When pointing out the path to others in India, it is considered rude and disrespectful to the other when you point with one finger, or just a few fingers. The proper way is to stretch out your full palm and show the way with your right hand. That is the gesture to adopt.

The next part of the explanation is that one does not wave unnecessarily with one's hand, as this would become excitement and be unconscientious. Instead wave your hand slightly. If one has to call someone, instead of shouting out loud or waving one's hand wildly, one should slightly snap one's finger, which will gain their attention. Otherwise one is too loud and becomes unrestrained.

1.3.3.3.1.3. How to do the action of sleeping

This explanation is precisely in accordance with the presentation in the Lam Rim teachings, but we can leave this for the next session. When done in a proper way sleeping is referred to as the yoga of sleeping, so even the act of sleeping can become a practice.

*Transcript prepared by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

16 September 2014

As usual we can spend some time in the regular meditation practice.

[Meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching, and put it into practice well.

1.3.3.3. PROTECTING SENTIENT BEING'S MINDS BY TRAINING IN THE ACTION OF NOT INCURRING FAULTS

1.3.3.3.1. Extensive explanation (cont.)

1.3.3.3.1.3. How to engage in the action of sleeping

The verse relating to this heading is:

96. *Sleep like the Protector, when he passed
Into parinirvana, in the desired direction.
Make sure from the start, with introspection
about
The thought of getting up quickly.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je gives this explanation of the meaning of the verse:

For sleeping, assume the position of the protector when he passed into parinirvana. Lie down on your right side, with your head in the desired direction, putting your left leg on your right leg, and your head into your right hand, and then sleep well covered with the cho-go.

At the time of sleep put your mind onto a virtuous object with mindfulness and introspection and adopt the recognition of brightness. Adopt from the start the mind that thinks, 'I shall rise quickly', and sleep with the thought, 'Tomorrow I shall practise the Dharma with the newly regenerated body'."

As the commentary explains, when we sleep our body should be in a position that is similar to that of protector, Lord Buddha Shakyamuni, in the aspect of passing into nirvana.

Depending on the direction that you wish to face (such as holy images on your altar), you lie down on your right side with your head in that direction and placed on top of your right hand. This lying position is also referred to as the sleeping lion position. The Lam Rim teachings give detailed explanations on the significance of adopting this sleeping posture, which emulates the fearlessness of a sleeping lion.

The commentary continues with the description, putting your left leg on your right leg, which is quite clear. Then, having positioned oneself in this manner, one sleeps covered with the cho-go, which is the upper yellow robe of the Sangha.

The main significance of placing oneself in this position, which is the position the Buddha adopted when he showed the aspect of passing into nirvana, is to remember death and impermanence. Of course, in actuality the Buddha is immortal, however he showed the aspect of passing into nirvana for the purpose of teaching death and impermanence to his disciples. So sleeping in this position is a reminder for us of death and impermanence. That is what we need to understand here. As Praise to Buddha Shakyamuni by Way of the Twelve Deeds, states:

To exhort the lazy to be quicker,
At the pure site of Kushinagar
You destroyed your deathless, vajra-like body
Entering nirvana—Homage to this deed.

This shows that entering this aspect of passing into nirvana was a way to exhort his disciples to enter into the Dharma. That is why the Buddha's sleeping position is described in this text.

When the commentary states At the time of sleep put your mind onto a virtuous object with mindfulness and introspection, it is advising us to recall the practice we have done during the day, as a way of not forgetting the virtuous object.

Next the commentary states that before going to sleep one makes that determination, 'I shall rise quickly'. Due to that determination one will be able to wake up at whatever time one has set. Indeed, when we develop the strong determination to wake up at a certain time in the morning, then we really don't require any alarm and will naturally wake up at that time. Following that determination to wake up early, one sets the motivation for the next day: 'After I wake up I will continue to engage in the practice of Dharma as a way to benefit sentient beings'. So in this way, prior to going to sleep one sets one's motivation for the next day.

If one goes to sleep with a virtuous mind and love and compassion in one's heart, and determines to wake up with an attitude of love and compassion, then it is most likely that one will wake up in that state of mind. Waking in a virtuous frame of mind would really be a wonderful way to start the next day. So sleeping, in itself, can be a virtuous activity. That is why, among the fifty-two mental factors, sleep is specifically included in the category of the changeable mental factors. If one has a virtuous mind prior to going to sleep then the whole period of sleep will be virtuous. Whereas if one has a negative mind prior going to sleep then that period will be a non-virtuous or negative state, and if the mind is neutral then sleep will be in a neutral state. Thus it is possible to turn sleep into a virtuous deed.

This is very practical advice. By remembering love and compassion before going to bed, if one sleeps for six hours for example, then during those six hours one will have gained the benefit of leaving the imprint of love and compassion on one's mind. It is quite unlikely that we will find the time during the day to spend six hours meditating just on love and compassion, so if we go to sleep with love and compassion on our mind, then that will ensure that our sleep becomes a really virtuous deed.

We can see how this advice ensures that even normal activities become a means to accumulate merit and virtue, and further develop our mind of love and compassion. As Shantideva advised earlier in the text, with the proper motivation we can turn normal activities such as eating and drinking into virtuous deeds. We can see that this advice is very pertinent for our practice in daily life. Other teachings give further explanations on the different states of sleep.

As indicated in the commentary, prior to going to sleep one should develop the intention: Tomorrow I shall practise the Dharma with a newly regenerated body. This indicates that one engages in the act of sleeping as a way to rejuvenate the body. When one goes to sleep with that intention it ensures that the sleep itself will be free from attachment. As indicated earlier, one of the offering prayers with the practice of eating is, 'I consume this food not merely for myself, but in order to sustain my body for the practice of Dharma'. Here sleep is being presented in the same way—with the proper motivation it actually becomes an aid to the practice of Dharma.

Thus we can see how, as indicated in the teachings, whatever actions the bodhisattva engages in are only a means to accumulate virtue. From the preliminary motivation, every aspect of normal activity is turned into the practice of Dharma as a means to accumulate virtue. This can inspire us to try to follow this example with our own motivations and intentions in daily life.

1.3.3.3.2. Summary

The verse relating to this is:

97. *Out of the immeasurable actions
Of bodhisattvas, that are taught,
Until you can definitely practise them,
Take up the trainings of the mind.*

Here Shantideva sums up the practices that have been presented under the heading, Protecting Sentient Being's Minds by Training in the Action of Not Incurring Faults.

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

If one is not able to practise all the immeasurable divisions of the bodhisattva actions of generosity and so forth that are taught in the sutras and their commentaries, then one should first only engage in the practices of training one's mind that were explained earlier, until one is definitely able to carry out all the infinite bodhisattva actions.

As explained here, the practices of generosity and the rest of the perfections as well as the practices of the four means of gathering disciples have immeasurable divisions, meaning that there are incredibly extensive ways of engaging in these practices. Thus they have immeasurable divisions, and these immeasurable divisions are extensively explained in the sutras and the commentaries.

The Tibetan word jong can either refer to training in virtue or purification. As I have explained previously, when the word jong is used in context of virtue then it means to train one's mind to increase virtue. When it is used in the context of negativity then it means training one's mind to purify negativities by applying the antidotes so as not to experience the negative results of negativity. In this context it refers to training one's mind to generate bodhicitta. The earlier chapters presented very detailed and particular advice on how to train one's mind to generate bodhicitta. Therefore as the commentary explains, one should first only engage in the practices of training one's mind, until one is definitely able to carry out all the infinite bodhisattva's actions. Once one has trained one's mind well and generated bodhicitta, and that has been developed thoroughly and firmly, then one will be able to carry out all the extensive bodhisattva practices prescribed in the teachings.

Again, this is very pertinent advice about how to first train one's mind to generate bodhicitta, and then gradually engage in the practices. If one were to attempt to engage in all the extensive practices explained in the teachings, before having established a thorough basis, then one would not be able to follow any particular practice through. This is very relevant to our state of mind now as well.

So this summarising verse is very significant. If the teachings explain the many different aspects of the practices and so forth, they may not seem personally relevant if they are not subsumed into succinct practical advice that one can apply now. The most practical approach is to distil it down to something that is manageable for beginners so that they can use it as a basis to further develop their mind, and then later be able to engage in further practices.

1.4. The method for perfecting the trainings

The actual training of how to actually perfect the practices that were described earlier has two subdivisions:

1.4.1. The extended explanation

1.4.2. Concluding summary

1.4.1. The extended explanation

This is subdivided into four

1.4.1.1. The methods for purifying the training

1.4.1.2. The basis for training

1.4.1.3. The purpose of the trainings

1.4.1.4. The basis for engaging into listening and contemplating

1.4.1.1. THE METHODS FOR PURIFYING THE TRAINING

If one were to transgress some of the commitments, then this section provides advice on the method for purifying these downfalls.

In explaining the meaning of the verse Gyalsab Je raises this doubt:

Query: What should one do if one incurs faults despite practising the trainings?

To explain the meaning of the verse, he first says:

If one has received a root downfall, then, as it is explained in the Compendium of Trainings,

Recall the bodhisattva Akasgarbha in front and engage in purification.

If one receives the small or medium contaminations, the forty-six faults and other faults explained in the Compendium of Trainings then,

98. *Recite the Sutra of the Three Heaps,
Three times in the morning and in the evening.
Pacify the remainders of downfalls
In dependence on conquerors and bodhisattvas.*

So this verse is explaining how to purify the faults of the small and medium contaminations in one's training.

Those of you who recite the Six Session Yoga will recall after listing the eighteen root downfalls of the bodhisattva vows, there is a list of the four conditions that are necessary to incur a breach of those vows. What are they?

Student: Not regarding these as detrimental; not forsaking the wish to repeat such behaviour; delighting and taking pleasure in them; having no shame or consideration.

What are the two that do not need any of these conditions in order to breach that commitment?

Student: Giving up bodhicitta and holding distorted views

So, if all four conditions are intact then any breach of the vows will be a great contamination. Here, the small or medium contaminations refers to breaches of the vows that do not have all four conditions intact. Thus if one receives the small or medium contamination refers to breaching any of the bodhisattva vows, but without all four conditions intact. If one has the mind of not regarding the transgression as detrimental, then, regardless of whether some of the other conditions are intact or not, it becomes a medium contamination, which is, in fact, quite a severe contamination. A small contamination is when either of the other three conditions are present, except for not regarding them as detrimental.

As I have mentioned previously the forty-six faults refers to breaches or downfalls of the bodhisattva vows. If there are either small or medium contaminations of those forty-six faults, or other faults as explained in the Compendium of Trainings, then one needs to engage in the purification as presented in the verse.

Gyaltsab Je presents the meaning of the verse:

...then one should confess three times in the day and three times at night, accumulate merits and recite the method to increase virtue and prevent it from being exhausted, i.e. the Sutra of the Three Heaps.

By taking refuge and in dependence on bodhicitta one pacifies the remaining downfalls with the four powers.

As the commentary explains, the way to purify these faults is by confessing them three times in the day and three times at night, and also engage in the means to accumulate merit. So this practice encompasses both confession and the means of accumulating merit. The way to increase virtue and prevent it from being exhausted is by engaging in the practice such as The Sutra of the Three Heaps, which is basically the Thirty-Five Buddhas' Confession Prayer.

As explained previously, the three heaps encompasses the heap of negativities, the heap of dedication and heap of rejoicing. By engaging in these practices one purifies both small and medium contaminations. This means that if one has not breached a commitment to the degree that it is a root downfall, then one can purify it through this practice. So this is a practice to purify minor breaches of the vows.

If one has actually broken the vows and incurred a root downfall, then one will have to apply the method of actually taking the vows again. Here, the text explains that by taking refuge and in dependence on bodhicitta, one pacifies the remaining downfalls with the four powers.

The first power, the power of reliance, is explicitly indicated here with taking refuge and generating bodhicitta. Then one applies the remaining three powers of the practice. This is the supreme method for purifying negativities. The four opponent powers were mentioned in detail in chapter two, so you can refer back to that. The main point presented here is that one needs to rely on these methods to purify the faults one has incurred through the breaches of one's commitments

1.4.1.2. BASIS FOR TRAINING

Here there are two verses, the first of which is:

99. *Whether from the point of view of self or other.
Whatever you do, on whatever occasion,
As taught, make it with effort
An occasion for the trainings.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Regardless of whether it is for the purpose of self or others, whatever action of body, speech and mind one engages in, and during whatever occasion, the Conqueror taught all of these as opportunities for practice.

One should always make an effort not to receive a fault of the trainings while using these different occasions for one's practice.

As the commentary explains, the Buddha taught that whatever the occasion may be, regardless of whether it is to accomplish one's own purpose or the purpose of others, and whatever actions one engages in through one's three doors of body, speech and mind, they are to be treated as an opportunity for practice. Using these different occasions for practice is really the basis of all the trainings one engages in.

In stating one should always make effort to not to incur a fault of the trainings, the commentary is saying that in order to make the training pure, one should ensure that one does not incur any faults when engaging in that training. Thus one should always make an effort not to incur any fault while engaging in the trainings. More specifically, the time when one engages in practice is the time when one needs to ensure that one does not incur a fault.

The second verse in relation to this heading reads:

100. *There is nothing the children of
The conquerors do not practise.
For those proficient who abide in this manner
There is nothing that does not become meritorious.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

There is no object of knowledge the bodhisattva children of the conquerors do not use for practice. For those that are proficient in training in all objects, there is no action that does not become meritorious. Therefore, one should never allow the generation of faithlessness.

As explained here, there is no object of knowledge the bodhisattva children of the conquerors do not use for practice, which is a point that was emphasised earlier. For the purpose of benefiting others, bodhisattvas may engage in various forms of practice, or acquire skills such as the five major sciences of arts and crafts, medicine, grammar, logic, and philosophy as a means to benefit other sentient beings. To some, these may appear as mundane practices, making it very easy to be critical of a bodhisattva who is engaged in these. As you will recall, Nagarjuna presented all of these five sciences, emphasising that they are needed for the purpose of helping others. The point being raised here is that for those that are proficient in training in all objects, there is no action that does not become meritorious. Therefore, one should never allow the generation of faithlessness, which causes one to lose faith in a bodhisattva.

Gyaltsab Je is emphasising the need to protect one's mind from losing faith in a bodhisattva's deeds, in the belief that they are engaging in some sort of mundane activity. We need to take this as a personal instruction. As it is hard for us to know who is actually a bodhisattva it is possible that we might generate a critical mind if we see someone engaging in some mundane activity, and thus incur the heavy negativity of criticising a bodhisattva. The author of the commentary, Gyaltsab Je, emphasises this point in many of his other teachings. We need to be very careful about being critical of others, particularly of those who are engaging in various activities to benefit other beings.

1.4.1.3. THE PURPOSE OF THE TRAININGS

Here there are two sub-headings

1.4.1.3.1. Dedicating the virtue for the welfare of all sentient beings

1.4.1.3.2. Never give up the Mahayana spiritual friend and the training

1.4.1.3.1. Dedicating the virtue for the welfare of all sentient beings

The verse relating to this reads:

101. *Regardless of whether it is directly or indirectly
Do nothing but work for the purpose of sentient beings.
Solely for the purpose of sentient beings
I dedicate all to enlightenment.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Whether it is directly or indirectly for the welfare of sentient beings, always act for their welfare, and in no other way. Dedicate all virtues towards enlightenment, solely for the purpose of sentient beings.

As explained in the commentary, whether engaged directly or indirectly, bodhisattvas are always engaged in acts of benefiting other sentient beings. Whatever activities they engage in are for the benefit of other sentient beings, and they do not engage in any activity other than that. That summarises the activities of bodhisattvas—they are always for the benefit of other sentient beings. They then dedicate the virtues of those deeds towards enlightenment, solely for the purpose of sentient beings.

The very beginning of generating the altruistic mind of bodhicitta itself is for the benefit of sentient beings; the middle of engaging in the practices such as the six perfections is for the benefit of sentient beings; and then the ultimate goal of achieving enlightenment is also for the benefit of sentient beings. Therefore whatever activities bodhisattvas engage in are dedicated towards achieving ultimate enlightenment for the purpose of benefiting sentient beings.

Reflecting upon the bodhisattvas' deeds as being solely for the benefit of sentient beings—at the beginning, in the middle and at the end, the very achievement of enlightenment—inspires us to practise similarly. Setting the right motivation at the very beginning of the practice, engaging in the practice itself, and dedicating it at the end, making sure that it is intact, is a fruitful and purposeful practice. It is good to recall the example of the bodhisattvas' deeds to ensure that our actions are meaningful and purposeful.

1.4.1.3.2. Never give up the Mahayana spiritual friend and the training

The first section encompasses the qualities of a virtuous spiritual friend. The verse relating to this is:

102. *The constant virtuous friend is one who
Is proficient in the meaning of the Mahayana,
And never gives up even at the cost of their life,
The supreme bodhisattva disciplines.*

Here the Bodhisattvacharyavatara is presenting the qualities of the Mahayana guru or spiritual friend.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

The constant Mahayana virtuous friend is one who is an expert in all of the great Mahayana teachings as well as those who abide in the Mahayana vows, and the supreme Mahayana austerities and do not give them up even at the cost of their life.

The main point is that the qualities of the Mahayana virtuous friend are that they are skilled in all of the Mahayana treatises, as well as abiding in the Mahayana vows, the supreme Mahayana austerities, and do not give them up at the cost of their life. Such are the qualities of the Mahayana spiritual friend, presented here in brief.

1.4.1.4. THE BASIS FOR ENGAGING IN LISTENING AND CONTEMPLATING

There are two subdivisions:

1.4.1.4.1. Training in dependence on sutras

1.4.1.4.2. Training in dependence on the commentaries

1.4.1.4.1. Training in dependence on sutras

Here there are two lines of verse

103ab. *Emulate the biography of Shrisambava
In the training of relying on the guru.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

From the life story of Shrisambava in the Array of Stalks Sutra,

The way of relying on the teacher: Child of good family, the bodhisattvas who are perfectly guided by virtuous friends will not fall into the lower realms.

One should train according to how it is explained extensively in this sutra.

This explains that the sutras confirm that bodhisattvas who are perfectly guided by virtuous friends will not fall into the lower realms.

This indicates that those who rely on a virtuous friend without breaking their commitments will not fall into the lower realms. So the advice here is one should train as explained extensively in the sutras.

Of course, there are more extensive explanations on the ten different ways of relying on a spiritual friend in the Lam Rim teachings.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

23 September 2014

As usual we can spend some time in our meditation practice. [meditation]

You can generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching, and put it into practise well.

1.4.1.4. THE BASIS FOR ENGAGING IN LISTENING AND CONTEMPLATING

Having presented the qualities of a Mahayana spiritual friend, the text then presents the basis on which to engage in perfecting the trainings in two subdivisions:

1.4.1.4.1. Training in dependence on sutras

1.4.1.4.2. Training in dependence on the commentaries

1.4.1.4.1. Training in dependence on sutras

This section is covered two verses:

103. *Emulate the biography of Shrisambava
In the training of relying on the guru
Understanding this and other advice by the buddhas,
Through reading the sutras.*

104. *The sutras generate understanding of the trainings
Therefore read the sutras.
First, read the
Sutra of the Essence of Space.*

We covered the meaning of the first two lines last week. In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of the remaining six lines thus:

Furthermore, the points of advice from this treatise and other advice taught by the Buddha should be understood by reading the Mahayana sutras.

One should read the sutras because in them the trainings are explained extensively. Specifically, those that have generated the engaging vows should read first of all the Sutra of the Superior Essence of Space.

When the commentary states the points of advice from this treatise, it is referring to the biography of Shrisambava, which gives advice on how to rely on a spiritual friend. We covered that last week. Relying on other advices taught by the Buddha, refers to the advice given in the sutras on the bodhisattva trainings, which should be understood by reading the Mahayana sutras. So one needs to read and familiarise oneself with the Mahayana sutras in order to understand the advice on how to train in the bodhisattva practices.

The commentary then explains, one should read the sutras because in them the trainings are explained extensively. This is also very clear so I don't think it needs any further clarification.

As further explained, specifically, those that have generated the engaging vows should read first of all the Sutra of the Superior Essence of Space, which has extensive explanations of the bodhisattva vows. This sutra identifies the eighteen root downfalls of the bodhisattva vows, and how transgressions of those vows are incurred. It also explains very extensively how to purify each of those transgressions. As indicated in the commentary, one should refer to these explanations from the very beginning so as to avoid transgressing these vows, and also to learn how to purify any transgressions of those vows if they were to incur.

Those of us who have taken the bodhisattva vows need to take this as personal advice. It is not sufficient to take the vows and then just sit back and relax. Rather, one needs to endeavour to really understand the eighteen root downfalls, and how to purify them if one were to transgress them. It is very important that we really familiarise ourselves with the bodhisattva vows and the advice on how to avoid any transgressions. While you may not have access to a translation of the Sutra of the Superior Essence of Space, you do have access to the many texts and commentaries that explain the bodhisattva vows, what the transgressions are and so forth. So it is important to become familiar with them. Also, as presented earlier, if the transgression is a small or medium contamination, then one purifies it by reciting the Thirty-five Buddhas Confession Prayer with the four powers intact.

1.4.1.4.2. Training in dependence on the commentaries

There are two verses relating to this heading, the first of which reads:

105. *Since that which one practises continuously
Is shown even more extensively
In the Compendium of Trainings, one must
Read it repeatedly as well.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Those that train and practise should also study repeatedly the Compendium of Trainings, where it explains extensively in thirty-two aspects how to give, protect, purify and increase one's body, possessions, and roots of virtue.

When the commentary explains those that train and practice should also study repeatedly the Compendium of Trainings it is referring to another text by Shantideva, in which he explains very extensively the ways and means of engaging in the bodhisattva trainings. His Holiness the Dalai Lama has presented teachings on the Compendium of Trainings on a number of occasions. If you have access to any translations of it in English, it would be good to read them.

The Compendium of Trainings has an extensive explanation of the thirty-two aspects of how to give, protect, purify and increase one's body, possessions and roots of virtue.

One engages in the practice of giving one's body at the appropriate time, and as well as engaging in mental training on giving one's body for the benefit of others. One also has to engage in the practice of protecting it, as we need our body for achieving higher purposes. Thus we need to understand the proper contexts for both giving and protecting one's body. We need to purify our body to ensure our generosity is not soiled with negativities, or by any physical defects that would hinder our practice. Then we need to increase our virtue, by accumulating the appropriate causes to continuously obtain a body that is endowed with the eight ripened qualities in future lifetimes.

Just as there are the four practices of giving, protecting, purifying and increasing with respect to one's body, the same practices are applied to giving one's possessions.

The practice of being generous with one's virtue refers, for example, to dedicating one's virtue to the welfare of others. Protecting virtue refers to protecting whatever virtue one has accumulated from being destroyed by anger. Purifying means ensuring that the virtue is not soiled or stained with self-interest for the sake of this life, or even a future life. If one were to accumulate virtue just for the mere intention of protecting oneself from the lower realms, then that would be accumulating virtue out of self-interest. Rejoicing in one's virtues is the way to increase one's virtue.

With reference to the thirty-two aspects of giving, protecting, purifying, and increasing, there are four aspects of giving the body, four aspects of giving possessions and four aspects of giving virtue, making up twelve aspects of the perfection of generosity. We can also apply these four aspects to the remaining perfections of morality, patience, joyous effort and so forth. That makes twenty aspects, making thirty-two aspects in all.

The four aspects of giving are specifically explained in Liberation in the Palm of your Hand, and you can relate that to all the perfections. As you have easy access to the English translation it would be good for you to take the initiative to read it for yourselves. Next time I might quiz you on whether you've checked it out or not.

This also applies to any explanations in texts that have been translated in English; you need to take the initiative to actually refer to those texts and read their presentation. That is how you will benefit from my reference to them. If I mention a text and you think "OK, it must have been mentioned there" and just leave it at that, then you will not derive the benefit of understanding the topic in greater detail.

As a personal instruction, it is good to try to recall these four aspects of giving, protecting, purifying and increasing whenever we engage in any practice. For example, whenever we accumulate virtue or purify negative karma, it is good to relate that practice to these four aspects.

The next verse in this section of the text reads:

*106. Or, read at least the Compendium of Sutras
Which summarises, and
Put also effort into reading the second one
Composed by Nagarjuna.*

As Gyalsab Je explains in his commentary:

If one is not able to do this, then one should read at least the Compendium of Sutras, composed by the master himself, and the second one composed by Nagarjuna, which summarise the sutras.

If one is not able to do this, refers to not being able to relate to the extensive explanations presented in the Compendium of Trainings. That being the case, one should at least read the Compendium of Sutras, which is also composed by the master himself, indicating Shantideva. And the second one composed by Nagarjuna, refers to another commentary of same name, Compendium of Sutras, which was composed by Nagarjuna, in which the meaning of the sutras is summarised.

Basically the advice is to refer to these texts on the bodhisattva vows: the Compendium of Trainings, or if that is too extensive, the Compendium of Sutras, or the text with the same name that was composed by Nagarjuna.

1.4.2. Concluding summary

The verse relating to this reads:

*107. That which has not been prohibited
Should be practised.
To protect the minds of worldly beings,
Practise correctly upon seeing the trainings.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

One should abandon that which has been prohibited in the sutras and commentaries and one should practise that which has not been prohibited. The purpose is to protect the minds of the worldly beings and prevent the generation of faithlessness. To this end one should, upon recognising the trainings of a bodhisattva, practise them and train in them.

This is a very clear presentation of the distinction between what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded. Put succinctly, one should abandon that which is prohibited or forbidden in the sutras and commentaries.

If one is uncertain as to what one should abandon, then refer to the sutras and the commentaries that explain what is forbidden, and which therefore should be abandoned. If the text states 'This act is forbidden', then the practice is to avoid engaging in that forbidden action. The teachings also present the practices that one should engage in, or adopt. This is how, by relying on the sutras and the commentaries, one makes the distinction between what is to be abandoned, and what is to be adopted.

Yet all too often we seem to adopt what has been forbidden in the sutras, and abandon what has not been forbidden! Out of confusion we ordinary beings actually adopt the opposite of what the sutras and commentaries advise. Here we are being advised to change our approach, and to gain a clear understanding of what is to be abandoned and what is to be adopted.

Furthermore, as explained here in the commentary, the purpose of engaging in this practice is to protect the minds of the worldly beings as a way to prevent the generation of faithlessness in ordinary or worldly beings, which means to protect their mind from losing faith in the Dharma.

2. CONCLUDING SUMMARY SHOWING THAT ONE HAS TO PRACTISE THE MEANING AND NOT JUST THE WORDS

This is subdivided into two:

- 2.1. Guard always with mindfulness and introspection
- 2.2. The actual meaning

2.1. Guard always with mindfulness and introspection

The relevant verse reads:

108. Investigate repeatedly during Actions of body and mind.

*Merely this, in brief,
Is the definition of introspection.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Investigate repeatedly, while engaging in the actions of body, speech and mind, with the wisdom that can distinguish between having transgressed the training or not and neutral actions, and whether or not one has fallen under the control of the afflictions.

This alone is in brief the definition of not degenerating introspection.

This is very pertinent advice, which, of course, I also emphasise regularly in my teachings. Its relevance for our daily life and practice cannot be underestimated. As presented here very clearly, we need to investigate our actions of body, speech and mind repeatedly at the time of those actions. In other words, we need to maintain constant mindfulness throughout all our actions.

Check whether any physical action is virtuous, non-virtuous or neutral, and whether it is in line with the trainings or not. Likewise, check whether your speech is virtuous, non-virtuous or neutral and whether one is transgressing the trainings. Do the same with the mind. We need to conduct a constant dialogue with our mind, always being vigilant of our actions of body, speech and mind.

This, in brief, is the definition of not degenerating introspection, which means maintaining our introspection, and not allowing it to degenerate. This act of investigating our body, speech and mind throughout all activities is called introspection, and we should not allow it to degenerate.

In summary, the main point being presented here is that we need to be constantly vigilant about our state of mind in all our actions and activities. As presented earlier, one way to check whether one's physical, verbal or mental actions are virtuous or not is by acquainting oneself with the explanations in the teachings. If we are engaging in something that is forbidden then it is a non-virtuous action; if we are engaging in something that is not forbidden, or something that is encouraged, then that is a virtuous action; if actions are not specified in the teachings as needing to be adopted or to be discarded, then they are considered to be neutral.

2.2. The actual meaning

The relevant verse is:

109. *They all have to be practised with the body.
What is accomplished by only talking about it?
Is the sick person cured
Merely by studying medicine?*

The first part of the explanation in the commentary reads:

Having understood these points and the need for them to be practised, one needs to put them into practise accordingly with this body. Without practice, merely by reciting many lists, what purpose will one achieve? None whatsoever! For example, is a person cured merely by studying the instructions on the medicine? No, they are not.

As explained in the commentary, they all have to be practised with the body, means that these points actually have to be put into practice. It is not enough to merely know about them—one should actually engage in practising them.

As further explained in the commentary, if one merely recites many lists or quotes from many texts and so forth, but without practising what they advise, then what purpose will one achieve? This is a rhetorical question, and the answer 'none whatsoever' indicates that there is no purpose at all.

In response to the lines from the root verse, What is accomplished by only talking about it? Is the sick person cured merely by studying medicine? the commentary explains that when a patient is prescribed a medication, they have to actually take the medication in order to be cured. It is not sufficient for them to merely read the instructions on how to take the medicine—that won't help to cure them.

Gyaltsab Rinpoche goes on to say:

In brief, although there are the three types of morality, it is important to initially train in the morality of restraint, either by actually adopting the rules of individual liberation or those which are in common with them ...

As presented here, there are the three types of morality, and it is important to initially train in the morality of restraint, which means not committing misdeeds. One practises the morality of restraint by adopting the rules of individual liberation, or those which are in common with those vows. As I have indicated many times in previous teachings, morality serves as the basis of all other practices. Without sound morality, one will not be able to accomplish any other more advanced practices. So the self-liberation vows are the very foundation on which to take and observe the bodhisattva vows, as well as the tantric vows. Refraining from the ten non-virtuous deeds is common to all three sets of vows. As I have indicated previously, protecting oneself from the seven misdeeds of body and speech is the basis for refraining from many other misdeeds. In other words, when you apply the practice of refraining from the seven non-virtuous deeds of body and speech, you will naturally refrain from many other misdeeds. Thus the morality of restraint serves as the basis for other practices.

Next the commentary presents the reason why it is essential to practise the morality of restraint:

...for if one protects them, then the others will also be protected, if one does not protect them then the others will also not be protected. If the morality of restraint degenerates, then all vows degenerate, as explained in the Compendium.

This directly relates to our own practice, and so it is a personal instruction.

As Gyaltsab Je further mentions:

If one thinks that the vows of individual liberation belong to the hearers and practises the trainings of bodhisattvas apart from them, then that is a great fault. One should train in the morality of restraint that abandons the natural non-virtues and is the basis for the morality of accumulating virtue and benefiting sentient beings. One should rely repeatedly on restraint to the opposing conditions of morality, and practise it in conjunction with the six perfections.

This is all quite clear. The morality of restraint should be practised in conjunction with the six perfections.

Moreover, each of the perfections can be practised in conjunction with the rest of the six perfections. Thus there is the generosity of generosity, the generosity of ethics, the generosity which is practised in conjunction with patience, joyous effort and so forth. Of course I have presented this many, many times previously but I'm not sure if you have retained it. I'm not implying that you don't have the understanding, rather I say this as a way to refresh your memory, to remind you that you do have the knowledge of these topics presented in earlier teachings.

Summarising Verse

Gyalsab Je ends his commentary on this particular chapter with this summarising verse, in which he very succinctly mentions the essence of this whole practice.

