that because there is a dispute that is a reason to say that they are not valid. The remaining part of the verse that reflects on this meaning is:

*43bcd. Non-Buddhists also question the texts,
And other texts are also questioned by Self and other. Therefore they should be abandoned.*

Answer: The Hinayana scriptures are questioned by non-Buddhists and Hinayanists alike. Also, while the Hinayana scriptures are accepted by all eighteen Hinayana schools as valid, there are individual quotes, such as the quotes that show the existence of an intermediate state, which are accepted by some Hinayana schools as the words of the Buddha, but are also not accepted by some Hinayana schools. It follows that the Hinayana baskets being valid is also something to give up, as they contain parts that are disputed by Buddhist and non-Buddhist schools.

The commentary explains the Hinayana response that if you cannot accept the Mahayana sutras as being valid words of the Buddha because there is a dispute, then it follows that the Hinayana scriptures are also questioned by both non-Buddhists and Hinayanists, on the same basis. Within the Hinayana scriptures some texts assert that there is a self, and others refute that saying that there is no self. Also in terms of permanence, there are texts that say some functional things are permanent, and other texts say they are not permanent and so forth. There are many points of disagreement and thus dispute.

The commentary further mentions here that while:

Hinayana scriptures are accepted by all eighteen Hinayana schools as valid, however there are individual quotes, such as the quotes that show the existence of an intermediate state, which are accepted by some Hinayana schools as the words of the Buddha, but are also not accepted by some Hinayana schools.

As such it further reasons that:

It follows that the Hinayana baskets being valid is also something to give up,

The earlier Hinayanist argument was that because there is a dispute it would not be valid. Leaving aside non-Buddhist schools even within the Hinayana subdivisions, where there are disputes and arguments about different points, this passage implies that since there is a dispute, then it would have to be considered as not valid and be given up:

As they contain parts that are disputed by Buddhist and non-Buddhist schools.

The commentary mentions an example of a Hinayana sutra about the existence of an intermediate state, which some Hinayana schools would accept as valid, while others do not. Another example is the Vinaya Sutra; the Tibetan system follows a particular system of the Vinaya from mulasavastivda tradition, whereas the Theravadin follow the school of the elders, which is a slightly different system that presents the Vinaya vows. There are slight differences in terms of the numbers of the full ordination vows, with the system followed by the Tibetan tradition having slightly more in number, albeit subsumed into the main ones. So in fact, there is not much difference in that regard as well.

This reminds me of the time His Holiness the Dalai Lama spoke of meeting two Theravadin monks in a gathering somewhere; elder monks who His Holiness showed respect to and who in turn showed respect to him. When they sat down to have a little discussion he noted that one of the elder Theravadin monks said that 'we are the same in being followers of the Buddha, but there is a big difference between us'.

His Holiness was taken a little bit by surprise, then he actually started going through the vows in the Vinaya Sutra until it came to their notice that in terms of the Vinaya there was not much difference at all. His Holiness said that in terms of quoting and numbering the vows etc. he happened to have a better memory that day to quote even more recitations from the sutras. His Holiness commented that it made him feel good on that occasion to be able to quote the sutras well. That was in Tasmania.

Later, as a result of this encounter with the Theravadin elders, His Holiness the Dalai Lama made a particular proposal to have meetings with the monks from the Theravadin tradition to discuss these vows and the Vinaya sutras and other differences and the similarities between the different schools. Some meetings have taken place since.

In a recent teaching in Dharamsala, His Holiness the Dalai Lama mentioned that as a result of these meetings many Theravadin monks from the Thai tradition attended these teachings, as did the most senior abbot from that tradition. Apparently the abbot of the Theravadin monks was astonished at the Dalai Lama's depth of understanding and knowledge of the sutras.

As usual let us engage in our meditation practice.

[Meditation]

We can now generate a good bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings. Indeed, the mind of wishing to benefit others is a very important and precious mind.

If we don't have the right mindset, then even though what is to be practised may be quite clear, we might engage in practices that are contrary to the teachings. However, this will not occur if we generate the mind of wishing to benefit others.

An example of practising contrary to the teachings would be to immediately revert back to our old habits of becoming upset or angry in difficult situations, rather than generating love and compassion. That is the complete opposite to the mindset one should have. Although one wishes for happiness, one voluntarily engages in creating the causes for one's own misery or suffering. We know the teachings and if we fail to put them into practice, then that will be the inevitable result. While regularly familiarising ourselves with positive states of mind such as love and compassion may not completely prevent anger from arising, when situations that cause us to become angry occur, that love and compassion will help us immediately notice the anger and not allow it to take root. That comes from familiarity with practising love and compassion regularly.

Throughout the day, in our spare time, it is really important to intentionally put some effort in to generate and familiarise ourselves with a virtuous state mind; this is really important. We might claim to be Dharma practitioners and set aside a minimum time for practice, but most of our time we are completely immersed in the afflicted distractions. In contrast to that, if we actually take the initiative to periodically bring a virtuous object to mind, then that definitely contributes to having a genuinely relaxed body and mind and to experience a happy state of mind. This will also ensure that one will have a genuinely happy life.

I mention this as a reminder for you to put into practice whatever Dharma you already know. For those who don't know anything about Dharma practice, then there is not much that can be done, as they are only familiar with following the afflicted distractions. As they don't know how to practise the Dharma, we cannot blame them for not practising.

But in our case it is different, as we know the value of the Dharma and have the means to practise it; we know the disadvantages and faults of following the afflicted distractions. Furthermore we know the great benefits of generating a virtuous mind, and know how to generate it. If, while knowing this and having the means to do so, we fail to put it into practice, then the fault lies with ourselves. As the previous masters warned, 'disregarding karma and its effects while understanding karma, is like knowingly taking poison'. So, we need to be really mindful. Taking these points into consideration is the best method for having a meaningful, happy life.

Often it seems I go off on a tangent, however the point that I always try to emphasise is to actually put the teachings into practice. That is something I've taken interest in since I was very young. I've always been concerned with putting into practice what I have learnt; that has always been my intention. Through that familiarity from a young age it has become part of my character. Thus, whenever I share the teachings it is to emphasise putting into practice whatever one has understood. I believe that this is essential. Therefore I feel compelled to relate the ways and means of how to practice.

As those of you who come on Wednesday nights know, I always emphasise the importance of putting the Dharma into practice in everyday life. This must be why Fedor took the initiative to make a booklet out of the Wednesday night teachings. It must be useful for some, because quite a few have come up and thanked me for the book.

Whenever we engage in the teachings, our intention and priority should always be on putting it into practice. Now, while the subject we are dealing with is quite complex and hard to fully understand at times, we must consider ourselves extremely fortunate to have this opportunity to engage in listening to these teachings. Even though it's difficult, try not to resort to despair, thinking, 'Oh, it's too difficult'. Rather, just continue listening with the intention, 'May I be able to understand this profound teaching and put it into practice someday'.

2.2.2.1. ESTABLISHING THAT ONLY THE WISDOM REALISING EMPTINESS IS THE PATH TO LIBERATION FROM EXISTENCE

2.2.2.1.2. Establishing this with logic (cont.)

2.2.2.1.2.2. Establishing it with shared reason

The four sub-divisions under this heading are:

2.2.2.1.2.2.1. Showing that it is impossible to become an arhat and go beyond sorrow if one is devoid of the wisdom realising emptiness.

From the heading alone, one should be able to derive an understanding of what is being presented, i.e. the reasons why it is impossible to become an arhat and go beyond sorrow if one doesn't realise emptiness. The Tibetan term for arhat is dra-chompa which literally means foe destroyer. So, we need to understand what that means. What is the 'foe' that they have destroyed? What is the state of 'going beyond sorrow'? More specifically, the heading explains that it is impossible to achieve the state of liberation if one lacks the wisdom realising emptiness. So this heading presents the point that without the wisdom realising emptiness, there is no possible way of becoming an arhat or foe destroyer.

2.2.2.1.2.2.2. If one can become an arhat simply through the path of the sixteen aspects, then one can also become an arhat by merely abandoning the manifest afflictions.

As explained earlier, in relation to the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths, there are the coarser levels of understanding of the sixteen aspects and more subtle levels of understanding of the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths.¹ This presentation relates to the coarser levels. It explains that there is no way that one can become an arhat through relying on the coarser levels of the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths alone. One can only abandon the manifest levels of delusions with that coarse level of understanding, but not completely abandon all forms of delusion and their imprints.

2.2.2.1.2.2.3. Refuting the answer to that

This refers to refuting an argument on the previous presentation.

2.2.2.1.2.2.4. Showing that even those merely wishing to attain liberation need to meditate on emptiness.

What is being confirmed under this heading is that one definitely needs to have the realisation of emptiness in order to achieve liberation.

2.2.2.1.2.2.1. Showing that it is impossible to become an arhat and go beyond sorrow if one is devoid of the wisdom realising emptiness.

The first two lines of the root text are:

*44ab. If the root of the teachings is the essential bhikhu,
Even the essential is difficult to abide.*

Under these two lines the commentary explains that:

The arhats had received direct teachings from the Buddha, and assembled them later into the collected works of the Buddha. Therefore, in a discussion amongst bhikhus, it would be difficult for even an ordained arhat to be the root of the Tathagata's teachings because of the following reason:

Take the subject 'superior hearer': it follows they have not attained the state of an arhat – because they did not take the wisdom realising emptiness as the path. This shows also the consequence that those who do not accept the emptiness that is the lack of inherent existence of phenomena cannot destroy the foes. The word 'even' indicates that 'not only can those devoid of a realisation of emptiness not become enlightened'.

As the commentary explains, the arhats received direct teachings from the Buddha, and assembled them later into the collected works of the Buddha. After the Buddha had passed away, those arhats who had received the teachings directly from the Buddha convened a gathering where they assembled a collection of all of the teachings of the Buddha. They had heard the teachings directly, and in that first council they recorded what they had heard. As mentioned earlier, the eighteen different Hinayana schools formed at that time, arising from some of the disputes in interpreting the words of the Buddha. So, that's one way of stating how arhats are the essence of the Buddha's teachings.

Another way of understanding the essence of the Buddha's teaching is the Vinaya sutra itself. As hearer arhats, they had heard the Vinaya teachings from the Buddha. In particular, the self-liberation vows are said to be the essence of the Buddha's teachings.

As Lama Tsong Khapa mentions in The Foundation of All Good Qualities:

The root of the teachings is keeping the pratimoksha (self-liberation) vows. Thus, please bless me to accomplish this essential practice.

While it is commonly accepted that the sangha in general, and the arhats in particular, are the essence of the Buddha's teachings, it would be difficult to state that they are actually the essence of the Buddha's teachings, because they are devoid of the wisdom realising emptiness and thus are not actually arhats. The reasoning is presented in the following syllogism. Take the subject 'superior hearer': it follows they have not attained the state of an arhat – because they did not take the wisdom realising emptiness as the path.

If one does not need to have the wisdom realising emptiness in order to become an arhat then, by default, it would be contradictory for the arhats to be accepted as the essential holders of the Buddha's teachings. They would in fact not be real arhats, because they are devoid of the wisdom realising emptiness, i.e. they have not taken the wisdom realising emptiness as a path.

As the commentary further explains, the syllogism shows that those who do not accept the emptiness that is the lack of inherent existence of phenomena cannot destroy the foes. Thus, it is difficult to establish the arhats as being the essence of the Buddha's teachings.

Then the next two lines of the verse are presented:

*44cd. The mind endowed with an object,
Has difficulty even to abide beyond sorrow.*

The commentary explains as follows:

Take the subject 'hearer arhat': it follows they have difficulties to go beyond sorrow as it is invalid for them to have liberation in their continuum – due to their mind possessing the object of true-grasping, as they have not repudiated with reasoning the grasped object of true-grasping, and so grasp at functionalities as truly existent.

Or: It is saying that for as long as one has true-grasping one will not go beyond sorrow. The first two lines state the proposition and the second two lines state the reason.

In brief, the mind endowed with an object means the mind that is endowed with the perception of a truly existent or an inherently existent object. Such a mind will have difficulty in even abiding beyond sorrow.

The syllogism, take the subject 'hearer arhat': it follows they have difficulties in going beyond sorrow, indicates that hearer arhats could not possibly go beyond sorrow, as it is invalid for them to have liberation in their continuum. The reasoning is that this is due to their mind possessing the object of true-grasping, as they have not repudiated with reasoning the grasped object of true-grasping, and so grasp at functionalities as truly existent.

The Madhyamikas are saying, since you accept that the hearer arhats have not actually overcome true-grasping with reasoning, and therefore grasp at functionalities as truly existent, they could not possibly go beyond sorrow. In other words, they could not possibly obtain the state of liberation.

Then the commentary indicates that the first two lines state the proposition and the second two lines state the reason.

In verse 44, the first set of two lines serves as the proposition: If the root of the teachings is the essential bhikhu, and the mind endowed with an object.

The second set of two lines Even the essential bhikhu is difficult to abide and has difficulty even to abide beyond sorrow, show the reasoning, which is that for as long as one has true-grasping one will not go beyond sorrow.

2.2.2.1.2.2.2. If one can become an arhat simply through the path of the sixteen aspects, then one can also become an arhat by merely abandoning the manifest afflictions.

This heading posits a similar argument to the previous heading. If you accept the first case, then it has to follow that by merely abandoning the manifest afflictions one can become an arhat.

The first two lines under this heading are:

45ab. *If liberated through abandonment of the afflictions,
One transforms immediately afterwards.*

Then the commentary states the argument:

Argument: One does not need to realise emptiness to become an arhat. By meditating on the path that realises the sixteen aspects of impermanence and so forth, one exhaustively abandons the afflictions and attains the liberated result of an arhat.

Then the commentary gives the answer:

Answer: It follows that the person who has merely abandoned the manifest afflictions temporarily transforms into an arhat immediately afterwards because by merely meditating on the path of the sixteen aspects of impermanence and so forth one eliminates the afflictions and becomes an arhat. These two are similar in all aspects.

The opponent's argument is that one does not need to realise emptiness to become an arhat because by meditating on the path that realises the sixteen aspects of impermanence and so forth, one exhaustively abandons the afflictions and attains the liberated result of an arhat. This is their reason for saying that it is not necessary to realise emptiness.

The Madhyamika contradict this by saying that if you assert this, then it follows that the person who has merely abandoned the manifest afflictions temporarily transforms into an arhat immediately after they have abandoned those manifest afflictions. This is achieved by merely meditating on the path of the sixteen aspects of impermanence and so forth.

The proponents of the Hinayana tenets for example, do not accept the subtle selflessness of person. Rather, they assert a person who is empty or devoid of having a self-sufficient substantial existence. When they gain that realisation, the manifest levels of delusions such as anger and attachment can be overcome. However they have not been completely uprooted, because the means used is not an ultimate antidote for overcoming the afflictions.

The counter argument being proposed here by the Madhyamika is that you holders of the Hinayana tenets would have to also accept that by temporarily overcoming these manifest afflictions, one would then become an arhat, merely by meditating on the path of the sixteen aspects of impermanence and so forth, and eliminating the [coarse] afflictions. As mentioned here, these two are similar in all aspects, which means that the reasons you gave earlier, and the reasons presented here on overcoming the manifest levels of the afflictions are exactly the same. Since they don't accept the latter, the Madhyamika are saying 'according to you, you would have to accept both because these two reasons are similar in all aspects'.

The reasons are similar in all aspects in that the opponent asserts that by meditating on the path that realises the sixteen aspects of impermanence and so forth, that one will exhaustively abandon the afflictions and attain liberation, becoming an arhat. That is what they accept.

The counter argument is, 'in that case, you would have to also accept that by abandoning the manifest afflictions temporarily, one is immediately transformed into an arhat'. As the realisation of the sixteen aspects is only on the coarser level, and since they accept that as the criteria for abandoning the afflictions and obtaining arhatship, then by default they would also have to accept the second proposition.

The next two lines of the verse are:

45cd. *Although not having afflictions,
One can see that their karma is still potent.*

The commentary that explains this reads as follows:

This is unacceptable however. Although the manifest afflictions are temporarily non-existent, it is observed that the person who has abandoned the manifest afflictions temporarily has the karmic potential to connect with a future existence.

The school of the opponent is expressed by: 'If liberated through abandonment of the afflictions', and the meaning of this is as stated in: 'One becomes liberated by seeing truth.'² What it is saying is that if one can abandon the afflictions and attain the state of an arhat through meditating on the path of the sixteen aspects of impermanence etc.

This is actually quite clear. It is unacceptable to posit that by abandoning the manifest levels of afflictions one becomes an arhat. That is because although the manifest afflictions are temporarily non-existent, it remains a fact that the person who has abandoned the manifest afflictions temporarily still has the karmic potential to connect with a future existence, i.e. cyclic existence. So those who have overcome the manifest levels of afflictions still carry the karma to be reborn into cyclic existence.

As the verse states: Although not having afflictions, one can see that their karma is still potent. The point is that they still have the karmic seeds to be propelled into cyclic existence.

The commentary continues:

The school of the opponent is expressed by: 'If liberated through abandonment of the afflictions', and the meaning of this is as stated in: 'One becomes liberated by seeing truth.' What it is saying is that if one can abandon the afflictions and attain the state of an arhat through meditating on the path of the sixteen aspects of impermanence and so forth.

This is the meaning of what it is saying, because at this point it is debating whether or not one attains liberation from the afflictions merely through the path of impermanence and so forth. This also is very clear from the arguments of, 'One becomes liberated by seeing the truth.'

² This is the first line of verse 40.

The meaning is certainly not that, while accepting that one can eliminate the afflictions by meditating on the path of the sixteen aspects, that one will not be liberated from suffering through that.

The meaning is that when that posited specifically by the two Hinayana schools as afflictions³ is temporarily absent in its mere manifest form by having generated the earlier explained path in the continuum, they posit that one has attained liberation from the afflictions. As a result, by merely abandoning the manifest afflictions temporarily, one will then immediately attain liberation from all contamination.

This is the assertion of both of the Hinayana lower schools, which posit a self-sufficient and substantially existent person that has to be abandoned. The lower schools accept that as the selflessness of the person, while for the Prasangika this is only the coarser level of the selflessness of a person. For the Prasangika the selflessness of a person is a person who is empty of being a truly and inherently existent person. It is only by abandoning the view of grasping at an inherently and truly existent person that one can actually abandon the afflictions from their very root. What is being established here is that while we both accept that abandonment of the coarse afflictions, for the Prasangika, the subtlest level of the afflictions is only abandoned when you abandon that grasping at an inherently existing self.

Thus the argument that overcoming the manifest afflictions temporarily is the cause to immediately attaining liberation from all contamination cannot be accepted.

This is shown in the lines:

That one cannot accept this is shown in the lines, 'Although not having afflictions one can see that their karma is still potent'. This is saying that although the manifest afflictions are temporarily absent one can observe the potential to be thrown into a future existence through the power of karma.

The conclusion in the commentary is quite clear:

These lines need to be explained in this way, and not as some commentaries and past Tibetans have done, who say that because it is observed that Maugalyana and Phagpa Sodreng experienced the suffering result of karma created earlier while an ordinary individual, they are not liberated in the moments afterwards. Here it does not refer to the potential to create suffering in this life, but it is saying that one is not liberated because one has not stopped the karmic potential that throws one into a future existence.

2.2.2.1.2.2.3. Refuting the answer to this

The first two lines of the next verse read:

*46ab. 'You say the craving that takes forcefully,
Is temporarily non-existent and say it is certain.'*

The argument is:

Argument. The attainment of the state of arhat by meditating on the path of impermanence and so forth is not merely temporary. Craving is the simultaneously acting condition for the forceful taking of another existence, and as it is exhaustively abandoned through this path, there is no seed and one does not take another rebirth. It is like this with certainty.

In stating, The attainment of the state of arhat by meditating on the path of impermanence and so forth is not merely temporary, the Hearer opponent is saying, 'I'm not claiming that by overcoming the manifest afflictions, one can become an arhat. I'm not saying that that is temporary'.

Craving is the simultaneously acting condition for the forceful taking of another existence, and as it is exhaustively abandoned through this path, there is no seed and one does not take another rebirth. It is like this with certainty. So here the Hearer is positing a counter argument to them saying, 'we don't accept that it's a temporary abandonment. Rather it is a complete abandonment, and one does not have to take rebirth in samsara.

The next two lines of the verse, which serve as an answer, read:

*46cd. Although this craving is not afflicted,
Why should it not be like ignorance?*

Then the commentary reads:

Answer. Although the craving in the continuum of the person that you assert to be an arhat is not afflicted as explained in the Knowledges similar to there being posited a total incomprehension⁴ that is afflicted according to the Knowledges and one being not, why should there not be a craving that is afflicted according to the Knowledges and one that is not? Both need to be posited.

These texts show the existence of a craving that is commonly renowned as non-afflicted in the two Hinayana schools and the Mahayana, but for the craving that is asserted by our own system certainly no afflicted and non-afflicted are asserted.

The Prasangika are saying that although the craving in the continuum of the person that you assert to be an arhat is not afflicted as explained in the Knowledges, similar to there being posited as total incomprehension that is afflicted according to the Knowledges and one being not, why should there not be a craving that is afflicted according to the Knowledges.

What the Prasangika are saying is that there is the common ignorance as explained in the two Knowledges, and uncommon ignorance according to our system. The common ignorance that is taught in the two Knowledges is the ignorance grasping at the person as a self-sufficient substantial existent. The uncommon ignorance as taught in the Prasangika system is the ignorance grasping at an inherently existent self.

To explain the meaning of the line although this craving is not afflicted: first we need to understand that just like with ignorance there are two types of craving, one that is induced by grasping at a person as self-sufficient and substantial existent, and the other is craving which is induced by grasping at an inherently existent person. The Vaibhashika and Sautrantikas (the two Hinayana schools) accept that craving induced by grasping at a person as self-sufficient substantial existent is an affliction, but do not accept that there is craving induced by grasping at a person as inherently existent; that is because they do not assert that the grasping at an inherently and truly existent person is a wrong view of the transitory collection. So, the Prasangika are saying that while we both commonly accept that the craving induced by grasping at a person as self-sufficient and substantially existent is an affliction in accordance with the presentation in the two Knowledges, this craving however is not an affliction that is induced by the grasping at an inherently existent person, which is a wrong view of the transitory collections. Thus, in saying although this craving is not afflicted the Prasangika are saying that according to our system this craving that is induced by the grasping at a person as self-sufficient substantially existent is not afflicted, (i.e. not an affliction induced by the view of transitory collections), but they are not saying that it is not an affliction at all. The Prasangika do of course accept that craving is an affliction.

³ The coarse afflictions correspond to the explanations of the two Knowledges i.e. The Treasury of Knowledge by Vasubandhu and the Compendium of Knowledge by Asanga. These are the explanations of the afflictions having as their root the grasping at a self-sufficient substantial self. This text however follows the uncommon Prasangika presentation of the afflictions.

⁴ Ignorance.

The line why should it not be like ignorance? means that since there are two levels of ignorance, why should it not also be the same for craving? There is the coarse craving that is induced by the transitory view grasping at the person as self-sufficient substantially existent, and the more subtle craving that is induced by the transitory view grasping at an inherently existent self.

Basically the Hinayana hearers assert that arhatship is obtained when grasping at a self-sufficient and substantially existent person is abandoned.

If you read through this carefully, it will become clear. I have explained this previously and this material is also explained in the Madhyamaka teachings.

As explained earlier, the view of a self-sufficient substantial existent person as being ignorance, is accepted by both schools. However, the Hinayana schools do not accept the grasping at an inherently existent person as being an affliction. They don't assert that one has to overcome the grasping at a truly existent or an inherently existent person to become an arhat, because they don't accept that as being ignorance of the transitory collection. That is the main point being presented here. The lower schools assert that abandoning the ignorance of grasping at a self-sufficient and substantially existent person is the cause to become an arhat. But the Prasangika do not accept that.

The commentary continues:

Thus, it is saying that although one temporarily abandons the manifest craving induced by the grasping at a person that is a self-sufficient substantial-existent self, how can one say that the craving induced by the transitory view that is grasping at the person as existing out of its own nature, is non-existent? The elimination of the earlier mentioned in manifest form does not stop even the manifest form of the just mentioned transitory view and craving.

If it is the same for both schools that when their manifest afflictions are abandoned, then this does not mean that the seeds are abandoned, then it is meaningless to set that craving apart.

What is being explained is that through meditating only on the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths as taught in the two Knowledges, a person may have abandoned the manifest craving that is induced by the grasping at the person as self-sufficient substantially existent. But that will not harm the manifest craving that arises from grasping at the self as inherently existent. The craving that arises from the grasping at the self as inherently existent will not be harmed in the slightest by the meditation on the sixteen aspects alone. Although it can abandon the manifest coarse afflictions to a degree, it will not abandon the seed of the afflictions at all.

We will now recite the Eight Verses of Mind Training, dedicating it to Susanna's mother, who is in Germany and is experiencing complications with her health. Susanna comes here regularly, and is a regular donor, and this is when the Centre needs to take the initiative to help out. We need to be mindful of those who are experiencing difficulty. After all, even dogs and cats recognise someone who has been nice and kind to them, and return their affection.

We will pray that Susanna's mother be freed from her illness and that she be quickly restored to health, and so that she has some more years. If however it is an illness that she cannot overcome and passes away, then we pray for her to have a good rebirth in the next life in Amitabha's pure land, coming into contact with Amitabha directly, receiving teachings from Amitabha and then gaining all the realisations of the path in her mind.

In general this is a good way to proceed whenever there is an occasion that we need to pray for others who pass away.

I, for my part, have definitely done prayers and as a study group if we can do these prayers, and then when she hears about that, that will also help Susanna.

The Sixteen Aspects of the Four Noble Truths

Truth of Suffering

One is mistaken with regard to the truth of suffering by grasping at purity, happiness, permanence and self. Understanding the four aspects of the truth of suffering, which are impermanence, suffering, empty and selfless, counteracts this.

Take the subject suffering of suffering - it is impermanent - because it is generated adventitiously; it is suffering - because it is powered by karma and afflictions; it is empty - because there is no separate controlling self; it is empty - because it isn't established in the nature of an independent self.

Truth of Origin

One is mistaken with regard to the truth of origin by grasping at sufferings to be without cause or to have a discordant cause. Regarding the latter there is the grasping at suffering being produced by only one cause, being produced by a creator the intention of whom preceded the result, and grasping at suffering to be changeable adventitiously but being essentially permanent. Understanding the four aspects of the truth of origin, which are cause, origin, intense generation and condition, counteracts this.

Take the subject contaminated karma and craving - it follows it is the aspect of cause - because it is the root of its resultant suffering; it is origin - because it generates its resultant suffering entirely again and again; it is intense generation - because it generates it strongly; it is the aspect of condition - because it is the concurrently acting condition of it's resultant suffering.

Truth of Cessation

One is mistaken with regard to the truth of cessation by grasping at liberation to be non-existent, by grasping at certain contaminated dharmas to be liberation, by grasping at certain sufferings to be supreme liberation, and by thinking that even though one can exhaust the sufferings one could reverse from that state.

Understanding the four aspects of the truth of cessation, which are cessation, peace, supremacy and definite emergence, contacts those misconceptions.

Take the subject complete freedom from suffering achieved through the power of the antidote - it is the aspect of cessation - because it is the freedom having abandoned suffering; it is peace - because it is the freedom having abandoned the afflictions; it is supreme - because it is liberation with benefit and bliss; it is the aspect of having definitely emerged - because it is irreversible liberation.

Truth of the Path

One is mistaken with regard to the truth of the path by thinking that a path to liberation is non-existent, thinking that meditation on selflessness isn't suitable to be the path, holding certain meditative absorptions alone to be the path to liberation and holding a path reversing suffering to be non-existent.

Understanding the four aspects of the noble truth of the path, which are path, suitable, accomplishment and definitely liberating, counteracts those misconceptions.

Take the subject wisdom directly realising selflessness - it is the aspect of path - because it is a path progressing towards liberation; it is the aspect of suitable - because it is the direct antidote against the afflictions; it is the aspect of accomplishment - because it is a transcendental wisdom directly realising mind's final nature; it is the aspect of definitely liberating - because it is the antidote irreversibly eliminating the afflictions.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་མ་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

11 October 2016

As usual, we will generate a pure, positive motivation for receiving the teachings, one not stained by self-interest.

You are all aware of what the bodhicitta motivation entails. As I regularly mention, even if we do not have the capacity to fully comprehend the bodhicitta motivation, we can all understand how every sentient being does not wish for any kind of suffering and spontaneously wishes to achieve every happiness. So we can ensure that whatever we do, in terms of listening to teachings and putting them into practice, is for the purpose of benefiting other sentient beings – eliminating all their suffering and presenting them with the highest happiness.

It is important to reflect on the essential points encompassed by the term 'bodhicitta motivation'. A bodhisattva is defined as a noble being whose mind is imbued with the aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all living beings – the bodhicitta mind – and their actions are to engage in the six perfections. This is what characterises a bodhisattva's state of mind and their deeds.

Next, to get an overview of the entire path taken by a bodhisattva to achieve enlightenment, as I have often mentioned, the basis is the two truths [conventional and ultimate truth]. The actual path encompasses method and wisdom and the result encompasses the two main bodies of the Buddha [the rupakaya and the dharmakaya]. When one reflects on this overview of the path to enlightenment, it will have an effect on one's mind.

In the teachings, as Mahayana practitioners we begin our practice by generating the bodhicitta motivation. But we must really take to heart what this entails: we have to at least generate a similitude of the bodhicitta motivation in our mind, and our actions should also be a similitude of the six perfections. We should ensure that in our everyday actions we engage in a similitude of the six perfections – generosity, morality, patience, joyous effort, meditation and wisdom. If we assume that we are a Mahayana practitioner and act otherwise, then we are not getting the essence of these points.

This is really important. Normally, we might say, "Oh, but I have a very busy life", but we can, in fact, reflect on these points wherever we may be, and whatever we are doing. And when we have time for practice, we need to bring these points to mind. As I share with you regularly, if you spend some time reflecting on this, and try to take it to heart and implement it in your practice, you will definitely get the benefit. When the benefits start to dawn upon you, this will help transform and subdue your mind. Otherwise, we will be practitioners in name only.

As mentioned earlier, the path encompasses the two collections of method and wisdom. Accumulating merit is said to be the supreme method, and the supreme means to accumulate merit is the generation of bodhicitta. Without bodhicitta, one cannot possibly attain one of the two results of the path – the rupakaya or form-body of a buddha, and the dharmakaya or truth-body of a buddha. The substantial cause for attaining a buddha's form-body is generating bodhicitta, and then further developing and maintaining that. The cause to achieve the dharmakaya or the truth-body of a buddha is gaining the supreme wisdom, the wisdom realising emptiness. Therefore, the study and recollection of emptiness is essential to achieve our goal of enlightenment, which is encompassed in these two bodies of a buddha - the form-body and the truth-body.

We normally say, "Yes, I aspire to achieve enlightenment", but what does it actually entail? What is the specific method and wisdom that one has to actually cultivate and generate? When we relate to the teachings in this way, we can see that it is a systematic, logical and reasonable approach to achieving the goal of enlightenment. And the teachings are presented in this way by none other than the incomparably kind and compassionate Buddha. Seeing how the teachings of the Buddha are presented can actually move our mind. When we see the real value of the teachings and how they are presented in such a systematic and approachable way, this can help us to be inspired and to generate strong admiration and faith in the Buddha and his teachings.

When we engage in the teachings in this way, with this understanding, it helps us to rapidly increase our understanding of the Dharma, and our intelligence and wisdom also increases.

Did you understand the explanation of Verse 44 from last week's session? Specifically the point that the first two lines state the proposition, and the second two lines state the reason. Was that clear to you?

44 *If the root of the teachings is the essential bhikhu,
Even the essential bhikhu is difficult to abide.
The mind endowed with an object,
Has difficulty even to abide beyond sorrow.*

[Some students respond to Geshe-la] What you are referring to is what was mentioned in the explanation of how the monks and arhats serve as the essence of the Buddha's teachings. Right? However, I'm referring to this particular point that the first two lines serve as a proposition and the second two lines state the reason.

Without going through too much further elaboration, we'll just look at this syllogism: Take the subject, 'a hearer arhat as you assert' – it would be difficult to establish them as an ultimate bhikhu who is the essence of the Buddha's teachings, because their minds still possess grasping at true existence, and thus have difficulty in abiding beyond sorrow.

Thus the hearers, who are proponents of the Hinayana tenets, assert that one does not need to gain the realisation of emptiness in order to become an arhat. That is their assertion. The Mahayana refute that assertion by saying: "While you [Hinayanas] may accept arhats as being the essence of the Buddha's teachings, if they were to be devoid of having the wisdom realising emptiness, then it would be impossible to establish them as the essence of the Buddha's teachings, because without that realisation of emptiness they could not possibly go beyond sorrow and achieve liberation".

Basically the proponents of the two lower schools, the Vaibhashika and the Sautrantika assert that by gaining the realisation of the lack of a self-sufficient and substantially existent person and further meditating on it, one will attain liberation. Thus they assert that one does not need to have the realization of emptiness to become an arhat.

The Prasangika say that you cannot become an arhat without the realisation of emptiness. That is because one cannot overcome the grasping at an inherently existent self by merely abandoning grasping at a self-sufficient substantially existent self. Thus, they say that while the mind still possesses grasping at true existence, it is difficult to establish a true or ultimate bhikhu, i.e. an arya being, who has the direct realisation of emptiness.

In fact all the schools below the Prasangika assert that one need not gain the realisation of emptiness of phenomena to become an arhat. They only assert that the realisation of the selflessness of the person is sufficient to become an arhat. According to the Mind Only and Svatantrika-Madhyamika schools, grasping at true existence is the obscuration to omniscience, and not an afflicted obscuration. It is only the Prasangika-Madhyamika who assert that grasping at true existence is an afflicted obscuration, and that in order to overcome the delusions at the very root and become an arhat, one has to realise the selflessness of persons as well as phenomena. This is why, as mentioned previously, the Prasangika assert that whoever has the realisation of emptiness necessarily has to be a proponent of the Prasangika tenets.

There are said to be eight unique presentations of the Prasangika system; one of them is the assertion that grasping at true existence is an afflicted obscuration. Another unique presentation is that if one is an arya or superior being then one necessarily has to have the realisation of emptiness.

Following that point, we went through refuting the lower schools' assertion that one will gain liberation by merely meditating on the path of the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths. The Prasangikas' refutation led to the explanation that there are both subtle and gross aspects of the four noble truths; I wonder if you understood that point?

There is a distinction between the gross and subtle aspects of the four noble truths. These were quite clearly presented previously.¹ For example, with respect to the second noble truth - the truth of origination - the craving imbued by the transitory collection of grasping at a truly or inherently existent self is the subtle truth of origination. And the gross truth of origination is the craving imbued by the grasping at a self-sufficient and substantially existent person.

With respect to the first noble truth - the truth of suffering - the contaminated aggregates obtained through grasping at an inherently existent self or person are the subtle truth of suffering. Whereas the contaminated aggregates obtained through the view that holds onto a self-sufficient, substantially existent person is the gross truth of suffering.

Regarding the third noble truth - the truth of cessation - the gross truth of cessation is gaining the understanding of the lack of a self-sufficient, substantially existent person, and further meditating on that to eventually obtain a cessation of the manifest level of the delusions. Realising the emptiness, or the lack of inherent existence of the nature of the mind, and further meditating on it and perfecting that realisation to obtain the cessation of completely abandoning grasping at true existence, is the subtle truth of cessation.

Similarly, with the fourth noble truth - the truth of the path - the realisation of the lack of a self-sufficient, substantially existent person is the gross truth of the path. Whereas gaining the realisation of the lack of an inherently existent self or person is the subtle truth of the path.

As explained earlier, with respect to impermanence, which is the first aspect of the truth of suffering, all schools make no distinction between subtlety and grossness. It is not as if the Prasangika assertion of impermanence is more subtle than the lower schools. There is no such distinction, because impermanence is accepted by all schools as being the momentariness of all functional phenomena, and this is the subtlest level of impermanence. Momentariness is the definition of impermanence that is asserted by all schools.

Also, with the second aspect of the truth of suffering, there is no distinction of subtlety and grossness. Regarding emptiness, the person being empty of self-sufficient, substantial existence is gross emptiness, whereas the person being empty of inherent existent is subtle emptiness.

All the remaining aspects of the four noble truths can be understood in the same way. When one understands the four aspects of the truth of suffering, then that can be related to the four aspects of the truth of origination, four aspects of the truth of cessation, and the four aspects of the truth of the path. They are all similar.

From this presentation, one can also understand that the Prasangika and lower schools differ in their distinction between the subtlety and gross understanding of the twelve interdependent links.

2.2.2.1. ESTABLISHING THAT ONLY THE WISDOM REALISING EMPTINESS IS THE PATH TO LIBERATION FROM EXISTENCE

2.2.2.1.2. Establishing it with logic

2.2.2.1.2.2. Establishing it with shared reason

2.2.2.1.2.2.3. Refuting the answer to this (cont.)

Following from our last session, we are now on the second verse under the same heading:

47. *Craving arises from the condition of feeling,
And they have feeling;
It abides for some whose Mind is endowed with an object.*

As the commentary explains:

A person who has not realised emptiness has not abandoned in the slightest the ignorance grasping at the true existence of feeling, and through the condition of feeling, such a person would generate craving for not being separated from happiness and wish to be separated from suffering. Because we posit that the arhats have the grasping at inherent existence of feeling, then craving is existing in the continuum. For as long as the mind that possesses the object that is perceived as truly existent is manifest in the continuum of the person, for that long it is impossible to stop the manifest craving that is induced by it.

As explained clearly in the commentary, the person who has not realised emptiness implies someone who has not overcome the grasping to true existence. Such an individual has not abandoned in the slightest the ignorance grasping at true existence of feeling. As I have explained previously, this is something we can understand from our own experience. For as long as we grasp at a feeling, then due to that grasping we will grasp at the feeling of happiness and crave pleasurable sensations, and not want to be separated from pleasure. We will also crave to be free from unpleasant feelings or suffering. This is something we can all naturally relate to. If we strongly grasp at feeling, we will naturally want to grasp at happy or pleasurable feelings, and not want to experience any unpleasant feelings or suffering.

It is also quite clear here that because we posit that the arhats have grasping at inherent existence or feeling, then craving exists in the continuum. Again, as mentioned previously, the Prasangikas are responding to the lower schools by saying: "Because what you call an arhat has grasping at the inherent existence of feeling, a craving will definitely exist in their continuum". The reasoning behind this assertion is that, for as long as the mind that possesses an object, i.e. perceiving the object as truly existent, manifest in the continuum, it will be impossible to stop the manifest craving induced by that grasping at inherent existence. This is quite clear.

2.2.2.1.2.2.4. Showing that even those merely wishing to attain liberation need to meditate on emptiness.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

48. *The mind lacking emptiness
Will arise again despite ceasing,
Like the absorption without recognition.
Thus meditate on emptiness.*

The commentary explains:

Although the manifest afflictions are temporarily stopped in a mind that is devoid of the realisation of the person and the aggregates as being the emptiness of being inherently established, they will again become manifest, just like in the case of the absorption without recognition.

Therefore, not only to attain omniscient consciousness, but also to attain the result of an arhat, or whichever result one wishes to attain, one should definitely desire to meditate on the emptiness that negates the subtle object of negation.

In the statement, Although the manifest afflictions are temporarily stopped in a mind that is devoid of the realisation of the person and the aggregates, both selflessness or emptiness, which is that the lack of inherent existence of the person and the aggregates are presented as what is to be realised.

Even while one is devoid of that realisation, the manifest afflictions may be stopped temporarily. It says here that the manifest afflictions are temporarily stopped through meditating on the selflessness of the self-sufficient, substantially existent person. Through that meditation, one can overcome the manifest level of afflictions, which are temporarily stopped.

However, they will again become manifest: that is, the afflictions will become manifest, and the reason used here to establish that is the example, just like in the case of absorption without recognition. The absorption without recognition - or 'equipoise of no-discrimination' as some translate it - is a meditative state in which all the gross sensation in the meditator's mind is completely stopped. They have no gross conceptions based on gross sensation or feelings in their mind. All of that is completely stopped.

In that meditative state or absorption, all recognition or discrimination temporarily stops. Later, however, when the meditator comes out of that meditative state, all the gross sensations and concepts will resurface. That is because the meditator has not actually stopped recognition or discrimination altogether; they still have discrimination or recognition in their mental continuum. Thus, when they come out of that meditative state or absorption, discrimination will resurface. This illustrates how all of the manifest afflictions are only temporarily stopped because, just like in the case of the absorption without recognition, they can reoccur.

Therefore, not only to attain omniscient consciousness or the omniscient mind, but also even to attain the result of an arhat, or whichever result one wishes to attain, one should definitely desire or one has to meditate on the emptiness that negates the subtle object of negation. As specified here, the meditation on emptiness has to serve as a means to negate the subtle object of negation. This is not just any kind of negation, but the subtle object of negation.

According to the Prasangika, the subtle object of negation relates to both the person and the aggregates. Thus, the inherent existence of a person is the object of negation based on a person, and the inherent existence of the aggregates is the object of negation in relation to the basis of the aggregates. The Prasangika assert there is no coarseness and subtleness in relation to the selflessness of a person and the selflessness of phenomena. They do not assert a distinction between coarseness and subtleness in relation to the basis of imputation or the object itself, but they do in relation to the mind that realises or perceives the object.

All the lower schools below the Prasangika, on the other hand, assert both a coarse and subtle person and phenomena. The selflessness of a person is said to be coarse selflessness, whereas the selflessness of phenomena is said to be subtle selflessness. Only the Prasangika assert that there is no distinction between the two.

Now, when we say the object of negation has to be eliminated or refuted in order to gain an understanding of the emptiness of the person and aggregates, we need to first understand what is to be negated.

If a person were to exist inherently, how would they have to exist? If the aggregates were to exist inherently, how would they have to exist? As you already know, if a person existed without depending on any other factors – such as aggregates or any other causes and conditions for their existence – that would mean the person exists inherently. Likewise, if the aggregates did not depend on any causes and conditions or other factors for their existence, then the aggregates would have to exist inherently. Since a person cannot possibly exist without depending on aggregates and other causes and conditions for their existence, a person therefore lacks inherent existence. This is also true for the aggregates.

The commentary continues to present this point:

Tseg Wang-juk Sengye and others interpret the Bodhisattvacharyavatara as saying that hearers and self-liberators do not realise the selflessness of phenomena, and posit the fault of non-pervasion for inferring the result from the cause for the line, 'craving arises from the condition of feeling'. Regarding this, the sun of the earlier ones had not risen and it is advice unsuitable to arise collectively.

Master Shantideva posits the true-grasping at the person and phenomena as affliction. If one wishes to understand this topic extensively, then one should read the great commentary that was composed by Je Rinpoche himself on the Introduction to the Middle Way.

These points are quite easy to understand, as they have been presented earlier.

The commentary next presents this comment:

There now follows three verses starting with, 'If the words attributed to sutra' which attempt to show reasoning why the Mahayana sutras are the words of the Buddha. There is no occasion to see how they could come above the lines, 'If the root of the teachings is the essential bhikhu', and in addition, the Great Commentary states that they are not the words of the master Shantideva.

So the following three verses are said by the Great Commentary not to actually be the words of Shantideva. However, they are presented here as a supplement to the main text.

49. *If the words attributed to sutra
Are regarded as teachings of the Buddha,
Then why do you not regard most Of the Mahayana in the same way as your sutras?*

The commentary states:

However that may be, their meaning is: If the words that show the higher training of the mind belong to the sutras, those that show the training in morality belong to the Vinaya, and those that show the training in wisdom are not in contradiction to the Abhidharma and are posited as the words of the Buddha, then, as the Mahayana sutras show mostly the three trainings, why are they not accepted as the words of the Buddha?

As clearly presented here in the commentary, if the words of the Buddha that show the higher training of the mind belong to the sutras, those that show the training in morality belong to the Vinaya ... This explanation is based on the Tripitaka, or the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings. All of the teachings in the Tripitaka are words of the Buddha which belong to either the sutras, the Vinaya, or to the wisdom basket. The counter-argument by the Prasangika is that, as the bulk of the Mahayana teachings fit into one of these three baskets, then why are they not accepted as the words of the Buddha? This implies that they should be.

The next verse reads:

50. *If because of only one
All become faulty,
Then why, through one concordant sutra,
Are not all teachings of the Conqueror?*

As the commentary explains:

If you assert all Mahayana sutras as faulty on the basis of the reason that there is one sutra on which you do not realise the complete definition that you posit to be the word of the Buddha, then why do you not assert all Mahayana sutras as the words of the conqueror when you see the definition that you posit to be the word of the Buddha complete on one Mahayana sutra?

If you assert all Mahayana sutras are faulty based on the reason that there is one sutra on which you do not realise the complete definition that you posit to be the word of the Buddha – in other words, if there is one Mahayana sutra that doesn't fit into this definition of the Tripitaka, or the Buddha's words, then this counter argument is presented.

... then why do you not assert all Mahayana sutras as the words of the conqueror when you see the definition that you posit to be the word of the Buddha complete on one Mahayana sutra? This implies that, in following your reasoning, it should be accepted as the words of the Buddha. The next counter-argument to that is:

Argument: If the extensive Perfection of Wisdom Sutra and so forth were the word of the Buddha ...

The main difficulty they find in accepting the Perfection of Wisdom Sutra as the word of the Buddha is because of statements such as: "... there is no eye, no ear, no nose ..." and so forth, as in The Heart Sutra. They would see that as contradictory to Buddha's words. So it follows that:

... then Mahakashyapa should realise their subject, but he does not. Therefore they are not the word of the Buddha.

What the Hearer proponents are presenting is a meticulous argument, saying that the council of the seven prominent disciples of the Buddha who compiled the Buddha's words, (Mahakashyapa being one of the main disciples of the Buddha) should be able to understand the subject. Thus they are arguing that Mahakashyapa did not understand this subject, so how could it be the words of the Buddha?

The verse relating to that reads:

51. *The words are not comprehended
By the great Mahakashyapa and so forth.
Who would disregard them
Just because you do not realise them?*

As the commentary explains:

Answer: Who would disregard the extremely profound, that is asserted to be difficult to comprehend by Mahakashyapa and so forth, as the word of the Buddha because you do not comprehend it? That is unsuitable.

What is being thus explained here is that there are certain words that are extremely profound, such as those that relate specifically to the presentation of emptiness.

Because the nature of the presentation on emptiness is profound, it was difficult to comprehend by Mahakashyapa and so forth, meaning the other disciples. So they had difficulty accepting it as word of the Buddha because they did not comprehend it.

This is virtually saying that if it could not be comprehended by the great Mahakashyapa and so forth, how could it be understood by you? That would not be a suitable reason to say that it is not the words of the Buddha.

I was hoping that by the end of this year we could finish this chapter, but it seems like that might be quite difficult.

Once we have completed the Bodhisattvacharyavatara, my intention is to teach Lamp of the Path, by Atisha. This is a text I had a keen interest in studying when I was quite young and I really paid a lot of attention. Because I have a fair bit of familiarity with this text, I feel that it would be an appropriate text to teach.

His Holiness presented this teaching in Sydney, as you would recall. I have received it prior to that. His Holiness was using the commentary by Panchen Lobsang Chokyi Gyaltsan and had mentioned that the lineage of this commentary is quite rare, quite an explanation based on the commentary as well.

The reason I am announcing the next teaching topic is so that you may start to collect some commentaries and translations and become familiar with them.

Since that text is the basis of all other Lam Rim teachings, going through it will be a good way to go over the main points of the Lam Rim teachings. It is considered the very root of all Lam Rim teachings – it is the main source.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱུང་རྒྱུ་མེས་མ་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

18 October 2016

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

As usual, let us set our motivation for receiving the teachings. It is important to generate a bodhicitta motivation as much as possible, even if it is at a very basic level, such as a contrived bodhicitta motivation. When a positive motivation is generated from both sides – from myself as the teacher and yourselves as the listeners – then through that combination of positive motivations we can definitely derive some benefit from our gathering.

As I usually remind you, it is important to be clear about our motivation in all our activities. Whether that activity is virtuous or not is dependent on the preceding intention or motivation. So it is really important to be mindful of that. Indeed, any activity or behaviour that we may adopt is preceded by an intention generated in our mind. Thus there is no activity that is not a consequence of such an intention. Therefore the teachings indicate that the mind is the forerunner of all activities; good or bad.

Trying to maintain a positive frame of mind at all times really helps to secure whatever activity we engage in as most meaningful and beneficial. As I mention regularly, it is not as if we can separate our actions from our state of mind, because there is no action that is not preceded by an intention in our mind.

I've related this story to you previously: one of the younger geshe once asked me, "How does one engage in meditation?" My response was, "by always maintaining a virtuous frame of mind". I emphasised that not being separated from a virtuous mind is my definition of meditation. Then the young geshe put his hands together and said, "Well, that was an unsurpassable personal instruction!"

In the past I've shared stories where I've responded to the queries of younger geshe who are teaching now, and who have many students themselves. For some reason they seem to be fond of having discussions with me, and I respond quite candidly to them. Sometimes I get carried away but I feel that sharing these stories can be relevant and helpful.

2.2. Establishing that even just to obtain Liberation one needs to recognise emptiness

2.2.2.2. ESTABLISHING IT AS THE PATH TO THE NON-ABIDING NIRVANA¹

It is good to take note of the explanations here, because they are very meticulous and precise explanations of this topic. So if we pay attention, we can derive a good understanding.

The verse reads:

52. *For the sake of those suffering due to ignorance
They attain freedom from the extremes of attachment and fear
And achieve an abiding in cyclic existence.
This is the fruit of emptiness.*

The commentary explains:

The attainment of the non-abiding nirvana definitely depends on the realisation of emptiness. That is because ordinary individuals are attached to the true existence of the aggregates and have fallen into the extreme of eternalism, where they circle in cyclic existence under the control of karma and afflictions. Hearers and self-liberators generate fear of the sufferings of cyclic existence, and have fallen into the extreme of nihilism, where they take the going beyond sorrow that has merely cut birth in existence as their main goal of attainment.

For the sake of the miserable sentient beings circling in cyclic existence due to the delusion that the self and the aggregates exist truly, superior bodhisattvas who are free from these two extremes have achieved an abiding in cyclic existence due to the power of their compassion. This is the fruit of realising emptiness, because if they were devoid of the realisation of emptiness, then although they may abide in cyclic existence, by experiencing true sufferings of cyclic existence, they would become weary and fall into the extreme of nihilism.

In essence, what is being presented here is the faults of being separated from the wisdom realising emptiness and great compassion. This is a precise presentation of, firstly, the faults or the disadvantages of lacking the wisdom realising emptiness, and secondly, lacking great compassion.

The disadvantages of not gaining the realisation of emptiness.

As explained in the commentary, the attainment of non-abiding nirvana definitely depends on the realisation of emptiness. That is because ordinary beings are attached to the true existence of the aggregates and have fallen into the extreme of eternalism, and so are attached to the true existence of the person and the aggregates.

This means that through grasping at a self of person and aggregates, ordinary beings fall into the extreme of eternalism, where they circle in cyclic existence under the control of karma and afflictions. So the consequence of grasping at truly existent persons and aggregates, and not overcoming that grasping by gaining the realisation of emptiness, is that ordinary individuals fall into the extreme of eternalism, and so circle in samsara.

As explained in the commentary, ordinary individuals are attached to the true existence and so forth. It is good to take this as a personal instruction by relating it to oneself. What does 'ordinary being' mean? Ordinary beings are those who are ignorant of grasping at a self. Thus, if one grasps at a truly existent self then one is an ordinary being. In order to take this as a personal instruction, we need to apply it to ourselves, rather than relating it to other individual beings. For as long as we have not exhausted previously created karmas, and continue to create new karma uncontrollably due to ignorance of grasping at true existence, then we will definitely be propelled into cyclic existence over and over again. This is what circling in cyclic existence means at a personal level.

¹ This heading, and the next one were introduced in the teaching of 20 September 2016.

The key factor that propels one into cyclic existence is, as mentioned here, falling into the extreme of eternalism. The extreme of eternalism is to be understood as holding onto the person and the aggregates as being truly or inherently existent. Of course this is not to say that one cannot accumulate good karmas and merit, but until and unless one has overcome grasping at true existence, and completely nullified it, whatever karma one creates will be just another cause to be reborn in cyclic existence.

Another way of putting it is that until one gains the wisdom realising emptiness, one cannot possibly overcome the root cause for circling in cyclic existence. And for as long as one is reborn in samsara due to ignorance, one will inevitably experience the various types of sufferings.

The fault of lacking great compassion

As the commentary explains, hearers and self-liberators generate fear of the sufferings of cyclic existence, and have fallen into the extreme of nihilism where they take the going beyond sorrow, which has merely cut birth in existence, as their main goal of attainment. The driving motivation of hearers and self-liberators on the Lower Vehicle or Hinayana path is wanting to be free from personal suffering. You can't blame them for that; we can relate to wanting to be free from suffering. In fact there is a great danger that we fall into their way of thinking. When we are really weary and fed-up with suffering it is very easy to be driven to just wanting to be free from suffering, and not give much thought to the welfare of all other sentient beings.

When the driving motivation is wanting to be free from personal suffering, then for as long as individuals are on the hearer and solitary-realiser paths, the underlying motivation will always be the dominant force that pushes them towards their goal of self-liberation. It is not as if hearers and solitary realisers - and arhats in particular - don't work for the welfare of other sentient beings, but it cannot be compared with the driving motivation of a bodhisattva, whose only wish is to achieve enlightenment for the sake of benefiting all sentient beings. So the driving force for bodhisattvas to attain enlightenment is to benefit all sentient beings; whereas the driving force for the hearers and solitary realisers is to attain liberation in order to be free from suffering. Thus, hearers and solitary realisers have fallen into the extreme of nihilism.

The commentary goes on to state that hearers and solitary realisers have fallen into the extreme of nihilism where they take the going beyond sorrow, that has merely cut birth in existence, as their main goal of attainment for the sake of the miserable sentient beings circling in cyclic existence due to the delusion that the self and the aggregates exist truly, superior bodhisattvas who are free from these two extremes have achieved an abiding in cyclic existence due to the power of their compassion. What one should note here is that all superior beings have equally severed the karma that projects one into cyclic existence, and whether they are a superior bodhisattva, superior hearer or solitary realiser, they will not newly create the projecting karma that propels one into cyclic existence by virtue of being an arya superior being.

Why are superior beings called superiors? Some explain it as being because they are superior to lower beings on the path, but that is a very limited understanding. In the context of the commentary, 'superior' has the connotation of being exalted. That which makes them superior is their state of mind. So the term 'superior' does not refer to the external appearance of a person, but rather to their state of mind. What makes them a superior is that their mind is free from grasping at a self. Because they are free from the grasping at a truly existent self, they will never again create projecting karma, which is a cause to be reborn in cyclic existence. That is because they have gained the realisation of emptiness, and are thus free from being controlled by grasping at a self.

What motivates one to create the karma that projects one into cyclic existence again? It is grasping at a truly existent self, which uncontrollably motivates one to create karma. Then that karma, created through the influence of grasping at a self, becomes the karma that projects one into cyclic existence over and over.

When the reverse takes place, where one's mind takes control over the grasping at true existence, at that time grasping at true existence cannot overpower one's mind and influence it to create karma. That is when one has true control over one's mind. Thus the precise controlling factor is gaining the realisation of selflessness or emptiness. When one's mind is dominated by that wisdom realising emptiness, then that nullifies grasping at true existence, and thus the creation of karma that propels one into cyclic existence completely ceases. As the antidote, which is the correct understanding of emptiness, becomes stronger in one's mind, the opponent, which is self-grasping or grasping at a self, naturally becomes weaker and weaker.

The commentary states that this is the fruit of realising emptiness, because if they were devoid of the realisation of emptiness, then they would abide in cyclic existence, experiencing the true suffering of cyclic existence. If bodhisattvas were to abide in cyclic existence without the realisation of emptiness, then they also have to experience the true sufferings of samsara, just as we do. Any happiness we experience is only a temporary, fleeting pleasure, and not real happiness. Whereas the sufferings we experience are true suffering. So a bodhisattva without an understanding of emptiness would experience the true sufferings of cyclic existence and become weary, and that would influence them to fall into the extreme of nihilism. If they were weary about their own suffering, then that would cause them to lose interest in benefitting others, and they would strive only for self-liberation, and thus fall into the extreme of nihilism.

The happiness that we experience is not true happiness, because all happiness and pleasure that we experience in samsara is necessarily contaminated. Therefore, as the teachings explain, the samsaric happiness that we experience is necessarily one of the three sufferings, specifically the suffering of change.

We can relate to this with our own experience. When we are very cold we experience the first moment of being in the sun as being very pleasurable, and we experience happiness. But if we remain in that hot sun, very soon we start to feel very uncomfortable, and we want to go back to the cold, which would then be experienced as pleasurable. But then that changes after a short time and we feel uncomfortable again. As explained in the teachings, the nature of what we perceive as happiness is actually contaminated happiness. The fact that happiness does not last is because it is contaminated.

2.2.2.3. THUS, ADVISING THAT IT IS SUITABLE FOR THOSE WISHING FOR LIBERATION TO MEDITATE ON EMPTINESS

The verse reads:

53. *Thus it is not valid
To repudiate the side of emptiness.
Therefore, free from doubt
Meditate on emptiness.*

As the commentary explains:

Thus, it is invalid to repudiate the side of emptiness, as it was explained earlier, because it will also be contradicted by the reasons explained below. Therefore, even those wishing to attain the enlightenment of the hearers and self-liberators should meditate on emptiness free from doubt. True-grasping is the affliction of ignorance that becomes the root of cyclic existence and without negating its grasped or apprehended object it is impossible to attain liberation.

If you recall, the proponents of the lower schools such as the Vaibhashikas and the Sautrantikas, say that there is no need for the realisation of emptiness. The commentary responds, saying that it is invalid to repudiate the side of emptiness. As it was explained earlier, and because it will also be contradicted by the reasons explained below. This indicates that further reasons will be presented to explain why it is necessary to meditate on emptiness.

The commentary says, therefore even those wishing to attain the enlightenment of the hearers and self-liberators should meditate on emptiness free from doubt. True-grasping is the affliction of ignorance that becomes the root of cyclic existence, and without negating its grasped or apprehended object it is impossible to attain liberation.

This reminds me of a debate in my early days when I was in Varanasi. During a debate session I quoted a few lines from the Compendium of Knowledge where it says, 'while there is no beginning to cyclic existence, the end can be seen when one realises emptiness'. The example that is given is that, 'although there is no beginning to a seed, the end of a seed can be seen when it is destroyed by fire'.

One of those attending the debate session was the late Geshe Lobsang Gyatso who was the founder of the School of Dialectics. He came up to me afterwards and said, "Oh, you really made a very good point in the debate", and then we had a further discussion about it.

The point is that what ends cyclic existence is seeing that the cause of cyclic existence is grasping at a truly existent self. Until one can see that this grasping can be destroyed, it is quite impossible to comprehend that there can be an end to cyclic existence. When one is able to negate grasping at a truly existent self, then it is possible to attain liberation and thus end cyclic existence.

Again, taking this as a personal instruction, what is being presented here is that grasping at a self is the root cause of cyclic existence. What that implies is that unless and until one overcomes self-grasping, one cannot possibly overcome the root cause of cyclic existence. Overcoming self-grasping refers to looking within oneself, and being able to identify the grasping at one's own self.

How do we go about holding this mistaken view? How does it manifest? How does that then become the cause for our own cyclic existence? When we are able to identify that grasping within ourselves, then it is like a doorway that opens the possibility for ending our own cyclic existence.

Otherwise, as in the analogy in the teachings, it would be like trying to look for the thief in the plains when they've actually run into the forest. If one knows that the thief has run into the forest then it would be really foolish to be looking around in the plains and trying to find the thief there, when in fact they've run into the forest. In other words it's the wrong place to look for the thief. Similarly we need to be identifying the self-grasping within ourselves!

Next is a presentation on afflictive obscurations and the obscurations to knowledge. The verse further explains the need to meditate on emptiness to attain liberation.

54. *Emptiness is the antidote against the darkness
Of afflictive and knowledge obscuration.
How can those wishing for quick omniscience
Not meditate on it?*

The commentary explains:

Since the wisdom realising emptiness is the antidote against the darkness of the afflictive obscurations and the obscurations to knowledge, how can those wishing to quickly attain omniscient transcendental consciousness, which is free from the two obscurations, not meditate on this emptiness? If one is separated from it, one will not even abandon the seed of the afflictive obscurations.

The seeds of the obscurations to knowledge are the final imprints of the afflictions, and the manifest obscurations to knowledge are the part that is the true appearance of functionalities and so forth. But to posit everything that appears as truly existent as the obscuration to knowledge is unsuitable.

First of all, as defined in the teachings, an obscuration is that which hinders the obtaining of either liberation or omniscience.

There are two types of obscuration:

1. Afflictive obscurations which are specific obscurations that hinder the attainment of liberation;
2. Obscurations to knowledge or omniscience, which hinder the attainment of omniscience or enlightenment.

All afflictions and their seeds lie within the category of afflicted obscurations. There are the afflictions themselves and the seeds of these afflictions, which have the potency to generate future afflictions. Both the seed of the afflictions and the afflictions themselves are afflicted obscurations.

The obscurations to knowledge or omniscience are the imprints of those seeds.

Therefore as the commentary explains, since the wisdom realising emptiness is the antidote to the darkness of the afflictive obscurations and the obscurations to knowledge, how can those wishing to quickly attain omniscient transcendental consciousness that is free from the two obscurations not meditate on this emptiness? If one is separated from it, one will not abandon even the seeds of the afflictive obscurations.

As explained further, the seeds of the obscurations to knowledge are the final imprints of the afflictions. As specifically mentioned here, the seeds of the obscurations to knowledge are the final imprints of the afflictions.

And the manifest obscurations to knowledge are the part that is the true appearance of functionalities and so forth. The appearance of true existence is said to be a manifest obscuration to knowledge. The seeds of the obscurations to knowledge are the final imprints of the afflictions, which are the cause of the appearance of true existence.

However as the commentary further mentions, positing everything that appears as truly existent as an obscuration to knowledge is unsuitable. This means that while true existence itself is an obscuration to knowledge, whatever appears as existing truly doesn't necessarily have to be an obscuration to knowledge. An example of an appearance of true existence that is not an obscuration to knowledge is the eye consciousness of an ordinary being. For the eye consciousness of an ordinary being, there is an appearance of true existence, but the eye consciousness itself is not posited as an obscuration to knowledge.

Thus, as explained, the final imprints of the afflictions are the seeds of the obscurations to knowledge, and due to the imprints the parts that make true existence appear to the mind are the manifest obscurations to knowledge.

If we take ourselves as an example, when we see a person or the colour blue, it appears to us as solidly existing from its own side. When someone walks in the door, they don't appear as being dependent on different parts, causes and conditions. Rather they appear as solid and existing from their own side; that is how it appears to our eye consciousness. That is the appearance of true existence.

The commentary continues with a summary of what has just been explained. It is presented first as an argument:

Summary

Argument: One should not meditate on emptiness as one is afraid of emptiness.

The opponent is saying, "I don't wish to meditate on emptiness, because it makes me afraid. Why should I meditate on emptiness if it makes me afraid?"

Of course we can't blame anyone for having this fear if they are not familiar with an understanding of emptiness. If one attempts to actually meditate on emptiness with only a partial or incorrect understanding of emptiness, then that can bring about the wrong conclusion that nothing exists. If one thinks that nothing exists, then one has a feeling of losing the sense of reality, which can cause strong fear to arise.

Without a proper understanding of emptiness there is the danger that one will fall into the extreme of nihilism. For example, if we were to take the words of the Heart Sutra literally - that 'there is no eye, no ear, no nose', and so forth - then we could start thinking, 'if I don't have any of my senses, then perhaps nothing exists'. If one fails to understand that the implicit meaning of 'no eye', 'no ear' and so forth, is that there's no inherently existent eyes, there's no inherently existent ear, and no inherently existent nose and so forth, and takes the words in the sutra literally, then one has come to the wrong understanding.

One should be able to immediately understand from this passage in the Heart Sutra that there is no inherently existent eye and so forth. That is what is meant by emptiness of eye - that it is empty of being an inherently existent eye. When we apply this understanding of emptiness to the entire Heart Sutra, then we can imagine how powerful and profound even one recitation of the Heart Sutra will be.

If we can develop our understanding of what emptiness really means, and take the time to contemplate it, then due to our acquaintance with the correct understanding of emptiness, we will definitely be suitable recipients for receiving the profound teachings on emptiness; if not in this life then in future lives. As suitable recipients of the profound teachings of emptiness, through hearing the teachings on emptiness we will be able to spontaneously gain the realisation of emptiness. As explained in the Madhyamakavatara, the Middle Way teaching, 'Merely hearing the word 'emptiness' moves a suitable recipient to the point where the hair on their body stands on end spontaneously, and tears flow from their eyes uncontrollably'. That is an external sign that one is a suitable recipient for the profound teachings on emptiness.

As Lama Tsong Khapa mentions in his teachings on the Madhyamakavatara, 'even if these signs don't occur, someone who listens to the unmistakable teachings and instructions on emptiness from a qualified teacher, and then thinks about it and contemplates it again and again, can be a suitable recipient of the profound teachings of emptiness'. I've explained this many times previously. These are really important points to bear in mind. Being a suitable recipient of the teachings to the point of gaining a real and profound understanding of what emptiness means, is based on the acquaintance with emptiness that we develop now.

When I taught the Madhyamakavatara, the Middle Way teaching, there were some who commented that although they didn't really understand much of it, it moved them to tears. So I'll take that as a good sign. Indeed, the teachings on emptiness do really seem to move the minds of some people. When they hear these teachings their minds are soothed and become very calm. That is definitely a sign that emptiness has a positive effective for some fortunate individuals.

We will conclude the teaching here and with the remaining time we will recite the dedication chapter of the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, and dedicate it to Susanna's mother who has just passed away.

Doing a practice like this together, or by oneself, dedicating it to someone else with a good intention and a good motivation, will definitely benefit them. Not only will they benefit, but we will benefit too because we're dedicating our prayers to them. As Lama Tsong Khapa mentioned, when you dedicate yourself to benefitting others, your own needs and purposes will also be fulfilled. This is a really significant point: when we do something for the benefit of others, we also receive benefit from that.

As usual, let us spend some time in our meditation practice.
(pause for meditation)

It is good to generate the bodhicitta attitude, the most positive motivation for receiving the teachings. Spending ample time generating such a state of mind with the sole wish to benefit other sentient beings is most essential.

2.2.2.3. ADVISING THAT IT IS SUITABLE FOR THOSE WISHING FOR LIBERATION TO MEDITATE ON EMPTINESS (CONT.)

Summary of the meaning

Argument: One should not meditate on emptiness as one is afraid of emptiness.

It is good to relate this to the eighteen root downfalls of the bodhisattva vows, which were covered during the Six Session Guru Yoga teaching. One of the root downfalls is to teach emptiness to an unsuitable vessel. The significant point here is that there have been cases where, when emptiness is presented, even bodhisattvas who are proponents of the Mind Only school, generate fear, lose faith and fall into the Hinayana path because of their very strong grasping at the notion of inherent existence and a truly existent self. When the lack of an inherently existent self is presented to them, this causes a great shock to their mind, to the point where they lose faith in the Mahayana teachings. In this way they can give up the Mahayana path and enter a Lower Vehicle path such as the hearer's path. If this is true even for those who have already become a bodhisattva, then we need to understand that it is even more crucial to be very careful when presenting these teachings to ordinary beings, who have not yet gained much understanding of the Dharma.

For example, hearers who are proponents of the Sautrantika and Vaibhashika lower Buddhist schools have very strong grasping at a truly and inherently existent self. Thus, presenting them with the correct view of emptiness – that there is no truly and inherently existent self – can cause great fear to arise in their mind. This is why their objection is presented here: one should not meditate on emptiness as one is afraid of emptiness. On this note, we need to understand that we need to be mindful not to present emptiness, and indeed even other aspects of the teachings, to those who are not really ready to hear certain points. That is because this can generate more doubts in their mind and possibly lead them to lose faith in the Buddha's teachings. We need to be very mindful of this because, rather than helping, it can turn them off the Dharma.

I have personal experience of people not being really ready to accept certain aspects of the teachings, even certain points from the lower scopes. So we need to be really mindful when presenting Dharma, making sure that it does not cause people's minds to become more disturbed. When there is very strong grasping at something it is very hard for them to give it up right away.

I have witnessed occasions where individuals are not willing to reconcile after having some conflict with one another. This can occur even amongst close relatives, such as siblings, where they have reached a point of seeing each other as enemies. At that stage even with a good intention, when I try to give them suggestions to make amends and think about the other's wellbeing, I notice that it immediately instils a strong negative reaction. It seems that they have made up their mind that they cannot possibly get along with the other person.

So in this example, even with a suggestion to try to see things from a different perspective and make amends with someone, you can see that when their mind is not ready they totally reject the idea, and they cannot accept it. And it seems to aggravate them even more. This is why one needs to be mindful. In last Wednesday night's teaching I also addressed this point saying that it is good to take initiative to look at oneself and try to analyse one's mind. One needs to try and come to the point where one can accept that anger is a problem for oneself. Then there is a chance to make a transformation. Saying 'you are an angry person' will not help and can be the wrong approach.

Someone had asked the question 'how can I help someone see their afflictions as being harmful to themselves?' My approach is that you have to be very careful and take a skilful approach as you can aggravate them even further. For example, in a family situation with siblings or relatives one does not get along with, I have suggested that even if you want to make a connection with the other, if that other is still very strongly holding onto something against you, then trying to communicate with them may not work right away, and it might just aggravate them further. So what I have suggested is on some occasions, such as Christmas or birthdays, to make a nice gesture of sending a small gift through someone else. You do not have to say much, just send a gift. Next time send another gift again, then gradually they may be able to change their attitude towards you. Then later when you express your interest in having some communication with them, they may feel quite ready and think, 'OK, it would be good to reconnect again.'

The main point is that one needs to be mindful when dealing with others who have difficult, strong grasping at certain feelings or emotions, as it can be very hard to let go. For some individuals we need to be very mindful that even when presenting our suggestions with good intentions, it can aggravate them further, and be more destructive for the mind. Many of you are now in a position of presenting the Dharma to others. So you need to be mindful that just because you have the understanding and knowledge of the Dharma, it does not mean that this validates you to present it to others regardless of whether they are ready to accept it or not. So we have to be very mindful of these points.

The argument as presented in the commentary is One should not meditate on emptiness as one is afraid of emptiness.

Then the verse reads:

55 *If one generates fear
Of the phenomena generating suffering
Then why generate fear of emptiness,
Which pacifies suffering?*

The commentary explains the verse as follows:

Answer: If it is suitable to be afraid and to generate fear of the functionality of true-grasping, which acts as the main cause for the sufferings of cyclic existence, then how can one be afraid of the wisdom realising emptiness, which pacifies the sufferings of cyclic existence? It is inappropriate to be afraid of it, as it is that which eliminates all fears.

The commentary explains the nature of the opponents' fear of emptiness: If it is suitable to be afraid and to generate fear of the functionality of true-grasping, which acts as the main cause for the sufferings of cyclic existence. Here, while the proponents of the lower schools do not accept true grasping as a cause of suffering, their acceptance of self-grasping as the root cause of cyclic existence is being further extended here. As presented by the Prasangikas, grasping at true existence is the root ignorance that is the cause of cyclic existence. It states here that both agree that one needs to be free from the suffering of cyclic existence, and both agree that to overcome this suffering one needs to overcome the root cause. So based on this mutual agreement the verse presents a way to consider that if grasping at true existence is the main cause of suffering, and since you and I both want to be free from the suffering of cyclic existence, then how can one be afraid of the wisdom realising emptiness which pacifies the suffering of cyclic existence?

So the Prasangika put forth this argument: since you want to overcome the suffering of cyclic existence, and since the wisdom realising emptiness is the ultimate antidote for overcoming the root cause of suffering in cyclic existence – which is the ignorance of grasping at true existence – it is inappropriate to be afraid of it as it is that which eliminates all fears of suffering. This is quite straightforward so you should be able to understand it.

In summary, the main point is that one need to rightly be afraid of that which causes all the suffering of cyclic existence, which is grasping at true existence. So that is what one should be afraid of. One should not be afraid of the cause for eliminating that root cause of cyclic existence, which is the wisdom realising emptiness. So basically what is being presented with the next verse is if one has grasping at true existence, that is what generates fear, but if one does not have grasping at true existence then there is no reason to have any fear. That is the point.

The next verse presents this as follows:

56. If some self existed
And one becomes afraid of any object,
Since there is no self at all
Who is the one afraid?

The commentary explains the meaning:

If some inherently existent self were to exist then it is suitable to generate fear from any suitable object due to the grasping at that self, but as there is no inherently existing self in the slightest, who is the person that is afraid? If you were to reverse the awareness thinking of inherent existence within and contemplate, then by fully comprehending selflessness you will become liberated from all fears.

As the commentary explains, if any inherent self were to exist then it would be suitable to generate fear. As also presented in Liberation in the Palm of Your Hand, in order to identify the false grasping at the self, one can reflect on it at a time when this self-grasping is most apparent, such as when one has very strong fear in one's mind. On an occasion where one thinks that something terrible is about to happen to oneself and one generates strong fear, there is a very strong sense of an 'I' or 'me', which does not depend on anything else. If one investigates and looks at how that 'I' appears to the mind, at that point one would notice that the 'I' appears as an independently and self-sufficiently existent self. It appears as a very solid entity, existing in and of itself, from its own side and is not dependent on anything else. Grasping at such an appearance of 'I' is what is known as grasping at a self.

When one analyses whether this 'I' exists as it appears, one comes to realise that such an 'I', which seems to truly exist in and of itself and not depending on anything else, in fact does not exist at all. When one has a strong fear, this is when the self - that in fact does not exist - becomes apparent to one's mind. I have presented other examples previously such as when one has a strong opinionated mind e.g. when one says, 'I cannot accept this'; when someone suggests something and you have a very strong opinion in your mind you will say, 'No, I cannot accept this'.

At that moment, when one says one cannot accept this, that referent 'I' that one says cannot accept this is actually the 'I' that appears to one's mind as a truly existent 'I'. Grasping at this 'I' is grasping at a false self – an 'I' that does not actually exist – and further enhances that strong sense of an independent 'I', and thus self-grasping.

When one understands that such an 'I', which does not even exist to begin with, is the object of negation, then the fear associated with that 'I' being in danger will not be present, because one will know that this 'I' does not exist.

What is being presented here is a counter argument to the opponents' argument that meditating on emptiness generates fear: 'Where is that self that is fearful of meditating on emptiness? You say that you generate fear when you meditate on emptiness, but where is that 'I' that you say is afraid?'

This is a counter argument to the point 'I am afraid of emptiness'. It says 'Where is this self that you say is afraid?' The self you propose is an inherently existent self, so if this self were to exist then it might be feasible to generate fear in any situation due to grasping by the self. But since that self that you posit is an inherently existent self that does not actually exist, then there is no self (as you posit) that can possibly experience fear.

The lower schools posit an inherently existent self, which is actually the object of negation according to the Prasangika. If, rather than generating fear in relation to the self, one realises that such an inherently existent self does not exist, then that understanding becomes the optimum means to overcome all fears. That is why the commentary mentions that as there is no inherently existing self in the slightest, who is the person that is afraid? This implies that there is no need to be afraid when one comes to that understanding. It further emphasises that if one were to reverse the thought of grasping at an inherently existent self and look within, then one can contemplate whether such a self exists or not. Through this investigation, by looking within, one will be fully able to comprehend selflessness and become liberated from all fears. This is the optimum means to overcome all fears.

In simple terms, the self that the proponents of the two lower schools assert is an inherently existent self, and according to the Prasangika, such an inherently existent self does not exist. What is being pointed out to proponents of the lower schools is that the only reason they generate fear is precisely because they are grasping at a self that does not even exist to begin with. So when you realise that the very self that you grasp at – the one you are claiming you are afraid of – does not even exist, then having negated the object of negation (i.e. the inherently existent self) you will gain the profound understanding of selflessness, which is the optimum means to overcome all fears and all suffering. That is the point.

The following points are profound, so it is important to read through them slowly and carefully.

2.3. Explaining extensively the reasoning that established emptiness¹

This consists of two subtopics:

2.3.1. Explaining extensively the reasoning that establishes the selflessness of person

2.3.2. Explaining extensively the reasoning that establishes the selflessness of phenomena

2.3.1 Explaining extensively the reasoning that establishes the selflessness of person

This has three sub-divisions:

2.3.1.1. Refuting the determined object of innate self-grasping

2.3.1.2 Refuting the intellectually acquired self

2.3.1.3 Refuting objections to the refutation

As explained, the selflessness of person is when the lack of inherent existence is understood on the basis of an individual person. When one understands the lack of inherent existence based on other phenomena, meaning all other phenomena that are not the individual self, then this is referred to as the selflessness of phenomena. As presented earlier, in terms of grossness and subtlety, there is no difference between selflessness of person and phenomena. So the distinction of the two is made on the basis of imputation.

A debating point is: isn't a person also a phenomena, and hence the selflessness of person is actually the selflessness of phenomena? The answer is that within the two categories of persons and phenomena, the reference 'selflessness of person' is made in relation to persons. But in general, of course, all persons are also phenomena.

2.3.2.1 REFUTING THE DETERMINED OBJECT OF THE INNATE SELF-GRASPING

This passage in the commentary quite meticulously presents the explanation of innate self-grasping.

Regarding the difference between the innate true-grasping and the intellectually acquired true-grasping; innate true-grasping is the true-grasping that everybody has, irrespective of whether the mind has been influenced by tenets or not. It is generated through its own power with regards to the person or the aggregates. It grasps at natural existence and at inherent existence independently of an analysis with reasoning.

The term 'innate true grasping' refers to grasping regardless of whether one adheres to a certain tenet or not, or whether one has gained some intellectual understanding or not. All beings, naturally and spontaneously, have innate true grasping.

The commentary highlights:

It is generated through its own power with regard to the person or the aggregates.

This means that whether focusing on individual persons or any other phenomena, the grasping that arises spontaneously and naturally is what is called innate true grasping.

For intellectually acquired true grasping the commentary explains:

Intellectually acquired true-grasping is true-grasping that, in dependence on an analysis with reasons, thinks it is valid that objects exist truly and that 'that objects exist truly'.

Intellectually acquired true grasping comes about as a consequence of analysis using reasoning, when one comes to a wrong conclusion that self and other phenomena exist truly.

The key point about innate true grasping is that it spontaneously and naturally arises in all ordinary beings, regardless of whether they've analysed phenomena or not. However intellectually acquired true grasping is that which arises in those who are proponents of certain tenets. This is why the root cause of samsara or cyclic existence is said to be innate true grasping. If it was intellectually acquired true grasping then only the proponents of certain tenets would have the root cause of samsara, and the rest would not have the root cause of samsara. That would be absurd, as only those who have intellectually-acquired true grasping would be creating the karma to be born in cyclic existence.

These are actually significant points to understand.

The commentary further explains:

In the category of self-grasping at person, there is also an innate grasping at a self-sufficient substantial existent,

This is the lower school proponents' explanation of self-grasping.

... and the grasping at the person as the lord and at the aggregates as the servant, which can only be intellectually acquired.

The grasping at the person as the lord and the aggregates as the servant can only be grasping in the category of intellectually acquired grasping. In the earlier presentation of an innate grasping at a self-sufficient substantial existent, one needs to understand that this is coarse self-grasping, not the subtle or actual self-grasping according to the Prasangika.

The commentary continues:

Likewise, also the grasping at partless particles and partless moments of time can only be intellectually acquired grasping at the self of phenomena.

Again this is coarse grasping at phenomena, not subtle grasping.

Next the commentary presents a summary of the main points Gyaltsab Je has mentioned:

In short, the two types of innate true-grasping are generated through their natural power, independently of analysis. Any other types of true-grasping are intellectually acquired.

The determined object of the earlier is the main object of negation, and the negation of the latter should be understood as part of the negation of the earlier.

The point here is that the determined object of innate self-grasping is the main object of negation, and that, as mentioned earlier, is because the determined object of innate self-grasping is the root cause of samsara. That becomes the main object of negation, whereas the negation of the latter i.e. intellectually-acquired self-grasping, should be understood as part of the negation of the earlier. In attempting to refute innate self-grasping one would then be able to negate intellectually-acquired self-grasping. The opponent presents this argument:

Argument: If one asserts that a refutation of the teeth, nails and so forth as being the self is for the purpose of liberation from cyclic existence, then that would be unsuitable, as sentient beings, while grasping at them as mine, do not grasp at them as 'I'.

A significant argument being presented here is that the root cause of samsara is grasping at the self, not at the parts of the self, such as teeth, other organs etc. These are not the self, so there is no point in overcoming grasping at the parts of oneself, as these don't serve as the root cause of samsara. So, they are saying that while one needs to overcome the grasping at self, the parts are not the self.

The commentary explains the answer to this with the following explanation:

Answer: Since this is synonymous with the teachings that form and so forth are not the self, ...

This is from another teaching where it says that form and so forth are not the self. It comes down to the same meaning.

The commentary continues:

... out of [the two] focus and aspect, of the innate transitory view, it is the focus that is the mere self-isolates of the mere 'I' and 'mine' that are the basis of karmic cause and effect. The innate transitory view grasps at them as inherent 'I' and 'mine'...

What is being presented here is the view of the transitory collections, which grasps at one's own 'I' and 'mine' as being inherently existent. The definition of the view of the transitory collection is an afflicted wisdom that focuses on the 'I' and 'mine' in the continuum of an individual person and grasps at them as inherently existent 'I'. So with the transitory view it is the general isolate of 'I' and 'mine' that is being focused on, not the specific aspects of 'mine'. Here we need to understand the distinction between the innate self-grasping that is the transitory view, and general grasping at a person. The transitory view relates to an individual who focuses on their own individual 'I' and 'mine' as holding them as being inherently existent. Holding onto another individual's self and grasping that as being inherently existent is not the transitory view. It is self-grasping but it is not the transitory view.

I will explain more specifically the focus that is the mere isolates of 'I' and 'mine'. When we refer to the parts which make up oneself e.g. 'head', we don't say randomly 'head' or 'nose' in relation to oneself, we refer to them as 'mine'. We say 'my head', 'my eyes', 'my ears,' 'my nose' in relation to the five sense faculties. We attribute the term 'mine' although it is part of oneself. So what is being specifically presented here is that when presenting innate self-grasping in relation to the transitory view, it is presented as an isolate. Grasping at that strong sense of one's own 'I' and 'mine' as being inherently existent is known as the view of transitory collections.

To emphasise the point, the innate transitory view grasps at one's own 'I' and 'mine' as inherently existent. While there is seemingly a distinction here, what we need to understand is that the grasping at 'mine' is actually part of grasping at 'I', it is not distinct. The grasping at 'mine' – my head, nose, and so forth – is actually grasping at the 'I'. The view of the innate transitory collection is grasping at the inherently existing 'I', so even when we say 'mine', that is part of the 'I'. Therefore it has to be posited as grasping at the 'I'. The significant point presented next in the commentary says:

If the 'I' existed inherently, then amongst the examples for the 'I', such as the collection of the aggregates or its continuum, its parts or division, or something of a different entity from the aggregates, should be established as the example of the 'I'. The point here is that this is not the case.

This means that if there were an inherently existent 'I' then it would have to be found amongst the parts that make up the 'I', as mentioned here; either the collection of the aggregates or its continuum, its parts or its divisions. If it is not found there, or in some different entity from the aggregates, then there is no other way to establish an inherently existent 'I'; either in relation to the aggregates, the whole of it, or the continuum of it, or the parts or the division of it, or something separate from the aggregates. If an inherently-existent 'I' did exist, then it could only be found in these ways.

As a way to get an understanding of the differentiation between innate self-grasping and intellectually acquired self-grasping it would be good to go over the text again, and also try to read other sources to complement it. With innate self-grasping there is the view of the transitory collection. What is that? Within that there are two aspects: grasping at an inherently existent 'I' based on an individual person and there is grasping at an inherently existent 'mine'. Grasping at either of these two becomes the view of the transitory collection. These are points that are good to understand.

As usual let us spend some time in our meditation practice.

Now, based on a good and clear bodhicitta motivation we can set our motivation for receiving the teachings.

2.3.1.1. REFUTING THE DETERMINED OBJECT OF INNATE SELF-GRASPING

Last session we went through the preliminary explanation in the commentary, which meticulously presented important points that we really need to become acquainted with so that we develop a good understanding of them.

Now we come to the actual verses in the root text that present points showing us how to identify innate self-grasping.

It is important that those who are new to these explanations do not misinterpret what 'selflessness' means. What is being negated is not the self, because the person does exist; what is being negated is an inherently existent self of a person.

The terms 'self', 'person', and 'I' are synonymous. While the Tibetan term ki wu refers particularly to a human being, the term gang sak – translated here as person – is a more generic term that refers to all beings. So a person, the self and 'I' definitely do exist.

When the teachings present the lack of self of a person, one needs to understand this in the context of the basic Buddhist view that is held by all Buddhist schools, known as the four seals of Buddhism. When one has a good understanding of these four seals then one gains an understanding of selflessness.

The four seals of Buddhism are:

- All compounded phenomena are impermanent
- All contaminated phenomena are in the nature of suffering
- All phenomena are empty and selfless
- Nirvana is peace

All compounded phenomena are impermanent: Most of you are already aware of this point. 'Compounded phenomena' refers to functional and produced things, which by their very nature are changing moment by moment. Thus, because they are momentary, all compounded phenomena are impermanent.

All contaminated phenomena are in the nature of suffering: This is very true, as the samsaric environment and the beings abiding within it are a constant source of suffering and dissatisfaction.

All phenomena are empty and selfless: The selflessness in the context of the view of the four seals is the selflessness of a person that is empty of being permanent, single or partless and independent, and this is accepted by all Buddhist schools of tenets. This is the gross selflessness of a person. This view is contrary to the self that is asserted by the non-Buddhist schools. As the text will present, the non-Buddhist schools posit a self that is permanent, because they say that the self does not change from moment to moment. It is singular as it does not depend on different parts for its existence, and it is independent, because it does not depend on causes and conditions.

For all Buddhist schools a self that is permanent, singular or partless and independent, as posited by the non-Buddhist schools, does not actually exist. Therefore such as self is an object of negation. The lack of a permanent, singular and independent person is the 'selflessness of person' – albeit a gross selflessness of person. So understanding the four seals is essential if we are to understand the selflessness that is accepted by all Buddhist schools of tenets.

From the higher school perspective this selflessness is considered to be 'coarse selflessness'. However, at our level it is important to begin with gaining a good understanding of the selflessness as presented in the four seals. Without a good understanding of the selflessness of a person at this basic level then there is no possibility of gaining an understanding of the more profound 'subtle selflessness' of person and other phenomena.

We need to incorporate our understanding of selflessness in relation to ourselves. It is quite clear that we are not a permanent entity as we can all see the obvious physical and mental changes we go through. Therefore we cannot possibly be a permanent entity.

Furthermore we are not a singular entity, because we know that we are dependent on the many parts that make up who we are. We are dependent on our physical aggregates or our body, as well as our mind, for without our body and mind we could not possibly be called a person. Therefore we are clearly not singular or partless.

Finally we could not possibly be independent of causes and conditions because we clearly depend on many causes and conditions for our existence, in particular the influence of karma. More specifically, our experience of happiness and suffering is dependent on causes and conditions: virtue is the cause of happy experiences and non-virtue is the cause of suffering.

This covers many profound aspects of the teachings. Having a good understanding of this encompasses a good understanding of the cause and effect of karma, as well as the existence of our past and future lives. Because our happiness is dependent on causes and conditions, we also come to understand the need to accumulate merit. We all want to experience happiness and joy, so we need to accumulate the appropriate causes, which are virtue and merit.

So we can see that when we relate this view of selflessness to our own experience, it becomes really tenable. Just saying, 'Oh, I do not accept the non-Buddhist view of a permanent, singular and independent self, because as a Buddhist I am not supposed to believe in that', would be a very superficial way of relating to this presentation. Rather, when we relate it to our own experiences, then we will gain a deeper understanding of what selflessness really means.

If we can begin to really pay attention to what seems simple and practical, then we can derive more profound understanding that will help our practice. We claim to be Buddhists, so it is important to understand what being a Buddhist really means, which basically falls into two main aspects – right conduct and right view. As presented in the teachings, a Buddhist's conduct is one that abstains from violence, and the Buddhist view is accepting the view of selflessness, as presented earlier. This explanation of the view is presented in the tenets. Of course, when His Holiness the Dalai Lama presents the Buddhist view he relates it to interdependent origination, which is a higher level of understanding the view. However, on the basic general level, the tenets present the view of selflessness.

The proper understanding of selflessness is derived from the presentation of the four seals of Buddhism, as it is the basic level of selflessness that is asserted by all Buddhist schools. There are other interpretations that posit as the view presented in the four seals as a higher level of selflessness such as a person being devoid of self-sufficient and substantial existence, however this is not tenable. Another example of selflessness is that posited by the Prasangika, which is a person being empty of an inherently existent self.

However, one needs to understand that the higher and more profound levels of selflessness are based on the earlier understanding of selflessness. As explained in the teachings, the presentations of selflessness range from the coarse - asserted by the lower schools and presented in the four seals - up to the subtlest level of selflessness, as asserted by the Prasangika. Each depends on an understanding of the previous presentation.

The Vaibhashika point of view is that a person is empty or devoid of being a permanent, singular and independent self, although one of the Vaibhashika sub-schools called the nes-ma bu-pa or Vasiputriya do not accept that as being selflessness.

Having a good understanding of that level of selflessness helps to develop a better understanding of selflessness as presented by the Sautrantika, which is that a person is empty of being self-sufficient and substantially existent. This brings us closer to the understanding of selflessness as presented by the Mind Only school, which is that the person is empty of an external existence.

For the Svatantrika-Madhyamika school, the view of selflessness of person is that the person is empty of true existence. That in turn leads up to the view of the Prasangika-Madhyamika school, which is that the person is empty of inherent existence. So one needs to understand how these views are presented in a consecutive way leading up to the higher levels of understanding.

There are some who say that the view of selflessness presented in the four seals has to be the selflessness asserted by the higher schools. But that couldn't be the case, because the question would then arise as to whether the lower Buddhist schools, which don't have understanding of the higher and more subtle views of selflessness, are Buddhists or not? Or perhaps they are Buddhist only by conduct but not by view, as they lack the correct view of selflessness. That would be an absurdity because the specific demarcation that distinguishes a Buddhist from a non-Buddhist is based on whether one accepts the view of selflessness or not. In fact we need to be careful ourselves, as we might easily fall into the category of being a Buddhist by conduct but not in view if we still hold onto views that are not in accordance with the view of selflessness. So we need to be very mindful of these points.

It is safe to assume that all of you have a basic understanding of selflessness, so there might not be much danger of holding on to a wrong view here. However, it is really important that you further enhance the correct understanding of selflessness and emptiness, especially if you assume yourself to be a practitioner of tantra. Every tantric sadhana begins with the passage 'all phenomena become empty; from within the sphere of emptiness ...' So without an understanding of emptiness one cannot possibly assume that one is practising tantra accurately. The understanding of emptiness in tantra is as presented in the perfection vehicle.

It is possible for a tantric practitioner to have an understanding of emptiness as presented by the Mind Only, or the view of emptiness as presented by the Svatantrika-Middle Way, not to mention the highest Buddhist school of Prasangika. However, in tantra the understanding of emptiness cannot be based on any of the lower schools' views of selflessness. That is definite.

The main point for those who have received tantric initiation is that you will breach one of your four root vows if you do not remember emptiness. So we need to pay attention to developing a correct understanding of emptiness, as remembering it on a regular basis is part of our commitment. Without a correct understanding of emptiness then there is no possible way to really remember emptiness, but with a proper understanding it is a matter of bringing that understanding to mind. We are working towards developing a more profound understanding of emptiness. That is what it means to remember emptiness at our level.

You will recall His Holiness' recent teachings where, prior to giving the initiation, he referred to the importance of generating bodhicitta with the practice of tantra. He used passages from the Commentary on Bodhicitta and went into quite a lot of detail in explaining the importance of generating bodhicitta based on the teachings. So both bodhicitta and emptiness are essential for understanding the practice of tantra.

What is being presented in the following verses of the root text and the commentary is, in summary, the lack of an inherently existent self.

If an inherently existent self were to exist, then it has be findable upon the aggregates that make up a person. Therefore, the first section of this part of the text negates the view of a self or a person as existing within the aggregates of the body.

First the text negates the view of those who assert the physical aggregates as an example of a person. Then it negates the view of those who posit the consciousness as the example of a person.

The Prasangika present the person as a mere label imputed upon the psychophysical aggregates. Thus the example of person is a mere label imputed upon the aggregates, and say that if you search within the psychophysical aggregates you will never find a person there. Thus a person is a mere label imputed upon the aggregates.

Again, it is good to reflect on this at a personal level. When we relate to ourselves, we automatically identify ourselves as 'I' or 'me', but we need to investigate further: Where is this 'I' or 'me' that I hold onto so strongly? Is it upon my aggregates? If it is upon my aggregates, then in which part of my aggregates is that 'I'? Am I able to find the 'I' upon any of my aggregates or anywhere else? When we investigate each and every part of our own body in this way, we will come to the conclusion that there is no 'I' to be found anywhere. We can't find the 'I'. This goes to show that none of our physical parts in themselves could possibly be 'I'.

The lower schools come to their conclusion about the 'I' based on this kind of investigation. The Prasangika, on the other hand, posit the 'I' as a mere imputation upon the aggregates. Thus, in order to posit the 'I' there is no need for investigation. That will be presented later on. This is really the distinguishing point: when the lower schools posit the

'I', they do so by investigating where the 'I' might be found, whereas the Prasangika posit the 'I' without having to do any investigation.

With that basic explanation the verses and the explanations of them should be quite clear.

57. *The teeth, hair and nails are not the self;
The self is not the bones or blood,
Not the nasal mucus or phlegm,
And also not lymph or pus.*
58. *The self is not the fat or sweat,
And neither the lungs nor liver are the self.
The other inner organs are also not the self,
The self is not faeces or urine.*
59. *The flesh and skin are not the self,
The heat and air are not the self,
The holes are not the self, and certainly the Six primary consciousnesses are not the self.*

The commentary explains:

Refuting parts of the aggregates as examples for the 'I': The teeth and nails are not the self, the bones or blood are not the self, and neither is the nasal mucus or phlegm because the self is established as merely labelled on these. Also, because of the earlier reason, lymph or pus are not examples of the 'I', and neither are the sweat or fat examples of the self. And neither the lungs nor the liver are examples of the self, and also the other inner organs such as the intestines and so forth are not examples of the self. The self is neither faeces nor urine and also the flesh or skin are not the self, as the self is established as merely labelled on them. The heat and air are not the self, and understand that also the holes of the body and so forth are not the self.

This is quite clear. Then the commentary further explains:

If the meaning of this is summarised: The Realists belonging to our side grasp at the aggregates as an example for the person, and non-Buddhists accept a self that is of different entity from the aggregates; the self being like the master and the aggregates like the servant.

What is shown here is synonymous with the refutation of the six spheres as the person in the Garland of the Middle Way. 'The holes are not the self' refutes the sphere of space as the person.

Thus it is also unsuitable to hold any of the collection of the aggregates, or its continuum, its parts or divisions, or something that is of a different entity from the aggregates, to be an example for the person even nominally, and also, anything of different entity from them cannot be posited as the person because the person is established as being merely labelled in dependence on these.

I don't need to spend too much time on this explanation, as I presented it in the teachings on the Middle Way. This verse is a presentation of refuting aggregates and so forth as being the self.

When the commentary states, If the meaning of this is summarised: The Realists belonging to our side refers to the Vaibhashika who hold the aggregates as an example of the person. When the Vaibhashika search for an example of a person, they conclude that a person cannot be found anywhere else but within the five aggregates; i.e. the physical aggregate, the aggregate of feeling, the aggregate of discrimination, the aggregate of compositional factor and the aggregate of consciousness. The Vaibhashika posit the person within this collection of the five aggregates. So according to the Vaibhashika, the five aggregates are an example of a person.

The non-Buddhists accept a self that is of different entity from the aggregates; the self being like the master and the aggregates like the servant. Another way of explaining this is with the example of a load and the carrier, in which the load and the person carrying the load are of different entities: the self is like the load, and the aggregates are like the person carrying the load, so with this example they posit the self as a different entity to the aggregates. Thus the self is posited as being completely separate from the aggregates.

What is shown here is synonymous with the refutation of the six spheres as the person in Garland of the Middle Way. We covered this in the teachings on Precious Garland, which says that because a person is a combination of the six spheres it cannot be truly or inherently existent.¹ The presentation can be summarised with the following syllogisms. Take the subject 'a person': it lacks inherent or true existence – because it is posited upon the six spheres; and the six spheres lack inherent existence – because the six spheres individually are dependent on many other causes and conditions for their existence.

As posited by the higher Prasangika school, the person is a nominal existent rather than substantial existent. Here, nominal existent means that it is merely nominated, or labelled upon the six spheres, and that there is no substantial existence from its own side. Thus nominal existence means that it is merely labelled by the mind.

Thus it is also unsuitable to hold any of the collection of the aggregates, or its continuum, its parts or divisions, or something that is of a different entity from the aggregates, to be an example for the person even nominally. This means that even conventionally the example of a person cannot be posited upon any of its parts.

Then, lest one comes to the wrong conclusion that since the aggregates and the continuity of these aggregates and parts and divisions of aggregates are not the self, they must be a separate entity, the words anything of different entity from them cannot be posited as the person are added. This is because the person is established as being merely labelled in dependence on the aggregates.

This is the point. The person is asserted to be a nominally existent because it is not any of the aggregates. Neither is the person a different entity from the aggregates, because it is imputed or labelled upon the aggregates.

Having refuted what a person is not, the following argument from a lower Buddhist school is presented.

Argument: But then there is nothing that can be posited as the person.

So, what they are saying is, 'if what we posit as a person is not a person, then what is there left to be posited as a person'? The commentary provides this answer.

Answer: Are you not satisfied in positing Devadatta or Yajjadatta [as persons] without analysis?

For if you posit an inherently existent person as the object labelled when saying 'person', then you will fall into the extremes of nihilism or eternalism. Understand that not even one atom of such a self exists.

¹ See teaching of 31 August 2010.

Although Devadatta and Yajjadatta are cited, any modern name can be used. In response to the argument, 'Is it not suitable just to posit an individual as a person without the analysis?' indicates that the Prasangika system presents the nominal person without analysis. It is said that the Prasangika presentation is very much in accordance with the worldly convention. When we call out someone's name or want to point out someone, we don't go through a whole analysis of where they are, and which part of them is them. We just point them out, saying, 'There is the person you want'.

What is being presented here is how a person is posited without analysis. Thus, an example of a person is that which is labelled upon that combination of the aggregates. As the commentary states, if you posit an inherently existent person as the object labelled when saying 'person' then you will fall into the extremes of nihilism or eternalism.

An example of a person is that which is suitable to posit as a person because of their function. For example, when we ask 'Where is Damien?' people point to his body and say, 'There is Damien'. If we were to go through a thorough analysis to look for Damien, then there is the danger of coming to the wrong conclusion, 'Oh, I cannot find Damien, so Damien must not exist'. That would be falling into the extreme of nihilism!

That which is suitable to function as Damien is who Damien is. Based on what we see of Damien; i.e. his bodily movements, mannerisms and functionality is what we posit as Damien. We don't go through a thorough analysis of determining where Damien is when we posit Damien, do we? If we were actually to do an analysis of where Damien is then we might say, OK, is Damien's head Damien? No. Is Damien's body Damien? His hands and arms? No. We might easily then come to the wrong conclusion that Damien cannot be found anywhere, therefore Damien does not really exist. If Damien can't be found anywhere, then Margie might get really worried!

In preparation for our following sessions it will be good to read some of the commentary texts. You all have access to the transcripts of the teachings that I have presented, as well as your notes. It is best if you have taken good notes and kept them in your memory. But we have all the transcripts of the teachings on the Precious Garland, the teachings on the Madhyamakavatara, and the teachings on the Four Hundred Verses, which all cover this topic.

So it is good to refer to these texts as a way to get a more comprehensive understanding of this presentation. It is my regular practice to have quite a few books around me. I pick up different books at different times and read different passages from them. It is good to refresh one's memory and gain a deeper understanding of these topics.

Merely reading a text will help to settle down a very hyperactive and unruly mind. It is good to understand that one has access to these methods to help calm down and subdue the mind.

For the manifestation of different negative states of mind such as strong anger, refer to the teachings on the antidotes for overcoming anger, such as developing patience and so forth. Through reading those passages one will be reminded of the way to apply the antidotes for overcoming anger. Then the mind will settle down and you will be calmer. Likewise, when strong attachment arises, refer to the passages on how to apply the antidote for overcoming attachment. There are many different sources - you can refer to passages from the Abhidharma as well. These are useful ways to overcome strong attachment, jealousy or pride and other negative states of mind. When one refers to these methods and techniques and reflects on them, it will help to settle the mind down.

We cannot blame those who do not have any understanding of or access to any explanations on how to apply the antidote for delusions, such as intense anger. They have nothing to help them to appease their mind. They are completely enslaved to that mind of rage and anger, carrying weapons and running towards what they perceive as their enemy in order to kill them, because they have no understanding of the ways to overcome the delusions in their mind. So we just have to feel compassion for such people, and not blame them for resorting to such strategies.

But if we, who do have an understanding and access to resources explaining the antidotes for overcoming such negative state of mind, don't do anything about applying the antidotes and just give in to our negative emotions and states of mind, then that would be more than a pity. What could be more disgraceful than knowing there are methods to overcome delusions, but then not apply them?

As I have explained previously, we need to understand the subtle differences between the different delusions and their derivatives. When anger is prolonged for a long time then it turns into belligerence, to the point where one could pick up any weapon as a way to intentionally harm what one perceives as being the cause of one's distress. As I have explained previously, belligerence is only directed at an animate object. While anger is listed as one of the six root divisions, belligerence is listed as a secondary delusion, but being a secondary delusion doesn't necessarily mean that it is less significant.

We see those who, out of frustration and anger, kick their own car. I really pity them. How can kicking the car help them? They just feel so angry, and out of their rage they either hit the car, or hurt themselves further, and some even intentionally engage in self-harm. This is a really pitiful situation.

As usual let us spend some time in our meditation practice.

[Meditation]

Now, based on a bodhicitta motivation and attitude, we generate the motivation for receiving the teachings as usual.

2.3.1.2. REFUTING THE INTELLECTUALLY ACQUIRED SELF

This is subdivided into two:

2.3.1.2.1. Refuting the self asserted to be consciousness by the Enumerators

2.3.1.2.2. Refuting the self asserted to be matter by the Particularists

2.3.1.2.1. Refuting the self asserted to be consciousness by the Enumerators

The self that is being refuted here is the self that is asserted by the non-Buddhist Samkhyas or Enumerators¹, which is a mere consciousness.

The commentary begins with:

Although there are infinite kinds of substantially established types of self asserted by non-Buddhists, as they are all either asserted to be matter or consciousness, they can be subsumed into either matter or consciousness by refuting these two, one is able to refute all others, two are refuted here.

It is quite clear that all types of self that are posited by non-Buddhists can be subsumed into either matter or consciousness. So by refuting these two views i.e. the self as either being matter or consciousness, one is effectively refuting all other non-Buddhist views of the self.

This section of the text is sub-divided into two:

2.3.1.2.1.1. The actual refutation

2.3.1.2.1.2. Refuting the reply

2.3.1.2.1.1. The actual refutation

First there is a presentation of how the Enumerators posit the self:

The Enumerators posit exactly twenty-five types of objects of knowledge, out of which twenty-four, including the great principle are matter, and the twenty-fifth is a consciousness, a knower, experience, or the self endowed with mind.

We don't need to go into all the categories now.² What one needs to understand is that the twenty-fifth is consciousness, and that this is what is being asserted here as the self. For the Enumerators there are no other aspects to a person besides the consciousness; basically the self is a mere consciousness.

The commentary further explains:

The great principle knows how to produce expressions but does not know how to use them, ...

The Enumerators assert that the great principle is the cause while the expressions are the effects. Furthermore, the great principle knows how to produce expressions but does not know how to use them, ... and the person, which is referred to as the knowing consciousness, knows how to use objects but does not know how to produce them.

The Enumerators assert that the person or self has five qualities, which are that it engages – in happiness, suffering and so forth; it is a permanent functionality; it is not the creator; it lacks qualities; and it lacks action. So, they assert these five qualities to be the attributes of the self or person.

As further explained in the commentary:

... This person is asserted to be a permanent functionality.

The specific assertion here is that the person is a permanent functionality, which is contrary to the Buddhist assertion of permanence as non-functional and non-produced phenomena.

At the time of using the object, to that called 'awareness' and 'the great' appear outwardly the five mere objects of sound and so forth, and inwardly appears the person, ...

As explained here, the mere person appears inwardly, while outwardly the person engages in the five sense objects such as sound and so forth.

As explained further:

Cyclic existence is asserted to come about through the awareness grasping at that used and the user as one.

The Enumerators assert that the user (i.e. the self) and what is being used (i.e. the five sense objects) are actually separate. So, sentient beings circle in cyclic existence because of the misconception that sees objects and object possessor as one.

There are more detailed explanations of the assertion of the Samkhyas in Precious Garland of Tenets. Nagarjuna's *Precious Garland of Advice*³ also has a summary of these explanations, and I also taught it when we did the Madhyamakavatara or Middle Way teaching⁴. So I do not need to explain it in detail here.

The commentary also states:

I will not explain it here in detail, but you should understand their presentation from other sources, because it appears that through misinterpretation there are many assertions that the school of the Enumerators are the view of Highest Yoga Tantra.

As an introduction to the verse, the commentary then states:

Although there are four possibilities with regard to sound and consciousness being permanent or not, the Enumerators posit both as permanent.

The four possibilities with regard to sound and consciousness being permanent means that there are some - such as the Enumerators - who posit that both sound and consciousness are permanent, and others who posit them as being impermanent.

For the Enumerators, consciousness is a mere awareness, whereas in our own system, consciousness includes mind and mental factors, as well as many other aspects of the mind. The Enumerators assert that this consciousness, or this mere awareness, is the person, which doesn't have any other aspects. They also assert that both consciousness and sound are permanent.

Madhyamika: If sound and consciousness were permanent then it would have to be the case that the consciousness constantly perceives sound; there would be no occasions when there's no perception of sound. If there are any instances where there is sometimes an awareness of sound and sometimes not, then it would be impossible to say that sound is permanent. If the consciousness were permanent, then whatever is perceived or apprehended would have to be constantly apprehended. This is the main point.

As adherents to a system of tenets, we assert that the person is impermanent. However as ordinary beings we instinctively grasp at the person as being permanent, don't we? We actually hold the notion that the self is permanent. So when the person is refuted as being permanent, we need to try to apply that understanding at a personal level, as a way to gain a real sense of what is being refuted. For this, we need to first acknowledge our own instinctive grasping at the permanence of the person.

It is not sufficient to just dismiss the view of the Enumerators by saying "oh, it's quite absurd that they assert that the person is permanent!" In fact, the core of their position in asserting that a person is permanent is because they cannot possibly see how it would otherwise be possible for a person to migrate from one life to the next. From a conventional point of view then, they seem to have a valid reason for asserting the self as being permanent, which we can relate to from our own false perceptions. In fact that is exactly how we perceive a person. We consider that the person we see today is the same person we saw yesterday. We may reason, if the person we saw yesterday doesn't exist today, then how could they be here now? And how could the person we see today actually continue to exist tomorrow? With that way of thinking it is easy to assume that the person or self is permanent.

The Prasangika system asserts that while a person is impermanent, its continuum migrates from past lives to this life and from this life to future lives. In Christianity there is no belief in reincarnation, is there? They don't believe in future lives, yet they believe in a soul which is permanent. So, if the soul is permanent but it doesn't reincarnate, then at the time of death where does it go? As Buddhists we believe that the self is impermanent, yet it reincarnates and continues to migrate to a future existence.

Some non-Buddhist schools of thought do not believe that there's a continuity of the self. They hold the view that at the time of death, the self simply ceases to exist. These non-Buddhist schools adhere to the notion that the self and the aggregates are actually of the same substance. Therefore when the aggregates disintegrate, the self

(which is dependent on the aggregates) also disintegrates. The example they give is of drawings on a wall. When the wall collapses the drawings naturally collapse as well, and so therefore the drawings cease to exist. Likewise, according to these schools, when the body disintegrates, the self or the soul also disintegrates and ceases to exist.

Does the person of yesterday exist today or not? Conventionally we would have to say that they do exist. What we have to understand here is that although we might easily say, "the correct view is to assert the person as being impermanent", we need to also understand how the continuum of the person continues to exist. So, while the person or the self is impermanent, it doesn't contradict the continuum of the person as existing continuously. What comes from yesterday exists today and goes on to tomorrow all the way into many future lives, and that is the continuum of the person. So when we hear comments that someone hasn't changed much over the years, we are actually referring to the continuum of that person, which is a similitude of the person that existed in the past.

Next comes the verse from the root text:

60. *If the consciousness of sound were permanent
One would apprehend sound all the time.
If there is no object of knowledge, then what is known
To say it is such a consciousness?*

Here the commentary explains:

If the knowledge consciousness person who engages the five mere objects of sound and so forth is a permanent functionality, then it follows that the knowledge consciousness person has sound as its apprehended object at all times, when sound exists and when sound does not exist – because it is a permanent entity that has made sound its object and apprehends it.

This thesis is unsuitable to be accepted – because if there is no object of knowledge, then what would be the known object in order for the consciousness to be the object-possessor of such and such an object? It would be unsuitable to say such a thing.

As explained here, the Enumerators or Samkhya assert that the knowledge consciousness person engages the five mere sense objects of sound and so forth, which are permanent functionalities.

Madhyamika: If they were a permanent functionality then it follows that the knowledge consciousness person has sound as its apprehended object at all times. As mentioned earlier, they would have to be apprehending sound at all times. What kind of object possessor would it be if there was no object to be apprehended, or perceived? If it is an object possessor then because you Enumerators assert it as being permanent, it will perceive that object at all times.

Can there be a consciousness that does not perceive an object? The point is that if it is a consciousness, it has to be an object possessor. The very function of a consciousness is to perceive objects. Without an object, how can it be an object possessor? The very term 'object possessor' means that if it is a consciousness it has to perceive objects, whatever the object may be.

In the teachings three types of object possessors are presented: person, consciousness and sound. The very term object possessor means that it has to engage with an object. So from the Buddhist point of view we need to understand that if it is consciousness, it necessarily has to perceive an object.

The next verse reads:

61. *If it is consciousness without that known,
Then it follows that also wood is consciousness.
Therefore one has to say that without proximity of
The object of knowledge, consciousness does not exist.*

The argument of the Enumerators is:

Argument: The reason is not established because even if there is no sound, there is the permanent consciousness that apprehends it.

To this the Madhyamikas say:

Answer: It follows that even wood becomes consciousness because it is permitted to accept consciousness without object of knowledge.

Hence, it is confirmed that without the proximity of the object of knowledge of sound or the like, one has to say there is no consciousness. As there is no way to posit consciousness if there is no object of knowledge, you would have to accept there is no time when the person does not apprehend sound.

The Samkhya assert that the reason is not established because even if there is no sound, there is the permanent consciousness that apprehends it.

The Madhyamika answer, as explained in the verse, is that it follows that even wood becomes consciousness. If one can posit a consciousness that does not apprehend sound, or indeed apprehend any particular object, then even a piece of wood could be considered as consciousness. That is because you Samkhya are saying that it is permitted to accept consciousness without object of knowledge. Hence, it is confirmed that without the proximity of the object of knowledge of sound or the like, one has to say there is no consciousness. There is no way to posit consciousness if there is no object of knowledge.

The conclusion reached by the Madhyamikas is that according to your assertions you would have to accept that there is no time when the person does not apprehend sound. The absurdity of the Enumerator's view is that the person constantly apprehends sound.

2.3.1.2.1.2. Refuting the reply

The Enumerators present this reply:

Enumerator: The consequence that there would be a consciousness without objects of knowledge is not tenable.

The consequence that there would be a consciousness without objects of knowledge is not tenable. Next the following verse is presented:

62. *If, 'they know form',
Why do they not hear anything at this time?
If, 'because there is no proximity to sound,'
Then there is also no consciousness of it.*

The Enumerators reason that:

Because at the time when sound does not exist, this permanent person is conscious of form by taking it as the object of apprehension.

Then the Madhyamika refute that by saying:

Madhyamika: Take the subject 'the being' – at the time of apprehending form by taking it as the object, why does it also not hear sound? It follows it should – because it is a permanent entity that engages the mere five objects without discrimination.

The Enumerators reason that when sound does not exist, the permanent person is conscious of form, and takes it as the object of apprehension.

The Madhyamika present their refutation in the form of the following syllogism. Take the subject 'the being': at the time of apprehending form by taking it as the object, does it not also hear sound? – it follows that it does.

The reason is that according to you Enumerators it is a permanent entity that engages the mere five objects without discrimination. So the Prasangika are saying "You're saying that the person is permanent and it also engages with the five objects equally.

The Enumerators then present this argument:

Enumerator: Because it does not abide close to sound at the time of being conscious of form, it is not conscious of sound at that time.

The Madhyamikas reply to that saying:

Madhyamika: When the object of sound does not exist, then the consciousness that is its object-possessor also does not exist. If you accept this, then the thesis of a permanent pervasive person is lost.

This explanation is quite clear.

Then the next verse is presented:

63. *How could that in the nature of the apprehension of sound
Become the apprehension of form?
Although one is labelled as father and son
This is not absolute.*

The Madhyamika response is:

Further, it follows that which is in the nature of a consciousness apprehending sound does not become a consciousness apprehending form – because their aspects are mutually exclusive.

Then the Enumerators say:

Enumerator: One person can be presented as father and son from two different points of view. Similarly, from the points of view of expression and nature the expression of sound does not exist at the time of the apprehension of form, but the nature of sound exists because form and sound are of one nature. Therefore one can also posit the object-possessor of sound at that time.

In the verse the Madhyamikas have explained that the aspect of apprehending sound and the aspect of apprehending form are mutually exclusive.

To that the Enumerators reply that one person can be presented as father and son from two different points of view. Similarly, from the points of view of expression and nature, the expression of sound does not exist at the time of the apprehension of form. So they say that the expression of sound does not exist at the time of the apprehension of form, but the nature of sound exists because form and sound are of one nature. Therefore one can also posit the object-possessor of sound at the same time.

The Madhyamika's response is:

Madhyamaka: It follows the example does not fit the meaning [of the example of the father and son] – because although one person is labelled father and son from two different points of view, that person does not exist ultimately in either. Yet you accept these natures to be ultimately established.

Then the next two lines of verse are presented:

*64ab. Thus, courage and particles
As well as darkness are neither father nor son.*

The commentary explains:

You accept that the equilibrium of courage, particles and darkness is the great principle, nature and ultimate truth. Regarding this, the very nature at the occasion of the son is not the nature at the occasion of not being the son, i.e., the father, because the Enumerators state,

The supreme nature of qualities
Does not become something visible.
That which becomes visible
Is without any essence like an illusion.

The nature is accepted as something that does not become visible, and the directly visible father and son and the like are accepted as illusory. From this point of view, the very father becomes the son, and the very son becomes the father because both their natures are one.

Having quoted from their own source, the Madhyamikas are saying you accept that the equilibrium of courage, particles and darkness is the great principle.

For the Enumerators the 'great principle' is the equilibrium of courage i.e. happiness; particles i.e. equanimity; and darkness i.e. suffering. When these three are in a state of equilibrium, then that is the principle or nature, which is an ultimate truth. Therefore, for the Enumerators the very nature of the occasion of the son is not the nature of the occasion of not being the son or the father. They cannot be the one entity at the same time.

The Enumerators quote from a text, saying that the supreme nature of qualities does not become something visible; that which becomes visible is without any essence like an illusion. They are saying that the supreme nature of qualities is not visible, and that what is visible is like an illusion. That which can be seen by the eyes is actually an illusion. They say that nature is accepted as something that does not become visible, and the directly visible father and son and the like are accepted as illusory.

The Madhyamika respond that from this the point of view, the very father becomes the son, and the very son becomes the father, because both their natures are one. This is the absurdity of your system. If that is the case:

Then, because the natures of the father and the son are accepted as one, it is also impossible to posit individual occasions in dependence on the basis.

So it is not possible to refer to individual occasions in dependence on the basis.

The next lines from the root text are:

*64cd. It is not seen as possessing
The nature of apprehending sound.*

65ab. If it is seen in a different guise

Like an actor, then it is not permanent.

The explanation in the commentary reads:

If the apprehension of sound is seen in the different manifestation of the apprehension of form, just like an actor who puts on a new costume upon having abandoned the earlier costume, then it follows that the consciousness knowledge is not a permanent functionality because it takes on a different mode upon abandoning another one.

According to the Samkhyas, the apprehension of sound is seen in the different manifestations of the apprehension of form, just like an actor who puts on a new costume upon having abandoned the earlier costume.

The Samkhyas assert that there is only one consciousness. When engaging through the eyes the consciousness will see forms; when engaging through the ears the consciousness will hear sounds; when engaging through the nose the consciousness will smell odours; and the same with taste and so forth. So there is only one consciousness but function through the five senses. There are no separate consciousnesses that apprehend the different sense objects. One analogy is that it is like a person in a house who looks out through the different windows of the house.

The Madhyamika assert that there are different consciousnesses that perceive the different sense objects. Thus, there are the five sense consciousnesses plus the mental consciousness.

As mentioned earlier, the Samkhya assert that there is only one consciousness. They use the analogy of an actor who changes their costume in accordance with whatever role they have to play.

The Madhyamika refutation is that it follows that the consciousness knowledge is not a permanent functionality, because it takes on a different mode upon abandoning another one. How can you Samkhya assert that the consciousness is a permanent functionality if it changes its mode of apprehension, as you say, just like an actor changes their costume? You say that each time the consciousness perceives a different object it changes to that particular perception. So if there is a change occurring, then it goes against your assertion that it is permanent.

The next two lines of verse read:

*65cd. In case, 'the different guise is one
With it,' that is without precedent.*

Basically this is saying, such a thing has never been known before. Then the Enumerators say:

Enumerator: Because the apprehension of form, which is a different mode from the apprehension of sound, is of one nature with the apprehension of sound, there is no mistake.

Basically, according to the Enumerators there's no fault.

To this the Madhyamika say:

Madhyamaka: This one nature is without any earlier precedent because it only abides individually.

Further: It follows it is unsuitable to accept the later mode as said earlier mode itself – because the later one is one without any past. As it states in the Great Commentary.

If this very one is this very one at the time of later generation, then this one is without a past because they are accepted as mutually exclusive ones.

The Great Commentary says that If this very one is at the time of later generation, then this one is without a past because they are accepted as mutually exclusive. You are saying what was in the past is the same as now, yet you have also said that they are mutually exclusive. This absurdity is quite easy to understand.

The first two lines of the next verse read:

*66ab. If, 'The different mode is not true,'
It is its own nature I say.*

In reply the Enumerators begin by stating:

Enumerator: There is no fault because what appears in another mode is not true in the way it appears.

Then the Madhyamikas state:

Madhyamaka: It follows that you should, yet cannot, say that it is the singular true nature of that consciousness – because you accept that whatever mode appears, is not true in the way it appears.

Again this is quite clear. The Enumerator's assertion is that there is no fault, because what appears in another mode is not true in the way it appears.

The refutation presented by the Madhyamika is that it follows that you should, yet you cannot, say that it is the singular true nature of that consciousness – because you accept that whatever mode appears is not true in the way that it appears.

66cd. If you say, 'only consciousness', according To this it follows that all beings are one.

*67ab. Also the animate and inanimate
Become one because of their shared existence.*

Thus the Enumerators say:

Enumerator: Only the continuum of the knowledge consciousness person exists truly.

Then the Madhyamikas response to that is:

Madhyamaka: In this case, it follows that all people of different continua become one – because all people are accepted as partless permanent pervading entities.

It follows that also the animate knowledge consciousness and the inanimate matter and principle become one – because they are the same in existing as partless permanent pervading entities. Or, one relates it to the answer that their mere existing nature is true.

Again, this is a clear presentation. In response the Madhyamaka are saying that in this case, it follows that all people of different continua become one, which is an absurdity, because all people are accepted as partless permanent pervading entities. Then it follows that also the animate knowledge consciousness and the inanimate matter and principle become one as well, because they are the same in existing as partless permanent pervading entities according to you Samkhyas. That is the absurdity being presented here.

The next two lines of the verse read:

*67cd. When the particulars are distorted
Then what could be their shared basis?*

Then the commentary explains:

Consider: When the different particulars of expression are distorted falsities, then it follows that their concordant basis, the primary principle, which exists truly, also does not exist – because the expressions are false.

According to the Enumerators the primary principle exists truly, yet according to them, their expressions are false.

Madhyamaka: The primary principle, which exists truly, also does not exist because the expressions are false. So the absurdity is how could something that is true produce something that is false?

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

With the generation of the bodhicitta motivation, we can now engage in the teachings. The meditation preceding our motivation is a way to help strengthen our motivation. The purpose of generating the motivation is to dispel any improper intentions in our mind, and basically to help subdue the mind. The stronger the positive state of mind we generate, the more likely it is we will be able to benefit others. Then, in turn, the more we benefit others, the more it will help us increase our good qualities and get rid of our negativities, thus bringing us closer to enlightenment.

If we wish to become enlightened, we need to consider practical ways by which we can proceed to get closer to enlightenment. Benefiting others and shunning actions that will harm them is a practical means of getting closer to enlightenment. So, while we're aiming for the long-term goal of enlightenment, in the meantime, on a practical level, we'll be able to contribute to the well-being of ourselves and others.

I'm relating this specifically in relation to a recent practice that some older students have been doing, and where others contributed, which is the fire puja. I've heard it went very well, and that people really helped each other. I see this as a good sign that the intention of helping each other has improved.

On the other hand, if someone is going through some difficulty, or an incident occurs involving someone, then instead of looking for ways to ease that situation, there might be occasions when others add more to the story and elaborate on the incident, or continue to talk about it, or spread rumours, etc. That is something which I consider to be like poison; that's definitely of no use, no benefit, at all.

If the person experiencing the difficulty gets to hear those comments about them, that is going to put them off coming here. They would not want to come to a centre like that, where they feel people are judging them, or talking about them, or spreading rumours about them. They would not want to come here. This is how we, as a centre, begin to close our doors to some people.

For that particular individual, who had an interest to come here initially and then stopped coming because of some incident like that, it would have harmed their ability to progress. For the centre also, even losing one person from coming to the centre, is a loss. If fewer people come to the centre, naturally it weakens the strength of the centre. For a centre to grow, it needs more people coming regularly.

We may think it's only one individual, but in fact those who have a connection with that individual would also be put off coming to the centre. When I was up in Chenrezig, I used to mention that we should not underestimate the gravity of not caring for even one person, because when that one person is disappointed, it could prevent many others from coming as well.

What I am reminding you about, particularly those who have particular roles in the centre, is that it's very important to be mindful not to cause this kind of rift with people. In effect, it is a reminder for all of us to remember to try to put into practice Shantideva's incredible, practical advice. Shantideva has very effectively presented many methods and techniques, so whenever we have difficulties, we need to remember Shantideva's advice, and try to put it into practice.

One of our members who used to come regularly to the Centre, Susan, is not well now. As many of you will know, she is having difficulty with her breathing. I heard that some of the older students have taken the initiative to help out and go and visit and help in whatever way. When I heard that, I was very pleased, I feel that that is a very good sign of caring for each other.

When I hear about others caring in this way for those in need of help, it makes me feel good that a positive outcome of the Dharma is taking effect, through them giving such practical help and benefit. From my side, I've now reached an age where it's hard for me to go and do service in this way, but if there's others who can do this, it is good to maintain such service to others; I feel that there's a good legacy occurring here.

However, there have been many who have commented that my advice and the teachings that I present are helpful for others. So, I guess this is one way I'm contributing to helping others!

When I was at the Drolkar Centre last Sunday, there were a few who came up to me afterwards to thank me and made comments about how they were very touched and really enjoyed the teachings. Some even made comments later, saying how moved and touched they were seeing us having lunch together joyfully – laughing and in good spirit; apparently some were moved to tears. This shows that they had felt the good connection amongst the people there.

It's good for you to also consider that I am not just using words for the sake of sounding good, or making a lot of noise with no effect, as there are in fact those who feel the benefit. I'm just reassuring you that there is some benefit from what I share in the teachings.

2.3.1.2. Refuting the intellectually acquired self

2.3.1.2.2. Refuting the self asserted to be matter by the Particularists

In the earlier section, we covered the Samkhya's or Enumerators' views. This next section deals with the Particularists.

The verse relating to this is:

68. *The inanimate is also not the self
Because it is inanimate, like a vase.
Then if, 'because it is endowed with consciousness
It is conscious,' it follows not knowing is eliminated.*

The commentary reads:

The self posited as matter without mind by the Naiyayika and Particularists is also not the self since it is inanimate, e.g., like a vase.

The Particularists say that:

Particularists: Although the self itself is matter, it possesses mind by way of compounded relation, and therefore one posits it as knowing objects.

The Madhyamikas' answer to that is:

Madhyamika: It follows the phenomenon of the self truly not previously knowing objects is then eliminated – because it knows objects through the power of subsequent other phenomena.

What is being presented is quite clear. We've also covered some of these points earlier. The main point is that the Particularists don't assert the self as being consciousness; for them the self is the aggregates. Therefore, they posit the self to be matter, rather than consciousness.

Their assertion of the self as matter is actually refuted by the Madhyamikas in the very opening line of the commentary, where it says: the self posited as matter without mind by the Naiyayika and Particularists is also not a self – in other words, what the Particularists posit to be a self is in fact not really a self – because it is inanimate – meaning that it doesn't have a mind. The example given is like a vase – so, the Madhyamikas are saying that this self that you posit is in fact no different to other objects of matter, such as a vase. Because the self you posit lacks a mind, it cannot be asserted as a person.

The Particularists respond by saying, although the self itself is matter, it possesses a mind by way of compounded relation. Basically, this means that, although the self is matter, because of its inter-relationship with other factors it comes to have a mind, and therefore, they posit the self to knowing objects. So, in dependence on 'other', the self will have a consciousness – and know objects. They also agree that a person or self has to be an object possessor and thus know objects.

The Madhyamikas then refute that assertion by saying, it follows the phenomenon of the self truly not previously knowing objects is then eliminated – because it knows objects through the power of subsequent other phenomena. In other words, what the Particularists posit as a self, which is matter and not consciousness, does not know objects previously; only by coming into relationship with something else does it come to know objects. Prior to that, the self does not know the object.

While the Particularists posit the self as matter, they also posit it as being permanent. So, the Madhyamikas say that if, due to coming into contact with other factors, the self becomes an object possessor that knows things, then it has basically changed from the earlier self – that is, the self prior to coming into contact with other factors.

We can see the meticulous logic that the Madhyamika uses here to refute the Particularists' assertions. We should study these methods of logic, basically refuting and making counter arguments to the earlier positions and so forth. Such logic is meticulous. It is good for us to relate to this as a way of enhancing our own reasoning and logic.

Because people resort to arguments in many situations, one may as well learn the skills to present a logical argument. Especially when two people live together it seems that they end up having many arguments, so perhaps it's good to know how to carry out the arguments well, using logic. If you have previously learned how to use logic, you might even win an argument with your partner! (laughter)

The next verse is:

69. *If there is nothing that becomes the self,
How does the mind affect it?
Thus, devoid of consciousness and action,
Space has been made the self.*

The commentary explains:

If one accepts that the self does not even have the slightest change, then how does the mind affect the self so that the self knows objects? It follows the self is not affected – because it is accepted that the self is not changeable.

After this the commentary presents a summary:

Summary: Because the self is accepted as lacking consciousness and action, one has effectively accepted space to be self, which makes it pointless to accept - as such a self cannot act in any beneficial or harmful manner.

When the commentary states if one accepts that the self does not even have the slightest change ..., it is referring to the assertion of the Particularists that the self is permanent. So they are effectively accepting that the self does not have the slightest change. The contradiction presented here by the Madhyamika is, how then does the mind affect the self so that the self knows objects? The Particularists assert that, while the self is matter, it is when it comes into contact with a consciousness that it knows objects. The Madhyamikas are asking, how is it possible for that change to occur if the self is permanent? How can the self later become an object possessor, when in fact you accept the self to be unchangeable?

The Madhyamikas' reasoning is then presented further: ... it follows the self is not affected, because it is accepted that the self is not changeable. Thus, the contradiction of the Particularists' assertion is presented.

From the Prasangika Madhyamika point of view – which we would claim is the point of view we adhere to – in relation to the self as knowing objects, although we would not say that the self is consciousness, we can still infer that the person knows things. Even from the normal conventional point of view, we would say that a person knows things, and that is because a person possesses a mind.

Some lower schools assert the self as being consciousness, but from the Prasangika Madhyamika point of view, the self is neither consciousness nor matter. While the self itself is not consciousness, it doesn't contradict that the self knows things. This is a significant point that we need to understand.

The summary of the Madhyamika argument is quite clear. It says that because the self is accepted as lacking consciousness and action, the Particularists have effectively accepted space to be self. If a self can be posited as lacking consciousness and not doing any action, that basically fits the criteria of empty space. So, you could effectively say that space is the self.

If that were the case, it is pointless to accept such a self because it cannot act in any beneficial or harmful manner. What the Madhyamikas are pointing out here is the contradiction that, if you were to posit a self that does not have any benefit or harm whatsoever, what is the point of even being a self? How can such a self even exist?

2.3.1.3. REFUTING OBJECTIONS TO THE REFUTATION

These are subdivided into two:

2.3.1.3.1. Refuting the objection that karmic cause and effect become invalid

2.3.1.3.2 Refuting the objection that meditation on compassion becomes invalid

With these particular non-Buddhist schools, we can see that they do believe in karma, because the objections they present here are that: "According to you Prasangika Madhyamikas, karmic cause and effect becomes invalid". This indicates that these schools do adhere to the notion of karmic cause and effect, as well as meditation on compassion, and so they value the need to meditate on compassion.

2.3.1.3.1. Refuting the objection that karmic cause and effect become invalid

This is divided into two:

2.3.1.3.1.1. Objection

2.3.1.3.1.2. Answer

2.3.1.3.1.1. Objection

The verse reads:

70. *If it is said, 'In case the self does not exist, Then karmic cause and effect relationships are invalid.
If one disintegrates upon creating karma,
Whose karma does it become?'*

From the commentary:

Argument: If the non-existence of the self, which becomes the basis for all bondage and liberation, is taken as momentary generation and disintegration of all functionalities, then virtuous and non-virtuous karmas and the relation to their results are invalid. If the person disintegrates in the next moment upon having created virtuous or non-virtuous karma, then whose karmic creation does it subsequently become? At the time of experiencing the result, the creator of the karma does not exist. If you say however according to our view the person is permanent [...].¹

Here the non-Buddhist Particularist schools are presenting a meticulously argued objection to the Prasangika Madhyamika. They say that the self in their system is a permanent self and begin their objection by saying, if the non-existence of the self, which becomes or is the basis for all bondage and liberation ... Here we can see that they have a concept of bondage and liberation, just as we have in the Buddhist system. Indeed, the Particularists assert that the self or person is the basis of bondage to cyclic existence, or being in samsara, and so becoming liberated is actually dependent on the self. So in that sense, the self is the basis of liberation.

The Particularists' objection to the Prasangika point of view continues: ... then virtuous and non-virtuous karmas and the relation to their results are invalid. If the person disintegrates in the next moment upon having created virtuous or non-virtuous karma, then whose karmic creation does it subsequently become? At the time of experiencing the result, the creator of the karma does not exist.

In other words, if you, the Prasangika, say that the self doesn't exist, then who is it that actually creates the karma?

It is undeniable that the consequence of a karmic effect is experienced by the same person who created it. However, the Particularists argue that, because the person who creates the karma is the one who experiences the effect later, this invalidates the Prasangika view, which asserts a self as being impermanent. If the self were impermanent and disintegrated from moment to moment, say the Particularists, who is the person experiencing the karmic effects created earlier?

We need to understand that, from the point of view of the Prasangika system and indeed all Buddhist schools, after the first moment in which a person creates karma, in the next moment that earlier moment will have disintegrated. The next moment after the karma is created, the action of the karma has ceased or disintegrated, but what does remain is the seed or imprint of the karma created earlier. The imprint is thus left on the continuum of the person's consciousness. As the continuum is carried forward, and when that seed later matures, one experiences the result of the karma.

Therefore, we need to understand that the reason why the Particularists feel they must assert the person as permanent is because, according to them, if the person were impermanent then, when the person who creates the karma disintegrates, that person will not experience the effects of the karma that was created earlier. Because to them it is the same person, and that is why they feel there is no alternative other than to accept the person as permanent.

2.3.1.3.1.2. Answer

The first verse and a half is presented first:

71. *The bases of action and result are different,
And although the creator self does not exist,
Since this is the same for both of us,
Isn't this debate here pointless?*

72ab. *It is impossible to see what you say,
That the cause is endowed with the result.*

The commentary explains:

Since it is established for both of us that the persons who are the basis at the causal time of creating the action, and at the resultant time of experiencing the result are of different substance, and that at the time of experiencing the result the self who created the karma does not exist, isn't your debate here at this time of explaining the relationship between karmic cause and effect pointless? You also accept that at the causal time of creating the karma the experience of the result is not there, and that at the time of experiencing the result, the creator of the karma is not there. If this becomes a fault, then it also applies to you. Additionally, your observation that the one endowed with the cause at the time of creating the cause is endowed with the experience of the result, this observation is impossible.

In presenting the answer here, the Madhyamikas say: since it is established for both of us that the persons who are the basis at the causal time of creating the action, and at the resultant time of experiencing the result are of different substance ... In other words, they would also assert that the person that experienced the result of the karma is different to the one who created it, in so far that they are of different substances.

The Madhyamikas continue: ... and that at the time of experiencing the result the self who created the karma does not exist, isn't your debate here at this time of explaining the relationship between karmic cause and effect pointless? You also accept that at the causal time of creating the karma the experience of the result is not there, and that at the time of experiencing the result, the creator of the karma is not there. If this becomes a fault,

¹ Note: the [...] denotes the commentary's continuity with verses 71–74, the answers to the Particularists' argument then it also applies to you. Additionally, your observation that the one endowed with the cause at the time of creating the cause is endowed with the experience of the result, this observation is impossible.

The Particularists then ask the question of the Prasangika Madhyamika:

Particularists: How is it then in your school?

Basically, they are asking, how do you assert the person that experiences both karmic cause and result?

The next two lines from the verse are:

*72cd. In dependence on one continuum,
We refer to agent and engager.*

The Madhyamika response is:

Madhyamika: In dependence on one continuum of aggregates we refer to the agent who creates the karma and the engager of the result. That called a continuum is the taker, which possesses parts, possessing that taken, the parts of the earlier, intermediate and later moments. In brief, it is valid to say this person creates karma, as well as experiences karma, but nobody can posit a cause and effect to be simultaneous.

As presented here, the Madhyamika school is saying that, in dependence on one continuum of aggregates we refer to the agent who creates the karma and the engager of the result. The continuum particularly refers to the continuum of the consciousness that goes from one life to the next. Within the aggregates, it is basically the consciousness that continues from one life to the next. Therefore, the creator of karma in this life is said to be the continuum of the same consciousness in the next life that experiences the result. That is how we posit a person who experiences the karmic consequences – a continuum of consciousness.

What is presented next is quite clear: That called a continuum is the taker, which possesses parts, possessing that taken, the parts of the earlier, intermediate and later moments. Here, the Madhyamika is positing the continuum as that which includes the earlier parts, the middle parts, and the later parts. That which possesses all of these is what they call a continuum.

The commentary continues, in brief, it is valid to say this person creates karma, as well as experiences karma. Here, it is valid means that, based on the continuum of the person, it is tenable or valid to posit that it is the same person who creates the karma, and also experiences the results or consequences of the karma. The Madhyamikas continue, but nobody can posit a cause and effect to be simultaneous. What is being emphasised here is that while the Madhyamikas assert that it is the continuum of a consciousness that experiences the effects of karma, the creation of karma and the resultant experience cannot be at the same time, as it is not possible for a cause and effect to be simultaneous.

It is important for us to get a good understanding of this point, because often we think that we experience an immediate effect, simultaneous with an action, and that whatever we do brings an immediate result.

The remaining two verses are presented are:

*73. The past and future minds
Are not the self because they do not exist.
Then, if the generated mind is the self
Because it disintegrates, again there is no self.*

*74. For example, like the banana tree,
When taken apart nothing is there.*

*Similarly, when looking with analysis
Also the self is not absolute.*

The commentary then presents the meaning:

The past and future minds are not the self or exist as self because they disintegrate and do not generate and therefore do not exist as self. Then, if the generated present mind were the self, as it disintegrates in the next moment, again the self asserted by you does not exist. For example, when the banana tree is separated into its parts, there is nothing there that exists inherently. Likewise, if one searches with logical analysis whether something is established inherently or not, then also the self does not exist in an absolute manner, because such a self is harmed by the reasoning that establishes the selflessness of a person that is explained below.

What the Madhyamika is presenting here is again quite clear: the past and future minds are not the self or exist as self because they disintegrate and do not generate and therefore do not exist as self. We can all accept that, if something happened in the past, then the very fact that it happened previously means that it doesn't exist right now. And the very fact that something is yet to come in the future, means that it doesn't exist now, so therefore it cannot exist inherently and permanently.

Having refuted the Particularists' assertion of the past mind as being a self and the future mind as being a self, the Madhyamika continue that, if the generated present mind were the self... – that is, if you were to assert the present mind is the self, then that also is invalid. The commentary explains, if the generated present mind were the self, as it disintegrates in the next moment, again the self asserted by you does not exist. So the mind of the past has been refuted as being the self, the mind to be generated in the future is refuted as the self, and even the present mind is also refuted as the self.

If you were to investigate in this way, you will not find an inherently existent self. Here, the Madhyamikas present the example of a banana tree, which is made up of different layers. If you were to peel off each layer to try to find the essence of the banana tree, you would actually discover that there is no such real, solid core to be found. Using that as an example, the commentary says that likewise, when one searches using logical analysis to find whether something is established inherently or not, the self, too, does not exist in the same way. If you were to investigate and analyse whether an inherently existent self exists, you could not possibly find such a self.

The commentary also mentions here that, because such a self is harmed by the reasoning that establishes the selflessness of a person that is explained below. In other words, when the logical reasoning of selflessness is presented, that will establish that there is no such inherently existent self.

2.3.1.3.2 Refuting the objection that meditation on compassion becomes invalid

75. If it is said, 'If there is no sentient being,

The Realists first present their objection:

Realist: If there is absolutely no inherently existing person, then, as there is no focal object for compassion, for whom should one practise meditation on compassion?

The Madhyamika answers:

Madhyamika: Although there is no inherently existing person, it follows there is no such fault that the focal object of compassion is non-existent – because that nominally existing sentient being, labelled by mental confusion, which is accepted for the purpose of achieving the result of liberation, is valid to be the focal object of compassion.

If one relates the ‘labelled by mental confusion’ to the true-grasping at person and phenomena then, since they label the person as truly existent and one refutes that it exists the way it is labelled, the sentient being is not refuted. By having refuted this, the sentient being is established as existing only in mere name, as an imputed existent.

Further, if one relates the mental confusion merely to ignorance, then the sentient being that becomes labelled by it exists as the focal object of compassion.

Here, where it says that if there is absolutely no inherently existing person, this objection will not relate to the lower Buddhist schools – the Vaibhashika, the Sautrantika, the Cittamatra or Mind Only, and the Svatantrika Madhyamika Middle Way school. All of these accept an inherently existent person.

The Realists’ objection to the Prasangika’s earlier argument is that, if there is absolutely no inherently existing person, then, as there is no focal object for compassion, for whom should one practise meditation on compassion? This implies that for them, if a person does not exist inherently, then a person could not possibly exist at all. They’re arguing that if, according to the Prasangika Madhyamika, a person doesn’t exist, then who is the object of compassion?