The person taking the essence
Of practising the sequence of the path of the three kinds of beings,
Depends on protecting mindfulness and introspection.
Hence they should always endeavour to be proficient
in these.

As mentioned very clearly, taking the essence of practising the sequence of the path of the three kinds of beings—which are the practices in conjunction with the small scope; practices in conjunction with the medium scope and the great scope—depends upon protecting mindfulness and introspection at all times. Therefore one should endeavour to completely understand, be proficient, and have full knowledge of introspection and mindfulness.

II THE NAME OF THE CHAPTER

The final outline that concludes the chapter is a presentation of the name of the chapter. The root text reads:

This is the fifth chapter of Introduction to the Action of Bodhisattvas called Protecting Introspection.

Gyalsab Je's commentary concludes:

This is the commentary on the fifth chapter called Protecting Introspection from the commentary on the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

That concludes the fifth chapter.

To explain the context of the next chapter we need to return to the subdivisions introduced in chapter 1.¹

2. The actual explanation of the stages of the path

2.2. The method for taking the essence

2.2.2. Explaining the individual meanings²

2.2.2.2. THE WAY OF TRAINING IN THE PRACTICES OF GENERATING THE TWO MINDS

2.2.2.2.2. The Way of Training in the Actions, the Perfections

2.2.2.2.2.1. The way of meditating on conscientiousness, the limb preventing the degeneration of the training in the mind of enlightenment³

2.2.2.2.2.2. Explaining the way of training in morality, by relating it to introspection and mindfulness, the methods for keeping virtuous dharmas pure⁴

2.2.2.2.2.3. Explaining the way of training in the remaining four perfections:

This is subdivided into four:

2.2.2.2.2.3.1. The way of training in patience

2.2.2.2.2.3.2. The way of training in enthusiasm

2.2.2.2.2.3.3. The way of training in the common and uncommon mental stabilisations that are contained in calm abiding

2.2.2.2.2.3.4. Training in the nature of superior insight—wisdom

CHAPTER 6: THE WAY OF TRAINING IN PATIENCE⁵

There are two parts to the chapter.

I. Explaining the text of the chapter

II. The name of the chapter

I. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

There are two main subdivisions of the explanation:

1. Meditating on patience earnestly by eliminating the obstacles to establishment and abiding

2. Applying to the mind the methods to establish patience

1. Meditating on patience earnestly by eliminating the obstacles to establishment and abiding

This has two subdivisions:

1.1. The faults of anger

1.2. The benefits of patience

1.1. The faults of anger

This is subdivided into three:

1.1.1. The unobservable faults

1.1.2. The observable faults

1.1.3. A summary of the faults

1.1.1. The unobservable faults

Here there are two subdivisions:

1.1.1.1. Anger destroys one's roots of virtue

1.1.1.2. Discerning the faults of anger and the benefits of patience and making an effort to meditate on patience.

1.1.1.1. ANGER DESTROYS ONE'S ROOTS OF VIRTUE.

In our next sessions we can go through the first verse under this heading.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright

Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

¹ See the teaching of 26 March 2013.

² Introduced in the teaching of 2 July 2013.

³ Covered in chapter 4, introduced on 25 February 2014.

⁴ Covered in chapter 5, introduced on 20 May 2014.

⁵ The numbering recommences with the new chapter.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

30 September 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

The sixth chapter, which we are about to start, explains the antidote to anger, beginning with:

1.1. The faults of anger

1.1.1. The unobservable faults

1.1.1.1. ANGER DESTROYS ONE'S ROOTS OF VIRTUE

Generally, understanding the relevance of practising patience is said to be developed when one contemplates the disadvantages of anger. So the more we contemplate the disadvantages of anger, the more we will see the need to practise patience. I have presented the definition of anger previously, so I need not go into it again as you can refer to that earlier explanation.¹ It may also be presented later in the chapter.

Anger destroys the roots of virtue is to be understood as explaining that basically, anger obstructs that which brings about a pleasant result, which is virtue.

The first verse of the chapter reads:

1. *All the wholesome actions
Of generosity and offerings to the tathagatas,
Built up over a thousand eons,
Are destroyed by anger.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads as follows:

Since anger is the ultimate obstacle to the generation and abiding of virtuous dharmas in one's continuum, one should initially meditate on the faults of anger, and then consequently strive to abandon anger.

One instance of anger at a bodhisattva destroys from the root all the virtues arising from generosity accumulated over one hundred and one thousand eons, as well as all the wholesome actions of having made offerings to the Three Jewels such as the tathagatas, wholesome actions of meditating and morality.

As presented here, anger is the ultimate obstacle to the generation and abiding of virtuous dharmas in one's continuum. This is a significant point. The ultimate obstacle for the initial generation of virtue is anger, which means that when anger arises it obstructs the ability to actually generate virtue. Moreover, if one has already accumulated some virtue, then anger will prevent that virtue from abiding and remaining in our mental continuum. So anger is really the main obstacle to both accumulating and retaining virtue. We need to regard these significant points as a personal instruction.

Indeed, no-one is happy when they are angry. The more anger someone has in their mind, the less peace they will experience. So the more we reflect on the disadvantages of anger, the more likely it is that we will be able to prevent anger from taking root in our mind. In the event that we do become angry, then reflecting on the disadvantages of anger will help to reduce the intensity of that anger. So the advice presented here is really great personal advice for us.

The commentary then explains that one should initially meditate on the faults of anger, and strive to abandon anger. This means contemplating again and again the faults of anger. From our own experience we know that from the moment anger arises in our mind we feel unhappy and unsettled. We really need to reflect on these experiences and understand how anger actually affects us.

As further explained in the commentary, one instance of anger at a bodhisattva destroys all virtues. It is explained in other teachings that this relates mainly to an intense form of anger. Thus, even an instant of such intense anger will destroy all the virtues arising from generosity accumulated over one hundred and one thousand eons, as well as the wholesome actions of having made offerings to the Three Jewels, such as tathagatas. This means that whatever virtues one has accumulated from wholesome actions of offerings to the Three Jewels, or from taking refuge in the Three Jewels and so forth, as well as the wholesome actions of meditating and practising morality, is destroyed in a moment of intense anger. Thus the virtues that arise from these three main actions of positive deeds such as making offerings, meditating and morality, will be destroyed in an instant of intense anger. When the commentary refers to destroying virtue from its root, it is to be understood that this does not mean that anger completely destroys the actual root of virtue itself. Rather, it significantly postpones the pleasant results of virtue, which will be experienced much later in the future. This is explained in other teachings.

Then Gyaltsab Je goes on to say:

Not only this, but in a quote used by the Sarvastivadin², and which is cited in the Compendium of Trainings, it says that if a fully ordained monk humiliates a companion in the pure trainings, then he has destroyed the merit equalling the merit of being reborn as a thousandfold wheel-turning king for as many times as the particles one covers, down to the golden wheel, with one's body when prostrating. This merit is accumulated when one makes a prostration to a stupa that contains the hair or nails of the Buddha.

As explained in the commentary, the merits that one accumulates from prostrations is to be reborn as a thousandfold wheel-turning king for as many times as the particles one covers, down to the golden wheel, with one's body when prostrating. This is a description of the depth and breadth, from the surface down, of the particles that are covered when one prostrates. As explained in the treatises, the golden wheel marks the end of the earth. Of course, that is something that cannot be seen or proven scientifically.

But then again, have there not been cases in recent times showing that not being seen, even with scientific means, doesn't necessarily mean that there is nothing there? We can take the recent example of the disappearance of the Malaysian Airlines plane. Despite all the searching by so many countries they were not able to find the plane or debris anywhere. But not being able to find it doesn't mean that it doesn't exist. Despite all the modern instruments it has not yet been found, so it seems that scientists are not able to find everything that exists.

¹ See, for example the teaching of 27 February 2007.

² Those That Assert That All Exists—a school of Buddhism.

In any case, the main point here is that the merit one obtains from doing prostrations is that one will create the cause to be reborn as a thousandfold wheel-turning king—a universal monarch—as many times as the particles that one's body covers when prostrating. However this merit can be destroyed when one humiliates, criticises or becomes angry with a companion in the pure training. A companion in pure training doesn't necessarily have to be a bodhisattva, so becoming angry with pure practitioners can also destroy one's accumulated virtues.

What we can derive here as a personal instruction is that even though we put an effort into accumulating virtues with practices such as prostrations and meditating, that merit can be destroyed in a moment of anger. There are those who have commented that while they can adopt a seemingly calm and composed mind during meditation, the moment they go out into the world again they soon become upset and angry once more. That is the point being addressed here: we need to be very mindful and careful to ensure that we don't destroy the merit from our positive deeds by becoming angry.

At this point we can also recall the great benefits of dedication. As explained in the teachings, if, after we have accumulated a certain amount of virtue, we immediately dedicate it to the ultimate goal of enlightenment, then that will protect one's virtues from being destroyed by anger. The analogy that is presented to illustrate this is that when a drop of water falls into an ocean it merges with that ocean, and we cannot say that it has evaporated until the whole ocean has evaporated. Similarly, when one dedicates one's virtues to the ultimate goal of enlightenment for the benefit of other sentient beings, then that merit will not be exhausted. It is also explained that one can partake of the benefits of that virtue. The more we experience the positive virtues, the more we will continue to experience their positive benefits. I have explained this in detail previously. So dedicating one's virtues is also another means of protection.

Also, as presented previously, one of the most powerful antidotes for anger is, of course, meditating on emptiness. The realisation of emptiness is the ultimate antidote that protects one from anger.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

It is taught that the anger that destroys the virtue of one hundred or one thousand eons has to be directed at a bodhisattva, which is also taught in the Introduction to the Middle Way. The statement in the beginning of the chapter on the four resting places in the Great Commentary on the Vinaya, says that anger destroys one's vows, clearly refers to the fact that strong anger destroys one's roots of virtue.

This is quite clear. The commentary then states:

Further, since it is also stated in the Blaze of Reasoning that wrong views and harmful intent destroy one's roots of virtue, one should strive, among other things, to contain one's anger.

Blaze of Reasoning, composed by Bhavaviveka, states that it is not only anger that destroys one's root of virtue, but wrong views can do the same. Holding onto wrong views can also destroy one's roots of virtue. This is explained very clearly in that treatise.

The main point here is that one should strive to contain or control one's anger for these reasons. Of course more detailed explanations about the faults of anger and benefits of patience and so forth can be found in the Lam Rim teachings. So you can also refer to those explanations.

1.1.1.2. DISCERNING THE FAULTS OF ANGER AND THE BENEFITS OF PATIENCE, MAKE AN EFFORT TO MEDITATE ON PATIENCE

As presented here, the supreme means to overcome anger is to discern the faults of anger and contemplate the benefits of patience.

The sequence of this presentation is really very practical because without seeing its faults there will be no initiative to overcome anger. Furthermore, if one does not see the benefit of practising patience, then there will be no impetus to develop patience. So discerning the faults of anger and meditating on patience are crucial.

The verse relating to this outline is:

2. *There is no negativity like hatred,
There is no austerity like patience,
Therefore meditate on patience
In earnest in various ways!*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

There is no negativity like anger for obstructing the generation of the path and destroying virtue, and there is no austerity like patience for destroying the painful heat of the afflictions. Therefore meditate on patience in earnest in a variety of ways and methods!

This presentation is similar to that in the Lam Rim. In saying, There is no negativity like anger for obstructing the generation of the path and destroying virtue, the commentary is indicating that anger has two fundamental disadvantages.

The first is that it will hinder the ripening of the positive consequences of virtue. We all want to experience the positive consequences of the virtue that we have accumulated, and anger prevents the actualisation of those positive consequence.

The second is that the moment anger arises, it generates the causes to experience negative ripened consequences, such as being reborn in the hell realm, or one of the other unfortunate realms. Just as we want to experience happiness, we don't want to experience any kind of negative consequences. However, the moment anger arises it establishes the causes for unwanted experiences.

When we contemplate these two disadvantages then we can begin to get a sense of the gravity of the consequences of anger. Of course, there are many different kinds of negativities, but there is no greater negativity than hatred or anger.

Further, as explained in the commentary, there is no austerity like patience for destroying the painful heat of the afflictions. Here the misery of the afflictions is likened to the physical pain of experiencing extreme heat. This analogy illustrates the extent of the mental misery and anguish that one experiences from the afflictions.

This misery is overcome by the practice of patience, and as the commentary states, there is no austerity like patience. This is a very significant point. As you will recall, patience is classified into the patience of willingly enduring difficulties and hardships, and the patience of not retaliating when harm is inflicted by others. Hardships can arise from external problems and difficulties, and more particularly from one's practices. So willingly enduring and accepting hardships and harm is indeed a great practice of austerity.

Therefore, as the commentary states, meditate on patience as a prelude to all the different methods of applying patience that will be presented later on in this chapter using logical reasons and so forth. So having contemplated these points one must strive to meditate in earnest to practise patience. Earnest in a variety of ways and methods includes the different classifications of patience mentioned earlier, as well as the various techniques and reasons and so forth.

1.1.2. The observable faults

Having considered the unobservable faults of anger, we now turn to the observable faults of anger. These are faults which we can immediately relate to, as we can see them in our life right now.

Observable faults are subdivided into two:

1.1.2.1. Anger takes away the opportunity for physical and mental wellbeing

1.1.2.2. It turns away friends and so forth

We have all experienced the effects of intense anger on our physical health and mental wellbeing, and we also know how anger turns away friends and so forth.

1.1.2.1. ANGER TAKES AWAY THE OPPORTUNITY FOR PHYSICAL AND MENTAL WELLBEING

Basically this heading is stating that anger robs us of opportunity for either physical or mental wellbeing. The verse relating to this outline reads:

3. *If one holds the painful mind of hatred
Then one's mind will not experience peace.
One will not attain joy or bliss,
Sleep will be elusive and there will be no stability.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Since it generates intense suffering, if one holds the pain-like mind of anger, one cannot experience the joy of having pacified mental suffering. One will also not attain mental joy or physical bliss, sleep will be elusive and the stability of a mind abiding in its natural state will be non-existent.

Pain-like mind of anger indicates that while anger does not produce actual physical suffering, the mental anguish generated by anger is equated to intense physical suffering. So, if one holds the pain-like mind of anger one cannot experience the joy of having pacified mental suffering. Because of the anguish of anger, one cannot experience the joy of having overcome mental suffering.

As indicated earlier, anger robs us of any sense of joy or happiness, meaning that we will not have the opportunity to have a mind that has pacified mental suffering. This means that when we experience mental anguish and suffering there is a lack of joy and happiness in our mind. As a consequence, one will also not attain mental joy or physical bliss. The point here is that because of the lack of mental happiness, one will not experience any physical wellbeing as well, and thus sleep and so forth will be elusive.

Furthermore, the stability of the mind abiding in its natural state will be non-existent.

1.1.2.2. IT TURNS AWAY FRIENDS AND SO FORTH

This heading refers to the fact that intense anger turns away friends and so forth, and is covered in the next one and a half verses.

4. *Even those who became dependent on
The offerings of wealth and honour
Will rise up and kill
The malevolent lord.*
- 5ab. *Friends will get disgusted,
Even those gathered with generosity will leave.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of these verses thus:

Even those that have become dependent on the extended offerings of wealth and honour will rise up and kill the malevolent lord. Anger will also exasperate friends and cause them to be disgusted. It will also disrupt the affection of those who were gathered with generosity. Therefore one should abandon anger.

The commentary explains that even those dependent on the extended offerings of wealth and honour will rise up and kill a lord who is infested with hatred or anger. Those who are dependent on a lord or master who provides them with all their basic needs will, in the event that the master or lord harbours ill-will and anger, rise up and kill him. The kindness of the lord towards his subjects in some cases could be similar to that of parents who meet all the needs of their children, who are completely dependent on their parents to feed and clothe them. Even though the subjects have similarly depended on and received benefits from their lord, it is possible that they will rise up and kill him if he treats them with a negative mind of anger.

Even these days we see so much destruction caused through anger, even between very close relations. There are those who kill their employer, and in the worst case, we even see children killing their own parents and parents taking the life of their own child, or a wife killing her husband, or a husband killing his wife and so forth. We can see so many destructive behaviours that are all initiated out of anger.

As explained in the commentary, anger will also exasperate friends and cause them to be disgusted. If a subject can kill their own lord or master out of anger, there is no need to mention that friends and so forth will be exasperated and disgusted by anger. This point is definitely relevant. We can see so many situations where it only takes a frown, or some unpleasant remark to separate good friends. We can become really disgusted with others out of anger. How often do we hear remarks such as, 'Oh, I will never go out with them again'? Inappropriate gestures expressed with anger, such as foul remarks, a frowning face and so forth can definitely destroy relationships.

The main point is that anger turns away friends, relatives or partners and so forth. We can definitely relate to this significant point, and we need to be really mindful of it. One can also understand that if anger disrupts relationships of all kinds, then the opposite of anger, which is patience, will bring one closer to others, and lead to more harmonious relationships. So this contrast between anger and patience needs to be understood.

Furthermore, anger will also disrupt the affection of those gathered with generosity. Some may have gathered friends or subjects and so forth through being generous. While on one hand being generous brings people closer to you, on the other hand anger will destroy that relationship.

Thus the conclusion is that having contemplated these obvious disadvantages and faults of anger one should abandon anger. The way to contemplate this point is to reflect upon how anger can lead to forgetting the kindness of others, and actually turn them against us. Anger can also create a distance between otherwise close friends or companions. This is how one needs to contemplate again and again the many great faults of anger.

1.1.3. A summary of the faults

The next four lines of verse summarise the faults of anger.

- 5cd. *In short, there is nobody
That abides in happiness through anger.*
- 6ab. *The enemy that is anger creates suffering
In the here and the thereafter.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

In short, due to anger there is no abiding in happiness. The enemy of anger is the supreme cause for the shortcomings explained earlier, such as suffering in the present and later.

As the commentary explains, due to anger there is no abiding in happiness, which relates to the very pertinent point that when anger is present in the mind there is no opportunity for the mind to abide in happiness and peace. So it is anger that causes the lack of a sense of joy and happiness in the mind. His Holiness the Dalai Lama also stresses this point and mentions it often in his teachings. He says that you can't find anyone who says that they are happy because they are angry! Anger gives no opportunity for any sense of joy or happiness in one's mind. That, in brief, is the main disadvantage of anger.

The commentary concludes, therefore, the enemy of anger is the supreme cause for the shortcomings explained earlier, such as suffering in the present and later, i.e. future lives.

1.2. The benefits of patience

I have, of course, presented this topic many times in the past. The relevant lines of verse read:

- 6cd. *Those who destroyed anger by focusing,
Will be happy here and thereafter.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Should a person, after having contemplated well the shortcomings of anger, focus their mind and destroy anger, then this will be the cause for their very happiness in this life and future lives.

As clearly explained in the commentary, when one has seen and fully acknowledged the faults of anger through contemplating and meditating, and taken the initiative to cultivate patience, then that act of destroying anger will be the cause for happiness to be experienced in this life right now, as well as in future lives.

This point was also explained by Lama Tsong Khapa. When the cause of the mental anguish that arises from anger has been removed, then what remains is happiness. What obstructs happiness is mental anguish and once that unhappiness has been removed, we find happiness. So, as Lama Tsong Khapa points out, when one takes the initiative to destroy anger, one will experience continuous happiness in this life. The happiness we experience now in this life will, as explained here, also be a cause for further happiness, as it will be a cause to obtain the high status of being reborn as a human or in the god realms, and ultimately to become a cause for definite goodness.

When one obtains such high status, it will be with perfect conditions, e.g. a human body with all the perfect conditions intact. That too causes happiness in future lives. Then the commentary continues:

Therefore one should strive in abandoning anger. If one does not abandon anger, then there are very great shortcomings, as explained in the Sutra of the Great Play of Manjushri.

On one hand one should contemplate the great advantages of abandoning anger, and on the other hand one should contemplate the great disadvantages of not abandoning anger. Even though it is not specified in the outline, what we can also understand here is that there can also be unobserved future benefits of practising patience, as well as the observable practical benefits we will experience in this life, where we will abide continuously in joy and happiness. So we can extract this further meaning from this section of the text.

2. BRINGING TO MIND THE METHOD TO ESTABLISH PATIENCE

This has two sub-divisions:

- 2.1. Eliminating the cause of anger
- 2.2. Meditating on the benefits of patience

2.1. Eliminating the cause of anger

Here there are four sub-headings:

- 2.1.1. The nature of the cause, including the shortcomings
- 2.1.2. Advice to strive in the method to oppose anger
- 2.1.3. The actual method to oppose anger
- 2.1.4. Striving in abandoning anger after having analysed the cause for anger in detail

We can conclude here for this evening.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

7 October 2014

As usual, we will spend some time in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings on these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

2.1. Eliminating the cause for anger

2.1.1. The nature of the cause, including the shortcomings

This is a presentation of the nature of the cause of anger, as well as its shortcomings. The relevant verse reads:

7. *Finding the nourishment of mental unhappiness,
Which arises from the undesired and
From obstructions to the desired,
Hatred grows stronger and destroys self.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary opens with a hypothetical query:

Query: How does anger generate suffering?

Answer: Mental unhappiness, which comes either from that which causes the undesired or obstructs that which is desired by the self and that which is close to the self, is the nourishment which increases anger. Having found the nourishment of mental unhappiness, the body of hatred grows stronger and destroys self in this life and future lives.

This is a presentation of how anger arises within us. On a personal level, this understanding is really very helpful as it enables us to detect what causes us to feel angry in the first place. Recognising this process can help us to prevent anger from spiralling out of control.

How does anger generate suffering? The commentary begins by explaining that mental unhappiness comes either from that which causes the undesired or obstructs that which is desired by the self and that which is close to the self, i.e. relatives and so forth. As presented here, mental unhappiness arises due to undesired events affecting either oneself or those close to one, or an obstruction to what one desires. It is that mental unhappiness that is the nourishment or fuel for anger.

When we relate this to ourselves, we can see how true it is that we become really unhappy when we get what we don't want to experience, or when there is an obstruction to what we do desire to experience for ourselves and our close ones. As soon as our mind becomes unhappy we are prone to becoming angry. That is because, as presented here, mental unhappiness serves as a fuel to anger. Unhappiness nourishes and sustains anger just like food nourishes and sustains the body as it develops and matures. Using this analogy the commentary says that, having found the nourishment of mental unhappiness, the body of hatred grows stronger, and thus destroys our happiness in this life and in future lives. These are really significant points about the underlying cause of anger.

We need to see the relationship between unhappiness and anger. We become unhappy when our desires are thwarted, or if we have to experience what we don't want. Then, because of that unhappiness, we focus on what we think has caused us pain and unhappiness, and anger arises. If it is an individual then our anger is directed at that person, and the more we think about how they have obstructed us, or caused us to experience something that we don't want, the more our anger increases. That is when we begin to regard the other person as an arch enemy.

We really need to understand how the process unfolds within our mind. We generate anger because we are unhappy. When we don't investigate thoroughly, we immediately blame the person who we consider has caused our unhappiness. However, if we investigate carefully, then we have to acknowledge that it is our own unhappiness that has caused the anger and which is creating so much mental agony and pain. When we use this sort of analysis we come to understand that it is that anger which is the real enemy, not the person.

Normally of course, we don't do that investigation, so we perceive external causes, such as a person or a particular situation, as the cause of our pain and unhappiness. When our mind is unhappy then, as presented here, that unhappiness fuels anger and nourishes it. As will be explained later, joy is the opposite of unhappiness, so being joyful will prevent unhappiness, which in turn prevents anger from arising. So, for example, if someone hits us with a stick, we start to feel unhappy as soon as we feel pain, and then, in a flash, we become angry with the person who inflicted that pain. But if we are not fazed by that one hit of a stick, and actually remain joyful, then there is no place for anger to arise.

The point made in the commentary is that as anger becomes stronger and stronger it destroys our happiness in this life and in future lives. Thus the exhortation, even though it is not mentioned specifically here, is that we must assiduously overcome anger.

When we consider the logic of the process by which we become angry we realise there is a state of mind between the event and the emotion of anger, which is our feeling of unhappiness. We are the owners of that unhappiness, so if we don't generate unhappiness then we will prevent the generation of anger. These are significant points that we really need to consider.

When we really embody this approach then we are practising the real meaning of patience. Many people comment on how amazing it is that His Holiness the Dalai Lama is so patient with the Communist Chinese. That is because His Holiness embodies this practice of patience so that what seems to be unimaginable becomes possible. If we really think about these significant points we will gain a very deep understanding. More details about this will be presented later on.

2.1.2. Advice to strive in the method to oppose anger

8. *Therefore I need to destroy the food
Of this enemy of mine,
An enemy who has no other function
Aside from harming me.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Therefore I should destroy mental unhappiness, the nourishment of this enemy of mine. There is nothing that harms me more than this enemy of anger, and I should strive in destroying this arch enemy of mine.

As has just been explained, our mental unhappiness serves as a fuel for anger, therefore I should destroy mental unhappiness which is nourishment of this enemy of mine, i.e. anger. Furthermore, because there is nothing that harms me more than this enemy of anger I should strive in destroying this enemy of mine. In other words, one needs to make an effort to overcome the real enemy that causes distress and agony. This is another significant point. When anger arises it not only harms others, but it also harms oneself. When one recognises that anger has no other function than to harm oneself, then one can recognise it as being the real enemy that needs to be overcome. Anger has no redeeming features. From our own experience we know that the moment anger arises we immediately feel unsettled and uncomfortable. Not only does it cause mental agony now, but anger also affects future lives as well.

The virtues of patience were presented earlier. The direct opposites of the virtues of patience are the faults of anger. Recognising that, we need to really embrace this on a personal level and do our best to overcome anger. Of course, our ultimate goal is to completely abandon anger. Meanwhile, we should, as much as possible, try to resort to these reasons and think about the disadvantages of anger when it does arise. This will help to lessen the intensity of our anger and prevent it from escalating. So we can definitely take measures now to prevent anger from taking root and increasing in intensity.

As personal practice, we need to put the most effort into protecting our own mind from anger, rather than finding excuses, like thinking, 'Oh well, they're angry so I have the right to get angry too'. If one uses that as a reason then there will be no end to one's anger. Even if one cannot stop the other person from becoming angry, one can at least make an attempt to control one's own mind and prevent anger from arising. To that extent it will benefit oneself, as well as defusing the conflict with the other.

Indeed, it is fuelling anger that causes more and more trouble in any situation. There are so many wars going on, and when we look at the situation we can see that those who are rising up are so fuelled up and angry, for whatever reason, that they will do anything to fight back. If, rather than trying to appease that anger and settle them down, one adds further causes for them to become upset, they will naturally rise up and fight with an even more intense anger. With these kinds of situations how can there really be world peace? We can never expect world peace when more fuel is added to already tense situations, with people who are already feeling unsettled.

In fact the patience practised by the stronger towards the weak is, as the teachings explain, the most supreme practice of patience. The Thirty-seven Practices of a Bodhisattva mentions that the practice of patience by the mighty against those who are weaker is a really supreme practice. As the mighty can very easily crush those who are less powerful, they have no need to practise patience. In contrast, the weaker have no choice at all. They often have to take whatever harm is inflicted on them because they don't dare to fight back with someone who is mightier. So practising patience in those circumstances is said to be not as great as the powerful being patient with the weaker. At a global level, a mightier nation should be able to tolerate those who are causing some disturbance and so forth. Then peace will be possible. However, I suppose that mighty nations would not find that reasonable.

When animosity or anger between two nations or groups of people is appeased, then there is room for negotiation and peace is possible, and when anger is not appeased, there is no possibility for negotiation and peace and so forth. That is really how it is. At a personal level it is exactly the same—when there is anger there is conflict.

In fact, when a really powerful enemy crushes you, you are so afraid that there is really no time to be angry. That was my response when the Chinese came into Tibet. Someone once asked me, 'When you had to flee, did you feel any anger towards the Chinese' and my response was, 'I didn't even have time to feel angry as I was so afraid. The only thing that came to my mind at that time was that my life was in danger, and so I had to flee'. When there are guns being fired, and heavy artillery being used, the constant fear leaves no time to feel angry.

The point is that when the stronger overpower the weaker, then the weaker ones have to accept that. We can see this also with parents and their children; if parents scold or spank a young child then, of course, the child cannot do anything in return as it is so small. So when the powerful practise patience, and do not inflict harm on the weaker ones, then that is indeed a supreme act of patience.

The current conflict in Syria and Iraq is a case in point. Syria is a small country, and it seems very easy for America and Australia to decide to go there. I'm not sure about that. America has a very big population. Australia is smaller so Australia has to be very careful, otherwise the conflict will come closer to home.

In the fourth chapter Shantideva used the example of an external enemy to show the danger of befriending the delusions. When you befriend an external foe it is possible that they will turn around and become your friend if you are kind to them. In contrast, if you are kind and nice to the delusions within, they will just become more powerful and cause you more harm. These are all significant points.

Another significant verse concerning overcoming the real enemy within explained that it is easier to cover one's feet to protect them against sharp objects than trying to cover the whole earth with leather.¹ Likewise, overcoming the inner enemy of the delusions is equivalent to overcoming all enemies. Some have confided in me that they have found this advice gives their practice real meaning and purpose. When we really contemplate these points they give us every reason to practise patience.

¹ Bodhisattvacharyavatara, chapter 5 verse 13.

As we are inclined to engage in Dharma practice we need to derive the real essence of what is being presented here, and try to put it into practice. As presented in the teachings, we need to regard our internal afflictions and delusions as our real enemy, and use all our energy to combat and overcome them. Conversely, we need to practise love for our external enemies. So, in short, extend love towards external enemies, and don't be patient with internal enemies. Try to use every means to overcome those inner delusions. That is, in essence, the practice we need to adopt if we are to consider ourselves Dharma practitioners.

2.1.3. The actual method to oppose anger

Once again we can take note of the sequence of outlines, although, of course, Gyalsab Je's commentary only reflects what is presented in the actual text. We have just covered the reasons why it is necessary to apply the method to oppose anger. Now we are presented with the actual methods that oppose anger. Gyalsab Je's meticulous outlines really bring out the logical presentation of Shantideva's text, and it is good for us to really relate to this text in a systemic way, as a way of integrating it in our practice. Rather than just thinking, 'Oh, this is just an outline', we can see that the outlines, just by themselves, have great purpose.

The actual method to oppose anger is subdivided into two:

2.1.3.1. It is unsuitable to generate mental unhappiness

2.1.3.2. The reason for that

2.1.3.1. IT IS UNSUITABLE TO GENERATE MENTAL UNHAPPINESS

The commentary on the verse begins this query:

Query: How then does one abandon mental unhappiness?

Here we can see the elegant simplicity of the presentation. The verse that relates to this reads:

9. *Whatever happens, I should never
Let this mind of joy be disturbed.
Though disliking, one will not attain one's desire,
And virtue will degenerate.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary goes on to explain:

Having contemplated the benefits of accepting suffering think: "I shall under no circumstances let my mental joy be disturbed." Contemplate this point well.

Mental joy is the antidote to mental unhappiness. Therefore, if one generates dislike upon meeting something undesired, then, though one generates dislike, one will not achieve one's wishes, and the virtue that bestows the desired result degenerates. In this way all sufferings are generated.

Having contemplated the benefits of accepting suffering, refers to the benefits of willingly accepting suffering, which will be presented in more detail later on in the text. The point here is that suffering does have some advantages and should not be viewed in a completely negative light. There are in fact many benefits in accepting suffering, and contemplating this one should think, 'I shall under no circumstances let my mental joy be disturbed'. This is a point I also make in my own teachings. I often remind people that preserving and protecting one's joy is of the utmost importance for one's wellbeing.