The Madhyamikas say, although there is no inherently existing person, it follows there is no such fault that the focal object of compassion is non-existent. The reasoning follows, because that nominally existing sentient being, labelled by mental confusion, which is accepted for the purpose of achieving the result of liberation, is valid to be the focal object of compassion.

The explanation here is that, when mental confusion or ignorance labels the person as being truly or inherently existent, that is what is called the misconception of true grasping at the person, or grasping at an inherently existent person. When phenomena are apprehended as truly or inherently existent, that is labelled as true grasping at phenomena. That is how the apprehension of grasping at an inherently existent person or phenomena comes about.

As the person and phenomena are labelled wrongly by mental confusion in this way, when the inherently existent person is eliminated, the person itself isn’t eliminated – the nominally existent person remains.

The commentary continues, since they label, meaning the mental confusion labelling the person as truly existent, one refutes that it exists in the way that it is labelled by the mental confusion. When that inherent existence is refuted, the sentient being is however not eliminated.

How, then, is a sentient being labelled? Having refuted the truly or inherently existent person, the sentient being is established as existing only in mere name, as an imputed existent. This is according to the Prasangika. In other words, the person is what is referred to as an ‘imputed existent’, meaning it exists merely by label, or by imputation. It does not exist from its own side, but is merely labelled; it exists by mere name, or imputation.

So, the person is merely labelled upon the basis of imputation, which is the aggregates, and thus exists and functions based on that imputation or label on the aggregates. That is how it exists – not existing from the side of the aggregates, but as a label on the aggregates. That is why a person is referred to as an imputed existence.

The next verse reads:

76. *Without sentient beings whose result is it?
True, but even though, it is posited from mental confusion.
For the purpose of pacifying suffering
Do not stop the resultant mental confusion.*

The commentary explains:

Realists: If there is no sentient being then, because the meditation on compassion loses its result, the buddha resulting from the meditation on compassion is the attainment of which person?

Madhyamika: Although it is true that these causes and effects do not exist truly, it is not contradictory to meditate on compassion that arises from nominal confusion about phenomena.

For the purpose of pacifying the sufferings of sentient beings one should not stop the non-afflictive mental confusion at the time of the subsequent attainment of having attained the resultant buddha. One cannot stop it adventitiously, and although one does not stop it, if one relates this branch of the method for attaining complete enlightenment to the delusion regarding suchness, then it is a delusion of true existence.

One can relate it to the compassion of merely focusing on sentient beings that have not been characterised as lacking true existence, and to the compassion focusing on phenomena, being explained as becoming the cause of enlightenment.

Otherwise the meaning² is that nominalities such as the focusing on only mind by those not realising suchness is not something to be abandoned.

The Realists’ objection here is, if there is no sentient being ..., which, of course, is not what the Prasangika is saying at all. The Prasangika say that there is no inherently existent sentient being, but they do not take that as being the non-existence of sentient beings. The Realists, however, object that, because the meditation on compassion loses its result, the buddha resulting from the meditation on compassion is the attainment of which person? This is a rhetorical question.

The Madhyamikas present their answer by saying that although it is true that these causes and effects do not exist truly, it is not contradictory to meditate on compassion that arises from nominal confusion about phenomena. Further, for the purpose of pacifying the sufferings of sentient beings one should not stop the non-afflictive mental confusion at the time of the subsequent attainment of having attained the resultant buddha.

These are actually very meticulous explanations. If we pay attention to this, it actually relates to our situation, so it is a significant point to understand. While one has not yet completely overcome the misapprehension, or misconception of true existence, by merely focusing on sentient beings, one can still generate compassion. This is the point.

As it mentioned here, one cannot stop it adventitiously, and although one does not stop it, if one relates this branch of the method for attaining complete enlightenment to the delusion regarding suchness, then it is a delusion of true existence. While one has not yet overcome the misconception of grasping at true existence or inherent existence, it is still necessary to develop compassion towards sentient beings. There are three levels of generating compassion: one merely focuses on sentient beings; the next focuses on sentient beings seeing them with the characteristic of being impermanent; and the third focuses on sentient beings seeing them with the characteristic of being empty of inherent existence, i.e. lacking a truly or inherently existent self.

² ... of the third and fourth line of verse 76 is ...

The commentary explains, one can relate it to the compassion of merely focusing on sentient beings that have not been characterised as lacking true existence, and to the compassion focusing on phenomena, being explained as becoming the cause of enlightenment. The compassion focusing on phenomena is that which sees sentient beings with the characteristic of them being impermanent.

So, while one has not yet overcome the misapprehension of grasping at truly existent or inherently existent sentient beings, one can still generate compassion for sentient beings by focusing on them merely as sentient beings, or focusing on them as impermanent phenomena.

The commentary further says, otherwise the meaning is that nominalities such as the focusing on only mind by those not realising suchness is not something to be abandoned.

The next verse is:

77. *Pride is the cause of suffering,
Which increases due to delusion regarding the self.
If, 'This cannot be reversed,'
The meditation on selflessness is superior.*

Realist: Why was the mental confusion including the object refuted earlier?

Madhyamika: As was shown earlier in the statement, 'It becomes the cause for cyclic existence', the pride that becomes the cause for cyclic existence, i.e. afflictive ignorance, fabricated the self, and the sufferings of cyclic existence increase. There is no contradiction that the pride needs to be stopped, and can be stopped.

The next argument is:

Argument: There is no stopping of true-grasping aside from stopping this kind of mental confusion, and it cannot be stopped. Although one stops it once, because it arises again, similar to the circling aggregates, it cannot be eliminated completely.

Madhyamika: It is not impossible to abandon true-grasping. It is distorted with regard to the mode of abiding of functionalities, and hence it is very weak and inferior, and the meditation on selflessness is superior compared to it. Because it realises the mode of abiding of functionalities faultlessly, the other can be eliminated from the root.

So, the Realists ask, why was the mental confusion including the object refuted earlier? And the Madhyamikas reply by saying, as was shown earlier in the statement, because 'It becomes the cause for cyclic existence', the pride that becomes the cause for cyclic existence, i.e. afflictive ignorance fabricates the existence of the self, and thus the sufferings of cyclic existence increase. There is no contradiction as this pride needs to be stopped, and can be stopped.

After the Madhyamikas explain why mental confusion including the object was refuted earlier, the non-Buddhist Realists present the next argument that, there is no stopping of true-grasping aside from stopping this kind of mental confusion, and it cannot be stopped. Although one stops it once, because it arises again, similar to the circling aggregates, it cannot be eliminated completely, so this is their argument.

The Madhyamikas answer, it is not impossible to abandon true-grasping, and the reason follows: It is distorted with regards to the mode of abiding of functionalities, and hence it is very weak and inferior, and the meditation on selflessness is superior compared to it.

I've presented this reasoning in more detail in previous teachings. For those of you who can recall them and can refer to the teachings, it will be quite clear.

As the Madhyamikas concisely mention here, it is distorted with regard to the mode of abiding of functionalities. So, true-grasping is distorted in relation to the actual mode of things, of functionalities, because it is based on falsity and distortion, hence it is very weak and inferior. The meditation on selflessness is superior compared to it. Thus, because the meditation on selflessness is superior, it has the ability to completely destroy true-grasping. The commentary concludes, because it realises the mode of abiding of functionalities faultlessly, the other can be eliminated from the root.

2.3.2. Explaining extensively the reasoning that establishes the selflessness of phenomena

We can leave that for our next session.

It is good to read the text slowly, and then revisit it again. Based on the teachings we've received, we can actually get a good understanding. When we refer to one text and get a good understanding of that, one can relate to other texts. That will also help us to get good understanding.

When we begin to understand and grasp the meaning of the texts we read, we will then begin to really enjoy the text. We will reach a point where we don't want to put the text down, but continue reading it. Without a textbook around, one would feel lonely!

Not only will we be able to derive the meaning while reading the text, even after we put the textbook down, we will still be thinking about certain points, reflecting on the meaning and getting more understanding and insight from the passages we have read.

As usual, let's spend some time in meditation.

[Meditation]

Now based on a bodhicitta motivation, we can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings.

2.3.2. Explaining extensively the reasoning that establishes the selflessness of phenomena

Earlier, the selflessness of persons was established with various reasons. Now what is being established is the selflessness of phenomena. To get a good understanding of the explanation of the selflessness of persons and phenomena, consider it from this perspective: if there were to be a self of a person, how would it exist? Think, why is the person empty of an inherently existent self? Likewise with phenomena, if there were to be an inherently existent self or phenomena, how would it exist? Why are phenomena empty of existing inherently? One needs to first clearly understand what is being refuted in order to understand what is being established.

Explaining the selflessness of phenomena has three subdivisions:

2.3.2.1. Explaining the selflessness of phenomena by way of the four close placements by mindfulness

2.3.2.2. Refuting the argument that the two truths would be invalid

2.3.2.3. Stating the reasons that establish selflessness

2.3.2.1. EXPLAINING THE SELFLESSNESS OF PHENOMENA BY WAY OF THE FOUR CLOSE PLACEMENTS BY MINDFULNESS

This is subdivided into four, which are the four placements that I have explained previously:

2.3.2.1.1. Meditating on the close placement by mindfulness on the body

2.3.2.1.2. The close placement by mindfulness on feelings

2.3.2.1.3. The close placement of mindfulness on the mind

2.3.2.1.4. The close placement by mindfulness on phenomena

2.3.2.1.1. Meditating on the close placement by mindfulness on the body.

Meditating on the close placement by mindfulness on the body in general would relate to, for example, meditating on the impure nature of the body. However here it specifically relates to meditating on the selflessness of the body.

This is subdivided into four categories:

2.3.2.1.1.1 Comprehending that the body which possesses parts lacks inherent existence

2.3.2.1.1.2 Comprehending that the parts lack inherent existence

2.3.2.1.1.3 Thus, attachment to the dream-like body lacking inherent existence is unsuitable

2.3.2.1.1.4 This also establishes the person as lacking inherent existence

The earlier reasoning of the selflessness of person also applies here as well. The reasoning why the person was established as lacking a self is that if there were to be a self of a person then it would have to be findable on the basis of imputation, i.e. the aggregates. Similarly, if the body were to exist inherently, then it would also have to be findable on the basis of the imputation of the body, which are the parts and collections of what makes up the body. The same logic applies for both the self of person and the body.

The specific explanation here relates to the assertion made by the Mind Only and Svatantrika Madhyamika school, in which they say, when investigated, an inherently person is found upon basis of imputation. Likewise an inherently existent body can be found on the basis of its imputation. That is how the Mind Only and the Svatantrika Middle Way School actually establish an inherently existent self of a person and the aggregates/body. Here, according to the Prasangika, what is refuted is an inherently existent person and body; neither can be found as existing inherently when searched for on the basis their imputation.

The key point to understand here is that what cannot be found is an inherently existent body. This is then established as the emptiness of the body. This is not to be confused with investigating the body and not finding the body itself; the lack of a body is not the emptiness of the body. But investigating the misconception of an inherently existent body, and not finding it is established as the emptiness of the body.

Thus, according to the Prasangika, the reason an inherently existent person and body does not exist is because if it were to exist, the physical aggregates would have to exist without depending on causes and conditions and any of its parts. Therefore the ability for something to exist that does not depend on either its causes and conditions, or its parts, is the proof that it does not exist inherently. While the lower schools would not accept that things exist without depending on causes and conditions at all, they do establish that things exist inherently, from their own side.

The Prasangika assert that the lack of true existence, inherent existence, and the lack of autonomous independent existence all come to the same point. That is, if they were to exist independently or inherently or autonomously, they would have to exist without depending on causes and conditions or any of its parts. Functional things are dependent on causes and conditions, whereas non-compounded phenomena, for example space, depend on its directional parts. This is how the lack of inherent existence is established, because all phenomena depend on either their causes and conditions or their parts.

In simple terms, the Prasangika are saying to the Mind Only and Svatantrika: you say that having investigated you can find an inherently existent person and aggregates, however we say that this cannot be found.

After investigating, if the person or aggregate is found to exist without depending on either its causes, conditions or parts, then we would accept that there is an inherently existent person and body, but that is simply not possible.

2.3.2.1.1.1 Comprehending that the body which possesses the parts lacks inherent existence

The commentary explains:

It follows the body does not exist inherently - because if it existed inherently, then an example of the body should be findable in the individual limbs of the body, in the collection of the accumulated parts or as a different entity from these, but it is not found.

Argument: The collection of all the accumulated parts is the body. What doubt is there about this?

Madhyamaka: Because one labels the body in dependence on the collection, the collection of the parts of the body is unsuitable to be the body. If it is not like this, then one needs to accept a final partless particle.

The commentary first presents the reasoning for why there is no inherently existent body. If you can get a good understanding of this reasoning, then you can apply it to all the rest. Just as it states in The Heart Sutra: 'correctly and repeatedly beholding those five aggregates also as empty of inherent nature', similarly this is to be applied to all other phenomena. Thus, it is good to have a clear understanding of what it means to lack inherent existence.

The first syllogism the commentary presents is, It follows the body does not exist inherently - because if it existed inherently, then an example of the body should be findable in the individual limbs of the body, in the collection of the accumulated parts or as a different entity from these. But it is not found either within the parts or as a different entity from them. An inherently existent body would have to be found, but it cannot be found. That's the reason being presented.

Then the non-Buddhist school says, The collection of all the accumulated parts is the body. What doubt is there about this? So they are saying that the collection itself can be posited as the body. The Madhyamika refute this by saying, because one labels the body in dependence on the collection and without the collection one cannot even use the label 'body'. It continues that, the collection of the parts of the body is unsuitable to be the body. If it is not like this, then one needs to accept a final partless particle, meaning that if this were to be the case, by default one would have to assert that there is a partless particle, which cannot be the case.

The verses read:

78. *The body is not the feet or calves,
The thighs and waist are also not the body,
The stomach and back are also not the body,
The chest and upper arms are also not the body,
The rib cage and hands are also not the body,*
79. *The armpits and shoulders are also not the body,
The internal organs are also not it.
If also head and neck are not the body,
Then what of this is the body?*

The commentary explains the meaning of the verses as follows:

Thus, when one analyses whether and how the basis of engagement for the label that expresses 'body' exists from the side of the body itself: The feet and calves of the person are not the body of the person, the thighs and waist are also not the body, and also the stomach and back are not the body because the body of the person is labelled in dependence on these. The chest and upper arms are also not the body, the rib cage and hands are also not the body, the armpits and shoulders are also not the body and the internal organs are also not it. If also the head and neck are not the body, then which of these parts is the body? Not any of them. Because also their collection is not the body or any different entity from these, the body does not exist inherently.

The statement When one analyses whether and how the basis of engagement for the label that expresses 'body' exists from the side of the body itself, is making the point that if the body were to exist inherently, it would have to exist from its own side. There is nowhere else it could exist inherently apart from the parts or the collection of the body. Then the following investigation applies: if the body were to exist from its own side then going through each part of the body, one would investigate whether that part is the inherently existent body.

The reasoning presented here refutes an inherently existent body after having searched for it. Even conventionally, any normal person would be able to accept that the feet and calves of the person are not the body of the person. Clearly, we can all accept that the feet and calves are not by themselves the body. Likewise, the thighs and the waist are also not the body and also the stomach and back in itself are not the body, because the body of the person is labelled in dependence on these. So these are not individually the body because what is labelled as 'body' is a combination of all of these. The commentary goes on, The chest and upper arms are also not the body, the rib cage and hands are also not the body, the armpits and shoulders are also not the body and the internal organs are also not it. If also the head and neck are not the body, then which of these parts is the body?

For an individual meditating on the emptiness of the body, the process is to first investigate whether the body exists inherently or not. That investigation is based on what appears as a body, meditating on whether each and every part are inherently existing parts of the body or not, and whether the collection of these parts make up an inherently existent body or not? When an individual employs this method to realise the emptiness of the body, they come to the conclusion that an inherently existent body is nowhere to be found. Not finding an inherently existent body is in fact realising the selflessness and emptiness of the body. So the investigative meditation and realisation is not based on negating a body, but rather negating an inherently existent body. This is the main point to be understood.

When one first conducts an actual meditation on the emptiness of the body, doing it in a proper way, one can come to a really good understanding of the emptiness of the body. To begin with, if the body were not empty of inherent existence, then it means that it would have to exist inherently. So first one needs to get a good understanding of how the body would exist if it did exist inherently. If the body exists inherently, then it can only exist upon either the collection of, or the parts of the body. There is nowhere else an inherently existent body could exist. Thus one investigates the various parts that make up the body, and going through each one comes to the conclusion that there is no inherently existent body, neither the parts nor the collection of the body itself can be found as being inherently existent. At a certain point one experiences a sense of vacuity, just like empty space, and it is at that point one maintains one's focus on this vacuity. Having done the earlier profound investigation, it is at this point that one gets a true sense of the lack of an inherently existent body. It is said that when one reaches this stage one should not engage in further analysis, but rather just maintain that awareness of emptiness and meditate on it. This establishes a really good understanding from which you can get closer to the actual realisation of emptiness.

While these points will be explained further on, I will now present the common understanding we have of a person which actually shows one's own wrong perception. It is good to begin to recognise one's own mistaken view when one perceives an individual person, or their body.

When we see the body of a person how does it appear to us? We have an instinctive notion that the body actually exists from its own side, independently of causes and conditions, and we grasp onto that appearance in the belief that the body actually exists in that way, i.e. as existing from its own side. That is the misconception of apprehending a truly existent body. There is no other misconception of true existence other than how we normally perceive and apprehend the body, instinctively grasping onto a body as existing from its own side.

So the body that appears to us as existing from its own side is actually completely mistaken. An individual person, and their body, cannot exist independently from its own side. What we call 'a person and their aggregates' is merely imputed by mind. Therefore they are known as imputed phenomena.

This is really the key point of the Prasangika view as presented by Chandrakirti and Nagarjuna: that persons and phenomena are merely imputed by the mind, and that all existence is merely imputed and labelled by the mind. When one gets a good understanding of this point, one is getting closer to the real understanding of the correct view – the fact that things are merely imputed by mind.

When one has an inkling that there is no substantial existence, but rather that the body is merely imputed by mind, then all the attractive attributes of the body also start to disintegrate within one's mind, and thus one's attachment to the body also disintegrates. This how we need to understand that the right view of emptiness is the optimum means to overcome one's delusions such as attachment and so forth. As explained in the teachings, when one comes close to the correct understanding of emptiness, it begins to shatter the core of cyclic existence and one's delusions. This is the key point in the explanation here.

To summarise the earlier part, the commentary says, Because also their collection is not the body or any different entity from these, the body does not exist inherently.

The next argument is then presented: The coarse body is of a different entity from the limbs and parts.

This suggests that some think the 'coarse body' is of a different entity from the limbs and parts. The following verses are a way to refute this view.

The first two verses read:

80. *In case this body abides
In all parts individually
Then of course the parts abide in parts.
How can it abide in itself?*
81. *In case the entire entity of the body
Abides in the hands and so forth,
However many limbs such as hands,
Are found, they become bodies.*

The commentary explains the meaning of these two verses as follows.

Madhyamaka: If there is such a coarse body that possesses parts, and it is of a different entity from the parts, does then each part of that coarse body individually abide in one of the parts, such as one part in the hand, one part in the calves and so forth, or does the whole part-possessor [the body] abide in each of the parts without being divided up?

If one looks at the first, as the part-possessor [or body] pervades hands and so forth, with each part abiding on the respective part, then it would become infinite for each part, e.g. the hand has again parts such as the fingers, which then would also abide in their respective parts.

If the part-possessor [the body] is partless, then there are no individual parts that can abide in the individual parts. Rather, as in the later examination, the whole entity would abide in each of the parts of the complete body, and there would therefore be as many bodies as there are parts. As the parts would not touch the body, it is solely false and not in the slightest truly existent.

Then a summary is presented.

82. *If there is no body inside or out,
Then how is there a body in the hands and other parts?
If it does not exist apart from them,
How can it exist?*

The commentary explains:

Summary: If one analyses well with reasoning in this way, then regardless of whether it is the body of the outer person asserted by the Buddhists or the internally fabricated person by the non-Buddhists, it does not exist inherently. Therefore, how could the hands and so forth be pervaded by an inherently existing body? They are not.

The commentary explains that if one analyses well with the reasoning presented earlier, then regardless of whether it is the body of the outer person asserted by the Buddhists, (i.e. the Prasangika) that what the body is, is a mere label upon a base of imputation, which is the aggregates. What is meant by the outer person asserted by Buddhists or the internally fabricated person by the non-Buddhist does not exist, is that it does not exist inherently. The body which does exist, the merely labelled body, as well as the body asserted by non-Buddhists (which is a fabricated assertion of the body) do not exist inherently, therefore how could the hands and so forth be pervaded by inherently existing body? They are not.

The main point here is, how could the hands and so forth be pervaded by an inherently existing body?, which, being a rhetorical question, implies that they are not. With the reasons presented earlier this should all be clear.

The next verse reads:

83. *Thus, there is no body. Body awareness is generated
Through delusion regarding the hands and other parts,
Similar to awareness of a person generated as
A heap of stones; through the specific shape it is placed in.*

The commentary explains:

Although the body does not exist inherently, regarding the cause for being mistaken: Although the body does not exist inherently, there is a reason for being mistaken with regards to it because although it does not exist inherently, by fantasising that the hands and so forth exist truly, the awareness thinking that the body exists inherently is generated. For example, like the generation of the awareness of a person as a heap of stones because of the characteristic of the human like shape it is placed in.

Here the commentary affirms that while the body does not exist inherently, as an ordinary being one apprehends a truly existent, or inherently existent body. Why is that so? The cause for this mistaken perception is that, although the body does not exist inherently, there is a reason for being mistaken with regards to it because although it does not exist inherently, by fantasising that the hands and so forth exist truly, the awareness thinking that the body exists inherently is generated. In relation to parts of the body such as the hands, when you perceive these as being truly existent then naturally you will perceive the body itself as being inherently existent.

The next example, like the generation of the awareness of a person as a heap of stones because of the characteristic of the human like shape it is placed in refers to further conditions impeding perception. For example, at certain times of the day when the visibility is a bit hazy, and one is at a distance from a heap of stones stacked in a similar shape to a person, one sees a shape which looks like a person. One will have a mistaken perception of a person over there, which arises because all the conditions for that mistaken perception are present. This explains the example presented here. This is explained further in the next verse.

The verse reads:

84. *As long as the conditions are there
The body will appear as the person.
Likewise, as long as they are there regarding
The hands and so forth, they will appear as the body.*

The commentary explains the verse in the following way.

For as long as the conditions for the mistake such as the unclear appearance of the heap of stones are complete, for that long the shape will appear as the person. Likewise, for as long as the causes and conditions of the hands and other parts are complete, for that long the body will appear as that which has limbs, and the awareness grasping at the body as existing inherently will be generated.

This clearly explains that for as long as the conditions for the mistake such as the unclear appearance of the heap of stones are complete, meaning that when all the conditions for perceiving a heap of stones as being a person are there, then for that period of time the shape will appear as a person. Likewise for as long as the causes and conditions for the hands and other parts are complete, i.e. as long as they appear as being truly existent, then for that long the body will appear as that which has limbs, and the awareness grasping at the body as existing inherently will be generated.

2.3.2.1.1.2. Comprehending that the parts lack inherent existence

The verse reads:

85. *Likewise, because of being the collection of fingers,
What could the hand also become?
Because they in turn are a collection of joints
Also the joints are divided by their parts,*

The commentary explains the verse this way:

The body of the person is labelled in dependence on the collection of limbs and parts, and does not exist truly. Likewise, as the hand is also labelled in dependence on the collections of parts and fingers, how could it become something inherently existent? It is impossible. Also because the finger is labelled in dependence on the collection of joints it cannot exist inherently. If the joints are also divided into their parts, they do not possess inherent existence. If the parts of the joints are divided into particles, then they also do not exist inherently.

The body of the person is labelled in dependence on the collection of limbs and parts, and does not exist truly. The reason the person does not exist truly is because it is merely labelled by mind upon the parts which make up the body. Similarly when you relate to each part of the body, such as the hand, then the hand is also labelled in dependence on the collections of parts and fingers. What we call 'hand' is nothing but the collections of the different parts which make up the hand, such as the fingers and so forth. So, how could it become something that is inherently existent? Being a rhetorical question, what is implied is that it cannot exist inherently. That is impossible. Furthermore, even the fingers are made of parts, the joints and so forth, so they cannot exist inherently.

86. *And the parts are divided into particles.
Should the particles be divided into directions,
Since the partitioned directions lack parts,
They are like space. Hence, there are also no particles.*

When the particles are also divided into different directional parts through the division into the directional part of the east and so forth, then they are labelled in dependence on directional parts and do not exist inherently. Also the directional parts do not exist inherently because they lack inherently existing parts, for example, like space.

Then, also the particles do not possess inherent existence because if they did, then one would need to accept partless particles, but this is refuted by the reasoning of 'if six are connected simultaneously'.

The commentary explains that, When the particles are also divided into different directional parts through the division into the directional part of the east and so forth, then they are labelled in dependence on directional parts and do not exist inherently. Directional parts do not exist inherently because they lack inherently existing parts, for example like space because space is posited as being a mere negation of obstruction.

The commentary continues:

Then, also the particles do not possess inherent existence because if they did, then one would need to accept partless particles, but this is refuted by the reasoning of 'if six are connected simultaneously'.

What is being presented here is that the particles themselves do not possess inherent existence. Of course, when you divide them into their smallest parts, even then they do not exist inherently, because if they did one would have to accept a partless particle. If a partless particle did exist, the logical refutation here is that it couldn't possibly coexist with other particles, like six other particles, because if it didn't have any parts to it, then in coming together with other particles it would all merge to become one, so they couldn't be separate particles. Then nothing solid could possibly exist as there are no parts to the particles, and all other particles would merge and become just one particle, which is absurd.

2.3.2.1.1.3. Then, attachment to the dream-like body lacking inherent existence is unsuitable

This is one of the points I mentioned earlier.

The first two lines of the verse read:

*87ab Thus, who with discernment,
Is attached to a dream-like form?*

The commentary explains these lines:

The dream-like form appears as something identifiable when not investigated but at the time of immediate investigation, it does not exist inherently. Who that possesses discernment would be attached? It is unsuitable, as there is nobody that comprehends the object of true-grasping.

The dream-like form refers to the body. The real point to understand here is the connotation of form or body being identifiable or existing from its own side, because it has not been investigated.

It is very true that with anything we perceive, like the hand, that when we don't investigate and just grasp onto it as it appears, it appears to us as really existing from its own side. The verse refers to the way forms are in fact like dreams; they have no real essence because they do not exist at all from their own side; to us however they appear as something real and identifiable. This is how something appears when it is not investigated, but at the time of immediate investigation it does not exist inherently.

As a group we can recite the Tara Praises and dedicate them to the success of Ingrid's treatment and also to Susan who is very unwell and has been admitted to hospital recently. Also dedicate them to Julie's mother who is also apparently very ill. I have been informed that while Susan is physically unwell, her mind is quite stable, quite happy and quite good.

I have advised her to put her complete reliance on Tara and recite Tara mantras and just think that whatever happens, I rely upon you Tara, wholeheartedly. She commented to me that this has been really helpful for her mind, that it is a good practice.

It is good to give advice that is easy to comprehend and manageable as a practice for people to do. Sometimes a practice can become too much, then of course it becomes overwhelming. That's a point to keep in mind – to make advice simple and manageable. Actually this reminds me of what a geshe (who is quite a great scholar himself) once told me – that it is good to give easily understood, succinct advice for a practice, rather than giving too many things to think about. When people ask for advice we find that many give too much elaboration, not something that is manageable and simple. This geshe told me that when people asked a question, it is good to give a simple answer, something they can manage. This particular geshe has now passed away.

In relation to sharing something simple with people, once I said to someone it is good to remember that your real, true friend is within you; not outside, but within you. This person said that he'd never heard that and it was a very significant point. The person was in distress because he had lost quite a lot of money in a business, but when I mentioned that he hadn't really lost anything, he understood the point and came to realise that if the real true friend was inside, then in losing external things one actually hasn't lost anything. He maintained the internal real friend that is within him. That is the point he got from that simple advice.

On another occasion, again I shared some advice with a Dharma student who was very ill. I mentioned that of course it is preferable if we can all have a long life. However between this life and the next life, wouldn't the next life be more important to consider? And then this person said that advice really helped them. Accepting sensible, good advice was a true mark of them having a good understanding of the future life. This is what we need to prepare ourselves for: that our practice is done as a means of preparing for that inevitable time of death. Otherwise what use is Dharma practice? It is not meant to accumulate worldly possessions.

When we do practices, and accumulate numbers of mantras, remember the main point to think about during the recitation is to think about these points and remember that we have something to rejoice about. The teachings state that when we rejoice in others' good deeds, this is a virtue that further enhances our own virtue. Also, rejoicing in one's own good deeds becomes a means to further accumulate or enhance our virtue. In order to be able to rejoice in one's virtues, one has to accumulate virtues, so one has to have a virtuous mind.

The virtuous mind is something we need to familiarise ourselves with periodically: think about Dharma points during the day, when going out and about. That is how our mind becomes more and more familiar with virtue. There are so many non-virtues we can recall even in this life alone, not to mention all our past lives.

While we can't remember the non-virtues we've accumulated in past lives, we can assume that we have definitely accumulated many grave negative karmas, such as being a very evil person who we'd now condemn as a murderer etc. We would have been born as animals, who are completely dependent on eating other animals. These are things that we can assume we have done in past lives. In terms of this lifetime, we can definitely recall certain non-virtuous states of mind or actions that we have engaged in and that what we need is to apply a purification practice. The main point of purification is to develop strong regret, because when one develops this it purifies half of the negative karma one has accumulated. In this way we embark on our practice of Dharma.

It is good to think about these points periodically to develop our practice of Dharma on a daily basis and further enhance a virtuous state of mind, and develop regret for the non-virtuous states of mind. That is how we familiarise ourselves with accumulating virtue. Otherwise there will be no end to it if we are completely preoccupied by the affairs of this life, thinking constantly about how things should be going in relation to this life's affairs. There will be no end to trying to fulfil one's wishes in relation to this life's affairs. If that was the case and if this life's wishes could be fulfilled, then there would be many who would already be really satisfied and happy by now. That we can see that this is not sufficient, and that we need to have a bigger scope to prepare us for our future existences, is something that constitutes the practice of Dharma.

There being no end to this life's affairs is illustrated in a story I would have shared in the past. Once there was a teacher and a student. The teacher used to promise that they'd have a picnic someday, and the student would periodically remind him about going on the picnic. The teacher would say, 'We will go. We will go when all our work is finished'. After a while the student would ask the teacher again, 'So when are we going on a picnic?' and again the teacher would say, 'When all the work is completed'. One day the teacher noticed something in the distance. He couldn't see very clearly and asked the student what was happening. It was a funeral procession, so the student said to the teacher, 'Well, that's someone whose work is all completed and who is now going on a picnic'. Whether this is a true story or not, it is a good illustration of our situation.

So when things are well, we constantly think that things are not going well and try to make them better. And during this time one's life will end.

So now we'll do the recitation of the Tara Praises and make the dedications. Since we can assume we here are endowed with morality, then the prayers would definitely be fruitful. The key point about whether aspirational prayers are actualised or not is dependent on the morality of the person who is doing those prayers. That is something which we need to keep in mind because if you are assuming that you are doing a virtuous practice of Dharma, whether that becomes a cause for our good rebirth or not is dependent on observing morality. So therefore we need to understand that morality is essential.

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

As usual we can now generate a motivation for receiving the teachings based on the bodhicitta motivation.

The four close contemplations

Earlier, we talked about the close contemplation on the body.

As explained in the Uttaratantra by Maitreya, the purpose of presenting the four close contemplations is to gain a deeper understanding and insight into the four noble truths, and thereby engage in the practice of adopting and discarding. As presented in the teachings, suffering is to be known, origination is to be abandoned, cessation is to be actualised and the path is to be meditated upon.

The first close contemplation is on the body, particularly on the suffering nature of the body. By contemplating the impurities and basic suffering nature of the body, one gains an understanding of the truth of suffering in relation to the body. Thus the understanding and knowledge of the truth of suffering is enhanced.

The close contemplations of feelings refers particularly to the feelings that bind us to cyclic existence. Feelings of happiness generate attachment, and feelings of suffering generate aversion. Thus, by contemplating how attachment and aversion are the main cause that binds us to cyclic existence, one gains a more enhanced understanding of the truth of origination, that which is to be abandoned.

With the third close contemplation on the mind, we understand that it is on the basis of our mind that we grasp at an inherently existent self. Further, by using the mind when one investigates and analyses how a person is impermanent, empty and selfless, that grasping at the self will be reversed. When one comes to understand that there is no such inherently existent self, then one realises that grasping at the self is false. At a certain point, when one gains the confidence to completely abandon grasping at the self, then one gains the fearlessness of actualising the cessation of all suffering. This enhances the understanding of the truth of cessation, thereby generating the wish to actualise or obtain the truth of cessation.

The close contemplation on phenomena is based on two specific categories of phenomena in relation to our existence: purified phenomena, and defiled phenomena. Cultivating the class of purified phenomena becomes the antidote to overcoming defiled phenomena, and thus adopting what is to be adopted, and discarding what is to be abandoned. Then one actualises the path, and that becomes the means to meditate on the path.

This is a very brief explanation of how to relate the four close contemplations to the four noble truths. When His Holiness the Dalai Lama presents this text, he always relates it to the two truths in the beginning, and then to the four noble truths at this point. I have explained this in detail in my previous teaching on the ninth chapter, so I'm just covering the main points here.

As I mentioned in our last session, if one gains a good understanding of what the lack of inherent existence actually connotes, then the rest will be easily understood. All of these refutations establish the lack of inherent existence upon different categories of phenomena.

2.3.2.1.1. Meditating on the close placement by mindfulness on the body (cont.)

2.3.2.1.1.4. This also establishes the person as lacking inherent existence

The second two lines of an earlier verse relate to this heading:

*87cd. When the body does not exist in this way
At that time who is the man, who is the woman?*

Then the commentary explains:

As a result, when the body of the person does not exist inherently, then at that time who is the inherently existing man, and who is the inherently existing woman? There is no inherently existing person.

In this school one does not realise the selflessness of person completely by merely realising the absence of a person that is a self-sufficient substantial existent. To this end, one needs to realise the absence of a person that is not posited in mere name.

There is no difference in the difficulty of realising the two selflessnesses, because on the basis of the person and the aggregates, one does not divide into the coarseness and subtleness of being an imputed existent, or being a substantial existent. In addition, one does not attribute a difference in coarseness or subtleness to the object to be negated.

In any case, the argument over whether or not hearer and self-liberator arhats realise the selflessness of phenomena while positing that they are unsuitable to realise the selflessness of person, should be understood as lacking comprehension.

What is being explained here should be quite clear when based on the understanding one has gained from earlier explanations. This heading establishes that the person also lacks inherent existence. When one has successfully established that the body lacks inherent existence, then without much further reasoning one is able to understand that the person also lacks inherent existence.

Note that this is not a specific sequence where one first needs to understand the lack of inherent existence of the body, before one is able to understand the lack of inherent existence of the person. This is not like the logical sequence of realising the selflessness of an individual person first before realising the selflessness of phenomena, because the earlier is easier to realise. The sequence under this heading is not because of logical necessity; rather, the commentary is simply saying that when the body (on the basis of which the person is imputed) is established as lacking inherent existence, then that which is imputed, which is the person, can also be easily understood as lacking inherent existence.

The explanation in the commentary begins with, as a result, when the body of the person does not exist inherently, then at that time who is the inherently existing man, and who is the inherently existing woman?, meaning that there is no inherently existing man or woman that can be found.

When the body is established as lacking inherent existence then, if there's no inherent existence of the body to begin with, how could there possibly be an inherently existent woman or man?

Here, in the Tibetan terms for man and woman, there is an implicit connotation that shows an equality between women and men. That in itself shows that in Buddhist terminology, there is no discrimination between male and female. The terms merely connote a difference. As we have established, the basis of imputation of the body is dependent on other phenomena, and thus the body cannot exist inherently. Likewise, what is termed 'a man' cannot exist inherently, as it is dependent on other causes and conditions. The same reason applies to 'a woman', who also cannot exist inherently because she is dependent on other factors. So here we can also derive the understanding that the label 'man' is dependent on the label 'woman' and vice versa. If there's no woman, we can't label man and without man we cannot label woman. So the very labels 'woman' and 'man' are dependent on each other.

It's good to note here that there is no discrimination between men and women in relation to the realisations to be obtained on the path. That's completely clear in the teachings. Within the merit field, there is the whole assembly of the lama, the tutelary deities which are mostly the union of the mother and father deity, as well male and female buddhas, male and female bodhisattvas, dakas and dakinis (heroes and heroines), and so forth. So the merit field includes both male and female aspects of the buddhas and so forth.

Also, the Heart Sutra mentions sons and daughters of the lineage as being suitable vehicles to gain the direct realisation of emptiness, and thus obtain the path of seeing. Once the path of seeing is obtained, one is surely on the path to definitely attain enlightenment. Just from this passage, we can see that both males and females equally gain the direct realisation of emptiness, and thus achieve the path of seeing; then there's no doubt about achieving the paths leading all the way to enlightenment.

These are important points to note. Sometimes people misinterpret the Buddha's teachings as discriminating against women. Accusing the Buddha of discrimination would be really heavy negative karma. How could we possibly state that the Buddha has that sort of biased mindset, given his unconditional love and compassion towards all living beings?

On the basis of establishing the body as lacking inherent existence, one can then establish the lack of inherent existence of the person. Similarly, when one establishes the lack of inherent existence of an object where the basis is a man, then using the same logical reasons one can also establish a woman to be also empty of inherent existence.

Then the text explains that, in this school one does not completely realise the selflessness of person by merely realising the absence of a self-sufficient and substantially existent person. We covered this point earlier.

Then the commentary further explains, to this end, one needs to realise the absence of a person that is not posited by mere name and label. What needs to be understood is that the absence of a person that is not posited by name implies that what is called a person is merely labelled by the mind.

Next it explains that there is no difference in the difficulty of realising the two selflessnesses. There are slightly different interpretations of this in the different texts studied in the monasteries. According to the text studied in our monastery, the selflessness of the person is realised first, followed by realising the selflessness of phenomena. That is because, as explained in our texts, in relation to oneself it is easier to realise the selflessness of the person first followed by the selflessness of one's aggregates.

However following the presentation here, the commentary further explains the reasons why there is no difference in the difficulty of realising the two selflessnesses. One does not divide the basis of the person and the aggregates into the coarseness of a substantial existent and subtleness of an imputed existent. This refers to the lower schools, who posit the aggregate of the body as being substantially existent, and the person itself as being an imputed existent. They say that because the person is imputed upon the body, in order for the person to appear as an object of the mind one needs to first apprehend the body.

In our school, one does not attribute a difference in coarseness or subtleness to the object to be negated. As explained earlier, the only difference between the selflessness of person and the selflessness of phenomena is the basis of imputation. When the self is negated on the basis of a person then the selflessness of person is realised; when the self is negated upon the basis of the imputation of the aggregates, then the selflessness of phenomena is realised.

In conclusion, the commentary states that in any case, the argument over whether or not hearer and self-liberator arhats realise the selflessness of phenomena, while at the same time positing that they are unsuitable to realise the selflessness of person, should be understood as lacking the correct understanding.

Having investigated the body in detail previously, one comes to the conclusion that there is no inherently existent body, and that establishes the selflessness of the body. That concludes the close contemplation on the body.

2.3.2.1.2. The close placement by mindfulness on feelings

This is subdivided into four:

2.3.2.1.2.1. Refuting that the nature of feeling exists inherently

2.3.2.1.2.2. Refuting that the cause exists inherently

2.3.2.1.2.3. Refuting that the focal object exists inherently

2.3.2.1.2.4. Refuting that their object possessor exists inherently

2.3.2.1.2.1. Refuting that the nature of feeling exists inherently

This is subdivided into three:

2.3.2.1.2.1.1. The feeling of suffering does not exist inherently

2.3.2.1.2.1.2. The feeling of happiness does not exist inherently

2.3.2.1.2.1.3. Advice to abide in the yoga of meditating on the lack of inherent existence of feeling

2.3.2.1.2.1.1. The feeling of suffering does not exist inherently

Here again we need to apply the understanding that it is not feelings that are being negated; rather, it is inherently existent feelings that are being negated. As indicated earlier, one needs to gain a profound understanding of what it is that is being negated as existing inherently. Then one will have a really good understanding of the content of the Heart Sutra.

The explanation in the commentary begins with this statement: Showing that like the body, feeling also does not exist inherently. When the form aggregate, which is actually our coarse body, is established as lacking inherent existence, then the next aggregate, which is the feeling aggregate, can also be logically established as lacking inherent existence. When we can infer in this way, we can also apply that logic to other aspects of the teachings. That is how we gain an understanding of the presentation of the Heart Sutra, which says that form is empty, feelings are empty, and so forth.

It may seem that I am skipping from one topic to another, but what I'm attempting to do is give you a broader perspective of the teachings, going beyond the particular explanation given here, and relating it to other aspects of the teachings. When one is able to apply one's basic understanding to other aspects of the teachings, one becomes rich in that understanding.

Then the two lines of verse are presented:

*88ab. If suffering exists in suchness
Then why does it not impede extreme joy?*

The commentary explains:

If that which is experienced, the suffering, and that experiencing, the feeling, exists in suchness, then for what reason does the feeling of suffering that exists on one mental consciousness, since it exists inherently and is unsuitable to change into something else, not harm the feeling of extreme joy and happiness? If it were to harm, and if that harm necessarily cancelled any occasion for the generation of happiness, then, because we can see happiness is generated, the former does not exist inherently.

As presented here, suffering is the experience and that which experiences it is feeling. So we talk about feeling as the experiencer, and what is being experienced, in this case, is suffering.

The term exists in suchness here means 'exists inherently'. If, as the Realists argue, the suffering and the feeling were to exist inherently, then for what reason does the feeling of suffering that exists on one mental consciousness, since it exists inherently and is unsuitable to change into something else... In other words, if the experience, which is suffering, and the experiencer, which is the feeling itself, were to exist inherently, they could not possibly change, because they existed from their own side. In that case, because ...it [the feeling] is unsuitable to change into something else, how can that not harm the feeling of extreme joy and happiness?

The main point here is that, if the experience of suffering were inherently existent on the stream of consciousness, it would have to be a perpetual experience of suffering, and there would be no opportunity for happiness to be generated. Likewise, if happiness were to exist inherently, it would be the same – there would be no occasion for suffering to be experienced.

However, there are times when suffering is experienced by the consciousness, and other times when happiness is experienced. Therefore, the commentary concludes that, if it were to harm, and if that harm necessarily cancelled any occasion for the generation of happiness, then, because we can see happiness is generated, the former does not exist inherently. So if the one were to cancel the other, and since there would be an occasion for happiness to be experienced, the earlier assertion that suffering is inherently existent is not tenable.

2.3.2.1.2.1.2. The feeling of happiness does not exist inherently

The last two lines of the earlier verse and the next two lines of verse read:

*88cd. If happy, then why do deliciousness etc.,
Not give joy when overcome with misery?*

*89. If due to being powerful it suppresses
And there is no experience.*

As the commentary explains:

If happiness also existed inherently, then why does fine food and drink not provide joy in the mind at the time of being overwhelmed by misery because of a dead child? It follows it does make one happy - because fine food, drink and the like generate inherently existing happiness.

This is quite clearly explained. If happiness were to exist inherently then, if at a time of feeling great sorrow – for example, after losing a child – a person were given delicious, fine food, they would have to experience great joy and happiness in partaking of that food. But that is not the case.

As explained here it follows it does have to make someone in that circumstances happy because fine food, drink and the like generate inherently existent happiness, according to you Realists.

That is followed by this argument:

Argument: If you say, although happiness is generated at the time of being overwhelmed by misery, because the suffering is strong it suppresses the happiness, and that is why one does not experience happiness.

The Realists are responding here that there is some happiness when the person is having fine food and so forth, but because the suffering is so great, it overpowers the experience of happiness. So, they say there is some happiness there, but it is overpowered by the extreme experience of suffering.

The Realists are asserting here that there's a happiness here which is not experienced. How could one say there is a happiness which is not experienced, if happiness itself is an experience? It is this absurdity which is being pointed out here.

89cd. How can that not in the nature of Experience, be a feeling?

*90. Merely subtle suffering exists,
Isn't the coarse one cleared away?
If, 'It is a mere joy apart from it',
The subtle itself belongs to it as well*

In the first part of the commentary, the Madhyamika explain:

Madhyamika: How can that not in the nature of experience be the feeling of happiness? It follows it cannot - because it [happiness] is experienced. One can relate the answer likewise to the suppressing of inherently existing suffering by strong happiness.

Next is the argument:

Argument: Because at the time of strong happiness there is a subtle feeling of suffering it is not as if one does not experience any suffering.

This is quite clear. I will just read the next parts:

Madhyamika: If there are subtle feelings of suffering, then what harm did the powerful happiness give to the suffering, so that one posits the experience of powerful happiness? Did the powerful happiness not clear away the coarse suffering?

Argument: This I accept, but this subtle suffering is only a form of subtle joy apart, separate from that great happiness.

Madhyamika: Since this subtle happiness is not outside the definition of happiness, if it is subtle happiness, it needs to be happiness.

The main point being presented here by the Madhyamika is that whether the happiness is great or subtle, if it is a happiness, then it is an experience; and because it is an experience, it has to be happiness. That is the point.

If you have read the text carefully, then it shouldn't be too obscure. If you have not done any reading, then even if I attempt to explain it word by word, I don't think you'll get much out of it!

The next verse is:

*91. If, 'since the adverse condition is generated Sufferings are not generated.'
'Feelings are conceptual fabrications'
Is this saying not established?*

That is presented first with an argument, which is:

Argument: Wishing to repudiate the fault of, 'If it is happiness, then why does fine food and so forth': Because the contrary condition for suffering, i.e., happiness, is generated from things like fine food and drink, therefore no suffering is generated at this time.

Madhyamika: Isn't the saying, 'the feelings of happiness and suffering are mere conceptual fabrications and imputations' established? It follows it is - because one instance of food or drink is labelled as the cause for both happiness and suffering through the power of conceptual thought.

This is relating to the earlier verse where it says:

*88cd. If happy, then why do deliciousness etc.,
Not give joy when overcome with misery?*

This is what is being contradicted by the argument: Because the contrary condition for suffering, i.e., happiness, is generated from things like fine food and drink, therefore no suffering is generated at this time. Here, the Realists are saying that, because happiness is generated after having fine food and so forth, there cannot be suffering at that time.

The next point being made by the Madhyamika is: Isn't the saying, 'the feelings of happiness and suffering are mere conceptual fabrications and imputations' established? It follows it is - because one instance of food or drink is labelled as the cause for both happiness and suffering through the power of conceptual thought.

Thus the reason presented here is: ... because one instance of food or drink is labelled as the cause for both happiness and suffering through the power of conceptual thought. This can be quite clearly understood; what we perceive as happiness or suffering is basically dependent on the conceptual thought that interprets that.

2.3.2.1.2.1.3. Advice to abide in the yoga of meditating on the lack of inherent existence of feeling

I've gone through the explanations of this in quite some detail previously. The verse relating to this is:

*92. Because of this very fact this analysis
Should be meditated upon as its antidote.
The mental stabilisation derived from the field of Analysis is the food of a yogi.*

Then the commentary explains:

Because of the very fact that feelings do not exist inherently, one should meditate on this analysis, which realises feelings to be lacking inherent existence, as the antidote against the true-grasping at feeling. If one meditates on the mental stabilisation of superior insight in dependence on the superior insight focusing on suchness that arises from the field of pure analysis and investigation, and in dependence on calm abiding, then the body of the yogi will be further and further increased and boosted. Therefore it is called 'food', like the ordinary food that increases the body.

What being presented here is that the wrong conception of grasping at true existence, or inherent existence, perceives feeling as being inherently existent. Whereas when the wisdom realising selflessness perceives feelings, it perceives them as lacking inherent existence.

These two perceptions are focusing on the same object, which is feelings, but are completely opposite apprehensions; while focused on the same object, the apprehension of each is completely different.

In the earlier view held by the Realists, which is the mistaken conception of perceiving feelings as existing inherently, that perception has no truth to back it up. It is actually based on falsity. Therefore, on the basis of that false perception, feelings cannot be established. When feelings are perceived as being inherently existent, the actual feelings cannot be established properly, or ultimately.

Whereas the Madhyamika viewpoint of the wisdom realising selflessness perceiving feelings as lacking inherent existence is able to establish feelings just as they are. This is how we need to understand what is being presented here.

If one meditates on the mental stabilisation of superior insight in dependence on the superior insight focusing on suchness that arises from the field of pure analysis and investigation, and in dependence on calm abiding ... So, having gained the profound understanding of the lack of inherent existence of feelings, one then uses one's mind to focus on that single-pointedly. Having obtained the calm abiding that focuses on the lack of inherent existence of feelings, if that is further developed, one will gain what we call superior or special insight into the lack of inherent existence of feelings – the emptiness of feelings.

When the yogi reaches the point of being able to apply special insight based on calm abiding focusing on, for example, the lack of inherent existence of feelings, then through that meditation the yogi actually gains sustenance to make the body even more powerful. That is referred to as the sustenance of concentration, or the food of concentration.

When the yogi is engaged in that level of concentration, because it naturally sustains the body, it is referred to as a food. The example given here is like the ordinary food that increases the body. As with ordinary gross food, we talk about eating healthy food, because when we consume the food, it nourishes and increases the strength of the body. Similarly, it is said that for the yogi concentration is becomes sustenance for the body.

The commentary concludes:

Through this concentration the ordinary body is also increased. Hence, one should strive in single-pointed meditative placement upon realising emptiness.

The conclusion here is that one needs to first gain a good understanding of emptiness. Then, based on that clear, good understanding, one attempts to generate a single-pointed focus upon the understanding of emptiness – although initially it is only a conceptual understanding of emptiness. Based on that, one then gains the actual direct realisation of emptiness.

Let us conclude the teaching here with a recitation of the dedication chapter of the Bodhisattvacharyavatara.

Last week we did some prayers and dedicated them for Susie and Julie's mother. Since then, they've both passed away. So now we will dedicate this practice for them.

If you recall, when we mentioned doing the practice for Susie last week, I indicated at that time that she was in quite a happy frame of mind, and that in the past, I had advised to her to focus on Tara, and she has particularly held White Tara as her main deity. I'd mentioned to her to keep that as her main deity, to really focus on that complete reliance on Tara, and that that would be good for her mind. Apparently Sandra went to visit Susie the next day, and Sandra was able to convey that to her, right? So, Sandra what was her response?

Sandra: When I saw her, she was in the heavy breathing phase, and not talking at all. I passed on your message from last week, saying, "It's Sandra. I have an instruction for you from Geshe Doga. He said for you to totally rely on Tara and her mantra." She came out of her heavy breathing and opened her eyes. I then showed her a framed picture of Geshe Doga and one of White Tara. She was very clear and lucid and her face lit up. She gave a big smile and was happy. Moments later, she went back into the heavy breathing. But she was definitely clear when I gave her the message.

Geshe-la: When I heard what you had relayed and her response, it made me very happy. Susie, as those of us here know, was a very kind lady, a very nice person, with a very nice personality. Thank you, Sandra, because you were there at the right moment to assist someone who was really in need of help. This is what I feel is the great service that we, as Dharma brothers and sisters, can do, being able to help each other at the time of need. So, I really thank you for that, Sandra. It is good.

Now, as mentioned earlier, we will do the dedication chapter and dedicate the merit to late Susie and Julie's mum.

Based on the motivation that we have generated, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [Meditation]

We can set the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: for the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and put them into practice well. Having just spent time meditating on tong-len (the giving and taking practice), it will be easier now to generate the bodhicitta motivation.

The reason why the superior intention is not specifically mentioned in the exchanging-self-with-other technique of developing bodhicitta is because it is cultivated naturally after doing that practice of giving and taking. When engaging in the practice of voluntarily taking the sufferings of all living beings upon oneself, and giving one's entire happiness to others, it initiates the personal responsibility to alleviate the sufferings of all living beings and lead them to the state of happiness. Thus, this practice naturally encompasses the superior intention.

It is essential to have a good understanding of why one needs to generate the wish to take the responsibility to benefit all sentient beings. One also needs to ensure that one generates the mind of taking personal responsibility for the welfare of all sentient beings in one's daily meditation practice. Without developing the mind of taking personal responsibility to free all sentient beings from every suffering and endow them in the ultimate state of happiness, there is no way that one is able to develop the superior intention that serves as the cause for generating bodhicitta. As the teachings present, the altruistic wish to achieve enlightenment is preceded by the sincere, genuine intention to take on the responsibility to free all beings from suffering and lead them to the state of ultimate happiness. With this reasoning we can see why it has to precede bodhicitta.

Bodhicitta consists of a two-fold aspiration: the aspiration to achieve enlightenment, and the aspiration to free all beings from suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness. The second aspiration is generated when one is moved to the point of not being able to bear sentient beings' suffering, even for a second, and cannot bear to see them deprived of happiness. Thus, one takes on the personal responsibility to free all beings from every suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness.

At this stage one investigates whether one has the full ability to do this right now, and comes to realise one does not have the ability. This investigation leads one to ask 'who possesses that ability?' It is at that point, by reflecting on the incomparable qualities of an enlightened being, one comes to understand the true significance of the Buddha Jewel. The Buddha is a supreme being endowed with all the qualities needed to free all sentient beings from suffering. Here one can reflect on the specific qualities of the Buddha's body, the qualities of the Buddha's speech and qualities of the Buddha's mind.

One can reflect on the qualities of the Buddha as presented in the teachings on refuge. In summary, the qualities of the Buddha's body are the ability to manifest infinite bodies to benefit numberless sentient beings in various numberless ways. With speech, he has sixty qualities of eloquent speech; being able to answer many questions asked at one time with one single answer, and so forth, which satisfies the needs of all sentient beings in accordance with their wishes. With his qualities of the mind, the Buddha's omniscient mind knows all existence past, present and future. Everything that exists is known exactly as it is by the Buddha's mind. He also has the quality of great unbiased compassion towards all living beings, regardless of whether the Buddha is respected or not, or treated nicely or not. From the Buddha's side there is unbiased compassion towards all living beings without discrimination, wishing to benefit them all and with the ability to do so. When one thinks about the qualities of the Buddha, this shows the abilities one would also achieve when one obtains the qualities of a buddha oneself. On a practical level, it is said that by contemplating on each of the Buddha's qualities one accumulates extensive merit oneself.

Since we need to accumulate merit, we need to use all the resources already available to us. Otherwise there is a danger of thinking 'I need to engage in some practice to accumulate merit, but I wonder what I should do?' If after receiving all these teachings, particularly the teachings on refuge, one feels one lacks the ways and means to accumulate merit, then one has missed the point.

Refuge explains the qualities of the Buddha so one can contemplate in a concise way the four qualities of the Buddha: that the Buddha himself is free from all fears; he has the means to free all other beings from all fears; he has love and compassion towards all sentient beings without any discrimination; and helps others regardless of whether the Buddha himself has been benefited or not. These four points are said to be the sole qualities of the Buddha. In terms of refuge, only the Buddha Jewel has these four qualities. It is in this way that one reflects on these points. In simple terms, when one goes for refuge or is making a request, basically one is saying that I admire your qualities and I would also like the qualities you have, please help me to do so. In essence, this is what going for refuge means.

The causal refuge is the enlightened being to whom one goes for refuge now, as a way to obtain their qualities. The resultant refuge is the buddha one becomes in the future. This acknowledges the potential one has to become a buddha. Going for refuge means taking refuge in the causal refuge, and then aspiring to obtain those qualities oneself.

These are important points to keep in mind and regularly mesh into our practice, because we will all reach the point where we cannot rely upon others, even if they want to help us. There will be a point when we cannot possibly ask others on the outside to help us, which is when we are totally at the mercy of what is in our own mind. At the time of death, we cannot rely on others, as there is nothing they can do for us. This crucial moment is the juncture between this life and the next life, when the mind of death occurs.

This is when we are completely dependent on the Dharma Jewel that we have developed within ourselves. Although we might not yet have obtained the actual ultimate Dharma Jewel, we have a similitude of it within our mind, comprised of all the practices we have engaged in such as meditating on love and compassion, observing morality and the practice of patience, generosity and so forth. All these practices we have attempted to engage in is called the similitude of the Dharma Jewel that resides within ourselves. The extent to which we strengthen the Dharma Jewel now when we have time is what we can then rely upon at the time of death.

We need to be very mindful that the time will come when we must completely rely upon what we have cultivated in our mind. Many have commented to me that they never saw the real value of the Dharma until they had a grave illness such as a terminal disease, and at that time the value and essential nature of the Dharma become very clear. So, it is good for us not to wait until that critical moment, but prepare from now on so that we are familiar with what we need to do, and can maintain a virtuous frame of mind. A virtuous frame of mind, rather than a negative mind or neutral mind, is the best state of mind at the time of death.

As mentioned earlier, while the actual Dharma Jewel is only in the mental continuum of arya beings, the relative Dharma Jewel (or similitude of it) is the practice we bring to mind in our preparation for death. Meditating on death and impermanence is the best preparation for death as it a great impetus for practising the Dharma. With the nine-point death meditation, as you will recall, the three main points are: death is certain, the time of death is uncertain, and at the time of death nothing but the Dharma can benefit. Each of these points has three reasons and three conclusions. The three reasons for the last one being: at the time of death, friends cannot help, one's body cannot help, and one's wealth cannot help. Thus, the conclusion is that only the Dharma can help one at that time. These are essential points to contemplate.

Even during our life there will be times when we are deserted by friends and times when even our bodies might fail us. Definitely, at the time of death our body will desert us and even our wealth will desert us and cannot help. At the time of death we have to leave everything material behind. At that juncture, when one is completely deserted by all we have been so familiar with in our lives - our body, friends and wealth - the only thing that can help is the Dharma. If we don't familiarise our minds with the Dharma now, and assume that the virtuous Dharma mind will arise spontaneously at the time of death then that is wishful thinking.

When we attempt to meditate now, if a neutral state of mind is all we are familiarising ourselves with, then a neutral state will most likely be the state of mind we will have at the time of death. Therefore the focus of our meditation practice now should be on developing a virtuous state of mind and familiarising ourselves with virtue as much as possible. I am sharing these points which I find very significant myself. These are points that I really think about and try to put into practice myself. I find that there are many simple ways to put Dharma into practice. It doesn't have to be something complicated or profound; there are simple, practical ways you can put Dharma into practice. These are some simple points that I share with you.

Meditating on impermanence has many, many practical benefits that we can experience right away, e.g. helping to develop more contentment in one's mind and helping to alleviate a lot of unnecessary sufferings experienced in our daily lives. Attachment is one of the main sources of the agony that we experience. Because of this strong attachment to our body, we experience a lot of agony and suffering in relation to it. If attachment is reduced, contentment with one's body can definitely bring about more ease in our mind. Likewise, if we have a lot of strong attachment to our friends, then this causes a lot of problems and agony in our mind. Likewise we have very strong attachment to our wealth. If we reduce these strong attachments to our body, friends and wealth, then our mind naturally becomes much more relaxed and calm, and much more expansive. Rather than being narrow minded and neurotic, the mind becomes more expansive and one can feel much more satisfied with what one has now, relieving us from feelings of dissatisfaction. One can think, 'my basic needs are met, I can sustain myself, and things are going quite well, so I can feel happy'. When one doesn't need to spend so much time and energy to focus on protecting and securing the various objects of attachment, there will be more space in the mind to develop a more positive state of mind.

This is where we take the inclination to develop more virtue in our lives. Familiarising ourselves with this way of thinking and putting it into practice is something which will come about through practice, not right away. Just thinking about it a few times and expecting results in a few months is not realistic. But over time, if we keep our mind in this direction, familiarise our mind with virtue, we will begin to see that a transformation takes place. These are points to put into practice in our daily life that I share with you.

I feel the most essential, the most valuable state of mind is a mind of love and compassion. In making attempts to develop this one begins to sense a genuine feeling in one's mind. Because of the unruly mind we have from beginningless lifetimes, it is hard to continuously maintain love and compassion, as self-centredness slowly creeps in. However, the more one familiarises oneself with it the more the mind of love and compassion will develop.

It is good to focus on each of the thoughts: may all beings be free from suffering; may they be endowed with happiness; may they never be separated from joy; and may they be endowed with equanimity. Just thinking about each of these and contemplating 'how wonderful it would be if all beings were free from suffering, may they be free from suffering, I myself will take the responsibility for freeing them from suffering, please gurus and deities bless my mind to be able to do so', encompasses the most essential points of the entire path to enlightenment.

Reflecting on the sequence of cause and effect encompasses the four noble truths, which, in themselves, are the basis for the entire structure of the path to enlightenment. When one thinks of expanding on each one, beginning with wishing beings to be free from suffering and the causes of suffering, it encompasses the points on the truth of suffering and the causes of suffering, the truth of origination. So we can relate to the four noble truths in a concise way as a means to put them into practice.

Indeed, when we go into more detail on the four immeasurables, we can see how they encompass the essence of the entire path, particularly the four noble truths. When we contemplate further on the sufferings, we recall from the classifications of general sufferings of migrators in cyclic existence from the Lam Rim teachings that there are the eight types of sufferings, the six types of sufferings, and the three types of sufferings that one can contemplate. Then having contemplated the sufferings, one generates the thought of wishing others to be free from the causes of suffering.

This is where one contemplates the causes of suffering from the very basic level of the ten non-virtues. Then more particularly, karma and delusion as presented in the truth of origination, which are the cause of suffering, and the various delusions. There are various types of delusions, and the primary one is the ignorance of grasping at a self. When one relates to that, one wishes for others to be free from the fundamental cause of suffering, which reincorporates the deeper understanding that one derives from the four noble truths. With wishing other beings to be endowed with joy, this joy can be the joy of liberation and ultimately the joy of enlightenment, encompassing the whole path; then contemplating the truth of cessation, and so on. This is how we can use what seems to be a simple practice as a means to incorporate profound understandings.

Meditating on immeasurable equanimity in particular becomes an impetus for generating great compassion for sentient beings. The compassion developed then is much more profound than just wishing beings to be free from the obvious levels of suffering. Understanding that what causes suffering for sentient beings is when they are not in a state of equanimity, when they are feeling close to some and distant to others out of attachment and aversion. When one wishes beings to be endowed with equanimity that is free from being close to some and distant towards others out of attachment and aversion, then it is said that when one goes into these subtle levels of understanding the level of compassion is much more profound.

The different levels of compassion, from the basic to the profound, particularly the three types of compassion, are explained precisely by Chandrakirti in his teachings on the Middle Way. Feeling compassion because one relates to the suffering of suffering experienced by others is something that is quite readily developed.

One could say that even animals have that level of compassion. When an animal sees another animal suffering they do try to help. This shows that they have the wish for the other animal to be free from suffering. The wish to alleviate the suffering of suffering is also something animals naturally have. For example a dog will go around looking for food when it is hungry to alleviate the suffering of hunger. When the dog finds some food it is temporarily satisfied and will have a nice sleep. Whereas we may not be able to have a good sleep even after our stomach is full.

Similarly, some levels of our suffering of suffering can be alleviated quite easily, e.g. when we have a headache and we take a Panadol to alleviate the pain. That is, of course, a temporary relief from the suffering.

The wish to alleviate the suffering of suffering is quite readily felt by all, so wishing others to be free from this is not very profound. Whereas when one develops compassion towards other sentient beings by recognising their plight – the suffering of cyclic existence and the causes they are creating to remain in it – then generating compassion with that understanding becomes much more profound. We can relate to this. For example, when we see someone poor and destitute we might find it is easier to feel compassion towards them. Whereas when someone is rich and famous etc., it is harder for us to even recognise that we need to feel compassion for them. But when we think about it, despite their wealth, they are actually creating a lot of negativities through attachment of being close to some and aversion by being distant to others, and thus constantly creating the causes to be in cyclic existence to experience numerous sufferings again and again. So, when we can think in that way, even wealthy people will definitely become an object of our great compassion.

What I am attempting to share with you now is that it is really important to try to put into practice what one has already understood at a basic level. You've heard a lot of teachings and have a wealth of knowledge in your minds already. Now it is time for you to put it into practice and try to derive the benefit of understanding what the teachings mean. You might not see immediate results but if you don't put it into practice now the results will never come. By integrating this into your daily practice, gradually your mind will become more and more imbued with the Dharma.

We all naturally look forward to getting more leisure time as we age, so when we finally get this time, we should refer back to all the teachings we have received and contemplate on them. This will definitely help to bring about a genuinely more subdued, calm mind, a more satisfied and happy mind; how wonderful would that be!

2.3.2.1.2.2. Refuting that the cause exists inherently

Preceding this was the explanation with reasoning that established the non-inherent existence of feelings. This section refutes that the causes of suffering exist inherently. This is subdivided into three:

2.3.2.1.2.2.1. Refuting the inherent meeting of sense power and object

2.3.2.1.2.2.2. Refuting the inherent meeting with the consciousness

2.3.2.1.2.2.3. Contact that arises from the meeting of these three does not exist inherently 2.3.2.1.2.2.1. Refuting the inherent meeting of sense power and object

What is being refuted here is an inherent meeting of a particle of the sense power and a particle of the object. It can also be related to the actual meeting of a sense power and its object. One needs to relate to this explanation as refuting every possibility of inherent existence. If one keeps that in mind then the following explanation will be clear.

The first two lines of the verse read:

93ab. If there is room between sense power and object,
Then how can the two meet?

The Madhyamika first present a statement followed by a question.

Madhyamika: One needs to refute that particles meet.

If the subtle and coarse particles of the sense power and the object meet, is there space between them or not?

The Realists state:

Realist: I say there is.

Madhyamika: How can these particles meet, as they possess the fallacy of having space in between? In the intermediate space there are also the particles of either light or darkness, between which there is again intermediate space, and thus it would become endless.

What is posited as a question is: If the subtle and coarse particles of the sense power and the object meet then is there space between them or not? In simple terms, the question is when they meet is there space in between them or not?

The Madhyamika is pointing out the absurdity of their statement by asking how can these particles meet, as they possess the fallacy of having space in between? The very term 'space' implies that there is a separation, and therefore they cannot meet. If there was no space in between, then how could you even talk about the meeting of two particles. If there is a meeting then it implies that there is space in between the two that are meeting. The main point is that if there is an inherently existent meeting, then there would be no space in between at all. How can the particles meet if they possess an intermediate space in between? Then furthermore there are also the particles of either light or darkness. As indicated in the teachings, there is also an explanation of light particles and darkness particles.

Using the example of two fingers, if there is a separation (space between the two fingers) then there can be light particles in between and also darkness particles in between. If this is so, how can you say they are meeting when there is space in between and particles there? The commentary states, 'between which there is again intermediate space, and thus it would become endless, meaning that there would be infinite regression. The main point to be understood, again, is that there is neither an inherently existent meeting nor inherently existent space in between. To summarise, what the Madhyamika are saying to the opponent is: if you say that there is inherently existent space in between the two particles then the fallacy of infinite regression will follow.

The next part refutes the meeting of two particles if there is no intermediate space.

The next two lines of the last verse read:

*93cd. If there is no room and they are merely one,
What is meeting with what?*

*94ab. Subtle particles cannot enter subtle particles,
They do not have the circumstance and are equal.*

That is followed by the argument.

Argument: There is no intermediate space.

If the Realists say that there is no intermediate space, then the Madhyamika present reasons to counter this, which are as follows.

Madhyamaka: Again, when two partless particles meet there cannot be the surface where they touch and the surface where they do not touch, and therefore they would need to touch each other in their complete nature. In that case, they merge into one point of reference, become one mere particle, and then what is meeting with which object to be met? It follows there is no such meeting - because there are no two objects.

The reason for that is that one subtle particle cannot enter, i.e. absorb, into another subtle particle, because there is not the circumstance of empty space between these particles, and they are of the same size.

This states the reason why they cannot meet in their complete nature.

The Vaibhashika posit that there are partless particles. What is being refuted here by the Madhyamikas is that if there were partless particles, how can they possibly meet when there is no surface or no two sides to them? So if there are no two sides since it is partless, then there couldn't be this side or that side. If there couldn't be this side of the particle, as opposed to the other side of the particle, then what is meeting with what? How can the two particles possibly meet if there are no sides to be met? These questions point out the absurdity of the Vaibhashika assertion.

If the particles didn't have separate sides (because each partless particle wouldn't have a side), when they meet, they would need to touch each other in their complete nature, or touch completely, meaning that when the two partless particles meet they would have to touch in every aspect and completely merge into one. As there is no one side that doesn't touch the other side - because there are no sides at all - they will mingle completely and become one. That is the absurdity being presented here.

The commentary continues with the explanation:

In that case, they merge into one point of reference, become one mere particle, and then what is meeting with which object to be met? It follows there is no such meeting - because there are no two objects.

With this, the following reasoning can be clearly understood.

The next lines of verse read:

*94.cd. Without entering there is no mixing,
Those that did not mix cannot meet.*

*95. How could it possibly be valid to say
That the partless can meet.
In case meeting and the partless
Are seen, show it!*

The commentary explains the meaning of this verse:

There is a pervasion because particles that do not enter and absorb into each other cannot mix, and partless phenomena that did not mix cannot meet. How can the statement 'partless phenomena meet' be accurate? Because it is impossible, if you observe the meeting with something partless, then you should show it, but you cannot.

It explains clearly that if there were partless particles, then the earlier reasoning has a pervasion because particles that do not enter and absorb into each other cannot mix, and partless phenomena that did not mix cannot meet.

This reasoning is followed by, How can the statement 'partless phenomena meet' be accurate? Being a rhetorical question it implies that it is impossible for partless phenomena to meet, because if they were to meet they would become one, and if they became one you cannot call it meeting. Thus, if you observe meeting with something partless, then you should be able to show it but you cannot. This implies that the meeting of partless particles is impossible.

The inherent meeting of particles, refuted earlier, also explains that there couldn't be an inherent meeting of sense power and its object as well.