Having contemplated this point thoroughly, we need to make the personal commitment, 'Regardless of whether the circumstances are good or bad, and especially when things are not going well, I will not allow my sense of joy to be disturbed or diminished', and in that way maintain that feeling of joy and happiness.

As presented in the commentary, joy is the antidote to mental unhappiness. If upon meeting something that is undesired, e.g. being harmed, one generates dislike, however that dislike will not achieve one's wishes. In other words, developing a dislike for someone who harms us won't affect that person at all. Furthermore, rather than accomplishing one's wishes, developing dislike actually destroys the virtue within oneself, obstructing the desired result of happiness.

In summary, as the commentary states, In this way all sufferings are generated. The point here is that whatever the unfavourable circumstance, generating dislike will not help to accomplish our wish for our own wellbeing. Indeed, rather than accomplishing anything, generating dislike actually harms our future experience of joy and happiness, because it results in the degeneration of the virtue within us. Because it is a negativity, the moment anger is generated it destroys the virtue that we have accumulated, which is the cause of our future happiness. That is how, as explained in the commentary, all sufferings are generated.

2.1.3.2. THE REASON FOR THAT

This refers to the reason why it is unsuitable to generate unhappiness. The verse in relation to this outline is one that many have found to be extremely useful and beneficial. It is a verse that is often quoted, and you will all have come across it many times.

10. *If one can do something
What is there to dislike?
If one can do nothing,
What use is dislike?*

Gyalsab Je explains the meaning of the verse thus:

If one can do something about the object that generates mental unhappiness, then what reason is there to generate dislike? Right away one acts and the mental unhappiness vanishes. In case one cannot do something then what is the use to generate unhappiness? One can dislike that space lacks obstructions, but what is the benefit in that?

As so clearly presented here, if one can do something about an object that generates mental unhappiness then what reason is there to generate dislike? To take a contemporary example, if a car breaks down and the problem can be fixed then taking it to a mechanic to be fixed will solve the problem. There is no real need for dislike or an unhappy state of mind, because it is fixable. In the event that it can't be fixed and has to be written off then, again, there is no purpose in generating dislike. If it can be fixed then there is no need to worry; if it cannot be fixed then there is no purpose in worrying about that either. We can use other examples such as someone dropping a ceramic cup. If it is cracked it can be fixed, so you fix it and then you can use it again. So there is no need to generate dislike and an unhappy mind. Whereas if it is broken into pieces and cannot be fixed, then generating dislike and worrying about it will not help to solve the situation. It will just cause more mental distress.

This advice is particularly relevant with physical illnesses. When we are ill and there is a remedy or cure then there is no need to really worry and generate a mind of dislike, as it can be cured. In the event that it is a disease that is difficult to cure then one has to accept that. The mental anguish generated from worrying will just add mental suffering to our physical suffering.

As the commentary states, if it can be fixed, then right away one acts and the mental unhappiness vanishes. In the case one cannot do something then what is the use to generate unhappiness? So again we are being reminded that if a situation cannot be remedied, or cannot be fixed, then there is no use in generating unhappiness. A further analogy presented in the commentary is that one can dislike that space lacks obstruction but what is the benefit in that? If someone were to be really upset with space because it lacks obstruction, saying, 'Oh, this space is useless. It's empty and doesn't have any function', then what purpose would that serve? None at all.

2.1.4. Striving in abandoning anger after having analysed the cause for anger in detail

This has three subdivisions:

2.1.4.1. Showing the general division of objects for generating anger

2.1.4.2. Stopping anger at undesired actions

2.1.4.3. Stopping anger at obstructions to one's wishes

2.1.4.1. SHOWING THE GENERAL DIVISION OF OBJECTS FOR GENERATING ANGER

Here we are being presented with the different kinds of objects or situations that generate anger. Some use these same objects as objects for generating patience. In fact the objects of anger and the objects of patience are basically the same, aren't they? The objects of our anger are the very objects with which one needs to generate patience with.

Here Gyaltsab Je uses these objects in the context of anger. The relevant verse reads:

11. *I do not wish for myself or my friends
Suffering, criticism, harsh words
And unpleasant talk.
For the enemy it is the opposite*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

For myself and my friends I do not want these four: feelings of suffering, criticism, harsh words spoken to one's face and the spreading of unpleasant derogatory rumours. These I do not wish for, and wish to reverse them, but in relation to the enemy these likes and dislikes are the opposite. In short, they are the eight worldly dharmas.

In relation to ourselves and those closest to us we don't want to experience any kind of feelings of suffering, any kind of criticism, or harsh words spoken directly to us, or the spreading of any unpleasant or derogatory rumours.

In fact we wish to experience their reverse, meaning that we want to experience the opposite of what we don't want. We do not want to feel any suffering and we want to feel happiness; we do not wish for criticism and we wish for praise; we do not wish for harsh words but wish only for pleasant words to be spoken to us; and we do not wish for unpleasant or derogatory rumours to be spread about us, but wish to have a good reputation.

But in relation to our enemies we wish the opposite. We want them to feel suffering and be the object of criticism, harsh words and unpleasant, derogatory rumours. Meanwhile we don't want them to experience the opposite of these negative experiences.

Basically, with these eight worldly concerns we want to experience the positives, but don't want to experience the negatives, whereas we want enemies to experience the negatives and not the positives. When we see how true this is for ourselves, we can see how these objects are the basis for all anger. When we are experiencing the negative side anger arises, and we also feel anger when the enemy experiences the positive side. So basically these eight worldly concerns or dharmas serve as the basis of so many unwholesome actions and non-virtuous states of mind.

Maybe we can go into a little bit more detail about these eight worldly dharmas in our next session. In the meantime it would be good for you to really look into these and understand how you actually experience them: the four that I do not wish for, and their opposites which I do wish for, whilst for my enemies I wish the reverse.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

14 October 2014

As usual we can devote some time to our meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now we generate the most positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

I need to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all mother sentient beings, so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

2.1.4.1. SHOWING THE GENERAL DIVISION OF OBJECTS FOR GENERATING ANGER (CONT.)

In short, one should refrain from the eight worldly dharmas, which are the causes of anger. As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

For myself and my friends I do not want these four: feelings of suffering, criticism, harsh words spoken to one's face and the spreading of unpleasant derogatory rumours.

When we, or our close and dear ones, experience these four unpleasant situations, then anger arises. Conversely we wish for their opposites: wanting to experience happiness rather than suffering; wanting to experience praise rather than criticism; wanting to hear pleasant words rather than harsh words; and wanting to have fame rather than experience derogatory rumours. We don't want to experience the four unpleasant situations and we do want to experience the four pleasant ones.

It is the complete opposite for our enemies—we are happy when they experience suffering, but unhappy and angry when they experience happiness. We don't want them to receive any praise, and are happy when they are criticised; we are unhappy when they have pleasant words spoken to them, but glad when harsh words are used towards them. If our enemies have fame, then that makes us uncomfortable and unhappy, and thus angry, and when there are unpleasant rumours about them, we are glad.

Those, in brief, are the eight worldly concerns: one wishes to avoid four unfavourable conditions, but wishes them upon one's enemies; one wishes to enjoy four favourable conditions, but hopes one's enemies will not encounter them. As I have said, it's important for us to really look into how we get caught up in the eight worldly concerns.

In short, we basically want to experience the happiness of the contaminated samsaric pleasures. Of course, there is nothing wrong with wishing to have a higher level of happiness, but here we are talking about a strong clinging and attachment to the happiness derived from samsaric pleasures, and an aversion to any unpleasant experiences. We want to be praised and not criticised. We cling to worldly fame, and are unhappy if we are the object of any derogatory rumours. Fame itself is not a bad thing if it is based on actual good qualities. For example, amongst sentient beings no-one could be more famous than a bodhisattva. Bodhisattvas are renowned for their deeds of benefiting other sentient beings, so a bodhisattva's fame only enables them to further benefit sentient beings, rather than being a source of harm to themselves. Thus, as the term itself indicates, we need to understand that the eight worldly dharmas refer to worldly concerns.

I have explained the means to counteract the eight worldly dharmas in detail previously, however as it is important to have a good understanding of them, I will go over it again now. So, as explained earlier, one wishes for the happiness that is derived from being attached to the contaminated worldly pleasures, and it is this happiness derived from worldly pleasures, fame, praise and pleasant remarks which are related to worldly views that we need to overcome. Whereas the happiness that one would experience from obtaining liberation or ultimate enlightenment is a happiness that we need to pursue, for it is a worthy goal. Wishing for the happiness of liberation or enlightenment will inspire us to achieve that great goal.

As explained in Nagarjuna's Letter to the King, as well as in the Lam Rim teachings, one needs to equalise the eight worldly concerns or dharmas. This means we need to adopt an attitude which is the opposite of our normal attitudes. Instead of wishing for happiness, one willingly wishes to endure suffering and hardship, and so forth. The way to understand this in its proper context is that the experience of even temporary happiness is the result of good karma, or the virtue that one has accumulated in the past. Thus, when we experience that wellbeing and happiness, we are actually using up our good karma. When we reflect upon this fact, then we won't feel too keen about wishing to experience samsaric pleasures, because we know that we will be using up our own good karma.

Suffering, on the other hand is the result of negative karma, and whenever one experiences suffering it is exhausting the negative karma that one has accumulated in the past. By contemplating in this way we realise that since suffering exhausts our negative karma, it is actually good for us, and the sooner our negative karma is expended, the better it is for us. By thinking in this way, we realise that it is quite reasonable to change our attitude from wishing to experience happiness and avoid suffering, to one of willingly wishing to experience suffering, and being very wary of experiencing the happiness arising from worldly pleasures. By adopting this attitude, one will not be daunted by suffering, because of the knowledge that it is expending one's negative karma. With this attitude one will also be practising the patience of willingly tolerating sufferings.

Another way to look at the significance of the practice of equalising the eight worldly dharmas is that by not engaging in this equalising practice and exchanging our attitudes, we are, in effect, longing to experience the happiness of worldly samsaric pleasures. Such a longing will increase our attachment, which will then hinder our practice. When our attachment to the happiness of samsaric pleasures increases, it further intensifies our anger when we experience its opposite, which is suffering.

Furthermore, when we anticipate the joy of experiencing samsaric pleasures, we are ignorant of the fact that such happiness is in the nature of contaminated pleasure, rather than long-lasting happiness. Holding onto this view increases our ignorance. Thus the three poisons are increased if one does not practise equalising the eight worldly concerns.

Taking up this practice of equalising the eight worldly concerns will strengthen our tong len (giving and taking) practice, which we attempt to practise in our regular meditation. As I have mentioned previously, someone who doesn't wish to experience happiness, and who willingly wishes to experience suffering, can really take the tong len practice to heart. If one does not want to experience suffering and wants to experience only happiness, it wouldn't be possible to even think of taking on the suffering of other sentient beings. Furthermore if one is really attached to happiness, one would not want to be parted from it, so giving one's happiness away to other sentient beings would not be possible. As I have mentioned previously, the tong len practice would be an appropriate practice for those who have taken up the practice of equalising the eight worldly dharmas.

To summarise the main points, the 'taking' part of the tong len practice is when one willingly wishes to take the suffering of others upon oneself. When one is wary about experiencing happiness, one will easily be able to give it to other sentient beings, which covers the 'giving' part of the practice. As mentioned previously, being able to practise the patience of enduring suffering will prevent anger from arising when one experiences hardships and difficulties. Rather than being unhappy when our enemies experience happiness, we will be glad about that, which will also prevent anger from arising when we see our enemies experiencing good conditions. This is really a great and profound practice, so it shouldn't be taken lightly. Indeed this practice has great meaning and purpose. This should be apparent when one sees the extent to which it transforms our mind. Further details about this will be presented later on.

2.1.4.2. STOPPING ANGER AT UNDESIRED ACTIONS

This section covers how to prevent anger from arising. There are three subdivisions:

2.1.4.1.1. Stopping anger at wrongdoings directed at oneself

2.1.4.1.2. Stopping anger at wrongdoings directed at one's friends

2.1.4.1.3. Stopping anger at those who benefit one's enemies

We can see how these three types of anger definitely relate to our immediate experiences in everyday life. The moment one experiences some wrongdoing directed at oneself or one's friends, one immediately becomes upset and angry. How wonderful it would be if we could actually prevent anger from arising when we face such situations! How gentle and calm our mind would be!

STOPPING ANGER AT WRONGDOINGS DIRECTED AT ONESELF¹

This has two main sections:

1. Tolerating the generation of suffering
2. Being patient with contempt and so forth

1. TOLERATING THE GENERATION OF SUFFERING

This section is subdivided into three:

- 1.1. Meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering
- 1.2. Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma
- 1.3. Meditating on the patience that does not think anything of harm.

This is where the three divisions of patience are presented:

- Meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering
- Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma
- Meditating on the patience that does not think of anything of harm.

As presented many times, the definition of patience is a mind that does not become disturbed in the face of harm and suffering. So this means if our mind is not disturbed when we experience harm from external conditions, or from our own experiences of suffering, then we are practising patience.

The opposite of patience is anger. The Lam Rim teachings specifically mention an opposite to each of the three types of patience listed here. However, in general, anger is the opposite of patience. The definition of anger is the malicious mind that intends to harm, which is focused on the three objects that cause one suffering.

The patience of willingly tolerating suffering is really a paramount practice for everyday life. Anger is mostly related to lacking the patience to tolerate suffering. So whenever we experience suffering we can contemplate, 'This is the result of my non-virtuous actions in the past, and therefore it is befitting that I experience this now, as a way to eradicate the results of my past negativities'. By contemplating in this way, suffering becomes more acceptable, and we will not become despondent when we experience it.

As I said earlier, the Lam Rim explains the opposites of these three kinds of patience. As I recall, the opposite to the patience of meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering, is a despondent mind that feels weighed down and worthless. The opposite to meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma, is a lack of interest in the Dharma, and no aspiration to practise it. The opposite of meditating on the patience that does not think of anything of harm, is basically anger. You can check the Lam Rim as well, but these are, as I recall, the opposite of the three kinds of patience.

1.1. Meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering

This is subdivided into five:

- 1.1.1. Contemplating that one is not beyond the nature of contaminated suffering

¹ To keep them manageable the heading numbers and styles start again at this point.

1.1.2. Contemplating the benefits of meditating on suffering

1.1.3. Contemplating how they are not difficult once habituated

1.1.4. The benefits of striving to abandoning afflictions

1.1.5. Extensive explanation of the benefits of suffering

1.1.1. Contemplating that one is not beyond the nature of contaminated suffering

One is not beyond the nature of contaminated suffering means that one definitely has to experience contaminated sufferings. Because one is still in samsara, one still has a samsaric nature.

The relevant lines of verse from the root text read:

*12ab. Causes for happiness come adventitiously,
Causes for suffering abound.*

In his commentary on these two lines Gyaltsab Je explains:

In cyclic existence the causes for happiness arise only occasionally and the causes for suffering abound. Since one is not beyond the nature of cyclic existence it is appropriate to tolerate sufferings.

As explained in the commentary, in cyclic existence the causes for happiness arise only occasionally. One needs to understand that the cause for happiness is virtue. Thus, for example, if you were to reflect upon whether you have accumulated virtue or non-virtue today, it may be quite evident that you have created more non-virtuous deeds than virtuous ones. If that is the case, you would have been creating more causes for suffering than causes for happiness. So, as indicated in the commentary, when the causes to experience happiness are generated only occasionally, then naturally, the result of happiness is also only occasional, and instead of happiness, one experiences more suffering. This can also relate to the fact that the immediate causes for our happiness are also scarce. Even on a daily basis there are far more occasions where things go wrong, which cause us suffering, than conditions for happiness.

Since one is not beyond the nature of cyclic existence the causes for suffering abound, relates to non-virtuous activities or negativities. If the delusions are prevalent in our mind, then it is more likely that we will be creating more non-virtues or negativities on a regular basis. If we find that this is true for ourselves now, then it would also have to have been true in past lives. Through having created abundant causes for suffering in the past, one naturally experiences more suffering now. Likewise, if we failed to create the cause of happiness, which is virtue, in previous lives, we will naturally experience the result of a lack of happiness now.

These are really significant points about karma. When one creates non-virtuous deeds and negativity, the result will be suffering. Whereas if one creates virtuous deeds, the result will be happiness. As the great Kadampa masters advised, on a regular basis one should, at the end of the day, count up how many deeds were influenced by the delusions, and were thus negative deeds, and how much virtue was accrued during the day. The results of this analysis show us our progress. Then we can slowly transform our lives by creating more virtues and shunning more negativities. This is a personal instruction on how to adopt virtue and abandon negativity. If we do that then we will then secure a better life right now, as well as preparing for our experiences in future lifetimes. This is very succinct advice that is being presented here.

In very simple terms, if we wish to experience real happiness in life, then we need to accumulate virtue. If you want to experience real happiness, then you must accumulate the causes for that, which is virtue. If you do not wish to experience suffering, then you need to abandon negativity which will eradicate the causes for suffering. One becomes a real practitioner when one abides by this code of training. When we really contemplate and think about how our experiences now are related to specific causes and conditions that were created in the past, we generate a real confidence in the importance of adopting virtue and abandoning negativity. We really need to take this on board.

1.1.2. Contemplating the benefits of meditating on suffering

One should understand that we don't need to be completely afraid of suffering, as there are actually benefits in experiencing it.

The following six lines explain this:

*12cd. Without suffering there is no renunciation
Therefore, mind be firm!*

*13. If the faithful of Durga and the Kanapa
Tolerate the meaningless feelings of
Being burned and cut, then why
Do I not have courage for liberation?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on these lines reads as follows:

It is appropriate to contemplate cyclic existence to be in the nature of suffering because without contemplating the suffering of samsara the mind definitely wishing to be free from samsara will not arise. Hence, "Mind be firm!"

It is appropriate to tolerate suffering. The faithful of the goddess Uma, in order to reverse and lessen the austerities of Ishvara, on the ninth of the middle month of autumn, fast and cut and burn themselves for one or three days in order to please her.

The people of Kanapa and so forth in the south, in order to compete with each other, endure the sufferings of cutting their bodies and the like. If one can tolerate sufferings for such meaningless purposes, then why do I fear the experiences of suffering for the great purpose of liberating all sentient beings from their sufferings? It is appropriate to tolerate them.

As explained here in the commentary, it is appropriate to contemplate cyclic existence to be in the nature of suffering, otherwise the mind wishing to definitely be free from samsara will not arise. As one of the great lamas, Drakha Rinpoche, who was from the same area in Tibet where I come from mentioned, there are no accounts of practitioners entering the path and gaining realisations by experiencing pleasures.

How this previously unknown booklet by Drakha Rinpoche came to be published was that there was an occasion when His Holiness the Dalai Lama was delayed in Patna for some time. In order to pass the time he said, "I'd like to check out what's in the library here, as I've heard it holds some rare texts in its collection". So

Dzongsar Rinpoche went to the Patna Library and found a collection of Drakha Rinpoche's works. When this was brought to His Holiness' attention, His Holiness was interested and wanted to see them. When he came across this particular text he was so impressed that he said "Oh, this should be made more available!" That was when this booklet was published. Apparently there is also a collection of Drakha Rinpoche's works in a library in America. It is quite amazing to think that a library in Patna and a library in America had held copies of his works, but this was not widely known.

After this text was published it remained relatively unknown until His Holiness the Dalai Lama mentioned in a teaching how he had found the advice given by Drakha Rinpoche to have been very beneficial for his own mind. The booklet was being distributed freely during a teaching, and so people quickly rushed to acquire a copy for themselves! Having gained access to this book, we can see its great significance.

Of course if we had ample time I would be referring to some of the appropriate passages in this book, along with the Lam Rim teachings. But because we don't have much time, we won't do that. In his text, Drakha Rinpoche says that there are many accounts of delusions increasing and negativities not being purified, as a result of enjoying the pleasures and happiness of samsara, and no accounts of practitioners who have lessened their delusions and purified their negativities through the experience of pleasures. However there are many accounts of practitioners who, having contemplated suffering, have lessened their delusions, purified their negativities, and accumulated extensive merit.

Then he quotes the great Kadampa master Chen-ngawa, who says one should cherish suffering, for it is through sufferings and hardships that the lamas and Sangha perform their great virtuous deeds. The great extensive deeds of the lamas are indeed the result of enduring a great amount of suffering and hardship in their practice. The sangha also endure the hardships of practising morality, and endure discomforts whilst engaging in virtues of the three doors of body, speech and mind. Thus, by willingly experiencing sufferings they are able to purify extensive negativities and accumulate very extensive merit to achieve the higher realisations of liberation and enlightenment. This is why, as explained, it is appropriate to cherish suffering.

The great lama Drakha Rinpoche was also known, amongst those who revered him, as a manifestation of Chenrezig. On a personal note, I had a classmate who came from the same town as Drakha Rinpoche. So he had an unequivocal faith in Drakha Rinpoche and he used to say to me, "Oh, there's really no lama like Drakha Rinpoche. He's a really incredible practitioner and a great being".

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains that it is appropriate to contemplate cyclic existence to be in the nature of suffering. As mentioned before, without contemplating the nature of samsara the wish to definitely be free from samsara will not arise. When one sees the great benefits from contemplating suffering, one will see the appropriateness of enduring suffering.

Furthermore, as explained in the commentary it is appropriate to tolerate suffering. Examples of such suffering include the faithful of the goddess Uma, who, in order to reverse and lessen the austerities of Ishvara, on the ninth of the middle month of autumn, fast and cut and burn themselves for one or three days in order to please her. So just to please this goddess, the devotees of Uma endure extreme pain and suffering.

Furthermore, the people of Kanapa and so forth in the south, in order to compete with each other, endure the sufferings of cutting their bodies and the like. If one can tolerate sufferings for such meaningless purposes, then why do I fear the experiences of suffering for the great purpose of liberating all sentient beings from their sufferings? So in comparison to such meaningless sufferings without much purpose, one's own sufferings, which arise from engaging in practices for the purpose of liberating all sentient beings from their sufferings, are worthwhile. By contemplating this we will not fear suffering. The implication here is that, as explained in the commentary, it is appropriate to tolerate suffering. More extensive benefits will be explained later.

There are many accounts of people enduring extremely painful acts such as putting fire on their heads and inflicting harm on their body in various other ways, for meaningless reasons.

1.1.3. Contemplating how they are not difficult once habituated

As indicated, tolerating suffering will not be difficult once one becomes acquainted with it.

That is subdivided into two:

1.1.3.1. Extensive explanation

1.1.3.2. Summary

1.1.3.1. EXTENSIVE EXPLANATION

This has four subdivisions:

1.1.3.1.1. It becomes easier with familiarisation

1.1.3.1.2. Establishing this with an example

1.1.3.1.3. The object to tolerate

1.1.3.1.4. Example of how, through familiarity the strength of patience increases

We can go over these in our next session. The main thing for you to do is to familiarise yourselves with the explanations, and try to understand them in relation to your own practice. As one of our real enemies is anger, finding ways of how to oppose this enemy is really worthwhile.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

21 October 2014

As usual we can spend some time in our meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now we generate a positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

1.1. Meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering (cont.)

1.1.3. Contemplating how they are not difficult once habituated

1.1.3.1. EXTENSIVE EXPLANATION

1.1.3.1.1. It becomes easier with familiarisation

This section of the text shows how, through becoming familiar with suffering, we are able to endure things that we may not have been able to endure previously. For example, suffering due to relatively minor ailments might be hard to endure initially, but if we familiarise ourselves with them, we will actually be able to tolerate them later on. Likewise, we may initially view harms inflicted upon us as unbearable or intolerable, but through familiarity with them we will come to tolerate them. The verse under this heading is a verse that is often cited to show that one of the characteristics of our mind is that it is possible to train it to manage things that we might previously have been unable to do. This is what it becomes easier with familiarisation means.

We really need to contemplate this point in relation to every aspect of our life. For example, even mundane tasks like work, or engaging in any kind of training, require some effort. If we don't develop the mind of being able to bear hardships and difficulties then we might easily give up because we think, "Oh this is too hard". All too often we see people give up their assignments, training and even their studies, saying, "Oh, this is too difficult". Thinking in that way can easily become a habit, leading some to give up as soon as there is some difficulty or hardship.

Developing a courageous mind that willingly accepts difficulties and hardships is part of the patience of willingly accepting hardship, as well as the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma. The patience of willingly tolerating harm is related to the harm that others may inflict upon us, whereas the patience of definitely relying on the Dharma can be applied to a range of different circumstances.

As the definition of patience suggests, a mind that does not become disturbed in the face of adversity or harm is definitely a calm and stable mind that is not prone to agitation. When the mind is not disturbed then that prevents anger from arising. That is how we need to see patience as being a direct opponent to anger. When the mind is not disturbed we will be able to accomplish whatever we need to accomplish. Conversely, when the mind is disturbed then it hinders whatever one is trying to achieve, and creates many negativities as well. When we really think about what patience really means, its benefits and how it is essential for our wellbeing, then we come to the natural conclusion, "I must definitely develop patience—I cannot afford to be without it".

Just as developing patience is essential for one's own wellbeing and relationships with others, it is also true for all the practices of the six perfections. Each one of the six perfections is essential for both our personal development and as a means of benefitting others. That is why the six perfections are the core practices of the bodhisattvas. As they practise the six perfections, bodhisattvas willingly undergo hardships and difficulties with joy, rather than any sense of suffering. That is how we need to understand the significance of these practices.

The practice of patience also strengthens the capacity of the mind to face hardships and difficulties. Whenever there is an occasion where harm is inflicted, practising patience will further increase the level of our tolerance. So the harm actually becomes an impetus to further develop patience, and make it even stronger. So, once one is committed to practise patience, experiencing harm only helps to increase and further strengthen our patience, rather than decreasing it.

The verse relating to this section of the text reads:

14. There is nothing that does not become Easier through familiarisation. Therefore, by meditating on small harm One will be able to tolerate great harm.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this oft-quoted verse begins with:

If one meditates on patience, then one will also tolerate suffering. All ways of apprehending arise through familiarisation, and therefore there is no object of the mind that does not become easier through familiarisation.

As the commentary explains, if one meditates on patience then one will also tolerate suffering. This is very succinctly pointing out that if one practises patience, then that will naturally enable one to also tolerate suffering. Conversely, one is unable to tolerate any kind of suffering when one lacks patience. These are very important points because as ordinary beings we are bound to experience some form of suffering or hardship at different times in our life. So if we don't develop a mind of being patient and tolerating suffering our minds will constantly be in a disturbed and agitated state. Then there will be no room in our minds to actually practise anything in depth. Indeed it is almost impossible to accomplish anything of significance when our mind is constantly in an agitated and disturbed state.

When we think about this we will come to the conclusion that patience is essential, and that we cannot function effectively without it. As the heading itself suggests, it is not beyond our capacity to practise patience because it is a matter of familiarising our mind with accepting and tolerating suffering and harm. As we train our mind in this way it becomes possible for us to tolerate even greater hardship and suffering, because the nature of the mind is such that there is nothing that cannot be developed through familiarisation.

The commentary explains that if one meditates on patience then one will be able to tolerate suffering, because all ways of apprehending arise through familiarisation. The very basis of the mind is that whatever is apprehended by the mind is based on familiarity with it. So whatever the mind apprehends now is possible due to that familiarisation. For that reason, there is no object of the mind that does not become easier through familiarisation. The very basis, and hence potential of the mind is that it knows and apprehends things through familiarisation. This implies that, through familiarisation with an object, it becomes easier and easier for the mind to apprehend that object. This point supports the earlier reasons.

The main point can be summarised in this way: If one were to ask whether an ordinary mind has faults, then of course the answer is that yes, an ordinary mind does have various faults. But it also carries the inborn ability to familiarise itself with good qualities, and is thus able to develop those good qualities. In other words, while the mind possesses many faults, it also possesses the ability to develop qualities, and thus carries the ability to remove those faults.

These are essential points. We often feel despondent, thinking, "Oh, I am riddled with faults, and therefore I cannot achieve anything; I am good for nothing". All too often we just focus on our faults and feel despondent and discouraged. We give up things easily and don't really consider going further to improve ourselves. When we experience these feelings, we need to remind ourselves, "Yes, we might have faults as ordinary beings. But the very nature of the mind is that it naturally carries the potential to develop qualities, and that is done through familiarisation".

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

For this reason, having meditated on tolerating small harms such as hot or cold, or harsh speech by others and so forth, know that one can also be patient with great harms such as the fires of the hell realms.

The commentary indicates that because one can learn to tolerate small harms such as hot and cold, or harsh speech by others and so forth, one is therefore able to train one's mind to tolerate greater sufferings. Before we can even attempt to think of tolerating greater suffering, we need to train our mind in being able to tolerate small suffering. Compared to the sufferings of hell realms, the suffering of feeling hot and cold, or being the recipient of harsh speech—which, as mere words, do not physically harm us—is really quite insignificant. However if we don't train our mind to tolerate minor suffering such as feeling a bit hot or cold, and hearing harsh words, then the mind becomes habituated with not being able to tolerate any kind of suffering, no matter how small. Whereas if we can train our mind to tolerate natural suffering like being a bit hot, or a bit cold, or occasionally hearing some unpleasant words, then it is possible to be patient with greater harms, specifically the sufferings of fire in hell realms.

This explanation is, of course, in the context of the great deeds of bodhisattvas. There are many accounts of bodhisattvas willingly accepting great sufferings - even going to the hell realms - in order to benefit sentient beings. This shows the great courage of the bodhisattvas and the extent to which they have developed their tolerance and patience in order to benefit sentient beings. They initially developed that level of patience and tolerance through familiarisation with smaller sufferings. So the point here is that if we familiarise ourselves with tolerating small harms such as heat and cold and harsh words and so forth, then it is possible for us to slowly, slowly be able to tolerate greater harms.

The main point is that developing the practice of patience is a matter of going through stages from being able to tolerate and endure small sufferings, and then slowly, slowly increasing the level of our tolerance and patience so that we are able to endure great sufferings. As mentioned here, if it is possible for bodhisattvas to endure the sufferings of the hell realms, then it is possible for us as well.

As a way to back this up, the commentary quotes from the sutra called the Sutra of the Meeting of Father and Son. This sutra is an account of the Buddha's life, and meeting the father is a symbolic expression that indicates reaching enlightenment. The quote reads:

The Bhagavan possesses the concentration called All Phenomena Become Happiness. Whoever attains this concentration will experience all objects of bodhisattvas only as happiness and will not experience suffering ... should they receive the harm of the hell beings they will still abide in the recognition of happiness.

The sutra is quite clear, so we don't need to explain it much more. The point is that should they receive the harm of the hell realms, bodhisattvas will still abide in happiness. As the sutra clearly states, due to practising patience, bodhisattvas are not troubled when they encounter suffering. Rather than experiencing suffering and unhappiness, they experience joy and happiness.

1.1.3.1.2. Establishing this with an example

This section presents an example of how patience becomes easier through familiarisation.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with a hypothetical qualm.

Qualm: If we meditate on small sufferings, the patience will not have power.

This hypothetical qualm is to remove any doubt that the patience developed through meditating on small sufferings will not have much power. In response to that, the next verse is presented.

15. *Snakes and insects,
The feelings of hunger and thirst,
Rashes and so forth,
Who has not seen it with these meaningless sufferings?*

The commentary goes on to say:

Answer: Why do you not see that if one meditates on patience for small and absolutely meaningless sufferings, such as the feelings of hunger and thirst, skin diseases, rashes and the like, that they then become tolerable, and if one does not meditate, they become difficult to bear. This is directly observable and it is therefore appropriate to meditate on patience.

This explanation is quite clear. The main point is why would you not see that if one meditates on patience for small and absolutely meaningless sufferings, that they will become tolerable. The commentary says that being hungry or thirsty or having rashes and the like are quite small inconveniences. They become tolerable if one practises patience, and they become difficult to bear if one does not practise patience. We can see how true this statement is from our own experience. If, when we are confronted with being hungry or a bit too hot, we allow our mind to become obsessed by that, and see that as a problem, then we start to become more and more uncomfortable. Whereas the moment we accept the discomfort and think, "Oh well, it's OK, I will tolerate it, and just deal with it", then it doesn't appear to be a big problem anymore. This reminds me that when we first went to India there were some who complained about the heat all the time. Other monks would say, "If you keep complaining about the heat, it will only get worse. Just forget about it. It is there anyway and you won't make it go away by complaining about it. Better to just accept it". When you accept something you don't think too much about it, and it doesn't bother you so much.

The main point is that if we develop a mind of accepting everyday difficulties and problems, and practise patience with them, then they become tolerable and not so much of a problem. Whereas if we don't practise the patience of tolerating them, then they always appear as problems, and the discomfort will become greater and greater. Think about today, which was a bit warm. If we have allowed our mind to accept it, then it will actually be quite pleasant. There are some who actually like the heat and don't see it as a problem. If we have accepted a warm day today and another warm day comes up tomorrow, then it will not be too difficult to bear, because you have already accepted it today. Whereas if you haven't accepted it today, and tomorrow is also a hot day, it will seem to be an even greater problem. We can definitely understand this from our own experience.

If we train our mind to accept a bit of heat, then, through that familiarisation, we will be able to tolerate heat, and it will not be a hindrance as we carry on with our lives. We will be able to do whatever we need to do, because we have trained our mind to accept it. Likewise, if we accept the cold then, through that familiarity, we will not be hindered when it is continuously cold. We will be able to carry on doing whatever we need to do. When we train our mind to accept things, then external conditions will not be a hindrance or an obstruction to our activities.

This reminds me of one time when I went to New Zealand. When I come out of the plane, the hostesses seemed very concerned that one of my arms was bare, but that's normal for me. It comes back to the practice of patience, particularly the patience of willingly accepting hardship. When one willingly accepts hardship, then through familiarity with accepting that hardship, it becomes easier to tolerate, and we will not experience any mental suffering. So we need to reflect the great benefit of tolerating suffering.

1.3.1.3. THE OBJECT TO TOLERATE

This basically refers to the object of patience that is to be tolerated, and the relevant verse is:

16. *I should not be impatient with
Heat, cold, rain, wind and so forth,
Sickness, bondage and beatings,
If I do so the harm will increase.*

Here Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of the verse as:

One should not be impatient with heat or cold, rain and wind, sickness, being bound by ropes or being beaten with a stick and so forth, because if one is impatient with small harms, this will only further increase the harm, as patience decreases.

We often experience heat, cold, rain, and wind, and there are definitely occasions where we feel too hot or too cold, and times when there is torrential rain or strong winds. And, of course, to different degrees we all have experienced some ailments and felt physical discomfort. Of course most of us would not have experienced being bound by a rope or beaten, but that does happen to others. These are some examples of the sufferings that occur on a regular basis.

It is because they occur so regularly that we should be patient with these relatively small discomforts. If we are not patient with them then our suffering will only increase. It won't be because the intensity of the actual harm increases, but because our mind does not accept it, and does not apply any patience or tolerance to the suffering. Then the suffering actually increases, by virtue of the sheer fact that our patience itself decreases. As we become less patient with the suffering, our discomfort seems to increase in our mind. Indeed, if we don't begin to practise patience with the small harms that we encounter regularly, then what else are we planning to be patient with? How else are we going to practise patience if we can't be patient with the regular suffering that we experience in our daily lives? We need to begin to develop a mind of tolerance and patience towards the regular discomforts we experience, which will then prevent our mind from becoming impatient with greater sufferings later on.

Of course there are many stories of how, through familiarity, things which may otherwise have been completely intolerable, are tolerated and accepted.

Recently I heard of a monk from the same province in Tibet that I come from, who was recently imprisoned because he had recited the Prayer for the Long Life of the Dalai Lama. While in prison he started to recite it even more, for which he earned more beatings. But the more they beat him the louder he shouted the long life prayer. It came to the point where the guards themselves were nonplussed. Rather than struggling and screaming, and begging the guards to stop the beatings, he increased the volume of his recitation of the verses of the prayer. The guards were amazed and came to a point where they didn't know what to do with him!

Willingly tolerating hardship and suffering is indispensable to our practice and wellbeing. If we don't tolerate them, it is as if the hardships and sufferings become our master and we, like slaves, are dominated by them. Once we willingly accept the hardships and difficulties, then we become the master rather than the slave. These are important points for us to consider.

1.3.1.4. AN EXAMPLE OF HOW, THROUGH FAMILIARITY, THE STRENGTH OF PATIENCE INCREASES

The relevant lines of verse are:

17. *For some, seeing their own blood,
Will increase their steadfastness and courage.
Some, when seeing the blood of others,
Faint and become unconscious.*

18ab. *This comes about due to natural
Firmness of the mind and fear.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads

For some brave person, seeing their own blood upon being injured by a weapon will only increase their steadfastness and courage. Some cowards will faint and become unconscious even when they see the blood of someone else. This does not come about through the force of the external object, whether it is large or small, nor does it come about due to a soft or hard body. It comes about solely through the mind being either firm or timid.

Therefore, one should strive in meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering.

Some brave people, even seeing their own blood upon being injured by a weapon will only increase their steadfastness and courage. When, out of bravery, people go into combat and see blood, then that further intensifies their eagerness to overcome their foe. Rather than becoming discouraged, seeing blood actually gives them even more courage. There are also some cowards who, let alone not being able to tolerate the sight of their own blood, become despondent and lose courage and actually faint when they see the blood of others.

You might also have come across people who faint when they see blood, because they have a mind that is not able to tolerate that. As explained in the commentary, this is not dependent on external conditions and objects. For some, blood makes their mind even more courageous, while others become discouraged, and faint. The difference is solely in the mind that interprets the situation. Therefore, as the commentary explains, one should strive in meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering. As the illustrations in the verse and commentary indicate, the benefit of tolerating suffering is that it makes the mind much more courageous.

As illustrated in the commentary, bravery is very much related to the intensity of the mind wishing to go into combat. This reminds me of an account that was related to me by someone from my home town. When the Red Guards came in, one man, who was known for his bravery, showed great courage. Using his simple gun he tried to fight the Chinese. At one point he was shot and fatally wounded, but he didn't drop dead right away. He kept on trying, unsuccessfully, to stand up and face the Chinese. Those around him saw his condition, and knew that he couldn't do anything, but they could also see his determination to try to overcome the person who shot him. After a while they were able to tell him that the person who shot him had been killed. Only then did the wounded man relax and pass on.

This story really shows the power of the mind. With intense determination it can even prevent immediate death and hold on to life. However, the moment someone lets go of such a mind then they pass on.

Then there is the situation of extreme fear. I heard another account of someone who was normally quite a skilled horseman, but in the face of the enemy coming, was so afraid that he was not even able to get onto his horse properly. In his haste, rather than putting his foot in the stirrup, he was trying to mount his horse by putting his knee into the stirrup! So, being really fearful can be a real disadvantage!

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Su Lan Foo

Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

28 October 2014

As usual, let us spend some time in meditation.

[meditation]

As we have just attempted in our short meditation, it is definitely highly worthwhile to familiarise yourself with the practice of tong len, i.e. giving and taking.

This should not be restricted just to this short session of meditation but is something you need to train yourself in in your everyday life, at every occasion and in any circumstance you find yourself in. In particular, this relates to any happiness you may experience in your daily activities e.g. the joys of eating and drinking etc. As soon as you experience these normal enjoyments, remind yourself to give that joy and happiness to other sentient beings. Then, whenever you encounter some difficulties or hardships, in whatever form, the moment you feel discomfort at any level, immediately try and use that as a way of taking the suffering of other sentient beings upon yourself. Remind yourself: "Since I'm experiencing this hardship now, may it become a means to take the suffering of other sentient beings upon myself." When you train yourself in this way you become more familiar with the actual practice of tong len. Then due to that regular familiarity, your meditation practice will become more profound.

The practical benefit you get from this practice is that it helps to reduce the negativity of generating attachment and anger when facing everyday life situations. When you experience joys and pleasures, if you are not mindful, these can cause increased attachment. But if you give that joy and happiness away to other sentient beings, there will be less attachment involved, which will reduce attachment to the pleasures and joys regularly experienced. Likewise, when you experience difficulties, willingly taking on the suffering of other sentient beings prevents anger from arising in your mind. In this way, tong len is a highly significant practice.

In this way we can see and relate to the effect of this practice outside of the formal meditation session. It would be a little strange if the practice is restricted to a few minutes of sitting in some formal meditation. If that were the case, then when you come out of the meditation, it may appear that the practice is not relevant and unnecessary. But that shouldn't be the case—that is the complete opposite of the significance of that practice. Whatever practice you attempt to do in a formal sitting, you need to ensure that the effects of it are carried through to your everyday lives, and then the real benefits of the practice will be felt. You will then have a constant 'guide' with you, reminding you of what is appropriate to engage in, and what is inappropriate and to be avoided.

Now you may set your motivation for receiving the teachings. As usual, generate the motivation along these lines: For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in the teaching and put it into practice well.

1.1. Meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering

1.1.3. Contemplating how they are not different once habituated (cont.)

1.1.3.2. SUMMARY

The verse reads:

18cd. *Therefore one should disregard harms
And not be influenced by sufferings.*

19ab. *The skilled, although receiving sufferings,
Remain with the clarity of their mind
unpolluted.*

The commentary then reads:

Therefore one should make one's mind stable, disregard any harm received and not be influenced by the suffering. Those who are skilled in meditating on the Mahayana path, although receiving sufferings, through meditating on patience remain with their mind clear and not polluted by anger.

Based on the reasons presented earlier, relating to the need to tolerate the sufferings etc. one should make one's mind stable or firm. 'Firm' in this context means not allowing the mind to become agitated or troubled, particularly in the face of harm or suffering that one may experience.

In disregard any harm received and not be influenced by the suffering, 'disregarding harm' means that while one may experience the difficulties of the harm, do not allow this to disturb one's mind and become influenced by the sufferings one experiences. What is particularly highlighted here is the way one needs to be able to willingly accept and tolerate the sufferings, which is the real mark of practising patience. As explained further on, those who are skilled in meditating on the Mahayana path, although receiving sufferings, through meditating on patience remain with their mind clear and not polluted by anger. This sentence explains that those who earnestly follow the Mahayana path are the ones who voluntarily accept the sufferings. Those who are skilled particularly refers to the bodhisattvas who are engaging in the Mahayana path. And while they experience suffering, by meditating on patience their minds remain clear and unpolluted by the faults of anger.

In summary, what is being presented here is that if one engages in the practice of willingly accepting suffering, then the mind will not be affected and become unhappy. Then, if the mind is not unhappy, there is no room for the pollution of anger to take effect. This is how one protects one's mind from the pollution of anger. In this way (with a clear state of mind) one's mind is undisturbed and protected from the negativity of anger. We need to understand that these are highly profound levels of practice, see their significance, and incorporate this approach into our lives now. If you relate to these passages and think, 'Oh it does make sense!', but then regularly leave it aside, you will never benefit from it. Whereas if you implement it into your daily life, you will see the real benefit and significance. These verses are actually speaking to us personally—they are a personal instruction. This is how we need to derive the benefit.

1.1.4. The benefits of striving to abandon afflictions

The relevant verses here are the second two lines of the previous verse:

19cd. *One wages war with the afflictions
And while waging war there is much harm.*

20. *Disregard all sufferings
And destroy the enemies of anger and so forth.
They who win thus are heroes,
The rest kill corpses.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary clearly presents the meaning of these verses:

The objects of abandonment, such as the affliction of anger, and their antidotes are at war, and during the time of waging war many sufferings arise. If in worldly terms someone who disregards the harm inflicted by weapons and kills the enemy is called a hero, then someone who disregards all physical and mental sufferings, destroys the enemy of anger and conquers the afflictions, should be definitely called a hero. The rest kill the ones who die anyway by themselves, which is just like killing corpses. They should not be called heroes.

As the commentary explains, the objects of abandonment, such as the affliction of anger, and their antidotes are at war. Using some examples, the antidote for attachment would be meditating on the imperfections of the objects of attachment. Therefore within one's mind, meditating on the imperfections of the object would be like a war (or battle) between the antidote and the affliction. Likewise, a mind meditating on the various categories of phenomena, and ultimately emptiness, would be at war with ignorance.

It is useful to use the analogy of an external battle to illustrate the internal battle of the antidotes overcoming the afflictions. Just as a lot of suffering (wounds and even death) is experienced with external wars, internal conflict also brings difficulties and hardships. What is being presented here is that it is worthwhile to endure those sufferings and difficulties when combating the inner enemies of the afflictions.

A further analogy given here is that in worldly terms someone who disregards the harm inflicted by weapons and kills the enemy is called a hero. This illustrates that if someone goes to war and vanquishes the enemy, they will be honoured as a hero upon their return, as they have willingly endured pain and suffering during the war. We can see for ourselves that elderly war veterans are proud to wear their medals! Using my own experience, I know that even when there is some suffering, it is easily disregarded during the time of conflict or fighting. When I was young and got into fights with another young monk, even when I had wounds on my head and was bleeding, I was still able to go forward and fight with him. So I can definitely say that it is true that one is able to disregard wounds and pain when fiercely attempting to overcome the enemy.

You need to derive an understanding of how this illustration fits the meaning of what is being explained. When ordinary beings go to war to overcome an enemy, there is a lot of hardship and harm inflicted upon them, but this is endured because of the willingness to do so. If one does not willingly accept the harms, one cannot go forth and overcome the enemy (and later be renowned as a hero). Being known as a hero is due to having endured the hardships and harms inflicted during combat. So it is not in spite of, but despite of the harms that one is later renowned as a hero. If it is the case that one who disregards the harm inflicted by weapons and kills the enemy should definitely be called a hero, then someone who disregards all physical and mental sufferings, destroys the enemy of anger and conquers the afflictions, should definitely be called a hero.

What is being explained here is that when in combat with the inner enemies i.e. the afflictions, applying antidotes such as meditating on imperfections to overcome attachment, and meditating on compassion to overcome anger, and meditating on emptiness to overcome ignorance, all require repeated meditation, again and again. It is not something that is quick and easy to apply. One cannot meditate once on the imperfections of attachment, and then attachment is suddenly overcome! In fact, sometimes the more we try to overcome attachment, the stronger it seems to become, and the more difficult it is to deal with.

In a worldly sense, someone can destroy the enemy and return from combat as a hero. The commentary states that this is similar to killing corpses as the external enemies will die naturally anyway, even without being killed. However inner afflictions are the complete opposite. If you leave inner afflictions and don't do anything about overcoming them, they will only become stronger and stronger. For example, if you don't apply antidotes to overcome attachment, and allow it to remain in your mind, indulging it, it only becomes stronger, even to the point of becoming seemingly impossible to overcome. This is also true for anger, ignorance and all other afflictions. So, unlike the external enemies, the inner enemies of the afflictions will only become stronger.

If ordinary beings who destroy external enemies are regarded as heroes, then someone engaged in the combat of overcoming the inner enemy of the afflictions should definitely be worthy of being called a real hero, as it is much more difficult to overcome the inner enemies. The commentary concludes by saying those who destroy their external foes should not be called heroes.

To reiterate the main point: having recognised the inner afflictions as the real enemies that destroy one's happiness and peace, one must destroy the afflictions by engaging in combat, which means applying the antidotes. Without this the afflictions cannot be naturally overcome. In addressing the afflictions one will be faced with hardships, but the hardships are worthwhile, because one has applied the antidotes, and so will definitely be able to overcome them. Once overcome, one will be a hero in the true sense, and worthy of veneration.

1.1.5. Extensive explanation of the benefits of suffering

The literal translation 'the benefits of suffering' may seem awkward so it can be understood as 'the benefits of seeing the faults of the suffering.'

21. *Further, the qualities of suffering are:
Through despondence it destroys pride,
It generates compassion for those circling in
samsara,
Fearing negativities and joy for virtue.*

Four benefits which are defined. The commentary reads:

Further, meditating on suffering is a great summary of the key points of practice. As the benefits of contemplating the shortcomings of sufferings are:

Seeing that one is controlled by suffering one becomes disheartened, which destroys the haughtiness of pride and arrogance.

Seeing that others are under the control of suffering one generates the compassion that thinks: How wonderful it would be if sentient beings were free from suffering.

Seeing that the suffering is the result of non-virtue and since one does not want suffering, one refrains from negativity.

Since one does not wish suffering and desires happiness, and seeing happiness to be the result of virtue one generates joy in virtue.

As Gyaltsab Je mentions in the opening line, Further meditating on suffering is a great summary of the key points of practice. Earlier I related that meditating, thinking, contemplating on the sufferings, really embracing them and seeing their benefits as a way to overcome them, is actually the main point of the practice. It really is a highly significant practice.

Then Gyaltsab Je elaborates on benefits of contemplating the shortcomings of sufferings.

As one experiences the sufferings one will be able to reflect upon the reality that one is still under their control and not completely free. Because of this one becomes disheartened and experiences a little sadness due to the suffering, and by being confronted with the fact that one is still controlled by the sufferings. That in itself helps to destroy any sense of haughtiness or sense that everything is fine for oneself; also pride and arrogance can be overcome.

Seeing others suffering refers to other ordinary beings who are still under the control of suffering. So seeing those in a pitiful state, one generates compassion thinking, "How wonderful it would be if they were free from suffering."

Understanding suffering as the result of non-virtue, and seeing that one does not want suffering, one will refrain from non-virtue. This, again, is a highly significant point in relation to our own practice. When one experiences suffering, one should immediately try and see that, "the suffering I am experiencing now is none other than the results of the non-virtue that I have created in the past." Since one does not wish for any kind of suffering, seeing it as a result of one's non-virtue can become an impetus to refrain from creating more negativity. In this way, experiencing suffering can help to prevent one from creating negativities such as killing and stealing etc. Thus, one refrains from the ten non-virtuous deeds.

The significant point here is that for those of us who already have a conviction in karma—this will not really make much sense if one doesn't already believe in karma—one can immediately relate to the unpleasant experience of suffering as being the results of non-virtue. One can take the suffering itself as caution not to create further non-virtues, shunning negativity and non-virtue, because one does not wish to prolong the unpleasant experience of suffering in the future. This then becomes the impetus. Since one does not wish for suffering, but desires happiness, and seeing happiness as the result of virtue, one will aim to generate virtue. The commentary specifically mentions how all are equal in wanting happiness and not wanting any kind of suffering: since one does not wish suffering and desires happiness, and seeing that happiness then is to be the result of virtue one generates joy or enthusiasm in creating virtue. So from the presentation here we can incorporate an understanding of karma as well as refuge. By contemplating this one has a way to overcome the sufferings.

These few lines really carry great depth in meaning and are an impetus for practice. The words one does not wish suffering and desires happiness are simple words. When we contemplate them and incorporate them into a broad understanding of the teachings, then because one does not wish for suffering, one thinks "I need to avoid non-virtues and stop creating negativity", and because one desires happiness one thinks "I must create virtue" and so adopt virtues to create positive karma. Take the line one does not wish for suffering and desired happiness as an impetus for your own personal practice. Shun non-virtue and adopt virtue. It also becomes a strong motivator to generate compassion for others. When one sees others experiencing suffering and deprived of happiness, this becomes a reason to generate strong compassion for them.

Thus one reflects, "just as I do not wish for any suffering and wish for every kind of happiness, it is exactly the same for others as well". When others are experiencing great suffering, one relates to that as being really unfortunate, and wishes that they experience happiness. When others are deprived of happiness, wishing them happiness becomes a strong motivator. So begin with yourself, relating to your personal experience, and then you can relate that to others. We can all immediately relate to the truth of these factors. Because of the great points presented in these few lines of verse Gyaltsab Je mentions they are a great summary of the key points of the practice.

As mentioned in recent sessions, there are many accounts of practitioners who, by having contemplated on suffering, and by experiencing it, have accumulated great amounts of merit and engaged in great practices of purification to achieve great goals. However there are no accounts of practitioners who have achieved these goals, or even engaged in these practices, by experiencing pleasures. When considering the benefits of contemplating sufferings, taken in the context of the entire path, it is definitely the case that practitioners of all three scopes—small, medium and great—experience significant results through not wanting to experience suffering due to seeing its disadvantages and faults. Therefore contemplating the faults of samsara is what leads you to liberation. Conversely, if one seeks the pleasures of samsara, then this is what keeps one in samsara, rather than being freed from it. If one voluntarily and intentionally seeks the pleasures of samsara, there is no way that one will be free from it. How can one possibly achieve liberation if one intentionally seeks the means to remain in samsara?

This is how we need to think in a broader sense: contemplating the sufferings is a highly significant impetus for the practices. If one can see that this is a way to ultimately become free from suffering, one can willingly take it on as a practice. Sometimes there are comments about people who feel a bit overwhelmed hearing about suffering again and again, who say "There is too much focus on suffering. I don't want to hear about suffering." This occurs when one does not see the benefits, or cannot relate to the purpose and real reason for meditating on suffering. While it may seem that hearing about suffering is unpleasant, when one thoroughly contemplates the disadvantages of suffering, such as remaining in samsara to experience birth, sickness, ageing and death, then one contemplates reality. That becomes the impetus to really generate a strong wish to be free from samsara, and then suffering has served its purpose. So if one does not want to think about the sufferings of samsara, and only seeks the pleasures of samsara, then the wish to be free from it will never arise in one's mind. If we don't see the benefits of being free from samsara then why do people long to be free? And why would we want to develop an aspiration for liberation?

This is how we need to understand the significance of meditating on the various types of suffering in samsara, as presented in the teachings in great detail. At the moment we may not immediately be able to relate to the various types of sufferings in different realms. But if we take the initiative to meditate on them, imagining we are experiencing those sufferings, then, through familiarity we can gain a real sense of what the sufferings would be like, even though we are not experiencing them now. One can imagine what it would be like, how unbearable it would be, if one were to actually experience such suffering. When one reaches that level in one's meditation it has become a personal experience. In time, a strong longing to be free from such suffering, and to be free from samsara, will definitely arise. One does not just feel the conviction to be free from the suffering of samsara in theory.

While it is true that without experience, it is hard for us to immediately relate to the sufferings, with familiarity we can gain that experience. This reminds me of a remark made by a lama some time ago. He was an ordained monk and a good student for many years, but later disrobed. Then he led a normal life, had a relationship, got engaged and went through the normal ups and downs of life. Later on, he related to some of his students, "Now I can understand what your suffering is all about". So he was able to relate the sufferings of relationships and so forth through his own personal experience.

Another account that I have mentioned previously is about a German lady who received teachings from Geshe Ngawang Dhargey when he was at Atisha Centre. She related to me that it was very meaningful, and that she got a lot out of teaching, but she confessed, "He talked a lot about suffering, and I am not too sure about all of that, but nevertheless, the teachings were very meaningful." She wasn't refuting the validity of those sufferings, but said "I am not too sure about that". Then, a couple of years later, when I met her again, she said, "Now I can definitely relate to the sufferings and I totally understand the significance of them. That is exactly true." Just as Geshe Ngawang Dhargey had related, she found it to be true for herself. This shows that when we have some experience or a deeper understanding, then we will gain a real conviction.

The significance of contemplating on the various types of sufferings, particularly thinking of death and impermanence, is that with a certain amount of familiarity it will become an integral part of one's practice. Furthermore, one will be able to maintain a constant impetus to be consistent with one's practice. In particular, meditating on the certainty of death, and the uncertainty of the time of death, one reaches the point where one recognises the truth in this. When one has a personal experience of it, rather than it just being a theory, it generates a conviction in one's mind and one will always be mindful of what one is doing—whether eating, walking or sitting. Whatever we may be engaged with, one will always try to incorporate that activity into one's practice, knowing that death can happen at any time, and that one should not waste time with meaningless activities. To that extent, the practice becomes authentic and one's purpose becomes that of a real practitioner. Without this sort of personal experience and conviction, it is very hard to claim to be a true practitioner. It is hard to regularly implement the practice in one's daily life, so we need to strive to generate some conviction in whatever practice it may be. Even if it is only a few points, to try to make an attempt to generate that conviction, whatever the practice may be.

Even though it might seem as though I am side-tracking from the actual topic, these are really important points for your practice, particularly in relation to recalling death and impermanence, which is really essential for one's practice to become more pure. Without familiarity with meditating on death and impermanence, cherishing this life and grasping at it will arise very easily. Then, whatever practice we do while clinging to this life will be mostly a worldly dharma.

Even if we meditated, the practice would only be a worldly concern rather than a real practice.

1.2. Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma

This is subdivided into two:

1.2.1. Extensive

1.2.2. Summary

Maybe we can cover this in our next session. So you can prepare yourselves by familiarising yourselves with the commentary, and also refer to the Lam Rim teachings.

Also it might be a little bit hard to read it all, and I don't know if you have access to it, but the Compendium of Practices by Shantideva himself is also a very good text to study. The chapter on patience also has a lot of information, and there are a lot of quotations from the sutras as a way to show the source of these teachings.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

4 November 2014

As usual let us spend some time in our meditation practice.

Meditation

We can set our motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will receive the teachings and put them into practice well.

Indeed, generating the bodhicitta motivation is of utmost importance. We have already established the basis of bodhicitta in our mind through our understanding of how to generate bodhicitta with either the seven-point cause and effect sequence, or the exchanging self with other technique. We need to further develop that basis by familiarising our mind with the bodhicitta motivation in every Dharma activity in which we engage. As mentioned regularly, the process of developing bodhicitta involves first generating the bodhicitta mind which has not yet been generated; once generated, to firmly establish it; and then further increase it to higher and higher levels. This is how we need to accustom our mind with bodhicitta at all levels of our practice.

Bodhicitta is the essence of the Mahayana teachings, with which we already have some familiarity. If we don't work on developing what we have already understood, and grasp on to some other form of practice, then we have entirely missed the point! Until we achieve enlightenment, we need to be continuously developing and perfecting the bodhicitta attitude, beginning with generating a contrived bodhicitta motivation, through to actually generating bodhicitta, and then engaging in the practice of the six perfections.

Although we have not yet actually generated bodhicitta, we can definitely generate a contrived bodhicitta attitude, which we can then further develop on the basis of that positive motivation. Furthermore, even though we are not yet able to practise the perfection of generosity we can definitely practise a similitude of that in the form of engaging in charitable activities. By familiarising ourselves with similitudes of both bodhicitta and the practices of the six perfections, we will gradually develop them within our mental continuum until we reach enlightenment.

1.2. Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma

This section shows us how to meditate on the patience that definitely relies on Dharma, which is one the three types of patience.

The previous section of the text explained how to rely on the patience that tolerates the suffering that we experience. As mentioned previously, this is the core practice that allows us to engage in the practice of the Dharma itself. This tolerance of suffering is developed by contemplating the benefits of suffering, rather than seeing it as an obstacle. As mentioned previously, it was only by enduring hardships and difficulties that the great practitioners of the past were able to engage in their practices. In fact, becoming a real practitioner can only be achieved by enduring hardships and difficulties—there is no other way to become a real Dharma practitioner. I could be wrong, but this is what I personally understand from these explanations.

Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma relate to the core Dharma of contemplating the two selflessnesses. Understanding selflessness and emptiness requires a lot of study, investigation and contemplation, and thus it involves hardship and difficulties. Although Nagarjuna and Chandrakirti elucidated the two selflessnesses very clearly, we still have difficulty in gaining a really good understanding of selflessness and emptiness. Thus we need to develop the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma.

The two subdivisions of this section of the text are:

1.2.1. Extensive

1.2.2. Summary

1.2.1. Extensive

The extensive explanation has three parts:

1.2.1.1. Anger and those getting angry depend on causes, and therefore lack independence

1.2.1.2. Refuting the existence of independent causes

1.2.1.3. The need for reversing anger

1.2.1.1. ANGER AND THOSE GETTING ANGRY DEPEND ON CAUSES, AND THEREFORE LACK INDEPENDENCE

This outline indicates that anger and the angry person are not independent; basically because things are dependent on causes and conditions. So what is presented here, in essence, is the dependent arising nature of all phenomena. Since everything is dependent on causes and conditions, neither anger nor the angry person can be independent.

If the angry person were to be independent, then it would not be possible for them to transform. It is because the angry person does not exist independently that it is possible for them to change and become a less angry person. Likewise, anger itself is also not an independent entity but arises due to causes and conditions. Therefore, by causing the cessation of the causes of anger, it is possible to overcome anger. We really need to understand this very profound point. In simple terms, what I derive from the explanation here is that we don't need to be slaves of anger, rather we need to be in control over our own mind, and abandon anger.

This section has two subdivisions:

1.2.1.1.1. Anger and the angry person are not independent

1.2.1.1.2. Their causes and conditions are not independent

1.2.1.1.1. Anger and the angry person are not independent

This in turn is subdivided into three:

1.2.1.1.1.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to be angry at an afflicted person

1.2.1.1.1.2. Anger is not generated volitionally

1.2.1.1.1.3. Since all faults are generated in dependence on conditions, they lack independence.

1.2.1.1.1.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to be angry at an afflicted person

This is a significant point that we really need to understand.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with a hypothetical argument.

Argument: Since the other person harms me, it is suitable to get angry at them.

The point of this hypothetical argument is that it is suitable to be angry with any person who harms us. The reasoning here is that the cause of anger is the person who inflicts the harm, and not the actual harm itself. Even though the actual cause of the pain is the harm, one does not use that as a reason to generate anger. Rather, the anger is directed at the person who inflicts the harm.

In answer to that hypothetical argument, these three lines of verse are presented.

*22abc. If one is not angry at bile disease and
Other great sources of suffering,
Then why be angry at the ones with mind,*

As an explanation of these lines, the commentary begins with a response to the original hypothetical argument.

Answer: It is unsuitable.

Then the commentary explains the reason:

One does not get angry at bile disease and the like, which are a great source for the suffering of the disturbance of imbalance. Why would one then get angry at a sentient being, i.e. a being with mind?

Basically, when we experience great suffering from diseases such as bile and so forth, we do not consider becoming angry with the disease that is the cause for that suffering. So why then does one find it reasonable to become angry with an individual being who has a mind, and consider them to be the cause of our suffering?

The irrationality of our response is that while we don't become angry with a disease, for example, we find reason to become angry with an individual, when in fact, as we perceive it, both have equally caused us suffering.

Then Gyaltsab Je presents another hypothetical argument:

Argument: Since bile disease and so forth arise without control one does not get angry at them.

In answer to that a counter argument is presented:

Answer: Then it follows it is also unsuitable to be angry at the person ...

Then the following lines from the root text are presented:

*22d. Which are also all induced by conditions.
23. For example, although one does not desire it,
The sickness arises anyway.
Similarly, although one does not desire it,
The afflictions are generated powerfully.*

One needs to relate this to our understanding of interdependence and emptiness. If there is no cause of suffering, then there cannot be a result. So suffering cannot be experienced as an independent result, because the cause lacks independent existence, and is, itself, dependent on causes and conditions. Therefore the results are also interdependent, as they only arise when the causes and conditions are intact.

When one relates this understanding of interdependent origination to the lack of independent existence, then that really contributes to an understanding of how everything is empty of independent existence. We should apply our understanding of interdependence and emptiness to derive a more profound understanding of why it is unsuitable to be angry with an afflicted person. Then one can really make progress.

The commentary concludes with:

... because afflicted beings are ordered around by the condition of their afflictions and hence do not have control of their actions.

For example, similar to this sickness arising against one's wish when the conditions are complete, this person does not desire to be angry, but due to the cause of mental unhappiness and the like, the afflictions arise strongly. Therefore, if one were to get angry, then one should get angry at the afflictions and not at the person.