2.3.2.1.2.2.2. Refuting the inherent meeting with the consciousness

Having refuted the inherent meeting of particles, if the doubt arises that there might be a meeting between the consciousness and the object then again that meeting implies an inherent meeting. So, what is being refuted is that there is an inherent meeting between the consciousness and the object. We can cover this in our next session.

Based on the motivation that we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayer, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

Now we can generate the usual positive motivation for receiving the teachings.

2.3.2.1.2. The close placement of mindfulness on feelings

2.3.2.1.2.2. Refuting the inherent meeting with the consciousness

The verse reads:

96. *That primary consciousness without body
Can be met is simply invalid;
There is also no phenomenon on the collection,
Similar to the earlier analysis.*

The commentary explains:

The assertion that primary consciousness, which is without a form or body, can be met inherently is simply invalid because it does not have form.

The refutation of meeting with the coarse: Also the meeting with a coarse object that is a collection of many atoms does not exist inherently because no truly existent object exists on that. It is similar to inherent existence which was refuted earlier through the analysis of the collection of joints.

As quite clearly presented here, the assertion that primary consciousness can be met inherently is simply invalid because it does not have form.

The next part of the commentary is the refutation of meeting with the coarse object that is a collection of many atoms. This coarse object does not exist inherently because no truly existent object exists on that collection. As mentioned, it is similar to the refutation of inherent existences that was refuted earlier through the analysis of the collection of joints. So, as explained previously, the body is not the collection of its parts, such as the joints, limbs and so forth.

2.3.2.1.2.2.3. Thus, contact arising from the meeting of these three does not exist inherently

Here 'these three' refers to the object, the sense power, and the consciousness. It is the combination of these three that induces contact, and contact induces feelings. So one needs to understand that a feeling is preceded by its particular cause, which is contact, and that contact is preceded by the combination of the object, sense power, and consciousness. There are other states of mind that can arise simultaneously, but here we need to understand that feeling is preceded by the contact that serves as its particular cause, and that contact is preceded by the meeting of these three; the object, the sense power, and consciousness. The point being explained here is that the meeting of these three does not exist inherently.

We can also take note that this understanding about how contact arises, and how feeling arises is derived from the study of Mind and Awareness, or Lo Rig; earlier studies form the basis of a more enhanced understanding of later subjects. Mind and Awareness was taught in 2001 over eight weeks, and these classes were attended by seventy-five people who made the commitment to come to all of the sessions.¹ At that time we didn't have time to cover the twenty secondary mental factors, but these were presented during the teachings on Precious Garland.

The first verse under this heading is:

97. *If thus there is no contact
From what does feeling arise?
What is the purpose of this exertion?
What is giving harm to whom?*

The first part of the commentary is an assertion by Madhyamikas.

Madhyamika: As explained earlier, the meeting of object, sense power and primary consciousness do not exist inherently. If, when looking at it from that point of view, contact does not exist inherently, then from what cause does truly existent feeling arise? A false cause does not have the power to generate a truly existent result. If there is no inherently existing feeling, then what good is the exertion and effort for its sake? It is meaningless.

This is again quite clear. Earlier it was explained that the meeting of object, sense power and primary consciousness does not exist inherently. The combination of the meeting of these three, which are the causes of contact, does not exist inherently. So the contact that is a result of these three also cannot possibly exist inherently.

As mentioned here contact does not exist inherently, because the causes do not exist inherently. So if there is no inherently existing cause then from what cause does a truly existent feeling arise? If there is no truly existent contact then how can there be truly existent feelings? A false cause does not have the power to generate a truly existent result. If contact itself does not exist inherently, then the feeling that is a result of that contact could not possibly exist inherently either, because a false cause does not have the power to generate a truly existent result. This is quite clear.

The Madhyamika then conclude that if there is no inherently existing feeling, then what good is the exertion and effort for its sake? So if feeling itself does not exist inherently, then what is the point of exerting oneself to acquire that feeling? In this context 'feeling' relates to a pleasurable feeling. Having presented that absurdity, the Madhyamika say that exerting oneself for non-inherently existing feelings is meaningless.

Then the Realists argue:

Argument: The exertion is for the sake of abandoning inherently existing feeling of suffering.

What the Realists are saying is that 'I'm not exerting myself to overcome pleasurable feelings, rather I'm exerting myself to overcome inherently existent feelings of suffering.

¹ These can be found on the CD of teachings available in the bookshop or downloaded from <http://www.tarainstitute.org.au/transcripts>.

The Madhyamikas refute that objection.²

Madhyamika: This is a fallacy because, as there is no inherently existing feeling, who is the person that receives harm from which cause?

This is a fallacy because, as there is no inherently existing feeling, who is the person that receives harm from which cause? This argues that, since the feeling of suffering does not exist inherently, it could not possibly harm the person who is experiencing it. So what point is there in exerting yourself to overcome a suffering that does not exist inherently?

The commentary continues:

In this world it is merely the happiness that alleviates earlier suffering that exists. While there is true suffering, there is no true happiness. For example, the experience of happiness that one experiences when, on a cold day, one stands in the sun and the suffering of cold recedes a little, is the feeling of happiness. But at that time the suffering of cold still exists. As soon as that suffering of cold ceases, uninterruptedly the suffering of heat begins. Thus, one needs suffering as the basis for imputing happiness, but one does not need happiness as the basis for generating suffering awareness; e.g. like blue and, short and long.

As presented earlier, contaminated or worldly happiness is the mere pleasurable sensation of alleviating an earlier suffering, and because of that it is experienced as happiness. The point here is that while there is true suffering, there is no true happiness. This is followed by the example of the experience of happiness when, on a cold day, one stands in the sun, and the suffering of cold recedes a little.

The commentary goes on to explain that at that time the suffering of the cold day still exists, because as soon as that suffering of cold ceases the suffering of heat immediately begins. Just as the suffering of cold begins to recede, the suffering of heat begins. This is establishing that one needs suffering as the basis for generating happiness, but one does not need happiness as the basis for generating an awareness of suffering.

What we perceive as happiness, i.e. worldly pleasure - which is contaminated happiness, or samsaric happiness - is based on suffering. As mentioned earlier, the alleviation of an earlier suffering is experienced as happiness, and therefore happiness is based on suffering. But one does not need happiness as the basis for generating an experience of suffering.

When we reflect on this from our own experience, we can actually see the truth of this fact. Any worldly pleasure that we experience is based on alleviating some kind of earlier discomfort, and the relief that one experiences when an earlier discomfort is lessened is experienced as pleasure or happiness.

These pleasurable experiences are mostly related to attachment. Nagarjuna said that the pleasure that we experience from attachment is like the pleasurable sensation one gets from scratching an itchy rash. One experiences pleasure from the relief of the itch. But, as Nagarjuna presents very logically, given a choice one would not opt to have the rash just to experience the pleasurable feeling of scratching it. That is how the analogy that happiness is based on suffering is explained. Many people seem to really relate this to their own experience. Basically, worldly pleasures are just the relief of an earlier discomfort, and that's why they are not true happiness.

The further analogy is that it is like blue and distance. The colour blue is not dependent on anything for it to appear as blue - it is blue by nature. This is likened to the experience of suffering, which is that it does not have to be based on happiness for it to be experienced as suffering.

Whereas the experience of happiness is like short and long. The awareness of short is dependent on something that is longer, and the awareness of long is based on something that is shorter. Therefore the perception of long and short are dependent on each other. The perception of long is dependent on the perception of short, and likewise the perception of short is dependent on the perception of long. Whereas the perception of blue is not dependent on anything else, it perceives blue just as it naturally appears - blue.

The commentary doesn't explain the example further in detail, however I think that suffering is like the colour blue, i.e. just as blue is not dependent on another factor to be blue, suffering is not dependent on happiness. Whereas just like long depends on short and vice versa, worldly happiness is dependent on the alleviation of suffering.

As an introduction to the next verse the commentary states:

Presenting that craving is reversed, if one realises the non-existence of inherent feeling:

The verse reads:

98. *When there is no-one experiencing feeling,
And when the feeling does not exist as well,
Having seen this circumstance at that time,
Why should craving not be reversed?*

Then the commentary explains:

When there is comprehension that there is no inherent person experiencing feeling, and that the experienced feeling also does not exist inherently, then at this time, having seen this circumstance of no inherent experience and experiencer at the time, why should craving not be reversed? The craving wishing to attain happiness and the craving wishing to be separated from suffering are induced through the force of true-grasping.

As the commentary explains, when one comprehends that there is no inherently existing person experiencing feeling, and that the experienced feeling also does not exist inherently then, as there is no inherently existing experience and experiencer, why should craving not be reversed? The implication is that with this understanding of the lack of inherently existent experiences and inherently existent experiencers, craving would indeed be reversed.

The reason why craving can be reversed is that the craving wishing to attain happiness and the craving wishing to be separated from suffering are induced through the force of true grasping. It is this true grasping that causes these two cravings of wishing to experience happiness and wanting to be separated from suffering.

² There are a few typos in the Tibetan text at this point, which have been corrected in this transcript.

When the inherent existence of craving itself is reversed, i.e. when one realises the emptiness of craving, then that understanding will overcome the misconception of inappropriate attention that causes the craving to arise in the first place. It is ignorance that is responsible for this inappropriate attention. So when that inappropriate attention is overcome through the realisation of the non-inherent existence of things, the craving itself will be reversed, or cease.

When we really investigate how attachment arises, we come to see that behind every attachment there is always a mind of ignorance. The mind of ignorance is the forerunner of attachment as well as aversion. This mind exaggerates the qualities of an object through inappropriate attention. So there's this combination of exaggerating qualities that is induced by inappropriate attention, which then develops into attachment to the object.

When there is strong attachment one sees qualities in the object that don't actually exist. And we can verify from our own experience that when strong attachment starts to subside, then one starts to see defects in the object that initially appeared to be so beautiful and desirable in the heat of attachment.

Likewise aversion is due to the exaggeration that is induced by an inappropriate attention that sees only faults in the object, and that is what causes anger. Again, we can verify from our own experience that when the fire of strong anger starts to subside, then one can start seeing qualities in that object. This shows how it is an underlying ignorance that drives craving.

Of the two types of craving, we relate more readily to the craving of wishing to attain happiness. That is because at the most basic level we want to experience happiness, and because we wish for happiness, craving naturally arises. We don't wish for any unpleasant experiences, and when we do actually experience something unpleasant, the craving of wanting to be separated from that unpleasantness arises. That is how we can relate craving to ourselves.

2.3.2.1.2.3. Refuting that the focal object exists inherently

The next two lines of the verse are:

*99ab. Whether seen or felt,
It is due to its dream-like illusory nature*

The commentary explains:

Regardless of whether it is seen by eye consciousness or felt by the body consciousness, because of the dream-like or illusory-like nature of the object empty of inherent existence generating the feeling, the feeling also does not exist inherently.

This is a very cogent explanation. Regardless of whether it is seen by the eye consciousness or felt by the body consciousness refers to either the beautiful forms that we see with our eye consciousness, or the pleasant sensations we experience from touching smooth tactile surfaces. Since these objects of the sensory consciousnesses are like dreams or illusions, they are empty of inherent existence.

When we see forms, they don't actually exist in the way they appear, so they are like dreams or illusions. When we relate this idea to emotions such as attachment, then these emotions will naturally subside. Attachment arises from thinking that what is perceived is real, and exists as it appears. The more we see and believe an object as being real and attractive, the more our attachment to that object increases. As soon as you see that the object lacks inherent existence, and that it does not exist as it appears to our eye consciousness, this understanding of the emptiness of the object will help cut through our delusions.

As explained in the teachings, while in meditative equipoise the mind of someone who has realised emptiness is completely absorbed in that emptiness. There is no conventional appearance and nothing but emptiness appears to their mind. As a consequence the delusions that arise in relation to conventional appearances naturally subside.

When that meditator comes out of their meditative equipoise into a post-meditative equipoise, they reflect on how things still appear as being inherently or truly existent when, in fact, they don't exist in that way. While in post-meditative equipoise, the trainee bodhisattva sees things as being like illusions or dreams, and thus not truly existent or inherently existent. Then strong negative emotions such as attachment or aversion will subside. This is a very significant point.

We need to understand that the analogies of dreams and illusions are very significant examples that illustrate how our mind is affected by ignorance, and thus misapprehends the things and events around us. In a dream, we believe that there are horses and elephants when in reality there are no such horses or elephants. That perception of horses and elephants is due to the mind being affected by the consciousness of sleep, which alters the mind so that it perceives things that don't actually exist and believes them to be real.

Another analogy given in the teachings is someone whose mind is affected by a spell during a magic show. When an illusionist conjures up horses and elephants, the people in the audience, who are under the spell of the illusionist, will see elephants and horses. Although there are actually no horses or elephants on the stage, they appear to the minds of the audience because their consciousnesses are affected by the spell.

Using these analogies we can understand that even though phenomena don't exist inherently, we perceive them as inherently or truly existent because our mind is affected by the ignorance that grasps at true existence and inherent existence, along with the imprints of that wrong perception.

For as long as one grasps at true existence due to the very imprints of that grasping at true existence, one will have mistaken perceptions, which will be followed by grasping at those mistaken perceptions. The only way to get rid of those mistaken perceptions is by removing their cause, which means removing that grasping at true existence and the imprints of grasping at true existence.

Someone who has completely removed not only grasping at true existence, but its very imprints from their mental continuum is an enlightened being, a supreme being, who does not have mistaken conceptions and perceptions. A supreme being sees the world as illusory, and so does not have any mistaken conceptions and perceptions. Thus they are not affected by any of the falsities caused by those mistaken perceptions, and hence do not experience any of the sufferings of worldly existence.

If we see the Buddha as a supreme being who is free from mistaken conceptions, then we will be inspired to become like the Buddha. Otherwise we might see the Buddha just as someone sitting there who seems to be very peaceful. If we don't know what the Buddha is free of, we might not be inspired to achieve the same state.

All of the sufferings that we experience are said to arise from the misconceptions that we hold. In the Lama Chopa text, after the tsog offering, there's this one particular line that says may all beings be free from the mistaken conceptions. I find that to be a very powerful line because not only does it point out the suffering that sentient beings experience, but it also explains that the very cause of that suffering comes from mistaken conceptions.

When we recite the Lama Chopa, as we do regularly, it is good to reflect on that line when we come to it. When we relate it to ourselves rather than thinking about other sentient beings who are suffering because of their mistaken conceptions, it becomes much more profound. Our own mind is affected by misconceptions, and because of this we experience the shortcomings of worldly existence.

If we can actually incorporate more visualisations during the Lama Chopa practice it will become much more profound. The tsog you take out is not just to satisfy them by temporarily relieving the suffering of hunger. As the deity when ones visualises transforming oneself into the tsog, then merely coming into contact with sentient beings will help them to be free from all their sufferings, i.e. the sufferings arising from their misconceptions. This is indicated in the verse. That then becomes not only a temporary relief from suffering, but also relieves all the forms of suffering that have arisen from mistaken conceptions.

We will conclude the session for this evening and dedicate the Tara Praises we are going to recite to Helen's oldest son Martin who has undergone surgery today. I've already done my part of doing prayers and as a group we can do the Tara Praises and dedicate them for the success of that operation. As we wait for the results let us pray that everything goes well and that he will be relieved from all physical ailments and recover soon.

As many of you have experienced, there is a definite benefit from prayers.

When they arrived in Australia, some Tibetans lived here at Tara Institute for a while; one of them came to teachings once in a while, on special occasions. One day she came to me looking very anxious. She told me that her sister, who lives in Scotland, had been missing for two days and that the police were looking for her. So she was very, very anxious.

I said: "Don't worry too much. Maybe you will speak to your sister in the future. You can even say that she can come here if she wanted. Her immediate response was: "Well how can I speak to her when she's missing? I've really come to see you hoping that you can do an observation, a mo, to see where she is". My response was: "Well I'm not someone who does mos, but I'll do prayers for her", but she didn't seem very pleased about that.

The next day I got a message from her saying that they had found her sister that morning. A year later she introduced me to her sister when they came here recently for a puja. I didn't mention anything then but it did remind me that when I'd suggested that she could bring her sister over she had said: "How could I ever bring her here? She's lost", and she hadn't seemed to relate to what I'd said about doing prayers at all. This is one instance of where prayers definitely seemed to help.

I have quite a few stories like that. Once I was asked to do prayers for a Kopan monk known as Cherok Lama (the older Cherok Lama). He had come to Australia and was in prison in Perth – I don't know what had happened. At that time Lama Zopa happened to be here, and he said to me: "Geshe-la we just got news that Cherok Lama has been imprisoned in Perth, maybe you can do some prayers?" Then the next day Rinpoche said to me: "Geshe-la I think your prayers have worked, because he's been released from prison".

The point is that prayers definitely seem to work if one does the prayers with a sincere mind, wishing to benefit the other, while making strong supplications to the gurus and the deities. The Kadampa masters said: don't rely on humans; rely on the deities. There's definitely a positive effect from prayer.

Your prayers will be very strong when you relate to deities such as Tara, thinking that you are the guru, you are the deity, you are all the protectors and dakas and dakinis, and that you are an unfailing friend and companion.

I have many stories from my days in Kopan when Lama Zopa Rinpoche would ask me to do prayers for certain things. Rinpoche could have done those prayers himself but he asked me, saying, "Oh, it's better for you to do them as they will be more beneficial". So I would do these prayers, and it seems that there were some benefits from them.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

20 December 2016

Based on the motivation that was generated with the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice.

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines: For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will engage in the virtuous practice of listening to the teaching and then put it into practice well.

It is good to set our motivation so that our practice incorporates both method and wisdom, which is the optimum means for creating the causes for enlightenment. Those who have gained the realisation of emptiness will set their motivation to achieve enlightenment for the benefit all mother sentient beings, prior to going into single-pointed meditative equipoise on emptiness. It is said that because their meditative equipoise is held with the bodhicitta motivation - which includes the aspiration to achieve enlightenment, they will be engaging in the practise of both method and wisdom throughout their meditative equipoise. Their single-pointed meditative equipoise on emptiness is not rendered to nothingness because of their bodhicitta motivation.

We need to relate this to all forms of our practice. Prior to engaging in the practice of prostration, for example, we can take a few moments to generate the bodhicitta motivation. Although we have not yet actually generated bodhicitta, we can develop a contrived bodhicitta motivation, and that similitude of the bodhicitta motivation, will help to secure a more meaningful practice. Combining simple practices with the bodhicitta motivation makes the practice really significant.

2.3.2.1.2. The close placement by mindfulness on feelings [cont.]

2.3.2.1.2.4. Refuting that the feelings of the object possessor exist inherently

Having refuted feelings as being inherently existent, we now turn to refuting that the feelings of an object possessor exist inherently.

The first lines of verse relating to this are:

99cd. *Because it is generated simultaneously with mind
Feeling is not seen by it.*

100ab. *Although generated earlier and later
It is remembered but not experienced.*

As the commentary explains:

Because feeling is generated simultaneously with mind, it is not seen inherently by the mind because those that are of different substance and simultaneous are unrelated. Although feelings are generated earlier and later, they are remembered but not experienced because, at that time, they have ceased and are not generated.

First of all, even though feelings are generated simultaneously with mind, they are not seen as being inherently existent by the mind. That is because even though they are generated simultaneously they are of different substance and therefore unrelated. When the commentary states although feelings are generated earlier and later, it is referring to feelings that are remembered but not experienced now because they have, in fact, already ceased.

The main point to be understood is the lack of inherent existence of a mind that experiences feelings. This is then clarified in the following lines of verse.

100cd *It does not experience its own nature,
And is also not experienced by others.*

101a. Since there is absolutely no one with feeling,

As the commentary explains:

Summary: That feelings do not experience themselves is refuted with the refutation of self-knowers. They are also not experienced by an inherently existent another because that which is experienced and the experiencer are unrelated. Not only does that producing the feeling not exist inherently, there is also absolutely no inherently existent experiencer of feeling. This was already refuted at the time of refuting the self of person.

The commentary explains - that feelings do not experience themselves is refuted with the refutation of self-knowers. Earlier the text refuted self-knowers. From this it follows that feelings cannot experience themselves. In other words there are no inherently existing feelings that experience themselves.

Lest one has the doubt that there might be another factor that experiences feelings inherently, the text clarifies that feelings are not experienced by an inherently existent other. That is because that which is experienced and the experiencer are unrelated. Experiencing someone else's feeling is an absurdity because there is no relationship between the experiencer, and that which is experienced i.e. the feeling.

Further, as the commentary explains, not only does that producing the feeling not exist inherently, but also there is absolutely no inherently existent experiencer of the feeling. This further refutes any doubts that while the feeling does not exist inherently, the experiencer - the person who experiences that feeling - might exist inherently. There is also absolutely no inherently existent experiencer of feeling as well. As explained in the commentary the self of a person was refuted earlier.

The next few lines of the verse are presented:

101bcd. *Thus feeling is not suchness.
In this way, how can this collection lacking self
Be harmed by this?*

As the commentary explains:

Thus, just as feeling does not exist as suchness, how should the collection of aggregates, that lack an inherently existing self, be benefited by happiness and harmed by suffering? As there is no inherently existing suffering as well as no inherently existing feeling, it is suitable to apply every effort to meditate on the close placement of mindfulness on feeling.

Since feelings are not inherently existent, how could the collection of aggregates, which lack an inherently existing self, be benefited by happiness and harmed by suffering? This is similar to what was explained earlier. If feelings were to exist inherently and the person experiencing the feeling also exists inherently, then who is there to benefit from pleasurable, happy feelings? Who is there to be harmed by inherently existent feelings of pain and suffering? While feelings of happiness are beneficial and feelings of suffering are harmful, the point here is that inherently existent feelings of happiness cannot benefit anyone and inherently existent suffering cannot harm anyone. This point was also mentioned previously.

As further explained here, as there is no inherently existing suffering as well as no inherently existing feeling, it is appropriate to apply every effort to meditate on the close placement of mindfulness on feeling. This conclusion specifically relates to applying the close placement of mindfulness on the lack of inherent existence of feeling, or the emptiness of feeling.

The main point to be understood here is that if one perceives feelings as being inherently existent one will develop attachment to pleasant feelings, and aversion towards unpleasant feelings. It is through such feelings of attachment and aversion that one creates negative karmas. But when one perceives happy feelings as lacking inherent existence, then attachment will not arise, and when one views any feelings of suffering as lacking inherent existence, then one will not develop an aversion to discomfort. Through the correct understanding of the lack of inherent existence of phenomena in general, and the lack of inherent existence of feelings in particular, the delusions will be overcome. In this way we gain a glimpse of the importance of understanding the lack of inherent existence of phenomena.

When someone, who believes that things exist inherently, hears the teachings on emptiness, they might develop the thought that maybe these teachings on emptiness are valid. As the teachings mention, for those who are receptive, generating even a mere doubt¹ about the validity of emptiness in this way can begin to shatter the very core of cyclic existence. Through understanding the lack of inherent existence, and thus the emptiness of phenomena, the delusions are first weakened, then eventually completely eradicated. This is an essential point to understand.

In order to overcome attachment and craving, one needs to develop an understanding of the lack of inherent existence of feelings. That is the only way to overcome attachment and aversion. A quote in the teachings says that 'because love is not a direct opponent, it cannot overcome the delusion of craving'. The point is that while the unconditional love of bodhicitta in a bodhisattva's mind is an invaluable most precious state of mind, it nevertheless cannot in itself overcome the delusions, the reason is because it doesn't serve as a direct opponent to those delusions. Therefore, as the teachings further explain, in order to overcome the ignorance of grasping at true existence or inherent existence, the direct opposite of that mind needs to be developed as an antidote to overcome that ignorance. This is really the point one needs to understand. So at our level, having this understanding, and applying it in practice means reflecting on these points again and again, and familiarise our mind with this understanding, as a way to get a better and clearer understanding of the lack of inherent existence, i.e. emptiness.

To apply this as a personal practice, we start by sitting quietly in a focused and a concentrated state of mind, and then look within and examine our feelings. How do feelings actually appear to us? Do they appear as independently existing from their own side? Is that actually the mode of existence of feelings? Or do feelings actually exist in dependence on other factors? When one contemplates in this way, one begins to clearly distinguish between the two different modes of existence. One is the erroneous view that perceives the mode of existence of feelings as existing inherently and independently, in and of themselves? The actual mode of existence, however, is that feelings rely on other factors for their existence, and hence do not exist inherently. When we contemplate these two perceptions, we see that they are the complete opposite of each other. So, which perception is the correct one? The perception of feelings as being inherently and truly existent, or feelings as lacking inherent existence, and which do not exist in and of themselves?

The object is the same, i.e. feeling, and there are two modes of apprehending that object of feeling. One is to apprehend it as being inherently existent, and the other is to see that it lacks inherent existence. Which of these two modes of apprehending feelings is true? When one further investigates in this way, one begins to find that the apprehension of feelings as existing inherently does not have any valid reason to support it. So it is based on a false perception rather than a true perception. The apprehension of feelings as lacking inherent existence is, on the other hand, based on a valid cognition, and is therefore true. It is in this way that one's understanding of the lack of inherent existence is enhanced, and this understanding can then be applied to all other phenomena.

Meditating on, and contemplating these points is essential for enhancing our understanding. Otherwise after receiving some teachings we will end up just parroting: "oh yes, the perception of grasping at true existence and inherent existence is false - it's a mistaken perception. It is mentioned in the teachings so must be true", and leave it at that. If we haven't really spent the time investigating it for ourselves, then it will be just another object of knowledge, and not an actual experience.

As it is our last session for the year, it will good to do an extensive dedication for the time that we have spent together throughout the year. It's important to dedicate the merits that we have accumulated collectively throughout the year, and we will do that by reciting the King of Prayers.

It is also good to incorporate an understanding of how, when one dedicates virtues, one is able to dedicate the virtues of the three times, which means the virtues that we have accumulated at any time in the past, the virtues we are accumulating at this time and also the virtues that are yet to be accumulated in the future. I explained this in detail during my explanation of the practice of tong-len or the giving and taking practice. When we offer virtues to others we can offer the virtues of all three times. On the other hand we can only offer the body and possessions that we possess now. We can't offer the body and possessions of the past because that time is gone and we don't have them any more, and we can't offer our future body and possessions because we don't possess them yet. Thus, we can only offer the wealth and possessions that we have now.

With But we can give in the three times: Yesterday I gave, today I give, and tomorrow I will also give. The reason why one can offer virtues of the past is because we still have in our possession the positive imprints left upon our mental continuum in the past, and that's what we are actually offering - the positive imprints in our mind. That is how it should be understood.

During the recitation of The King of Prayers it is good to reflect upon all the virtues one has ever accumulated in the past since beginningless time: "Whatever positive deeds and virtues that I have created intentionally or otherwise, I dedicate for the benefit of all sentient beings, to relieve them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness". So dedicating our virtues to the ultimate state of enlightenment makes one's dedication much more powerful and meaningful.

I want to thank everyone for your participation in the teachings this year, which have gone very well. Thank-you!

After a short break over Christmas the program will resume on Monday evenings on January 2, and the Wednesday program will begin on January 11. Rather than just staying in your room doing nothing, coming along to meditation together would be good. I place great importance not only on practising together, but also on gathering together afterwards, and have tea together. This is a good way to promote good relationships between students. There have been many who have commented that they have found starting the year, and indeed starting any practice with meditation is very beneficial and meaningful.

In discussion with Ross he said that that he couldn't attend the Kalachakra Initiation this year, and also Tina is not going, so I suggested that you would derive the same benefit from watching a live-stream of the event together. It would be good for those who are around to come along, and perhaps bring something to eat and drink, and watch it together. That would be a really meaningful way to spend time together, again promoting good feelings between each other.

On a practical level, if even one hour spent together with good friends and like-minded people relieves feelings of loneliness, then it will have been worthwhile. If you are at home by yourself, your mind might not be content and go wandering off everywhere. If you are a meditator, of course, then that's different. But you might as well come to a gathering like this because it's more meaningful than sitting at home with a distracted mind. I consider a gathering of like-minded people promotes good feelings and develops good relationships with each other. I personally take great pride in having a good relationship with others and I feel that it's a really important element of our existence.

Apparently not too long ago, the Kalachakra Initiation done in Ladakh was presented on the ABC's Compass program. Two weeks later when I went for my regular check-up with my doctor, he commented on having seen that program. He was very, very impressed and said "oh, it was really very good". Of course I couldn't understand everything he was saying, but what I gathered was that he said "His Holiness the Dalai Lama is doing really good work". The fact that it was presented by Geraldine Doogue, who is very well respected, was important, as having a well-known presenter seems to make a difference.

You don't need to feel that if you can't come to the live-stream every day that there's no point in coming. That's a narrow-minded way of looking at it. Even coming to one or two sessions will bring some benefit, so that's OK.

Of course my intention is that it will be of some benefit and help. I heard that last year over 100 people joined in the Tara Practice and Lama Tsong Khapa puja. It makes me happy when others take an interest and seem to benefit from these practices.

Having just recited the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, it is important to remember that taking refuge is the means to protect oneself from following a wrong path, while generating bodhicitta is the means to protect oneself from the lower paths. Keeping these two essential motivational points in mind, we can now engage in our regular tonglen meditation practice.

[Meditation]

As we do regularly, we now generate our motivation for receiving the teachings, which is extremely important. This can be along the lines of: for the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

As mentioned earlier, taking refuge is the optimum means to protect oneself from following a wrong path. In very simple terms this means that dedicating ourselves to following the Buddha's teachings, in particular developing faith in his advice, will naturally protect us from following a mistaken path.

The Buddha is an incomparably kind guide who is free from all mistaken concepts and endowed with all possible good qualities. Recalling the kindness and great qualities of this incomparably kind being will instil a strong aspiration to follow the Buddha's advice. Just thinking about this can bring great solace to the mind.

We also need to have a good understanding of how generating the bodhicitta motivation, the essence of the Mahayana path, protects one from following the lower path. Here, the greater path is where one completely dedicates oneself to the goal of achieving the ultimate state of enlightenment for the sole purpose of benefiting other sentient beings.

The paths of the hearers and solitary realisers are termed the Lower Path only in relation to the goals of the Mahayana or Great Vehicle. Their primary purpose for entering the path is to be free from suffering, which is for one's own benefit. Their goal, or aim, is to achieve liberation solely for oneself, which is a state of being free from cyclic existence. So, in comparison with the Great Vehicle's purpose and goal their path is called a lower path.

Of course one needs to be mindful that this does not mean in any way that the hearers' and solitary realisers' vehicle is inferior. In fact, achieving liberation is an incredible achievement. The realisations and the achievements gained on the hearer and solitary realiser paths are astonishing compared to any achievements of ordinary beings. However, when compared to the Great Vehicle, their achievements are less significant. Thus, it is the bodhicitta motivation which protects one from aiming for these lesser goals.

Those who have entered the path of the Great Vehicle are referred to as bodhisattvas or noble beings. The mind of a bodhisattva is imbued with bodhicitta - the altruistic wish to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings. Their mind is spontaneously imbued with bodhicitta, and their conduct is to engage in the practice of the six perfections. We can see how amazing bodhisattvas are, just from the description of being endowed with these two qualities! Being engaged in the practices of the six perfections means that their practice is solely for the benefit of sentient beings.

The tonglen giving and taking practice that we have just done, is, as I have mentioned previously, a very profound practice and not to be taken lightly; when one actually takes it to heart it is really a very profound and deep practice. It is good to remember that this is the very core practice of bodhisattvas.

Thinking about these qualities of the bodhisattvas can really inspire us. As Buddhists, we naturally have strong faith in the Buddha seeing him as an enlightened being. It is important to reflect on the fact that a buddha is none other than the result of the practices done by a bodhisattva. As reflected in the teachings, the Buddha did not suddenly materialise out of nowhere. Rather, he is a supreme being who engaged in all the causes and conditions on the path, beginning with the very basic levels, going through the entire stages of the path and reaching that ultimate state of enlightenment. So the manner in which the Buddha became an enlightened being is a source of great encouragement for us all.

Of course at our level, we may have not yet developed the bodhicitta mind. However, since we are followers of the Mahayana path we need to aspire to follow the Great Vehicle path. So at the very least we must make every endeavour to generate even a similitude of the bodhicitta motivation. Even if it's a contrived bodhicitta motivation, we need to really develop this as strongly as possible. In its simplest form, we should dedicate our practice and teaching - indeed whatever virtue one engages in - towards the benefit of all sentient beings, and then aspire to achieve enlightenment for that purpose. If we generate this mind again and again whenever we do our practice, then through familiarity with this thought, our mind naturally becomes more and more imbued with this motivation and aspiration. It is through familiarity that one actually develops all the realisations on the path. That is what we need to do at our level.

There are other points about going for refuge and generating bodhicitta that we need to reflect upon and understand clearly. Refuge is a practice that is common to all three vehicles - the hearer vehicle, the solitary realiser vehicle, as well as the greater vehicle. Whereas generating bodhicitta is the uncommon practice of the Great Vehicle, the Mahayana Vehicle. There is a form of refuge that is called the Mahayana Refuge that involves a particular formula. However, in general, refuge is common to all three vehicles, while generating bodhicitta is an uncommon practice for those who aspire to follow the Great Vehicle.

Indeed, we can say that taking refuge is common to all religions; all religions have a form of refuge that they practise prior to engaging in any of their practices. Christians go for refuge to Jesus and God whenever they engage in some ceremony or practice. As a spiritual seeker or a follower of religion it's good to understand that taking refuge is common to all spiritual traditions. These are important points to understand, otherwise people might think: "Oh, going for refuge must be unique to Buddhists? Is it only because I'm a Buddhist that I have to take refuge?" In fact it is good to know that all religions have a form of refuge. However, since we aspire to follow the path of the Great Vehicle, it is good to know that as followers of the Mahayana path we have the additional task of generating bodhicitta.

While taking refuge is common to all religious practitioners, taking refuge in the Three Jewels is unique to Buddhism. Having a clear understanding of what the Three Jewels - the Buddha, the Dharma and Sangha - are, a conviction in the protection the Three Jewels provide, and a heartfelt reliance on the Three Jewels is a unique Buddhist practice. On the basis of taking refuge in the Three Jewels, the principle of non-violence is implemented, which is to refrain from harming any living being. So the practice common to all Buddhists is taking refuge in the Three Jewels, and refraining from harming other sentient beings.

Generating the bodhicitta motivation on the basis of taking refuge and refraining from harming others is what makes Mahayana practice unique. So as followers of the Mahayana tradition, our refuge and other practices become a Mahayana practice, when they are held with - at the very least - a contrived bodhicitta attitude. That is something that we really need to work on as seekers of the Mahayana practice. I have given detailed explanations of this in the past. Because taking refuge and generating bodhicitta are done before every practice, it is really good to have a clear understanding of what they mean.

The most practical and simple way for us, as ordinary beings, to implement the bodhicitta attitude in our daily lives is to follow the advice of His Holiness the Dalai Lama (which I also emphasise again and again), which is to generate the thought: "I will not intentionally harm any living being and I will do my utmost to only benefit sentient beings". Generating this noble thought on a daily basis is, as His Holiness the Dalai Lama says, a substitute of the bodhicitta motivation for us ordinary beings. So we really need to pay attention to these two lines. I'm not boasting, but I really do pay attention to generating this thought. You can also go a little bit further by spending a few more moments thinking: "I will do everything possible to only benefit sentient beings and I will completely shun and avoid harming sentient beings". Just spending a few moments cultivating this thought can bring great solace to the mind, leading to a genuine sense of calmness and ease. So it's very beneficial.

These points are not all that complicated and they are very easy to contemplate, yet they are very, very profound; they can also help to bring about a great transformation in one's mind. When we think about it, these attitudes are very reasonable. There is no sentient being who wishes to experience any harm, and there is no sentient being who does not wish for benefit. In other words, all living beings naturally want to experience benefit and happiness and do not wish to experience any kind of harm or suffering.

When we commit ourselves to benefitting others and not harming them, which is what they wish for, then we are actually engaging in the very core practices that the great Mahayana practitioners of the past implemented in their lives. If we can follow their example and generate this thought, then, as mentioned earlier, as we become more familiar with these sentiments and thoughts (which will of course take some effort initially) and we will begin to notice a real transformation taking place in our mind. Because our mind becomes gentler and genuinely kinder, we will naturally become less prone to harming sentient beings and more readily inclined to help other beings. This is the transformation that will naturally take place over time. So this is really a very profound level of practice to adopt.

When the Buddha mentioned these profound words: "If you harm sentient beings, you are harming me; when you benefit sentient beings, you are benefitting me", he was saying that "if you respect me and have faith in me, then benefit sentient beings, and don't harm them". It was through the practice of only benefitting sentient beings and not harming any sentient being that the Buddha reached the state of enlightenment. So the incomparable and kind Buddha has given us some very practical advice. When we generate these thoughts and really commit ourselves to engaging in these practices, then our life becomes much more meaningful, and our practices become much more profound, and much more complete. We might be inclined to engage in Dharma practice, but in order to engage in practice we need to know how to practice. These are the instructions on how to conduct ourselves on a daily basis through our thoughts and actions.

It is good to acknowledge the great fortune that we have at this time. We are engaging in none other than the unmistakable Mahayana teachings of the Buddha, so being part of this gathering is incredibly fortunate. We have met with unmistakable Mahayana teachers and we have these incredible conditions to engage in practice. So it is important for us to really utilise them to the best of our ability, because having all of them at the same time is a rare opportunity.

More specifically, as a human being, we have the eight freedoms, which free us from the eight adverse conditions, and the ten endowments. Possessing these is unique to human beings. As Lama Tsongkhapa mentioned, they are more precious than a wish-fulfilling jewel. This is a very significant point, when we think about what we can achieve with our present conditions. No amount of money, even hundreds of millions of dollars can buy us our ultimate purpose. But with these eight freedoms and ten endowments of a precious human rebirth, we can achieve our ultimate purpose.

As Lama Tsongkhapa said, we waste our life with meaningless worldly activities if we do not pay attention to the great meaning of our life, which is another very significant point. When we don't think about the preciousness of a human life, then we naturally fall into a normal pattern of using this life for worldly pleasures, which is how we tend to spend our lives.

Furthermore, the conditions that we have with our precious human rebirth are also rare and very difficult to find. If we didn't think about the rarity and difficulty of acquiring these conditions, then we might relax and think: "Oh, there's no rush to engage in Dharma practices". But as Lama Tsongkhapa mentions, a precious human rebirth is more precious than a wish-fulfilling jewel, and we have only found these precious conditions at this time. This indicates that if we were to lose this opportunity, it will be very, very difficult to obtain it again. So these are essential points to contemplate.

The teachings give many examples that explain the rarity of a precious human rebirth. We can think about the rarity of finding a precious human rebirth in terms of the cause. This is another essential point that we need to reflect upon. The cause for obtaining a precious human rebirth is said to be the threefold causes of observing morality as a basis, making aspirational prayers, and finally complementing them with the practices of generosity and so forth. These three factors are the causes for a precious human rebirth.

Another teaching mentions that there is no other cause for obtaining a higher status than morality. This teaching specifically emphasises that morality, or ethics, is the basic cause for obtaining a high status. So we need to really think about the importance of following an ethical life.

We can rejoice in the fact that because of our practice of morality in the past, we have now obtained a precious human rebirth. So we can congratulate ourselves and feel joy in what we have achieved. We made aspirational prayers in the past to engage in good deeds, and dedicated them to obtaining a precious human rebirth such as we have now. The fact that we engaged in practices of generosity and so forth in the past can be seen from our current conditions - we are not lacking for food, shelter and other basic needs such as medicine and so forth. As a result of having engaged in these practices in the past we have obtained these incredibly good conditions now.

However, if we want to secure a precious human rebirth in our future lives, then there is no other way than engaging in the very practices that were the cause for our current precious human rebirth i.e. practising morality, making aspirational prayers, and complementing them with the practices of generosity and so forth. So if we can create these causes now, then we should be in no doubt that we will obtain a precious human rebirth in the next life. It will naturally follow! We have obtained a precious human rebirth now, as a result of previous causes, so if we practise in the same way, we will definitely obtain the good conditions again in the future.

But if we don't practise and engage in the causes now, then that is where it becomes difficult. We need to understand that the great advantage of obtaining a precious human rebirth again in the future is that we will be able to continue with the practices that we have engaged in over this current life. If we continue to do this from life to life then our conditions will just get better and better, and we will progress to higher and higher levels of achievements and realisations and so forth.

Contemplating the preciousness and the rarity of our precious human rebirth should not be taken lightly. It is a point that is emphasised in many teachings as being an impetus to practice. We should not think of it lightly by saying "oh, this is just a beginners practice". Rather, we need to really contemplate these points again and again, and take them to heart. As Lama Tsongkhapa mentioned, when you think of the rarity of a precious human rebirth, there is no way that you will lie around in a leisurely manner. This is another significant point. If we are lying around leisurely, this means that we are not really contemplating the rarity of our precious human rebirth.

Furthermore, as the teachings emphasise, having thought about the preciousness of the human rebirth, followed by its rarity, we must also contemplate how easily this precious rebirth can end. This means thinking about the fragility of our life. These are all very meticulous and very profound ways of encouraging us to engage in Dharma practice.

If we don't think about the preciousness of a human rebirth, we won't be inspired to use it for a meaningful purpose. If we don't think about its rarity, then we might think: "Oh well, I have a precious human rebirth now, but I can obtain another one at any time. So I don't have to worry about it now". In order to overcome such a misconception, we need to contemplate how easily this precious human rebirth can end. If we don't contemplate that, then again we will fall victim to laziness, thinking, "Yes, I need to use my precious human rebirth in a meaningful way to practice Dharma, but I can do that tomorrow or the day after, or some time in the future". So contemplating death and impermanence is crucial, as it inspires us to not waste our time and opportunity, and to put our good conditions to use.

Lama Tsongkhapa mentions in his work, Lines of Experience:

This human existence with its (eight) liberties is much more precious than a wish-granting jewel. Obtained just this once, difficult to acquire and easily lost, (it passes in a flash) like lightning in the sky. Considering how (easily this can happen at any time) and realizing that all worldly activities are as (immaterial as) chaff, you must try to extract its essence at all times, day and night. I, the yogi, have practised just that. You who also seek liberation, please cultivate yourself in the same way.

As Lama Tsongkhapa mentioned, by contemplating the precious human rebirth one develops a sense of seeing the affairs of this life as being meaningless, and lacking essence. They are no more than chaff which, like worldly affairs, has no essence.

These are points to reflect upon. If our worldly life had some essence, then because we are so engrossed and busy with these worldly affairs, we should have gained some sort of real satisfaction and happiness by now. But the fact that we have not gained true satisfaction and happiness, shows that whatever we have engaged in so far has lacked any essence, and we have not really achieved anything meaningful so far. So Lama Tsongkhapa encourages us to really contemplate these points as a way to lessen our engagement with meaningless worldly affairs, and engage our mind in virtue and the Dharma.

I apologise that I have seemingly gone off on a tangent in mentioning these points again. As I consider you all to be really good Dharma friends, I'm just sharing my thoughts as a way to encourage all of us to make our life more meaningful and to practise a bit of Dharma.

When I think about these points made by Lama Tsong Khapa, I feel that being completely immersed in this life's affairs primarily involves engaging in many negativities to please and protect your dear ones, and engaging in many negative deeds to combat your enemies. That's what this life's affairs are mostly involved with, as a result of which they lack any essence. In the end, engaging in such affairs only brings about more frustration and suffering. Perhaps I'm wrong, but that's what I feel. If I am wrong then I apologise.

As Lama Tsongkhapa said, in a very simple way, when there is attachment to one's own side, then instinctively there will be aversion towards anyone who opposes one's own side. Isn't holding on to such sentiments just a cause for more agony?

Again, I want to say how wonderful it is to have this opportunity to gather together again after a gap of a few weeks. You all seem very well and I'm definitely well, and my trip to India was very beneficial and successful.

The one thing that was a bit difficult and challenging was that Indian food somehow doesn't agree with me these days. I don't know what it is, but when I tried the food, it initially seemed quite tasty but then after a while, it didn't really taste nice at all. Then, although I didn't really get sick from it, I just lost my appetite, so I couldn't eat much. Then I resorted to having a clear soup, which seemed to be quite tasty! But after a while I started thinking "I wonder if this taste is because they've used MSG".

We can see here how you can use logic even in these situations. I was being served a clear broth, but because it was very tasty I was thinking, "How could something very clear and bland have so much taste?" So then I asked, and sure enough I found they had used MSG in the soup!

On a more positive note I can definitely assure you that I enjoyed the teachings very much. The teachings were so clear for me and I didn't even have to use my hearing aids at all. It must be the result of some sort of good, virtuous actions that I created in the past that I was able to hear the teachings so clearly, without the hearing aids. Of course His Holiness' speech has the incredible quality of being very clear and very precise. But I was able to really listen to them very easily. I didn't have any difficulty, and I didn't get tired.

However, when the teachings finished, getting back to my accommodation was a bit of a struggle, as there were big crowds to get through. I was very tired, and I had two young monks helping me back to my accommodation. When I had the younger monks helping me, they were just eager to get back home. Later when I had some of the older monks from house number 15 helping me, they said "Oh, Geshe-la, maybe we will stop and have some tea here". So we stopped on the way, and didn't head straight back.

While I can assure you that my time receiving the teachings was very meaningful and very good, I also would like to acknowledge those who attended the sessions that were streamed here. I was very happy to hear about that, and I want to thank you for coming along.

My intention in implementing this idea was not just to receive the teachings but to gather together, have tea together, bring some biscuits and share the food together. I felt that would be a good way to build a communal feeling. I was told that people really felt good about that and indicated that in the future, it would be good to have more sessions like these.

We can finish our session today on an auspicious note, and return to Shantideva's profound words in our next session.

Maybe I just babble on about certain things, but I do feel there will be some benefit from the points I have shared with you.

Tara said that she found it very easy to follow His Holiness' teachings in Bodhgaya due to having come to the teaching sessions here regularly. That is one indication that our gathering here has definitely had some purpose. His Holiness actually elaborated quite a bit on the close placement of mindfulness, which we have partly covered in our sessions here.

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [Meditation]

We can now generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: "For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment. So, for that purpose, I'll engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings, and then put them into practice well."

As I've mentioned previously, the meditation practice we engaged in earlier – the tong-len, or giving and taking practice – is a core bodhisattva practice that particularly encompasses the practice of the superior intention stage of the sevenfold cause and effect sequence for developing bodhicitta.

Therefore, we need to really keep this practice in our heart, not only during meditation times, but throughout our lives, as a way to further encourage our development of love and compassion.

We all have the potential to develop love and compassion. Not only do we have this potential, but we also have an understanding from the teachings of how important it is to develop love and compassion.

If we put this understanding aside and start questioning what kind of practice or meditation we are meant to be doing, then we are completely missing the point. We need to actually engage in the practices for developing love and compassion. Although we may not develop these qualities right away, through familiarity, we can definitely achieve significant results. Through familiarity with practices such as the tong-len, we will see a transformation taking place. It is important that we keep this in mind.

2.3.2. Explaining extensively the reasoning that establishes the selflessness of phenomena

2.3.2.1.3. The close placement by mindfulness on the mind

Under the major heading of the four close contemplations, we have covered the close contemplation on the body and the close contemplation on feelings. Now we will cover the close contemplation on the mind.

The earlier subdivisions analysed, firstly, the close contemplation on the non-inherent existence of the body, and secondly, the close contemplation on the non-inherent existence of feelings. Similarly, here, the close contemplation on mind is the close contemplation of the non-inherent existence of the mind.

This section is further subdivided into two:

2.3.2.1.3.1. Showing that mental consciousness does not exist inherently

2.3.2.1.3.2. Showing that preceding sense consciousness does not exist inherently

Although I've explained this previously I will give a brief explanation of what 'mind' is according to the texts. In the texts on mind and awareness, the Tibetan terms sem, yi and nam-shay which translate in English as 'mind', 'intellect' and 'consciousness', are said to be synonymous and refer to the same entity.

There are six primary (or main) minds or consciousnesses. They are called 'primary' in relation to their functionality. The mental factors are referred to as secondary minds; again, the term 'secondary' is in relation to their functionality. A primary mind or consciousness, serves as the primary factor that cognises the object on which it is focused; it does the primary engagement with the object. The accompanying mental factors or secondary minds, on the other hand, relate to the particular characteristics of the perceived object.

The analogy of the different functionalities or roles of a king and his ministers are used in the teachings to illustrate the difference between the primary mind and the mental factors. In this country, we might use the analogy of the roles of Prime Minister and the ministers. The main point of the analogy is to illustrate how a primary mind or consciousness perceives the mere identity of the object, while the mental factors perceive the particular characteristics of the object – such as the colour, shape and size of a visual object.

There is further explanation on how the primary minds and mental factors are synonymous and arise at the same time. Particular mental factors, such as the omnipresent mental factors, arise at the same time as the primary minds. The difference however is that when the mental factors perceive an object, they don't do so out of their own power. They can only perceive an object in relation to a primary mind, but not from their own accord or by their [needs to be checked as it appears it is referring to the object's own power, not the secondary mind's. Was this intended?] own power. On the other hand primary consciousnesses perceive an object through their own power. So, that is another feature to understand about the mind.

I've explained all of this in detail previously, particularly when we went through the text on Buddhist tenets.

We should note here that the Vaibhashika Buddhist school asserts that main minds and mental factors – or secondary minds – arise simultaneously. The Vaibhashikas assert a unique presentation of a simultaneous arising of cause and effect. While causes and effects are not generally simultaneous, the Vaibhashikas assert that mind and mental factors are simultaneous as well as being causes and effects. So they have this unique presentation of mind and mental factors.

It is good to relate to such explanations as a way of sharpening our reasoning. The reason why the Vaibhashikas say that secondary minds are the effects of a primary mind is that there has to be a primary factor which comes first. They assert that the primary mind comes first, followed by the secondary mind. This is asserted as cause and effect.

However, mind and mental factors are also said to be simultaneous in relation to the five omnipresent mental factors. The latter are secondary minds that are always present with the primary minds, and thus arise at the same time as the primary mind when it perceives an object.

The Tibetan term for a secondary mind is sem-jhung and the Vaibhashikas seem to take that term literally. The literal connotation of sem-jhung is 'arising or originating from the mind'. When you take literal meaning of the term in that way, then it implies that a secondary mind arises or originates from a mind that previously existed.

Again, I will not spend too much time on this, as it has already been presented previously and you can do your own research. Understanding mind and mental factors is an essential aspect of Buddhist psychology, as it is a way to understand the function of our mind.

The five omnipresent mental factors – feeling, intention, contact, attention and discrimination – are said to be always present whenever a main mind functions. There is always an associated feeling when an object is perceived by a primary mind, as well as an intention and so forth. Many of you would be aware from previous teachings that the actual definition of karma is intention. We create karma based on the intention at the time of an action. Whenever we engage an object, it is the intention that drives us towards that engagement. When we talk about creating karma, what part of us actually creates it? It is our intention. This has how we need to understand karma on a deeper level.

In relation to omnipresent mental factors, whenever we perceive an object, there is a feeling that arises simultaneously in relation to perceiving that object. As we engage with the object, we are also creating karma, and whether the karma is virtuous or non-virtuous depends on the intention. So, whenever we engage in any object, karma is involved. Discrimination, which perceives the particular characteristics of an object, along with attention and the other omnipresent mental factors, all occur at the same time.

These are important topics to really remember and understand well. Thanks to Margie for remembering the list of the five omnipresent mental factors. That goes to show you've kept them in mind. I'm hoping Margie was speaking on behalf of others who have already studied it. Although Margie doesn't assume an air of knowing much, she actually does remember things well. Whereas there might be others who presume they know a great deal, but I'm not sure how much they would actually remember!

2.3.2.1.3.1. Showing that mental consciousness does not exist inherently

102. *Mind does not abide in the sense powers,
Not on form, and also not in-between,
There is also no mind inside or outside,
And it is also not found elsewhere.*
103. *It is not the body; it does not exist separately,
It does not mix and it also does not stand alone.*

Because of not existing in the slightest, therefore Sentient beings are naturally gone beyond misery.

The commentary presents the meaning of these verses as follows:

Mind does not exist inherently because it does not abide inherently on the six sense powers; it does not abide inherently on the six objects of form, sound, scents, tastes, tactile sensations and objects of mental consciousness, and it also does not abide in between these two or on the collection of these two. Remember the seven-fold analysis of the chariot as explained in the Introduction to the Middle Way.

The mind also does not abide inherently in the internally elaborated person labelled by the non-Buddhists, not on the outer hands and other limbs, and it cannot be found to abide inherently in another way apart from the inside and outside. It is not the body or truly something else other than the body, the mind is not mixed with the body, and it also does not abide as some inherent object apart from the body. Because it does not exist inherently in the slightest way, the emptiness of inherent existence of the mind is naturally gone beyond sorrow.

The explanation starts with the statement mind does not exist inherently, followed by the reason. One needs to remember that this does not mean that the mind does not exist at all. Of course the mind, intellect or consciousness does exist, but the point being emphasised here is that it does not exist inherently.

According to the Prasangika Madhyamika or Middle Way School, the mind does not exist inherently, truly or substantially. While some lower Buddhist schools will not assert a truly existent mind, all lower Buddhist schools accept that the mind does exist inherently. So, the unique feature of the Prasangika system is the assertion that mind does not exist inherently.

According to the Prasangika, the main reason for the lack of inherent existence of the mind is that the mind does not exist without depending on an imputation; it does not exist in and of itself, independently, without depending on a label.

By contrast, the lower Buddhist schools would say that if you investigate and don't find anything through your investigation, then that would imply the object does not exist at all. So according to them since it can be found through investigation, it exists inherently.

However, the Prasangika go further, arguing that the lack of inherent existence is not only dependent on whether or not you find the object through investigation, but whether or not it exists independently, without it being labelled or imputed by the mind.

The commentary reasons that mind does not exist inherently because it does not abide inherently on the six sense powers. If the question is, 'does the mind exist?', then the answer is 'yes, it definitely does exist'. We cannot deny the fact that the mind exists: our own experience proves it. However, the point here is that while the mind depends on the six sense powers, it does not abide inherently on these six powers.

The eye consciousness, for example, does abide in dependence on the eye sense power. However, the eye consciousness does not abide inherently on the eye sense power. Likewise, the nose consciousness depends on the nose sense power but does not abide on it inherently.

If we go through all of the six sense consciousnesses, we find that none of them abide inherently on the six sense powers. As explained in the commentary, it does not abide inherently on the six sense objects of form, sound, scents, tastes, tactile sensations and objects of mental consciousness.

Here again you can refresh your memory. The six primary consciousnesses depend upon the six sense spheres, referred to here as the six sense powers. There are six corresponding types of object perceived by the six consciousnesses – forms by the eye consciousness, sounds by the ear consciousness, tastes by taste consciousness, and so forth.

The point here is that the six primary consciousnesses do abide in dependence on the six sense powers, as well as the six sense objects. Although not specifically mentioned here, when we extend this reasoning, we can see that if the consciousnesses were to exist inherently or independently, they would not have to abide in dependence upon the six sense powers and the six sense objects. The fact that they do depend on these shows that each sense consciousness cannot exist inherently, independently in and of itself.

As the commentary further explains, it also does not abide in between these two, i.e. the six sense powers and the six sense objects, or the collection of these two. If mind does not abide inherently on the six sense powers and the six sense objects individually, there's no way it could abide on the collection of the sense powers and objects, because a collection is none other than the sum of its individual parts.

The commentary continues: Remember the seven-fold analysis of the chariot as explained in the Introduction to the Middle Way.

When I presented this in the teachings on the Middle Way, those of you who attended will recall the reasoning referred to here: the chariot does not exist inherently on its individual parts, such as the wheel, hubs or spokes; and it also does not exist on the shape of the chariot, the collection of all the parts and so forth. Therefore, through this analysis, we come to the conclusion that the chariot cannot exist inherently.

The mind also does not abide inherently in the internally elaborated person labelled by the non-Buddhists... This refers to the different organs within our body, like the liver, gall bladder, intestines, and so forth. So the mind does not abide internally on these organs.

And, as further explained, ...not on the outer hands and other limbs, and it cannot be found to abide inherently in another way, apart from the inside and outside. It is not the body or truly something else other than the body, the mind is not mixed with the body, and it also does not abide as some inherent object apart or separate from the body.

So, in every instance of what is labelled by some as the person – the very body itself – the mind cannot be found to exist inherently either inside, on the internal organs, or outside, on the limbs and so forth, or in between, or even outside of the body. This, then, exhausts every possibility for the mind to exist inherently. When the mind cannot be found inside, or outside, or mixed with the body, and does not abide as some inherent object separate from the body, then that exhausts all the possibilities of finding an inherently existent mind.

As the commentary concludes: Because it does not exist inherently in the slightest way, the emptiness of inherent existence of the mind is naturally gone beyond sorrow. Having exhausted all possibilities for the mind to exist inherently, the emptiness of inherent existence of the mind within sentient beings is referred to as that which has naturally gone beyond sorrow. Emptiness itself would not be called liberation, but is referred to as an entity that has naturally gone beyond sorrow.

2.3.2.1.3.2. Showing that the preceding sense consciousness does not exist inherently¹

104. If consciousness exists before the object of knowledge,

In reference to which object is it generated?

If consciousness and the object of knowledge are simultaneous,

In reference to which object is it generated?

105ab However, if it exists subsequently to the object,

At that time what is consciousness generated from?

The commentary explains:

If the sense consciousness exists before the object of knowledge as it is not preceded by a focal condition, in reference to which focal object is it generated? If the consciousness and the object of knowledge are simultaneous, then in reference to which object is it generated? When the sense consciousness is not generated, the focal condition is not generated, so it cannot be generated, and once the focal condition is generated the consciousness is also generated and does not need a generator anymore.

If, however, the sense consciousness exists subsequently to the object of knowledge, at that time from what condition is the sense consciousness inherently generated?

This is not valid.

If it is generated from the disintegration of the previous moment, then a sprout would also have to be generated from a burnt seed. If it is generated without the disintegration of the preceding, then is it generated with another moment in-between or not? In the first case, it becomes impossible to be generated directly. In the latter case, as there is no interval in relation to its full nature, they become mixed within the one moment. If the interval relates only to one part and not to the whole, then its true existence dissolves, and it becomes non-truly existent.

The commentary begins with the statement: if the sense consciousness exists before the object of knowledge..., which is clearly an absurdity. If the object of knowledge was, for example, a form perceived by the eye consciousness, and if you were to then say that the eye consciousness perceiving form existed before the form, then how could it be an eye consciousness perceiving form when form was not around at the moment of perception? It could not be called an eye consciousness perceiving form if it existed before the form.

The reason for the absurdity of this possibility is: ...as it is not preceded by a focal condition, in reference to which focal object is it generated? Again, taking the example of the eye sense consciousness perceiving form, the focal condition for that eye sense consciousness perceiving form is form – that is the focal condition. So, if form itself didn't exist, because the focal condition is lacking, how could that sense consciousness perceiving form arise? This should be quite clear.

Having dealt with that absurdity, the commentary continues: If the consciousness and the object of knowledge are simultaneous... Having just explained that a sense consciousness could not exist before its object of knowledge, the Prasangikas proceed to refute the next possibility – that consciousness and the object of knowledge are simultaneous. A sense consciousness can only arise in relation to an object that it is perceiving. So if they were to be ...simultaneous, then in reference to which object is it generated? This is yet another absurdity.

The commentary further argues that when the sense consciousness is not generated, the focal condition cannot be generated; once the focal condition is generated the consciousness is also generated and does not need a generator anymore. If, however, the sense consciousness exists subsequently to the object of knowledge, from what condition is the sense consciousness inherently generated?

Again, because the arising of a sense awareness or a consciousness requires the condition of an object, if there is no condition, then how could it be generated?

Then another hypothesis is presented: If a sense consciousness is generated from the disintegration of the previous moment, then that implies that a sprout for example, would also have to be generated from a burnt seed. Again, the logic is quite clear. If the sense consciousness were to arise because of the disintegration of the previous moment, then you would have to say a sprout could be generated from a burnt seed.

The commentary further argues: If you say it is generated without the disintegration of the preceding, then is it generated with another moment in-between or not? In other words, is the sense consciousness generated from another moment, between the two, or is it not? In the first case, if it were generated in the moment between it would be impossible to be generated directly. Because there is another moment in-between, you cannot say that it was directly generated from the previous moment.

In the latter case, as there is no interval in relation to its full nature, they become mixed within the one moment. This is arguing that if the interval relates only to one part and not the whole, true existence dissolves and the consciousness becomes non-truly existent.

If you were pay attention and follow the reasoning and logic, it will then become quite clear to you. It might not become clear from just glancing at it once – you need to read it again and again.

The main point to be understood here is that if we were to simply investigate the existence of the conventional or illusory mind, then this analysis does not adhere to the mode of investigation required to find the meaning of ultimate reality. It is only when you attempt to ascertain whether an inherently existent mind exists or not that you will be adhering to an analysis that will bring you to the understanding of ultimate reality – that the lack of inherent existence of mind is the emptiness of the mind.

So, according to the Prasangika, the main point is that if our research and analysis is based on the existence of the conventional mind, we can all agree there is such a mind; rather we need to analyse and ascertain whether the mind exists inherently or not. In order to get an accurate, unmistakable understanding of the ultimate view asserted by the Prasangika, the investigation must be based upon whether a mind exists inherently or not. And, if it were to exist inherently, how does it exist? Where can you find an inherently existent mind?

This process of analysis, of going through every possibility of finding where an inherently existent mind might exist, and then coming to the conclusion that such a mind cannot be found, leads to the understanding of the ultimate reality of the mind, which is that it does not exist inherently. Since the mind cannot be found to exist inherently anywhere, realising the lack of inherent existence of the mind, is realising the emptiness of the mind.

If we are not careful, it is easy to take a wrong turn. If we were to investigate whether a conventional mind exists or not, and came to the conclusion that a conventional mind cannot be found, then we have actually come to a completely wrong conclusion and fall into the extreme view of nihilism. If we came to the conclusion that a conventional or illusory mind cannot be found, then that would mean the conventional mind does not exist. That would be a wrong understanding.

These are really subtle points that one needs to keep in mind when embarking on process of obtaining the correct understanding of the view.

If it were the case that not finding something is understanding its ultimate reality, then quantum physicists who do research on looking for the smallest particle of an atom, would be gaining the understanding of emptiness. From what I have heard, scientists have concluded that there is no such thing as the smallest particle: they come to a point where they cannot say 'this is the smallest particle'. But have they understood emptiness because they haven't found the smallest particle? I don't think that would be the case. Right?

I think you call this particular branch of science quantum physics. His Holiness mentioned this recently in his Kalachakra teaching at Bodhgaya. Do you recall that?

2.3.2.1.4. *The meditation on the close placement by mindfulness on phenomena*²

The next two lines of the verse relates to this:

105cd. *In such a way the generation of all phenomena
Is not realised.*

The commentary explains:

In the way explained earlier the generation of all phenomena is not realised as inherently existent, because, as it is taught in the Sutra Requested by the Superior Inexhaustible Discriminating Wisdom, one should realise all compounded and un-compounded phenomena as non-inherently existent.

In the way explained earlier the generation of all phenomena is not realised as inherently existent. This translation here doesn't convey that the Tibetan word for Dharma, chö, and the term for all existent phenomena is one and the same. The definition of chö or phenomena in general, is 'that which holds its own identity', which can also relate to the Dharma. So, while chö in general would refer to all existing phenomena, when we are referring to chö as the practice of Dharma, then it carries the meaning 'that which holds you from falling into a lower existence'.

For example, if we hold onto something to stop us from falling into a precipice, that object or factor would be protecting us from falling. In the same way, the practice of Dharma — for example, observing ethics or morality — is the factor that protects us from falling into the lower realms. So this meaning of 'holding its own identity' can be applied here as 'holding us from falling into the lower realms'. So observing morality is what it protects you from falling into the lower realms.

This is definitely the case. It is said that if you put morality into practice, then this will definitely protect you from falling into the lower realms; you will not be reborn in the lower realms in the next life.

Another way of interpreting the meaning of 'holding its own identity' in relation to Dharma practice is to understand that Dharma holds you back from mistaken or wrong conduct. Any form of practice that involves the abiding in, and accumulation of, virtue will definitely protect you from misconduct. The practice of meditation is exactly that — it protects us from wrong views, mistaken and negative states of minds, and so forth.

Coming back to the general meaning of chö as 'that which it holds its own identity', I've explained previously that if we were take a glass as an example of a phenomenon, we can see that it holds its own identity. As soon as we look at the glass, we can identify it exactly and refer to it as a glass. We don't mistake it for something else — say, a book or a table — but instinctively and automatically relate to it as a glass, that is because of the functionality of the glass. It is precisely because the glass continuously holds its own identity, that we don't mistake it for something else.

The commentary continues: In the way explained earlier the generation of all phenomena is not realised as inherently existent, because, as it is taught in the Sutra Requested by the Superior Inexhaustible Discriminating Wisdom... In this particular sutra, the Buddha mentioned that one should realise all compounded and un-compounded phenomena are non-inherently existent. So, as the Buddha himself said, all existents included in compounded and un-compounded phenomena are to be seen as non-inherently existent.

We will conclude our session for the evening, and follow with a recitation of the dedication chapter of the Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life. This is to dedicate our merits to the late mother of Sandup Tsering who passed away recently.

Sandup himself came to visit me just last Friday with a khatag and an offering, informing me he was on the way to India to see his mum who was critically ill, in her last stages. So he came with the request for some prayers and made an offering. Then he went to India, and apparently soon after he arrived there, his mum passed away.

Sandup himself is like part of our family. We knew his mother quite well too. Many of the older students would have gone to her home many times, whenever we went to India, for lunch. Sandup would always make sure we were invited to his home. He would hire a small mini-bus — in Indian terms, he had to pay quite a bit to hire it — so that we could go and visit his home and his parents. So we've had many meals with his parents.

It is also good to note that both Sandup and his younger sister Namgyal took the opportunity to really serve their parents well, particularly their mum. This year, Sandup went to India earlier and spent some time with his parents, and last year he went as well. The year before last, Namgyal was there for about three months.

It is good to take note of how they really did serve their parents to the best of their capacity. For example, for Namgyal, staying there three months meant leaving her children here. While she would have had concern for her children, nevertheless she saw the importance of looking after her own mother and went to India, sacrificing her salary for three months. Also, Sandup went last year and this year spent some time with his parents.

These are good examples for us to take note of. If our parents are already deceased, then of course, whenever we do prayers and dedication practice, we dedicate our merits to them. But if we have parents who are still alive, this is a good example for us to serve our parents well, in whatever way we can. While we have the opportunity, we do the best we can.

I understand that when Sandup's mum was taken to hospital in Bangalore for tests and treatment around four years ago, it was actually the first year that His Holiness began Lam Rim teachings there. Her visit to the hospital coincided with His Holiness coming to Bangalore for a day on the way to give teachings at the monastery. So Sandup's mum was able to be brought to the reception of the place where His Holiness was staying. His Holiness stopped and actually came close to her and she had her picture with him. His Holiness advised her that it was good for her to have really good treatment and stay in the hospital for as long as she needed. And if she had any difficulty with the finances, His Holiness said he would ask his office to assist.

² In the enumeration of headings on 22 November 2016, the heading reads The Close Placement by Mindfulness on Phenomena

This again shows the incredible compassion His Holiness has, especially for destitute people. He shows great concern and extends his love and compassion to them.

As for as Sandup's mum, after having that encounter with His Holiness, she commented: "Now I have no regrets. Even if I die I have no regrets."

Sandup's offering consists of one hundred dollars to me. My intention for this is for the Study Group to host the lunch for His Holiness's birthday, as we regularly do. I want to contribute this money towards that. Maybe Margie could keep that for me? Now we can do the prayers for the dedication. [Group recitation]

[Serving of tea]

When we recite OM AH HUM three times in the tea offering, the first recitation represents purifying all the defilements, such as the bad taste and impurities of the offering, the colour and shape, and so on - all the impurities subside. The second recitation transforms the offering substance into uncontaminated nectar. The third recitation signifies that the offering, which has now been transformed into nectar, increases expansively. This expanse of nectar is then offered to the gurus and buddhas.

The actual offering occurs when one generates the thought that the offering has been accepted. Accepting these offerings generates unceasing, uncontaminated bliss in the gurus' and buddhas' minds, which is the actual offering. So this is good to keep in mind.

Then we can think about the offering syllables individually. The OM represents the indestructible body of the Buddha Vairochana. The AH is the syllable of the indestructible speech of the Buddha Amitabha. The HUM is the syllable of the indestructible mind of Akshobya.

The HUM represents purifying all the defilements or impurities of the offering substances. There is nothing that cannot be eliminated; there are no defilements or impurities that cannot be eliminated by the indestructible mind of the enlightened being. So the HUM specifically represents that which eliminates all defilements.

The AH represents the transformation of the impure substances into pure nectar. That is because of the indestructible speech of Amitabha. Because AH represents Amitabha, it has mastered all the substances; there is nothing that cannot be transformed by the speech of Amitabha.

The OM is the indestructible syllable of Vairochana, and represents the body of the enlightened being, which represents the body. It is through the enlightened body that innumerable, infinite numbers of manifestations arise and are sent forth. So the OM represents the increasing of the pure substances. To be able to satisfy all sentient beings in accordance to their particular needs – that many bodies of innumerable enlightened bodies are manifested to assist and help each of them. This is how we need to understand the enlightened activities of the buddhas.

So if we can incorporate this understanding when making offerings, it is said that our offering will become highly meaningful.

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta motivation that we have generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

As we have just attempted to do in our short session, it is good to engage in meditation regularly like this. Engaging in meditation is a way to help to subdue the mind and in particular to bring the mind to a more peaceful state. The more we experience a calm and peaceful state of mind, the more it will contribute to a genuine sense of happiness.

Having a clear and bright state of mind is essential to our wellbeing. It ensures that wherever we go, and whatever we do will be of the utmost benefit. Meditation practice helps ensure that, through familiarity, we gradually become more and more accustomed to maintaining a positive and virtuous state of mind. The more we practise in this way, the more likely it is that we will achieve that state of mind.

If, along with a calm and peaceful state of mind, we can willingly accept hardships and difficulties then that will help us to overcome those difficulties. The fact is that we are bound to come across challenges and difficulties at different periods in our life. It's safe to say that a problem of some sort is always around the corner, and the best way to deal with any problem is by willingly accepting it.

We have the great fortune of studying this incredibly profound text. Pdraig recently asked me whether there is a specific text on the study of logic. My response was that there is no better text about logic than this very text we are studying now, A Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life. The logic used by Shantideva is in accordance with the logic of the great masters Nagarjuna and Chandrakirti. All three were very, very intelligent logicians who used very meticulous reasoning as a way to refute the assertions of other great masters such as Shantirakshita, who was also a great scholar. It is good to understand that when great scholars debate with each other they use very refined and subtle logic.

When the lineage masters of the lam rim are traced back, there are those who held the Prasangika-Madhyamika point of view and those who held the Svatantrika-Madhyamika point of view and so forth. This distinction is specifically pointed out

His Holiness the Dalai Lama regularly reminds us that we are following the Nalanda tradition. There are seventeen renowned pandits who were great scholars of this tradition, one of whom is Shantideva. Their analysis of the teachings was done in debate using reasoning and logic. Of course, the incomparably kind Buddha's teachings are the basis; however, they are not accepted at face value. Rather, they are analysed and re-analysed through reasoning and logic. Then, having been thoroughly investigated in this way, they have been established as being the ultimate intention of the Buddha. Through this analysis and debate, those who once held, for example, Mind Only School's views are later converted to the Prasangika or Consequentialist Middle Way school of thought. The way this is done is through logic.

We can use this approach on a practical level in our everyday life. Rather than being gullible and accepting whatever others say, we should only accept what is presented after carefully analysing using logic and reasoning. Investigate and use your reasoning skills to see whether what is being presented to you is valid or not, i.e. whether there is a logical reason to accept it or not. Then you will not be easily misled or influenced by negative friends. If you find yourself being easily influenced by negative friends, then that is a sign that you are not using logic and reasoning.

Some consider monks who are engaged in studies with a lot of debate to be somewhat stubborn. That is only because they do not accept things lightly without sound reasoning. For example, what may seem like a simple assertion such as, 'a vase is impermanent', is not simply accepted by saying 'yes, yes, it is impermanent'. Rather, it is debated for many hours, sometimes up to the early hours of the morning: Why is the vase impermanent? How can it proven to be impermanent? What would the consequence be if the vase were not impermanent? ...and so forth.

In the Bodhisattva's Way of Life Shantideva, who holds the Prasangika point of view, asserts that conventional (or illusory) truths lack inherent existence. The lower schools, such as the Realists, use reasoning to assert that things and phenomena do exist inherently, and the Prasangika present logical reasons to refute that.

The process presented in the teachings is that one reaches a final understanding and realisation through the process of first hearing instructions from others; then contemplating the understanding gained from hearing them; and finally meditating on the understanding gained from contemplation.

What one understands initially is based on what hears from others. Then based on the understanding gained from hearing, one uses one's intelligence to further investigate and analyse that understanding. This deeper insight and understanding derived from thorough analysis is unlike the understanding gained from merely hearing the instruction. That is because the wisdom one gains through contemplation and thinking is a wisdom that comes from within. One does not leave it just at that analytical understanding, but through meditation one takes it further to gain a deeper, and more profound level of understanding.

As explained in the teachings, the understanding one gains from hearing an instruction is an understanding based on the power of others, whereas the understanding one gains through contemplating the instruction is gained from one's own side. It is good to understand that distinction.

We can apply this on a more practical level to academic studies. I often hear of people finding it hard to choose a subject to study. If they were to use their reasoning and logic to investigate, say, five possible subjects, then through analysis they will be able to see which one of these five is the best choice.

In very simple terms, the advice is to first listen, from which you will gain some understanding. Don't leave it at that, but analyse that understanding further. Then you can use that understanding gained through analysis and investigation for the practice of meditation.

This is all just a prelude to show how, by paying a bit of attention to this seemingly complicated topic, it will become clearer if we just go through it slowly.

2.3.2.2. REFUTING THE ARGUMENT THAT THE TWO TRUTHS WOULD BE INVALID

This has three subdivisions:

- 2.3.2.2.1. Refuting the consequence of absurdity
- 2.3.2.2.2. Refuting the consequence of becoming endless
- 2.3.2.2.3. Showing there is no proof for the true existence of object and consciousness

2.3.2.2.1. Refuting the consequence of absurdity

Here the proponent is a Realist who says that if there is no truly existent illusory truth, then there could be no ultimate truth either. Therefore both truths would cease to exist. That, the Realists say, is the absurd consequence of positing the lack of true existence.

*106ab. In case the illusory does thus not exist;
How could both truths exist on it?*

The commentary begins the explanation of these two lines as an argument.

Previously object and object possessor were refuted as inherently existent, having been labelled as earlier and later. In that case, the same fault would apply to their illusory existence and, as there is no basis for the designation of any phenomenon if inherent existence is impossible, the illusory becomes non-existent. As a result, how can the two truths exist on it? They become non-existent.

Previously object and object possessor were refuted as inherently existent, relates back to the previous verse where the consciousness and the object of knowledge are refuted as being inherently existent on the basis of being labelled as earlier and later. The same fault applies to labelling them as illusory, as there will be no basis for the designation of any phenomena if inherent existence is impossible.

This is the Realists' presentation of what they see as the absurd consequence that would follow if all phenomena were to lack inherent existence. Their conclusion is how can the two truths be something that lacks inherent existence? This is a rhetorical question implying that the two truths could not exist.

Simply put, their argument is that if the illusory does not exist then ultimate truth would also not exist, and thus both truths would be non-existent.

A specific example of this logic is that if a vase, which has a conventional existence (and is therefore an illusory truth) were not to exist, then it would be impossible for the ultimate reality of the vase to exist as well. If the existence of the vase is negated then naturally there is no vase, and the ultimate reality or the emptiness of the vase cannot be established because there is no vase. So their logic is that if the illusory truth lacks inherent existence, then by implication it does not exist, and if illusory truth does not exist then ultimate truth could not exist as well.

The commentary continues:

If it is the case that you accept that the objects of form, sound and so forth exist truly to the perception of the illusion that grasps at them as inherently existent, but lack true existence from their side, and exist in an illusory manner.

Basically, the Realists saying to the Prasangika 'following your logic if you were to accept that the objects of form, sound and so forth exist truly to the perception of the illusory, which grasps at them as inherently existent, but they lack true existence from their side and thus they exist in illusory manner. Then the following assumed absurdity of the Prasangika would arise.

The next two lines read:

*106cd. If it is illusory due to another,
How can sentient beings go beyond misery?*

The commentary explains:

If we look at this, then just as the rope lacks a snake from its side, but exists as snake for the perception of the grasping at the rope as snake, your illusory existence is posited through the mere elaboration as existent by another awareness. If this is looked at, then how can sentient beings go beyond sorrow even conventionally? It follows that liberation becomes impossible – because everything that exists has been established as the mere delusion of a distortion. If this is accepted, then it follows that to comprehend the view for the purpose of liberation becomes meaningless.

In the Realists' arguments against the assumed Madhyamika position if we look at this refers to looking from the point of view of the logical consequence (according to the Realists assumption) of why the Madhyamika's assertion of illusory truth is flawed and absurd.

The example used is when under certain conditions a rope appears to be a snake, although in reality there is no snake there at all. To the mind perceiving the rope as a snake, it is as if one is seeing an actual snake and thus fear arises. However, the snake does not exist at all upon the rope.

Similarly your illusory existence is posited through the mere elaboration as existent by another awareness. Here the Realists are arguing against the Prasangika position of an illusory existence, saying 'your claim that there is illusory conventional existence is posited through the mere elaboration as existent by another awareness' but actually it does not exist. So how can sentient beings go beyond sorrow even conventionally?

It follows that liberation would be impossible, because everything that exists has been established as the mere delusion of a distortion. According to you Madhyamikas, the Realists say, things exist only to a distorted mind, and do not exist in reality. So if this is accepted – which is of course is not what the Madhyamikas say – then it follows that to comprehend the view for the purpose of liberation becomes meaningless. Here the Realists are using their own form of sound logic saying, 'We both accept that we want to obtain liberation and that the whole purpose of establishing the correct understanding of reality is so that we gain liberation. However, if we follow your assertions that purpose becomes meaningless'.

The next two verses serve as the answer presented by the Madhyamika.

*107. This separate mental superstition
Is not our illusory.
If it is subsequently ascertained, it exists.
If it is not, it is not even an illusion.*

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse:

Regarding what is referred to as illusory existent accepted by the Madhyamika: that which is merely elaborated as existent by the mental superstition of true-grasping by a separate awareness that is mistaken with regard to the grasped object, is not the meaning of existing in an illusory manner in our own Middle Way system. In our system the meaning of existing in an illusory conventional manner is: because all phenomena posited as the objects of the view realising the mode of abiding are realised as being empty of inherent existence, the illusory actions and activities of being generated, generating and so forth can be posited as existing, through being ascertained by prime cognition in an unconfused manner.

If it is not like this, and in our own system actions and activities cannot be posited as being established by prime cognition, then their illusory conventional existence wanes.

The answer presented here by the Madhyamika, specifically the Prasangika-Madhyamika, first presents the incorrect view of illusory truth that the Realists assume them to hold, and say 'this is not how we assert the illusory'.

The commentary reads:

That merely elaborated as existent by the mental superstition of true-grasping, by separate awareness that is mistaken with regard to the grasped object, this is not the meaning of existing in an illusory manner in our own Middle Way system. In our own system the meaning of existing in an illusory conventional manner is: because all phenomena posited as 'the objects of the view realising the mode of abiding' are realised as being empty of inherent existence, the illusory actions and activities of being generated, generating and so forth can be posited as existing, through being ascertained by prime cognition in an unconfused manner.

If it is not like this, and in our own system actions and activities cannot be posited as being established by prime cognition, then their illusory conventional existence wanes.

First the Prasangika-Madhyamika present the Realists' assumption of the Madhyamikas' assertion with respect to conventional or illusory truth, which is that merely elaborated as existent by the mental superstition of true-grasping, is a separate awareness that is mistaken with regard to the grasped object. Then they reject this presentation saying: this is not the meaning of existing in an illusory manner in our own Middle Way system. What is being established here is that the illusory truth that the Realists' claim is the Madhyamika view is not accepted in our system.

Then the actual the Madhyamika view of the meaning of existing in an illusory conventional manner is presented. Because all phenomena posited as 'the objects of the view realising the mode of abiding' are realised as being empty of inherent existence, the illusory actions and activities of being generated, generating and so forth can be posited as existing through being ascertained by prime cognition in an unconfused manner. If it is not like this, and in our own system actions and activities cannot be posited as being established by prime cognition, then their illusory conventional existence ceases to exist.

This is really a very profound presentation that establishes how beings and the environment exist in a conventional or illusory manner while being empty of inherent existence. His Holiness Dalai Lama emphasises this point regularly in his teachings. I have also explained the meaning of this essential point previously.

It is to be understood as presented in this verse of the Guru Puja:

Samsara and nirvana lack even an atom of true existence
While cause and effect and dependent arising are infallible.
I seek your blessings to discern the import of Nagarjuna's intent –

That these two are complementary and not contradictory.

The presentation here in the text expresses the ultimate view of the forerunners of the Prasangika view, Nagarjuna and Chandrakirti, as well as the great scholars such as Shantideva who followed them. We need to gain a good understanding of that which is the crux of the Prasangika view.

The essential point being presented here is that there is no contradiction between appearance and emptiness but rather a union of the two.

More specifically, as presented in the commentary 'the objects of the view realising the mode of abiding' are realised as being empty of inherent existence. When phenomena are seen as being empty of inherent existence, that enables the establishment of actions and activities as being generated and so forth in an illusory manner. The point being presented here is that the understanding of emptiness and the understanding of the interdependent nature of phenomena, are not contradictory but rather complementary. As Lama Tsongkhapa mentioned, it is at this point that one's understanding of the ultimate view is thoroughly established.

Understanding the empty nature of phenomena actually relates to subtle illusory or conventional truth. Through not understanding this essential point, other schools take the wrong turn and establish illusory truth as being inherently existent. According to the other schools, if things lack inherent existence then that would negate all existence.

It is essential to have the correct view of emptiness. If one is not able to establish the interdependent nature of all phenomena, and thus the illusory truth or existence of phenomena, then there is a danger of completely negating the existence of all phenomena, and that is where one would fall into the extreme of nihilism. So we really need to understand the non-contradictory relationship between conventional or illusionary phenomena and emptiness. To gain a clear understanding of this, the commentary emphasises this point when it says, ascertained by prime cognition in an unconfused manner.

As further explained in the commentary, if it is not like this, and in our own system actions and activities cannot be posited as being established by prime cognition, then their illusory conventional existence ceases to exist. The understanding of illusory truth refers here to gaining the understanding of subtle illusory truth.

This point refers to the agent, the action and the activity or karma that is created. The Svatantrika-Madhyamika school posits the lack true existence of the agent, action and activity (karma that is created) that is performed, but they are not able to establish the lack of inherent existence of the action, agent and activity.

Only the Prasangika Middle Way School is able to establish, through logic and reasoning, that the agent, the action and activity lack inherent existence. There is not even an atom of inherent existence in all three. It is only the Prasangika-Madhyamika School that presents the profound logic and reasoning of how the lack of inherent existence, rather than negating existence, actually establishes the existence of the illusory truth – this is the unique presentation of the Prasangika Middle Way school. It is in this way that one gains an understanding of subtle illusory or conventional truth. As I have presented many times in previous teachings, this has the same meaning as the lines in The Heart Sutra which say, form is empty, emptiness of is form. It all comes down to the same point.

When the understanding of interdependent origination dawns upon oneself, it enhances the understanding of emptiness, and when the understanding of emptiness dawns upon oneself, it enhances the understanding of interdependent origination. At that point, one has come to the correct understanding of the Prasangika view.

What this means is that a prime cognition establishes interdependent origination without having to rely on another prime cognition. The right view of emptiness is established when the same primary awareness or cognition that establishes interdependent origination is also able to establish the empty nature of the phenomena and vice versa. When the prime cognition that realises emptiness is also able to establish interdependent origination, one will then have gained the correct and unmistakable understanding of the Prasangika view.

Although elaborate explanations are available to help enhance our understanding, it is good to begin with a simple but correct understanding of what is being presented here. Then, based on that, one can further expand that understanding with a more elaborate explanation. So it is good to begin with this simple understanding, which will shed light on the correct view.

As presented in the teachings we have this mistaken perception of the self as being inherently existent, and existing independently, which is called grasping at an inherently existent self. First, we need to understand what that wrong conception is. What does it mean to grasp at an inherently existent self?

With a good understanding of what that misconception is then, as the teachings present, we can go further. The self that is perceived by the wrong conception of grasping at a truly or inherently existent self does not exist in the way that it is perceived by that wrong conception. What does that mean? If such a self were to exist, then how would it exist? As one begins to understand the absurdity of a self that does not depend on any other factor, existing in and of itself, then the understanding of the lack of an inherently existent self begins to dawn upon oneself. One is getting closer to the correct understanding of selflessness.

When engaging with the explanations in the teachings, we may think, 'Oh, we need to realise selflessness as a way to overcome the misconception of grasping at a truly or inherently existent self'. However, we run the risk of becoming wrapped up in such words. Using these explanations to relate only to other phenomena is the wrong approach.

The proper approach is to relate the teaching to oneself. Setting aside the investigation of other phenomena for the time being, look at how we perceive ourselves, and then try to understand the lack of inherent existence of one's own self. It is essential to understand how grasping a truly existent self, is a misconception that we hold on to at all times. That is what we need to target – overcoming the misconception of grasping at an inherently and truly existent personal self. If we take this approach when contemplating selflessness, then we will reach a point where our meditation practice becomes more meaningful.

We might assume a rigid posture and try to focus single-pointedly on one object, which may have some effect in settling one's mind. But that alone will not help to overcome the afflictions within us, which serve as the very root of all our misconceptions. Grasping at true existence will not be shattered if we just focus single-pointedly on an object just to calm our mind.

We have access to the teachings, and we have heard them many times, so it is good to actually think about the profound explanations on emptiness again and again. We won't accomplish much of an understanding just by reading the texts just occasionally and glancing at them once in a while. It is only by really contemplating them again and again that we develop a deeper understanding. Of course, emptiness is a difficult topic to understand, and not easy to meditate on.

When I was in India recently, there was a young geshe staying with us. We had quite a few discussions and he commented, 'Oh, there are so many explanations about the right view and so forth. What do you think about it?' I related some points that I understand as the correct view. Of course, I said that this was just my understanding. He is a learned geshe himself, and he was quite interested in what I had to say.

Last year I had a discussion on meditating on emptiness with another geshe, who was from the Gaden Jang-Tse monastery. I commented, that meditating on emptiness might not be too difficult if one has a bit of understanding, however at our level, meditating on impermanence seems to be really difficult. I made the comment that it seems that we really need a good understanding of impermanence to be able to shatter clinging to the worldly affairs focusing merely on this life. One can safely say that without a proper understanding of impermanence, one cannot even practise the Dharma properly. Leaving aside emptiness, we find meditation on impermanence hard enough.

When I responded in that way, the other geshe said, 'I was attempting to dig out some understanding of emptiness from a scholar, but I got only an explanation of how to overcome the eight worldly dharmas'. But then he said, 'Well, of course I agree that it is very difficult to overcome the eight worldly dharmas'. So, he understood my point that without an understanding of impermanence, one cannot overcome the eight worldly concerns.

The main points that I emphasise regularly is that we have this great opportunity now of having access to the Dharma, and we should not waste this incredible fortunate time. The main point of practice, as the great masters of the past have emphasised, comes down to the ways to cultivate love and compassion, and being kind to others. The benefits of this are obvious. You can definitely see that if you are kind and considerate to others, you will receive benefit yourself in return. On the other hand, if you engage in harmful intentions towards others, you will be harmed yourself. This is very obvious. The essential point is developing a sense of genuine concern for others, and then further enhancing that love and compassion. As I often emphasise, this is really the main point of our practice.

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta motivation generated during our prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [Meditation]

As we just did in that short session, it would be good to engage in this tong-len practice regularly. When doing so, incorporate in the visualisation that you are surrounded by all living beings in human form who are experiencing all the various types of sufferings. By contemplating the various types of suffering one will then generate the natural wish for them to be free from suffering. This in turn instils the mind of love and compassion towards other sentient beings, wishing them to be free from suffering and to be endowed with happiness.

On this basis, when the wish for them to be free from suffering is further strengthened, one will develop the determination to take their suffering upon oneself. When you develop a mind that is unable to bear their suffering, then at that stage you will be able to willingly accept taking the sufferings of others on yourself and give them your own happiness. When you engage in practice with this visualisation it will help to ensure the practice becomes more meaningful.

Indeed when you contemplate in this way, focussing on all living beings (not leaving any sentient being out) and wishing them to be free from suffering and endowed with happiness, that becomes what is called 'unbiased' love and 'unbiased' compassion. This is the most valuable and most esteemed love that one can extend towards all other sentient beings. There is no doubt that you accumulate extensive merit and also purify heavy negative karmas by engaging in this practice. Thus this is an incredibly powerful practice.

The more we familiarise our mind with unbiased love and compassion, the more readily that sentiment will arise. When we feel an unbiased love and compassion towards others, there is no way for anger towards others to develop in our mind. If we can protect our mind from generating anger, then that's an incredibly powerful practice.

Indeed, when you generate the mind of wishing the other to be free from suffering, then the stronger that mind, the more it will naturally protect the mind from feeling hostility, and causing harm to others. If you don't wish the other to experience any suffering, then you wouldn't in your right mind intentionally go out of your way to harm others. Likewise, the more genuinely you develop the mind of wishing them to be happy, the more natural is your intention to benefit others. 'Benefitting' means engaging in the means and ways to bring happiness to others. So here, you need to see how this is a very crucial practice for developing a really positive state of mind within yourself.

These practices are not to be taken lightly. In terms of your own mental wellbeing, there is no greater practice than to meditate on love and compassion. A lot of unwanted problems and difficulties will naturally subside as you focus on the wellbeing of others. Most of our problems are actually created by ourselves, to the extent of thinking only about one's own wellbeing. When we focus only on our own selfish needs, our own happiness and wellbeing, then the slightest discomfort becomes a huge problem that is hard to bear.

Most of our problems are actually created by just focussing on 'me, me, me ... my own happiness', and always thinking about oneself. If we were to train our mind to actually focus on others' wellbeing, then naturally our own happiness would no longer be the main focus. Therefore, even when conditions are not so good, you will not feel weighed down, because you are not focussing just on your own happiness. Your own suffering doesn't become a big issue because your main concern would be how to relieve others from suffering and bring them happiness.

You can see these are essential points for your own wellbeing; developing love and compassion actually brings about a more genuine sense of wellbeing and happiness for oneself. On the other hand, when you are obsessed with your own wellbeing all the time, then anything that obstructs your needs will seem like an enemy. The more you focus on your own selfish needs, the more likely it is that there are many who will oppose you, and thus you gain more and more enemies. Whereas when we focus on the wellbeing of others, and develop love and compassion toward them, then they will naturally appear dear and close to you. Then, when you are with others, you'll be at ease, feeling joy and happiness rather than feeling agitated and uncomfortable. That is an essential point to consider for your own wellbeing.

To give a more immediate example, take a relationship between two people. If you adopt an attitude such as, "if it's fine with you, then it's fine with me too", then this brings a sense of ease and harmony to the relationship. But when you hold the opposite attitude i.e. "although it is fine with you, I cannot accept it", then the moment this attitude arises it strengthens the conceited sense of 'me' and 'I'. Then there is much more agitation and unease in one's mind because of the strong sense of self-importance, rather than consideration for the other's needs. These are important points to consider. When we develop a genuine sense of unbiased love and compassion, these negative states of mind, which cause a lot of agony and unrest and even hostility and confrontation, will naturally subside and our minds will be much more at ease. I emphasise that you should try to cultivate, more and more, the attitude of "if it's fine with you, then it's fine with me. I will agree and accept".

It is worthwhile for you to consider what states of mind cause you happiness and what states of mind cause you agony. We all wish for happiness, we all wish for a peaceful mind; no one intentionally wants to have a troubled and agitated mind. So, through this practice, you become aware that the real cause of your happiness is within yourself. And likewise, the real cause for your troubles also lies within yourself. They do not come from an external source; ultimately, the main cause is within.

The main cause that disrupts your own happiness and peace of mind is a mind that wishes harm towards others. This mind of wanting to cause harm towards others comes from none other than only focussing on your own needs, your own personal wellbeing and happiness. This self-cherishing mind focussing just on your own wellbeing at the expense of others' happiness and wellbeing is very tricky because, instinctively, when we think about our own wellbeing, it seems like we are caring for ourselves. Because we want happiness we think, "I need to take care of my own interests". But because this is an erroneous way of achieving a state of happiness for yourself, in effect it brings you more trouble and more unhappiness. When you exchange that attitude of only cherishing yourself, with focussing on others and cherishing them, then your own happiness is naturally fulfilled on the side.

If we take the teachings literally, they may seem to suggest that by cherishing others we should neglect our own wellbeing and happiness, but actually it is the opposite. If we genuinely cherish others and think about their wellbeing, it contributes to our own happiness and wellbeing. So you are not neglecting yourself, but rather taking care of yourself more holistically and the happiness you gain is much sounder and much more profound. On the other hand, you won't experience true happiness if you focus merely on your own wellbeing with a self-cherishing mind. These are essential points. In our meditation session here, we may focus on these things and do some visualisation, however it is most important to think about these points regularly in our everyday life.

When you go about in everyday situations, really try to contemplate these things, and constantly remind yourself of the value of cherishing other sentient beings and feeling love and compassion towards them. That is how you will regularly be able to protect your mind in everyday life situations.

Another way of protecting your mind from unnecessary angst and unhappiness is in situations where others are doing well. If others are experiencing success and things are going well for them then, depending on your state of mind, these situations can bring you either agony or a sense of joy and happiness. When, through meditation, the mind of love and compassion and the strong wish to benefit the other has taken root, and becomes a core attitude, then seeing others experience success and happiness will bring joy to the mind. If your mind is familiar with wishing beings benefit and happiness, then when they experience success that will naturally contribute to your own joy and happiness. If someone who is not familiar with the wish of benefitting others, particularly with unbiased love and compassion, sees others experiencing success, they can start to feel jealous and that brings agony to their mind.

We can see here that the same situation, depending on our attitude and how we interpret it, can either bring joy or the unhappiness of jealousy. These are essential points to investigate. As I have mentioned in the past, looking at our mind, detecting our states of mind and the follies of our mind, and the tricks that our mind plays, can be quite amusing. We can see what's going on in our mind and that is a more worthwhile investigation rather than investigating what others are doing. Using logic and investigation in the right way is really what practice comes down to. Investigating what brings you and others genuine happiness and adopting that, and investigating what brings misery and suffering for you and others and discarding that, really summarises the essence of Dharma practice.

2.3.2.2. REFUTING THE ARGUMENT THAT THE TWO TRUTHS WOULD BE INVALID

2.3.2.2.1. Refuting the consequence of absurdity (cont.)

The verse reads:

108. Conceptual thought and that imputed
Are both mutually dependent.

Just as in dependence on renown
All investigations are expressed.

The commentary explaining this verse reads as follows:

Regarding the way of positing something as an illusory conventionality in our own system: Both the object-possessor of the conceptual thought and the imputed object are mutually dependent, i.e., they are posited relative to each other, and do not exist in the slightest out of their own nature. This is explained in the Root Wisdom:

The actor is produced in dependence on the action.

Just as being renowned to worldly nominal prime cognition, they are all an analysis in dependence on mere name, i.e. all presentations [or categories of existence] are expressed.

The commentary explains that regarding the way of positing something as an illusory conventionality in our own system, both the object-possessor of the conceptual thought and the imputed object are mutually dependent. This is basically talking about subject and object being dependent on each other. The object-possessor (subject) is the consciousness perceiving an imputed object, which is the object itself. Being mutually dependent means that they are dependent on each other. If the consciousness perceiving an object were to exist from its own side, then it would not have to depend on the object, and thus could not be called an object possessor.

Without relying on the object, the consciousness perceiving an object would have to exist by itself. Likewise, the object is also dependent on the consciousness that perceives it. If the object were to exist in its own right, then it would not have to depend on the consciousness perceiving it. But the very establishment of an object as dependent on a consciousness perceiving that object shows that they are mutually dependent.

The commentary further elaborates that, they are posited relative to each other, and do not exist in the slightest out of their own nature. As a way to back up this point the commentary quotes from Root Wisdom by Nagarjuna: The actor is produced in dependence on the action, and then explains: Just as being renowned to worldly nominal prime cognition, they are all an analysis in dependence on mere name, i.e., all presentations are expressed.

What is being explained here is that all presentations or the various categories of phenomena are posited as existent, and dependent on how they are expressed and perceived by worldly prime cognition. In other words, the existence of things is not posited through investigations, but they are posited in the way they appear conventionally. That is why Chandrakirti mentioned in his teachings 'I do not posit nominal existence through analysis, but rather posit them as accepted or renowned by worldly conventions'. This is a point I have also mentioned previously.

Again, to emphasise this point, they are all an analysis in dependence on mere name, indicates that the Prasangika system posits the way in which things are nominally existent, merely labelled or merely imputed by the mind. That is in accordance with the nominal existence of things. For example, when we refer to a glass, merely saying 'glass' will bring about an understanding of the function of the glass, i.e. it has a specific shape and function to hold liquid, without having to resort to any specific investigation. That specific function and the attributes of the glass need not be investigated; rather they are understood when we hear the mere name or label of the glass. Similarly, the way the Prasangika posit existence is by mere name, by an object being merely imputed by the mind. Thus, it does not exist in or of itself, from its own side.

When explaining the previous verse, I emphasised a crucial point. Have you given any thought to it?

This verse reads:

107. This separate mental superstition
Is not our illusory
If it is subsequently ascertained, it exists.
If it is not, it is not even illusory

The crux of the Prasangika-Madhyamika view is presented right here. Would anyone like to shed some light on the meaning of this verse?

Alan Molloy: Perhaps it's to do with that illustration of the snake and the rope. The snake is basically imputed on the rope, but doesn't exist [inaudible] imputed ...

Geshe-la: That relates to an earlier verse.

Denis Marsh: I haven't studied this well since last week, but I recall that the meaning was that emptiness deepens our understanding of dependent arising and dependent arising deepens our understanding of emptiness.

Geshe-la: The main point that I emphasised is as explained here in the commentary

In our own system the meaning of existing in an illusory conventional manner is: because all phenomena posited as the objects of the view realising the mode of abiding are realised as being empty of inherent existence, the illusory actions and activities of being generated, generating and so forth can be posited as existing, through being ascertained by prime cognition in an unconfused manner.

If it is not like this, and in our own system actions and activities cannot be posited as being established by prime cognition, then their illusory conventional existence wanes [or ceases].

I also mentioned this verse from the Lama Chöpa (or Guru Puja):

Samsara and nirvana lack even an atom of true existence,
While cause and effect and dependent arising are unailing.
We seek your blessing to discern the import of Nagarjuna's thought
Which is that these two are complementary and not contradictory.

Last week I mentioned that I had specifically explained this verse before, and I also explained the meaning, which summarises the essential point being explained here in the commentary. Similarly the passage from the Heart Sutra where it says, form is emptiness and emptiness is form is what is being explained here in Shantideva's text, and through the explanations of the commentary. All three bring out the same point.

As I have said previously, this is an important verse to understand.

This is another key point mentioned in last week's teaching. Basically, when the independent origination of phenomena dawns upon you, then without relying on another prime cognition, this can bring about an understanding of emptiness, and how, through interdependent origination, you can understand the lack of inherent existence of phenomena, or see the emptiness of phenomena. When you see that things are empty of inherent existence, and through that understand, without relying again on another prime cognition, the interdependent origination of that phenomena, then that is the meaning gaining an understanding of emptiness through the understanding of dependent origination. Therefore, as the text presents, one sees that they are complementary and not contradictory.

[Geshe la made a comment on Damien's ineffective note taking and then said he was just joking, as friends you would not be offended by things said in jest. In the monasteries the monks tease each other, and all with a good light-heartedness. When you start teasing each other, if you get upset, then it's not a good gesture. We tease each other because we are friends, and we accept it from each other because of our friendship.

I used to be very good buddies with Geshe Wangchen who recently passed away. In the monastery we played a lot. When we used to play, we used to cut each other's hair with a blade, and once I scratched him with the blade. He announced to the other elder monks in our house that it happened "when we were playing". So he was not accusing me of maliciously cutting him with a blade.

When I was living in Buxa Duar I coughed up some blood. The doctors were very concerned that it was tuberculosis. This incident coincided with some Westerners who were going around checking the health conditions of the monks. Apparently one of them had been to Tibet before, and had come to our camp at Buxa Duar to check on all the monks who had the symptoms of TB. So when he came and checked my condition he said, "We need to be cautious, it could be TB" and then he said, "I think you are quite malnourished". Then he asked me personally, "Would you have an interest in going to a Western country?" And at that time I said, "No, no, I'm not going. I don't have any such intention". Then he said, "Ah well, you need to be cared for well". He took the initiative to bring a lot of good food to me - different kinds of meats, chicken and fish. But I didn't eat fish, so I didn't accept the fish. And when he brought chicken I didn't eat it because I realised it would have been local chickens that had been slaughtered. So I took the initiative to refuse and said "I cannot eat the chicken". He then brought other types of fresh foods. That's when I was segregated. The monks were segregated and it was said, "those who have TB shouldn't be mixing with others". And that's when Geshe Wangchen (who was not a geshe at that time), was asked to help nurse me. Of course I wasn't really sick at that time, I was quite well, but he was there to supposedly nurse me. So we ended up just having fun and playing around and pulling jokes on each other. So maybe he was referring to that time when we were playing around, where I might have cut him with the blade.

We were quite young at the time - I was 24 and Geshe Wangchen would have been 23.

2.3.2.2. Refuting the consequence of becoming endless

The first verse under this heading reads:

109. When the investigating
Analysis analyses,
When also the analysis is,
Analysed then it has no end.

The commentary presents the argument:

Argument: When the investigating analysis, which analyses whether phenomena exists truly or not, discerns them to be empty of inherent existence, at that time, as it does not fall under that analysed, does one need to analyse the non-true existence of the analysing awareness or not?

If not, then it is the same for all other phenomena, and their lack of true existence wanes. If yes, then, because the non-true existence of this analysis needs to be in turn analysed by another analysis, there would be no end to the analysing analysis.

As clearly explained here, the Realists first say, when the investigating analysis, which analyses whether phenomena exists truly or not, discerns them to be empty of inherent existence, then at that time, it does not fall under that analysed. This explains that the awareness that is analysing, in itself does not fall under the analysed, because it is the analyser. Does one need to analyse the non-true existence of the analysing awareness or not? That is the question that is posed.

The commentary continues, if not, one does not have to analyse it. Then it is the same for all other phenomena, and their lack of true existence wanes. This is quite clear.

Further, it says, 'If yes, then, because the non-true existence' or the lack of true existence 'of this analysis needs to be in turn analysed by another analysis, there would be no end to the analysing analysis', which in other words means there would be infinite regression for that analysis.

The commentary presents the Madhyamaka response to that, followed by a verse serves as the reason for that.

Madhyamaka: It follows that no other prime cognition analysing the lack of true existence is needed for the prime cognition realising the lack of true existence of all phenomena.

The verse reads:

110. Having investigated the analysed object
There is no basis for investigation.
Since there is no basis, it is not born.
This is also called going beyond misery.

The commentary then explains:

That is because when the prime cognition analysing the lack of true existence has analysed the non-true existence of that to be analysed, i.e., all phenomena, no truly existent subject that would be a basis for a repeated analysis of non-true existence, exists in the perception of that awareness for as long as it does not lose that mode of apprehension.

Also, for the person who has realised all phenomena as empty of true existence, and for whom the realisation holds and has not waned, a subject basis that is characterised by an analysis into true or non-true existence, is impossible because immediately upon generating that thought, the mindfulness thinking, 'it does not exist truly' is generated.

The fault of endless analysis into the non-true existence despite having realised all phenomena as lacking true existence, exists for you, because of the necessity of another prime cognition having to analyse that very awareness. If another analysis were needed, then there would remain a leftover of intellectually acquired true-grasping, despite all manifest intellectually acquired true-grasping being stopped by the earlier prime cognition itself.

Because the subject basis does not exist truly, both the object of negation and that negating are not generated inherently, and are therefore called 'naturally gone beyond sorrow'. Realising this and meditating on it is also called 'attaining the liberation beyond sorrow free from adventitious stains'.

The commentary explains that the reason why the awareness that analyses whether the lack of true existence does not have to be further analysed, is that when the prime cognition analysing the lack of true existence has analysed the non-true existence of that to be analysed, i.e., all phenomena, no truly existent subject that would be a basis for a repeated analysis of non-true existence exists in the perception of that awareness for as long as it does not lose that mode of apprehension. This makes the point that for as long as the awareness analysing the lack of true existence of all phenomena is maintained, then for as long as apprehension does not wane or as long as one does not lose that mode of apprehension, it does not need further investigation, since there is no true appearance of any phenomena.

While the earlier part of the explanation was in reference to analysing awareness, the next part is in relation to the person engaged in that analysis. The commentary next presents, also, for the person who has realised all phenomena as empty of true existence, and for whom the realisation holds and has not waned, for that individual person a subject basis that is characterised by an analysis into true or non-true existence is impossible, because immediately upon generating that thought, the mindfulness thinking, 'it does not exist truly' is generated.

For as long as a person holds onto that awareness of the lack of true existence of phenomena, then any doubt about whether it exists truly or not, will not occur. That is the point in relation to the person, because the mindfulness thinking, 'it does not exist truly' is generated. This mindfulness will be immediately generated because it is still holding onto that awareness.

Then as the commentary explains, the fault of endless analysis into non-true existence despite having realised all phenomena as lacking true existence, exists for you. The Prasangika are actually saying that for you this fault would exist because of the necessity of another prime cognition having to analyse that very awareness. If another analysis were needed, then there would remain a leftover of intellectually acquired true-grasping, despite all manifest intellectually acquired true-grasping being stopped by the earlier prime cognition itself. When the lack of true existence of phenomena is being realised then at that time the manifest intellectually-acquired true-grasping has stopped. According to you, if you still need another awareness to analyse whether that awareness lacks true existence or not, then it would be as if there were a remnant of intellectually-acquired true grasping still left that has not yet been negated. That would be the fallacy.

Emptiness is referred to as naturally gone beyond sorrow, or naturally abiding nirvana. Realising this and meditating on it is also called 'attaining the liberation beyond sorrow free from adventitious stains'. Because emptiness is naturally free from adventitious stains, it is referred to as 'naturally abiding nirvana'. Although emptiness itself is not actually nirvana, the term 'naturally abiding nirvana' is used because it is beyond or free from the adventitious stains. This is why that term is used.

Although initially this may seem a little bit complicated, if you read through the commentary slowly and well, over a few times, it will become clearer.

2.3.2.2.3. Showing there is no proof for the true existence of object and consciousness

What is being presented under this heading in the following verse is that there is no proof of true existence of object and consciousness, i.e. object and object possessor. Those who assert the true existence of both object and object possessors are the Realists such as the Sautrantika, the Vaibhashika and also the Mind Only (Cittamatra) schools.

The next verse and the first line from the following verse read:

111. Whichever way one looks at it,
That these two are true is extremely problematic.
If, 'The meaning is established through the power

Of consciousness', what basis exists for mere existent consciousness?

112a. If however, 'consciousness is established from that known'.

The commentary presents the meaning:

Regardless of the way that a Realist looks at it, it is extremely problematic to assert that the two, object and consciousness, exist truly, because there exists no proof.

The Realists would then say:

Realist: One can establish the meaning of true existence from the example of truly existent primary cognition consciousness.

And the Madhyamika response to this is:

Madhyamaka: What supporting prime cognition is there for the existence of a truly existent consciousness? There isn't any because there is no self-knower, and if it is known by another consciousness, then it would become endless.

The term 'Realist' is used because they posit things as being truly existent. Generally this view is held by the Sautrantika and the Vaibhashika, but because it refers to that which accepts true existence, it also refers to the Mind Only school.

The commentary explains that regardless of the way that a Realist looks at it, it is extremely problematic to assert that the two, object and consciousness, exist truly, because there exists no proof. This is what the Madhyamika say.

The Realists then say one can establish the meaning of true existence from the example of truly existent primary cognition consciousness. The Realists accept a truly existent primary cognition which is a consciousness, and then because of that they say because there is a truly existent consciousness that perceives objects, and therefore objects must also be established as truly existent. That is their logic.

As a response to those assertions, the Madhyamika say, what supporting prime cognition is there for the existence of a truly existent consciousness? which implies that there cannot be another cognition that actually supports prime cognition of a truly existent consciousness. Therefore the Madhyamika say, there isn't any because there is no self-knower. Self-knowers have been refuted earlier, so there is no self-knower, and if it is known by another consciousness, then it would become endless. So if there were another consciousness that knows, which sees the awareness as truly existent, then there would have to be another consciousness to know that as well, and then another to know that. Therefore the fallacy of infinite regression would apply here, as it did earlier.

The Madhyamika then refute another hypothesis of the Realists.

However if you say, consciousness is established through the direct perception of true objects of knowledge and comprehension.

The verse reads:

112bcd. *What basis is there for the existence of the object of knowledge?
Both exist through their mutual power,
Both again are non-existent.*

The commentary explains the meaning:

Madhyamaka: What support is there for the existence of object of knowledge? If it is posited by prime cognition, then it is certain: Because both object and consciousness exist through the power of mutual dependence, it is clearly established that again both do not exist inherently, e.g., like long and short or here and there.

What the Madhyamika are presenting here is that if the prime cognition is posited in relation to an object then, because both object and consciousness exist through the power of mutual dependence it is clearly established that again both do not exist inherently. If consciousness is posited because there is an object that it perceives, and if the object is also posited because there is a consciousness that perceives it, then they are mutually dependent. This implies that they cannot exist in and of themselves independently. The example given is long and short. As we discussed earlier, 'long' is posited only in relation to 'short', and 'short' is only posited in relation to there being 'long'. Therefore long and short are mutually dependent, which implies they cannot exist in or of themselves.

'Long' is posited in relation to 'short' and 'short' is posited in relation to 'long', therefore they are dependent on each other. This means 'long' cannot exist from its own side and 'short' cannot exist from its own side. Likewise the positions 'here' and 'there' are relative. 'Here' is posited in relation to 'there' on the other side, and 'there', which is on other side, is also posited in relation to being 'here'. Therefore both positions of 'here' and 'there' are mutually dependent on each other, and thus cannot exist in or of themselves.

The next verse reads:

113. *If there is no father without a child,
Then from where does the child arise?
Without a child there is no father,
Likewise these two do not exist.*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

If there is no child, then the father is not an existent because that which is defining the father does not exist. As there is no cause if there is no father, then from where does the child arise? And if there is no child because there is no father, then the two are mutually dependent on each other and lack true existence; the two, object and consciousness, lack true existence in the same way.

This is quite clear. Again, the verse presents another example of how what is posited as 'father' is dependent on the child. Without the child, an individual person cannot be labelled as a 'father'. How could someone be a father without a child? So therefore 'father' is posited in dependence on the child. Likewise 'child' is dependent on having a father; without a father a child also cannot be posited as a 'child'. Therefore 'father' and 'child' are mutually dependent, and cannot exist independently in and of themselves. This is yet another example to illustrate how 'object' and 'consciousness' are mutually dependent. If an object were to exist independently and in and of itself, then it could exist without there being a consciousness to perceive it. Likewise if consciousness were to exist independently, in and of itself, then it would not have to depend on an object to be called 'an object possessor', a consciousness.

The next verse under this reads:

114. *The sprout is generated from the seed
And just as the seed is realised through it,
Why should one not realise the existence of
The object of knowledge from the consciousness generated from it?*

The commentary explains this verse as follows:

Realist: The sprout is generated from an inherently existing seed and the seed can be inferred through the valid reason of that very sprout. Likewise, why should one not realise the existence of truly existent ultimate object of knowledge through the truly existent consciousness that is generated from the object of knowledge?

This again is quite clear. It is positing the Realists' argument, which is that the sprout is generated from an inherently existing seed and the seed can be inferred through the valid reason of that very sprout. That is what they are asserting. Likewise, why should one not realise the existence of truly existent ultimate object of knowledge through the truly existent consciousness that is generated ...

This absurd assertion is then refuted in the next verse, which reads:

115. If the existence of the seed is ascertained and realised
Through a consciousness apart from the sprout,
From what does one realise the existence
Of the consciousness realising that object of knowledge?

The commentary clearly explains the meaning:

Madhyamaka: This is not valid. If the existence of the seed is ascertained and realised through a prime cognising consciousness that is of different substance from the sprout and sees the sprout, then from what prime cognition is the existence of a consciousness through the realisation of the object of knowledge realised? Self-knowers have already been refuted, and you do not accept any other way of knowing.

The Realists' position is quite clearly refuted by the Madhyamika. If the existence of the seed is ascertained and realised through a prime cognising consciousness that is of different substance from the sprout and sees the sprout, then from what prime cognition is the existence of a consciousness through the realisation of the object of knowledge realised? This implies that because self-knowers have already been refuted, you cannot accept any other way of knowing. That is the absurdity that is being pointed out.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷོ་མེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

14 March 2017

Based on the motivation we generated during the refuge and bodhicitta prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

As usual, let us set our motivation for receiving the teachings:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and then put them into practice well, not just merely in words but in actual actions and deeds.

Thinking in this way is most meaningful.

2.3.2. Explaining extensively the reasoning that established the selflessness of person (cont.)

2.3.2.3. STATING THE REASONS THAT ESTABLISH THE LACK OF TRUE EXISTENCE¹

This is subdivided into three:

2.3.2.3.1. The vajra sliver reason

2.3.2.3.2. The reason of dependent arising

2.3.2.3.3. The reason of refuting generation and cessation of existence and non-existence

2.3.2.3.1. The vajra sliver reason

This is subdivided into five:

2.3.2.3.1.1. Refuting generation without cause

2.3.2.3.1.2. Refuting generation from a separate permanent cause

2.3.2.3.1.3. Refuting generation from a permanent principal

2.3.2.3.1.4. Summarising the meaning of generation from no-cause

2.3.2.3.1.5. Refuting generation from both self and other

The main essence of this presentation was presented in the Madhyamaka teachings and also in the Four Hundred Verses teachings.² It refutes the self as being generated from either the self, other, both and without a cause.

Although I've presented the meaning previously, I'll remind you of the analogy that is used to explain the name 'vajra sliver'. Adamantine is one of the hardest substances in existence. Even a splinter of it is so powerful that it can destroy huge mountainous rocks and so forth. This analogy indicates that the reasoning presented here can completely shatter the very core of the notion of grasping at the self.

2.3.2.3.1.1. Refuting generation without cause

We need to note here that generation without cause does not refer to generation from all causes. Rather it refers to the specific causes that are presented by the Hedonists and so forth, who assert that there is a result that does not have to depend upon a specific cause. That is what is being refuted here.

The commentary first presents their assertion:

Hedonists and others: Because one cannot see the products of the colours of the eye in the peacock's feather and others, and one does not see any creator of the movement of the lotus petals or their smooth shape, or the sharpness of thorns and so forth, therefore they exist out of their own nature.

The Hedonists, and others who follow similar systems of thought, use the example of the different colours of the eye of a peacock's feathers, which are very detailed. However we can't observe any immediate cause that created them. So the posed question is 'who creates them'? Another analogy they use is the movement of lotus petals, which open at different times: some already open, and some are about to blossom. So, who causes the subtle movements of the petals, as well as their smoothness. Another example is the sharpness of thorns. How did the sharp tip of the thorn come about?

What they are saying is that since we cannot see anyone actually creating them, and no other immediate causes are apparent, they must exist of their own nature.

These examples are quite obvious: we can see the results, but we cannot see their causes. For this reason, the Hedonists argue that there is no cause for them, and that they must exist out of their own nature.

The first verse under this heading is:

116. In this instance, the direct perception of worldly beings

Sees all causes.

The different petals of the lotus

Are generated by different causes.

117. If it is asked, 'By which different causes?'

Of course by the preceding different causes.

Why can a cause generate an effect?

From the mere force of that preceding cause.

The commentary explains the meaning of these verses as follows:

Madhyamika: This is invalid. In this instance, the direct perception of worldly beings sees most of the generating causes for the various inner and outer functionalities such as crops and the like. The different results such as the colours of the different lotus petals, their number and the like are generated by different causes. If it is asked, 'By which different causes?', then of course by preceding different causes.

Argument: Why are different causes able to produce different results?

Madhyamika: The fault that they cannot do this does not exist. Through the very force possessed by a preceding cause, different causes have the ability to generate different results.

Thus, these functionalities are not without cause because they are observed as adventitiously generated in relation to place and time.

¹ This heading was first introduced on 22 November 2016.

² The vajra or diamond sliver reasoning was taught:

In the Madhyamaka teachings between 15 April 2003 and 20 April 2003

In the 400 Verses teachings on 8 April 2008

In the Shantideva teachings of 2005 between 16 August 2005 and 13 September 2005

The Madhyamika reply to the Hedonists saying, your argument is invalid, because the direct perception of worldly beings sees most of the causes that generate the various inner and outer functionalities.

The implication here is that 'although there are inferential reasons that can be used to refute your assertions, I'll begin by using reasons that can be seen by ordinary valid perception'. It is obvious we can see the causes of many of the things that are produced in this world. For example, it is obvious to worldly beings that when you plant barley seeds, they will produce barley sprouts. Thus a farmer who wishes for a crop of barley will sow barley seeds and not any other. Likewise a crop of wheat is dependent on wheat seedlings, and a crop of peas is produced from pea seedlings. It is obvious that the results of particular crops come from their own particular causes, which are the seeds of each. This is something that is readily perceived.

Furthermore, different results such as the colours of the different lotus petals, their number and the like are generated by different causes. The different kinds of lotus seedlings produce lotus plants with different types of petals and so forth. That is also readily seen.

The Hedonists then ask, if there are different causes for these different results then who creates these causes?

The Madhyamika answer to that is that the various causes are created by the preceding different causes, a fact which is quite obvious. The Madhyamikas make this comment to the Hedonist question: the fault that different causes cannot produce different results does not exist. Through the very power possessed by a preceding cause, different causes have the ability to generate different results. The power of a preceding cause has the ability to produce certain types of results. Therefore different causes all have the ability to generate different results.

As a concluding remark, the Madhyamika say, these functionalities are not without cause because they are observed as adventitiously generated in relation to place and time. This reason is very profound. If things were to be causeless then they would have to be generated at all times, regardless of time and necessary conditions. The fact that different results are produced only at a certain time and place indicates that they have particular causes. Do bananas or avocados grow in Victoria? No, because it's not the right place – they grow in Queensland. The point here is that growing crops or flowers or fruit depends on an appropriate time and place. Even if the immediate or substantial cause, the seed, is there, it won't produce a result unless the other factors it is dependent upon are there as well, such as water, fertile soil, warmth and so forth. People say 'it's the cherry season now', 'mango season', or 'strawberry season'. If it's out of season then you won't be able to get a particular crop or fruit; you only get the results when the time is right.

2.3.2.3.1.2. Refuting generation from a separate permanent cause

The reason for this refutation is because there are some non-Buddhist schools who say, 'yes there is a cause, and that cause is permanent'. So they assert that a result can come from a permanent cause. This section refutes that.

Here we can understand why different schools of tenets have arisen. Each system of tenets comes about as a result of the different ways of investigating things, and each comes to different conclusions based on their method of investigation. Proponents of some religious tenets, for example, would say there is a creator god, and use their own reasons to present that argument. Others, like we Buddhists, say that there's no creator as such, but we believe in karma. And karma is asserted with reasoning and many examples. This section of the text is subdivided into three:

2.3.2.3.1.2.1. Refuting Ishvara with questions to its meaning

2.3.2.3.1.2.2. If it is permanent, it is unsuitable to be the cause of anything arising from conditions

2.3.2.3.1.2.3. Reminder that permanent particles without cause were already refuted

2.3.2.3.1.2.1. Refuting Ishvara with questions to its meaning

Prior to actually refuting the assertion that Ishvara is the cause, the Hedonists are asked 'What do you mean by Ishvara? What does Ishvara actually mean?

So the first line of verse is:

118a. If Ishvara is the cause of migrators,

Then the commentary explains:

The Naiyayika, Enumerators and Particularists that accept Ishvara as divine: The self-arisen all-knowing Ishvara, produced all places, bodies and enjoyments with a preceding movement of his mind, and is therefore the cause of migrators.

The implication of the Naiyayika (or Logicians), Enumerators and Particularists who accept Ishvara as divine is that there are some non-Buddhist schools that do not accept Ishvara as a divine creator. There are other non-Buddhist schools that assert the fundamental principal as the cause of all existence. They say that their classifications of causes and effects are due to the various manifestations of the fundamental principal. However all these non-Buddhist schools are the same in asserting a cause that is a permanent substance. The difference between the two lies in the fact that one accepts Ishvara as a divine creator, and the other does not.

As the commentary explains quite clearly, their assertion is that Ishvara the divine creator is a self-arisen and all-knowing, i.e. he has arisen as an omniscient being by his own accord, without depending on any other causes. This self-arisen all-knowing entity called Ishvara produces all places such as the environment, bodies such as the beings or migrators who live in the environment, and enjoyments, which are all the objects of the sense enjoyments. These are all created by a preceding movement of Ishvara's mind. It is Ishvara's movement of the mind or thought that creates the things and events in the environment. This is negated in the later verses.

The relevant lines of verse read:

118bcd. First, declare what is Ishvara?

If you say, 'the elements,' that may be, but Why stress yourself over a name?

The Madhyamika reply:

Madhyamika: First, declare what is posited as the meaning of Ishvara.

Upon being asked that question: If you say due to the increase and decrease of the four elements of earth, water, fire and wind the results also increase or decrease.

That may be so. However we also accept that from the increasing and decreasing of the elements, the results also increase or decrease, why stress yourself over a difference in name of the same meaning out of a great attachment to establish Ishvara? That it is unsuitable to be Ishvara if there is a big difference in reality whether if it is permanent or impermanent and so forth, is shown in the lines '[However....] and so forth.

Furthermore:

Because the four elements are in the nature of different substances, are impermanent and producing generation and disintegration, are not moved in the sense of preceding the production of results with awareness or mind, are not divine and is the very ground that is walked upon, and because they are impure, they are not Ishvara. Ishvara is permanent, unitary and precedes the production of a result with awareness, is accepted to be divine, not to be the very ground walked upon and not as impure.

Having been asked what Ishvara is, the reply from the opponent is due to the increase and decrease of the four elements of earth, water, fire and wind the results also increase or decrease. So they argue that if there's an increase in the four elements, then the result will also increase, and if there's a decrease in the four elements then the results will also decrease, and that the cause of this is Ishvara.

To that the Madhyamika reply, we also accept that. If that is what you mean by Ishvara then why stress over a name? You may call it Ishvara but if it is in fact relating to the increase and decrease of the elements, then it is the same as we posit.

The commentary then explains, that it is unsuitable to be Ishvara if there is a big difference in reality whether if it is permanent or impermanent and so forth is shown in the following verse.

119. *However, since earth and so forth are many,
Impermanent, not moved and not divine,
Since they are the very ground walked upon and impure
They are not Ishvara.*

The explanation in the commentary is:

Because the four elements are in the nature of different substances, are impermanent and producing generation and disintegration, are not moved in the sense of preceding the production of results with awareness or mind, are not divine and is the very ground that is walked upon, and because they are impure, they are not Ishvara. Ishvara is permanent, unitary and precedes the production of a result with awareness, is accepted to be divine, not to be the very ground walked upon and not as impure.

The refutation by the Madhyamikas is that if the four elements are in the nature of different substances then they could not be a unitary divine being Ishvara.

The opponent posits that Ishvara is permanent, which our system refutes by pointing out that the four elements are impermanent as they are generated and disintegrate.

Since the opponent posits that Ishvara produces things with a preceding awareness, there would have to be a movement of the mind that produces the four elements. Yet they are not moved in the sense of preceding the production of results with awareness. It is not necessary for there to be a movement of the mind in order for the elements to be produced.

Furthermore, the opponents say that Ishvara is divine, but the four elements are not divine. For example ordinary beings walk on the earth.

Also the earth and other elements have unclean aspects, so they are not Ishvara.

In summary, you assert Ishvara as being permanent, unitary and precedes the production of a result with an awareness, is accepted to be divine, and so therefore is not the very ground to walked upon and is not impure. Because the elements do not fit your description of what Ishvara is, they could not be Ishvara.

Having refuted the four elements as being Ishvara, the next argument by the non-Buddhists to be refuted is that space is Ishvara.

Argument: Space is Ishvara.

The next verse is:

120. *Space is not Ishvara because it does not move.
That the self is not Ishvara has been proven earlier.
Also, a creator beyond thought,
What good is it to describe that beyond thought?*

As the commentary explains, the Madhyamika presentation is:

Madhyamika: Take the subject 'space': it is not Ishvara—because it does not move for the purpose of a result. A permanent self is also not Ishvara—because this has been refuted earlier both from the point of view of matter or consciousness.

The commentary quite clearly explains this with a syllogism. Take the subject 'space': it is not Ishvara (which is the predicate)—because it does not move for the purpose of a result (which is the reason). According to the assertion of these non-Buddhist schools, Ishvara produces things through the movement of the mind, or with the thought to produce. Space doesn't have any movement to produce things.

Furthermore, a permanent self is also not Ishvara because this has been refuted earlier both from the point of view of matter or consciousness. This is as was presented previously.

Then a further argument by the non-Buddhists is presented:

Argument: Because Ishvara is a creator beyond thought these faults do not apply.

The Madhyamaka refute this by saying:

Madhyamaka: What is the point of taking something that is beyond thought as the creator? In addition, you cannot know who Ishvara is as he is beyond thought.

If Ishvara is beyond thought as you say, then how could you even possibly describe Ishvara? How would you even begin to conceive of him?

2.3.2.3.1.2.2. If it is permanent, it is unsuitable to be the cause of anything arising from conditions

What is being refuted here is that if something is considered as permanent then it cannot be a cause of anything, because anything that arises from a condition has to have an impermanent cause.

Then these lines of verse are presented:

121. *Also what does it desire to create?
Aren't the nature of the self,
Earth and so forth and Ishvara permanent?
Consciousness is generated from the object of knowledge,*

122ab. *And beginningless happiness and sufferings from karma.
Tell, what is generated by him?*

The explanation in the commentary begins with a question from the Madhyamika:

If the feelings of happiness, suffering, equanimity and other functionalities are generated from previous karma and other causes, then what is the result that the Ishvara asserted by you desires to create?

The non-Buddhist replies:

Argument: It is the self.

Then the Madhyamika refutation follows:

Madhyamika: It follows that it is not valid—because it follows that this self, the four elements of earth, water, fire and air, and also subsequent similar types of Ishvara are not produced by Ishvara—because aren't the self, the particles of the four elements and Ishvara permanent?

Following this rhetorical question the commentary continues:

So because you accept them to be permanent they are invalid as that which is generated and the generator.

Thus, because the different sense consciousnesses to which blue and so forth appear are generated from the objects of knowledge blue and so forth, and because the feelings of suffering and happiness are generated from virtuous and non-virtuous karma, therefore state the result that is generated by Ishvara. The result generated by Ishvara does not exist.

This explanation is quite clear. There is however one important point. The point that feelings of happiness, sufferings, and equanimity, and other functionalities are generated from previous karma is mutually accepted, and the question posed by the Madhyamika is 'what causes that?'

The counter argument here is that if the feelings of happiness, suffering, equanimity and other functionalities are generated from previous karma and other causes, then what is the result that the Ishvara asserted by you desires to create? In other words, if we both accept the results of karma, then what does Ishvara create?

The opponents say that it is the self that is created by Ishvara.

The Madhyamika say that this is not valid—because this self, the four elements of earth, water, fire and air, and also subsequent similar types of Ishvara are not produced by Ishvara. If there's a first Ishvara then that implies that there must be a similar subsequent Ishvara. The self, the four elements (earth, water, fire and air) and subsequent similar types of Ishvara, could not be produced by Ishvara—because, according to the opponent, the self, the particles of the four elements and Ishvara are permanent. If you accept them as being permanent they cannot be both the generated and the generator. If something is permanent then how can it be both the generated and a generator?

The Madhyamika refutation refers to the different sense consciousnesses, to which blue and so forth appear, as they are generated from the objects of knowledge blue and so forth. In other words, the consciousness perceiving blue is generated in dependence on an object that is blue, and the consciousness perceiving yellow is dependent on an object that is yellow. Each consciousness is generated in relation to a particular object.

The next part of the refutation begins by acknowledging that we both accept that feelings of suffering and happiness are generated from virtuous and non-virtuous karma. So the Madhyamikas state the result that is generated by Ishvara. Can you actually say that they are created by Ishvara? There is not much left that you can claim is created by Ishvara. Therefore, the result generated by Ishvara does not exist, and you have to conclude there is no result created by Ishvara.

The next lines of verse under this heading are:

122cd. *If there is no first cause,
How could there be a first result?*

123. *Why should he not always produce?
He does not rely on others.
If there is nothing other that is not produced by him,
How could he rely on these?*

As the commentary explains:

Because the causal Ishvara is a permanent functionality, if he were to exist since beginningless time, then how can there be a first of his resultant feelings and other results? The direct cause of the feeling generated today possesses its ability since beginningless time.

As he produces all results without depending on other conditions, why would he not produce all results on a continual basis? It follows it is like that—because if there is no other separate result that is not created by Ishvara, then in dependence on what condition does this Ishvara generate these results? That asserted as simultaneously acting condition needs to be created by Ishvara and it is acceptable that it is produced by him.

Again the explanation in the commentary is clear. You state that the causal Ishvara is a permanent functionality. So if he were to have existed since beginningless time, then how can there be a first of his resultant feelings and other results? The absurdity is that if the cause existed from beginningless time, then the results would also have to also exist from beginningless time. The feeling that you have today would have been there perpetually. If, for example, you were feeling happy today, then because the cause was beginningless, that happy feeling would have to have been a perpetual happy feeling from beginningless time. If the causes exist from beginningless time then the results also have to have existed from beginningless time. That is the absurdity that is being pointed out.

Then as the commentary explains, as Ishvara produces all results without depending on other conditions, why would he not produce all results on a continual basis? That is the logical conclusion of your argument, because if there is no other separate result that is not created by Ishvara, then in dependence on what condition does this Ishvara generate these results?

As explained here, having posed that rhetorical question, then that asserted as simultaneously acting condition needs to be created by Ishvara and it is acceptable that it is produced by him. The generation of something depends on another condition. The question, then, is what condition does Ishvara depend on? The conclusion would have to be that the simultaneously acting condition needs to be created by Ishvara and it is acceptable that it is produced by him. This is saying that the other condition that Ishvara depends on is Ishvara himself. That is what you would have to conclude from this argument.

What is being as clarified in the next two verses is that for anything to be produced it needs both a substantial cause and a simultaneously acting condition. There has to be the substantial cause as well as a simultaneously acting condition for something to be produced.

124. *If he relies, then the aggregation
Is the cause and not him.
If there is aggregation, he is powerless to prevent generation.
If there is no aggregation, he has no power to generate.*
125. *If he creates despite not wishing to do so,
Then he is under the power of others.
Although wishing, it depends on the wish.
Although creating, how can it be Ishvara?*

The commentary explains:

With regard to Ishvara generating a result, if it is in dependence on the simultaneously acting condition, the combination of substantial cause and simultaneously acting condition becomes the cause, then it follows there is no cause that Ishvara controls – because once the causes and conditions are complete Ishvara has no power to prevent the result, and if they are not complete, then he does not have the power to generate the result.

If the results of suffering of the lower realms and the like are generated from karma against Ishvara's wish, then it follows that Ishvara is controlled by other conditions, and the position that he is independently the creator of all is lost.

Even if Ishvara creates results upon wishing to create the result, the result would depend merely on the wish, and also if the wish is creating the result, how can that be Ishvara? The wish is impermanent.

As presented here, if Ishvara generates a result in dependence on a simultaneously acting condition, the combination of substantial cause and simultaneously acting condition would become the cause. For anything to be produced there has to be a substantial cause, and a simultaneously acting condition. For example, when a seed produces a sprout, the four elements serve as simultaneously acting conditions in that: the earth holds the seed so that it doesn't fall through; by gathering the essence of the nutrients in the earth the water causes the seed not germinate; fire or warmth ripens the seed; and the wind element expands the growth of the seedling. So the four elements work together as a simultaneously acting condition.

In other words, the combination of substantial cause and simultaneously acting condition becomes the cause. From that it follows that there is no cause that Ishvara controls. For a result to be produced, there has to be a combination of both the substantial cause as well as the simultaneously acting condition, therefore Ishvara does not have control over the production of a result. Once the causes and conditions are complete, Ishvara has no power to prevent the result. When the causes and conditions are complete and intact, they will definitely produce a result without Ishvara. And if the substantial cause and the simultaneously acting conditions are not complete then Ishvara does not have the power to generate a result. Therefore, claiming that Ishvara is the cause for everything that is produced is spurious.

Next comes the refutation of the result of the suffering of the lower realms and the like are generated from karma against Ishvara's wish. Although Ishvara does not wish for the sufferings of the lower realms and so forth, these sufferings are still produced by karma. If that is the case then it follows that Ishvara is controlled by other conditions, and the position that he is independently the creator of all is lost, is not tenable.

What is also implied here is that if Ishvara is a divine being with compassion for all beings and so forth, then why would he create the hell realms and allow beings to experience the sufferings there? This is yet another absurdity.

The next refutation is that even if Ishvara creates results upon wishing to create the result, the result would depend merely on the wish, and also if the wish is creating the result, how can that be Ishvara? If Ishvara has to depend on a wish in order to produce things, then it is not Ishvara who is the sole cause, i.e. he is dependent on a wish. Once again, it is not tenable to hold that Ishvara is the primary cause for everything.

2.3.2.3.1.2.3. Reminder that permanent particles without cause were already refuted

The relevant verse reads:

*126ab. Those asserting permanent particles
Also they have been refuted earlier.*

The commentary explains:

The position of the Particularists that permanent particles create migrators was refuted earlier with the reasoning refuting partless particles, and there is no need to add anything to that which has already been said.

As the commentary itself comments, there is no need for further explanation.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

21 March 2017

Based on the motivation we generated during the Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [meditation]

It would be good for us to incorporate this meditation into our daily practice, as we just attempted in that short session. We need to particularly check that our mental focus is stabilised: making an effort to stabilise a mind which is not yet stable and further stabilising it once it is settled.

Many obvious faults arise because of an unstable mind. When our mind is distracted externally, that brings both physical and psychological problems. If we could maintain our focus inwardly and allow the mind to abide peacefully, then that that would benefit us in whatever we do.

Once we acquire some control over our mind and subdue it to certain degree, we will have begun to establish the foundation for genuine peace in our mind.

Of course, the students here are already aware of these points. Nevertheless, we need to attend to them, because, if we don't use the instructions presented here to subdue our mind, then there will be nothing else that can help subdue it. We all know from our own experience that the unsubdued and crazed mind brings a lot of unwanted difficulties and problems in one's life.

2.3.2.3. STATING THE REASONS THAT ESTABLISH THE LACK OF TRUE EXISTENCE

2.3.2.3.1. The vajra sliver reason (cont.)

2.3.2.3.1.3. Refuting generation from a permanent principal

The Samkhyas assert what is called the principal, which is the primal cause of all subsequent manifestations or expressions.

This section is subdivided into two:

2.3.2.3.1.3.1. Stating the position

2.3.2.3.1.3.2. Repudiating it

First, we need to understand what the Samkhyas' position is, then we can repudiate it.

2.3.2.3.1.3.1. Stating the position

126cd. *That a permanent principal is the cause
Of migrators is asserted by the Samkhya.*

127. *The equilibrium of the qualities of Courage, particle, and darkness
Is strongly asserted as principal
And their imbalances are the migrators.*

The commentary explains:

Enumerators (or Samkhyas): From nature comes the great, from which in turn pride arises. Pride leads to the collection of sixteen, which are expressions (manifestations) while the person is neither nature nor expression.

The Enumerators posit that out of the twenty-five classes of objects of knowledge, the principal has the five characteristics of being permanent, unitary and so forth and is the cause for the various expressions and the migrators. Courage, particle and darkness are other words or other terms for happiness, suffering and equanimity. When these three characteristics are in equilibrium, they are strongly asserted as the principal, and when they are in disharmony, they are the migrators i.e. the expressions.

The Enumerators' (Samkhyas') position is that from nature or the principal, the great one arises, followed by pride. Then pride leads to the collection of the sixteen, which are expressions while the person is neither nature nor expression. The Samkhyas are asserting that the principal or nature is a primary source of all existence as manifestations. According to them, when a person wishes to experience any enjoyments of the five senses, the principal will manifest those objects, such as sound and so forth.

To summarise the Samkhyas' viewpoint, from the principal (1), the great one (2) arises, and from the great one arises pride (3). Then there is the person (4). This accounts for four of the twenty-five classes of objects of knowledge. Pride leads to the collection of sixteen, which includes the five sense objects – form, sound, odour, taste and tangible objects (9). In addition to these five sense objects, the collection of sixteen includes the eleven faculties: the five mental faculties of the eye, the ears, the nose, the tongue and the skin; the five physical faculties of speech, arms, legs, anus and genitalia; and the intellectual faculty (20). The final five of the twenty-five classes are the elements: earth, water, fire, wind and space (25).

The Samkhyas assert the principal as the great one, which is both cause and effect. The collection of the sixteen – the five sense objects and the eleven faculties – are said to be only effects. The person is neither cause nor effect. As mentioned here, the specific characteristic of the person is that it is neither nature nor the principal of expression.

The commentary continues: The Enumerators posit that out of the twenty-five classes of objects of knowledge the principal has the five characteristic qualities of being permanent, unitary and so forth... – it is permanent because, the Samkhyas assert, it does not change.

There are actually six characteristics of the principal: it is a permanent entity for it doesn't change (1); it is unitary as it is partless (2); it is all-pervasive (3); it is the origin of all manifestations (4); it is merely an object and not awareness (5); and it is the equilibrium of the qualities of courage, particle and darkness (6).

You can look up these classifications, which I have presented previously.¹

The commentary continues: ...is the cause for the various expressions and migrators. Courage, particle and darkness are other words or terms for happiness, suffering and equanimity. Other terms also used in the texts are 'lightness' (instead of courage) and 'motility' (instead of particle). When these three characteristics – courage, particle and darkness – are in equilibrium, this is what the Samkhyas strongly assert as the principal. When they are in disharmony, they are migrators or expressions or manifestations of the principal.

2.3.2.3.1.3.2. Repudiating it

Having presented the Samkhyas' position, the Madhyamika go on to repudiate it. This has two subdivisions:

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.1. Actual

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.2. The fault does not apply to the Madhyamika

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.1. Actual

This is further subdivided into three:

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.1.1. Refuting that a partless permanent can be the nature of the expressions

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.1.2. Refuting it to be permanent

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.1.3. Refuting that it would be impossible for something to first not exist and then to generate newly

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.1.1. Refuting that a partless permanent can be the nature of the expressions

128. *For one to have three natures
Is invalid. Hence it does not exist.
Likewise, qualities do not exist
Because they each have three aspects.*

129ab. *If there are no qualities, then also the existence
Of sound becomes not tenable.*

The commentary reads:

Take the subject 'object of knowledge' – it follows it is unsuitable for forms and so forth, and for a singular partless principal to have three natures of happiness and so forth – because it becomes impossible for them to be one. If that is impossible, it is also impossible for them to be many, and thus they are completely non-existent.

For that reason, a partless principal in the nature of three qualities does not exist. Likewise, the qualities themselves are not truly existent one, because each of these has again three qualities. If upon this analysis the principal with three equal qualities does not exist, then also the existence of the five objects of forms and so forth becomes far-fetched (not tenable), as the five mere objects are accepted as expressions of the primary principal.