As presented here, because afflicted beings are ordered around by the condition of the afflictions they do not have control of their actions. Everything is dependent on its own particular causes and conditions. Being under the control of the delusions, beings do not have control over their actions, and are compelled to engage in actions that cause harm. And these delusions are themselves also dependent on many causes and conditions.

So the individual who causes us harm is not really an appropriate object for our anger, because they are not engaging in those harmful actions voluntarily. Rather, they are engaging in harmful actions because they are under the control of the delusions.

As mentioned previously, people engage in harmful actions because their mind is unhappy. When the mind is afflicted by delusions it is not a happy mind. We know from our personal experience that when our mind is affected by any of the delusions it is in a state of turmoil, and it is a troubled, unhappy mind. And, as we have seen, an unhappy mind is the basis for anger.

When one contemplates these points then, rather than finding reason to become angry at the individual causing harm, one feels compassion. That is because they are completely under the control of delusions that are causing them agony and unhappiness, which is the cause of their harmful actions. Therefore they are actually an object of compassion, rather than an object of anger.

Then the commentary goes on to present the analogy that the delusions are similar to this sickness arising against one's wish when the conditions are complete. The analogy is that when all the causes and conditions for sickness are intact, then the inevitable effect is sickness. As presented in other texts, when all the causes and conditions are intact then there is nothing that can avert the consequences. So when all the conditions for sickness are present then the result of illness will definitely be experienced.

When the commentary says, this person does not desire to be angry, but due to the cause of mental unhappiness and the like the afflictions arise strongly, it is indicating that although people don't want to be angry, because they know that is not a desirable state to be in, anger will nevertheless arise when all the causes and conditions, particularly the cause of mental unhappiness and the like, are intact. Because of their unhappiness the afflictions arise strongly, resulting in harmful actions.

So the individual person is not really to blame. Being completely under the control of the delusions, they become angry when the causes and conditions are intact, and are compelled to engage in harmful actions. So the cause of their behaviour is ultimately the afflictions. If one is to become angry, then one should be angry with the afflictions and not the person. This is really the crux of the presentation: if one is to become upset, then it should be with the afflictions themselves, which are harboured within one's own mind.

On a personal level we can understand that just as afflictions cause other people to become angry and create harmful actions, our own afflictions cause us to become upset and angry. 'Just as those who cause me harm are affected by the afflictions, I too am afflicted by the delusions, so that is what I need to target, not the individual person.' By contemplating this point, one develops patience with other people through understanding how they are affected by causes and conditions.

However, we should not be patient with the afflictions themselves because that will only cause us further harm. So one applies measures to completely overcome and destroy the afflictions.

1.2.1.1.2. Anger is not generated volitionally

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section with another hypothetical argument:

Argument: Since the other person thinks 'I shall harm', it is not the same as with the afflictions.

We will be familiar with this hypothetical argument. We might reason that although the afflictions don't have an intention to harm us, the person definitely does. Using that reasoning, one might think it reasonable to become upset with the person.

The next verse presents the means to overcome such doubts:

24. *Although not thinking, 'I should get angry',
Beings become angry naturally.
Although not thinking, 'I shall generate',
Anger generates likewise.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse in the following manner:

Answer: Although the causes do not think 'I shall generate anger', when the conditions are complete then beings generate anger without any choice. Although afflictions do not think 'I shall generate', anger is generated likewise. They do not have any freedom of action.

Otherwise, the first half can be related to the person and the second to the condition of the afflictions.

When anger arises due to causes and conditions, it is not as though the causes themselves think, 'I shall generate anger', and then generate anger. Rather, when the conditions are complete, beings generate anger without any choice. So it is not a voluntary act, where the causes think, 'Now I will cause anger'. Rather, when all the conditions are complete, then, even without a prior intention, one becomes angry. In that very instant, without even thinking about the conditions being intact, anger is generated spontaneously, without any choice.

Although afflictions do not think, 'I shall generate', anger generates likewise, indicates that it is not as if the afflictions themselves are demanding that anger should arise. Rather, the anger just naturally arises when the conditions are intact. Therefore there is no freedom of action.

In saying, Otherwise, the first half can be related to the person and the second to the condition of the afflictions, Gyaltsab Je is indicating how on a practical level we may adopt the understanding that both the person and the afflictions have some role in the generation of anger. This explanation may sound a bit fairer to us.

1.2.1.1.3. Since all faults are dependent on conditions, they lack independence

25. *All the faults that are found,
And the variety of negativities,
They all arise through the force of condition,
They do not have independence.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

All the faults of afflictions that are found, and the variety of negativities that arise from them, also arise through the force of conditions, and do not have independence. Similar to it not being suitable to get angry at water flowing downhill, thinking about these reasons stops anger.

All the faults of afflictions that are found, and the variety of negativities that arise from them, also arise through the force of conditions, and do not have independence, refers to the fact that while we do not wish to be influenced by the afflictions and create negativities, it is as if we have no control over them. When the conditions for the afflictions to arise are intact, then one does not have any control. This is also true for others. By contemplating this reality, particularly in relation to those who inflict harm, we will understand that they are completely under the control of the afflictions, and therefore have no control over their own actions.

The analogy—it is similar to not becoming angry about water flowing downhill—uses an illustration from the reasoning of nature, which is one of the four types of reasonings.¹ One would not become upset and angry about water flowing downhill, because that is its nature. Likewise, when others have the conditions for afflictions to arise, then the natural consequence is that they will engage in harm. Thus we should not become angry with them, but instead blame the afflictions.

¹ There are six different modes of research or investigation, and the sixth is the research of reasoning, which in turn is subdivided into four: 1. The reasoning of dependence, 2. the reasoning of the performance of function, 3. The reasoning of nature 4. The reasoning of valid establishment.

Source: The Dalai Lama at Harvard, Snow Lion publications

1.2.1.1.2. Their causes and conditions are not independent

Here we should take note of the meticulous presentation of the teaching, which is designed to rule out the possibility of any independent existence.

First of all, to overcome any notion that the faults and afflictions are independent, the faults were presented as being dependent on causes and conditions. Thus they lack independence.

One may then wonder whether the causes and conditions themselves are independent. So, to rule out that possibility, this presentation shows that the causes and conditions themselves are also not independent.

In our system, no matter how far you take it back, you cannot come to a point where you can find an entity that is an independent cause for other things to be produced. When other traditions trace the causes back, they come to the point where they have no choice but to accept an independent creator who is the primordial cause of all existence. These views will be presented in the next few verses.

What is being refuted under the heading Anger and the Angry Person Are Not Independent, is that an independent cause can produce other dependent phenomena. This will be presented in more detail later on.

The verse that is presented under this heading reads:

26. *The accumulation of conditions also
Does not have the thought 'I shall generate'.
That generated by them also does not Possess the thought 'Why was I generated?'*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Also the accumulation of conditions that generates the sufferings does not have the thought 'I shall generate these sufferings', and the generated sufferings also do not possess the thought, 'I was generated by them'.

Therefore it is unsuitable to be angry at the other person based on the reason that the other person thinks 'I shall inflict harm'.

The commentary quite clearly explains that it is not as though the accumulated conditions themselves have the voluntary thought, 'I will generate these sufferings'. Nor do the sufferings themselves have the thought, 'I was generated by them'. So therefore, it is unsuitable to be angry at the other person based on the faulty reasoning that the other person thinks 'I shall inflict harm'.

The afflictions themselves, and that which causes anger to arise, are all dependent on many other factors, i.e. the causes and conditions. In other words, they are not generated independently or voluntarily. Therefore one should not find reason to be angry with the person, thinking that they were actually in control, and saying, 'I shall inflict harm'.

1.2.1.2. REFUTING THE EXISTENCE OF INDEPENDENT CAUSES

Here there are three subdivisions.

1.2.1.2.1. Refuting the independent self and primary principle of the Enumerators

1.2.1.2.2. Refuting the independent self of the Logicians

1.2.1.2.3. It is unsuitable to become angry upon understanding all beings to be like an emanation.

1.2.1.2.1. Refuting the independent self and primary principle of the Enumerators

This is further subdivided into:

1.2.1.2.1.1. Refuting the generation of independent expressions by the principle

1.2.1.2.1.2. Refuting that the knowledge-being engages objects independently

The Enumerators are also known as the Samkhya school, which presents five characteristics of the self. We went over this in detail when we studied the Madhyamaka text.² In brief, the Samkhya school assert a permanent, unitary and independent self. They say that because the self is not momentary it is permanent; because the self lacks parts it is unitary; and because the self does not depend on causes and conditions it is independent. However this is all refuted in our system.

Next Tuesday there will be a teaching, the following Tuesday will be the discussion, followed by the exam, and there will be two more teachings in December. Tuesday, December 16, will be the Lama Tsong Khapa puja, which will conclude the sessions for the year.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Judy Mayne

Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

² See teachings of 22 April 2003, and 29 April 2003

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

11 November 2014

As usual let us spend some time in our meditation practice.
[meditation]

We can now set the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines—for the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will engage in the activity of listening to the teachings and put them into practice well.

The key factor of our motivation is the purpose of doing the activity, and the ultimate purpose here is that 'I must benefit other sentient beings'. So one has to put that at the forefront of one's aim in life and engage in virtuous activity for that purpose. Then our life becomes most meaningful.

1.2.1.2.1. Refuting the existence of independent causes

1.2.1.2.1.1. Refuting the generation of independent expressions by the principle

It was explained previously that the Samkhya school assert an independent entity called 'principle', or 'nature'. This is an entity which, while in itself is independent, causes other phenomena to arise from it.

The verses read:

27. *Whatever is accepted as that called principle,
And any imputation that is called self,
They do not arise volitionally, thinking
"I shall arise."*

28ab. *If the non-generated does not exist
How can one then posit generation?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse in the form of a syllogism.

Consider the dual subject—'The primary principle possessing five characteristics, which is an equilibrium of particle, darkness and courage¹, as well as the harms that are contained in its expressions' and 'the self that is imputed on the knowledge person'—it follows it is unsuitable to say that they are generated independently—because this very principle is like the horns of a rabbit that cannot perform actions. It does not arise volitionally thinking, "I shall arise to generate an independent expression" or "an independent experience of the object".

It follows it is unsuitable to assert that at the time of the generation of the result, a result is generated from the principle—because the principle itself is not generated. There is a pervasion because—if oneself is not generated, then one cannot generate a result. There is then a pervasion that one cannot generate a result.

So what is being presented here is the assertion of the primary principle (also known as nature or expression) by the Enumerators (the Samkhya non-Buddhist school), which possesses five characteristics that are the equilibrium of the three qualities: particle, darkness and courage. The five characteristics are:

1. It is the creator of all actions and so forth.
2. Since it is unproduced it is permanent.
3. Being partless it is a single entity
4. As it lacks consciousness it is merely an object.
5. It pervades the entire environment and all beings.

Some other texts present six characteristics, by combining the three qualities of particle, darkness and courage into one, and adding that to the five characteristics.

Some texts present the meaning of particle, or motility, as suffering, darkness as ignorance, and courage or lightness as happiness.

Detailed explanations have been presented numerous times in previous teachings, such as when we studied the Madhyamakavatara text² and also when we studied the ninth chapter of *Bodhisattvacharyavatara*³. It has also come up in the 400 Verses teaching⁴, in Nagarjuna's *Precious Garland*⁵ and of course in Tenets which I have taught twice. So when we come to a topic which presents these subjects it is good for you to refer back to those teachings, where I explained it in detail, as way to refresh your mind, and become more familiar with it. By referring to the texts again and again, eventually it will be implanted into our memory so that we won't forget it. This is what is meant by really putting an effort into understanding the Dharma texts and teachings.

According to Samkhya school, the primary principle possessing the five characteristics, which is equilibrium of the qualities of particle, darkness and courage, as well as all harms contained in its expression, arise independently. We need to reflect on whether this holds true. Is this explanation in accordance with the reality of how things exist? Do things exist independently as an expression of the primary principle? Would it be reasonable to accept that? This is how you need to reflect on their presentation.

The Samkhyas assert that what they call a knowledge-being, or conscious principle, is an independent entity. They consider the primary principle itself (with its five characteristics) as arising independently. They assert this, because they believe that the experiences of suffering and happiness arise independently. Thus, because feelings arise independently, the knowledge-being (or self), who experiences these feelings, also has to be independent. This is their assertion. By understanding this we will know what is being refuted. They believe the knowledge-being or self is a solitary, independent entity, which has only one consciousness, but which functions through the five senses. For example, if there is a person looking out of five different windows in a building, they assert that it is the same consciousness that functions through the five different senses. This is how they assert a single consciousness that functions through the five senses.

The Madhyamakavatara text presents the Samkhya's assertion of a self in this verse:

A self that is a consumer, permanent, not a creator,
Lacking qualities and activity is imputed by the Forders.
In dependence on very slight distinctions of that;
There are the different systems of the Forders.

² See the teachings of 22 April 2003, 29 April 2003, and 18 May 2004.

³ See the teachings 31 May 2005 (which contains a complete list of the twenty-five categories of objects asserted by the Samkhyas, 23 August 2005, and 13 September).

⁴ See the teaching of 9 September 2007.

⁵ See the teaching of 6 July 2010.

¹ Jeffery Hopkins translates these terms as motility, darkness and lightness

So, according to the Forders or the Samkhyas, there are five characteristics of the self:

1. It is a consumer of pleasant and unpleasant objects.
2. It is a functional permanent phenomena.
3. It is not a creator.
4. It lacks qualities.
5. It lacks activity.

When we understand their assertion of the self, and what the five characteristics are, then we can assess whether such a self is reasonable or not. With some slight variations, all the non-Buddhist schools, in general, assert a self as being a single, permanent, and independent entity. It is this self that is being refuted here.

As the commentary explains, the principle itself cannot be generated independently to begin with, as it is non-existent like the horns of a rabbit. So it follows that the result cannot be generated independently. The absurdity, which is highlighted here, is that if the cause itself is not generated, then how can the result be generated? So the syllogism used here refutes the assertion of a primary principle that is the cause of all existence.

What is being refuted here is the manifestation of a primary principle. When that is refuted, then the next step is to refute the knowledge-being (or conscious principle) that experiences objects independently, by showing that this cannot be independently existent either.

1.2.1.2.1.2. Refuting that the knowledge-being engages objects independently

The next two lines of the verse read:

*28cd. Since it would always be distracted by objects
It will also not cease.*

While you have some understanding of the basis of what is being presented here, it is good to know how the actual logic works. Once you understand this, you can then relate it to all other instances using the same line of logic, using syllogisms and so forth. To summarise the sequence: first the generation of independent expression by the principle is refuted, and then the individual being (the conscious principle or knowledge-being), who engages with the objects that they have caused, is refuted.

The commentary explains the meaning of these two lines:

Does the knowledge-person cease when it does not engage objects? It follows it does not because it is accepted to be a permanent functionality and if it is that, then it will always be distracted by objects, because there will be no time when it is not apprehending objects.

This refutation is based on pointing out the absurdity of a knowledge-being with this rhetorical question, Does a knowledge-being cease when it does not engage objects? According to this assertion, the absurdity is that engagement with an object is by a self that is a permanent functionality. As such it would perpetually apprehend objects. A simple example to illustrate this absurdity is that when a self is engaged in, for example, hearing sound, it would be perpetually engaged in apprehending sound. The same would apply for the other four senses: taste, sight, tactile sensations and smell. It would be difficult for the Samkhyas to accept this, as it goes beyond the bounds of obvious reality. So the refutation is based on the absurdity of their assertion.

1.2.1.2.2. Refuting the independent self of the Logicians

This has three subdivisions:

- 1.2.1.2.2.1. It is impossible for something permanent to produce a result
- 1.2.1.2.2.2. It is impossible for such a self to depend on conditions
- 1.2.1.2.2.3. Such a self cannot be related to conditions

The assertions of another non-Buddhist school are being presented here. It is similar to the earlier one, but with slight variations, which is why it is included separately.

1.2.1.2.2.1. It is impossible for something permanent to produce a result

The non-Buddhist Naiyayika school asserts a self that is by nature a permanent entity, but which temporarily becomes impermanent due to certain conditions.

The commentary first presents their assertion:

The Naiyayika assert a self that has form and is a permanent functionality, and they say it creates harm.

The next verse reads:

*29ab. It is clear that if the self is permanent
Then, like space, it cannot act*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary then refutes their assertion:

However, it is very clear that if such a self is a permanent functionality then, similar to non-compounded space, it cannot produce a result.

The commentary presents a refutation that points out the absurdity of their assertion. It is very clear that if such a self is a permanent functionality then, it will be similar to a non-compounded space. This means that like empty space the self is a permanent phenomenon, and so cannot produce anything. Like space, such a self cannot produce a result. This should be clear.

1.2.1.2.2.2. It is impossible for such a self to depend on conditions

Next they say that the self depends on conditions, but it is impossible for such a self to depend on conditions.

First, their argument is presented:

Argument: Although its nature is permanent, if this self meets with conditions then it can produce a result.

The lines that serve as an answer to the assertion read:

*29cd Although conditions meet
How can they affect the unchanging?
30ab. If it is like before during the action
What did the action do to it?*

As an answer the commentary states:

It is impossible for a permanent phenomenon to meet with conditions. Although the conditions of striving and so forth meet with other conditions, how could these conditions affect the self?

What is being highlighted here is that as they have already asserted the nature of the self as permanent, how then could it possibly change when it meets certain conditions? How can conditions affect the self so it can be temporarily impermanent, when its very nature is permanent? The very definition of permanent indicates that it does not change. This again points out the absurdity of the assertion.

The non-Buddhist schools such as the Samkhyas and the Naiyayika (or Logicians) assert a permanent self, based on their acceptance of past and future lives. According to their reasoning the self has to be permanent in order to have come from a past life to this life, and to be able to go from this life to the next life. They think that if the self was impermanent then it could not come from a past life to this, and from this life to the next? So while they accept past lives and future lives, and understand that some effects arise due to the past causes etc., the self, they say, has to be permanent, because if it changes or degenerates, then what would be left to go on to the next life? This is the reason for their assertion that the self is permanent.

We can readily relate to their limited reasoning, because we are not able to see the subtle momentary changes that occur in functional phenomena ourselves. The actual definition of impermanence implies that change occurs from moment to moment, and it is this momentary nature of change that we do not readily perceive. Thus we carry the perception of ourselves as being more or less the same self as yesterday, or the day before, etc.

Actually, the real understanding, and thus the realisation of impermanence, is actually quite difficult to obtain. While selflessness or emptiness are more profound than impermanence, and thus more difficult to realise, it seems that it is easier to understand the meaning of emptiness, rather than the subtle changes that occur from moment to moment. I definitely feel that understanding impermanence in terms of the momentariness of the existence is not easy to grasp. When we talk about impermanence it is usually in relation to the gross impermanence of phenomena, such as when a glass breaks. Because we see it break, we feel the impermanence of the glass is presented. In this way we can perceive and relate to the gross level of impermanence, whereas the actual impermanence of functional phenomena, the change which occurs from moment to moment, is subtle and difficult for us to realise.

While some of the non-Buddhist schools like the Samkhyas and the Naiyayika assert past and future lives, others do not. The self asserted by the non-Buddhist schools who don't believe in past and future lives is a self related to the body, i.e. the physical aggregate. Therefore, when the physical aggregate disintegrates, the self, which is dependent on that, also disintegrates. The analogy they use is that it is like drawings on a wall. When the wall falls down, the drawings that are dependent on the wall also disintegrate, because their very support has disintegrated.

The Christian faith, for example, does not assert past and future lives, or more specifically, reincarnation, but they do accept an individual being, which, in essence, seems to be called the soul, which doesn't disintegrate at the time of death. There is a continuity of the soul, as they present it. So, this is accepted in their religion.

His Holiness compares the Christian soul with what we call the self that goes on from past life to future lives. The common ground here is that both traditions posit a continuity that goes from the past to the future.

It is interesting to note that although there are differences between religions, there are also similarities. For example, when His Holiness speaks to other religions, he relates to them on the basis of commonality. That is something for us to also consider.

2.1.2.2.3. Such a self cannot be related to conditions

The commentary first presents the Naiyayika argument:

Argument: Although the self does not facilitate an action due to its own nature, actions are performed in relation to other factors.

30cd "These are its actions," you say.
How do they become related?

What they are saying is basically that, although the self itself does not facilitate an action by its own nature, it does perform actions in relation to other factors. So, this is what is being refuted here. The commentary presents:

Answer: This is also not valid—because if one says that the action which creates the result of this self is of a different entity, then how does it become related to the self? It could not be related to the self by nature or cause.

The assertion being refuted here is that of a self, which is permanent, but which can perform actions, and produce results in relation to other factors. What the commentary highlights is how these other factors are related to the self. If it is not related to the self by nature, or by cause (i.e. as a cause and effect), then there is no third option, and no other way to relate them. An example of something that is related through nature would be function and impermanence. Wherever there is a function, it is naturally related to impermanence through nature. Everything that functions is by nature also impermanent; so that is the relationship. Whereas the relationship between smoke and fire is that of cause and effect; fire being the cause and smoke the effect. If you assert that there is an independent, permanent self which produces some result, then there would have to be some relationship there. Any relationship has to have a relation either by nature, or by cause and effect. But that is not tenable here.

1.2.1.2.3. Understanding all beings to resemble emanations, anger is unsuitable

We can clearly see that interdependent origination is really the basis of the presentation here.

The verse reads:

31. Thus, everything is other-powered,
Through the power of this they are powerless.
Having understood this, do not become angry
At emanation-like phenomena.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Thus, all actions that produce a result are other-powered, and these conditions are again powered by earlier causes and conditions. Therefore, the result does not have any say in whether it arises or not, and hence is like an illusion or emanation.

When one understands that all functionalities perform actions while being empty of existence from their own side, one does not become angry at these emanation-like functionalities. Therefore one should train in realising the dependent arising that is the lack of existence from its own side, which destroys the seed of the afflictions.

The commentary presents the meaning of this verse. All actions that produce a result are other-powered implies that an action doesn't have control over itself, therefore actions are other-powered, meaning they are dependent on their previous causes and conditions. The point here is that the result does not have any say in whether it arises or not, and hence is like an illusion or emanation.

The commentary further explains that When one understands all functionalities perform actions while being empty of existence from their own side, one does not become angry at these emanations like functionalities. Therefore one should train in realising the dependent arising that is the lack of existence from its own side, which destroys the seed of afflictions.

The crux of the Prasangika view is presented here: that all things lack independent and inherent existence; that things are empty of inherent existence or they do not exist from their own side. If one understands these key points, then one really destroys the seed of the afflictions.

The very definition of illusion, or emanation, is something that is unreal or untrue, like a trick conjured up by a magician, and one should understand that phenomena arise like this, completely empty of existing from their own side. When one incorporates that understanding in one's perception of phenomena, then there is no room for one to become angry, because the very object which appears to exist from its own side as an independent entity harming us, does not actually exist in that way. Therefore there is no room for one to become angry towards it. Basically this is the crux of the explanation.

As I have presented many times before, when strong afflictions such as anger arise, it is because we relate to the object that is causing us harm, as if it were an independent object, completely arising from its own side. This is how it appears to us, so anger arises, and we feel justified in becoming angry. When one trains oneself to see that this appearance is false, that it is beyond reality, that the object one perceives is not inherently and independently existent, then that definitely helps to reduce the afflictions that arise in relation to the object of anger etc. This is hard for us initially, because we are habituated to perceiving things as independent and inherently existent. So overcoming that seemingly natural perception is not an easy task. However, to reduce the intensity of the negativities in one's mind, and eventually overcome the seeds of afflictions, we need to understand these points, and train our mind so that we can gain that realisation.

Having refuted some of the non-Buddhist schools in earlier verses, this verse is refuting the views held by all the Buddhist schools below the Prasangika, which assert inherent existence.

When one understands that all functionalities perform actions while being empty of existence from their own side, one does not become angry at these emanation-like functionalities. Therefore one should train in realising the dependent arising that is the lack of existence from its own side, which destroys the seed of the afflictions

The commentary implies the lack of inherent existence, which is the main point of the Prasangika presentation, and this refutes the earlier Buddhist schools.

1.2.1.3. THE NEED FOR REVERSING ANGER

The verse reads:

32. If it is said: What is supposed to oppose what? Also, opposing is unsuitable. There is nothing unsuitable about asserting That in dependence on that the continuity of suffering is severed.

Argument: If there is not even the slightest particle of inherent existence, then what antidote is supposed to oppose what object of abandonment? Since action and activity are invalid, even the action of opposing is unsuitable.

The argument is presented in the first two lines of the verse: If it is said: What is supposed to oppose what? Also, opposing is unsuitable. Then the counter argument, or answer, is presented in the next two lines There is nothing unsuitable about asserting that in dependence on that the continuity of suffering is severed.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary expands upon the meaning:

There is nothing unsuitable about the lack of inherent existence of the conception that grasps at the two truths as mutually exclusive, and due to which one cannot posit action and activity of something that lacks inherent existence; i.e., there is nothing unsuitable about the lack of inherent existence of the object of abandonment and the antidote.

It follows it is like that—because in dependence on realising the lack of inherent existence of the object of abandonment, and the antidote all afflictions of anger and so forth become extinct and the continuum of suffering is severed.

What is being presented here is the validity of the realisation of the lack of inherent existence. Thus, gaining the understanding that inherent existence is the object of abandonment, and its antidote is the realisation of emptiness, is valid. That is so because by abandoning the grasping at inherent existence, one will overcome all afflictions, as this is the very root of samsara. So when grasping at a truly and inherently existent self is completely abandoned, the consequence of afflictions such as anger and so forth, will also be completely severed. Thus the continuum of one's suffering is completely severed, and samsara will cease.

1.2.2. Summary

33. Therefore, whether it is friend or enemy, If one sees them acting unsuitably, Say 'it came due to those conditions'. Keeping this in mind be firm in happiness.

Under the first verse the commentary explains that:

For those reasons, if one sees someone, whether it is friend or enemy, doing something unsuitable that harms, think "this person has only become like this due to their afflictions. They do not have any freedom". Keeping this in mind, stop anger and make your mental happiness firm by not letting it degenerate. Be patient in such a way.

What is being presented here, in relation to one's practice, is that you will reach a point where, whenever you see someone—be it friend or enemy—engaging in an activity which seems inappropriate or harmful, you will immediately recognise they are doing this only due to the afflictions in their own minds. They do not have control over their own mind, and thus do not have control or real freedom over their actions, because they are dominated by the afflictions. When you hold this in your mind at all times, you will naturally not immediately react with anger. It will stop the anger and you will maintain your mental happiness. Because you are not getting angry, your mental happiness will not degenerate, and will be maintained. This is the way you tolerate harm and engage in the practice of patience. Within the different categories of patience this relates more to the patience of willingly accepting harm and suffering from others.

The main point here is that in order to protect the happiness in one's mind, the practice of patience is indispensable—one cannot do without it. As we all wish to have a happy state of mind—no-one voluntarily wants to have a sad or despondent state of mind—protecting it, by engaging in the practice of patience, becomes essential.

You need to take these points on board, and practise them regularly in your everyday life, particularly with close relations, associates or companions. As you have daily contact with them, you are prone to becoming upset or angry with them. Rather than immediately reacting, you can recognise that they don't have control over what they are doing and saying, because they are under the control of the afflictions, and that they are not in a happy state of mind themselves.

Use your own experience as a basis to understand how others act. When you are affected by the afflictions, and when you get upset and angry, you are not in a happy state of mind. In that sense, rather than taking it personally and retaliating, this approach gives you the distance to not react immediately, and allows your anger to subside.

An analogy I have given previously, demonstrating how those afflicted by afflictions do not have control over their own mind and actions, is when a car bumps your car from behind. When you look back, your immediate reaction might be to become upset with the car behind you. But when you see that the car behind you had no control, because it was pushed by the car behind it, then you realise there is no point getting upset with the car behind you, because they had no control at all about running into you. The afflictions are the one behind you, and they, themselves are also dependent on causes and conditions. If we understand that there is no independent entity that is voluntarily causing us harm, then our reasons for becoming angry will definitely subside.

These illustrations are effective in relation to our mind. Using the car example, we are in the first car, the one in the car behind is the individual that we perceive to be harming us. Whether it is our friend or companion or enemy, the only reason they would harm us is because they themselves are affected by delusions such as anger. Therefore the afflictions are like the third car. Just as we don't blame the person who crashes into us, we cannot blame the person who harms us, because they are affected by their afflictions. Therefore it is the afflictions which we need to overcome. This is how we protect our mind.

These ways of reasoning are supreme methods to protect our own mind so that our happiness does not degenerate. If we react with our normal perceptions and reasoning we will find every reason to become upset and angry in response to those who perpetrate harm. Blaming them only causes our own mind to become agitated and disturbed. When we become angry, the happiness in our mind completely degenerates, and we actually allow the conditions for our own happiness to degenerate, and our mind to become despondent and agitated etc. So the optimum protection is using these methods and reasoning as the way to actually protect oneself from harm.

Some make comments like, 'I could not give up the Buddhist principles or path because it is based on reasoning that gives me the freedom to use my own intelligence and reasoning. Why would I want to give up that? It gives me the freedom to rule my own life with reasoning and logic, rather than being completely dominated by others. Why would I want to give that up? I could never give it up.' These are actually very good points.

As you are aware, the next session is the discussion night. I have confidence that you will do the discussions well. Keep in mind that what is being discussed is a form of revision to make the topics we have covered a little clearer. Doing the exam fulfils the same purpose. Studying serves the purpose of revision, and discussion needs to be done with the same approach.

If one sees someone, be it friend or enemy, acting in an unsuitable way, think along the lines of the points of the teaching tonight. Who could disagree with them? No-one in a rational state of mind would disagree that practising in this way is beneficial.

One needs to understand from these presentations that the very reason that one is applying these protective measures is because not doing so is uncomfortable. We do not like to experience harm and we find ways to prevent ourselves from being affected by it. If it is our experience that the harms, inappropriate gestures etc. inflicted by others are uncomfortable, then we need to find the ways and means to protect ourselves. Applying these principles will do that. As much as they protect oneself from the harms of others, they are also a means of protecting oneself from harming others. That is how we need to understand it. These are really profound ways to understand the main points being presented here.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Su Lan Foo

Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མཁའ་འགྲུབ་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

2 December 2014

As usual let us spend some time in our meditation practice.

[Meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching, and put it into practice well.

1.2. Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma

1.2.2. Summary (cont.)

The second verse of the summary reads:

34. *In case they acted independently,
Since nobody desires suffering,
None of all the embodied beings,
Would receive any suffering.*

Some other commentaries place this verse under the next heading, Meditating on the Patience That Does Not Think Anything of Harm. This commentary relates it to the summary of the section, Meditating on the Patience That Definitely Relies Upon the Dharma.

Gyalsab Je's commentary on the verse explains:

If the result would be independently created out of their own wish, without the power of other conditions then, since not one sentient being desires suffering, none of all the embodied beings should have any suffering. Since we see that they receive suffering, and they do not have freedom, it is unsuitable to be angry at them. The mental afflictions are behind them.

What is being emphasised here is that results are not independently created. If suffering were to be created independently out of one's own wish or accord, then, since no beings would ever want to experience any suffering, they would not voluntarily or independently create that suffering for themselves.

If suffering were to be generated independently then, since no being would want to experience suffering, suffering would not be generated. However we all know that beings do experience suffering and that they do not have any control over that suffering. Thus it is unsuitable to be angry with them for their reaction to that suffering. The mental afflictions are behind them indicates that the cause of their suffering is the mental afflictions, and that is what has to be targeted, not the beings themselves.

1.3. Meditating on the patience that does not think anything of harm

This is subdivided into three:

1.3.1. Bringing to mind the method of compassion

1.3.2. Stopping the cause of anger

1.3.3. Considering it one's own fault if something undesired is received

1.3.1. Bringing to mind the method of compassion

This has three further sub-divisions:

1.3.1.1. Some harm themselves out of ignorance

1.3.1.2. If they commit suicide due to ignorance, it is no great surprise that they harm others

1.3.1.3. It is suitable to be compassionate with that person

1.3.1.1. SOME HARM THEMSELVES OUT OF IGNORANCE

Out of ignorance, some sentient beings actually harm themselves. Thinking about that should be a cause to generate compassion for them.

If we experience harm from others, then we need to remember that the harm is done out of ignorance. In fact, out of ignorance others cause harm to themselves. So if they are capable of harming themselves out of ignorance, then there is no question that they would harm others. Thinking about this factor gives reason not to react out of anger when others cause one harm.

The first verse under this heading is:

35. *The reckless harm themselves
With thorns and so forth.
In order to attain women and so forth.
They become obsessed and starve themselves
and so forth.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

These people that harm others through the power of the afflictions and a lack of conscientiousness also harm themselves. To attain liberation they roll on thorns, or jump from great heights. Some become obsessed with attaining wealth and women, and out of anger starve themselves and so forth.

As clearly explained in the commentary, those who harm others through the power of the afflictions and a lack of conscientiousness, also harm themselves. Thus, due to a lack of conscientiousness and the influence of the afflictions some people not only harm others, but they also harm themselves.

Furthermore, with their intention to be free from suffering, gain happiness and attain liberation, they are misled about the appropriate methods to reach liberation. They engage in actions such as walking on thorns, or jumping from a high cliff, and harm themselves, under the illusion that they are creating the cause of happiness, and freedom from suffering.

Others become obsessed with attaining wealth and women and out of anger starve themselves and so forth. We have all seen how some people become enraged, and even starve themselves to attain wealth, or for the sake of obtaining women and so forth. This is the extent of the harm that people are capable of inflicting upon themselves, due to the afflictions and a lack of conscientiousness.

What we can learn from this on a personal level is how incredibly fortunate we are in having obtained unmistakable methods for attaining liberation. There are so many who, in their quest for liberation, are presented with and follow incorrect or erroneous methods. This presentation of how some people harm themselves due to the afflictions, and an incorrect understanding, indirectly shows us how extremely fortunate we are to have been presented with unmistakable methods. Thus we need to really cherish these unmistakable methods, acknowledge them and put them into practice.

The next verse under this heading is:

36. *Some are obstructed and jump from heights,
Eat poison and other unbecoming things;
With unmeritorious actions
They harm themselves.*

These unthinkable things actually do happen—we see so much harm arising from drastic actions done out of ignorance. So we really need to be cautious and wary of the afflictions.

As Gyaltsab Je states in his commentary:

Some are obstructed by the afflictions and jump from great heights, eat poison and other disagreeable things. Through non-meritorious negative actions that are the cause for the lower realms they harm themselves in this and in future lives. How can it be appropriate to be angry when one is harmed by others?

Here, obstruction indicates an obstruction to one's life. Due to being weighed down by great suffering, and a longing to be free from that suffering, there are those who, out of ignorance, take their own life by hanging themselves, or, as mentioned here, by jumping off a cliff or bridges. Others take poison and other harmful substances and they do this out of ignorance, with the intention of ending their suffering. They want to be free from their suffering but because they don't have the correct method they have no choice but to resort to such actions.

These, as mentioned earlier, are everyday occurrences. So we can see the relevance of Shantideva's presentation even in our modern times: we see so many ignorant people taking drastic measures, thinking that they can free themselves from suffering.

Many ignorant beings, which includes ourselves, regularly create non-meritorious negative actions that are the cause for the lower realms. With the intention to either gain some happiness or remove some suffering we regularly engage in non-virtuous actions, such as the ten non-virtuous actions of killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, and so forth. I have mentioned previously that there are some who feel uncomfortable when they don't have an opportunity to create negativity, and glad when they have an opportunity to create some negativity. So you can see I was not making this up—this is indeed exactly what Shantideva is presenting here. We willingly create so many negativities, which are actually the cause for rebirth in the lower realms.

So if there are those who create harm for themselves in this and future lives, then how can it be appropriate to be angry when one is harmed by others? This rhetorical question implies that it is inappropriate to be angry with those who are constantly engaged in harming themselves in this and future lives. Rather than anger, one should develop compassion for them.

So the main emphasis here is that those who act in this way are an object of our compassion rather than anger.

This, in essence, is the meaning of the heading, Bringing to Mind the Method for Compassion.

1.3.1.2. IF THEY COMMIT SUICIDE DUE TO IGNORANCE, IT IS NO GREAT SURPRISE THAT THEY HARM OTHERS

This heading emphasises the point that if, out of ignorance and other afflictions, people can take their own life—one's most cherished and prized possession—then it is no great surprise that they would harm others. The verse under this heading reads:

37. *When under the control of the afflictions
Suffering sentient beings even kill themselves.
How could it be that at such time
They do not harm the body of others?*

We need to see how the practices, such as patience, that are being presented in this text and others are the profound practices of the great noble beings, the bodhisattvas. First of all, we need to see how profound these presentations are. Secondly, we need to recognise that the methods and means to actually practice are really profound. Thirdly, we can also acknowledge the fact that those who actually engaged in these practices, the bodhisattvas, are indeed great noble beings. Then a deep sense of veneration and genuine respect and admiration for bodhisattvas will arise. This is how we need to relate to the advice being presented here.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

When one falls under the control of the afflictions one will suffer at heart, and be despondent and even kill oneself. At this time, how could it come that one does not harm the body of other sentient beings? By thinking that it is impossible not to be harmed it is unsuitable to get angry.

What is clearly explained in the commentary is that any being who falls under the control of the afflictions will experience much mental agony. Then they become despondent, feeling completely hopeless and worthless. Under such circumstances some people will not hesitate to take their own life, and thus destroy their most prized possession. So if, under the influence and dominance of the afflictions, an individual is capable of taking such drastic measures as taking their own life, then it is no wonder that they are capable of harming others.

In the commentary this is presented as a rhetorical question, At this time, how could it come that one does not harm the body of other sentient beings?, which indicates that harming others is more likely, as it is a much easier task. Therefore by thinking that it is impossible not to be harmed, it is unsuitable to get angry.

By contemplating this point one understands how beings who become angry and harm themselves are an object of compassion rather than scorn.

1.3.1.3. IT IS SUITABLE TO BE COMPASSIONATE WITH THAT PERSON

Because of the examples given earlier, it is suitable to be compassionate towards such beings. This is the point where the emphasis is placed on those who engage in harming themselves. These of course are very important points, and this is an unmistakable presentation of how to engage in these practices. When we reflect on what we hear and study, we need to try to implement it as much as possible in our lives. If we just leave it to a mere act of listening out of curiosity, then while there might be some benefit in hearing these sacred words, our minds are not likely to change much. If we don't actually put it into practice, it won't have the benefit of transforming our mind.

We are, of course, under the influence of the afflictions, but if we take this advice to heart and try, at the very least, to aspire to these practices by emulating them, then it will definitely help to transform our minds. Even though anger still arises, we won't be completely dominated or influenced by it. The intensity of anger can definitely be reduced; this is how we begin to become a genuinely gentler and calmer person.

That transformation will definitely happen when we try to implement these points into our practice. On the next occasion when someone harms us, or wrongly accuses us, then instead of immediately reacting with anger and finding every reason to justify being angry with them, if we can just remember the points that Shantideva presents here, then it is most likely that we can protect our mind. Rather than becoming angry with this person, it is possible to develop some compassion for them.

The verse relating to this heading is:

38. *Even if one cannot generate compassion
For those that, due to generation of afflictions,
Commit suicide and so forth,
Why should anger have the last word?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse is not too obscure for us to understand.

It is suitable to practise compassion towards such a person that, upon having generated afflictions, harms others as explained above and even kills themselves. Even if compassion is not generated then how can anger be the final word? It is extremely unsuitable to get angry.

The main emphasis is that when one sees the condition of others, who upon having generated afflictions harm others, and even kill themselves, it is suitable to practise compassion for such individuals.

Even if one is not able to generate great compassion for them, then, at the very least how can anger be the final word? In response to this rhetorical question, the final point presented here is that it is extremely unsuitable to become angry with such individual beings who are driven by afflictions.

1.3.2. Stopping the Cause of Anger

This heading is sub-divided into three:

1.3.2.1. If childishness is their nature, then anger is unsuitable

1.3.2.2. Although the fault of harming is adventitious, anger is unsuitable

1.3.2.3. Anger is unsuitable when the direct causes are analysed

Of course the term childishness is not to be taken literally. It is a translation of a Tibetan word meaning 'like a child'. It refers to ordinary beings, as opposed to the supreme beings, the bodhisattvas.

In another text there is an indication of how, just as it is extremely difficult for a child to see a hair in the palm of the hand, all pervasive suffering is extremely profound and hard to comprehend. This is an analogy illustrating the meaning of the term meaning 'like a child'.

1.3.2.1. IF CHILDISHNESS IS THEIR NATURE, THEN ANGER IS UNSUITABLE

The verse under this heading is:

39. *In case harming others
Is the nature of the childish,
It is as unsuitable to be angry at them
As it is to be resentful at the burning nature of fire.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

If harming others is in the nature of the childish, who do not know what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned, and, then it is unsuitable to be angry at them; just as it is unsuitable to be resentful and angry at fire for being in the nature of burning.

There are two aspects to if harming others is the nature of the childish who do not know what has to be practised, and what has to be abandoned. The first aspect is not knowing what has to be practised, and what has to be abandoned. The second is that one might know what has to be abandoned and what has to be adopted but, through being overwhelmed by the afflictions, one does not engage in this practice.

Not knowing what is to be practised and what is to be abandoned may be excusable if someone has not had that explained to them, and so they have no understanding. However, some people receive the teachings, and have a clear understanding of what has to be abandoned and what has to be practised, but they are still so strongly dominated by the afflictions that they are not able to actually engage in the practices. Most of us fit into that category!

These are the shortcomings of the childish, or ordinary beings. So it is unsuitable to become angry with them, because they either don't know what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded, or because they are so overwhelmed with strong afflictions they are not able to engage in the practices of adopting what is to be adopted, and abandoning what is to be abandoned. Thus, because they have no control over their own minds, it is unsuitable to be angry with them.

The analogy that is used here is that it is unsuitable to be resentful and angry at fire for being in the nature of burning. The very nature of fire is that it burns. So being resentful or angry with fire because it has the nature of burning, is pointless. Just as it is silly to be resentful and angry with fire because it has the nature of burning, likewise it is unsuitable to be angry with the childish, who either don't know, or are completely overwhelmed by the afflictions. It is because of their nature that they harm themselves and others, so it is unsuitable to retaliate, or be angry with them.

1.3.2.2. ALTHOUGH THE FAULT OF HARMING IS ADVENTITIOUS, ANGER IS UNSUITABLE

The verse under this heading reads:

40. *Then, even if this fault is temporary
And the nature of sentient beings is wholesome,
It is still not suitable to become angry,
Like being resentful that smoke rises in space.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Even if the fault of harming others arises adventitiously and the nature of the mind of sentient beings is wholesome and gentle, it is still unsuitable to become angry at the harmer, because that would be as unsuitable as being resentful at space for letting smoke to arise.

The nature of the mind of sentient beings is wholesome and gentle, and thus the act of harming others arises only adventitiously. This means that harming others occurs only occasionally, when the all the adverse conditions are intact. As mentioned here, it is unsuitable to become angry with the harmer, just as it is unsuitable to be angry with space for letting smoke arise. Other commentaries use the example of clouds developing. If we desire a sunny clear sky, it would be pointless being resentful about any temporary obstruction such as clouds or smoke. In fact being resentful about the sky allowing smoke or clouds to arise would be quite silly.

1.3.2.3. ANGER IS UNSUITABLE WHEN THE DIRECT CAUSES ARE ANALYSED

The verse presented under this heading is often quoted in the teachings. Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with an argument:

Argument: It is suitable to get angry as the other person is harming me.

41. *Though I am contacted directly by the stick,
If I am getting angry at the wielder,
Since they are induced by hatred,
I should get angry at hatred instead.*

Then Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of the verse:

Answer: If I were to get angry at that which directly harms me then, since I am directly touched by the stick, weapon and so forth, and thus harmed by them, it would be suitable to get angry at them. Then, since they are not doing this independently, but are wielded by a person, if one were to get angry at the wielder, they are also without independence due to hatred. Instead of getting angry at these two I should get angry at hatred.

If we were to reason that we should be angry at what directly harms us, then we should be angry with the stick, or weapon, that actually makes contact with us. However common sense tells us that even though the stick caused us the direct pain, it would not be able to hurt us by itself, because it has to be wielded by someone. Therefore, even though it makes direct contact with us, it is not really the stick that causes the pain. Rather, the real cause is the wielder of the stick, so therefore one has reason to become upset and angry with that person.

In other words the stick is not hitting us independently, but is wielded by a person, so it is pointless being angry with the stick. The logic being presented here is that the wielder of the stick is also without independence, and is controlled by hatred.

If one is able to use logic and the common sense reasoning of not becoming upset at the stick because it is not independently hurting us, then that same line of logic also applies to the wielder of the stick, because they are, in turn, controlled by the afflictions. They are not acting independently as they are controlled by the afflictions.

So the conclusion is that instead of becoming angry at these two—the stick and the person—one should instead become angry at hatred, or the afflictions.

We can use this meticulous line of reasoning to further develop our own ability to use reasoning and logic to make the right decisions, followed by the correct means of engaging in whatever activity we do. We need to take, from the logic presented here, the proper way of conducting ourselves in all activities that we engage in. If one were to really contemplate these points, one can see that they give us a lot of room to use profound reasoning and logic in daily life. If one does not think much about them, then of course one will not really see their value.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcribed by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་ལ་འཇམ་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

9 December 2014

As usual we will spend some time in meditation.

[meditation]

The tong len practice is a profound practice that can really assist us if we actually implement it. With respect to the taking part of the practice, we may not see the relevance of taking the suffering of others upon ourselves at first, and so the benefit of that part of the practice may not be immediately evident. However there is an obvious direct benefit in the giving part of the practice, as it is the immediate cause for the generation of love and compassion. Once love and compassion has been generated within one's heart then one will naturally and spontaneously act to benefit other sentient beings. So we can easily relate to the benefits of the giving part of the practice.

When one wishes for others to be endowed with happiness and to be free from suffering, and has the determination to bring about their happiness and free them from suffering, then that can definitely lead one to act in ways to bring about happiness for others, and help to remove their suffering.

The meditation and mental training that we do now will be transformed into actions that benefit others. Those who are deprived of happiness definitely wish for happiness, and those who experience suffering definitely want to be free from suffering. So if we help them to achieve this, we are benefitting others in a very practical way. So we can see that this practice is really the essence of the Buddha's teaching.

When we generate these two most precious states of mind—love and compassion—then we are naturally inclined to benefit other sentient beings. As the second Dalai Lama, Gedun Gyatso mentioned, when one generates the mind of compassion, then that instils the wish to benefit other sentient beings. Thus, a mind of love and compassion is a most valuable and supreme state of mind, which serves as a basis for benefiting sentient beings.

A mind of genuine, unconditional love and compassion that is devoid of self-cherishing and attachment, which is accompanied with the sole intention of benefiting others, is indeed a most supreme state of mind. The more we familiarise ourselves with generating love and compassion, the more we will develop that genuine feeling within ourselves, and the kinder and gentler our mind will become. This is the practical benefit of the tong len practice.

The practice of giving encompasses giving one's body, possessions and root of virtue. It involves initially training the mind in selflessly giving one's body, possessions and root virtues to others. As indicated in the teachings, having trained our mind, we then need to actually practise giving to others, as way of directly benefiting sentient beings.

As the teachings explain, mind-training needs to be followed by actual practice. The way to measure our progress in this practice is to check whether our mind of giving has in fact increased. We do this practice in a form of meditation. However, reciting a prayer, and sitting for a few minutes with closed eyes is not sufficient, if it doesn't actually transform our mind into the mind of giving. When we can see that our mind of giving has actually increased and become more natural, then that is a true mark of progress, and a positive transformation.

The teachings indicate that we need to give away our body as well as our possessions and root virtues. Now, we may have not reached the point where we are readily able to give our body parts, which of course is the practice of the great bodhisattvas. However, by training our mind in giving our body in thought, we are familiarising ourselves with the practice, thus drawing closer to being able to actually give our bodies.

Practice needs to be manageable and practical, so that means engaging in practices that are in accordance with our ability. What we need to really contemplate is minimising the mind of wishing harm upon others. The true mark of progress is when the mind wishing harm upon others is reduced, and the mind of wishing to benefit others is increased.

As advised further, one needs to immediately regard any sentient being one happens to meet as being as kind as one's mother and remember that, 'They are the supreme field of my merit, because by relying on sentient beings I will be able to accomplish all the necessary conditions (such as accumulating merit and wisdom) for achieving enlightenment. Therefore this being is really precious to me. If I endeavour to please this sentient being then that will be the equivalent to pleasing all the buddhas and bodhisattvas'. That is how we need to relate to other sentient beings.

As Shantideva mentions

*When looking at sentient beings say,
"In dependence on this very sentient being
I will become a buddha",
And look at them honestly and lovingly.*

So we need to see any sentient being we encounter as being the cause for our enlightenment. In addition to reciting that verse and remembering its meaning, one also needs to put it into practice. We need to be able to look at any sentient being, and think, 'This sentient being is the cause for me to become enlightened', and hold that being with the mind of compassion.

Memorising a verse such as this and then reciting is a way to train the mind. As the teachings indicate, one needs to first train with words. So when we do the tong len practice we begin by reciting this verse from the Guru Puja:

And thus, O Venerable Compassionate Gurus, we seek your blessings,
That all karmic debts, obstacles and sufferings of
Mother beings,
May without exception ripen upon us right now,

And that we may give our happiness and virtue to others

And thereby invest all beings in bliss.

That recitation helps to instil the actual meaning of the practice into one's mind. That is why the teachings advise us to first train in the words, which means memorising those words and then, whilst reciting them, bringing the meaning of the words to mind.

In summary, the essential advice is to practise to the extent that one is capable. This eliminates excuses about not engaging in practices because one doesn't know enough, and so forth. In fact, as some teachers have advised, we are not deprived of the knowledge of how to practice, but we are deprived of the actual effort to put in the practice. So, beginning with the basics, we need to actually apply whatever we have learnt.

Essentially, this means integrating the practices into your minds. If we think of practices as being exterior practices, and live our life in a manner that is not in accord with the teachings, then that is where we will fall short of any true transformation. We need to integrate our practises into our minds so that we always carry them with us, in whatever we do.

When they hear such advice, anyone who is keen to put the Dharma into practice will say to themselves, 'Yes, this is meant for me. This is what I need to be doing'. But when someone who is not too keen on practice hears such advice they will think, 'Oh yes, I have heard that before. I already know that' and thus fall short in implementing the advice. They have reached a dangerous point where they have this false assumption that they know all that they hear, and they don't relate it to themselves. There is a particular term in Tibetan, cho drep, sometimes translated as immune to the Dharma, which is derived from the fact that no matter how long you boil some vegetables, they never really cook well. This sort of analogy is used to describe someone who hears advice and instructions in the teachings, but keeps thinking, 'Oh yes, I have heard that before. It doesn't relate to me, because I already know it'. If that is their attitude then how could the advice in the Dharma ever help them to transform their own mind? The Dharma only transforms the mind if one takes it to heart, and practises what one hears.

Another example of how we might relate something in the teachings to some external factor is the teaching on impermanence, which is an essential teaching for helping to transform the mind. If, for example, a glass breaks and one has heard the teaching on impermanence and how things are transitory and change moment by moment, then one might think, 'Oh yes, of course. This is an example of impermanence'. However, that does not actually instil any sort of personal realisation of how one is also impermanent and changing from moment to moment. In particular, one's own life is also fragile and changing moment by moment. If one is able to relate the glass breaking to oneself in that way, then one has then taken the teaching on impermanence as a personal instruction, and used the external event as an impetus to practise the Dharma.

For those who are keen to practise, witnessing someone's death will also be a very strong impetus to remind themselves of the fragility of their own life, and the need to practise before the moment of death arises. So we can see the difference it makes, when an instruction is applied on a personal level and put into practice.

Coming back to the main point, the practice of love and compassion is essential. We might not be able to generate the bodhicitta attitude right now, but we do have access to its base which is love and compassion. So it is just a matter of actually contemplating and putting effort into generating those states of mind. That is something we definitely can do, and generating the thought of love and compassion to the best of our ability, and meditating on that, is essential for our practice.

When we are able to generate the thought of love and compassion to a certain extent, then it becomes easier to actually move to the next step of developing the special intention in which one takes on the personal responsibility of benefiting sentient beings. One thinks, 'It is not sufficient to merely wish other beings to be free from suffering and endowed with happiness. I need to take responsibility for doing that myself. I need to take on the responsibility of freeing all beings from every type of suffering, and leading them to the state of ultimate happiness'. When we take personal responsibility in this way, then our minds become a much more fertile ground for the development of actual bodhicitta.

After having developed the special intention, we realise, 'Even though I wholeheartedly want to take on the responsibility of freeing all beings from suffering, and leading them to the ultimate state of happiness, the reality is that I don't have that ability right now'. So one contemplates, 'Who has that ability? How can I possibly achieve this ability myself?' That is when one contemplates reaching the state of enlightenment, and how it is a perfected state, where one is free from all adversity and has developed all qualities. At this point one thinks, 'When I have achieved that state of enlightenment, then I will have the capacity and ability to free all beings from suffering, and lead them to happiness'. It is at that point one has generated a very firm foundation for generating bodhicitta.

Over the past year we have been studying Shantideva's precious text together. Studying this text and making the effort together makes us real Dharma friends. From the teacher's side, I have tried my best in presenting it, and from your side, you have placed all of your attention on listening to the teachings, and trying to study them. We have made that joint effort to study this profound text by Shantideva, which presents the unmistakable methods of generating bodhicitta and then practising the six perfections. So we can all rejoice in our joint efforts.

As a result we have definitely accumulated a great amount of root virtue. So we need to secure and increase it so that it does not go to waste. Thus we rejoice in and dedicate that virtue, which is a supreme practice.

One of the greatest prayers of aspiration that is a means to dedicate one's virtues is the King of Prayers. As we did last year, we will recite it again, not only as a supreme means to rejoice and dedicate for our own virtues, but also as a means to dedicate that virtue to those who are connected to the Centre who are unwell, and those who have passed away. Because of the connection we have with them, and the connection that they have with the Centre, our practice will definitely benefit them as well. So this is not just a personal practice

Of course, as you recite it in English, I will have to recite it in Tibetan. However I don't necessarily feel left out, as I'm happy and proud to be reciting the text in Tibetan! Tibetan is now being accepted as being one of the most supreme languages for the study of the Dharma. Leaving aside the contents of the texts such as Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara, the language is incredibly rich with lots of deeper meanings in the words. It would be quite difficult to find any other language, even in other Buddhist countries, which presents the teachings so profoundly.

Only in Tibetan will you find all of the Buddha's doctrine intact. Many works were translated into Chinese, but a lot of them have been since destroyed. There are some Japanese translations, but I have heard that you need to know Chinese characters to be able to read them. So Tibetan is one of the rare languages that has kept all of the Buddha's doctrine intact. That is why I can claim Tibetan to be supreme. I value the language and don't wish to forget it.

Given that Buddha's teachings are preserved in the Tibetan language, it seems quite reasonable to think that being reborn as a Tibetan might be a reasonable aspiration.

There are now many Buddhist scholars in America and other countries who only became renowned after they learned Tibetan and studied the texts directly in the Tibetan language. Glen Mullin once told me that every big university in America has one student of late Geshe Ngawang Dhargye as a staff member, which has to imply that he was a great teacher. I have heard that Glen is a very learned man himself, with a very intelligent mind. I gather that he has translated many texts and also written the history of all the previous Dalai Lamas.

Glen presented me some of these translated works himself, and told me that the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargye had advised him that it will be good for him to engage in the Dharma activity of translation and so forth. But in order to do that, he advised that it would be good, not just to learn Tibetan, but to also have some understanding in the debate system. That is why Glen was advised to go to the Institute of Buddhist Dialectics in Dharamsala, where he studied for a while.

Apparently Glen indulged in a care-free hippie lifestyle in his youth. However, he developed a connection with Gen Rinpoche, Geshe Ngawang Dhargye. He would visit Geshe-la in the evening, and Geshe-la would reprimand him about his ways. Then slowly, slowly he began to transform himself to the point where he really got into the Dharma, and became a good scholar.

Before reciting The King of Prayers, generate a bodhicitta motivation that is based on the intention:

For the sake of all sentient beings, and to lead them to the ultimate state of happiness and free them from all suffering, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will recite this prayer, and dedicate it to that purpose.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

11 February 2014

As usual we will devote some time to meditation and we can base our motivation on the Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer that we have just recited. [meditation]

Prior to taking up the practice of meditation it is very important that we understand both the conducive and the adverse conditions that affect meditation. Without recognising those two aspects, and making an attempt to overcome the adverse conditions and to adopt the conducive ones, our attempt to meditate will not be very successful. We may seem to achieve a temporary focus but apart from that we won't get much out of our meditation session. For a genuine meditation session, we really need to understand the way the conducive and adverse conditions affect a meditation session.

As mentioned regularly, the main purpose of engaging in the practice of meditation is so that one may be able to subdue one's mind. In order to subdue the mind we need to understand the process of gaining control over our own mind, otherwise we will maintain our habitual pattern of being controlled by our mind, which in turn is controlled by the delusions, and of the various delusions, the main culprit is the strong grasping at the 'I'.

We can assume that whatever activity we engage in is done with the intent of gaining happiness and eliminating suffering. Regardless of whether the activity actually serves that purpose or not, that is the ultimate goal. This is true for whatever activity human beings are engaged in—the pursuit of happiness and the elimination of suffering is always the goal. When we observe the activities of others we may notice that their activity is not serving that purpose. However, we can't tell them that, because everyone has the notion that they are using the correct methods to achieve their goal. Those methods are ingrained, and they believe that they will work for them, and so it is impossible to immediately change their approach, especially when they believe theirs to be the best method. So it is worthwhile for us to simply observe what others are doing and learn from that.

The practice of Dharma and meditation is a unique method for achieving happiness and eliminating suffering. However, we also need to understand that adopting meditation should not be presented to others as being contrary to leading a normal life in a worldly environment. Some may feel that adopting the meditation technique is a religious practice and therefore not related to their everyday life existence and wellbeing. If meditation is presented as having to lead a completely different kind of lifestyle, then it would be very difficult for ordinary people to see how meditation can benefit them. Rather, we need to present the meditation technique as being relevant to leading a happier life in their everyday existence. If one seemingly leads a normal lifestyle outwardly, but experiences a true inner transformation as a result of meditation and the practise of Dharma, then, based on that personal experience, we can share something of great value with others. Others from ordinary walks of life will feel comfortable in our presence and easily accept what we present. This will be of real benefit to others.

It is by solving our own personal difficulties and problems through the practice of Dharma and meditation, and experiencing an inner transformation, that we will be able to confidently share the Dharma with others. And, as such, what we present will be accepted by others, because no-one can dismiss a personal experience of positive transformation—especially when it relates to overcoming problems and difficulties similar to the ones they are facing themselves. How can others say that meditation has no value when you share with them the fact that it has helped to solve your own difficulties and problems? No-one intentionally wishes to experience any kind of problem or difficulty and everyone appreciates a state of wellbeing. So when a genuine technique is presented from the basis of personal experience, it will readily be accepted by others. That is because they are also striving towards the same goal of happiness and wellbeing and not to experience any difficulties and problems.

The main point is to ensure that your practice hits the target of subduing and controlling your own mind. The great Gyalsey Thokmay Sangpo said in his Thirty-Seven Practices of Bodhisattvas:

If you do not analyse your own faults,
You might put on a Dharmic facade while behaving in a non-Dharmic way.
Therefore, to continually analyse your faults and then discard them,
Is the practice of a bodhisattva.

The essential point here is that one really needs to detect and acknowledge the faults within one's own mind and then strive to overcome them first. Otherwise, as the great master Gyalsey Thokmay Sangpo mentions, there is a great danger that we will completely mislead others by presenting them with a false appearance. If one does not attend to the real intention of the Dharma, particularly if one engages in actions contrary to the Dharma, then there will be great danger of creating doubt about the value of Dharma in the minds of others. It can cause others to think, 'How could someone behave and conduct themselves in a way that is contrary to what they preach?' If we create the conditions where others doubt the Dharma and generate a negative state of mind it is a grave fault on our part. We should strive for others to generate virtue and not more negativity.

So we need to really pay attention to the main cause of our own faults and mental unrest, which lies within our own mind, and not in external conditions and circumstances. When we are feeling a little down or depressed we may resort to going out with friends and having a good time, which may give some temporary relief. But when the enjoyment of being with others has faded away, the mental unrest and the uncomfortable feelings and negative emotions return. That is because we are not paying attention to applying antidotes to overcoming the root cause of our problems.

Seeking temporary relief each time we feel depressed and unsettled will not help to solve the real problem. Rather, we need to ensure that whatever meditation we do, and whatever Dharma practice we adopt, becomes an antidote for overcoming the real problem that lies within. Each one of us can detect a troubling state of mind, attitude or delusion in our mind that is always there to harm us. So it is important for us to detect the cause of that, and work at overcoming the main culprit.

Of all the various delusions found in negative states of mind, the ultimate culprit is grasping at the self, an aspect of which is self-cherishing. There is some debate about whether the self-cherishing mind is actually a delusion but, regardless of that, it is quite clear that it harms us and hinders our happiness and joy. Grasping at the 'I' and self-cherishing are mutually supportive, and they work together like master and servant to cause us so much misery and pain.

Grasping at the 'I' is the root cause of all our problems, and when we are able to fully acknowledge that then the strong wish to overcome grasping at the self will develop. So what are the best methods and antidotes to overcome self-grasping? As the teachings present, the ultimate antidote for overcoming grasping at the self is realising emptiness or selflessness. There is no more supreme antidote to grasping at the self than to gain the realisation of emptiness. This is why the view of emptiness is held in such high esteem. It is considered a most precious realisation because it serves as the sole antidote for overcoming the root cause of all our problems, which is grasping at the self.

To see why grasping at the self is the cause for all unwanted misery and suffering we need to understand how it is the root cause of all other delusions and, in particular, the cause for the development of strong attachment and anger. This is not an obscure point. If we really think about it we will notice that this is true for ourselves. From strong clinging to the 'I' there naturally follows attachment to those things and individuals that are favourable to oneself, and aversion or anger towards those who oppose one's own interests. So, there is strong attachment to one's friends, relatives and the like, and anger towards enemies. Due to this strong attachment and aversion we engage in so many different activities that revolve around trying to please those who are close to us, while trying to subjugate those we consider our enemies and who oppose our interests, thus creating much heavy negative karma. In this way we come to understand how self-grasping is the root cause of all our unhappiness.

When we investigate further and look into how we carry these attitudes into our daily life we find that we make most of our decisions based on, whether 'I like this', or 'I don't like that'. Our strongly held opinions are based merely on the fact 'because I like this, I want it' or 'because I don't like it, I don't want it'. So, the driving force behind the decisions we make is mostly because 'I' like or dislike something.

We need to further investigate how that very strong opinionated 'I' appears to us. Through a sincere and thorough investigation we will come to realise that we view this 'I' as being independently existent; a very solid and unshakeable 'I' that does not depend on any other causes and conditions for its existence.