The Madhyamikas' logic here is this: if the principal can be said to be three separate qualities, how can you (i.e. the Samkhyas) assert the principal as unitary or singular? This assertion is untenable. Furthermore, the Madhyamikas argue that while the principal cannot be singular, it also is impossible for it to be many. All three qualities could not be the single partless entity you assert, so it couldn't be many either. For anything to exist, it has to be either singular or many. If it is neither, then the conclusion has to be that it does not exist.

The commentary continues: For that reason, a partless principal in the nature of three qualities does not exist. So, having refuted the Samkhyas' assertion, with the argument that if such a principal is neither one nor many, it becomes completely non-existent – a partless principal in the nature of three qualities cannot exist. It is quite clear if you follow the logic.

Likewise, the mere qualities themselves are not truly existent one, because each of these has again three qualities. The Madhyamikas point out the absurdity in the Samkhyas' assertion – each of them has a further three qualities, so they cannot be a truly existent one. If upon this analysis, the principal with three equal qualities does not exist, then also the existence of the five objects of forms and so forth becomes far-fetched or not tenable, meaning that it is impossible for them to exist ...as the five mere objects are accepted as expressions of the primary principal.

The logic repudiating the Samkhyas' position is that the qualities themselves are not truly existent. This means that the qualities themselves would have to have further qualities, meaning they cannot truly exist as a unitary quality. Therefore, the principal with three qualities cannot exist, and if that does not exist, then even the five objects, which the Samkhyas exert as being expressions of the principal, also become untenable.

The next four lines of verse are:

129cd. *It also becomes impossible for non-sentient,
Clothes and so forth to have happiness etc.*

130ab. *If functionalities exist in the nature of the cause,
Haven't functionalities already been analysed?*

As the commentary explains:

Because they are inanimate matter, it follows it is impossible for the subject of the clothes and so forth to be of one simultaneously established substance with happiness, suffering and equanimity.

If the functionalities that are expressions, such as clothes, exist truly in the nature of happiness, suffering and equanimity, which is their cause, then haven't the true existence of functionalities already been analysed, that is they have already been refuted as true.

It is quite clearly explained here that the subject of the clothes and so forth cannot possibly be happiness, suffering and equanimity. So, if the functionalities that are expressions, such as clothes, exist truly in the nature of happiness, suffering and equanimity, which is their cause, then haven't the true existence of functionalities already been analysed, implies that they have indeed already been analysed and refuted as true existence.

The next lines of verse are:

130cd. *Your cause is happiness and the like,
From that, clothes and the like do not arise.*

131ab. *Happiness and the like arise from clothes and the like,
Because it does not exist, happiness and the like do not exist.*

The commentary explains:

If, as according to you, the cause of clothes and the like is the principal in which the three parts of happiness, suffering and equanimity are in equilibrium, then clothes and the like cannot arise from the principal because this principal is impossible.

If happiness and the other qualities are generated from clothes and the like then, because clothes and other objects do not subsequently exist, also the principal that contains the three equal parts of happiness and so forth becomes non-existent, because a result without a cause is impossible. It is unsuitable for you to accept this because you accept the principal to be a permanent functionality.

What is being refuted here is that the clothes and so forth are produced by the principal: if its three parts of happiness, suffering and equanimity are in equilibrium, then clothes and the like cannot arise from the principal because this principal is impossible. This principal was refuted earlier, and this argument follows that earlier reasoning.

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.1.2. Refuting it to be permanent

131cd. Happiness and so forth

Are never observed as permanent.

132. If the particulars of happiness exist,

Why is the experience not apprehended?

If it becomes subtle,

How can it be coarse or subtle?

133ab. Since it stops being coarse and becomes subtle

The coarse and subtle are impermanent.

The commentary explains:

It follows that the nature of happiness and so forth never exists as permanent – because it is not observed as such by prime cognition. In case the particulars of happiness exist as permanent functionalities, then why is the experience of happiness not apprehended at the time of experiencing suffering? It follows that one does apprehend it.

If that very happiness becomes subtle at that time, how can it be coarse and then abandon that status and be subtle? It follows it cannot do that - because it is permanent. Because happiness and the like stop being subtle and become coarse, and stop being coarse and become subtle, therefore this subtle and coarse phenomena become impermanent.

The first part here is quite clear. It follows that the nature of happiness and so forth never exists as permanent – because it is not observed as such by prime cognition. This follows the earlier Madhyamika presentation that it is not possible for it to be permanent.

In case the particulars of happiness exist as permanent functionalities, then why is the experience of happiness not apprehended at the time of experiencing suffering? The Samkhyas assert that, at the time of the cause, the effect is there but is not yet manifested; in other words, the effect or result is there at the time of the cause. That is what the Madhyamikas are refuting here.

As mentioned earlier, if happiness had the quality of suffering as well, then when one experiences happiness, one would also have to experience suffering as well. In case the particulars of happiness exist as permanent functionalities, then why is the experience of happiness not apprehended at the time of experiencing suffering? So, why doesn't one experience happiness if it is also part of the quality? This is a rhetorical question.

The Samkhya then say: If that very happiness becomes subtle at that time... They assert that when we are experiencing suffering, there is happiness, but because it is subtle, it is not experienced. This is refuted by the Madhyamika, who say, how can it be coarse and then abandon that status and become subtle? It follows it cannot do that – because it is permanent. Since the Samkhyas said earlier that it is a permanent functionality, which means it cannot change. So if it is coarse, how could it change to subtle? That is the absurdity being pointed out to the Samkhyas.

Because happiness and the like stop being subtle and become coarse, and stop being coarse and become subtle, therefore this subtle and coarse phenomena become impermanent. The Madhyamikas prove there is a change, therefore the subtle and coarse phenomena becomes impermanent, which nullifies the Samkhyas' assertion of happiness and so on as being permanent.

133ab. Similarly, why do you not assert

All functionalities to be impermanent?

134ab. If the coarse is not distinct from happiness,

Then happiness is clearly impermanent.

The commentary explains:

Likewise, why do you not posit the subject of all functionalities as impermanent? It follows that is suitable – because they change in their nature from one to the other.

Is the coarse cause of different substantial establishment from happiness or not? In case of the first, because one still experiences happiness although the coarse cause stops, one has a clear experience of happiness, and it is not a coarse cause. If it is not of different substance, then happiness clearly becomes impermanent because when the coarse cause stops, happiness also stops. If that is accepted, then the permanent nature of happiness and the other qualities wanes.

Here the Madhyamikas ask, likewise why do you not posit the subject of all functionalities as impermanent? It follows that it suitable – because they change in their nature from one to the other. If the characteristic of impermanence is that something changes in nature from one moment to the next, then if they change, they have to be impermanent.

Next, the Madhyamikas ask: Is the coarse cause of different substantial establishment from happiness or not? In the first case, because one still experiences happiness although the coarse cause stops, one has a clear experience of happiness, and it is not a coarse cause.

In the second instance, if it is not of different substance, then happiness clearly becomes impermanent because when the coarse cause stops, happiness also stops. If that is accepted, then the permanent nature of happiness and the other qualities wanes. Thus, the Samkhyas' assertion is untenable.

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.1.3. Refuting that it would be impossible for something to first not exist and then to generate newly

I will go through this section quickly, as it is quite clear when you read it. There are four lines of verse:

134cd. In case you say whatever is non-existent
Cannot generate because of not existing,

135ab. Then although not asserting it,
You abide on the generation of the unclear.

The commentary explains:

If your assertion is that for something to generate it has to exist at the time of the cause, then something that does not exist at the time of the cause cannot generate, because it does not exist in the nature of the cause. So what is your meaning of 'generate'?

Samkhyas: The nature that, although existing earlier, did not appear as object to the awareness at that time, is now clearly revealed.

Madhyamaka: Because you accept the clearly revealed that does not exist as generated at the time of the cause, then although you do not posit the new generation of something that did not exist earlier, you abide on that view. You accept the meaning, and merely do not accept the name.

Or: Although you do not posit the new generation of a previously non-existent particular, i.e. expression, you need to accept that you abide in this view.

If your assertion is that for something to generate it has to exist at the time of the cause... refers to the uncommon way in which the Samkhyas assert or posit cause and effect. They assert that because the effect has the same nature as the cause, it has to exist as a cause. If it does not exist at the time of the cause, they argue, how can something of the same nature be revealed as its effect?

However, asserting that the effect exists at the time of the cause is an absurd position. That is what the Madhyamikas are refuting in the commentary when they say: ...then something that does not exist at the time of the cause cannot generate, because it does not exist in the nature of the cause. So what is your meaning of 'generate' or 'produce'? This is the question being put to the Samkhyas.

The Samkhya respond: The nature that, although existing earlier, did not appear as object to the awareness at that time, is now clearly revealed. They are saying that, at the time of the cause, the fact is invisible. When the cause generates or produces it becomes visible. For example, the sprout exists at the time of the seed, but it is invisible at that time. When the actual sprout becomes visible to the naked eye of ordinary beings, then that is when we would refer to being generated or produced.

The Madhyamika refute that with the following lines:

*135cd. If the effect abides in the cause, then
One would eat faeces while eating food.*

*136ab. One would have to include the price
Of the cotton seeds when buying cotton.*

Then the commentary explains:

In the case where the result abides in the cause without being of different nature, then it follows one would eat faeces when eating food – because the nature of the food and the nature of the faeces are partlessly one. This is because you accept the principal as the nature of phenomena, mode of abiding, ultimate and as a partless permanent, as well as accepting that the nature of food and the nature of faeces as one.

Further, one would have to put the price of cotton onto the cotton seeds when buying cotton. It follows they would be suitable to be worn – because the nature of the cotton cloth and the nature of the cotton seed are partlessly one.

The reasoning here is that, because faeces are the effect or result of eating food, then if the effect exists at the time of the cause, this implies that faeces would exist at the time of the food. So when you consumed food, you would be consuming faeces!

This line of reasoning follows the Samkhya's earlier assertion that the nature of the cause (food) and the effect (faeces) are partlessly one. This is because you accept the principal as the nature of phenomena, mode of abiding, ultimate and as a partless permanent, as well as accepting that the nature of food and the nature of faeces as one.

Further, one would have to put the price of cotton onto the cotton seeds when buying cotton. So, if one were to buy cottonseed, one would have to pay the same amount that one would pay for the clothing produced from the cottonseed, because the nature of the cotton cloth and the nature of the cotton seed are partlessly one.

Again, according to the Samkhyas' assertion, the clothing would already exist in the cottonseed. Therefore, one could just wear cottonseed as clothing, as the clothing already exists! These are the logical fallacies brought about by the Samkhyas' position.

The next lines present the Samkhyas' answer:

*136ab. If worldly beings do not see it due to delusion,
This reality is determined through knowledge.*

*137. Because also worldly beings have this knowledge
Why should they not see?
If the worldly are not valid,
Then also the perception of the particulars is untrue.*

The commentary explains:

Samkhyas: What about if, even though the two are of one nature, worldly beings cannot see the result at the time of the cause because of being deluded, and therefore do not wear the seeds.

Madhyamika: Well then, as you the Enumerators accept your teacher Rishi Lingkye and others to be omniscient, and that you know that the result exists at the time of the cause because they have determined this reality with their knowledge, then you eat faeces when eating food. Because in your system also worldly beings can understand reality, why should they not see that the result exists at the time of the cause? It follows they see it - because they know that the Enumerator has determined that the result exists at the time of the cause.

Or: That the teacher referred to in the earlier line who is accepted to know reality, is seen insisting on wearing cotton clothes and not cotton seeds, makes it clear that the result does not exist at the time of the cause.

Thus, the Samkhyas assert that even though the effect and cause are of one nature, worldly beings cannot see the result at the time of the cause because of being deluded, and therefore do not wear the cotton seeds.

The Madhyamikas refute that by saying: Well then, as you the Enumerators accept your teacher Rishi Lingkye and others to be omniscient, and that you know that the result exists at the time of the cause because they have determined this reality with their knowledge, then you eat faeces when eating food. So they are saying that, since this is what is being asserted by your teacher, who you consider as omniscient, then the fallacy would have to follow. What is being refuted here is the Samkhyas' earlier assertion that the effect exists at the time of the cause because they are of the same nature. Yet worldly beings don't see this. So ...because in your system also worldly beings can understand reality, why should they not see the result exists at the time of the cause?

It follows they see it — because they know that the Enumerator has determined that the result exists at the time of the cause. So since worldly beings know that the principal has determined that the result exists at the time of the cause, then that means you are able to understand or see that.

Another way to present the Madhyamikas' argument is: That the teacher referred to in the earlier line who is accepted to know reality, is seen insisting on wearing cotton clothes and not cotton seeds, makes it clear that the result does not exist at the time of the cause. So your teacher himself wears clothes and not cottonseed. That in itself shows you cannot possibly see the effect at the time of the cause.

Samkhyas: Because the perception of worldly beings is not a prime cognition they do not realise it.

Madhyamika: Well then, it also follows that their perception of the particular expression that became a manifest entity is also untrue - because the perception of worldly beings is not a prime cognition.

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.2. The fault does not apply to the Madhyamaka

We can leave this for our next session. Although we have covered quite a lot of material this evening, it is not too incomprehensible or difficult to understand if you go through the text and read it slowly. So you can go over the text and make an attempt to understand the meaning.

The assertions presented in these teachings are those of the Samkhya scholars of the past. I am not sure whether there are still scholars or followers of this system in this day and age.

Again, if you are interested in these different schools of tenets, what their assertions are and how they have been refuted, then it is good to get an understanding as explained here in the text. You can also refer to other texts that explain these systems of thought.

28 March 2017

As usual let us engage in our meditation practice.

[tong len meditation]

We can now generate our motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: for the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and then put them into practice well.

Setting this motivation and then listening to the teachings will ensure positive imprints are left on our mindstream.

2.3.2.3.1.3.2.2. The fault does not apply to the Madhyamika

The first verse under this heading is:

138. *In case prime cognition is not valid
Doesn't what it comprehends become false?
For that very reason your Meditation on emptiness is invalid.*

The Realists present this argument:

Realist: If, according to you, prime cognition is not ultimately prime cognition, then it is a false prime cognition, and in this case does not its comprehended object also become a false distorted object not existing in the way it is comprehended? It follows that it becomes that – this is the case because the comprehending prime cognition is false. For that very reason, because the comprehending prime cognition is false, that which you posit as meditation on emptiness becomes distorted and invalid.

Then Madhyamika respond as follows:

Madhyamika: Take the subject 'object of knowledge' – for us it is very valid that the prime cognition that comprehends emptiness, and the emptiness posited by it are false. To ascertain the negation of the functionality true for conception depends on the appearance of the object of negation arising in the mind. It follows it is like this – because ...

The Realists' objection to the Prasangika position is that if prime cognition is not ultimately prime cognition as you say, then it is a false prime cognition. In that case isn't the comprehended object also a false distorted object that does not exist in the way it is comprehended? According to the Realists, both prime cognition and that which is apprehended exist truly. The Realists are saying to the Prasangika that if prime cognition is false, then what it apprehends should also be false. That is the main point being raised here.

The Realists continue with it follows that it has to be that, because the comprehending prime cognition is false. They are saying that if the comprehending prime cognition is false, then the apprehended object that it perceives should also be false.

For that very reason, they say, what you posit as meditation on emptiness is distorted and invalid, or not tenable.

The Madhyamikas say: Take the subject 'object of knowledge' – it is valid to say that the prime cognition that comprehends emptiness, and the emptiness posited by it are false. The Realists have said: "How can you claim a valid cognition perceiving an ultimate reality if the cognition itself is false?"

They are in fact using logical reasoning to point out that a false cognition could not perceive a true object. In response the Madhyamika say: "We accept that the prime cognition is false, and what is being apprehended is also false, i.e. emptiness is also false in so far as it lacks true existence".

We need to be careful not to misunderstand this. By saying that emptiness is false because it doesn't exist truly, the Madhyamika are, of course, not saying that emptiness is not an ultimate reality. What will be explained later in the text is that while the Realists are not able to conceive of a false cognition perceiving an ultimate object, the Madhyamika explain how, through perceiving a false object, a false cognition contributes to comprehending the ultimate.

The main point of the debate here is that the Realists posit all existence as being truly existent, while the Madhyamika say that things actually lack true existence, i.e. that things are not truly existent.

The Madhyamikas' essential point is that ascertaining the negation of the functionality true for conception depends on the appearance of the object of negation arising in the mind. The next verse explains the reasoning, which is the essential point.

139. *Without contact with the analysed object
One will not apprehend its non-existence.
Therefore the non-existence of any False object is clearly false.*

The commentary explains:

... without the conceptual thought making contact with the analysed object of true existence, i.e. if the aspect of true existence does not appear to the mind, then the investigating thought will not apprehend the object of being empty of true existence, which is the lack of true existence. Therefore, because the falsity that is the object of negation is impossible, therefore the negation that is the non-object is clearly also false.

The example of the earlier is: Without the aspect of the child of a barren woman appearing to the conceptual mind, the aspect of a dying child of a barren woman does not appear.

If the emptiness of true existence that lacks the object of negation exists truly, then the appearance of the lack of true existence to the knowing inferential cognition also needs to exist truly.

The explanation in the commentary begins with without contact with the analysed object one will not apprehend its non-existence. This is the main point to be understood. The conceptual thought making contact with the analysed object of true existence refers to the aspect of true existence not appearing to the mind. The commentary says that the absence of the object of negation will not be understood unless the conceptual thought has clearly identified, and really understood, what the object of negation is.

To make this clearer, the analysed object refers to true existence, and will not apprehend its non-existence refers to emptiness. What is being explained is that the non-existence or lack of true existence, i.e. emptiness, cannot be understood without first having a clear understanding of how the conceptual mind apprehends things as being truly existent. That is the main point.

If you understand this point then the meaning of this passage is clear. The commentary clarifies without the conceptual thought making contact with the analysed object of true existence... by adding... if the aspect of true existence does not appear to the mind, then the investigating thought will not apprehend the object as being empty of true existence, i.e. lacking true existence.

This explains the meaning of the first two lines of verse 139.

The commentary then explains the remaining two lines of the verse beginning with: Therefore, because the falsity that is the object of negation is impossible, the negation that is the non-object is clearly also false.

Then an example is given: Without the aspect of the child of a barren woman appearing to the conceptual mind, the aspect of a dying child of a barren woman does not appear. This example is a good illustration of the point that was made earlier, which is that without a clear understanding of what true existence is, the lack of true existence cannot be understood. Although a barren woman's child does not exist, without knowing what a barren woman's child means, one cannot even conceive of the impossibility of the death of a child of a barren woman.

The commentary continues: If the emptiness of true existence that lacks the object of negation exists truly, then the appearance of the lack of true existence to the knowing inferential cognition also needs to exist truly. The knowing inferential cognition mentioned here refers to the inferential cognition that apprehends emptiness. As explained in other texts, emptiness exists as it appears to the meditative equipoise of an arya being, but doesn't exist as it appears to the knowing inferential cognition, because to this cognition emptiness appears as truly existent. What is being explained in the commentary is that if emptiness were to exist truly then it would have to exist as it appears to the knowing inferential cognition, but that is not the case.

The reason why emptiness doesn't exist as it appears to the knowing inferential cognition is because it is a mistaken consciousness. As I have explained in previous teachings, except for the meditative equipoise of arya beings in which there is no true appearance at all, consciousnesses of all other sentient beings are necessarily mistaken. That is because when a sentient being's consciousness apprehends objects, it perceives them as being truly existent due to the imprints of true grasping in their mind. It is only an enlightened mind that doesn't have any true appearance at all. That is the point being made here: while the knowing inferential cognition apprehends emptiness, it still has the appearance of emptiness as truly existent.

Then the commentary further explains:

If one looks at this, a collection with only one part negated is impossible, and because the object of negation appears truly to it, the true appearance needs to also exist truly. In this case, true existence should be an existent, which it is not. The emptiness of true existence that has abandoned it, is also false and not truly established.

The point being explained is that while emptiness appears as being truly existent, it actually lacks true existence.

The commentary further explains:

This point is shown in the Root Wisdom, 'In case something slightly non-empty exists'. Without the meaning generality of the lack of true existence appearing to the mind, one does not properly ascertain the lack of true existence, and therefore one needs to be proficient in identifying the object of negation.

This is another succinct point. Without the meaning generality of the lack of true existence appearing to the mind refers back to the necessity for having a good understanding of the way true existence appears to the mind. Without having a proper understanding of that, one cannot properly ascertain the lack of true existence and therefore one needs to be proficient in identifying the object of negation. So it is very important to have a clear understanding of what is being refuted, which is the object of negation.

In simple terms this means that one should have a clear understanding about how things and events would have to exist if they were to exist truly. One has to have a very clear understanding of this point. This emphasises the point that it is crucial to identify the object of negation.

The next verse under this heading is:

140. *Thus, the thought thinking,
'The dream child has passed away'
Cancels the thought thinking that it Exists, and it is false.*

The commentary explains:

For this reason: When e.g., in a dream one observes the child dying and thinks, 'Now it does not exist anymore', this thought cancels out the thought thinking that it does exist.

Just as these two, the dream object of abandonment and the dream antidote are false, so it is not contradictory for the false antidote to destroy the false object of abandonment, and for the false prime cognition to comprehend the false object of comprehension.

It is not the same for you because the Enumerators accept all phenomena as truly existent, and do not know how to posit a false prime cognition.

This analogy should be quite clear. In a dream one observes a child who is dying or who is actually dead and thinks, 'now the child does not exist anymore', and this thought that the child does not exist anymore eliminates the thought of the child as still existing. Even though both the dream object of abandonment and the dream antidote are false, having a false antidote destroy a false object of abandonment is not contradictory. Using the same reason, it is not contradictory for a false prime cognition to comprehend a false object of comprehension.

The contradiction presented by the Enumerators is that if the prime cognition is false, then it could not perceive a true object. But for the Madhyamika, of course, this is not a contradiction. It is not the same, indicates that it is not the same for us because the Enumerators accept all phenomena as truly existent, and do not know how to posit a false prime cognition.

As mentioned previously, for us, a prime cognition can comprehend emptiness. While Enumerators cannot posit a true prime cognition perceiving a false object, for us, a prime cognition, which may be false itself, can also perceive an object that lacks true existence. That is a point being presented here.

2.3.2.3.1.4. Summarising the meaning of generation from no-cause

The first two lines of the next verse are presented:

141ab. *Therefore, by analysing in such a way
There is nothing without a cause*

Then the commentary explains:

Therefore, for these reasons, if one investigates with the reasons mentioned above, not only does generation from discordant causes such as Ishvara and the primary principal become impossible, saying 'there is no result that generates without a cause', it is also the concluding summary of the refutation of causeless generation.

This explanation is quite clear, so not much further explanation is needed. If one investigates the many reasons that were presented earlier, the generation from discordant causes such as Ishvara, as some non-Buddhists posit, and the primary principal as others posit, is impossible. Saying 'there is no result that generates without a cause' it is also the concluding summary of the refutation of causeless generation. In other words the argument that something can be generated without any cause is refuted.

A significant point to reflect upon here is that investigating with the various reasons that were presented earlier implies that the arguments and refutations are not just accepted blindly, or that some parts are accepted and other parts are 'left to beg'. Rather, the conclusion that the generation from discordant causes – such as Ishvara and the primary principal – is not tenable arises from thorough investigation with many reasonings. When careful logical reasons are presented the conclusion has to be accepted. Here the conclusion is that causeless generation is not tenable because all the arguments have been refuted, and so the conclusion has to be accepted. This is also in line with what I usually share with you, which is that you need to use your intelligence and wisdom to decide things.

2.3.2.3.1.5. Refuting generation from both self and other

This section begins with the comment in the commentary:

These four lines can be a summary for the refutation of generation from three principles, and can also be related to the refutation of generation from both self and other.

It's important to understand this. What is being refuted here is generation from both self and other.

Generation from self refers to generating from a separate permanent self as the non-Buddhist schools posit. That was refuted earlier. Generation from other refers to an effect that is generated from an inherently existent cause. All schools, including the Buddhist schools below the Prasangika assert such a cause. Here the Prasangika refute generation from both self and other.

The lines relating to this are:

141cd. It also does not abide on the individual Conditions or their collection;

142ab. It does not come from other, It does not abide or go.

The commentary explains:

The sprout abides neither inherently on the individual causes such as the water, fertiliser, warmth and moisture nor on their collection, as a juniper tree would abide on the bronze base¹. If it abides in such a way it should be observable, which it is not. It is the same for other results. They also do not exist at that time because without the conditions taking shape the sprout cannot be generated. It also does not come from some- thing other than these conditions, it also does not abide inherently upon having been generated inherently, and it does not go somewhere else upon cessation. Hence, it does not exist inherently in the slightest, and therefore there is also no generation from self, generation from other or generation from both self and other.

In short, this establishes the directional property of the argument, 'take the subject the aggregates and the person': it follows they are not generated inherently – because they are not generated from self, generated from other, generated from both or generated from no cause.

As the commentary explains, the sprout abides neither inherently on the individual causes such as the water, fertiliser, warmth and moisture nor on their collection. The assertion is that the sprout is generated from the collection of all of these causes. For the sprout to generate it is initially dependent on the seed and then other conditions such as fertiliser, warmth and moisture. The fact that it depends on all of these causes shows that the sprout does not exist inherently, and it does not abide inherently on any one of individual causes or the collection itself.

The analogy is that they are like a juniper tree that abides on a bronze base. If it abides in such a way then it should be observable, which it is not and it is the same for other results. If the cause were to exist inherently then the sprout would have to be observable at the time of the cause, but it is not observable. This indicates that while the sprout depends on causes it does not exist at the time of the cause. That is what refuting generation from self means.

They also do not exist at that time because without the conditions taking shape the sprout cannot be generated means that the sprout cannot exist or be generated while the necessary conditions are being assembled. It also does not come from something other than these conditions means that since the sprout does not exist before the conditions such as fertiliser and so forth come together, it does not exist inherently at that time or at any other time.

It does not come from something other than these conditions means that since it depends on these conditions, it cannot be produced from anything other than these conditions. It also does not abide inherently upon having been generated means it is not generated inherently nor does it abide inherently. Furthermore, it does not go somewhere else inherently upon cessation. The conclusion here is that it does not exist inherently in the slightest, and therefore there is also no generation from self, generation from other or generation from both self and other. That is how it is refuted.

A summary of this is presented in the next paragraph of the commentary.

In short, this establishes the directional property of the argument, 'take the subject the aggregates and the person': it follows they are not generated inherently – because they are not generated from self, generated from other, generated from both or generated from no cause.

The syllogism here is Take the subject 'the person and other phenomena': it follows they are not generated inherently from self – because they are not generated from self, generated from other, generated from both or generated from no cause. This syllogism is related to the syllogism known as the King of Reasoning as explained in Root Wisdom, which is, "take the subject 'persons and phenomena': they do not exist inherently – because they are dependent arising". This syllogism specifically states that, persons and phenomena are not generated inherently, whereas the earlier syllogism said they do not exist inherently. It's a slight difference but it comes down to the same point.

The King of Reasoning is the syllogism that uses the reasoning that the subject, whatever it may be, is a dependent arising, and this applies to all phenomena. Since the subject here, persons and phenomena, is all-inclusive, saying that they do not exist inherently because they are dependent arising applies to all phenomena.

The reasoning in the syllogism presented in the commentary is that since the aggregates and the person are not generated inherently, then that has to apply to all generated phenomena. The aggregates and persons are phenomena that have a particular cause, and are therefore generated. Thus, they are not generated from self, generated from other, generated from both or generated from no cause.

2.3.2.3.2. The reason of dependent arising

142cd. *How is that made true by delusion
Different from an illusion?*

The explanation in the commentary begins with:

What difference is there between the object labelled and made true by afflicted delusion, i.e., ignorance, and an illusion, dream, reflection and so forth? They appear as inherently existent while being empty of inherent existence.

This is a point that supports the earlier explanations. What difference is there between the object labelled and made true by afflicted delusions, for example ignorance, or an illusion or a dream, or a reflection and so forth? Although things appear as being true, they are actually known to be false. Likewise, though things appear as being inherently existent, they are actually empty of inherent existence. The point being made here is that conventionally we all accept these as false, which is also the case for the lack of inherent existence.

The next verse reads:

143. *That magically generated by a magician
And that magically generated by a cause
Where do they come from, where do they go?
You should analyse this.*

Then the commentary explains:

If the illusory horse and elephant conjured by the magician and the functionalities conjured by the causes and conditions were to exist truly then, when they are generated, they should come from somewhere else, and when they cease they should go somewhere else. In this case it should be analysed where they come from and where they go to. Because they do not possess inherent coming or going, take the subject 'the person and the aggregates' - they lack inherent existence - because they are dependent arising, e.g., like a reflection of a form.

The commentary starts with an example, if the illusory horse and elephant conjured by the magician, and the functionalities conjured by causes and conditions were to exist truly, then when they are generated they should come from somewhere else, and when they cease they should go somewhere else. This is saying that illusions may look like they actually exist, in that they come and go. But that is not the case.

Where do they come from and where do they go? The conclusion is that they do not inherently come or go, which relates to the earlier syllogism that was based on the subject 'the person and the aggregates'. The syllogism here uses the same subject. Take the subject 'the person and the aggregates: they lack inherent existence - because they are dependent arisings.' The example is like a reflection of form.

First of all as mentioned earlier, one needs to contemplate how the person and aggregates would have to exist if they were to exist truly. What would their mode of existence be if they were to exist truly? Once you really understand that question then the syllogism should make sense. The subjects, which are persons and aggregates, lack inherent existence, because they are dependent arisings. This implies that if they were to exist inherently, then they could not be dependent arisings i.e. they could not depend on anything else. But since they are dependent arisings, they cannot exist inherently.

To gain an understanding at a more personal level, we first need to accept the fact that we still have the misconception of grasping at a truly existent person. What does grasping at ourselves mean? We have this misconception that a person exists truly or inherently, so how do we relate that to ourselves.

The investigation begins by first analysing how we perceive ourselves? How does the misconception of grasping at a self, apprehend the self? As explained in the teachings, the misconception of grasping at a self apprehends a self that exists without depending on any other causes and conditions, existing from its own side in and of itself. That is how the 'I' appears to exist for the misconception of grasping at a true self.

The next investigation is to analyse and check whether the 'I' actually exists in that way or not? We investigate by asking: "Do I exist independently, without depending on any other causes and conditions?". When we realise that such an 'I' could not possibly exist in this manner, then an understanding of how the 'I' lacks true existence will begin to dawn on us. So we need to overcome that misconception of grasping at a truly existent self starting with our own personal individual self.

It is impossible to meditate on emptiness without having scrutinised and really understood how that misconception of grasping at a self appears to us. If whatever understanding of emptiness we have does not actually counteract grasping at the self, then claiming to be meditating on emptiness is quite lame. The very purpose of meditating on emptiness is to overcome the misconception of grasping at a self beginning with our own individual self. If we are indeed meditating on emptiness adequately, then the longer the time we spend in meditation the less intense our grasping at a truly existent individual self will become, and eventually it will be completely overcome. In simple terms, meditation on emptiness has to be able to counteract the misconception of grasping at an individual self.

The manner of conducting the investigation on a personal level is explained very clearly in Liberation in the Palm of Your Hand. As presented there, an appropriate time to investigate how the personal 'I' appears to us when a strong sense of 'me' is evoked. For example when someone criticises us, or accuses us of doing something that we haven't done, our self-defence mechanism is triggered and we become outraged: "How dare you accuse me!, I didn't do that!". In that instance how does the 'me' or 'I' appear to us? When we notice that this 'me' or 'I' appears to be completely independent, existing in and of itself, then that is when we are beginning to identify the object of negation.

Likewise when something good happens and we feel elated, thinking: "Oh, I feel so happy, something really good has happened to me". How does the 'I' or 'me' appear to us at that time? If that 'I' appears to be existing independently in and of itself, and not dependent on any other causes and conditions, then such a fabricated 'I' or 'self' is the object of negation that has to be refuted. That how Liberation in the Palm of Your Hand explains how to investigate the 'I'.

For us ordinary beings the usual way that forms appear to us is said to be the appearance of the object of negation.

When we ordinary beings apprehend form, it appears to us as existing independently, in and of itself. Thus the appearance of the object that we apprehend is the object of negation.

It appears to exist independently in and of itself because the form appears as something that exists 'out there'. Regardless of the fact that it is imputed by the mind, it actually appears to exist 'out there', from its own side. That is the appearance of the object of negation for ordinary beings. I have explained this many times in the past, so we need not spend too much time on this again.

The next verse reads:

144. *That which is seen due to proximity
To something, which likens the artificial reflection
In being not if that does not exist,
How could it possess a true reality?*

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse:

Any result, such as compositional factors or the sprout are seen to generate in proximity to their cause, such as ignorance or the seed and the like. Because they are artificial phenomena that are not generated if these causes do not exist, they are like a reflection of form. How could they exist in the very nature of true existence? They do not.

The four lines of, 'That magically [...] and so forth establish the pervasion of the reason of dependent arising. The next two and a half lines show the reason, and the next half is the example and the last line shows the thesis.

if one wishes study this more extensively, then one should study the great commentary on the Introduction.

As it explains here results such as compositional factors or the sprout are seen to generate in proximity to their causes, which are respectively ignorance and the seed and the like. Any result refers to any type of result such as compositional factors, which is the second of the twelve links. The cause of compositional factors is ignorance, so ignorance precedes compositional factors in the list of the twelve links. Therefore ignorance is the cause of compositional factors, which is karma. The cause of any kind of sprout is a seed. The seed precedes the sprout and is therefore the cause. So just as the sprout is seen to generate in proximity to its cause, and compositional factors arise from the cause of ignorance, because they are artificial phenomena that are not generated if these causes do not exist, they are like a reflection of form. So how could they exist in the very nature of true existence? The conclusion is that they are not truly existent.

The commentary explains that the four lines of verse 143 – that magically generated by a magician and so forth – establish the pervasion of the reason of dependent arising. They show that whatever is a dependent arising definitely can't exist truly or inherently. That is the pervasive reasoning of dependent arising.

The next two and a half lines of verse show the reason, and the next half is the example, where it talks about the artificial reflection being like an illusion. The last line shows the thesis, which is could they possess true reality if they do not exist? That is the reason that has been established.

Then the commentary concludes by saying that if one wishes to understand this more extensively, then one should study the great commentary on the Introduction, by Lama Tsongkhapa.

Another commentary on the Bodhisattvacharyavatara says that the reasoning of dependent arising is the most supreme of all reasons as it presents the most succinct logic to establish the view of dependent arising. That is why it was established as the King of Reasonings by Lama Tsong Khapa and his sons, i.e. his main disciples.

Then there is also a quote from the Madhyamakavatara, which we have studied previously. You can refer to Madhyamakavatara teachings², which explain the syllogism. These are really profound explanations that establish the right view, which the view of emptiness. So it is very good to have a sound understanding of them.

Around the time when we were studying these points in the Madhyamakavatara text, His Holiness was visiting to Australia. I saw His Holiness just briefly, and he asked me: "What subjects are you teaching these days?" I mentioned that we were in the middle of the Madhyamakavatara teachings and that on another night I was teaching The Thirty-Seven Practices of a Bodhisattva. Then His Holiness actually put his palms together and said: "Oh, it's really incredible that these actually include both method and wisdom. That's incredibly good". I'm sure all of you would have also received a blessing when he put his palms together and made that comment.

We should really acknowledge our great fortune in being able to study such texts as these. Further on, the text also explains the great purpose that one can achieve through the understanding of emptiness. So keep this in mind!

The text will also explain the relationship between understanding emptiness in relation to oneself and helping others. As will be explained, understanding emptiness helps to overcome the eight worldly concerns, as well as gaining various ways and means to benefit other sentient beings.

While maintaining the motivation generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

Generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings.

Our basic understanding of the bodhicitta motivation is a seed of bodhicitta, so it's a matter of further developing and enhancing it. Without putting some effort into increasing our level of bodhicitta it will not just suddenly and spontaneously develop within ourselves. Nourishing the seed of bodhicitta is our personal responsibility.

As explained many times previously, you have received the teachings and have an understanding of the different methods of developing bodhicitta, such as the sevenfold cause and effect sequence and the technique of exchanging self with others. Based on your understanding of these techniques, you need to familiarise yourself with them again and again; that is how you actually engage in the practice of developing bodhicitta.

The bodhisattvas who have already developed bodhicitta did done so by using these very techniques and are constantly increasing their bodhicitta by benefiting sentient beings, There's no other way to develop bodhicitta other than training your mind in the techniques presented.

If the bodhisattvas spontaneously generate the mind of bodhicitta without any effort, then we might also resolve to wait around for the day that we spontaneously generate it too. But since that is not possible, as I regularly emphasise, it is important for us to train our mind to become more compassionate and kind. For every effort we put into doing this, the benefits will definitely be reaped in this life, and in many future lives. So making every attempt in training our mind to cultivate bodhicitta is definitely of great benefit right now and in the long term.

If you wish to experience good results, then that is entirely dependent on generating positive and virtuous states of mind now. Likewise if we wish to avoid the experiences of suffering, then that is dependent on avoiding negative states of mind. What this shows is that we personally have the entire responsibility for securing a good future with positive results for ourselves, and avoiding negative results being experienced.

2.3.2.3.3. The reasoning refuting generation and cessation of existence and non-existence

This relates to refuting the effect and has three subdivisions:

2.3.2.3.3.1. Refuting inherent generation upon establishing the reason

2.3.2.3.3.2. Refuting this refutes inherent existence
2.3.2.3.3.3. Thus, establishing the equanimity of samsara and nirvana

2.3.2.3.3.1. Refuting inherent generation upon establishing the reason

With the earlier explanations from the text, the following passages should be easier to understand.

The first verse reads:

145. *For a functionality to come into existence
What need is there for a cause?
Even in the case that it does not exist,
What need is there for a cause?*

The commentary explains:

For a functionality to come into existence inherently, what need is there for a cause, for that which exists inherently does not need to be generated? Further, in the case that such a result does not exist, then what need is there for a cause as there is an inability to generate it? As all results are never generated at the time of the cause, this is not refuted, but what is refuted is that they are not generated at all.

The refutation of generation of an existing result, is the refutation of the result that exists at the time of the cause as asserted by the Enumerators, and results existing inherently as accepted by most others. But to say that since the effect is already generated it does not need to be generated, is a statement which is completely illogical. Thus, the non-inherently existing causes and effects are accepted to be like the illusion of a reflection.

Regarding establishing that a non-functionality is unsuitable to be created by a cause.

An argument is presented:

Argument: Although one does not need to generate something that is already generated, why should something non-existent not be generated?

The commentary explains, for a functionality to come into existence inherently, what need is there for a cause? For that which exists inherently does not need to be generated. This clearly explains that if a functionality comes into existence inherently, which means that it comes into existence independently, in and of itself then by default it would not depend on a cause since it does not have to depend upon anything for its generation.

The commentary continues, in the case that such a result does not exist, then what need is there for a cause as there is an inability to generate it? This is also quite clear: if such a result does not exist then there's no need for a cause. This relates to the refutation of generation and cessation of existence and non-existence, particularly in relation to causes and effects. The commentary explains, as all results are never generated at the time of the cause, this is not refuted, but what is refuted is that they are not generated at all. The commentary states that it is quite obvious that results are not generated at the time of the cause, therefore there is no need to refute what is quite obvious, but what is refuted is that they are not generated at all.

The Prasangika further explain, The refutation of generation of an existing result, is the refutation of the result that exists at the time of the cause as asserted by the Enumerators, and results existing inherently as accepted by most others. The Enumerators assert that the effect exists at the time of the cause and this is what is being refuted. Also, most other Buddhist schools, which are the schools below the Prasangika, assert inherent existence, and thus they accept inherently existent causes and effects; this also what is being refuted.

The Prasangika make this comment, But to say that since the effect is already generated it does not need to be generated, is a statement which is completely illogical. They conclude by saying, Thus, the non-inherently existing causes and effects are accepted to be like the illusion of a reflection, explains that just as the reflexion of a face in a mirror is not the real face, and illusions conjured by a magician are not actual things, similarly although all causes and effects appear to be inherently existent, in fact they do not exist in that way in the slightest.

These analogies of illusions and reflections of a face in the mirror and so forth are very profound, as they can help you get a better understanding of what emptiness is. They are very good analogies to illustrate how although things appear to exist inherently that is not how they actually exist. Even if you don't immediately gain a profound understanding of the lack of inherent existence, at the very least it will help you to reduce strong afflictions like intense attachment and anger.

If you can bring to mind that although the object of attachment appears to be extremely attractive, in reality the beauty doesn't exist as it appears. When you spend some time reflecting on this, your attachment towards that object will definitely become reduced. Likewise, when an object of anger comes to mind, and you see it as being repulsive, if you were to recall that although it appears to be entirely repulsive, that repulsiveness doesn't exist in the way that it appears, then that will definitely help to reduce anger towards the object. These are very good trainings for our mind to see how things don't exist the way they appear to our mistaken consciousness; and thus helps to reduce the intensity of the afflictions.

If you actually contemplate in this way, an understanding of emptiness, on the basis of a lack of inherent existence of phenomena will dawn upon you, and the more you think about it and contemplate in this way, the more understanding you will develop. This is how it is of great benefit for you. The more you contemplate on emptiness to overcome the afflictions the more you will benefit by improving your life, which is only a gain. There is only great gain and no loss at all. Some seem to think that gaining an understanding of emptiness i.e. the lack of inherent existence, particularly in relation to reducing attachments, anger and so forth, will be some sort of loss in their lives. But you need not doubt that there is only gain. All the great masters of the past obtained their great realisations and achievements by overcoming the afflictions through these understandings.

As the teachings say, merely developing a doubt¹ about the validity of emptiness, will begin to shatter the very core of samsara.

The commentary continues to explain that, regarding establishing that a non-functionality is unsuitable to be created by a cause, there's the argument that: Although one does not need to generate something that is already generated, why should something non-existent not be generated? This leads onto the next verse.

What is being presented here is based on the earlier explanation and not too complicated to understand. The real essence of this whole presentation is presented in the following verses.

The next verse reads:

146. *Even through one billion causes
A non-functionality cannot be changed.
How can this status be functional?
What else is that which becomes functional?*

Then the commentary explains:

Madhyamaka: Even through one billion causes, a non-functionality cannot be changed into a functionality because a non-functionality cannot fulfil the function of any functionality. If it changes, does it change without giving up its non-functional status or upon giving it up? If we look at the first, how can the status of non-functionality be a functionality? The status of being able to perform a function and the status of not being able to perform a function are mutually exclusive. If we look at the second, what is the cause that changes into a functionality apart from being a functionality or non-functionality? There is no such thing.

This is quite clear, Even through one billion causes, a non-functionality cannot be changed into a functionality, means that any phenomena which by nature is non-functional, cannot be changed into something which is functional. That which is by its very nature non-functional cannot be transformed into something which is functional. This is quite clear.

A further question is asked to back up this statement, If it changes, does it change without giving up its non-functional status or upon giving it up? This is a reasonable question. In the first instance it says, how can the status of non-functionality be a functionality? If something which was non-functional gives up its status of being non-functional and changes into something functional, then how can the state of non-functionality be a functionality as they're mutually exclusive. Then, If we look at the second, this explains that, what is the cause that changes into a functionality apart from being a functionality or non-functionality? This indicates that something has to be either a functional thing or a non-functional thing, there is no third possibility. It is absurd to say that a non-functionality changes into a functionality, and there is no point asserting that a functionality changes into a functionality, because it is already a functional phenomenon. This is quite clear.

The verse reads:

147. *If an existent functionality is impossible when non-existent,
When does functionality become existent?
Without having been generated as functionality
It does not become separated from this nonfunctionality.*

148ab. *It is not separated from non-functionality
An occasion for the existence of functionality is impossible?*

¹ Here 'doubt' has a positive connotation in the sense of suspecting that the teachings on emptiness are indeed valid.

Then the commentary explains:

Further, if it does not give up the status of non-functionality, and if it is not possible for a functionality to exist at a time when no functionality exists, when does functionality become existent? Functionality has not been generated at the time of non-functionality.

Further, if it becomes upon having abandoned the status of non-functionality: Without functionality having been generated it is impossible to become separated from non-functionality, and if it is not separated from non-functionality, then there is no chance for the existence of functionality, because these two types of status are mutually exclusive.

Again, this is quite clearly explained in the commentary so there's no need to elaborate further. What can be noted here is that the Vaibhashika assert that if it is existent phenomena it necessarily has to be a functional phenomenon – so even space is functional phenomenon. Their definition of functional phenomena is, that which can be conceived by a consciousness. So whatever can be conceived by a consciousness is what they would assert as a functional phenomenon. However according to the Prasangika system, functional phenomena relates to something which is produced by causes and effects, and thus cannot be permanent.

The next two lines of the verse read:

*148cd. Also, the functionality does not become non-existent
Because it would follow that it has two natures.*

Then the commentary explains:

Just as a non-functionality does not become a functionality, a functionality does not become a non-functionality because if it would be half functionality and half non-functionality, then the consequence would arise that merely one would have two natures.

These reasonings refute all generation from non-existence and non-functionality.

Take the subject 'sprout' – it is not generated inherently – because it is not inherently generated as existent, and it is not inherently generated as non-existent, e.g., like the child of a barren woman. Although its generation is refuted if non-existent at the time of the cause, it is a refutation of its inherent generation at the time of generation, even though it is non-existent at the time of the cause. Therefore, one needs to relate it to the object of negation.

What is being refuted in, although its generation is refuted if non-existent at the time of the cause, is that although the effect does not exist at the time of the cause, an inherently existent effect is generated from an inherently existent cause. Thus the commentary explains, therefore, one needs to relate it to the object of negation.

2.3.2.3.3.2. Refuting this also refutes cessation as being inherently existent

Having refuted inherently existent causes and inherently existent effects, this also refutes inherently existent cessation. That is what is being presented here.

The verse reads:

*149. Likewise cessation does not exist in such a way
And because functionalities also do not exist*

*All these migrators
Are never generated and never cease.*

The commentary explains:

If we look at the non-inherent existence of generation due to the reasoning explained above, cessation also does not exist inherently and because functionalities do not exist inherently, all these migrators are never inherently generated or inherently cease, they are primordially pacified and naturally liberated.

The main point being presented here is that when inherent generation is refuted by the earlier presented reasons, then inherently existent cessation is also refuted.

2.3.2.3.3.3 Thus, establishing the equanimity of samsara and nirvana

It was mentioned earlier that sentient beings are primordially pacified and naturally liberated, so this point establishes the equilibrium of samsara and nirvana.

The first two lines of the verse read:

*150. Migrators are like a dream
When investigated they are like banana trees*

The commentary explains:

The dream-like migrators of existence have not the slightest nature and they abide individually, without action and activity mixing. When analysed with the reasoning investigating suchness they are like a banana tree, they appear as if there is something identifiable but there is not the slightest inherent essence.

The demarcation that decides whether it becomes an analysis into suchness or not: If one is not satisfied with mere imputation by name and analyses on the basis of wanting to investigate how the basis exists, then it becomes an analysis into suchness, but if one is satisfied with mere imputation by name and investigates whether Devadatta comes and goes, then it is a nominal analysis.

The commentary explains, the dream-like migrators of existence have not the slightest nature and they abide individually, without action and activity mixing, which refers to the fact that migrators abide individually by performing actions and activities. When first analysed it appears to be like that but, When analysed with the reasoning investigating suchness, they are like a banana tree, means that although they appear like there's something identifiable, there is not the slightest inherent existence.

With the banana tree illustration, when you peel the trunk there is no solid core to be found. Similarly, sentient beings and migrators and their activities appear to exist from their own side, but in fact lack inherent existence. The word identifiable means that although they appear to exist from their own side, independently and in and of themselves, they actually do not exist in the slightest in that way.

The commentary now applies further reasoning with, the demarcation that decides whether it becomes an analysis into suchness or not, which is to point out the demarcation between the analyses of conventional reality and ultimate reality.

The statement, if one is not satisfied with mere imputation by name and analyses on the basis of wanting to investigate how the basis exists, highlights that when a name is imputed to a person (e.g. Tom or Devadatta), if one is not satisfied with that mere label, and wants to investigate further on how the basis exists, this would be an investigation or analysis into suchness.

On the other hand, but if one is satisfied with mere imputation by name, meaning if you are satisfied with just the label that is given, whether Devadatta comes and goes, and you don't analyse further than that, then it is a nominal analysis. This was also explained previously.

The first two lines of the next verse read:

150cd. *Having gone beyond misery and having not gone
They do not have any distinction.*

The commentary states:

There is no difference in suchness between those gone beyond sorrow free from the bonds that bind them to existence, such as attachment, and those not gone beyond sorrow that are caught in the prison of cyclic existence, because both existence and peace are the same in being empty of inherent existence.

This highlights that as far as lacking inherent existence is concerned, there is no difference whatsoever between those gone beyond sorrow i.e. those gone beyond the deluded state and thus are liberated, with those still caught in samsara. Both are exactly the same in that they both lack inherent existence. It continues that, because both existence and peace, existence here referring to the cyclic existence, and peace referring to nirvana, are the same in being empty of inherent existence. This is the point.

The commentary then quotes from the King of Concentration:

The dream-like migrators of cyclic existence,
They are not born and neither do they die.

This is quite clear. Then from the Sutra Requested by the Superior Upali:

If one has comprehended the nature of phenomena, then all results are non-existent and there is also no result to be attained.

These again are in reference to phenomena being in the nature of emptiness.

3. ADVICE THAT IT IS SUITABLE TO STRIVE IN REALISING EMPTINESS

These following passages show why it is suitable, and the great advantages and benefits one would obtain by gaining the realisation of emptiness.

What is presented here in the following passages are meticulous and profound explanations. The heading here is sub-divided into three:

3.1. The actual advice

3.2. Showing the object of great compassion by showing the disadvantages of cyclic existence

3.3. Showing the mode of apprehension of the aspect of great compassion

3.1. The actual advice

That is then divided into two:

3.1.1. Showing the meaning of the mode of abiding

3.1.2. It is suitable to strive in realising that

3.1.1. Showing the meaning of the mode of abiding

The verse reads:

151. *How can functionalities thus empty
Be attained or lost?
How could one be praised?
How could one be criticised?*

The commentary then explains:

If one comprehends the actual nature of functionalities that are thus empty of inherent existence in the way explained earlier, then which gain does one attain and become attached? Through the loss of what gain does one generate anger? What is the benefit received by praise, and what is the harm received by criticism, and by whom?

What is presented here is one of the immediate benefits of gaining a realisation of emptiness: to overcome the eight worldly concerns. As previously explained, while the benefits of overcoming the eight worldly concerns are usually expressed as a way to overcome a strong sense of attachment, aversion etc. this passage relates to how the eight worldly concerns are developed, and how we are compounded by that, and how the eight worldly concerns are overcome by the actual understanding of emptiness.

You can do some research on what the eight worldly concerns are, and be prepared to answer questions if I ask you to list them. While the heading here specifically advises that it is suitable to strive to realise emptiness, headings in some other commentaries refer to the following passages as the actual results of realising emptiness.

We have nearly come to the end of chapter nine so I guess in the next few sessions we'll complete it, and then the tenth chapter is on dedication, which serves as a conclusion.

We might be able to start the teachings on the Path to Enlightenment in June.

As usual let us spend some time in our meditation practice. [tong-len meditation]

Now we can generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings

3. ADVICE THAT IT IS SUITABLE TO STRIVE TO REALISE EMPTINESS¹

3.1. The actual advice

3.1.1. Showing the meaning of the mode of abiding

The root text reads:

151. *How can functionalities thus empty
Be attained or lost?
How could one be praised?
How could one be criticised?*

The commentary begins by stating:

If one comprehends the actual nature of functionalities that are thus empty of inherent existence in the way explained earlier...

This refers back to the various reasons that refute or negate the inherent existence of functionalities, which were presented earlier.

The commentary continues:

...then which gain does one attain and become attached? Through the loss of what gain does one generate anger?

This refers to the first two of the eight worldly concerns: being glad when one has obtained gained something and upset and unhappy when one does not gain anything. If we are glad when we gain something, then that can induce attachment to what we have gained. Likewise anger can arise when we are unhappy about not gaining something.

So we need to equalise those states of mind by understanding how the gains that we obtain and the lack of gain both equally lack any inherent existence. Since they do not exist from their own side, there is no independently existent gain to be obtained or lost. By contemplating this fact then our whole attitude towards gain and loss can change to feeling happy when we do not gain anything and unhappy when we gain something.

The misapprehension that perceives things as being inherently or independently existent also explains how that initial grasping at gain, and aversion towards not obtaining gain is actually induced by a self-grasping mind. So there is this combination of a self-grasping mind that is strengthened by the perception of objects as being inherently existent. That is the main point.

Here we need to be careful to not misinterpret this as meaning that we should avoid all gains. The main point is that we should overcome attachment to gain. If we think that it is necessary to completely avoid all gains, then that would imply that bodhisattvas would completely shun all gains, and not have possessions and so forth. That of course is not the case. There are bodhisattvas who have vast riches and so forth, but because of their lack of attachment to those riches they utilise them to benefit many other beings. Great practitioners such as the seventh Dalai Lama, Kelsang Gyatso, and the fifth Panchen Lama, Lobsang Yeshe, had great riches in their lifetimes. Yet it is said that they did not even cling to their robes as being 'mine'. They didn't have the slightest of thoughts that anything 'belongs to me'. This goes to show that it's not gain that we need to avoid, but the grasping and attachment to gains and so forth.

The commentary then asks:

- What is the benefit received by praise, and what is the harm received by criticism, and by whom?

This relates to the second set of the eight worldly concerns: liking praise and not liking any criticism. As they both equally lack any inherent existence from their own side, why be so glad about praise and why be so unhappy about criticism?

The relevant verse reads:

152. *Where do happiness and suffering come from?
What is there to like or dislike?
Having investigated suchness
Who craves, and for what?*

Here the commentary explains:

From what true cause does the suffering of happiness, for which one engages into effort to attain and abandon it, arise? What is the inherent object of aversion and desire that one dislikes and likes? If one investigates suchness with the reasoning investigating the nature of the mode of abiding, then which craving person generates craving for which object, in dependence on which basis is craving generated? The three circles of craving lack inherent existence.

Being glad when experiencing happiness and despondent and unhappy when experiencing suffering is said to be one of the worst worldly concerns, as it is the cause of so much agitation, distress and mental suffering. That is because the happiness we crave eludes us so often, while we keep on experiencing what we really want to avoid. The moment we experience some sort of pleasurable samsaric happiness, attachment immediately arises in our minds, and the moment we experience any kind of discomfort and suffering, aversion and anger arise in our minds. We know this from our own experience. The moment we feel any discomfort, our mind is likely to become upset, and we begin to feel agitated and angry.

The way to equalise and overcome this worldly concern is to contemplate how there is no truly and inherently existent happiness. Likewise, there is no truly and inherently existent suffering existing independently from its own side. With this understanding strong grasping at the experience of worldly happiness, and the desire to avoid suffering is overcome.

There is also the exchanging and equalising method that is mentioned in the mind-training teachings. This involves exchanging your attitude from one that likes happiness with an attitude of disliking happiness, and exchanging disliking suffering with the attitude of liking and welcoming suffering and problems. This is, of course, a very profound level of mind-training, but through regular practice it is possible to actually reach the stage of exchanging the mind that craves happiness to being wary about experiencing worldly happiness, and then replacing it with an attitude of looking forward to experiencing difficulties and suffering.

Adopting this technique of exchanging worldly concerns can definitely be assisted by contemplating karma. All of our experiences come from previously created causes and conditions – none of them comes about randomly without any cause. When we apply this to ourselves, then we realise that the happiness we experience is result of our virtuous behaviour and the good karma that we have created in the past. So if we get attached to that happiness, then we are actually using up the virtue that we created in the past. So there's nothing to be happy about in using up and wasting the good karma that we have created in the past. When we think in this way and really understand the implications, it is very reasonable to not feel too elated about experiencing happiness.

Likewise, suffering is the result of negative karma that we created in the past with negativities and non-virtuous behaviour. So whatever suffering we experience now is actually exhausting our previously created negative karma, which is quite a good thing. When we understand things on this level then we welcome problems, because they are exhausting our negative karma. Wouldn't it be great to use up all your negative karma so that there are no more negative karmas left to experience?

Shantideva himself mentions five qualities of suffering. One of these is that when we experience suffering, we can immediately contemplate shunning negativities and accumulating virtue, and in that way see suffering as a way of encouraging us to accumulate virtue. Whenever I drink tea or enjoy a good meal, I contemplate how this is the consequence of good karma. Contemplating in this way actually encourages us to accumulate more virtue. Rather than becoming a cause for attachment, it actually reminds us that we need to accumulate more good karma. Conversely, when we experience any kind of mishaps and difficulties, we can remember that the uncomfortable experience we are experiencing now is a result of past negativities. This reminds us to purify our negative karma so that we won't have to experience the consequences in the future.

Shantideva mentions that we should develop a mind of being cautious about creating negativities, and glad and happy about accumulating virtues.

This is an essential point that we need to really consider. Whenever we have a good experience then, rather than getting too excited and feeling elated, we should immediately remind ourselves, 'OK, this is a result of the virtue that I accumulated in the past. So I should not waste it by becoming attached'. This also reminds us to accumulate more virtue. As soon as we experience any kind of mishap, discomfort and suffering we should immediately remind ourselves that this is result of the negative karma that we created in the past, and that we must not engage in negativities now. Contemplating in this way develops a very strong impetus to accumulate virtue and shun negativities, which is the essential practice of Dharma.

The next line in the commentary is:

What is the inherent object of aversion and desire that one dislikes and likes?

Again, this is referring to what is liked or disliked such as liking happiness and disliking suffering, and liking pleasant words while disliking unpleasant words. As the commentary suggests:

If one investigates suchness with the reasoning investigating the nature of the mode of abiding, then which craving person generates craving for which object, in dependence on which basis is craving generated?

The conclusion is that:

The three circles of craving lack inherent existence.

The three circles refer to the person who is craving, the object that is being craved and the actual action of craving. All three lack even an atom of inherent existence. When we really analyse the person who likes and dislikes, the object that is liked and disliked, as well as the actions of craving for what we like and craving to be free from what we dislike, we find that all of them lack inherent existence. When we contemplate in this way it definitely reduces strong attachment and aversion in relation to, respectively, beautiful and repulsive objects. What is being presented here is that without a proper understanding of emptiness then it is very difficult to overcome the mental afflictions. Conversely when there is a good understanding of emptiness, the lack of inherent existence of ourselves and other phenomena, then that helps to reduce and ultimately overcome the mental afflictions. This is what needs to be understood.

The next verse is:

153. *When analysed, this life's worldly being,
How can it pass away here?
What will arise, what arose?
Who is a relative or friend?*

Here the commentary explains:

If one analyses thus a result, if one analyses karma and the person accumulating karma, then, because death is empty of inherent existence, how can this worldly sentient being die here in existence? How can it arise in a later life, how could it have arisen in a previous life? As there is not even the slightest inherent existence, who is the benefiting relative, or the attractive friend? Therefore, having worked at gaining a complete understanding of the meaning of the mode of abiding, one should train in equanimity for the eight worldly dharmas.

If we investigate the karma and the person who is accumulating the karma, then we are investigating on the basis of a living person now, as well as the experience at the time of death, and the future lifetime. All three, the living person now, the person who will experience death, and the person in the future, equally lack inherent existence.

As there is not even the slightest inherent existence, how can this worldly sentient being die here? How can it arise in a later life? How could it have risen in a previous life? What is being pointed out is that the living being now, that which will experience death, that which is to be reborn in the future as well as that which has come from the past, all equally lack any inherent existence. The reference to the relative who benefits and the attractive friend relates to friends and relatives who we perceive as existing inherently and from their own side, and are thus an object of attachment and craving. Understanding the lack of inherent existence of all the various objects of our attachment and aversion will help to overcome strong attachment and aversion, as well as all other afflictions.

Then comes the exhortation, Therefore, having worked at gaining a complete understanding of the mode of abiding, one should train in equanimity for the eight worldly dharmas. Although we may not have a complete understanding of the mode of abiding, i.e. the lack of inherent existence of phenomena, we can strive towards overcoming the eight worldly concerns with whatever understanding of emptiness that we do have now. This is the main point.

3.1.2. It is suitable to strive in realising that

The following two lines of verse are:

154ab. *Everything is like space -
That is how the likes of me should hold everything.*

The commentary explains:

Therefore, those like me, the author, should hold all phenomena to be like space, because it is the main path to cut the root of existence and progress to all-knowing transcendental wisdom. 'Those like me' is to reduce the pride of the author, and the main reason is as advice to those ordinary individuals that have not yet realised suchness.

The definition of space is the mere negation of obstruction. Emptiness is likened to space as it is a non-affirming negation; i.e. emptiness is the mere negation of inherent existence.

Because it is the main path to cut the root of existence and progress to all-knowing transcendental wisdom explains that the realisation of emptiness is the main path that cuts the root of cyclic existence, and progress to all knowing transcendental wisdom.

This is a specific explanation: the wisdom realising emptiness is both the root cause for obtaining liberation i.e. cutting the root of cyclic existence, and for obtaining the all-knowing transcendental wisdom that is enlightenment. So the realisation of emptiness is the unequivocal cause of both liberation and enlightenment.

The remainder of the commentary is quite clear. 'Those like me' is to reduce the pride of the author. The main reason or purpose, however is to entice ordinary individuals who have not yet realised suchness, to actually gain the realisation of emptiness.

3.2. Showing the object of great compassion by showing the disadvantages of cyclic existence

The following passages are not difficult to understand if you read through them slowly. They contain essential advice how to engage in practice.

There are five subdivisions:

- 3.2.1. The disadvantages of this life
- 3.2.2. The disadvantages in the next life
- 3.2.3. Contemplating that despite taking rebirth in the happy realm there is no time to practise Dharma
- 3.2.4. Contemplating the difficulty of attaining a birth with leisure and endowment
- 3.2.5. That oneself and others are afflicted by the suffering of cyclic existence is suitable to be mourned

3.2.1. The disadvantages of this life

Contemplating the disadvantages of this life also helps to induce compassion for other beings as well. That is the main point presented in these lines of verse:

154cd. *Those who desire happiness for themselves,
Through the causes of fighting and liking,*

155. *Are agitated or joyful;
Are miserable, striving and arguing,
Cutting, stabbing, and creating negativity
With each other; it is a very difficult life!*

The explanation in the commentary reads:

Even in this life, those desiring happiness for themselves are not beyond the power of suffering. Out of the wish for happiness they fight with enemies and like their friends, and through these causes they are either very disturbed or joyful. They are miserable when not achieving their aim. It appears as if they have to lead a very difficult life with much exertion, and yet attain little fruit due to the effort exerted to achieve the aim of their desires, due to arguing with others, cutting and stabbing each other's bodies, and accumulating infinite negativities of speech, mind and so forth. Therefore, the wise ones should not crave for the perfections of this life.

As the commentary explains, Even in this life, those desiring happiness for themselves are not beyond the power of suffering. Although we wish to experience happiness, we constantly experience suffering.

This is the same point that was presented in an earlier verse in the text. Shantideva really hit the mark when he said:

Although not wishing any sufferings,
Beings constantly run towards suffering
And although wishing for happiness,
They destroy the very causes of happiness.

As the commentary explains very clearly, Out of the wish for happiness they fight with enemies. We have all seen those who try to overcome enemies with the intention of gaining some happiness. However, far from attaining happiness, their actions just incite more hostility, so the desired result of happiness has become the cause for more suffering. We can see this on a global level. All the current conflicts arose from an initial intention to defeat and vanquish enemies in the name of peace, yet these conflicts have just created more and more hatred, and more combat, and more fighting. It is the same with friends. We try to please our friends, but sometimes that just causes more misery, and we realise that we haven't found the friendship we were looking for.

As the commentary further explains, through these causes they are either very disturbed or joyful but they are miserable because they do not achieve their aim. It appears as if they have to lead a very difficult life with much exertion. We can see this in our own lives: we put so much time and energy into the pursuit of success and so forth but happiness still eludes us. As the commentary clearly explains people attain little fruit due to the effort exerted to achieve the aim of their desires. These efforts include arguing with others, cutting and stabbing each other's bodies, and accumulating infinite negativities of speech, mind and so forth. This is all very clear. Therefore, the wise ones should not crave for the perfections of this life. Here we are being exhorted to be careful about being overly concerned with the pleasures of this life.

The main point is the need to be mindful of acquiring the right conditions and causes for happiness. If we follow mistaken causes, then instead of experiencing happiness we will experience suffering which, of course, is what we have experienced all too often. The reason why we end up experiencing problems and thus suffering is because we are not acquiring the right causes for our happiness, and we keep on creating the causes for more problems and suffering. That is what we have done in the past, and that is what we are doing now. When you really contemplate these points especially in relation to the next verse, it really instils a strong compassion for those who are completely ignorant of the cause and effect sequence of how to accumulate virtues to experience happiness, and how to avoid the causes of suffering. Because of this ignorance they constantly experience suffering.

3.2.2. The disadvantages in the next life

The next few lines express the plight of sentient beings very succinctly. It is quite difficult for them to free themselves from cyclic existence, because this circle of constantly craving more causes us to experience the sufferings of cyclic existence again and again.

156. *Taking a higher rebirth from time to time,
And having experienced plenty of happiness there
One falls after death into the lower realms,
Experiencing long and terrifying sufferings.*

As the commentary explains:

Through the force of occasionally meeting with a virtuous teacher one takes a happy rebirth from time to time for the shortest of periods, like a flash of lightning in the sky. Having enjoyed much happiness there, one then has to experience the rough hot unpleasant sufferings of the lower realms and fall into the unceasing great hells where one remains for infinite eons experiencing terrifying suffering. Therefore, contemplate the sufferings of the lower realms.

Again this is essential advice, and it's not too hard to understand. It is a very strong reminder to actually practise the Dharma. As the commentary explains, through the force of occasionally meeting with a virtuous teacher one takes a happy rebirth from time to time for the shortest of periods. Right now we are enjoying the perfect conditions of a human life with its ten endowments and eight freedoms, because we met virtuous teachers in the past, and accumulated virtuous karma or merit in the past.

However, as explained here, although we have obtained a higher rebirth from time to time in the past, each of those lives were very short. The good conditions that we enjoy now will definitely not last much more than eighty years. As mentioned here, like a flash of lightning in the sky, having enjoyed much happiness then one has to experience the rough hot unpleasant sufferings of the lower realms. When we have exhausted the merit to experience good conditions, then what remains is the negative karma that we created in the past, which then propels us to the lower realms once more.

Contemplating these points definitely brings a sense of urgency about securing a good future by accumulating virtues now. As the commentary explains, the alternative is to remain for infinite eons experiencing terrifying suffering. So we need to contemplate the sufferings of the lower realms.

In this life we are exhausting the merit that we have accumulated in the past, and unless we accumulate further virtues and merit to secure a good rebirth in the next life, we will have to experience the suffering of an unfortunate rebirth in the lower realms. So the main point here is that we need to develop a sense of urgency about accumulating virtues now. While that definitely inspires me to accumulate virtues and shun negativities, we all can benefit from thinking about this point.

While contemplating the sufferings of an unfortunate birth in the next life encourages us to engage in virtues and practise Dharma, it also induces a sense of compassion for other beings. They are experiencing so much suffering at this time, and they have no understanding of how to overcome the causes of that suffering. Their plight is really pitiful, and contemplating that can induce great compassion for them.

On a very basic level try to avoid negativities and accumulate virtues. While we may not yet have a vast understanding of the teachings, we can definitely practise at a simple and practical level. Understanding the ten virtuous and the ten non-virtuous actions gives us all that we really need to practise morality. There are the three non-virtuous physical actions of killing, stealing, sexual misconduct; the four non-virtuous actions of speech i.e. lying, divisive words, harsh words, and idle gossip; and three mental non-virtues of covetousness, harmful intention, and wrong views. By avoiding these ten non-virtues, and making a promise to practise the ten virtues, you are engaging in the practice of avoiding negativities and adopting virtues.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

18 April 2017

As usual, let us spend some time for our meditation practice. [tong-len meditation].

Now let us generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings, thinking, 'for the benefit of all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and put them into practice well'.

3.2.2. The disadvantages in the next life

Under this heading, we covered the first verse and its explanation in our last session. We are now onto the next verse.

What is being presented here are profound ways for encouraging ourselves to engage in Dharma practice. As explained earlier, although we may have obtained a rebirth in a fortunate realm, the period of time we have in this fortunate rebirth is very short. Therefore, having obtained this precious human rebirth at this time, and particularly having had the good fortune to meet with a qualified Mahayana teacher, we need to seize this opportunity and put the Dharma we have studied into practice well. This is the essence of what is being presented here.

In fact, we covered this yesterday in the last session of the Easter course on The Three Principal Aspects of the Path, when we went through the details of contemplating the sufferings of sentient beings as a way to generate bodhicitta. So we can easily relate to this point.

In yesterday's session, we reached the point in the verses about the purpose of realising emptiness. As we didn't have time to go further with that, this can be a continuation of the same topic – how to go about generating the realisation of emptiness.

The first three lines of the next verse read:

*157abc. There are a multitude of precipices in the world.
Suchness does not exist there
And they contradict each other.*

The commentary explains:

Contemplating the general sufferings of existence, in the existence of desire, form and the formless there are great multitude of precipices of harmful sufferings. The cause why one is not beyond this is that this world does not comprehend suchness, which is the method to be liberated from suffering. Situations such as being bound by the noose of existence is mutually exclusive with such an understanding.

Therefore, if one does not comprehend suchness, then one fabricates functionalities as truly existent, and as a result, one will be in contradiction to the cause of liberation. Then there is nothing left but to circle in cyclic existence ...

What is being explained here are the many pitfalls of suffering that exist in the desire, form and formless realms.

Just to explain further about the 'formless realm': we may recall that the definition of a person is 'that which is nominated upon one or more of the five aggregates'. So while beings in the formless realm don't have the form aggregate, by definition they are a person or a being, as they are nominated upon the aggregates of consciousness along with the compositional factors, feeling and discrimination.