When we further investigate whether such an independent and solid 'I' actually exists or not, we come to realise that in fact such an 'I' does not exist at all. When we come to understand that such an independently existent 'I' does not actually exist, then one has identified the basis of the object of negation. Without abandoning the object of negation we cannot possibly overcome the grasping at the self. Thus, we come to understand the importance of realising selflessness.

When the Buddhist teachings present selflessness, it is not suggesting that the self does not exist at all and that there is no 'I'. Rather, it is a self-sufficient and independent 'I' that does not exist. Our wrong conception makes us believe and hold onto such a non-existent self or 'I'. However, when we understand that there is no such self-sufficient and independently existing 'I', then we begin to gain the true understanding of selflessness and emptiness. We also begin to understand that we have to realise selflessness or emptiness because we need to overcome that grasping at the self, which is the main cause of our suffering. Furthermore, we begin to see for ourselves why the teachings on emptiness are held in such high esteem, and why it is necessary to gain an understanding of emptiness; to work on developing that realisation.

This also leads to the main point that His Holiness the Dalai Lama presented in his recent teachings in south India, which many of you attended. You might recall that he said that the purpose of this gathering can be summarised into two main points. 'The purpose of gathering here' he said, 'is to find a means to overcome grasping at the self and the self-cherishing mind. So if you can take this essential point with you and work on that, then it serves the purpose of the teachings'. He said that if you take these two points with you and think about them constantly, then coming to teachings will have served its purpose. So, it is good to take that succinct advice to heart and really try to implement it in our daily lives.

If we work on these two essential points, then the more we reduce grasping at the self and the self-cherishing mind, the greater our happiness will naturally be. Conversely, the more we hold on to grasping at the self and maintain a self-cherishing attitude, the more our happiness decreases and our suffering increases. This is very true. To give a small practical example: if, in a mutual relationship, you have to make a decision about something and the other person says, 'Let's do it this way', and you say, 'No, I don't accept that', then from that very moment the situation becomes tense and you both start to feel uncomfortable. The stronger that sense of 'I' or 'me', along with what 'I want' and 'don't want' becomes, the more we feel unsettled and uncomfortable. But if we say, 'OK, I accept and agree with you' then things settle down. There is no conflict and dispute with the other person and naturally the situation is calm. Indeed, the more we increase our genuine kindness and concern for others, the more our happiness will increase. Thus, concern for others and taking their interests into account opposes the self-cherishing mind. The more we rise above the self-cherishing attitude and think about the welfare of others the more our happiness will increase. This is the practical way to think about the benefit of overcoming self-cherishing.

Of all the antidotes for overcoming a self-cherishing mind, the optimum antidote is none other than bodhicitta, the mind of enlightenment, and this is the subject matter of the text we are studying. In this very text Bodhisattvacharyavatara or Bodhisattva's Way of Life, Shantideva explains what bodhicitta is, how to develop bodhicitta and the benefits of bodhicitta and so forth. It is important that we have a deeper understanding of what we are studying and the purpose of this text from the very outset. Having such an overview and implementing it in our practice is really important for whatever studies we engage in.

Having earlier mentioned the importance of meditation, it is good to also understand how to develop a sound, genuine meditation practice. First of all, the mind has to have a single-pointed focus on the object, and secondly, it has to be a sharp and clear state of mind. Those are the criteria which need to be met in order to develop concentration.

It is also important to acknowledge the opposing factors to this sharp, clear state of mind that is single-pointedly focussed. The opposing factors are excitement and laxity. Excitement causes the mind to waver and is the main opposing factor to developing single-pointed concentration; whereas laxity is the main opposing factor to having a clear and sharp state of mind.

The conducive factors for developing and maintaining concentration are mindfulness and introspection. Mindfulness is the state of mind where there is a constant recollection of the chosen object, i.e. constantly bringing to mind whatever meditation object one has chosen to focus on. Introspection, on the other hand, is a state of mind that is constantly vigilant of our state of mind and our focus. If the mind starts to waver (either becoming distracted by excitement or when it starts sinking into stupor and laxity), one immediately notices that and applies the antidotes. The state of mind which allows us to do this is called introspection. So mindfulness and introspection are the most important conducive factors.

When one understands that genuine meditation requires a single-pointed focus and a clear and sharp state of mind, then the real meaning of meditation becomes apparent. Meditation entails choosing an appropriate object to focus on and then intentionally withdrawing the mind from all forms of distraction. The meditation begins when we intentionally focus on the object and maintain that focus.

An appropriate object for single-pointed focus is one that does not give rise to delusions. Because we have chosen an appropriate object to focus on, and because the technique of focusing on that object involves withdrawing from engaging in the delusions, we will naturally experience a mind that is genuinely settled. So, during the time of the meditation, at the very least, the manifest delusions will subside, thus creating a virtuous state of mind. By acquainting our mind with this technique the delusions will begin to have less influence on our mind.

As Lama Tsong Khapa said, when one notices that the delusions have become weaker, then that is the true mark of one's practice of the Dharma. Furthermore, when this is complemented with a stronger faith in the gurus, the buddhas and in the Dharma itself, that is a true sign of the fact that meditation and Dharma practice have worked for us. If, despite our attempts to practise, we find that the delusions are not weakening and remain the same or worse, becoming even stronger, then we need to acknowledge that something is not right and that we are not hitting the mark with our practice. Perhaps it's because we are not making sufficient effort or that we are not adopting the correct methods.

If one's meditation practice serves as an antidote that weakens the delusions, then it has served its purpose and one's practice has born fruit. However if our delusions start to increase then this is a sign that we have to be very cautious about how we are adopting the practice and the effects it has on our mind. An example of how one's practice does not serve the purpose of overcoming the delusions and, in fact, actually feeds one's delusions to a certain extent is starting to feel proud about one's practice of meditation and so forth. Such a sense of pride can manifest in feeling jealous of those who are practising. That is a sign that one's practices have completely missed the mark, and that the delusions are increasing rather than decreasing. If one's attempts to practice have been genuinely applied, then far from feeling pompous and proud and thinking one is doing better than others, or looking down on others, or even feeling competitive or jealous of those who are practising, one will feel very joyful and happy when one sees others engaging in practice. One might then rejoice in one's own attempts to practice, feeling 'I am very fortunate to have this opportunity to practise myself, and it's really great to see others engaging in practice too.' Wishing others well in their practice and encouraging them is a true mark of one's practice having a positive effect.

We also need to keep in mind how incredibly fortunate we are to have this opportunity to engage in these studies and practices. Most of you are still young and have the opportunity with all the right conditions intact, with the Dharma being available, and teachers presenting it. With all of these conditions intact, we need to really reflect upon having this great opportunity now, and understand how we really need to utilise and not waste this opportunity. We really need to cherish these ongoing opportunities to engage in study and practices, and remind ourselves again and again that the purpose of practising is to overcome the self-grasping and self-cherishing mind within us. That, in summary, is the purpose we need to always bear in mind.

We are up to the third and final part of Chapter 3, which is:

3.1. Rejoicing

Here the headings are:

3.1.1. Achieving one's own purpose

3.1.2. Achieving the purpose of others

3.1.1. Achieving one's own purpose

This is subdivided into three:

3.1.1.1. Rejoicing by eulogising the mind

3.1.1.2. Meditating on conscientiousness after having found such a mind

3.1.1.3. Generating joy because of having found a mind that is difficult to find

Having covered the first of these three we move on to:

3.1.1.2. MEDITATING ON CONSCIENTIOUSNESS AFTER HAVING FOUND SUCH A MIND

This refers to making use of this rare mind that is difficult to find, and applying conscientiousness to this mind.

The root text reads:

27. *From now on I shall as much as possible
Engage in actions befitting this lineage.
I shall act in a way so as not to sully
This faultless and holy lineage*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

If one thinks whether this alone is enough:

From now on I shall engage in actions of the three doors that befit the lineage of the father Buddha

I shall strive in the method in a way that does not sully this holy lineage, which is adorned only by qualities and is faultless in the beginning, middle and end, with the faults and downfalls of the wishing and engaging advice.

Having warned the reader, lest one thinks whether having found this mind is enough by itself, the commentary goes on to explain what needs to be done from now on, which is I shall engage in actions of the three doors that befit the family lineage of the father Buddha. As explained previously, the Buddha is like a father and, because bodhisattvas aspire to develop the enlightened mind, they are like his children. A prince who carries the lineage of the king has the responsibility of upholding that lineage in a manner that befits that lineage and without damaging it. Likewise, those who have now become the children of the Buddha need to engage in a manner that befits that lineage of the Buddha. That is the point being made here. The commentary then explains that the commitment is to strive in the method in a way that does not sully this holy lineage of the Buddha, which is adorned only by qualities and is faultless in the beginning, middle and end. One would sully the holy lineage by engaging in the faults and downfalls of the wishing and engaging advice or instructions.

Generating the aspiring wish to achieve enlightenment entails recalling that wish three times during the day and three times during the night, refraining from engaging in the four black dharmas, and adopting the four white dharmas. Engaging bodhisattva vows has eighteen root downfalls and forty-six auxiliary or secondary downfalls. So the commentary is urging us to refrain from committing these faults and downfalls, and if one finds oneself doing so, to immediately engage in purification practices.

Having taken the engaging bodhisattva vows, one adopts the practices of the six perfections such as generosity and morality and so forth. Not sullyng the practice of generosity, for example, would be to ensure that whatever one intends to give is given without any sense of miserliness, or pride, or other ulterior motives. In other words, in order to ensure that the lineage is not sullied, one needs to ensure that one counteracts the adverse conditions for the practices of generosity and so forth. There is a Tibetan word used here, tsunpa, which has the connotation of being ethical. However, the main point is to ensure we are free from strong delusions whilst engaging in the practice.

Recalling the meaning of this verse on a regular basis would be a good practice in itself. It will be a personal pledge that, in itself, is very powerful as it reinforces one's dedication to developing the bodhicitta mind.

3.1.1.3. GENERATING JOY BECAUSE OF HAVING FOUND A MIND THAT IS DIFFICULT TO FIND

Here we are being exhorted to really generate that sense of joy of having found a mind that is difficult to find, which is, of course, the actual awakening mind or bodhicitta. We can definitely generate a sense of joy about having that aspiration. We can, at the very least, safely assume that we have some sort of contrived bodhicitta attitude within our mind. The analogy in the teachings for contrived bodhicitta is that it is like the bark of sugar cane; while the bark doesn't contain the full sweetness of the actual sugarcane it does have some level of sweetness. Likewise, while we have not yet developed actual bodhicitta we can still generate a similitude of the bodhicitta attitude.

As I regularly suggest, we can, at the very least, generate on a daily basis this thought: I will not engage in any action that harms any living being and I will try my utmost to engage in as many ways as I can to benefit other sentient beings. We can definitely manage to generate that thought which, in itself, is a very precious state of mind. However, that thought is not generated naturally or spontaneously, so we need to put some time and energy into generating it. When we do generate that thought, even just for a moment, it is a very precious state of mind. So, if on a regular basis we could work on developing the mind, 'I will not harm any sentient being and I will do my most to benefit sentient beings', it will be a mind that we can cherish and we can feel great joy about having generated that intention.

The root verse is:

28. *Just like a blind person finding a jewel
In a heap of rubbish,
I generated this mind of enlightenment
Just by coincidence.*

As the commentary explains:

This mind of enlightenment was born within me by pure chance, just like a poor and destitute blind person finding a jewel on a heap of rubbish by sheer coincidence. It must definitely be through the force of the buddhas.

In the Tibetan text the commentary begins with the analogy of a poor and destitute blind person finding a jewel on a heap of rubbish by sheer coincidence. Not only is this person destitute, but they are blind, which makes it even much more unlikely that they might actually find a jewel. And of course in a place of great poverty, finding jewels lying around is quite unlikely. If a person who is destitute and blind finds a jewel in a heap of rubbish, then how much joy would that person feel? They would feel incredible joy at the extraordinary fortune and coincidence of finding this jewel.

The generation of this mind of enlightenment is similar. An ordinary being can be likened to a blind person in that we don't have the wisdom realising emptiness. The heap of rubbish is analogous to the delusions that infest our mind. Yet despite being riddled with delusions and blinded by ignorance we have encountered this precious mind, the awakening mind of bodhicitta. This is like the sheer coincidence of a blind person finding a jewel in a heap of rubbish. This has definitely occurred through the force of the buddhas, which means that due to the buddhas' blessings we have had the great fortune to have had this opportunity to generate this mind. Thus we are exhorted to develop a sense of great joy in having had this opportunity to develop this mind.

One of the main points we need to consider here is that while bodhicitta is indeed a difficult mind to find, it would be a complete mistake to put it aside thinking, 'Oh, it's too difficult to generate' and not make any effort at all. Even though it is a difficult mind to generate, it is definitely possible, and because of that possibility we need to strive towards developing it. If it was not possible to be generated then we might as well cast it aside as being a waste of our time, but that is not the case. This is the main point that we need to bear in mind.

The new program for our study group evenings will be eight teaching sessions followed by a discussion and then an exam. Maybe Ven. Lhamo could keep track of the number of sessions because in my old age I may start to forget!

There is mutual benefit in combining the wisdom of the elderly and the energy and clear mind of the young. The elders definitely have a wisdom that arises from whatever experiences they have had, whilst the younger generation have not had the experiences to generate that wisdom. So the elders can share their combined wisdom and experience. The younger generation have a full life energy force and a clearer, fresher mind, so they are less likely to be forgetful. So the combination of youth and age can be mutually beneficial. I think this is usually the way it works.

Transcribed by Bernii Wright

Edit 1 by Adair Bunnnett

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

18 February 2014

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta prayer and motivation that we have generated, we can now engage in meditation.

The most important thing is to visualise sentient beings who are deprived of happiness and genuinely and sincerely wish them happiness and goodness. Focus on beings who are experiencing tremendous suffering, and develop a very strong intention to free them from that suffering; to do one's utmost to make it happen, for them to be free from suffering. So with that intention in one's heart, engaging in the practice becomes more meaningful. Without visualising sentient beings deprived of happiness and experiencing suffering, and wishing them to be free from suffering, then one's meditation practice is on the surface with no real substance. [meditation]

So we'll now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings, to lead them to ultimate happiness and free them from all sufferings, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. For this purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and put them into practice well.

3. CONCLUSION

3.1. Rejoicing (cont.)

Having completed the topic Achieving One's Own Purpose we now turn to the second part of this section of the text.

3.1.2. Achieving the purpose of others

Achieving the purpose of others is based on aspiring to develop the mind of enlightenment, the bodhicitta attitude. What is being encouraged here is to develop that mind so that one will be able to benefit others. Benefiting others is really the ultimate point of why we are striving to develop this state of mind that aspires to achieve enlightenment. So, the main point is to familiarise one's mind again and again with the intention to benefit others. As His Holiness the Dalai Lama mentions regularly, at our beginners' level, whilst we might not have developed actual bodhicitta yet, we can definitely generate the intentions 'I will not harm any living being' and 'I will engage in benefitting others as much as I can'. His Holiness says that even generating this state of mind at a beginners level can serve as a substitute for bodhicitta. Thus, focusing on this intention regularly and establishing it firmly in our minds is highly meaningful.

When we intentionally devote ourselves to cultivating this state of mind and further strengthen it, then as it becomes firmly established the result is that our mind naturally becomes happier and more joyful. Through this familiarity one is in fact establishing all the right conditions to develop actual bodhicitta, whereby the joy and happiness in our minds will increase unceasingly.

Indeed, developing this intention directly opposes the self-cherishing mind; an attitude that is completely obsessed with one's own self interests and which has a strong focus merely on 'I' or 'me'. As this positive state of mind that intends to benefit others opposes the self-cherishing attitude, it also serves as an antidote for overcoming the manifest levels of grasping at the self. Whilst it is not an actual antidote for abandoning the grasping at the self at its very root, it does serve as a means to minimise an otherwise strong sense of grasping at the self. For as long as one maintains a firm intention to benefit others and not to intentionally harm them in any way, there is no room for anger to arise, no room for jealousy to arise and no room for the strong sense of 'I' or 'me', that which focuses merely on one's own personal interests, to arise. Thus, whilst directly opposing the self-cherishing mind, it can also loosen the strong hold of the self-grasping mind.

If we were to sincerely investigate, we will come to notice that on a daily basis most of our thoughts, ideas and attitudes are driven by a strong grasping to the 'I'. An exception may be when we are sleeping, but in the waking period during most of our activities, if we were to ask ourselves, 'What is the driving force behind my actions?' we will find that it is mostly driven by self-interests which are related to a strong sense of grasping to the 'I'. As such, familiarising ourselves with a state of mind that opposes such a strong focus on the 'I' becomes a very high level practice. We need to adopt practical ways to cultivate the means to help overcome our chronic obsession with the self-cherishing mind.

Generating a positive attitude in one's mind and trying to maintain it becomes an optimum meditation practice in itself. As one becomes familiar with this positive attitude and maintains it, the mind naturally settles down to a clear and calm state. It is also an optimum Dharma practice because one is actively following the core advice of the Buddha: not to harm any living being and only benefiting sentient beings. This is really the ultimate intention and advice of all buddhas and bodhisattvas. Buddha Shakyamuni clearly mentions in the sutras: 'if you harm sentient beings you are harming me; if you benefit sentient beings you are benefiting me'. Notice the Buddha doesn't say, 'if you harm me then that is negative'. Rather, he says: 'If you don't wish to harm me stop harming sentient beings. If you wish to benefit me then benefit sentient beings'. So this shows the unequalled love and compassion that Buddha has for all sentient beings. Intentionally generating this state of mind and focusing on it becomes an optimum means to benefit oneself in this and future lives. In relation to both short-term and long-term benefit, it is really the optimum practice because it serves the purpose of fulfilling the wishes of all sentient beings. We can all relate to the fact that every single sentient being only wishes for happiness and does not intentionally wish to experience any suffering. So, when we actually generate a state of mind that wishes all sentient beings to experience happiness and further engage in ways to benefit them, whilst wishing all beings to be free from suffering and actively refrain from harming them, then one is actually fulfilling the needs and wishes of all sentient beings. One is not leaving any sentient being out, because every sentient being ultimately has this same wish. Thus, the practical approach to understanding the great benefit of generating this state of mind is to remember that you are ultimately fulfilling the wishes of all sentient beings.

By understanding this we can relate to how the bodhisattvas are always engaged in fulfilling two purposes: their own purpose, which ultimately is to fulfil the purpose of benefiting other sentient beings. Thus cultivating this state of mind benefits oneself by calming one's own mind. While I cannot personally claim that I have much experience, I do spend significant time generating this state of mind. I find that it really helps to settle and quieten the mind and make it more receptive to being virtuous. To that extent it becomes a very practical means to induce a positive and pure state of mind. If one makes a genuine attempt, one will definitely see the practical benefit on one's own mind. Thus, I encourage you and remind you again and again of the practical benefits that such a state of mind brings.

This outline, Achieving the Purpose of Others is subdivided into three categories.

3.1.2.1. It can eliminate the sufferings of sentient beings

This points out again that serving the purpose of others requires eliminating their sufferings and very succinctly shows how this is done.

3.1.2.2. It can eliminate its cause (its obscurations)

Again, not only does this mind eliminate the suffering of sentient beings but also the very causes which are the obscurations. Even though it is not explicitly presented here, we can relate this to the Four Noble Truths, particularly the first Noble Truth of suffering, and the second Noble Truth, which is the origination of suffering. If you can relate generating the bodhicitta attitude to the Two Truths it helps to eliminate suffering of sentient beings as well as the cause, the origination of suffering.

The obscurations here relate specifically to the deluded obscurations and the obscurations to omniscience, which encompass the origin of suffering. We derive a deeper understanding when we relate it to the Four Noble Truths.

3.1.2.3. It can achieve all benefit and happiness

Take special note that this relates to not only being able to achieve some minor level of happiness, but all benefit and happiness. So this is the extent to which the bodhicitta mind can benefit.

3.1.2.1. It can eliminate the sufferings of sentient beings

This is further divided into five sub-categories:

3.1.2.1.1. It can destroy the lord of death

3.1.2.1.2. It destroys poverty

3.1.2.1.3. It destroys sickness

3.1.2.1.4. It destroys the suffering of existence in general

3.1.2.1.5. It destroys specifically the sufferings of the lower realms

3.1.2.1.1. It can destroy the lord of death

Amongst the various sufferings we experience e.g. suffering of birth, sickness etc. this heading relates particularly to the suffering of death.

The first two lines of the verse relating to this point are:

*29ab. It is also the supreme nectar
Destroying migrator's lord of death.*

The commentary explains:

This bodhicitta is also the supreme nectar that destroys the lord of death through whom migrators die without freedom of choice.

Dying without freedom means that sentient beings have no choice over their mortality and have to experience death. That is the meaning of dying without freedom.

Bodhicitta serving as the supreme nectar that destroys the lord of death indicates that while there are other kinds of nectars, like those produced through the achievements of humans and gods, bodhicitta is the most supreme, as it is the one able to destroy the very lord of death. Thus, bodhicitta is likened to nectar of immortality. The Prayer to Maitreya reads:

Bodhicitta bars the way to unfortunate destinies;
It is the great teaching that leads to the highest realms;
And even to the state beyond old age and death.
To the mind of enlightenment, bodhicitta, I prostrate.

We can relate here to how bodhicitta is the supreme method for overcoming the lower rebirths, the supreme means for achieving the higher realms, and the supreme means to overcome aging and death.

In praise of bodhicitta, His Holiness the Dalai Lama quoted this very verse in the teachings in Sydney last year. This verse definitely summarises the qualities of bodhicitta. This is exactly how it is presented in the text here — developing bodhicitta becomes the means to overcome all unfortunate rebirths, leads one to the higher realms and to the state of being free from aging and death. Here the ultimate state of immortality is liberation, and the ultimate liberation is enlightenment. While it is possible to obtain the self-liberation of the lower vehicles without developing bodhicitta, i.e. the hearers and solitary realiser's state of liberation, there is no way that one can achieve enlightenment without first developing bodhicitta. Bodhicitta is the optimum cause for achieving enlightenment, and by relating to the benefits of developing it and maintaining it in one's continuum, a strong sense of awe can be generated in one's mind. Thus, one contemplates how wonderful bodhicitta is and the extensive benefits it brings. By developing bodhicitta one is able to achieve the most incredibly profound goal. Thus, by relating to the benefits of bodhicitta in this way, one will develop a great sense of awe, and a real inspiration that will leave the strong positive imprints to develop bodhicitta in one's mind. One will be inclined to develop bodhicitta oneself, because one sees the great value in it.

One needs to understand the explanation here in its proper context. When it says it can destroy the lord of death it is not referring to obtaining a miraculous feat, such as going around destroying suffering in other beings and freeing them from death without them having to create any causes and conditions; this is definitely not what is being implied here.

Developing bodhicitta will definitely have a great positive effect upon others. As the great Khunu Lama Rinpoche mentions¹:

The sheer fact of having bodhicitta within one's own mental continuum,
Naturally brings great solace to others
Even animals feel a great sense of comfort and fearlessness,
Not to mention humans and other beings alike.

So, developing bodhicitta oneself, even without any intentional activity on one's part, can bring so much comfort and ease to those around oneself.

However, the actual way that it eliminates sufferings and destroys the lord of death is by imparting the methods and teachings to others, particularly the teachings on what to adopt and what to discard. By presenting beings with the unmistakable teachings of how to accumulate virtue and abandon negativities, and when they adopt those teachings and practices, they will overcome their own sufferings and the causes of sufferings, ageing and death. Imparting advice to others needs to be in accordance with understanding their mental disposition and with a loving and kind attitude. Thus, presenting the unmistakable teachings to others with love and compassion is dependent on having developed bodhicitta oneself first. So this is how developing bodhicitta oneself actually helps to eliminate sufferings and death in other sentient beings. This is the proper way to understand this point.

As mentioned in the commentary, the way bodhicitta destroys the lord of death is by leading sentient beings to the ground which is free from old age and death.

3.1.2.1.2. It destroys poverty

The indication here is that bodhicitta becomes a cause to overcome or destroy poverty. The next two lines of the verse read:

29cd. *It is also the inexhaustible treasure
That eliminates sentient being's poverty.*

The commentary meaning is that

Because it gives inexhaustible material and Dharma, this mind generation is an inexhaustible treasure that eliminates the poverty of migrators.

Actually the meaning of the verse and explanation is quite clear. Generating bodhicitta also becomes the ultimate means for achieving the state where one has complete control over material gain as well as Dharma. When a bodhisattva reaches the eighth ground they obtain complete control over material wealth and knowledge of Dharma, and thus it becomes inexhaustible. It is like having an inexhaustible treasure house that can eliminate the poverty of migrators.

So this is how bodhisattvas benefit sentient beings. Initially, through their acts of generosity and kindness to others, they gather sentient beings close and then they impart their knowledge of the Dharma.

Other benefits touching on the same point are presented by Khunu Lama Rinpoche as:

The nectar of the mind is bodhicitta,
The jewel of the mind is bodhicitta,
The moon of the mind is bodhicitta
The sun of the mind is bodhicitta.

We can see that the way Khunu Lama Rinpoche presents the benefits of the bodhicitta from his own experience is aligned to how Shantideva presents the same meaning of the benefits of bodhicitta. Through his work from his own experience, we can definitely see that Khunu Lama Rinpoche was definitely a great practitioner of bodhicitta. Khunu Lama Rinpoche also said:

Bodhicitta is the optimum way to benefit others,
Bodhicitta is the optimum means for guiding others,
Bodhicitta is the optimum means to teach others.

It is presented in poetic form with very succinct meaning regarding the benefits of bodhicitta. Furthermore, he mentions:

If one wishes to benefit other sentient beings, that is done through bodhicitta;
If one wishes to be the friend of others, then the best way to do that is through developing bodhicitta.
Being a source of reliance, then that is achieved through bodhicitta.

Khunu Lama Rinpoche also mentions that if one wishes to be a virtuous teacher to others, then the optimum way is by generating bodhicitta. This is in line with what Lama Tsong Khapa mentions—without generating the wish for others to be free from suffering and for others to obtain happiness there is no way that one can really benefit others. So, the wish to benefit others is based upon wishing others to be free from suffering and to gain happiness.

3.1.2.1.3. It destroys sickness

The verse which relates to this is the next two lines:

30ab. *It is also the supreme medicine
Pacifying migrators' heavy diseases.*

The commentary reads:

It is also the supreme medicine that thoroughly pacifies all diseases of migrators.

The meaning of the verse is very clear here. The commentary explains bodhicitta is the supreme medicine that thoroughly pacifies the disease of migrators. The meaning here is linked to the earlier explanation, that the way it pacifies the diseases of other migrators is by presenting them with teachings of what to adopt and what to discard, to achieve the state of being free from disease.

As explained in the teachings, the ultimate source of migrators' sickness and disease is basically the three poisons: attachment, anger and ignorance. These really serve as the basis for all kinds of diseases and all sufferings. So the way bodhisattvas benefit beings to eliminate their sicknesses is by presenting antidotes to the three poisons. To overcome attachment, meditate on the unattractive features of the object of attachment. To overcome anger, meditate on love. To overcome ignorance, meditate on interdependent origination and emptiness. Presenting specific antidotes overcomes specific delusions, which are the very causes of all sufferings and diseases. Meditating on them and applying the antidote becomes the means to overcome the particular diseases of attachment, anger and ignorance, thus overcoming all sickness. This is how bodhicitta becomes the means to eliminate the sicknesses of other beings.

¹ Khunu Lama Rinpoche, Vast as the Heavens, Deep as the Sea.
Chapter 3

3.1.2.1.4. It destroys the suffering of existence in general

The verse which relates to this is the next two lines:

*30cd. It is the fruit tree that is a resting place for migrators,
Who wander the paths of existence and are tired.*

The commentary reads:

It is also the fruit tree that provides a cool resting place for the migrators who are wandering on the paths of existence and are tired.

The analogy presented in the commentary is that like a tree that provides a cool resting place, those who need that rest are migrators, endlessly wandering on the path of existence and extremely tired. The teachings refer to the three types of existence: birth, death and the intermediate state. So, endlessly cycling through the three types of existence, migrating from one existence to the next, beings are extremely tired. Just as a large fruit tree would provide a cool resting place for those travelling in the heat and sun, bodhicitta is the optimum means for providing that ultimate rest for beings who are wandering in cyclic existence. Some texts would relate this explanation to the path of the medium scope, so bodhisattvas would show the path of the medium scope to those who are trainees in the medium scope, particularly solitary realisers and hearers. General existence is explained here and it means destroying the sufferings of the existence in general by leading to the optimum state of liberation.

The main point is that bodhicitta serves as a means for beings who are wandering on the path of cyclic existence to obtain that ultimate rest of achieving liberation, being free from all samsaric existence.

3.1.2.1.5. It destroys specifically the sufferings of the lower realms

The verse which relates to this is the next two lines:

*31ab. It is the universal bridge that liberates
All migrators from the lower realms.*

The commentary explains that

Generating the mind of bodhicitta is also the universal bridge that liberates all migrators from the lower realms.

The analogy of the universal bridge indicates presenting teachings on adopting the ten virtues. Beings then follow this advice, adopting the ten virtues as the means to free themselves from the lower realms or to be reborn again in the lower realms. So this is how to understand how the bodhicitta attitude becomes the supreme means to present the teachings in accordance to beings' capacity and mental disposition; to present unmistakable methods and ways to be free from various types of sufferings, particularly the lower realms. It shows that when bodhicitta has been developed, it spontaneously helps sentient beings without much effort from one's own side. Also, it establishes a very suitable foundation for those who listen to the advice and teachings to naturally be able to adopt that advice and benefit from it. So this again shows the way by which bodhicitta becomes the supreme means to benefit others.

In summary, the main points that have been presented here are how bodhicitta serves as an optimum means to overcome the various levels of sentient beings' sufferings; that it destroys the sufferings of existence in general and particularly helps to destroy the sufferings of the lower realms. This is done by benefiting others. The first step of benefiting others is when bodhisattvas lead sentient beings to the state of liberation from the sufferings of cyclic existence in general. The next step of benefiting sentient beings is when bodhisattvas lead them to the higher status, free of the suffering of the lower realms.

Other commentaries explain the analogy of bodhicitta serving as a universal bridge. The connotation is from a Tibetan word for an actual bridge or platform from which you cannot go back. Providing this platform reverses beings from the lower realms and establishes them in higher rebirths to serve as the means to obtain the highest goal of liberation and enlightenment. This becomes the very basis for beings to further develop the causes which liberate them from samsara and the ultimate liberation of enlightenment.

3.1.2.2. IT CAN ELIMINATE ITS CAUSE

Cause refers specifically to the causes of a suffering existence (samsara) and a rebirth in a lower realm. The two main causes are explained in the subdivisions of this outline:

3.1.2.2.1. Eliminating afflictive obscurations

3.1.2.2.2. Eliminating the obscurations to knowledge

3.1.2.2.1. Eliminating afflictive obscurations

The verse which relates to this is the next two lines:

*31cd. It is the moon shining in the mind
That eliminates migrator's misery of the afflictions.*

The commentary reads:

This mind generation is also the shining moon that eliminates the heat and misery of the afflictions of migrators. That is, it has the power to eliminate all afflictive obscurations.

As mentioned previously, Khunu Lama Rinpoche's verse indicated that bodhicitta is the moon of the mind and the sun of the mind. This explanation also relates to moonlight or the cooling light of the moon.