Again, we can relate the commentary to what we were discussing in the verse of the Three Principal Aspects of the Path at yesterday's session. The purpose of realising emptiness is as explained here: the cause why one is not beyond this is that this world does not comprehend suchness or emptiness, which is the method to be liberated from suffering. The commentary goes on: situations such as being bound by the noose of existence are mutually exclusive with such an understanding. As was also explained in yesterday's session on the purpose of realising emptiness, beings are bound to cyclic existence due to karma and afflictions. If we recall the analogy of a person bound to a tree, the binding factor – the rope – is analogous to karma and the delusions. As I have mentioned previously, gaining an understanding of one aspect of the teachings, and maintaining that understanding, can help us to relate to other similar explanations. When you have read and understood a particular aspect of the teaching, then whenever you find it presented in a text, that part of the text will be very clear to you.

So if we understand cyclic existence as being our own contaminated aggregates, the binding factor – or as mentioned here the noose – is karma and the delusions, and that which is being bound is the person, ourselves. We are bound to the contaminated aggregates by the noose or rope of the afflictions and karma. Thus, we will not be free of being bound to the contaminated aggregates unless and until we generate the understanding or realisation of suchness or emptiness. This is the essential point.

The commentary further explains:

Therefore, if one does not comprehend suchness, then one fabricates functionalities as truly existent, and as a result, one will be in contradiction to the cause of liberation.

When we have the false perception of grasping at phenomena as truly or inherently existent, this mistaken view will bind us to cyclic existence, which is in contradiction to the cause of liberation. If we view things as being empty of true or inherent existence, then that will not be in contradiction to the cause of liberation. In fact, it will be the very cause of our liberation.

Here, we need to understand that the fabricated perception we have that sees functionalities, or phenomena as being truly existent is the main cause that binds us to cyclic existence, a specific example of which would be our own contaminated aggregates. Until we thoroughly understand why we need to abandon our contaminated aggregates, there is no way we can develop the mind of wanting to be free from cyclic existence.

In relation to the three types of sufferings – from our own experience, we can all relate to the suffering of suffering as something we desperately want to overcome. Even animals want to be free from the suffering of suffering. Some translations refer to it as the ‘suffering of pain’ denoting the emotional and physical pain that is experienced. This is not an obscure point; because of the very experience of physical or mental suffering, all beings are naturally inclined to want to be free from that. The next type of suffering is the suffering of change, which is a little bit more obscure. It is not, however, unique to the Buddhist tenets, as there are some other traditions that view the suffering of change as something to be abandoned as well. The third level of suffering – all-pervasive, compounded suffering – is said to be the subtlest suffering to realise, and thus to be abandoned. But until we see the need to abandon our contaminated aggregates, then there is no way we can be free from cyclic existence. This is what specifically needs to be understood here, which is an uncommon and unique presentation in the Buddhist teachings. If, on the other hand, we are in contradiction to the cause of liberation, then there is nothing left but to circle in cyclic existence.

The last line of Verse 157 and the two lines from Verse 158 read:

157d. Hence, nothing like it exists in the world.

158ab. Additionally, there is a terrifying infinite Ocean of suffering without example.

The commentary explains:

Because in the world of circling there is no such thorough comprehension of suchness, and it is a unique existence in which one experiences an ocean of terrifying infinite suffering without example. Therefore it is suitable to strive in understanding emptiness.

This serves as a reason for the earlier point. The commentary starts by saying that because of the lack of the thorough comprehension of suchness, it is a unique¹ existence in which one experiences an ocean of terrifying infinite suffering without example. In other words, until we gain the thorough comprehension or understanding of suchness or emptiness, we will not be able to see the end of cyclic existence. In earlier teachings, there were questions about whether or not there is an end to cyclic existence. Here, we are shown that we will not be able to see the end of cyclic existence if we do not have the comprehension, or thorough understanding, of suchness. Such a person will experience a seemingly endless round of rebirth in cyclic existence. But a being who develops a thorough understanding of suchness will be able to see that there is an end to their cyclic existence.

Rather than getting caught in endless debates about whether in general there is an end to cyclic existence or not, it is much more worthwhile for us to understand that, on a personal level, for as long as we do not gain the thorough or complete, unmistakable understanding of the correct view of suchness, there will be no end to our personal cyclic existence. We will have to be continuously reborn in cyclic existence. But when we gain a good understanding and realisation of emptiness, from then on, we will be able to clearly see that there is an end to our own personal cyclic existence. So, as the commentary concludes, it is suitable to strive to understand emptiness.

Here, we need to contemplate our own mistaken view, or the view of the transitory collections. With this view, one grasps at oneself (the individual ‘I’) and the ‘my’ and ‘mine’ which belong to the aggregates as being inherently existent. That core misconception – grasping at the self – is what binds us to cyclic existence. We must then see the possibility of overcoming this mistaken view, and that there’s an antidote to this mistaken view of the transitory collections. The antidote is to cultivate the understanding of the correct view, which is that the ‘I’ and the things that belong to the ‘I’ do not exist inherently. When we comprehend that and realise the view of selflessness, we overcome that mistaken view of the transitory collections.

As the teachings explain, when grasping at the self is overcome, then we release the noose that binds us to cyclic existence. We need to see that the object apprehended by self-grasping – an inherently or truly existent ‘I’ – does not exist. Once we see that there is no truly or inherently existent self, we will have negated the object perceived by self-grasping. That is how we understand the selflessness of the ‘I’.

3.2.3. Contemplating that despite taking rebirth in the happy realm there is no time to practise Dharma

The next verse exhorts us to overcome the thought, ‘although I didn’t get time to practise much in this life, I can certainly aim to practise further in the next life’. What may sound to us like a comforting thought is in fact just a form of laziness, specifically the laziness of procrastinating.

The following passages help us to overcome such laziness by reminding us that, although we may have a good rebirth at the moment, it is very short, and there is not much time to actually practise the Dharma.

So we can relate the following passages to our precious human life:

158cd. *There thus it is weak
And one’s life is short.*

159ab. *There are actions to live
And stay healthy; thirst and fatigue,*

The commentary explains:

There, in that existence, although one takes rebirth in a happy realm, as a consequence the power to create virtue is thus weak, and the basis for achieving virtue, the freedoms and endowments, is short-lived.

Even during the briefest times there, one is engaged in actions with which one hopes to stay with for a long time, such as washing and massaging the body and relying on medicine to stay free from sickness. There is thirst, fatigue on the road, ...

So although one may take rebirth in a happy realm such as a human rebirth with freedoms and endowments, the power to create virtue is still very weak. Even if one has obtained a human rebirth with freedoms and endowments, it is also very short-lived. It doesn’t last for a long time. We really need to reflect upon this in relation to our own circumstances.

¹ Translator’s note: the Tibetan word here means ‘an existence which has no comparison or has no example’. I think that’s why this translation uses the word ‘unique’ here.

Even during the briefest times there, one is engaged in actions with which one hopes to stay with for a long time... So, although the duration of our stay in the happy realms or in fortunate rebirths is only for a short time, we hope to stay for a long time. Thus, we engage in the means for staying healthy and prolonging our life, by engaging in activities such as washing and massaging the body and relying on medicine to stay free from sickness and so forth.

We know that the daily act of washing or taking a shower – and especially taking a bath – takes some time out of our day. The main point being made here is that if we engage in these activities frivolously or mindlessly, then we are using up our time without taking the opportunity to practise the Dharma. When I take a bath, I incorporate thoughts about the Dharma, such as, ‘By cleaning and taking care of my body, may it be sustained for the purpose of the teachings, for the purpose of benefiting others’. With that attitude, such actions can become meaningful. Otherwise, if we engage in activities like cleaning ourselves or eating simply with worldly concerns, then since most of the day is taken up with such activities, our time will have been used frivolously and we won’t have had the time to practise Dharma. Likewise, when we get sick, we are so absorbed in our aches and pains, it is hard to think about the Dharma at that time.

Most of our day is taken up with such worldly activities. So, if we seek to set a separate time for practising Dharma, there is not much time left. However, if we were to engage in all our daily activities in a virtuous frame of mind, they would become meaningful. That is why, as I regularly recommend, it is important to remember offering every meal we eat and every drink we have, and think that we are consuming food and drink as a way to sustain ourselves for the purpose of Dharma. That then becomes the means for accumulating merit and engaging in virtue. Otherwise, if we think Dharma practice is to be done only at a separate allocated time, and regard everything else outside of this as merely daily activities for our survival, we will carry them out mindlessly, in a worldly way. If that is the case, then definitely there will not be much time left for what we would consider ‘time for Dharma practice’.

The next lines of verse are:

159cd. Sleep and harm. Likewise, due to Meaningless association with the childish,

*160ab. Life passes by quickly, and
The opportunity to investigate is extremely rare.*

Then the commentary explains:

... sleep and [being harmed by] various inner and outer harms. Likewise, through meaningless association with the childish negative friends, life passes quickly without meaning and disintegrates without the time to practise Dharma.

Because it is extremely difficult to find an opportunity to investigate the meaning of suchness, which is the cause to go beyond existence, for that reason one should strive in the method to reverse cyclic existence.

We could say that up to half of our life is spent sleeping. In 24 hours, up to half the time may be taken up with sleep. Sleep takes up a lot of time that otherwise could be used to practise Dharma.

The inner harms could relate to inner diseases, or psychologically feeling weighed down or depressed. The outer harms are harms from external sources that also cause mental agony. If we are not mindful when we are in pain and agony, this time could detract from our practice of Dharma, and become a condition for us to create non-virtue rather than a virtuous state of mind. That is why these harms are considered as times that keep us away from the practice of Dharma.

Likewise, through meaningless association with the childish, i.e. non-virtuous friends, life passes quickly without meaning... This means our life doesn’t wait for a moment. It is passing away continuously, subtracting from our lifespan, while most of our time is used up with these frivolous activities. So our life passes quickly without meaning, and disintegrates without finding the time to practise Dharma.

Because it is extremely difficult to find opportunities to investigate the meaning of suchness, which is the cause to go beyond existence, one should strive in the method to reverse cyclic existence

Returning to the topic of sleep, for those who are not familiar with the mental factors sleep is one of the four ‘changeable’ mental factors. This means that it can be virtuous, non-virtuous or neutral, depending on the motivation preceding the act of sleep. If, prior to falling asleep, one has a virtuous mind, it is said that when one falls asleep, one’s sleep will actually become virtuous, due to the last moment of mind before sleep being virtuous. If one has a negative mind just prior to falling asleep, the rest of the sleep actually becomes non-virtuous. Whereas if one has neither a virtuous nor a non-virtuous mind and just falls asleep within a natural state of mind, then that act of sleep will also be neutral - what we call neither virtuous nor non-virtuous. I mentioned ‘motivation’ earlier, but I think the meaning here is more like your state of mind prior to falling asleep.

In terms of making sleep virtuous by adopting a virtuous mind, I had some personal experience with this last month. I was in bed and reciting the prayer of the Four Immeasurables; I recited it a few times, then I fell asleep. Sometime later, when I woke up, I was actually still reciting it – I woke up reciting that prayer!

As I have shared a few times previously, when I put my head on the pillow to go to sleep, I normally visualise the Buddha just above my head. Then I imagine light rays coming from the Buddha’s heart and pervading my body, imagining that I am receiving the blessings of the Buddha. Then, when I fall asleep in that state, I feel like my sleep has been worthwhile. However, that is just something I have chosen to do. I’m not saying that you all have to do the same. I’m sharing this as an example of how to bring about a virtuous mind just before falling asleep.

It is specifically explained in some instructions that one can visualise the light rays coming from the Buddha, like a net or canopy of light. I guess we could think of the image of a mosquito net draped over a bed. The body is covered with the rays of light descending from the Buddha: one sleeps within that canopy of light. It is said that one can feel very joyous and very protected under those rays of light. The instructions say that it is one of the best methods to protect one from external harms. It can also help one to ward off nightmares and uncomfortable dreams.

3.2.4. Contemplating the difficulty of attaining a birth with leisure and endowment

First, the argument or hypothetical doubt is presented:

Argument: It is acceptable because one can stop cyclic existence through meditating on emptiness when one takes rebirth in a happy realm and meditates on emptiness.

This is in relation to the earlier point that it is difficult to obtain a human rebirth in the next lifetime. Here, the argument is that, it is acceptable because one can stop cyclic existence through meditating on emptiness when one takes rebirth in a happy realm and meditates on emptiness. This is a doubt held by many people, 'Well even in this life if I don't achieve something significant, that's fine! I can relax, because in the next life, I will have the opportunity to practise the Dharma.'

There are those who often say 'I didn't get much time to practise Dharma in this life, but that's okay, because in the next life, I will obtain a human rebirth, and then I will be able to practise.' The text proceeds to remove such wishful thoughts, and encourages us to practise the Dharma now, when we have such good conditions.

160cd. *How can the method to overcome
Habituation with distraction possibly exist there?*
161ab. *Demons work there to throw one
Into the vast hells;*

Then the commentary explains the meaning of this verse, which serves as an answer to the earlier argument:

Answer: Cyclic existence is extremely difficult to stop due to having habituated oneself since beginningless samsaric lives to grasping at functionalities as truly existent, and to the distractions such as outer excitements and the like. How can there be the method to stop it, as conducive conditions are extremely rare and harmful obstructing conditions abound? Even during this limited time to practice, the dharma demons such as the 'Son of Gods' work for one to fall into the great hells. The conditions obstructing liberation from existence are many and difficult to stop.

What the commentary is explaining here is that cyclic existence is extremely difficult to stop due to having become habituated since beginningless samsaric lives to grasping at functionalities as truly existent, and to the distractions such as outer excitements and the like. We have a long habituation to grasping at truly or inherently existent functionalities, which include 'self' and other phenomena. This is due to the very deep-rooted seed of grasping at true existence, as well as our habituation to the distractions such as outer excitements, which means being distracted by, and engaging in frivolous activities. Due to this long habituation, we find it difficult to ignore these conditions.

As the commentary asks, how can there be the method to stop it, as conducive conditions are extremely rare and harmful obstructing conditions abound? We can relate to the examples or analogies given in the lam-rim teachings that illustrate how our negativities are plentiful. One analogy compares our negativities to being like an expansive, deep-rooted tree, while our virtue is weak. There's another analogy: it is difficult to make a large quantity of a bitter substance palatable and sweet. Our virtue is like a few small drops of a sweet substance like honey that we put into a huge pot containing a bitter substance – one or two drops definitely cannot make it sweet. It would require a lot of the sweet substance to sweeten it. This analogy illustrates how, while our negativities abound, our virtue is very, very weak, as we have few opportunities to accumulate virtue.

There is a two-fold understanding for us here. On one hand, because our virtues have been weak, we cannot expect a radical, immediate change, expecting that by engaging in a few practices, we will suddenly experience a great transformation. That is too grand an expectation. On the other hand, despite our attempts at virtue being meagre, if we make every small effort to continuously engage in them, then eventually we can overcome our negativities – just like many drops of a sweet substance will eventually sweeten a big pot of a bitter substance.

Because of our habituation to perceiving things mistakenly with the view that grasps at inherent or true existence, and because of our many distractions, just practising a few lines of the Dharma could not possibly immediately change us. That is to be understood here. When the commentary further mentions that even during this limited time to practice, the Dharma demons – the Dharma demons mentioned here could refer to the negative influence of others, such as negative friends, but more specifically those who may show us a wrong or mistaken path that is not based on fact and reality, but on misconstrued, fabricated advice and teachings. Due to their influence and by following their advice, we could be misled and thus move further away from achieving the real Dharma, the truth. The 'Son of Gods' is the example mentioned here, which causes one to fall into the great hells.

Of course, when the Buddha teaches, he is able to subdue many sentient beings with his teachings. Because of the Buddha's majesty, he is able to attract many disciples. However, it is said that certain demons have a miraculous power to show an aspect of looking like the Buddha, just on the outside. When such demons give teachings, they mislead people into engaging in negativities.

It is said that evil-minded beings who do not like virtue and the Dharma, will be jealous when we do good virtuous deeds, and try to influence us to engage in negativities by telling us things that are untrue, leading us away from our Dharma practice and virtue. That is the main point being related here. We need to be mindful to protect ourselves from the negative influences that lead us away from the Dharma.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

Now we can generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I'll listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

3.2.4. Contemplating the difficulty of attaining a birth with leisure and endowment (cont.)

Last week we discussed the first two lines of verse relating to this heading. Next comes this argument:

It is not difficult to find opportunity to liberate oneself from existence because when one takes rebirth in the happy realms, then one can achieve liberation through such practices such as meditating on the truth, and faith in the Three Jewels and the like.

Then these two lines are presented:

161cd. *There are many wrong paths,
And it is difficult to contradict doubt.*

The answer to the argument is:

While taking rebirth in the happy realms there are many wrong paths that have fallen into the extremes of eternalism or nihilism, which are opposing conditions to generating the right view. There are false teachers that lead one on these paths, and it is difficult to contradict doubt with regards to the correct view because it is difficult to find the inner and outer conditions to cut that doubt.

We can relate taking rebirth in the happy realms to ourselves because we have been reborn with all the conditions of a perfect human rebirth. Yet even though we have this happy or fortunate rebirth now, we still find it hard to utilise these good conditions, because there are many wrong paths that have fallen into the extremes of eternalism or nihilism, which are opposing conditions for the generation of the right view.

The first argument is that it is not difficult to find the opportunity to liberate oneself from existence, because when one takes rebirth in the happy realms, one can achieve liberation through practices such as meditating on the truth, and faith in the Three Jewels and the like. If the thought, 'Even though I may not be able to practise Dharma fully in this life, I'll achieve all the good conditions in future lives, and then I can meditate on truth and having faith in the Three Jewels and be liberated' arises, then we need to immediately recognise this as the laziness of procrastination.

Although we have obtained a happy rebirth now, there are many wrong paths of eternalism or nihilism, which are opposing conditions for the generation of the right view. Then there are false teachers that lead one onto these wrong paths. So not only are there wrong paths, but there are also those who propound the tenets of the wrong paths. Hence it is difficult to contradict doubt with regard to the correct view because it is difficult to find the inner and outer conditions to cut that doubt.

As explained in the teachings, it is hard to generate even a doubt about whether emptiness is valid.¹ However eliminating that doubt and moving towards an understanding of emptiness is difficult, because it is difficult to find the necessary inner and outer conditions.

This is followed by a further argument:

Although one may not find these conditions in this life, because one will find the virtuous teacher in the next life, and then practise.

The argument here is that although one may not find these conditions in this life, it is acceptable because one will find a virtuous teacher in the next life, and then be able to practise. This argument points out a false sense of certainty that we will definitely obtain a fortunate rebirth in the next lifetime, and be able to continue to practise the Dharma. The assumption is that, although one may not have all the conditions for practice in this life, one will obtain a good rebirth again in the next lifetime and be able to practise then.

The answer is that there is no certainty one will obtain a good rebirth in the next lifetime, as the causes are so difficult to obtain. So on a personal level this is an instruction to overcome the laziness of procrastination. We need to specifically relate this to the difficulty of obtaining a precious human rebirth with its eight freedoms and ten endowments, as presented in the next verse. It is also extensively explained in the lam-rim teachings.

The next verse reads:

162. *Finding freedom again is difficult
And the coming of a buddha is extremely rare to find.
It is difficult to abandon the river of afflictions
And, alas, weighed down by these one continually suffers.*

As the commentary explains:

Answer: If one does not strive well in this life, when one has found a virtuous teacher, then it will be difficult to find freedom again in the future, and since it is extremely rare for a buddha to come to the world, it is very hard to meet with a virtuous teacher.

Although one has met a virtuous teacher and already attained a wholesome basis with freedoms and endowments, if one does not strive well in conscientiousness, then it is hard to counter the river of afflictions. They will continue to pour down until one has attained liberation. 'Alas' contains the meaning of sadness and despondency because one continually experiences one suffering after the next, as well as experiencing extreme suffering. Although one may be free from one suffering, one falls into another suffering. Therefore, one should strive in contemplating the sufferings of cyclic existence while having attained freedom and endowments.

¹ Ed: As mentioned previously, this doubt is the positive doubt that maybe it really is the case that things do lack inherent existence.

This is an explicit explanation of the difficulty of obtaining a precious human rebirth, which is necessary to gain an understanding of the right view that realises emptiness. Of course, this applies in a broader sense as well; let alone realising emptiness, finding the conditions to practise Dharma is very difficult.

As specifically mentioned, it is even more difficult to find a teacher who presents the correct view of emptiness properly, because they are very rare. The significant point here is to strive well in this life, when one has found a virtuous teacher.

When the commentary says, it will be difficult to find freedom again in the future, it is referring to the conditions necessary for a precious human rebirth with its eight freedoms and ten endowments. Moreover it is extremely rare for a buddha to come to the world, which why it will be very hard to meet with a virtuous teacher. As explained in the lam-rim teachings, we are said to be living now in what is called a 'light eon', which is a fortunate eon where the Buddha has come and taught the Dharma. The 'light eon' is followed by a 'dark eon' when the Buddhist teachings have declined. If one were to be born in a dark eon, there would be no possibility of meeting with virtuous teachers, because the teachings of the Buddha would not be present.

So we have both the internal conditions of a precious human rebirth and the external conditions of the eon in which we are now living, where Buddha has come and taught in this world. Without these external conditions, it is very difficult to meet with a virtuous teacher who is able to present the unmistakable correct view.

When the commentary states that although one has met a virtuous teacher and already attained a wholesome basis with freedoms and endowments, it is referring to the argument which says that one will have all the necessary conditions to be able to practise in a future life. In simple terms it is saying, 'What makes you think that you'll be able to practise in a future life with all the necessary conditions, when you are not utilising the good conditions that you actually have right now?'

That is followed with if one does not strive well in conscientiousness, then it is hard to counter the river of afflictions which will continue to pour down until one has attained liberation. If we don't utilise all the perfect conditions that we have now by applying conscientiousness, then the afflictions will run rampant, and pour down like rain, meaning that we will be completely consumed by them, and have to endure suffering until we have attained liberation.

As the commentary further mentions, 'Alas' contains the meaning of sadness and despondency because one continually experiences one suffering after the next, as well as experiencing extreme suffering. Although one may be free from one suffering, one falls into another suffering. Therefore, one should strive in contemplating the sufferings of cyclic existence while having attained freedom and endowments. The conclusion is that we need to reflect upon the fact that having obtained these good conditions now, we need to take the essence of this life and make it most meaningful by contemplating the correct understanding of emptiness, and engaging in the practice of Dharma.

Shantideva is really encouraging us here. Reflecting on these points is an impetus to practise Dharma and make our precious human life with its eight freedoms and ten endowments most meaningful.

There is nothing obscure about this. We can all relate to the comment that although one may be free from one suffering, one falls into another suffering. With our contaminated aggregates, we find that we might have a headache, but once we've cured the headache, we might start having aches and pains in our back, or our knees might start to give way, and then we have stomach aches. We find that we experience these sufferings one after another, again and again, in one form or another, which will be the case until we obtain liberation.

The main point that we need to understand here is that we will have to experience these sufferings again and again until we obtain liberation. And until and unless we gain an understanding of the correct view, the realisation of emptiness, we cannot possibly obtain liberation.

As explained previously, grasping at an inherently existent self is the very root cause of samsara. So until and unless grasping at an inherent existent self is completely reversed by applying the antidote of the wisdom realising emptiness or selflessness, there's no way we will be able to reverse the condition of being in cyclic existence.

Gaining the wisdom realising emptiness also depends on having a proper understanding of interdependent origination. Therefore, as presented in Lama Tsongkhapa's Three Principal Aspects of the Path, which we covered in our Easter course, we need to strive to gain an understanding of interdependent origination. This is the crucial point.

It is important for us to incorporate whatever understanding we gain from other teachings into whatever subjects we are currently studying, as that will form a concise basis for our practice. There are so many different texts and different practices, and if we view each individual text or practice in isolation, it can be confusing. Rather, we need to try to combine whatever understanding we have from the different texts we study, and whatever practices we are doing, and then we will gain a comprehensive understanding.

3.2.5. That oneself and others are afflicted by the suffering of cyclic existence is suitable to be mourned

This refers to the ways and means of instilling feelings of love and compassion for sentient beings.

The first verse under this heading reads:

163. *Those who do not see their suffering
Despite suffering to the extreme,
They, submerged in the river of suffering,
'Oh dear', they are appropriate to be mourned.*

The commentary explains:

Sentient beings suffer to the extreme, they do not see that they are sinking in suffering by mistaking suffering for happiness, and they are submerged in a river of suffering. Having generated love for these sentient beings that sink in the mud of suffering, they are suitable to be mourned with the thoughts of, 'Oh dear, how wonderful would it be if sentient beings were free from suffering' and the like. Therefore, one needs to strive in meditating on great compassion.

When the commentary states, sentient beings suffer to the extreme, we need to relate this to ourselves as well, as the heading indicates. We need to remember that these explanations apply to ourselves as well as other sentient beings, as we are all in the same lamentable and pitiful situation.

Sentient beings, including ourselves, endure extreme suffering. By mistaking suffering for happiness they do not see that they are sinking. This again is very true. A lot of suffering is mistaken for happiness and as a result sentient beings purposely engage in suffering. As I've mentioned previously, we need to be very cautious about creating negativities. We gladly and wilfully engage in some negativities rather than being hesitant about creating them; indeed, there are times where we become upset if we don't get an opportunity to engage in some negativities.

How can we call ourselves true Dharma practitioners if we behave like this? If we willingly engage in negativities and get upset when we don't get an opportunity to create negativities then we are indeed submerged in a river of suffering.

Understanding karma means recognising that if we engage in the causes of suffering, we are bound to experience the consequence, which is suffering. If we do not wish for suffering, we need to avoid creating the causes of suffering, which are negativities. Conversely, if we want to experience happiness, we need to engage in the appropriate causes for happiness, which is engaging in virtuous actions.

The commentary continues, having generated love for these sentient beings that sink in the mud of suffering, they are suitable to be mourned with the thoughts of... When we relate these sufferings to ourselves, they become a condition to generate renunciation. When we relate them to other sentient beings, then they become a condition for us to generate compassion. We need to understand that the difference comes down to the focus. If the sufferings relate to ourselves, they become a condition for us to generate renunciation. But when focused upon other sentient beings, then contemplating these sufferings and their pitiful situation becomes an impetus for us to generate compassion for them.

Therefore one generates the thought, 'Oh dear, how wonderful it would be if sentient beings were free from suffering' and so forth. This can be further elaborated into these three aspirations: how wonderful would it be if sentient beings were free from suffering; may they be free from these sufferings; and I will personally ensure that they are free from suffering. These thoughts are a very powerful way of generating compassion.

Then the commentary concludes with, therefore, one needs to strive in meditating on great compassion.

The next verse presents an example of mistakenly taking suffering as happiness.

164. For example, some, after having washed repeatedly,

Go into fire again and again.

Thus, even though abiding in extreme suffering, they project that they are happy.

The commentary explains:

For example, some followers of outside tenets, that were deceived by misleading teachers, repeatedly wash themselves and enter the fire again and again. Although they abide with strong suffering due to the physical austerity, they project happiness onto it by holding it to be a method for attaining liberation.

The commentary explains that some followers of outside tenets, i.e. followers of non-Buddhist schools, who were deceived by misleading teachers, repeatedly wash themselves seeing it as a means to gain liberation. Just washing themselves again and again doesn't seem so severe, but then the next austerity the commentary mentions is entering a fire again and again. To this day, there are those who walk on fire, sleep on nails or thorns, and so forth, holding these severe and austere practices to be a means to gain liberation.

Bathing in the Ganges, however, is believed to have some benefit because the water is actually blessed by bodhisattvas, so it has some positive effect. But if we could gain liberation just by washing, then I guess we wouldn't be too far away from liberation, because we bath ourselves quite often!

It is quite misleading to say that these austere practices, in and of themselves, are a means to gain liberation. Actions such as enduring the pain of putting one's fingertips on fire, or enduring extreme heat and cold, or sleeping on thorns or nails, in and of themselves, cannot be a cause to achieve liberation, and so they are quite meaningless.

Nevertheless, although they abide with strong suffering due to physical austerity, they project happiness onto it by holding it to be a method for attaining liberation. In their minds, these followers think they're creating the causes for liberation, when in fact they have been misled.

As a personal instruction, it is not sufficient for us to point the finger at others and say they're meaninglessly enduring such sufferings by following strange practices, while we ourselves create more suffering for ourselves by willingly engaging in negativity. In both cases, the suffering is self-inflicted.

The understanding we need to derive here is that we need to avoid engaging in negativities as a way to stop the causes of our own suffering.

The advice in the next verse is again very pertinent advice for us:

165. Thus those continually acting
As if without old age and death
Are first killed,
And then comes the terrifying downfall into the lower realms.

As the commentary explains:

In this manner, those that abide acting like arhats without death or sickness, are first killed by the lord of death without any means to stop or abandon him, and then come the terrifying sufferings of having fallen into the three lower realms.

In reference to those that abide acting like arhats without death or sickness, real arhats are of course free from sickness, aging, and death, because they have abandoned the very root of the afflictions. When we, who are still in cyclic existence, fail to utilise our freedoms and endowments to engage in the practice of Dharma, then we are acting as if we are arhats.

We cannot afford to lie around lazily as if we are arhats with no need to free ourselves from cyclic existence, because our life is bound to end. If we fail to put time into practising the Dharma, there's no way to stop the lord of death, and then the terrifying sufferings of having fallen into the three lower realms will be upon us. Here the metaphor of being killed by the lord of death is being used as an exhortation to not lie around in a leisurely manner and waste our opportunity to engage in the practice of Dharma.

3.3. Showing the mode of apprehension of the aspect of great compassion

Basically, this is presenting an aspect of great compassion. The first verse reads:

166. Thus may I become someone from whose Clouds of merits rain of a well borne Accumulation of happiness that pacifies those Tortured by the sufferings of fire.

The commentary explains:

Having contemplated the way they who experience terrifying suffering in their continuum in the way explained earlier, are afflicted by suffering, one should meditate on great compassion in the following manner, keeping in mind the sentient beings that are tortured by the fires of suffering:

'When will I become someone that pacifies the sufferings of the lower realms with medicine, food and the like? That which are parts of my collection of happiness, built up from clouds of merits built up by generosity and so forth. How wonderful would it be if sentient beings were free from suffering? May they be free from suffering. May I bring about that freedom.'

Meditate in the following way on great compassion:

Having contemplated the suffering of sentient beings, which have just been explained, one meditates on great compassion in the following manner. What are presented in the commentary as questions, are actually aspirational prayers.

Keeping in mind that sentient beings are tortured by the fires of suffering, one asks oneself, 'When will I become someone who pacifies the sufferings of the lower realms with medicine, food and the like?' This rhetorical question is basically saying, 'May I be the one who pacifies the sufferings of the lower realms with medicine, food and the like?' That which are parts of my collection of happiness, built up from clouds of merits built up by generosity and so forth refers to the accumulation of merit from practising the six perfections of generosity, morality, patience, joyous effort, concentration and wisdom.

With the merit gained from these practices one thinks, 'How wonderful it would be if sentient beings were free from suffering.' From this arises the compassion that thinks, 'May they be free from suffering, and may I bring about that freedom.' In other words, by reflecting on the suffering of sentient beings, the mind of compassion thinking, 'May I free them from all the sufferings' will arise.

So, as the commentary says, meditate in the following way on great compassion.

This part of the text is specifically dedicating the accumulation of one's merit towards the alleviation of the suffering of sentient beings, and wishing them to be free from that suffering. Here, compassion is presented as an outcome of having generated merit.

The next verse relates this back to the need for wisdom:

167. *May I, by respectfully building up the accumulation of merits
In the way that lacks focus,
Be able to show emptiness to those Who are destitute because of having focus.*

The commentary explains:

'Dedicating as the cause for liberation from the sufferings of cyclic existence: When will I realise that all phenomena lack inherent existence, and respectfully build up the infinite accumulations of merit of generosity and so forth with the method of the objectless wisdom?'²

When will I show emptiness to the sentient beings that are destitute in cyclic existence due to the object of true-grasping, to pacify their samsaric suffering? How wonderful it would be if all sentient beings were free from the suffering of cyclic existence. May I free them from that suffering.'

It further mentions:

To fulfil the definition of great love and compassion that are contained in the Mahayana path one needs to wish to place sentient beings in the state of complete enlightenment that is endowed with all happiness, and which is free from all suffering.

Meditate in the following way on great compassion:

'Dedicating as the cause for liberation from the sufferings of cyclic existence: When will I realise that all phenomena lack inherent existence, and respectfully build up the infinite accumulations of merit of generosity and so forth with the method of the objectless wisdom? When will I show emptiness to the sentient beings that are destitute in cyclic existence due to the object of true-grasping, to pacify their samsaric suffering? How wonderful it would be if all sentient beings were free from the suffering of cyclic existence. May I free them from that suffering.'

This is a dedication that serves as the cause for liberation from the suffering of cyclic existence. As related here, one dedicates the combination of one's extensive accumulation of merit and one's understanding of emptiness, referred to here as objectless wisdom, to liberating all beings from suffering. We need to develop the aspiration by asking ourselves, 'When will I realise that all phenomena lack inherent existence, and respectfully build up the infinite accumulations of merit of generosity and so forth?' Here and so forth refers to the other perfections. So the aspiration is, 'May I actually use these merits combined with the objectless wisdom - the wisdom realising emptiness - to be able to liberate sentient beings'.

The following aspiration in the commentary has essentially the same meaning: when will I show emptiness to the sentient beings.

² Some translations use also 'the wisdom which lacks apprehension'

The next point is the main point:

To fulfil the definition of great love and compassion that are contained in the Mahayana path one needs to wish to place sentient beings in the state of complete enlightenment that is endowed with all happiness, and which is free from all suffering.

One realises that having generated strong love and compassion for sentient beings by contemplating all of the suffering they are experiencing, and instilling a strong sense of urgently wishing for them to be free from suffering and endowed with happiness is not sufficient in itself as a means of actually benefiting sentient beings. What needs to be added is what is called superior intention.

The superior intention that is indicated here is taking personal responsibility for implementing the wish to place them in the state of complete enlightenment, that is endowed with all happiness, and which is free from all suffering.

As I've also emphasised many times previously, we need to develop the strong impetus to generate love and compassion, and then engage in practices such as the tong-len meditation. This giving and taking practice is a powerful practice that incorporates the actual deeds of a bodhisattva – taking the sufferings of others on oneself, and giving them happiness.

As I mentioned earlier, these are really essential points that allow one to generate that strong mind of bodhicitta.

I place great emphasis on love and compassion and how practices like tong-len and so forth are a very strong means of generating that mind of superior intention as a way to generate bodhicitta. I have mentioned this again and again, and it is being backed up here by these teachings. This goes to show that I'm not just being a loud mouth, and that it is actually a significant practice!

As the commentary continues:

In short, one should meditate on the mode of abiding in dependence on calm abiding.

So, what is the point being made here by saying one should meditate on the mode of abiding in dependence on calm abiding?

Student: You need to have established calm abiding before you can meditate on emptiness.

This point was mentioned in the Mahamudra teachings. There are two specific systems: finding the right view through meditation, and finding meditation through the right view.³ What is being presented here is finding the right view through meditation, which specifically means developing calm abiding first, in order to achieve the realisation of emptiness.

Then the commentary explains:

Further, because the 'I' in reference to thinking of 'me' is established as merely labelled in dependence on the aggregates and does not exist inherently, it does not exist intrinsically, ...

As further explained, this 'I' does not exist intrinsically because:

... it is not established in the slightest in an independent mode. Therefore, the existent person is merely posited in name, it exists only as labelled and in a dependent mode.

So, as the commentary says:

Hence, take to heart, 'It does not exist inherently'.

What is being specifically emphasised here is that the existent person is merely posited in name. It exists only as a label that is imputed by the mind, and exists only in a dependent mode, meaning that it exists only interdependently. The conclusion that we need to keep in mind is that, for these reasons, the 'I' does not exist inherently.

Finally, the commentary says:

Meditate in the same way on all phenomena such as the aggregates and so forth.

Essentially, this is just a summary of how to meditate on emptiness.

Then the author of the commentary, Gyaltsab Rinpoche, adds these verses as a summary of the chapter:

I say this as summary:

For as long as one does not find a holy master
One will not even realise partially
The Middle Way of dependent arising that is free from extremes
That can cut the root of existence.

Whatever well-spoken advice I receive
Is due to the kindness of the lama.
May this virtue become the cause
That my mothers meet a Mahayana guru.

Without realising the suchness of the Middle Way,
free from extremes
One cannot touch the state of a superior.
Hence, by deciding that dependent arising is the meaning of emptiness
Strive accordingly in achievement.

That difficult to find even in a billion eons;
Because the pure school of Nagarjuna pronouncing the two truths
Because they will disappear before long in this realm
Those with intelligence will quickly generate joyous effort.

The meaning of these words is quite clear. They cover many of the points that were presented in the chapter itself, so as we read these verses we can relate them to those points.

Chapter 9

As usual, let us spend some time in our regular meditation practice. [Tong-len meditation]

As I mentioned before, if time permits, it will be good for us to recite the dedication chapter together over the following teaching sessions on this chapter. This evening, we can specifically dedicate our recitation to the late John Frigo, who passed away few days ago, and also for Elvira's dad, who is has not been feeling well. With the bodhicitta motivation, let us recite these verses of incredibly powerful aspirational prayers and dedicate the merits accordingly.

If one has actually generated bodhicitta, then this chapter shows how the merits of bodhisattvas are dedicated. The rest of us who are inspired to generate bodhicitta, can at the very least generate the altruistic state of mind thinking, 'May I only benefit sentient beings, not causing the slightest harm to any living being'. Think, 'May all my virtuous deeds become a means for sentient beings to experience only happiness; it is for that purpose that I dedicate all my merits'. The way to dedicate every virtue we have created is explained in this text, which gives us the perfect means to dedicate our virtues.

As we go through explanations of the verses, you'll see how incredibly meticulous and extensive the dedications are. [Recitation of chapter 10]

[To explain the context of the next chapter we need to return to the subdivisions introduced in chapter 1.¹]

2. The actual explanation of the stages of the path

2.2. The method for taking the essence

2.2.2. Explaining the individual meanings²

2.2.2.2. The way of training in the practices of generating the two minds

2.2.2.2.2. The way of training in the actions, the perfections

2.2.2.2.2.1. The way of meditating on conscientiousness, the limb preventing the degeneration of the training in the mind of enlightenment³

2.2.2.2.2.2. Explaining the way of training in morality, by relating it to introspection and mindfulness, the methods for keeping virtuous dharmas pure⁴

2.2.2.2.2.3. Explaining the way of training in the remaining four perfections⁵

2.2.2.2.2.4. Explaining with the limb of dedication the training in the generosity of giving away body possessions and roots of virtue for others

CHAPTER 10: EXPLAINING WITH THE LIMB OF DEDICATION THE TRAINING IN THE GENEROSITY OF GIVING AWAY BODY POSSESSIONS AND ROOTS OF VIRTUE FOR OTHERS

The chapter is subdivided into two:

I. Explaining the words of the chapter

II. Explaining the name of the chapter

The commentary clarifies the difference between an aspirational prayer and a dedication, and this is often quoted in other texts.

Whilst the first chapter also presented the practice of generosity, the tenth chapter, as its title indicates, specifically presents the practice of generosity in the form of dedication. Within the six perfections, the perfection of generosity is presented here with the limb of dedication, which is done by dedicating one's body, possessions and root of virtue for the sake of all other mother sentient beings.

I. EXPLAINING THE WORDS OF THE CHAPTER

This first heading is subdivided into:

1. In brief: dedicating that all sentient beings may enter the bodhisattva trainings

2. Elaborate dedication

3. Prostrating by remembering kindness

1. IN BRIEF: DEDICATING THAT ALL SENTIENT BEINGS MAY ENTER THE BODHISATTVA TRAININGS

The brief dedication for all sentient beings to enter the bodhisattva trainings is presented with the first verse.

The verse reads:

1. *By any virtues of my writing the
Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Actions
May all migrators
Enter the bodhisattva's actions.*

Gyaltsab's commentary explains:

The author of the treatise is saying: By any virtue derived from composing this detailed exposition on how to enter the action of bodhisattvas by completely practising the paths of the three beings, the path for one person to attain enlightenment, which is the purpose of all the teachings, and by the virtue derived from explaining, listening to and contemplating the meaning, may all migratory beings practice the bodhisattva trainings accordingly.

Here the commentary highlights that the purpose or essence of all the Buddha's teachings is presented as an entire path for an individual to attain enlightenment through practising the paths of the three scopes. Furthermore, it explains how to dedicate the virtue one derives from explaining, listening and contemplating the meaning of what is presented with the aspiration, may all the migratory beings practice the bodhisattva trainings accordingly. This is quite clearly explained as the essential purpose of engaging in virtuous deeds.

As you can see from the dedication, dedicating for the benefit of all other sentient beings is not sullied with even an atom of self-cherishing mind. This is the extent of the altruistic mind that one should develop for an ultimate dedication.

The commentary then quotes from the Sutra Requested by the Ocean of Wisdom.

² Introduced in the teaching of 2 July 2013

³ Covered in chapter 4, introduced on 25 February 2014

⁴ Covered in chapter 4, introduced on 20 May 2014

⁵ Covered in chapters 6 to 9, introduced on 23 September 2014

From the Sutra Requested by the Ocean of Wisdom,

Just like a drop of water fallen into the great ocean
Does not exhaust for as long as the ocean does not dry up,
The virtue that is thoroughly dedicated towards enlightenment
Does not exhaust until enlightenment is attained.

The quote from this sutra is presented in many other teachings as it clearly states that even the smallest virtue you accumulate can be dedicated towards enlightenment. The benefits of dedication are presented in the verse with the analogy of a drop of water fallen into the great ocean. It does not exhaust for as long as the ocean does not dry up. This illustration highlights that even when just one small drop of water merges into the ocean, we cannot possibly say that this particular drop is exhausted until the whole ocean has dried up. Similarly, even the smallest virtuous deed that you accumulate, when dedicated towards the ultimate state of enlightenment, will never be exhausted or wasted.

The commentary further explains:

Upon contemplating the benefits mentioned above, such as that virtue that would otherwise be exhausted in the interim if undedicated, does not become completely exhausted and rather is increased, and that even small virtue brings forth a great result.

This passage shows the importance of dedicating even the smallest virtue that you may have accumulated towards the end of achieving enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings. If you were to dedicate your merits only for a certain length of time e.g. 100 years, then when that period is up the accumulated merit would be exhausted. But by dedicating the merit to the highest enlightenment it will never be exhausted. By contemplating its incredible benefits, you'll be motivated to engage in the practice of dedication.

The commentary then quotes from another sutra:

From the Sutra of the Wisdom Gone Beyond, Dedicate all roots of virtue only for omniscient
transcendental wisdom,
And not for the Hearer and Self-Liberator grounds.

This clearly states that whatever virtues you accumulate need to be dedicated only towards the ultimate goal of omniscient transcendental wisdom. While it is a great achievement on a personal level to attain the hearers' or self-liberators' ground (i.e. liberation from cyclic existence just for oneself), dedicating your merits to this end will only assist you achieve that goal; it will not become a source of merit that causes you to achieve omniscience and the highest state of enlightenment. Hence dedication to a lesser goal actually obstructs the virtues from becoming merits that serve as a cause to achieve the ultimate goal of enlightenment. That is why not dedicating to a lesser goal is mentioned here.

To take this instruction on a personal level, whenever we accumulate virtues, we must be mindful not to dedicate them towards our own personal goal of liberation, but rather dedicate all merits towards achieving the ultimate state of enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings. These are profound instructions to keep in mind.

The commentary then states:

These virtues need to be dedicated by being held by the wisdom realising the lack of true existence of the three circles.

This explains the need to ensure that the dedication you make is also held by the wisdom realising emptiness. Whatever merits you accumulate need to be complemented with both accumulations i.e. method, which is the bodhicitta motivation, and wisdom, which is the correct understanding of emptiness.

The commentary then presents the distinction between aspirational prayer and dedication:

Although there is no big difference between dedication and aspirational prayers, a prayer is characterised by an aspiration to obtain a result for that which is aspired for.

While:

A dedication is characterised by an aspiration that transforms a causal virtue into a cause for the desired result.

Apparently this clarification is not presented in many other texts, which is why this passage is often quoted when explaining the difference between dedication and an aspirational prayer. The main point is that aspirational prayers do not necessarily need to be accompanied by actual deeds, i.e. actual virtues one has created. Whereas for a dedication, one needs to have actually engaged in virtue and accumulated merit for it become a cause to obtain a particular goal. Another way to understand the distinction is that whilst all aspirational prayers are not necessarily a dedication, all dedications are by nature aspirational prayers as well.

2. ELABORATE DEDICATION

This is subdivided into three:

- 2.1. Dedication for the purpose of others
- 2.2. Dedication for the purpose of self
- 2.3. Dedication for the increase of the Dharma, the source of happiness

We can feel moved by the very presentation of this outline, as it presents dedication for the purpose of others, dedication for the purpose of oneself and dedication for the increase of the Dharma, which is the source of all happiness. When presented in this way we can see that the outline of the material itself is very inspirational and we can derive a lot of meaning just from going over the outline itself. Indeed Gyaltshab Je, the author of the commentary, was a great master in his own right and we can see his eloquence in his presentation.

2.1 Dedication for the purpose of others

This is subdivided into two parts:

- 2.1.1 Dedicating of the purposes of the world
- 2.1.2 Dedicating for purposes having gone beyond the world

2.1.1 Dedicating of the purposes of the world

This section is further subdivided into four parts:

- 2.1.1.1 Pacification of sufferings such as sickness
- 2.1.1.1 Pacification of sufferings such as sickness
- 2.1.1.3 Dedicating for happy migrations
- 2.1.1.4 Dedicating in a summarised way for the purpose of all sentient beings

2.1.1.1 PACIFICATION OF SUFFERING SUCH AS SICKNESS

This is subdivided into two parts:

2.1.1.1.1 Dedicating for temporary happiness

2.1.1.1.2 Dedicating for ultimate happiness

2.1.1.1.1 Dedicating for temporary happiness

The first to be explained is dedicating for temporary happiness.

The verse reads:

2. *May those found in all directions
Afflicted by suffering in body and mind
Attain an ocean of bliss and happiness
Through my merits.*

The commentary explains:

May those found in all directions, who are held by the sufferings of physical and mental sickness, be liberated from their sickness and be filled with an ocean of physical bliss and mental joy by whatever merits I have for happiness.

As you can see, the dedications are presented with an altruistic mind. May those found in all directions, implies one is extending one's scope and dedicating one's merits without any discrimination to all beings in every direction. Not focusing on certain beings, certain locations or certain directions means not leaving out others and shows how encompassing dedications focus on all beings in every direction who might be suffering physical and mental sicknesses. For them to be liberated from their sickness and be filled with an ocean of physical bliss and mental joy by whatever merits I have for happiness, means whatever merits I have accumulated for my own happiness, I dedicate for others' physical and mental happiness.

2.1.1.1.2 Dedicating for ultimate happiness

The verse reads:

3. *For as long as they are in cyclic existence
May they never fall from happiness.
May migrators attain uninterruptedly
The highest happiness.*

The commentary explains:

May these migrators [referring to all migrators in every direction] never degenerate from happiness until the end of cyclic existence, and in the end, may they attain the unceasing cause for the highest happiness. For the meaning of the first line of the verse, some commentaries explain it as 'until Buddhahood is obtained', however it comes to the same meaning.

This means that by the merits of the conduct of the bodhisattvas, may the migrators attain unceasing causes for the highest happiness, or the state of enlightenment.

2.1.1.2. PACIFYING THE SUFFERINGS OF THE LOWER REALMS

This is subdivided into three:

2.1.1.2.1 Pacifying the sufferings of the hells

2.1.1.2.2 Dedicating for animals

2.1.1.2.3 Dedicating for hungry ghosts

2.1.1.2.1. Pacifying the sufferings of the hells

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.1.2.1.1 Dedication for the quick pacification of sufferings

2.1.1.2.1.2 Dedication for pacification through the power of others

2.1.1.2.1.1. Dedication for the quick pacification of sufferings

This is subdivided into three:

2.1.1.2.1.1.1 Pacifying suffering in general

2.1.1.2.1.1.2 Pacifying the sufferings of the cold hells

2.1.1.2.1.1.3 Pacifying the sufferings of the hot hells

2.1.1.2.1.1.1 Pacifying suffering in general

Pacifying suffering in general is presented with the next verse. The verses in this chapter are quite easy to understand, but as with any explanation, if you read through them and try to derive their meaning, they have much more meaning and power.

The verse reads:

4. *May all embodied beings existing
In all the hell realms
Found in the transitory worlds
Be happy and attain bliss through happiness.*

The commentary explains:

May every suffering of every embodied being in all the hot and cold hell realms found in all transitory realms extending to the edge of space be pacified, and may they attain mental joy through the bliss of the Realm of Great Bliss.

With respect to may every suffering of every embodied being in all the hot and cold hell realms, recall the classifications of the hells i.e. the eight hot realms and the specific cold hell realms as well. These are mentioned in more detail as all the sufferings experienced in all of these various hell realms extend to the end of space. The dedication is, 'Wherever these sufferings may occur, may all of them be pacified and may the beings attain mental joy through the bliss of the Realm of Great Bliss'. Again, we can see that these are very inspirational prayers, and aspirational dedications.

2.1.1.2.1.1.2. Pacifying the sufferings of the cold hells

The first line of the next verse reads:

- 5a. May those burdened by cold attain warmth.

The commentary highlights:

May those burdened by the cold of the eight cold hells of blisters and so forth attain the warmth that will generate bliss for them.

The mention of, those burdened by the cold of the eight cold hells, again refers to the eight cold hells. Then, of blisters and so forth attain the warmth that will generate bliss for them, indicates that as they are suffering from the cold may they obtain warmth to sooth those particular sufferings.

This is again subdivided into four:

2.1.1.2.1.1.3.1 Pacifying suffering with water from the clouds of the two accumulations of bodhisattvas

2.1.1.2.1.1.3.2 Pacifying the sufferings of the neighbouring hells

2.1.1.2.1.1.3.3 Pacifying the sufferings of the actual hells

2.1.1.2.1.1.3.4 Pacifying other sufferings of the neighbouring hells

2.1.1.2.1.1.3.1. Pacifying suffering with water from the clouds of the two accumulations of bodhisattvas

The remaining three lines of the verse read:

- 5bcd. *May infinite water from
The great clouds of bodhisattvas
Refresh the beings oppressed by heat.*

The commentary explains:

May infinite water from the great clouds of compassion, building up the two accumulations of a bodhisattva, refresh those oppressed by heat.

The commentary explains, may infinite water from the great clouds of compassion, building up the two accumulations, i.e. the accumulation of merit and accumulation of wisdom, of a bodhisattva, refresh those oppressed by heat. Using this analogy of great clouds full of water that pour down as rain, you can visualise the two accumulations of the great bodhisattvas in the form of clouds laden with rain when you read the verses. This is symbolic of nectar, and so when the nectar pours down from the clouds of accumulation it enters into the beings who are experiencing extreme suffering of the hot realms etc. and completely pacifies them and eliminates their sufferings.

2.1.1.2.1.1.3.2 Pacifying the sufferings of the neighbouring hells

This next dedication of pacifying the sufferings of the neighbouring hells introduces the neighbouring hells which are situated around the hot hells.

The two verses read:

6. *May also the forests of blade leaves
Become beautiful sandalwood forests.
May the trees or the Shalmari forests
Become wish-fulfilling trees.*
7. *May they be beautified by the melodious sounds of White swans and yellow geese and other water fowl.
Through lakes with greatly scented lotus flowers
May the places of hell become enjoyable.*

The commentary explains:

May the forests with blade-like leaves, which exist next to the hot hells, become for the sentient beings there beautiful pleasure gardens like the flourishing groves of Indra.

May these trees be beautified by the melodious sounds of white swans, yellow geese and other water fowl. May the places of hell become enjoyable through lakes with greatly scented lotus flowers.

The commentary states that in the hot hells there are forests with blade-like leaves with spiky thorns on both sides of the leaf. They might be a sort of cactus that has spikes on both sides. When beings who dwell in these hells move about they are cut by these leaves. So the dedication is, May the forest of blade-like leaves actually transform and become beautiful pleasure gardens like the flourishing groves of Indra. This transformation into beautiful pleasure groves can occur due to the merits the bodhisattvas have accumulated.

The commentary further explains:

May the iron trees of the Shalmari forest, with the thirty-six downward pointing thorns be transformed into wish-fulfilling trees becoming the source for everything desired.

An abode called the Shalmari forest is said to have downward-pointing thorns which are like swords. When beings are below a tree, they hear sounds that beckon them to climb upwards, but when they go up they are severely cut by sword-like thorns that point downwards. Then once they reach the top they are beckoned down, but when they go down the sword-like thorns point upwards, and they are cut again. There are detailed descriptions on this in the lam-rim teachings.

The dedication here is, 'May these razor-blade trees which cause so much agony and suffering in this abode, turn into wish-fulfilling trees'. A wish-fulfilling tree allows whatever one desires to magically appear, so this is a dedication for these trees that cause so much suffering to transform into wish fulfilling trees that only bring joy.

Furthermore, once these trees have been transformed into beautiful wish-fulfilling trees, the verse says May they be beautified by the melodious sounds of white swans, yellow geese and other water fowl. In conclusion, May the places of hell become enjoyable through lakes with greatly scented lotus flowers.

These descriptions create a very good visualisation and a sense of joy, and we can use them as a form of meditation. When your mind is filled with suffering and you are feeling weighed down and uncomfortable, then when you envision places of bliss and happiness for others it helps you too. Furthermore, doing these dedications can also become a cause to diminish the negativities to be reborn in these extreme levels of sufferings that we have created for ourselves. One can incorporate all these visualisations into one's dedication.

2.1.1.2.1.1.3.3. Pacifying the sufferings of the actual hells

The next two verses read:

8. *May the heaps of burning coals become heaps of jewels.
May the burning ground become like a crystal ground.
May the grinding mountains become the crystal palace
Of offerings, and be filled with Ones Gone To Bliss.*
9. *May the rain of leaves, embers and weapons
Become forthwith a rain of flowers.
May those cutting each other with knives,
Forthwith throw flowers for fun.*

The commentary explains:

May also the heaps of burning coals in the hot hells become heaps of jewels. May also the burning iron ground become like a pleasant crystal ground. May the ram-like grinding mountains, between which one becomes crushed, transform into the crystal bathing house filled with Ones Gone To Bliss.

May the rain of fire leaves, embers and weapons transform forthwith into a rain of flowers. May those in the reviving hells, who slice each other with knives, throw instead flowers at each other for fun.

The first verse says, may the heaps of burning coals become heaps of jewels. The hot hells explained here have burning grounds, like red-hot sheets of metal. So the dedication here is, May this burning iron ground transform into pleasant crystal ground.

Then there are the grinding mountains, which are ram-like because they are like the heads of two rams colliding when they fight. These mountains are called grinding or crushing mountains because beings caught between them are completely crushed. We dedicate that these mountains transform into a crystal bathing house filled with Ones Gone to Bliss, a pleasant blissful abode where only buddhas are present.

In the explanation of the second verse, may the rain of the fire leaves, embers and weapons is an aspiration for these hot hells to transform forth with into rain of flowers.

Next is a dedication to pacify the reviving hells. Those reborn in this hell are in constant combat with each other using various weapons like swords etc. They fight and pierce each other with their weapons, falling to the ground with cuts and lacerations, but then they all revive again and start to fight all over again. And so it goes on and on. The dedication here is, 'For those who are reborn in this hell, may their weapons transform into flowers, and instead of using them against each other, may they instead engage in the playful gesture of throwing flowers at each other'. This is the aim of the dedication.

There are similar battles happening here on earth, where we see people constantly fighting each other and trying to destroy each other with various weapons. It is good to also reflect on that reality.

2.1.1.2.1.1.3.4. Pacifying other sufferings of the neighbouring hells

The verse reads:

10. *May those sinking in Vaitarani, equalling a fire pit,
Their bones, the flesh boiled off, in the colour of the Kunda flower,
Through the power of my virtue attain the body of a god,
Enjoying themselves with goddesses.*

The commentary states:

May also those sinking in the wrathful boiling waters of Vaitarani, the bank-less river of ash and boiling water, whose bones, with the flesh boiled off, are in the colour of the Kunda flower, attain the perfect body of a god through the power of my virtue, enjoying themselves with goddesses in a bathing pool.

May those who are sinking in the wrathful boiling waters of Vaitarani describes beings in hell realms being boiled in a cauldron of molten liquid iron, which is extremely hot. It brings to mind an image of something similar to lava from a volcano, which is basically molten rock. If beings are boiled a cauldron of liquid iron, their flesh is burnt away and their bones are completely exposed. Even the bones disintegrate into ashes. The dedication for those experiencing such extreme sufferings in these hell realms is, May they attain the perfect body of a god through the power of my virtue, enjoying themselves with goddesses in a bathing pool. Rather than experiencing extreme sufferings in the boiling cauldron, may the molten iron transform into pleasant water giving them the sense pleasures of the gods and goddesses.

2.1.1.2.1.2. Dedication for pacification through the power of others

The four subdivisions are:

- 2.1.1.2.1.2.1. Vajrapani pacifying suffering through power
2.1.1.2.1.2.2. Chenrezig pacifying suffering through compassion
2.1.1.2.1.2.3. Manjushri pacifying sufferings with emanations
2.1.1.2.1.2.4. The other close disciples pacifying suffering with ability

As indicated in the following outlines, Vajrapani pacifies suffering through power; Chenrezig pacifies suffering through compassion; and Manjushri pacifies suffering with emanations. The 'other close disciples' pacify suffering with ability. These are very meticulously presented.

If we take the concepts presented in the text and the commentary on a personal level, we can see that making a connection with deities such as Vajrapani, Chenrezig and Manjushri can have a very long-lasting positive effect for us. Even if we have to experience the results of our previous karmas with extreme suffering, then due to the power of our connection and prayers now, our sufferings will be quickly pacified. We should recognise the great fortune we have in making a connection with these deities now.

As will be covered later in the text, hell beings, who have the particular karma to see Manjushri, see him and call out to other hell beings to come quickly and see Manjushri. These are indications that even if reborn in the hell realms, positive karmic connections are still there, which occur due to the power of one's previous imprints of positive karma. Such miraculous things can happen. Take this into account when doing prayers for the deceased. Making strong prayers to Avalokiteshvara, and making requests for the being to be liberated from the unfortunate realms will have a definite positive effect. It will also have a positive effect for you, as well as the deceased, when you do this visualisation with strong faith and devotion. When we do these aspirational prayers, it will definitely have a positive effect for the deceased, so it is good to keep that in mind.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

9 May 2017

As usual, let us devote some time to our regular tong-len meditation practice. [tong-ten meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings based on the bodhicitta intention.

We'll begin by reciting the tenth chapter together. As mentioned previously, when we recite these verses it is good to incorporate one's own virtues in the dedication: 'whatever virtues I've created in the past, whatever virtues that I'm creating now in the present and whatever virtues I will create in the future, I dedicate towards the ends of the aspirations just as they are presented in this chapter'.

2.1.1.2.1.2. Dedication for the pacification through the power of others

There are four subdivisions:

2.1.1.2.1.2.1. Dedicating for the pacification of suffering through the power of Vajrapani

2.1.1.2.1.2.2. Dedicating for the pacification of suffering through the compassion of Chenrezig

2.1.1.2.1.2.3. Dedicating for the pacification of suffering through emanations of Manjushri

2.1.1.2.1.2.4. Dedicating for the pacification of suffering through the ability of the other close disciples

2.1.1.2.1.2.1. Dedicating for the pacification of suffering through the power of Vajrapani

Vajrapani is an embodiment of the power of all enlightened beings, so he is regarded as an incredibly powerful deity. Practices relying on Vajrapani are said to be very effective for eliminating various types of diseases and obstacles.

It might be appropriate to relate a true story here, which I felt was an obvious and clear sign of the power of Vajrapani. In 1984 I went up to Chenrezig for a teaching session. I was informed that a young Tibetan man who was married to an Australian was attending the teaching. Later I found out that I knew the man, whose name is Thubten Gendun. His wife Felicity was stricken with a disease on her leg for which there was no known cure.

In 1985, Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey-la was visiting Australia giving teachings and initiations. When he bestowed the Vajrapani initiation Thubten Gendun and Felicity were both present, and after receiving that initiation Felicity's leg (previously believed to be incurable) was completely cured. She is able to walk and no longer needs a wheelchair. Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey-la later said to her, 'Vajrapani turned out to be the most powerful remedy to cure your disease'.

These kinds of practices in relation to powerful deities definitely have a positive effect for some diseases that otherwise seem to be incurable, or for which a treatment has not been found. Of course, one would also need to have the karma for that practice to be effective, but nevertheless it does definitely seem to have a positive effect.

There was once an American nun at Tara House called Konchog Drolma – Bonnie was her American name. Later she lived in Dharamsala for many years. At one time she apparently had a stomach ailment which could not be cured by any kind of medication. Then she visited Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey. Again through the practices given to her by Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey, she was completely cured. Apparently this occurred on two different occasions with two different complications! Her faith in Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey-la was unwavering and very strong. She said, 'I don't think there is anyone as powerful as Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey'. Through the advice of Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey, those diseases and obstacles were removed.

Vajrapani, Chenrezig and Manjushri are also referred to as the three supreme lineage protectors. Vajrapani is from the lineage of the vajra family, Chenrezig from the lotus family, and Manjushri is of the Tathagata family. Although I'm not 100% certain, it may be that they are called the supreme protectors of the three lineages because each one of them represents a particular lineage.

Here the dedication is for the alleviation of the sufferings of sentient beings through the power of Vajrapani. On a personal level, faith and a strong connection with Vajrapani and the other deities can definitely have a very powerful effect on removing personal obstacles and so forth.

Both the relevant verse and the explanation in the commentary are quite clear.

11. Thinking, "Why be afraid here of the lord of death's men, crows and vultures?"

The power creating bliss and happiness dispelling darkness completely, Whose power is this wholesomeness?"

They look up, and see Vajrapani blazing in the centre of the sky. May they accompany him as their joy purifies their negativities.

The commentary reads:

May sentient beings of the hell realms suddenly be freed from their sufferings, making them wonder, 'Why am I now free from the terrifying men, crows and vultures of the lord of death who harm me in this abode of hell. Whose is this wholesome power that creates physical bliss and mental happiness dispelling all darkness completely?' and when they look up into the sky see Vajrapani blazing with splendour in the centre of the sky. May they take refuge in this protector and the power of their extreme joy free them from their previously accumulated negativities and may they then accompany him.

Hell realms are not unique to Buddhism. Other religious traditions such as Christianity believe in hell realms as well. I've heard that some Greek Orthodox churches even have icons representing the hells. Also the Hindu tradition believes in the hell realms.

When beings in the hell realms suddenly find themselves free from suffering, they would wonder, 'Why am I free of these terrifying men, crows and vultures of the lord of death?' We can see these ferocious beings such as the terrifying guardians and vultures with iron beaks that are depicted in the drawings of the hell realms. Due to the karma of the beings in the hell realms they are confronted by these terrifying denizens of the hells, such as vultures with iron beaks and terrifying guards and so forth. When that cause of so much pain and suffering suddenly disappears, they again wonder, 'Whose is this wholesome power that creates physical bliss and mental happiness? How has this come about?'. And when they look up into the sky they see Vajrapani blazing with splendour.

In one of the various manifestations of Vajrapani, known as the 'holder of the secret', he is lifting up a vajra with his hand facing outwards, and has a wrathful aspect. This manifestation of Vajrapani seems to be the one referred to here as blazing with splendour.

The aspiration here is for the beings in the hell realms to take refuge in the protector, Vajrapani, and through the power of their extreme joy free themselves from their previously accumulated negativities, and then accompany Vajrapani in great splendour and bliss and happiness. This is the extent of the aspirations in this verse.

2.1.1.2.1.2.2. Dedicating for the pacification of suffering through the compassion of Chenrezig

Chenrezig is an incredibly significant deity, who is the embodiment of the compassion of all enlightened beings. Relying on Chenrezig is said to be incredibly effective in subduing an otherwise unruly and unsubdued mind.

When you make supplications to Chenrezig while reciting the six-syllable mantra OM MANI PADME HUM and visualising your mind as being inseparable from the mind of Chenrezig, you will find this to be very effective method to settle down your agitated mind.

The aspirations in the verse and the explanation in the commentary are quite clear, so we don't need to spend too much time explaining them.

The verse reads:

12. *Having seen the fires of hell extinguished
By a splattering rain of flowers mixed with scented water,
The hell beings wonder where this sudden satisfaction of happiness
Came from, and see the One Holding a Lotus in His Hand.*

The commentary explains:

Further, having seen the fires of hell extinguished by a splattering rain of flowers mixed with scented water, the hell beings wonder what the cause was for this sudden satisfaction of happiness. When they look around may they then see Chenrezig, who holds a lotus flower in his hands.

The aspiration here is to alleviate the sufferings of the hell beings. Having seen the fires of hell extinguished by a splattering rain of flowers mixed with scented water indicates a blessing from Avalokiteshvara (Chenrezig). Due to this blessing of Avalokiteshvara all the causes of suffering in the hell realms are transformed when a splattering flowers mixed with scented water rains down on them. The hell beings then wonder what is the cause for this sudden satisfaction of happiness? When they look around for the source, may they see Chenrezig, who holds a lotus flower in his hands.

2.1.1.2.1.2.3. Dedicating for the pacification of suffering through emanations of Manjushri

Manjushri is regarded as the essence of the wisdom of all enlightened beings. So here we make supplications to and rely on Manjushri as the enlightened being who is the source of all wisdom.

There are two verses under this heading.

The first reads:

13. *Friends, come hither, far away from the dangerous ones. May all go
To him, by whose power they shall be free from all sufferings and enraptured in the power of joy,
Who generates bodhicitta and love, to rescue
all migrators.
Who will come to the youthful one with the radiant top knot eliminating all fears?*

The commentary explains:

Some beckon their friends, 'Come here, come here, far away from the dangerous ones of hell. May all go to him, by whose power they shall be free from all sufferings of the body, and all mental fears, and thus be enraptured in the power of joy. He, who is the light and loving mother rescuing all migrators, the youthful one with the radiating crown protrusion who frees our minds from fear.'

The implication here is that some hell beings, having been suddenly affected by a powerful blissful experience, call over to the other hell beings saying 'Friends, come here, come here quickly, there is no danger here! It is a place free from danger and the sufferings of hell'. Through the power of Manjushri may they be free from all sufferings of the body, and all mental fears, and thus be enraptured in the power of joy.

Manjushri is described as he, who is the light and loving mother rescuing all migrators, the youthful one with the radiating crown protrusion who frees our minds from fear. The crown protrusion refers to the five layers of the top knot on Manjushri's head, which is one of the marks of an enlightened being.

The next verse under the same heading reads:

14. *A hundred gods make offerings to his lotus feet
with their crowns,
Eyes moistened with compassion, diverse flower bouquets raining down on his crown,
Hundred-thousands of goddesses in towering buildings singing praises, behold him!
Having seen Manjushri like this may their hellish minds emerge.*

The commentary then explains:

Friends, behold the one to whom a hundred gods make offerings to his lotus feet with their crowns, who has eyes moist with compassion, on whose crown diverse flower bouquets are raining down and who is praised by hundred-thousands of goddesses from towering buildings with verses and music. May the sentient beings of the hell realms be placed in the laughter of joy upon seeing the Melodious One who bestows breath.

Again, the verse and the explanation are quite clear so there's no need for further explanation.

2.1.1.2.1.2.4. Dedicating for the pacification of suffering through the ability of the other close disciples

'Other close disciples' actually refer to the eight close disciples of the Buddha who are in the aspect of bodhisattvas.

The verse under heading this reads:

15. *Thus, by the roots of my merits,
May the hell sentient beings be delighted
By seeing fresh, fragrant and blissful rain falling from the unobscured
Clouds of the bodhisattvas Samantabhadra and so forth.*

As the commentary explains

Thus, by the roots of my merits, may from the unobstructed clouds of the bodhisattvas Samantabhadra, Maitreya, Sainyingpo, Namkhai, Nyingpo and so forth, these bodhisattvas with powerful prayers, a blissful rain, fresh and fragrant, fall. May the hell beings, upon seeing this rain, be delighted.

The Sanskrit names are: Kshitigarbha; Akashagarbha, and Sarvanivaranavishkambhin respectively. These are three of the eight close disciples of the Buddha, who are said to have manifested as bodhisattvas at the time of the Buddha. The other five are the earlier three, Manjushri, Vajrapani and Avalokiteshvara, along with the bodhisattvas Samantabhadra, and Maitreya.

2.1.1.2.2. Dedicating for the sufferings of animals to be pacified

The aspirations presented in the following passages are very important to bear in mind as we contemplate the sufferings in the different realms. We can see how the text includes dedications to beings in all six realms from the hot hell realms through the cold hell realms and the neighbouring hell realms. Then there are the sufferings of animals, the sufferings of hungry ghosts and the sufferings of humans.

The two lines of verse for this heading are:

- 16ab. May animals be free from the Fear of eating each other.

Then the commentary explains:

May, in dependence on each and every root of merit of myself and others, the animals be free from the fear of eating one another.

Although mentioned very briefly here, the sufferings of animals are very obvious and take many forms. In the wild, there is the constant suffering of bigger animals preying on smaller animals. Even those that prey on animals are themselves preyed upon by other animals. That form of suffering is continuous. Humans also inflict a lot of suffering on animals used as beasts of burden, and for heavy work and so forth. When we look around, animals are in a pitiful state due to their extreme suffering. So when we engage in any virtue, it is very meaningful to make strong dedications for the suffering of animals to be completely eliminated.

Contemplating the various types of suffering experienced by animals will naturally lead to a deeper sense of compassion, wishing that they be free from these sufferings. Then we will very naturally and spontaneously dedicate our virtue towards that end.

Here, the text is very meticulously explaining the way to generate compassion and to do something meaningful with it by accumulating virtue and dedicating it. There are so many ways of meditating in this way, which can be very effective for naturally subduing and calming our unruly mind.

If we don't include these practices into our meditation, then of course there is no way that they will move our mind, and we won't see any benefit. We will however benefit if we actually work at putting them into practice. As said before, we can relate to the sufferings of animals as we are surrounded by them. There's nothing obscure about this as we share the same abode, and the same planet: we are so closely associated with animals that we cannot avoid seeing their suffering. We also have the ability to free them from some suffering, especially our immediate pets. If we care for our dogs and cats we are helping them to have a better life, thus making their life a little bit more meaningful.

In fact it is right that we care for animals, as our survival very much depends on them. At an immediate and obvious level our clothing, food and so many other products come from animals. Even within our body, our immune system is very much dependent on bacteria if it is to function well. On that level the animals within our bodies are keeping us alive. So we can see how dependent we are on animals.

2.1.1.2.3. Dedicating for hungry ghosts

The second two lines of the earlier verse, and the next verse read:

- 16cd. *May all hungry ghosts be as happy
As the people in Draminyen.*
17. *May the hungry ghosts be satisfied
By a stream of milk flowing down
From the hand of the powerful transcendent
Chenrezig
And be refreshed forever by the bath.*

The commentary explains:

May the hungry ghosts be as happy as the people in Draminyen, who receive food, clothing and possessions merely by wishing for them.

May a stream of nectar milk flowing down from the hand of the powerful transcendent Chenrezig satisfy the hunger and thirst of the hungry ghosts, and may they be refreshed forever by bathing in it.

The commentary then explains quite clearly may the hungry ghosts be as happy as the people in Draminyen (the continent called Uttarakuru in Sanskrit) who receive food, clothing and possessions merely by wishing for them. The aspiration is for the hungry ghosts to achieve whatever they desire and be relieved from their sufferings of hunger and thirst.

Furthermore, may a stream of nectar milk flowing down from the hand of the powerful transcendent Chenrezig satisfy the hunger and thirst of the hungry ghosts. As a visualisation practice it is good to visualise the eleven-faced manifestation Avalokiteshvara with one of his hands holding a vase filled with nectar, which flows down to the hungry ghosts below relieving them of their thirst.

May they be refreshed forever by bathing in it. Here bathing relates to the bathing house that is visualised when we make the offering of a bath, which was extensively explained in Chapter Three. During an Easter course we did a visualisation of a bathing house where after the enlightened beings have bathed, the water is then used to satisfy beings such as the hungry ghosts. These are visualisations that one can do.

2.1.1.3. DEDICATING FOR HAPPY MIGRATIONS

Having made dedications for the sufferings of the three lower realms to be alleviated, the text now turns to making dedications for happy migrations, which includes the desire realms.

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.1.3.1. Dedicating to be free from suffering

2.1.1.3.2. Dedicating to achieve their purpose

2.1.1.3.1. Dedication to be free from suffering

This has four subdivisions which meticulously relate the aspirations to the particular types of sufferings experienced in higher rebirths.

2.1.1.3.1.1. Dedicating to be without incomplete organs and the pain of childbirth

2.1.1.3.1.2. Dedicating to be without the suffering of poverty and mental suffering

2.1.1.3.1.3. Dedicating to be without the sufferings of sickness and encountering hate

2.1.1.3.1.4. Dedicating for the sufferings of travellers and non-human harms to be pacified

2.1.1.3.1.1. Dedicating to be without incomplete organs and the pain of childbirth

The verse reads:

18. *May the blind see with their eyes,
And the deaf always hear sounds.
Like the magical goddesses.
May pregnant women safely give birth.*

The commentary explains:

May the blind behold forms with their eyes, and may the deaf always hear sounds. Like the magical goddess, may pregnant women safely give birth.

Here incomplete organs refers to congenital defects of organs that are associated with a precious human rebirth, rather than becoming blind or deaf due to secondary circumstances. So blind refers to being blind from the time of birth and deaf from birth. When people lack these organs, they endure suffering that those with complete organs do not experience. The aspirations here are for the blind to be able to see and the deaf to be able to hear. Of course, this aspiration can also include those whose organs are defective due to later causes.

The term literally translated here as magical goddess, refers to Mayadevi who was mother of Prince Siddhartha. When she gave birth to him, it was a miraculous birth which didn't involve any labour pains. Therefore the aspiration here is, 'May all women giving birth also be free from the pain of childbirth'. Those of you who are mothers will know this extreme form of suffering, but the rest of us can only try to imagine what the pain of childbirth may be like.

2.1.1.3.1.2. Dedicating to be without suffering of poverty and mental suffering

One can dedicate for others to be free from mental suffering and the suffering of poverty. This also includes our own future. The verse relating to this is:

19. *May the naked ones receive clothes
The hungry get food, and may
The thirsty get water
And tasty drinks.*

The commentary explains:

May the naked ones receive clothing, the hungry food of perfect colour, smell and taste, and may the thirsty receive water and other tasty drinks.

Again, the commentary is quite clear. The naked ones refers to those who are deprived of clothing. The aspiration is 'May those who are deprived of clothing actually receive adequate clothing'. The next aspiration is for the hungry to find food which is of perfect colour, smell and taste. This supports what I've mentioned before: reciting OM AH HUM clears away the bad, foul colours and smell and taste, and consecrates and purifies the offering of food and drink one makes.

A similar aspiration is the dedication, 'May all find the food and drink that is most suitable', which might be coffee or tea or even alcohol. The main thing is that whatever they consume is tasty! If they have something that is not tasty, then it is not enjoyable. So the aspiration is not only may they be sustained by food, but may their food and drink be tasty as well. We can all relate to that can't we?

We may wonder, 'How, can I possibly benefit others in these extensive ways?' as we do not see any immediate benefit from making these incredibly powerful aspirations. Although we may not see any immediate benefit, these aspirations will definitely reap a positive effect at future time when we do have the ability to help others. For example, while doctors may have the same qualifications, some can more effectively treat patients than others. Their patients are more receptive to their help and so they can help their patients to a greater extent. These are the consequences of previous strong aspirations of really wanting to benefit others. The main thing is that we have this strong wish to benefit others, and when the time comes and we have all the right conditions then we will be able to effectively benefit the other according to their wishes.

However, there are some things we can do now. If we come across someone who does not have any clothes and we have an extra piece of clothing, we can easily give it to them to protect them from the cold. That is not beyond our capacity right now. Giving food to those who are hungry is also something we can do. The implication of 'food' in this context is that it wouldn't be a true act of generosity if we were to give food that we cannot consume ourselves, e.g. out of date food and so forth. Giving away food because we don't wish to consume it ourselves is not really an act of generosity. The implication in this verse is that the food we give is food that we would eat ourselves. If we were to see someone who is hungry, we should be willing to share our food with others. That is how we can benefit others now.

Those of us who believe in future lives need to understand that these aspirations are ways of implanting the seeds to have a greater capacity to be able to benefit others in our future lives – if, that is, we were to be reborn again as a human. Then, due to the aspirations we make and the virtues we collect now, we will be in a much better position to be able to benefit others than we are now. Thinking, ‘Oh, I can’t see any change in my capacity to be able to help others, so what purpose do these aspirations serve?’ is a very limited view. Since we believe in past and future lives, we need to have a broader understanding of this aspiration by seeing the benefits for our future lives.

The next verse under the same heading is:

20. *May the destitute attain wealth.
May the miserable and downtrodden attain joy.
May the depressed be uplifted
And become perfectly stable.*

The commentary explains:

May the destitute lacking possessions attain wealth. May the miserable and downtrodden who are separated from what they wish for attain mental happiness. May the depressed whose fortunes degenerated be mentally restored and attain the excellent and complete stability where they cannot be harmed by suffering or mental unhappiness.

As the commentary explains quite clearly, may the destitute lacking possessions attain wealth. May the miserable and downtrodden who lack what they wish for find mental happiness. May the depressed whose fortunes have degenerated be mentally restored and attain the excellent and complete stability where they cannot be harmed by suffering or mental unhappiness. This is all very clear.

2.1.1.3.1.3. Dedicating to be without the suffering of sickness and not encounter hate.

The two verses under this heading read:

21. *May all sick sentient beings quickly
Be liberated from their sicknesses.
May all the sicknesses of all migratory beings
Be eternally banished forever.*
22. *May the frightened be without danger.
May serfs become liberated.
May the powerless become empowered
With beautiful minds.*

Then the commentary explains:

By the power of whatever virtue there is of myself and others, may all sick sentient beings quickly be liberated from their sickness, and may all the physical and mental sufferings of migrators be banished forever. May those that are in fear of an enemy be without fear. May serfs, who are bound by others and lack independence and freedom, be liberated from their bondage. May the powerless gain power and strength, and be endowed with the beautiful mind of mutually benefitting each other.

The earlier part of the explanation is clear. At the end beautiful mind is another way of saying a compassionate mind. So the aspiration is ‘May they be endowed with a compassionate mind of mutually benefitting each other.’ That is the main point.

2.1.1.3.1.4. Dedicating for the sufferings of travellers and non-human harms to be pacified

This dedication is for the suffering travellers to be overcome, as well harms from non-humans like spirits and so forth to be pacified.

The first verse under this heading reads:

23. *May all the travellers
Encounter happiness wherever they go.
May the purpose for which they set out
Be accomplished effortlessly.*

The commentary explains:

May all travellers of the ten directions, such as traders and so forth, be happy wherever they go, and may they achieve the purpose of their journey effortlessly.

This is quite clear so there is no need for further explanation on this point.

The next verse reads:

24. *May those who sail on boats and ships,
Achieve their aims according to their wishes.
May they safely reach the shore of their destination
And joyfully reunite with their family.*

The commentary explains:

May those who set out on the ocean on small boats and big ships to find riches such as jewels, achieve their aims according to their wishes. May they then safely reach the shore and be happily reunited with their family.

Again, this is quite clear. We can all relate these accounts to our own wishes. This is basically wishing for the wishes of others to be fulfilled.

Then the third verse reads:

25. *May those wandering circuitous fearful desert routes,
Meet with travellers,
And be free from dangers such as bandits,
thieves, or tigers.
May they be able to walk their paths untiringly and happily.*

The commentary explains:

May those who wander on circuitous fearful routes in sandy deserts, meet with travellers who give them a fresh breath of hope, and may they then be able to walk their paths untiringly and happily, free from dangers such as bandits, thieves or tigers.

This is also quite clearly explained. When we relate it to our own experiences, we can recall our feelings of anxiety and fear when we have travelled an unfamiliar route. If we become lost, especially if it’s deep in a forest or in a deserted area, we become anxious and panic about the uncertainties of the place. Just as we experienced unease and discomfort on such occasions, we are making aspirations for others to be free from becoming lost while on their travels. Wishing them to be free from the dangers such as bandits, thieves and wild animals like tigers is quite clear.

The final verse under this heading reads:

26. *May those in the wilderness without paths,
fearful and miserable,
Those without protector, the children and elderly,
Whose minds are deluded by sleep or totally crazy,
May all of these be looked after by the gods.*

Then the commentary explains:

May children, the elderly, those without protector, whose minds are deluded by sleep or totally crazy, who are lost in isolated wilderness without paths, be looked after and guided by the gods of the white side.

Again the first part of the aspiration is quite clear. Gods of the white side refers to gods who support the Dharma. It is also said that these are the gods who help those who are engaged in Dharma practice.

2.1.1.3.2. Dedication to achieve their purpose

This is subdivided into two.

2.1.1.3.2.1. General human purpose

2.1.1.3.2.2. Purpose of ordained ones

We can see here again this meticulous presentation of the different levels of the aspirations. In the human realms there is the laity and those who are ordained.

2.1.1.3.2.1. Dedication for the general human purpose

This is subdivided into three:

2.1.1.3.2.1.1. Attaining perfect excellence

2.1.1.3.2.1.2. Entering a correct path

2.1.1.3.2.1.3. Having temporary endowments and happiness

2.1.1.3.2.1.1. Attaining perfect excellence

This is subdivided into four:

2.1.1.3.2.1.1.1. Attaining a basis with freedoms and endowments with perfect possessions

2.1.1.3.2.1.1.2. Being free from harm and attaining perfect splendour

2.1.1.3.2.1.1.3. Attaining a perfect form and progressing from inferiority to greatness

2.1.1.3.2.1.1.4. Dedication for perfect virtue

2.1.1.3.2.1.1.1. Attaining a basis with freedoms and endowments with perfect possessions

The next verse and a half relate to this:

27. *May they be liberated from all inopportune states,
Be endowed with faith, wisdom, and compassion.
Always having perfect food and actions,
May they always be aware of their lifetimes.*
- 28ab. *May they receive unceasing wealth
Equalling the space-like treasure.*

The commentary explains:

May they always be free from the eight inopportune states for Dharma practice, and endowed with faith, wisdom and compassion thinking about the welfare of others. Having attained perfect food and actions, may they always remember their lifetimes. May all who are destitute of possessions receive an unceasing stream of possessions, equalling the concentration of space treasure.

When the commentary explains, may they always be free from the eight inopportune states for Dharma practice it is referring to being endowed with the eight freedoms. This aspiration is for others to endowed with faith, wisdom and compassion which is thinking about the welfare of others.

Furthermore, as well as having these conditions of having attained perfect food and actions, may they also always remember their lifetimes. May all who are destitute of possessions receive an unceasing stream of possessions, equalling the concentration of space treasure. Here space treasure refers to an inexhaustible treasure house where one can take from it whatever one wishes for, and there is always more to take.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

16 May 2017

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice. [tong-len meditation]

In the same way that we have briefly engaged in the ton-glen meditation just now, we should try to make it part of our daily practice. As I've mentioned previously, when the tong-len visualisation is combined with the breath, it is good for the breathing to be a bit more laboured: when visualising taking in others' sufferings you breathe in heavily, and when visualising giving away your happiness, along with your body, possessions and virtues, you breathe out heavily.

So the measure of the breathing for this practice is different to when we do the practice of single-pointedly focusing on the breath. It would be hard to combine the technique used in our normal breathing meditation practice, where we attempt to just focus on the breath, with the ton-glen practice as the two techniques are not quite the same. With the tong-len practice, we need to imagine that we are intentionally and willingly taking in the sufferings of others, and intentionally and willingly giving away our happiness, so more vigour is needed.

As in our previous sessions, let us first recite the dedication chapter together, based on the bodhicitta motivation that we generated earlier. Indeed, the very first verse of chapter 10 relates to bodhicitta, so it is an essential reminder to first generate the bodhicitta motivation, and then recite the aspirational verses of dedication while holding that motivation. When we generate the bodhicitta motivation, the practice of giving and dedicating becomes the perfection of generosity. It is good to know how that practice becomes a perfection.

The first verse of the Bodhisattvacharyavatara reads:

*By any virtues of my writing the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Actions
May all migrators
Enter the bodhisattva's actions.*

While this dedication specifically relates to the composition of the text, it encompasses all bodhisattva actions, which should be dedicated in a similar manner. It is good to really try to contemplate the meaning of the verses and incorporate that understanding into one's recitation. This chapter presents a very good example of how to dedicate whatever virtues we accumulate. [Recitation]

The motivation we generated earlier will suffice as the motivation for receiving the teachings as well.

2.1.1.3.2.1.1.2. Dedication for being free from harm and attaining perfect splendour

Here, Shantideva relates to the various forms of suffering. It shows he's aware of the many different levels and types of suffering; he includes every type of suffering to be eliminated. He is also dedicating for sentient beings to be free from harm and to attain splendour. This dedication and those following are done out of great compassion – not being able to bear seeing others suffering in numerous ways, then dedicating any accumulated virtues for the wellbeing of other sentient beings.

The verse reads:

*28cd. May they live together without quarrels and arguments.
May they, without harmfulness, attain independence.*

29ab. May sentient beings with little splendour Achieve great splendour.

The commentary explains:

May they live together harmoniously, without quarrels, and may they live independently, without experiencing harm. May those of little splendour who are the object of ridicule, achieve great splendour.

We can also take this dedication as a personal instruction on how to live harmoniously with others: may they live together harmoniously, without quarrels, and may they live independently. This is the way to live with others without having conflict.

The second sentence reads: may those of little splendour who are the object of ridicule, achieve great splendour. I find this to be a significant point. It is a pitiful situation when others are ridiculed by those stronger than them, either in strength or in status. When I see the weak being bullied or taken advantage of, I immediately feel very uncomfortable. I've always felt like this. As I've shared in the past, when I was young, I had a few fights. Usually, the fights were because I was taking sides when I saw stronger kids bullying the younger ones. I would always take the side of the weaker ones, and try to fight back against the bullies.

We need to also be mindful to live harmoniously with others in our own lives. Although we consider ourselves to be Dharma practitioners, often, if we are not careful, we can start to quarrel with other practitioners out of jealousy, or find fault with, or criticise, them. It happens in every religious tradition; rivalry occurs, even in a religious context. Therefore, we need to be mindful.

These states of mind – jealousy, ridiculing others, or criticising them – come from not really paying attention to the purpose of our Dharma practice. Thus, if we practise Dharma and dedicate that practice in the ways mentioned here, it will prevent those unruly states of mind from arising. So, we really need to be mindful and take this as a personal instruction.

2.1.1.3.2.1.1.2..3. Dedication for attaining a perfect form and progressing from inferiority to greatness

*29cd. May those with wretched bodies such as ascetics
Have beautiful completely perfect and whole bodies.*

*30. May all women existing in the worlds
Become solely men.
May the low achieve high status
And abandon pride as well.*

The commentary reads:

May all those, who with wretched bodies, such as ascetics whose bodies are tormented by heat and cold, have beautiful, completely perfect and whole bodies. May all women in the worlds become men. May all those of low caste achieve a higher status, and abandon pride despite this attainment.

The first part is quite clear: May all those, who with wretched bodies, those who are downtrodden or their bodies are weak, such as ascetics whose bodies are tormented by heat and cold, have beautiful, completely perfect and whole bodies.

The next part requires some explanation; otherwise, there is a lot of room for misinterpretation. May all women in the worlds become men. If one has a proper understanding, this point will not affect one's mind. Otherwise some may use this one line as a reason to criticise the whole work of Shantideva. Those who don't have a good, broad, deep understanding of the Dharma would find reason to create a negative mind and start being critical.

Even if one were to take this literally, I would add another line, which is 'And may all men become like women'. The Buddha mentioned in another teaching that there are no men who would not desire women, and no women who would not desire men. From this perspective, desire refers to desiring the qualities of the other. In that sense, it is the same thing: all men would desire the unique qualities in women, and all women would desire the unique qualities in men.

In relation to the actual implication here, 'women' would not refer to all women in general, but to women suffering from adverse conditions, such as those who are mistreated, or have no power, or have no real independence, but are dominated by others. Even to this day, we can see this situation occurring in many parts of the world. I've heard that in some countries, women are completely dominated by men, and have no opportunity for individual independence, or even studying or pursuing a personal career, and so forth. These are really unfortunate circumstances.

Furthermore, some women are particularly affected by symptoms associated with the menstrual cycle, which may prevent that person from being able to pursue or to engage in normal activities. I don't think all women have such symptoms, but in these circumstances such women are really disadvantaged.

The aspiration here is 'may such women not have to experience such sufferings, and obtain bodies that are strong with vigour, and may they have ability and independence'. Of course, not all males would have the latter qualities, but this relates to those who do have a supreme male body with these qualities of strength, ability and independence. So the aspiration here is 'may women who are limited by certain physical hardships obtain such bodies of splendour, and be free from these particular sufferings'. When we relate to it in this way, we can see that these are aspirations are for human beings to be free of the particular disadvantages and sufferings experienced by some women.

Apparently, there are many ailments that are unique to the female body. Maybe Alan as a doctor might know more about it? Generally speaking, each individual has his or her own particular ailments. On a broader level, men, because of their different physiology and anatomy, would certainly have some ailments that women don't experience; whereas, women would have certain ailments that men don't experience.

The text here is particularly relating to those ailments that are obstacles in life. Thus the dedication here is for those who are disadvantaged, that they may obtain bodies which have strength, stamina and splendour, in order to be able to optimally practise the Dharma, without any interferences. That is the main point. In verse 10, the text referred to enjoying themselves with goddesses. Here again, these are the qualities of those who have perfect bodies.

Next the text reads, may all those of lower caste achieve a higher status, and abandon pride despite this attainment. Here, the dedication of one's virtues is made to alleviate the particular sufferings that come from belonging to a socially confined low-caste. In Australia and the rest of the developed world, there is no distinction based on caste, but in India – particularly in the past – the caste system was prevalent, and those of lower caste were underprivileged and disadvantaged. Therefore, the dedication here is for them to achieve high status, and after achieving high status to abandon pride despite that attainment.

In Buddhist communities in India, there has never been any distinction between castes.

2.1.1.3.2.1.1.4. Dedication for perfect virtue

The verse reads:

31. *By my merits,
May all sentient beings without exception,
Having abandoned all negativity,
Continuously practise virtue.*

The commentary explains:

By my merits from meditating on bodhicitta and so forth, may all sentient beings without exception, who are the purpose, abandon all obstructive conditions of negativities such as killing and the like, and continuously practise virtue.

By my merits from meditating on bodhicitta and so forth includes the virtues accumulated through the practices of generosity, morality, patience, joyous effort, and cultivating wisdom. So, through the virtues accumulated from these practices, may all sentient beings without exception, who are the purpose – that is, who are the purpose of one's dedications – abandon all obstructive conditions of negativities such as killing and the like, and thus be free from negativities such as the ten non-virtues, and continuously practise virtue. This again can be taken as a reminder to refrain from such non-virtuous actions oneself.

2.1.1.3.2.1.2. Dedication for entering a correct path

This dedication is specifically made for others to be protected from entering a wrong path which would otherwise lead to destructive behaviours and activities.

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.1.3.2.1.2.1. Dedicating to be endowed with correct motivation and practice of the path to liberation

2.1.1.3.2.1.2.2. Dedicating for complete conducive conditions and no obstructing conditions

2.1.1.3.2.1.2.1. Dedicating to be endowed with correct motivation and practice of the path to liberation

- 32ab. *May they be inseparable from bodhicitta,
And engage in the bodhisattva practices.*

The commentary explains:

May all sentient beings never be separated from bodhicitta and always engage in the bodhisattva practices, such as generosity.

This is a profound dedication: dedicating towards sentient beings to be never be separated from bodhicitta and always engage in the bodhisattva practices such as generosity, morality, and so forth.

2.1.1.3.2.1.2.2. Dedicating for complete conducive conditions and no obstructing conditions

These are particularly in relation to the accumulation of virtue, since there are conducive conditions we need to acquire and obstructing conditions we need to avoid. That is the dedication here.

*32cd. May they be looked after by the buddhas;
May they abandon actions induced by demons.*

The commentary explains:

May they be looked after by the virtuous teachers, the buddhas, and may they abandon the actions induced by demons, who obstruct the creation of virtue.

Here, the virtuous teachers, the buddhas, are seen as the conducive conditions for practising virtue, whereas the influence of demons or negative friends, is the obstruction.

This as a profound dedication. It is good to reflect upon this when doing our normal dedications, and make the strong aspiration: 'May I never be separated from the buddhas and virtuous teachers in this life and in all future lifetimes. In all future lifetimes, may I always be guided by the buddhas in the forms of virtuous teachers'.

2.1.1.3.2.1.3. Dedicating for having temporary endowments and happiness

This is again subdivided into three:

2.1.1.3.2.1.3.1. Dedicating for long life and pure environment

2.1.1.3.2.1.3.2. Dedicating for being made happy by benevolent beings

2.1.1.3.2.1.3.3. Dedicating for complete necessities and pacification of harm

2.1.1.3.2.1.3.1. Dedicating for long life and pure environment

Here, we can recall the aspirations we make to be reborn in the pure environment of the blissful lands. The first verse here is:

*33. May all those sentient beings
Have a limitless life span.
May they always enjoy a happy life, and
May the very sound of death never ring.*

The commentary explains:

May all sentient beings take rebirth in a happy migration and be able to have a long limitless life span. May these long lives always be happy, and even the sound of death never ring.

Again, the explanation in the commentary is quite clear. The next two verses under this heading are:

*34. May all directions be filled with Groves of wish-fulfilling trees,
Full of buddhas and bodhisattvas
Proclaiming the melodious sound of Dharma.*

*35. May the grounds everywhere be pure,
Without pebbles and the like,
Smooth like the nature of lapis lazuli,
Similar to the palm of one's hand.*

The commentary explains:

May all directions be filled with groves of wish-fulfilling trees, filled with buddhas and bodhisattvas proclaiming the melodious sound of Dharma. May the ground everywhere be lush, pure and smooth, without stones, thorns or pebbles, smooth like the nature of lapis lazuli, similar to the palm of one's hand.

The description of 'wish-fulfilling trees' was presented earlier in verse 6.

May the ground everywhere be lush, pure and smooth, without stones, thorns or pebbles, smooth like the nature of lapis lazuli, which is similar to the palm of one's hand. The description given here indicates that the ground of the pure lands is very smooth and without any sharp objects. The ground itself is said to be like walking on a soft cushion that slightly sinks in when you walk on it, (but of course doesn't sink in completely). When you put your foot down, you feel an expansion, so it's very pleasant to walk. These are the descriptions given of the pure lands, where there's no cause for any discomfort or any kind of suffering.

So we make the aspiration 'may beings be reborn in such blissful lands, and have the opportunity to practise Dharma'. This is a very meaningful object of meditation: while dedicating for others, we can also make the aspiration 'may I be reborn in such pure lands, that are always surrounded by buddhas and bodhisattvas'.

If we can meditate on these points now, it will definitely have a positive effect at the time of death, because one will be more likely to have visions of such pure lands at that time. One would have a strong premonition of being reborn in the pure lands, where buddhas and bodhisattvas are residing everywhere, where everything is easy, without any stress, and so forth. How wondrous that would be, to have such visions at the time of death! The buddhas and bodhisattvas are not just residing there, but are spontaneously teaching, so wherever one goes, one continuously hears the sound of the Dharma. That's the main point - it's not just a pure blissful land where you relax and do nothing, but you also have access to the Dharma, and you are continuously able to engage in Dharma practice. If one were in such a land, there would be no suffering at all, because of the ever-present, positive influence of the Dharma.

While the descriptions here relate to pure lands, even today on this planet we can see places that don't have any of the conditions for hearing the Dharma, and where the land itself is uncomfortable, rough, and so forth. So we can see that similar descriptions fit certain environments on this Earth today.

In terms of abodes similar to pure lands, I've seen on TV certain places - I'm not sure if they are in America or elsewhere - that are really beautiful and seem to fit the description of the pure lands. On Channel 7, there are two presenters in the morning on the Sunrise program, I think, who recently went to America. The TV program showed some really lush and beautiful places, estates and so forth. I thought at the time that the people who live there would have definitely created the good causes and merit to be in such beautiful places. Whether they actually enjoyed their homes, I'm not really sure! But visually, they were really beautiful abodes.

When I see individuals living in these beautiful places and big, luxurious homes, I immediately think how wonderful it would be if they were happy as well. That would be nice. If they could actually enjoy their homes, that would be really great for them. But after that I think, 'Of course, what would be best is that they didn't have to die'. That thought stops my mind from craving to live in such places, because no matter how beautiful and luxurious, in the end, you have to leave it all behind.

If one thinks about death, grasping at such a nice abode will not occur. But if one does not think about death and impermanence, a craving for such nice places might develop. Indeed, meditating on death and impermanence is really helpful for spiritual practitioners. If one considers oneself a spiritual practitioner but does not recall death and impermanence occasionally, one's practice becomes difficult.

2.1.1.3.2.1.3.2. Dedicating for being made happy by benevolent beings

The first verse under this heading reads:

36. *May, wherever mandalas of retinues are,
A multitude of bodhisattvas reside,
Adorning the ground
With their goodness.*

The commentary reads:

May wherever mandalas of retinues of dharma students are, a multitude of bodhisattvas reside, adorning the ground with the goodness of their excellent qualities.

May wherever mandalas of retinues... means that wherever beings engage in practising and listening to Dharma, may a multitude of bodhisattvas reside, adorning the ground with the goodness of their excellent qualities in that abode. One is dedicating one's merits by saying, 'whatever virtues one has accumulated, may these become a cause for places where people are engaged in Dharma practice, to always have bodhisattvas residing there'. Here the aspiration is for the bodhisattvas to remain for a long time to assist and benefit the beings in such places.

These are really meaningful dedications. For me, personally, whenever I see someone – whether they're men or women, from a religious tradition or not – doing any good for others and benefiting them, it really brings joy to my mind. I immediately think, 'May they have a long life, may they remain for a long time to continually be able to help and benefit others'.

37. *May all embodied beings
Hear uninterruptedly the sound of Dharma
From all birds, trees, and sunlight,
And even from space.*

The commentary explains:

May all embodied beings hear uninterruptedly the sound of Dharma from all trees, light rays, and even from space, like bodhisattvas who have attained power.

The dedication relates to those bodhisattvas who have obtained certain high powers. Due to their attainments, they're able to hear the Dharma everywhere. Every sound becomes the sound of Dharma – from trees, birds, even light rays and space. The dedication here is that may all beings be born with such conditions.

38. *May they always meet buddhas
And the children of the buddhas.
May they offer infinite offering clouds
To the highest of migrators.*

The commentary explains:

May these sentient beings always meet buddhas and the children of the buddhas. May they offer infinite oceans of offering clouds to the highest of migrators, the buddhas.

May they offer infinite oceans of offering clouds to the highest of migrators... This could be easily misinterpreted; highest of migrators refers to those amongst migrators who are held in the highest esteem – that is, the buddhas. So it refers to making offerings to the buddhas.

A practical way to relate to this is to offer our meagre virtuous acts and deeds now, that they will also become a cause for one, in the future, to be able to make abundant material offerings. While we may not have much in the way of material means to make extensive offerings now, we can offer our virtues, which then become a cause for us to be able to make abundant offerings in the future.

2.1.1.3.2.1.3.3. Dedicating for complete necessities and pacification of harm

The first verse reads:

39. *May the gods bestow timely rain,
And may a perfect crop ripen.
May kings act in accordance with the Dharma
And may the worldly realms increase.*

The commentary reads:

As conducive conditions for Dharma practice, may the gods bestow timely rain, and may the crops be perfect and complete. May the powerful among human beings, such as kings and princes, act in accordance with the dharma and may the worldly realms be increased through being adorned with happiness and joy.

Here, timely rain would refer to rain that falls at the right time to ensure perfect and complete crops. As farmers would know, soon after seed is sown, if there's rain, that is said to be the best condition for the seed to germinate and sprout. Then, as it sprouts, it needs further rain to grow into a bigger, mature crop. At a certain time, when the crop is about to ripen, it requires little or no rainfall, because that could destroy the crop. So, following the general pattern of the seasons, a crop would be sown when the rains are just right for the crop to grow, and this dedication is for the rains to fall in a timely way.

May the powerful among human beings, such as kings and princes, act in accordance with the Dharma. This is again a significant point. If rulers, such as the kings and princes of ancient times, were to be imbued with the Dharma, their rule would be a righteous one. The interests of their rule constituency would naturally be at the front of their minds, rather than their personal interests. Thus they would be able to rule justly and bring benefit to everyone.

Furthermore, may the worldly realms be increased through being adorned with happiness and joy. This is again a very meaningful dedication for the benefit of others.

Of course, the opposite would be true if kings and rulers were unjust and took advantage of their subjects. That would create much difficulty for the people living in that country.

40. *May medicines be effective and May the recitations of secret mantra be successful.
May sky dwellers, yakshas, and so forth
Be endowed with the mind of compassion.*

The commentary reads:

May medicines be effective in curing disease, and may the purposes of the recitations of secret mantras accomplishing pacifying, increasing and other activities be accomplished the way they were intended. May sky dwellers, yakshas, carnivorous beasts and the like become endowed with the mind of love.

The dedication being made here is, may whatever medicines that are administered be effective in curing diseases. And may the purposes of the recitations of secret mantras accomplishing pacifying includes the four types of actions associated with the different purposes of reciting mantras – peaceful or pacifying; increasing; controlling or influencing; and wrathful activity.

When one recites mantras, it could be for any of these four purposes. Pacifying would be to pacify ailments, or to have good conditions, and so forth. When a mantra recitation is done for these ends, it would be for peaceful purposes. Increasing is for the purposes of increasing one's life force, or merit, for example. When mantras are recited for that purpose, the recitation is said to be done for the purpose of increasing.

Controlling refers to the purpose of controlling others. Also, when one recites the mantra for a particular deity, it is said that we are aiming to have control of the deity. That may seem a little presumptuous, but basically one is getting closer to the deity so that one can ask the deity to remove obstacles for oneself and make one's practice virtuous, and so forth.

Then there are recitations for wrathful purposes. Wrathful here implies, for example, subduing those who harm other sentient beings or harm the teachings. In order to subjugate such beings, certain mantras are recited for that purpose.

So for whatever purpose the recitation is done, may all of that be accomplished according to one's wishes. Of course, this would imply a Dharma purpose with the proper motivations, so may increasing and other activities be accomplished the way they were intended.

Then, the text mentions sky dwellers. I think this relates particularly to malicious beings. Yakshas are like demons. So may such beings and carnivorous beasts and the like become endowed with the mind of love. The aspiration here is in relation to those beings that may feel malice or harmful intent towards others: 'May their harmful intentions and malicious thoughts be supplemented with a mind of love, so that they do not harm other sentient beings'.

Although I've presented this in the past, in terms of knowing how rituals are practised, if one is doing mantras for the purpose of pacifying, the mala is held between one's thumb and first (index) finger. That's generally how it's explained. The second (middle) finger and thumb are used for mantra recitations done for the purpose of increasing. For the purposes of controlling, one uses the thumb and fourth (ring) finger. During what is called an approximation retreat, the mantra recitation is usually done using the thumb and fourth finger. You hold the mala between the thumb and fifth (little) finger for the recitation of wrathful mantras.

While this is the traditional practice, there are different presentations for reciting mantras. For example, if you recite mantras other than the pacifying ones, it would not be wrong to use the mala between the thumb and first finger, because the first finger is above all the other fingers, so it's not a mistake.

If one doesn't know these distinctions, and why things are done in certain ways, one could become very fixed and rigid about certain ways of doing things, and one may even turn around and tell others, 'You're doing it wrong, you've done it incorrectly!'. This brings up all sorts of doubts in people's minds. If you say things that create doubt in the mind of someone who's inclined to engage in virtue, they may lose the opportunity to create virtue. That would be a great disadvantage for them. So those who understand the implications of what they say to others will not say such things.

There is an additional subheading here which is:

Dedication to be separated from that which is unwished for

The verse is presented under this:

41. *May sentient beings not experience the slightest suffering,
Be free from dangers and criticism,
And not have the slightest mental unhappiness.*

The commentary explains:

May sentient beings be utterly free from physical suffering. May their minds be free from fears, may they not be humiliated by others and may they be utterly free from mental unhappiness.

Because there are no sentient beings who like any kind of physical suffering, the dedication here is that they may be utterly free from physical suffering. And there is no sentient being who wishes to feel any kind of fear in their mind, so the next dedication is that may they be free from all fears. Similarly, there's no one who likes to be humiliated, so may all beings be free from humiliation by others and may they be utterly free from mental unhappiness.

So, it's good for us to recite these verses and contemplate the meaning. This, in itself, can be a really inspiring and helpful practice for our mind.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

23 May 2017

Based on the motivation we have just generated, we can now engage in our regular meditation practice.

[tong-len meditation]

Now, based on that positive motivation, we will read the tenth chapter together. We can make particular dedications for Elvira's father, who passed away recently, and for the victims of the Manchester tragedy. It is really terrifying to see how so many innocent people have been killed and the disruption to the lives of those who survived. Indeed the whole world is affected by this act of terror.

As we read in the chapter, there are dedications for the minds of malevolent spirits and non-humans and so forth to be pacified. We have just seen an example of people who invoke terror and suffering, so we dedicate for their minds to be pacified.

When there are terrorist actions such as these there is no benefit whatsoever. There is only harm for the victims and also the perpetrators. Actions such these arise from very evil negative states of mind, which only lead to harm. So we need to remember that the perpetrators are also an object of great compassion, as they have engaged in such negative deeds motivated by anger, or whatever strong negative mind that might be influencing them at that time. Because they create so much negativity for others and themselves, they are indeed a great object of compassion.

It seems that they are retaliating out of their own ignorance, as a result of the deeds of some leaders of a few nations. Their minds have been disturbed and that is why they are retaliating. This is no small matter for them, but the way that they respond is harmful. This kind of resentment, which is like a sickness, can be passed down over many generations and cause a lot of harm.

May the bodhicitta motivation that we generate bring about only benefit for sentient beings, may all their suffering be removed, and may they create the causes to achieve enlightenment. This is the extent of the motivation we generate. In particular, we are dedicating for the minds of others to be pacified.

Personally, I rely on deities such as Avalokiteshvara and Tara and make strong requests to these enlightened beings to bestow blessings and pacify the minds of those who are completely overwhelmed by ignorance, thus creating negative karma. At our level right now, making strong prayers and seeking blessings is the most we can do. Whenever someone requests to me to pray, I make strong prayers to the enlightened beings to please extend their help and blessing to those in need.

[Recitation of chapter 10]

We can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: 'For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and put them into practice as best as I can'.

Along with this motivation we generate the really strong complementary aspiration, 'May I be never separated from the precious Mahayana teachers in all my lifetimes, and may I be able to meet with these same conditions that I have now, from life to life, in all my future lifetimes.'

2.1.1.3.2.1. Dedicating for the purpose of ordained ones

This is subdivided into five:

2.1.1.3.2.1.1. Dedicating for the Sangha in general

2.1.1.3.2.1.2. Dedicating for the purpose of gelongs

2.1.1.3.2.1.3. Dedicating for the purpose of gelong-mas

2.1.1.3.2.1.4. Dedicating for the purpose of complete morality

2.1.1.3.2.1.5. Dedicating for the enjoyment of the result

2.1.1.3.2.1.1. Dedicating for the Sangha in general

We need to keep in mind that the actual Sangha Jewel refers to the arya Sangha.

Here Sangha in general refers to the ordained Sangha. The teachings mention that an assembly of four pure ordained Sangha suffices as the actual Sangha Jewel. Therefore, ordained Sangha are held in high esteem, and respected in many traditions. The Sangha Jewel refers to those who are actively engaged in preserving the Dharma by propounding and practising the teachings. If we were to think about it in practical terms, then since the buddhas are already enlightened and in the state of perpetual bliss, they don't have to face any challenges and hardship. Whereas the Sangha are the ones who face many challenges and hardship while adopting various means to preserve the Dharma. For the preservation of the Buddha's teachings, along with the Sangha Jewel there is the Dharma Jewel – true paths and true cessation. These are significant points to take note of.

The verse says:

42. *May the monasteries abide well,
And be adorned by reading and recitation.
May the Sangha always be harmonious and May the purpose of the Sangha be accomplished.*

As the commentary reads:

May the Sangha who live in the monasteries abide well by spreading and increasing the Dharma through reading the teachings of the Buddha and the elucidations of his thought, and reciting prayers. May the Sangha always be harmonious while engaging in virtuous activities and may the purpose to benefit sentient beings and so forth be accomplished just as intended.

The specific Tibetan term used here is tsuk la-khang which is translated as 'monastery', however a more literal translation would be 'temple'. The connotation of tsuk la-khang is an abode where the vinaya and the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings are preserved. So in that sense a tsuk la-khang is a place where the sutras of the Buddha are kept and honoured, such as on the altar here at Tara Institute.

The word gompa is usually translated as ‘monastery’, a place where Sangha i.e. monks and nuns reside. The term ‘gompa’ has the connotation of an abode that is removed from places where there is sexual activity. That is why monasteries are usually found on the outskirts of villages or towns.

As the commentary states, May the Sangha who live in the monasteries abide well by spreading and increasing the Dharma through reading the teachings of the Buddha. The meaning here is to recite the Buddha’s teachings again and again, as a way of remembering them in order to be able to expound them. There are of course the recitations that are part of our commitments; however, here it refers to the texts explaining the Buddha’s teachings. Thus the Sangha in the monasteries memorise many different texts and recite them from memory.

In monasteries such as Sera Monastery, there is a tradition where the monks memorise a text during the day and then in the evening the memorised texts are recited from memory. As part of the curriculum, some monks spend from seven in the evening to about four or five o’clock in the morning reciting the texts they have memorised. I did this several times in my youth when I was studying at Sera.

The English translation ‘reading’ does not bring out the full meaning of the Tibetan word lokpa which has the connotation of listening to the teachings, contemplating and then meditating on them. This is the ultimate means of preserving the Buddha’s teachings, to keep them fresh and alive.

The next part of the dedication is, may the Sangha always be harmonious while engaging in virtuous activities. The Tibetan term gen-dun, which is translated as Sangha, has the literal meaning of ‘abiding in virtue’. The emphasis here is on engaging in virtuous activities harmoniously. This is said to be one of the essential elements for the wellbeing of the community of the Sangha. Furthermore, may the purpose to benefit sentient beings and so forth be accomplished just as it was intended.

2.1.1.3.2.1.2. Dedicating for the purpose of gelongs

The verse relating to this is:

43. *May the gelongs who aspire towards the trainings Attain isolation and
Upon having abandoned all distraction,
Attain a mind of pliant meditation.*

As the commentary reads:

May the pure gelongs who wish to protect their training from degeneration attain physical isolation from the bustle of worldly affairs, which is an obstacle to morality. Having abandoned all mental distractions and having become adorned with the bliss of mental and physical pliancy, may they meditate on virtue with pliancy.

May the pure gelongs who wish to protect their training from degeneration attain physical isolation from bustle of worldly affairs, which is an obstacle to morality. In order to practise pure morality, one has to protect it from adverse conditions. Conversely, if there are no adverse conditions, then there is no need to protect anything. The Sangha have taken vows and commitments as a way to protect themselves from obstacles; if there were no obstacles to be protected from, then there would be no need for those vows. As the Vinaya text indicates, the early disciples of the Buddha didn’t have many vows, but as the early ordained Sangha started to engage in misdeeds, more and more vows were laid down.

These are indications of the need to protect the Sangha from external obstacles, referred to here as the bustle of worldly affairs, or being around people who engage in worldly excitement. Physical isolation in this context refers to refraining from bustling worldly affairs, while mental isolation refers to refraining from engaging in superstitious or discursive thoughts. These are the two main obstacles.

As the teachings indicate, one needs to practise in isolation. Although this usually refers to an isolated physical abode, real isolation encompasses both physical isolation i.e. refraining from mingling with the hustle and bustle of worldly life and people and engaging in frivolous activities, and mental isolation, which means refraining from engaging in superstitions or discursive thoughts. You can be physically isolated, but if your mind is constantly engaging in these superstitious or discursive thoughts, you will not be able to maintain your focus on your practice. These are instructions for all of us to keep in mind.

As further explained in the commentary, having abandoned all mental distractions and having become adorned with the bliss of mental and physical pliancy, may they meditate on virtue with pliancy. We need to understand how to acquire all the conditions to develop calm abiding, and then actually develop it. In the process of developing calm abiding, one obtains mental pliancy first, followed by physical pliancy, then one experiences the bliss of physical pliancy, which induces the bliss of mental pliancy. Then, having obtained actual calm abiding, one can meditate on virtue effortlessly for as long as one wishes. These achievements are essential for one’s practice.

2.1.1.3.2.1.3. Dedicating for the purpose of gelong-mas

The next two lines of verse are:

44ab. *May gelong-mas have gain, and
May they abandon harm or quarrel.*

As the commentary explains:

May gelong-mas have the gain of being endowed with the Dharma, and abandon the harm of quarrelling, being seduced by others and such.

Being endowed with the Dharma, as translated here, implies being able to sustain oneself without much effort. It is essential that practitioners, particularly bhikshunis, have sufficient resources to engage in the practice of Dharma, because having to expend a lot of effort to secure basic necessities is an obstacle to practice.

Furthermore, may they abandon the harm of quarrelling refers to disputes and quarrelling with each other. Being seduced by others refers to being led astray by those who speak pleasant words and act as if they are friends, but who have the negative motivation of wanting to disrupt the morality of the bhikshunis. So the dedication is, ‘may bhikshunis be free from all these adverse conditions and obtain all of the good conditions for the practice of Dharma’.

2.1.1.3.2.1.4. Dedicating for the purpose of complete morality

This refers to being able to practise pure ethics, unstained by faulty morality. The first four lines of verse read:

44cd. *Similarly may all those who are ordained
Never degenerate their morality.*

45ab. *Having renounced mistaken morality.
May they always abandon negativity.*

Here the commentary states:

Likewise, may all ordained ones complete their morality and be without degeneration. Should they receive individual mistaken moralities, then may they renounce them by generating regret and always abandon negativity.

As the commentary clearly explains, likewise may all ordained Sangha complete their morality and be without degeneration. So the dedication is for the Sangha to abide in pure morality without allowing it to degenerate. Should they receive individual mistaken moralities, meaning if their moral ethics were to lapse, may they renounce them by generating regret and always abandon negativity. While making every effort to observe morality, in the event that some breaches do occur due to strong delusions, may that become a cause for the Sangha to develop even stronger renunciation, and with the aid of regret, may they engage in purification practices.

On a personal level, it is good to note that although we may not intend to engage in negativities, if we do create negativities then that can become an impetus to engage in strong purification practices. So in this sense, it becomes a means to engage in further virtues.

The next lines of verse are

45cd. *On having attained a higher rebirth
May their discipline never degenerate.*

46. *May the scholars always be praised,
And always receive enough alms,
May their continuum be perfectly pure, and
May they be renowned in all directions.*

The commentary explains:

Then, having attained a higher rebirth in the next life, may even then their discipline not degenerate. May the scholars of the world receive praise and alms. May their continuum be completely pure, free from pride and such, and may they be pleasantly renowned in all directions.

This dedication for the purpose of perfect morality is framed around the positive results of observing morality. What is the benefit for the Sangha in abiding by all these vows? It is a higher rebirth in the next life; the consequence of observing morality is obtaining a higher rebirth the next life.

Furthermore, may their discipline not degenerate even in the next life. In other words, may they be able to maintain their morality even in the next life.

Next there is a dedication for the scholars of the world to receive praise, which means that those who have great knowledge are acknowledged with due praise. May their continuum be completely pure, free from pride means that when they receive that praise may their mind not be affected by pride.

These are really significant aspirations, which we need also be mindful of applying to ourselves. If we have some specific knowledge and so forth then while we may receive acknowledgement or praise for that, we need to be mindful of not letting that become a cause for pride, because that would ruin our own ethics and positive virtuous mind.

Finally, may they be pleasantly renowned in all directions.

2.1.1.3.2.1.5. Dedicating for the enjoyment of the result

The next verse is:

47. *May they not experience the sufferings of the lower realms.
May they, without any difficulties,
Quickly attain enlightenment
Through the body superior to gods.*

The commentary explains:

May they not experience the sufferings of the lower realms. May these proficient ones quickly attain enlightenment, without any difficult hard actions of the three doors, with the body that is the ripening result superior to the ripening result of the gods, this body that possesses the seven qualities of higher status for attaining omniscient consciousness.

May they not experience the sufferings of the lower realms. May these proficient ones quickly attain enlightenment, without any difficult hard actions. Here we can refer to the earlier explanations of how some austere practices involve a lot of physical endurance and so forth. So the dedication here is, may those engaging on the practices be free from such hard and difficult practices of the three doors, with a body that is the ripening result superior to the ripening results of the gods’.

This body possesses the seven qualities of higher status that are essential for obtaining the mind of enlightenment. A body that is endowed with the eight freedoms and ten endowments is said to be the body that is needed for obtaining higher status and liberation. To achieve enlightenment, however the seven qualities are necessary. These, as I have presented in earlier teachings, are having: (1) a good lineage; (2) a sound body with all the faculties intact; (3) sufficient wealth; (4) power and control; (5) wisdom; (6) long life and (7) freedom from sickness.

These are the essential qualities that are needed in order to be able to benefit others. Being of good lineage is good condition in itself, but if you are attractive as well as from a good lineage, then apparently that is very appealing to others, and you can accomplish great deeds. Having sufficient wealth, power and control gives you a positive influence over others, making them amenable to being led to virtue and conducting themselves in accordance with the Dharma. Without wisdom or intelligence, of course, you cannot really benefit others, and without a long stable life, you may do some good deeds, but will not be able to continue to do so for long. Being free from illnesses or sickness also enables you to help without interruption.

2.1.1.4. DEDICATING FOR THE PURPOSE OF ALL SENTIENT BEINGS

The lines of the verse relating this are:

48. *May all sentient beings repeatedly Make offerings to all buddhas and
Through the infinite happiness of the buddhas,
May they always be endowed with happiness.*

The commentary reads:

By the might of whatever virtue there is, may all sentient beings in every action repeatedly make offerings to all buddhas with devotion. In dependence on this may they practise the actions of bodhisattvas, and thus continuously become endowed with happiness, through the infinite happiness of the buddhas.

By the might of whatever virtue there is, or through the power of whatever virtue one may have accumulated, may all sentient beings in every action repeatedly make offerings to all the buddhas with devotion. Here every action includes making an offering of actions that we would normally consider as mundane, such as eating, drinking, sleeping, and walking about. As I regularly emphasise, it is important to make offerings of everything we eat and drink, and this is being backed up in these teachings. In this way, even our normal activities and deeds can become the means to accumulate great virtue and merit. This is the point we need to understand here.

Thus in dependence on this, may they practice the actions of the bodhisattvas and thus continuously be endowed with happiness through the infinite happiness of the buddhas. Here we can also derive the understanding that the good, positive results obtained from these aspirations and dedications, such as the happiness of the buddhas, is dependent on causes and conditions. These again are points that we should recall.

2.1.2. Dedicating for purposes having gone beyond the world

This is subdivided into three:

2.1.2.1. Dedicating for the accomplishment of the wishes of the bodhisattvas

2.1.2.2. Dedicating for the completion of the Buddha's actions

2.1.2.3. Dedicating for accomplishment of the wishes of hearers and self-liberators

2.1.2.1. DEDICATING FOR THE ACCOMPLISHMENT OF THE WISHES OF THE BODHISATTVAS

The dedication here is for the incredibly extensive wishes that the bodhisattvas have to benefit sentient beings be accomplished just as they intended. The lines of the verse read:

- 49ab. *May bodhisattvas accomplish the purpose
Of migrators they intent in their heart.*

The commentary reads:

May, in dependence on the virtue of composing this commentary and other virtues, bodhisattvas accomplish the actions for the temporary and ultimate purpose of all migrators the way they intend in their heart.

May all the virtues that have been accumulated become the means for the bodhisattvas to accomplish the actions for the temporary and ultimate purpose. Here we need to understand that temporary refers to obtaining the high status of a good rebirth in the next life, such as in the human and god realms, and ultimate refers to liberation and enlightenment.

2.1.2.2. DEDICATING FOR THE COMPLETION OF THE ACTIONS OF THE BUDDHAS

The relevant lines of verse read:

- 49cd. *Whatever the protectors' intent,
May that happiness be received by sentient beings.*

The commentary states

May sentient beings receive whatever infinite happiness the buddha protectors intend for them

Again, this is very clear. As the commentary explains, may sentient beings receive whatever infinite happiness the buddha protectors intend for them. May beings experience happiness and wellbeing, free from suffering as the buddhas intended.

2.1.2.3. DEDICATING FOR ACCOMPLISHMENT OF THE WISHES OF HEARERS AND SELF-LIBERATORS

May the wishes of hearers and self-liberators be fulfilled.

The text reads:

50. *Likewise, may self-liberated buddhas
And hearers also attain happiness.*

The commentary reads:

Likewise, may self-buddhas and hearers also attain the happiness of peace.

This is quite clear. May self-buddhas and hearers also attain the happiness of peace. Their intended goal is to achieve self-liberation, a state mainly focused on themselves, where they are free from suffering and achieve the state of happiness. May they achieve that state of liberation.

2.2. Dedication for the purpose of self

This is subdivided into four:

2.2.1. Praying for the attainment of the temporary result

2.2.2. Praying to be directly guided by Manjushri

2.2.3. Praying to abide within the bodhisattva trainings

2.2.4. Praying to complete the purpose of others

Here the term 'praying' also means aspiring.

2.2.1. Praying for the attainment of the temporary result

51. *May I also, through the kindness of Manjushri,
Until attaining the ground of supreme joy,
Always remember my lives
And attain ordination.*

The commentary explains

By the power of these virtues may I also, through the kindness of Manjushri, until the attainment of the ground of supreme joy always have mindfulness of my lives and attain ordination, the vessel for qualities.

As explained here the aspiration is, 'may I have mindfulness and attain ordination through the virtues that I have accumulated through the kindness of my teacher

Manjushri until I achieve the ground of supreme joy, which is the first ground of the ten bumis or grounds of a bodhisattva.

The remaining verse under this heading is:

52. *In spite of inferior food
May I have splendour and livelihood.
May I in all my lifetimes abide in solitude
And attain perfection.*

Despite inferior food that is bad and scarce, may my body be endowed with splendour, and may I have a happy livelihood. In all my lives may I remain in isolation from physical and mental distractions, and attain perfection.

This dedication is really very meaningful. 'Although my food may be meagre and not very tasty, may my body be endowed with splendour' means, 'may my body be nourished and thus lustrous and strong'. Rather than a happy livelihood, a more literal translation from Tibetan is, 'may I be able to sustain myself well'. Finally, in all my life may I remain in isolation from physical and mental distractions. This refers back to achieving mental and physical isolation, which was explained in an earlier verse.

2.2.2. Praying to be directly guided by Manjushri

The implication here is receiving direct guidance from Manjushri as a teacher.

53. *Whenever I wish to study,
Or have even small questions,
May I be able to behold without obstructions
The protector, Manjushri.*

The commentary explains

Whenever I wish to study the teachings of the conqueror and so forth, or wish to ask a small question regarding some meaningful words, may I be able to immediately, without obstructions, behold directly the protector Manjushri himself.

This is a very meaningful verse, which I recite daily as a personal initiative. As the commentary explains, the prayer is whenever I wish to study or have even the smallest of questions, may I be able to behold without obstruction the protector Manjushri himself. Whenever I wish to study the teachings of the conqueror and so forth, refers mainly to the teachings of Buddha. The intention here that whenever one wishes to ask a small question regarding some meaningful words, 'may I be able to immediately, without obstructions, behold directly the protector Manjushri and receive answers from Manjushri himself'.

As usual, let us spend some time in our regular Tong-Len meditation practice.

[meditation]

2.2. Dedication for the purpose of self (cont.)

2.2.3. Praying to abide within the bodhisattva trainings

The verse reads:

- 54 *May my actions, to accomplish
The purpose of all sentient beings,
Extending to the edge of space of the ten directions,
Equal the actions of Manjushri.*

The commentary explains:

To accomplish the temporary and ultimate purpose of sentient beings extending up to the edge of space of the ten directions, may my actions equal the actions of Manjushri.

The commentary says that, to accomplish the temporary and ultimate purpose of sentient beings extending up to the edge of space of the ten directions, one needs to visualise sentient beings extending as far as space exists. Accomplishing the temporary purpose refers to the temporary happiness of achieving a higher rebirth (in the human or the god realms – called good status). The ultimate purpose is a dedication for sentient beings to achieve the state of liberation, and ultimately enlightenment. The wish for your actions to equal the actions of Manjushri is an incredibly profound dedication and an aspiration which is important to make regularly.

2.2.4. Praying to complete the purpose of others

The verse reads:

55. *For as long as space abides,
And as long as sentient beings remain,
For that long may I also remain and Eliminate the sufferings of sentient beings.*

Then as the commentary explains under this verse:

For as long as cyclic existence and the migrators circling within it remain, may I remain and eliminate all sufferings of sentient beings.

This is a verse His Holiness the Dalai Lama takes to heart as a strong aspiration. We can see from the extent of the aspiration embedded in the dedication that it is very profound and meaningful. The commentary clearly states that, For as long as cyclic existence and the migrators circling within it remain, until then, may I remain and eliminate all sufferings of sentient beings. This shows the extent of the incredibly powerful aspiration and dedication of the bodhisattvas.

The next verse reads:

56. *May any suffering of migrators
Ripen upon myself.*

*By the power of the bodhisattva Sangha,
May all sentient beings enjoy happiness.*

The commentary explains:

May any suffering of migrators that exists ripen upon me. By the nature of the power of the bodhisattvas' Sangha may all migrators enjoy happiness.

This verse describes what we actually intend to do in our regular Tong len meditation practice. It specifically encourages us to aspire to engage in the actual practice of giving and taking.

2.3. Dedication for the increase of the Dharma, the source of happiness

Recognising that the Dharma is the source of all happiness, and making aspirations for it to expand and go in all directions is an incredibly profound dedication.

The verse reads:

57. *May the sole medicine for the suffering of migrators,
The source of all happiness,
The Dharma, abide long
With praise and high regard.*

The commentary explains:

In dependence on whatever virtue there is, may the sole unrivalled medicine for all sufferings, the holy source from which every happiness of migrators arises, the teachings of the Buddha Bhagawan, abide with praise and high regard for a long time, until the end of cyclic existence.

The words, In dependence on whatever virtue there is, refer to all the virtues one has ever accumulated. The text uses the analogy of a panacea – i.e. the sole unrivalled medicine for all suffering. The dedication thus infers that when one understands the profundity and the expansiveness of the teachings, and how they are a source for alleviating sufferings, Dharma is like an unrivalled medicine to end all the sufferings of sentient beings. In stating, the holy source from which every happiness of migrators arises, the aspiration is for the teachings of the Buddha Bhagawan to abide with praise and high regard until the end of cyclic existence.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama particularly recites this verse when consecrating new monasteries or temples. There are similar verses in the prayer Benefits of Constructing images of Maitreya, and few other verses proclaiming auspiciousness such as 'placing the victory banner in all directions'. These are some of the verses which are recited. I'm just giving you this extra bit of information to know how the verse is used during certain occasions.

3. PROSTRATING BY REMEMBERING KINDNESS

Prostrating by remembering kindness particularly refers to Manjushri, with whom Shantideva himself had close personal relationship, and relied upon as a guide and teacher. Remembering Manjushri's kindness is highlighted in the first two lines of the verse.

The verse reads:

- 58ab. *I prostrate to Manjushri,
Through whose kindness virtuous minds arise.*

The commentary explains:

I prostrate to the special virtuous teacher Manjushri, the empowering condition through whose kindness the meditation on bodhicitta and then training in the actions as well as the virtuous awareness to compose the treatise taking these as the subject, arose.

From this we can see that Shantideva in no way boasted that he composed this work by himself, but rather relied on his own virtuous teacher Manjushri. In accordance with the lam-rim, this point relates to relying on the virtuous friend or teacher. After stating, I prostrate to the special virtuous teacher Manjushri, the empowering condition (to compose the treatise) relates to the fact that any virtuous state of mind does not arise out of nowhere, but rather everything that arises has its own causes and empowering conditions. The empowering condition of the virtue arising from this composition, Shantideva states, is his virtuous teacher Manjushri. In explaining, through whose kindness the meditation on bodhicitta arose, the commentary indicates that the ability to meditate on bodhicitta also arises through the kindness of the virtuous teacher Manjushri. Then, having meditated on bodhicitta training in the actions means engaging in actions based on the bodhicitta mind also arises through the kindness of Manjushri. Then, the virtuous awareness to compose the treatise taking these as the subject, also arose through the kindness of Manjushri. What is being presented here is the need to remember the kindness of the virtuous teacher.

The second two lines of the verse refer to the actual prostration:

*58cd. I also prostrate to the virtuous teachers,
Through whom one develops.*

One section in the lam-rim outline pays special respect to the virtuous teacher by remembering their kindness. You can see that this verse definitely relates to that point in the lam-rim.

The commentary explains:

I also prostrate to the virtuous friend through whose kindness I was inspired to engage in the trainings and who gave strength for the virtuous side by generating the realisations of listening, contemplating, and meditating in my continuum.

As presented here, these are indications of how, when we take it as a personal instruction for our own practice, it is by remembering their kindness that one will naturally develop respect for one's teachers. We can all remember the time when we didn't have any understanding of the Dharma or how to practise it. Now, however, we have reached the level of having gained knowledge of the teachings and received instructions on how to practise. So, gradually our understanding has increased which is all due to the kindness of the virtuous teachers. By contemplating and thinking about that, naturally remembering the kindness of the gurus and the teachers will arise, which is followed by paying respect.

The commentary continues:

This last chapter explains elaborately the training in the generosity of giving away body, possessions, and roots of virtue for the purpose of others with the dedication taking as objects and transforming them with strong aspiration into the temporary and ultimate objectives of prayer. Since the training in generosity was also explained earlier, I did not write a separate chapter on generosity.

As explained here, this chapter explains elaborately the training in the generosity of giving away body, possessions, and roots of virtue for the purpose of others. As earlier stated, this is mentioned here specifically, with the dedication taking as objects and transforming them with strong aspiration into the temporary and ultimate objectives of one's aspiration or prayer. Since the training in generosity was also explained earlier, I did not write a separate chapter on generosity implies that it is included here in this last chapter. This next concluding verse is by Gyaltsab Rinpoche himself.

It reads:

Whatever virtue there is from listening, contemplating and meditating,
Whether it is the mere virtue of prostration or offering,
To make all virtues inexhaustible
And to increase them, I adorn them with dedication.
This is the condensed explanation.

Again, this passage reveals an essential instruction to take into our own practice. The commentary's author, Gyaltsab Rinpoche himself, says here that whatever virtue there is from listening, contemplating and meditating, that is, whatever time and energy one spends in listening to the Dharma, thinking about it and then meditating on it, whether it is the mere virtue of prostration or offering, which includes all other means for accumulating merit - such as doing prostrations and making offerings, the way to make all virtues inexhaustible so they do not dissipate or go to waste and to increase them, is to adorn them with dedication. This shows how it is really essential and significant to make dedications to ensure that one's virtues are not wasted, and for them to further increase.

As mentioned previously, whenever one accumulates virtue or merit, the way to secure them so they don't go to waste is by making a dedication. That is why we have the dedication at the end of every practice.

II. EXPLANATION OF THE NAME OF THE CHAPTER

As presented here:

This is at the tenth chapter of dedication of the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life.

The commentary reads:

This is the commentary on the tenth chapter called Thorough Dedication from The Introduction to the Bodhisattvas Way of Life, called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

The title The Entrance for the Children of the Conqueror is the the name Gyaltsab Rinpoche gave to his commentary.

THE MEANING OF THE END

There is a part at the end which has not been translated into English. It comes from under a heading used at the very beginning of the text, where it was the last of the four main headings.

This essentially explains who composed the text and who translated it.

This text is called Introduction to the Bodhisattvas Way of Life and is composed by the renowned master Shantideva, who was guided directly by Manjushri himself. Shantideva personally engaged in incredibly profound deeds of the bodhisattvas way of life, and in particular, having mastered the highest yoga tantra practices, obtained the state of Vajradhara.

So the treatise propounded by this great master is completed.

It was translated by the Indian abbot Sarvajnadeva and the translator Pal-tzeg, from a manuscript that comes from the Muslim continent.

This probably refers to Afghanistan. There were many great Buddhist scholars in Afghanistan at one time, and there are quite a lot of references to the masters who came from the Muslim continent. That is my assumption knowing that there have been great scholars from Afghanistan.

At one time Buddhism flourished in countries like Afghanistan, but now there seems to be little or no trace of any practitioners there. However through artefacts we can see very obvious signs in carvings of Buddhas etc. still in Afghanistan that prove the strong influence of Buddhism at one time. I don't have a clear understanding of how many artefacts still exist. You might know better yourselves.

This concludes the teaching on the explanations of the Bodhisattva's Way of Life which we can safely say went very well.

Now we can make a strong dedication, of the studies done together, with the recitation of the Tenth Chapter.

[Recitation]

For the next session I would like you to have a discussion on the two truths according to the four different schools of Buddhism. How the Vaibhashika assert the two truths, and the two truths according to the Sautrantika, the Cittamatra or mind-only school and then the Prasangika. How do they each assert the two truths? What are their points of distinction and so forth? This is something I had in mind previously, but didn't find the right time for you to have the discussion.

In terms of doing the teachings on the lam-rim Lamp on the Path, my intention is just to go over the meanings of the verses.

For your homework, in preparation for these teachings, I would like you to read the lam-rim texts which are translated in English. The lam-rim text begins with the small scope. When it comes to classifications of certain topics, I would ask you to check what the classifications of certain topics are so as I go through the verses we will relate them to the specific classifications presented in the lam-rim text.

My intention is to present the lam-rim as material for you to actually put into practice. The lam-rim teaching is essentially tailored for that. The small scope begins with relying on a virtuous teacher. The actual topics are then: a precious human rebirth; death and impermanence; karma and then refuge. They will be the main topics of the small scope.

So you read from the lam-rim text, then as we go through the verses, we can relate to those topics in the lam-rim.

For example, when we come to the first topic of the precious human rebirth, when the text indicates the eight freedoms, you will be the ones to tell me what the eight freedoms are and what the ten endowments are. This is something to be prepared from your side. Then as we go through the text, we will come to those types of lists such as death and impermanence. We will look at the benefits or the advantages of thinking about death and impermanence and also the disadvantages of not thinking about death and impermanence, and what the measure is of thinking about death and impermanence, or how to go about that. These are the classifications presented in the lam-rim, and something you can familiarise yourself with.

In fact, it is particularly essential to reflect upon the topic of death and impermanence in order for our practice to become a real and pure Dharma practice. Without recollecting death and impermanence, almost everything we do would just focus on this life, and our practice could not be a pure Dharma practice. When the focus is on this life's pleasures or this life's gains, then it is not a Dharma practice. These are essential points. As I also presented during the recent Easter course on The Three Principal Aspects of the Path, until one reverses clinging to this life, one has not really engaged in the practice of Dharma.

The verse itself says that a precious human life is difficult to find and that one does not have leisure time with that life. By contemplating this, the clinging to this life will be reversed. Understanding points like those explained in The Three Principals of the Path are essential and can be related back to the lam-rim teachings.

Indeed when one starts to reduce the clinging to and the grasping at this life, one's mind starts to become more joyous, more calm and happier. Otherwise, for as long as we have a strong clinging to this life, we will never be satisfied, and never content. No matter how much we try to gain, there is never a sense of contentment in one's mind.

I think that an example of those with external signs of discontentment are those with tattoos on their bodies. They begin with a small tattoo somewhere, and then it seems that they are not content with that and then they have to get a bigger tattoo, and then they get more tattoos covering all parts of their body. Then when all the other parts of their body are completely tattooed, they even start to tattoo their forehead and face! So I feel that clearly shows discontentment.

Then there are also accounts of someone owning three to four thousand pairs of shoes – another external sign of discontentment. Another instance I saw personally was when I was staying at a home in Perth owned by very rich woman whose father got rich in mining. Now she (Gina Rinehart) is a mining tycoon and has apparently made a lot of money. In any case, the father remarried a Filipino woman (Rose Hancock/Porteous). We were shown the house and there was a small room full of cosmetics! When I saw all that I felt it was a sign of discontentment. Perhaps a few would be okay, but a whole room full of cosmetics! All of those cosmetics didn't seem to have helped to beautify her body, and surely didn't stop her from ageing!

Then again on the other hand, I have seen well-known and apparently quite rich individuals wear very simple clothes and go around helping those who are poor. I see that that as a really a good sign. The money they would have saved on expensive clothing etc. is rather used to help the poor and the needy, and that is very noteworthy. When we see accounts like that, it can remind us how suffering is really the suffering of dissatisfaction. It is not the suffering of not having, but rather it is the suffering of dissatisfaction. Even if someone has things in abundance, they are still not happy.

I am just indicating here that the main topic of the small scope is an explanation of how to develop a disenchantment with the pleasures of this life, and thus overcome the clinging to and grasping at it. Then when the strong clinging to this life is reduced, even in this life itself one starts to experience the positive consequences of the mind being more relaxed and happier, not to mention the benefits in the future lives.

When we can understand these teachings, and how putting them into practice can begin to transform our mind, we can see how the actual practice of Dharma is a means to bring about a more genuinely happy mind now, and in future lives.

This reminds me of a remark made by a Mongolian abbot when he was abbot of the Gomang Monastery in Drepung. One time when I was visiting that monastery he was asking about the wellbeing of a prominent teacher Khensur Lobsang Wangchuk, who was indeed a great teacher and master. The Mongolian abbot asked me "How is Khensur Lobsang Wangchuk?" and I said "Oh, he is actually quite well". Then he replied to me "Indeed, he would be well whether he is sitting, whether he is moving about, wherever he is going, whatever he is doing he would be happy!".

The main point here is that as our mind becomes more subdued and naturally becomes happier, then whatever we do, on every account we will be more joyful. Of course in terms of this life it is a only certain number of years, but it is especially a good preparation for the time of our passing, at the time of death, when our mind could be much more joyful and more peaceful. We see these accounts occurring. So for the future life it will also be the best preparation.

Basically death and rebirth in an everyday experience is similar going to sleep and then waking up again. By going to sleep with a happy mind, it is more likely you will wake up with a happy mind.

There are accounts of prominent masters and teachers making remarks like "I have no hesitation for an old person in the evening to come back again as a young vibrant child in the morning". Even children appreciate this notion. When a mother was asked by her child "What happens when we die?" and responded with "Oh well, when we die we will just come back again", the young child remarked "Oh, how wonderful. That is very nice". This idea seems to give some solace that everything you know doesn't just disappear, but there is a continuation and you will come back. This is quite a comforting notion.

Then there are accounts of child prodigies where young children show great skills which usually would have taken years to learn. Without any teaching they spontaneously become great experts in, for example, playing the violin or playing the piano. Those who do not believe in past lives are astonished and wonder how this can be explained, whereas past lives easily explains it as a strong imprint from the past.

On TV recently a child of barely one year old was swimming like a fish with no fear of the water. By now he's probably a bit bigger, but he was swimming then under water with no hesitation and no fear. I don't know what you would relate it to but whenever I see accounts like this I think it's quite astonishing. There are many signs of what seem to be amazing things which are something to be learned about and something to know about.

For the discussion, could those of you who have resources bring them along because we can't expect the newer students to know where to find them or to have access to them. If you can bring those resources it would be good to share them or to show them during the discussion.

This approach will be good for teachings like the tenets, which I have presented previously. There is a particular tenet called The Precious Garland of Tenets which is quite a short text that has been translated to English. I think Geoffrey Hopkins has also translated the Changkya tenets by Changkya Rolpay Dorjee. Of course now in my old age I might not recall specific passages, but I have read it many times and it is really good text.

In my youth I memorised the whole lam-rim and its outline, and I was able to quote and recite it. Now, in my old age I may not be able remember it all, however in my youth I definitely made the effort to memorise many texts.