The commentary explains that this mind generation is like the shining moon, eliminating the heat and misery of migrators' afflictions. This is because it has power to eliminate afflictive obscurations. Using this analogy, moonlight has a cooling effect which eliminates the suffering of the heat felt during the day when it is very hot. As soon as the sun sets and the moon rises, the moon's cooling light eliminates the suffering of extreme heat. Likewise here, the heat is an analogy for the actual misery (or afflictions) of the migrators, all their sufferings. The analogy explains that bodhicitta is that which eliminates all the afflictive obscurations of sentient beings. The main afflictive obscuration is grasping at the self and the delusions in general, but particularly grasping to the self. When bodhicitta has the power to eliminate this, there is no way for sufferings to be experienced, because when the cause of suffering is completely eliminated from the mind there is no way to experience the result, which is suffering. This is how bodhicitta serves to bring this about.

It is good to note here the descriptions of specific symbols, such as the moon, sun and lotus. For example, whenever images of deities or buddhas are presented on the moon, the symbolism of the moon represents bodhicitta. The symbol of the sun represents wisdom realising emptiness. Enlightened beings seated upon a lotus, sun and moon disc actually represent the significance of developing bodhicitta and the wisdom realising emptiness so the individual beings obtain the ultimate state of enlightenment and become a Buddha, an enlightened being.

3.1.2.2.2. Eliminating the obscurations to knowledge

The verse which relates to this is the next two lines:

32. *It is the great sun that dispels
The vitreous humour of not knowing.*

The commentary reads:

It is also the great sun that dispels from the root the non-afflictive not knowing of migrators, the cataract-like obscurations to knowledge. The reason for this is that the wisdom realising emptiness is adorned with great accumulations that exhaust the seed of the obscuration to knowledge.

As explained in the commentary, it is also the great sun that dispels from the root the non-afflictive not knowing of the migrators, the cataract-like obscurations to knowledge. Firstly, the non-afflictive not knowing of migrators refers to the obscurations to knowledge (which as the analogy refers to here, are like cataracts that causes the eyes not to see clearly). What obscures one from seeing ultimate reality directly is the mistaken appearance that obscures one from clearly seeing both truths simultaneously. For as long as one has obscurations to knowledge, one will not be able to see the Two Truths simultaneously, and one's current mistaken view serves like a veil to have mistaken appearance. Because bodhicitta serves as a means to overcome this obscuration to knowledge and remove the veil of mistaken appearance, it is like the great sun.

To further explain this analogy, the sun becomes the means to eliminate darkness because as soon as it rises darkness is completely eliminated. In a similar way, bodhicitta removes the cataract-like obscurations to knowledge completely. The commentary explains that the reason for this is that the wisdom realising emptiness is adorned with great accumulation, and this exhausts the seed of the obscurations to knowledge. Bodhicitta serves as the means for obtaining a great accumulation of merit. The merit based on love and compassion is generated when engaging in the practice of the six perfections; also extensive practice of generosity. All can be accomplished through the power of bodhicitta.

Furthermore, extensive practices of morality are accomplished through bodhicitta, also patience and joyous effort and meditation and finally, the wisdom realising emptiness. When the wisdom realising emptiness is complemented with bodhicitta, it becomes the optimum means to accumulate extensive merit and completely exhausts the seeds of the obscurations to knowledge, by completely eliminating it from the mind stream.

It has now been explained that developing bodhicitta is the ultimate means for overcoming all faults and obscurations and acquiring all qualities to achieve the ultimate state of enlightenment. It shows how bodhicitta serves as a means, and from the moment it is developed along the path, it achieves all the realisations and leads to the ultimate state of omniscience. This is all based on having developed bodhicitta; it becomes the very root and cause.

We'll conclude for the evening by reciting the prayer The Eight Verses of Training the Mind and dedicate it to the late Norman Henderson who, while he might not have been a member of Tara Institute, was definitely a very diligent student, coming here regularly. I have known him from when I was at Chenrezig Institute in Queensland. He used to come when I was up there, so I remember him and have known him for a long time; he is like an old friend. As he passed away recently, we'll dedicate the merit of the recitation of the prayer to him and also to Liam's grandfather who passed away recently.

I had already explained the visualisation that we can adopt for this practice, so I don't need to do that again. So, we try to do that visualisation as we recite the prayer.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcribed by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

25 February 2014

The Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer that we have just recited should suffice to generate the proper motivation for our meditation practice.

Indeed the Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer is the most profound prayer that we say. If, while reciting the profound words through our mouth, we can also adopt the respectful physical gesture of prostration, and mentally go for refuge and generate the bodhicitta attitude then, within just a few minutes, we will definitely collect extensive merit. There is no doubt about that at all.

What needs to be purified are negativities, which we definitely have. But we also have the means to purify those negativities. And as explained previously, the optimum method to purify negativities is to rely on the objects of refuge and generate bodhicitta. We need to keep this point in mind.

If, after going for refuge wholeheartedly as we recite the prayer, we can visualise the objects of refuge merging into ourselves and thus blessing our mental continuum, our minds will definitely settle down. There is no question that any disturbing thoughts will definitely be appeased by taking refuge in this way.

Bearing that in mind we will now engage in the meditation practice for a few minutes. [meditation]

Now we generate the motivation to receive the teachings, by developing this strong intention:

In order to free all sentient beings from suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself, so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

During the tong len practice that we engaged in earlier, our intention was to take upon ourselves all the sufferings of all sentient beings, as well as the causes of that suffering and the very imprints giving rise to those causes, whilst in return giving them our happiness and virtues. With that intention in mind, we generate the motivation for the teaching, to reaffirm that having taken on the sufferings of sentient beings we generate the intention to lead them to the ultimate state of happiness i.e. enlightenment. The motivation 'I need to engage in the practice of listening to the teaching' complements the tong len practice that we have just done.

Indeed, engaging in any activity with that motivation in mind will ensure that one's life becomes most meaningful.

3.1.2. Achieving the purpose of others

3.1.2.2. IT CAN ELIMINATE ITS CAUSE

3.1.2.2.2. Eliminating the obscurations to knowledge (cont.)

The relevant verse reads:

32ab. *It is the great sun that dispels
The vitreous humour of not knowing.*

We concluded the teaching last week with these lines, which indicate how bodhicitta serves as a means to remove the obscurations to knowledge, even the very subtle imprints in our mind that are the root of non-afflictive not knowing. This shows that it is our own responsibility to eliminate those imprints by applying the antidote to the obscurations to knowledge. We need to realise that we cannot expect others to remove our obscurations and that we need to take the initiative to do so ourselves. This is what we need to derive as a personal instruction.

3.1.2.3. IT CAN ACHIEVE ALL BENEFIT AND HAPPINESS

This is subdivided into two:

3.1.2.3.1. Achieving all benefit

3.1.2.3.2. Achieving every happiness

3.1.2.3.1. Achieving all benefit

This heading relates to achieving the ability to benefit all other sentient beings, and the lines that relate to this heading are:

32cd. *It is the essence of butter
That is derived from the milk of Dharma.*

We need to see the connection between what is presented here and what we are attempting to do in our own practice. Our earlier meditation was based on wishing to bring about benefit and happiness for all sentient beings and eliminate all their suffering. Achieving all benefit through developing bodhicitta relates to the same intention, and it is good to remember this point.

As you know, one of the methods for developing bodhicitta is the technique of exchanging self with others. In order to engage in that practice one needs to train the mind to the point where we have no hesitation in exchanging self-interest with the interests of other sentient beings. Thus the tong len practice of giving and taking serves as a basis for training the mind in exchanging self with others. When we actually attain that state of being able to exchange self with others and then develop bodhicitta, we will experience tremendous joy. That is because we will have achieved what we are striving to achieve, which is a state of mind that works for the welfare of other sentient beings. That naturally brings us great happiness and joy.

We need to understand how all of these practices - beginning with the meagre attempts of training our mind now - lead to the higher state of actually developing this incredibly precious state of mind called bodhicitta. We need to see the connection between what we are attempting to do now and the ultimate result we intend to achieve.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse quite succinctly:

This mind generation is the butter essence arising from churning the great ocean of milk that is the holy Dharma, with the churning wood of wisdom arising from listening and contemplating.

It is the essence of butter that can generate the taste of achieving each and every benefit, and therefore everybody should strive in it.

Here, the teachings or the doctrine of the Buddha are likened to a great ocean of milk. Butter is created by churning the milk with a wooden paddle, likewise listening to, contemplating and meditating on the Buddha's doctrine, is analogous to using a wooden paddle. Just as butter arises from churning the milk with a wooden paddle, wisdom arises from listening to, and contemplating and meditating on the Buddha's doctrine. Butter is actually a coarse substance that can be further refined to its essence by boiling it, and just like clarified butter, bodhicitta is the very essence of the Buddha's doctrine. This is similar to the presentation in The Three Principles of the Path, which states that bodhicitta is the very essence of the Buddha's doctrine that is praised by all the buddhas.

As the analogy explains, just as the tastiest part of butter is the essence of butter, the tastiest part of the Buddha's doctrine, its essence, is achieving the benefit of all beings through having cultivated bodhicitta. Therefore, one needs to develop that which serves as the very essence of the Dharma.

Developing the essence of the Dharma, which is bodhicitta, begins with the meagre attempts we make now of generating a genuine mind of consideration for others, with a genuine wish to help and benefit others. Part of our training is to develop that intention now to whatever extent we are able to. It would be quite lame to think, 'Oh, since I haven't yet developed bodhicitta, there is not much point thinking about it'. It is because of the very fact that we haven't yet generated bodhicitta that we are being exhorted to strive to develop it.

As mentioned previously, we do that by cultivating loving and kind attitudes to others with whatever means we have now. Then, slowly through our training and familiarity our mind will gradually become more and more attuned to having a genuine sense of concern for the wellbeing of other sentient beings. This then serves as a basis to further develop a genuine sense of love and compassion. This is how we make progress, and further develop the mind of bodhicitta.

The peerless instruction on the generation of bodhicitta by means of listening, contemplating and meditating is none other than this very text that we are studying now, the Bodhisattvacharyavataara. This is the best source of advice to listen to, contemplate on and meditate on. So we have the most supreme instructions at hand on how to develop bodhicitta.

3.1.2.3.2. Achieving every happiness

This section of the text is explained in the following verse:

33. *The migrating guests wander on the paths of existence
And wish to engage pleasant enjoyments;*

*It abides close to supreme happiness
And satisfies the great samsaric guests*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

The migrating guests wandering in cyclic existence on the paths of the three existences wish for the pleasant enjoyments of gods and humans.

This mind generation abides close to the supreme method for establishing happiness, and satisfies the many guests from cyclic existence because it establishes the higher status and definite goodness of all sentient beings.

I have explained many times what cyclic existence connotes. As teachings explain, that which binds one to the appropriated aggregates again and again through the influence of delusions and karma is cyclic existence. In other words, the contaminated aggregates that we possess now are an example of cyclic existence. Over countless lifetimes we have uncontrollably obtained such contaminated aggregates, through which we experience the shortcomings of sufferings and so forth. So the real cycle is obtaining the appropriated contaminated aggregates again and again through the influence of delusions and karma. It is as if we are bound to these appropriated, contaminated aggregates which serve as the basis for all unwanted misery and suffering. This is the real meaning of cyclic existence.

The migrating guests are those who are bound by delusions and karma to this existence of obtaining the contaminated aggregates again and again. The paths of the three existences are the desire, form and formless realms. Thus, beings circle in these three different realms again and again. All those beings in the cyclic existence wish for the pleasant enjoyments of the gods and humans. So, not only does bodhicitta bring the ultimate benefit and goodness of liberation and enlightenment, but it also serves as a means to bring about the temporary benefits of humans and gods while circling in samsara.

Furthermore, this mind generation abides close to the supreme method for establishing happiness, and satisfies the many guests from cyclic existence. The reason for that is that it establishes the higher status and definite goodness of all sentient beings. So bodhicitta serves as a means to establish beings in the temporary wellbeing of the most fortunate rebirth in cyclic existence, and while bringing that temporary pleasure and enjoyment, it ultimately brings the definite goodness of the state of liberation and ultimately, enlightenment.

Thus bodhicitta is the supreme method to benefit sentient beings because the generation of this mind brings about the temporary and ultimate wellbeing of sentient beings; that is the main meaning of this verse.

Satisfying many guests also has a connotation of being a most supreme offering. There are explanations in the teachings that one of the best ways of gaining merit is making unsurpassed offerings to the enlightened beings and benefiting sentient beings. Of all the offerings that one can make to the buddhas and bodhisattvas, offering bodhicitta is the best, because it brings benefit for all sentient beings. So the generation of bodhicitta is the most supreme offering and method for accumulating merit.

We need to really contemplate these points, remembering how the generation of the mind of bodhicitta is dependent on first developing love and compassion. Thus, we need to really think about the great value of developing love and compassion again and again and train our mind daily in the development of love and compassion. This means that in whatever activity we engage, whether it is eating or drinking or going about our daily business, we constantly remember, 'I am doing this as a means to benefit sentient beings'. When we eat something, we offer it first to the objects of refuge and then we remind ourselves that we are consuming it to sustain ourselves for the purpose of benefiting sentient beings. When we drink something, we accumulate merit by offering it, and then drink it to quench our thirst and nourish us as a means of supporting ourselves so that we can benefit sentient beings.

If we can relate to every activity this way, seeing it as a means to benefit sentient beings, then we are familiarising our mind with the wish to benefit sentient beings and actually utilising our daily activities for that purpose. So, in this way we slowly and gradually establish a firm foundation for developing bodhicitta. Bodhicitta is not developed instantaneously; it requires effort and a great amount of training.

Of course, in explaining this I am not implying that I have obtained any great experiential levels from practising in this way, but I can assure you that I do attempt to practise in this way. So if you ask me whether I attempt to do these practices then the answer is definitely, 'Yes, I do try to practise like this in my daily life'. If you ask whether I have achieved any great realisation from this practice then the answer will be, 'No, I have not'. However I find that there is great benefit derived even from my genuine attempts to practice. Thus, I entreat you to really familiarise your mind again and again with these practices, and then, through constant familiarity you will gradually see a transformation taking place.

When the commentary says this mind generation abides close to the supreme method, the Tibetan word nyi-war-ne, has the connotation of 'definitely abiding'. So the meaning here is that the mind generation of bodhicitta definitely abides as the supreme method for establishing happiness.

Thus, the generation of bodhicitta is an unsurpassable offering to the supreme enlightened beings, as it is the supreme means to satisfy the many guests in cyclic existence. Why? Because, it establishes high status and definite goodness for all sentient beings.

3.2. Inducing others to be joyful

What is being explained here is that by generating the mind of bodhicitta, one induces joy in others. This can be understood with the analogy of someone who has the potential and ability to take care of all our needs by promising us, 'I will take responsibility for establishing your wellbeing and I will give you everything you need for your happiness'. Hearing such a promise would make us feel extremely joyful. Just the thought, 'Oh, I have someone who is going to take care of me', brings great solace and joy.

What actually is implied here, and this will be explained in the verse, is that someone who aspires to develop bodhicitta is making this promise to establish all beings in happiness: I will take responsibility for establishing all beings in a state of ultimate state of happiness and free them from all suffering. That is the vow that one makes.

The verse relating to this heading is:

34. *Today I have, in front of all protectors, Served migrators the hospitality of
A tathagata and intermediate happiness.
The gods, demi-gods and so forth should rejoice.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Today, in the presence of all the protectors, the conquerors and their children, I have invited all migrating sentient beings as guests and serve them the hospitality of becoming a sugata, one who has accomplished all ultimate benefit and happiness, and until they obtain that state I also give them the permission to satisfy themselves with the intermediate happiness of gods and humans.

'I' refers to oneself, and the time when the vows are taken is today. These vows or promises were made in front of all the protectors, who are the conquerors and the children, i.e. all the buddhas and bodhisattvas. Then one continues, I have invited all migrating sentient beings as guests and serve them the hospitality of a sugata, which indicates that one has made the pledge to lead all sentient beings to that ultimate state of a sugata who has accomplished all ultimate benefit and happiness.

As indicated in the commentary, the ultimate intention is to lead all beings to the ultimate state of buddhahood, but until that state is obtained, one offers all beings the permission to be satisfied with the intermediate happiness of gods and humans.

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

As such I have offered the supreme hospitality and from today onwards the gods, demi-gods, serpent kings and so forth should be happy.

This is to induce joy in others.

So others should be joyful because of the pledges that one has made today, in the presence of all the protectors, buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Then Gyaltsab Je exhorts us:

Preceding the generation of the two minds, as explained in this commentary:

This means that as a precursor to developing the generation of the two minds i.e. aspiring and engaging bodhicitta, one needs to:

Understand that mind generation upon having purified the disrupting conditions of the obscurations and building up the conducive conditions of the accumulations of merit, is the supreme way to take the essence of the precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments, and strive in it.

This is an exhortation that the supreme means to develop the mind of bodhicitta is to engage in the practices of accumulating merit and purifying one's negativities. That is the supreme means to take the essence of one's precious human rebirth with its freedom and endowments. That is what we need to strive for.

Summarising Verse

Gyatso Je offers this summarising verse as a final exhortation:

They who understand they have attained a human rebirth with freedoms and endowments
Should strive in generating the two bodhicittas,
The essential meaning of all the teachings of the conquerors,
The sole path traversed by the tens of millions of their children.

Anyone who understands that they have attained such human rebirth with its freedom and endowments indicates that those who have the wisdom to understand the value of the precious human rebirth, definitely need to strive in generating bodhicitta, which is the essential meaning of all the teachings of the conquerors, and the sole path traversed by the tens of millions of their children.

II. THE NAME OF THE CHAPTER

The root text concludes the chapter with:

This is the third chapter on taking the mind of enlightenment, from Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas.

The commentary reads:

This is the commentary on the third chapter called Taking the Mind of Enlightenment, from the commentary on the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

Now we come to the fourth chapter, the title of which is Applying Conscientiousness. To explain the context of this chapter, we need to return to the subdivisions introduced in chapter 1.¹

2. THE ACTUAL EXPLANATION OF THE STAGES OF THE PATH

2.2. The method for taking the essence

2.2.2. Explaining the individual meanings²

2.2.2.2. THE WAY OF TRAINING IN THE PRACTICES OF GENERATING THE TWO MINDS

2.2.2.2.1. Taking the mind of enlightenment

This was the content of the last chapter. Now we come to:

2.2.2.2.2. The Way of Training in the Actions, the Perfections

This has four subdivisions:

2.2.2.2.2.1. The way of meditating on conscientiousness, the limb preventing the degeneration of the training in the mind of enlightenment³

2.2.2.2.2.2. Explaining the way of training in morality, by relating it to introspection and mindfulness, the methods for keeping virtuous dharmas pure⁴

2.2.2.2.2.3. Explaining the way of training in the remaining four perfections⁵

¹ See the teaching of 26 March 2013.

² The following two subdivisions were listed in the teaching of 2 July 2013.

³ Covered in chapter 4.

⁴ Covered in chapter 5.

⁵ Covered in chapters 6 to 9.

2.2.2.2.2.4. Explaining the way of practising the generosity of offering one's body, possessions and roots of virtue to others, by way of the limb of dedication⁶

This list encompasses all the remaining chapters.

The first three chapters of the text, as you would recall⁷, present the means of generating bodhicitta, which has not yet been developed. The next three chapters, Conscientiousness, Mindfulness or Introspection, and Patience present the means of maintaining the bodhicitta that has been generated. Chapters 7 to 9 present the means of increasing bodhicitta, and the final chapter dedicates the merits of bodhicitta.

2.2.2.2.2.1. The way of meditating on conscientiousness, the limb preventing the degeneration of the training in the mind of enlightenment

This section also includes other practices that are needed for developing bodhicitta.

Conscientiousness is defined as state of mind that prevents one from being influenced by the delusions, and by maintaining enthusiasm it protects one from contaminated states of mind and increases virtue.

This definition has two main elements:

- It is a mental state of mind that prevents delusions from arising
- While maintaining enthusiasm it protects one from contaminated states of mind and increases virtue

That which encompasses all these attributes is called conscientiousness. Without conscientiousness, it said that one will not be able to engage in any of the three trainings of morality, concentration and wisdom. Therefore conscientiousness is an essential state of mind that we must develop if we wish to engage in our practice properly.

CHAPTER 4: APPLYING CONSCIENTIOUSNESS⁸

The chapter has two elements.

- I. Explaining the text of the chapter
- II: The name of the chapter

I. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

The chapter has three subdivisions

1. Short explanation of the way to meditate on conscientiousness
2. Explaining it extensively
3. Summary

1. SHORT EXPLANATION OF THE WAY TO MEDITATE ON CONSCIENTIOUSNESS

The first verse of the chapter reads:

1. *After the children of the conquerors,
Have very firmly accepted bodhicitta,
They should unwaveringly strive always
To not transgress the trainings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explanation of this verse reads:

⁶ Covered in chapter 10.

⁷ See 12 February 2013.

⁸ To keep things manageable the numbering system starts again.

After the children of the conquerors, the bodhisattvas, took very firmly the two minds of enlightenment as explained earlier, they should unwaveringly protect them with conscientiousness, so as not to wander from them for even a second.

They should also unwaveringly protect the trainings of the six perfections and the four ways of attracting disciples, so as not to waver from them, and that they never decrease.

I have already explained in the past the connotation of children of the conquerors, and also what conqueror refers to, so you may recall that. Having very firmly established the two minds of enlightenment, which were explained earlier, we must unwaveringly protect them with conscientiousness, so as not to wander from them for even a second. Furthermore they should also unwaveringly protect the trainings of the six perfections and the four ways of attracting disciples, so as not to waver from them, and that they never decrease.

What we need to understand from this is that once a bodhisattva generates the two states of mind of bodhicitta, there are only two activities that they will engage in from then on—activities that encompass fulfilling their own purpose, and activities that encompass fulfilling the purpose of others. The six perfections are specifically the means to fulfil one's own ultimate purpose, although they also directly benefit others. The four ways of attracting disciples are the activities that specifically and directly benefit other beings. Bodhisattvas have no other activities than these two.

The six perfections serve as a means to fulfil one's ultimate goal of achieving enlightenment, solely for the purpose of benefiting other sentient beings. As explained in the teachings, having generated a state of mind of bodhicitta, bodhisattvas are committed to striving to achieve enlightenment, which takes many eons of practice. So bodhisattvas need to ensure that they are not deprived of good conditions and that they have sufficient wealth and so forth over the many lives needed to achieve the ultimate state of enlightenment. Because that takes many eons, one has to ensure that all the conditions are in place so as to be able to continuously engage in the practices until achieving the state of enlightenment. The supreme means of ensuring that one has the appropriate conditions of sufficient wealth and so forth is none other than engaging in the practice of generosity. That is how the practice of generosity is the optimum means to establish those necessary favourable conditions.

In order to engage in the practice of generosity to amass sufficient means in good conditions one needs to have a basis, which is a perfect physical body. This is obtained through none other than the practice of morality. Thus, morality is the main cause of obtaining a perfect body.

Furthermore, having amassed the perfect conditions of sufficient wealth and so forth, and having the perfect base of a sound body, one needs to have a good retinue if one is to make use of those conditions. In both a worldly context and for the Dharma, one needs to have an appropriate retinue to help us to utilise those good conditions. What brings about a perfect retinue is none other than the practice of patience. That is why the practice of patience is said to be essential.

We also need to ensure that whatever activity we engage in is completed. That which ensures that any activity reaches completion is none other than the practice of enthusiasm or joyous effort.

Then we need to make sure that all the earlier good conditions that we have obtained do not become a condition for delusions to arise. So we need to adopt the practice of meditation to ensure delusions do not arise.

Being able to discern what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded is essential, and the unmistakable discriminating wisdom is acquired through the practice of wisdom.

We can see the relevance of all of this to our own practice. By seeing the practical benefits of engaging in these practices of generosity, morality, patience, joyous effort, meditation and developing wisdom, we are further encouraged to engage in these practices to accomplish our ultimate goal.

The purpose of obtaining the perfect conditions we enjoy now is twofold: ultimately it is to benefit other sentient beings, and to achieve one's own ultimate goal. The first three perfections, generosity, morality and patience are a direct means of fulfilling the benefit of other sentient beings.

Our own ultimate purpose is gained through the wisdom that leads one to obtaining the bliss or happiness of liberation. However, if the mind is distracted and wavering then it is not possible to develop that wisdom. So, in order to cultivate that wisdom one needs to have a very stable and undistracted mind, which is established through meditation, in particular concentration.

The ultimate concentration is calm abiding and based on calm abiding one achieves the wisdom of special insight. The union of calm abiding and special insight can only occur after having first obtained calm abiding. So we need to understand that special insight is preceded by calm abiding. However concentration and wisdom cannot be established if one is lazy. Therefore the perfection of joyous effort is essential to achieve both one's own purpose as well to benefit other sentient beings.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

4 March 2014

Based on the motivation we had just generated, we can engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

In our last session we started Chapter 4, which is Conscientiousness.

1. SHORT EXPLANATION OF THE WAY TO MEDITATE ON CONSCIENTIOUSNESS (CONT.)

The importance of applying conscientiousness was explained earlier as being essential to prevent bodhicitta from declining after it had been generated. I also explained how the bodhisattvas' activities are encompassed in the practices of the six perfections and the four means of gathering disciples.

Although I have already identified and explained the four means of gathering disciples previously, I will list them again. They are: giving whatever is necessary; speaking pleasantly; helping others; and consistency between words and deeds. Here we will notice that the incomparably kind Buddha presented these ways of benefiting others in very practical manner.

The first is giving people what they need through generosity. By engaging in giving, you develop an acquaintance with them where they begin to feel comfortable and develop a bond with you. Along with that, if you utter kind and pleasant words, that will really appeal to them.

We can all relate to the benefit of giving, however generosity needs to be accompanied with kind and pleasant speech so that the recipients can receive it gracefully, without fear or hesitation. For example, when you give food to animals, if you do so with pleasant words it creates a gentle atmosphere that makes them feel comfortable, and then they come close to you and gracefully accept the food. If even animals can appreciate this kind and gentle gesture, then there is no need to mention how humans would relate to it as well.

As you would know, generosity is classified into two types: generosity with material wealth and generosity with the Dharma. Likewise, speaking pleasantly can also be related to a worldly context—such as greeting and welcoming people with pleasant words, and presenting the actual meaning of the Dharma.

The third way of gathering disciples, helping others, particularly relates to presenting the Dharma. Taking the example of helping animals again, when an animal has been treated kindly (with food and pleasant words) it develops trust in the owner, who can then explain things which it will follow, like certain behaviour patterns or even tricks. Animals can learn quite a lot of skills willingly from their owners or trainers that they trust. In the context of bodhisattvas helping sentient beings, it refers not only to temporary benefit, but that which will benefit sentient beings in all future lives, up until achieving the ultimate state of enlightenment. As part of the means to benefit other beings, you can see that these ways of gathering disciples play a very important role in developing a good relationship with other beings. It is very much in line with the worldly concepts of enacting good deeds for others, thus we can easily relate to this as being a practical ways and means to benefit others.

When we see how the teaching presents these points so meticulously and logically, it gives us the initiative to implement and integrate them in our own practice. It gives us a deeper sense of understanding, and entreats us to use our intelligence, our reasoning and logical way of thinking. For me it definitely provides very good ways to think critically and logically; I am sure you can relate to it as well.

As explained to me by my own teachers and previous masters, the fourth means of gathering disciples, consistency between words and deeds, means to act in accordance with the Dharma. This relates to both entreating others to act in accordance with the Dharma and to follow the advice of the Dharma oneself. So, the third means is to help others by explaining the meaning of the Dharma while the fourth is to implore others, as well as to follow the Dharma oneself.

In our last session I explained how the six perfections serve as a means to acquire good conditions. It is important to also take note of the opposites to each of the six perfections, as the exact opposite is a hindrance to engaging in the practice. For example miserliness is the opposite of generosity, so when we are affected by miserliness this obstructs us from being generous. We will not be able to perfect the practice of generosity if we don't overcome miserliness. Thus, we need to apply an antidote to overcome miserliness to become more and more accustomed to being naturally generous.

We can definitely relate to the ill effects of strong miserliness. Some are not able to make offerings because they are too miserly to use their resources. Furthermore, out of miserliness some are not able to benefit others with their wealth and may not even be able to use their own wealth to benefit themselves. So we can see in a very practical way how miserliness obstructs one from using one's wealth in an optimum way. The antidote for overcoming miserliness is none other than actually engaging in the practice of generosity, by seeing the advantages and benefits of being generous. As we gradually increase acts of generosity, we will begin to overcome miserliness.

To list the other opposites: the opposite of morality is corrupt morality; the opposite of patience is anger or hatred; the opposite of joyous effort is laziness; the opposite of meditation (concentration) is mental wandering and the opposite of wisdom is corrupt wisdom.

So identifying the opposites of the six perfections and overcoming them is necessary to engage in the actual practices. By relating to a bodhisattva's practice of generosity we can definitely understand how it enables a bodhisattva to fulfil the purpose of others as well as one's own purposes. That should encourage one to also overcome miserliness and begin to practise generosity and so forth.

2. EXPLAINING IT EXTENSIVELY

This is subdivided into two.

- 2.1. Meditating on conscientiousness for bodhicitta
- 2.2. Being conscientious of the trainings

2.1. Meditating on conscientiousness for bodhicitta

This is further subdivided into two.

- 2.1.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to give up bodhicitta
- 2.1.2. The fault of giving it up

The first explains that having taken the bodhisattva vows and making that pledge, it is unsuitable to give up bodhicitta. The reason presented is encompassed in the second point, the fault of giving it up. That is, if one were to give it up, what would the faults be?

2.1.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to give up bodhicitta

The next two verses explain the meaning of this heading.

The first verse reads:

2. *Any action done in the spur of the moment,
Or done without having been considered carefully,
Although having already committed to them,
It is appropriate to analyse whether to act or to leave it.*

The commentary explains the meaning of this verse as follows:

Actions that were just engaged in impulsively, without consideration of their benefits and drawbacks, or actions that were minimally analysed but not well investigated before engaged in, are actions that are suitable to be investigated later on, to decide whether to continue them or not, despite having made an earlier commitment.

The first part of the translation reads actions that were just engaged in and uses the term impulsively which relates to the Tibetan term that has the connotation of not taking any measures to check whether the action one is about to engage in has any advantages or disadvantages, or benefits or drawbacks i.e. just engaging in an activity without first checking. For example, compare taking the bodhisattva vows without first checking the benefits and drawbacks, with first doing some analysis and then taking them. Taking the bodhisattva vows after analysing and understanding them is proper practice, whereas taking the bodhisattva vows without first analysing and understanding what they are would be improper and a fault.

The point to note here is that without consideration of the benefits or drawbacks or actions that were minimally analysed but not well investigated, are suitable to be investigated later on to decide whether to continue or not, despite having made earlier commitment.

The Tibetan commentary begins with despite having made an earlier commitment, which implies that one has already made a promise to do a certain action. However even if one has made a promise, there are actions that are suitable to be investigate later on, and decide whether one should continue doing them or not.

The point being presented here is in relation to a bodhisattva's promise. While this may not apply to us directly, as we have not actually developed bodhicitta yet, nevertheless we can still relate this to other aspects in our everyday life. As I regularly share with you, don't be hasty making promises or commitments to others prior to fully understanding what you are committing to. I have often heard people speak of a commitment in a lamenting way such as, 'Oh, I have to follow this through now because I have already made a promise'. A promise is taken very seriously and even though you no longer find the action suitable, because of a promise you feel an obligation to do it. So my advice, which is in line with what is being presented here, is don't be hasty making promises or commitments prior to investigating whether it is something suitable or manageable for you do to. You need to apply this advice into your everyday life situations.

The main point being presented here is that if normal activities that need further investigation are not given up because a promise is made, then what need is there to mention not giving up bodhicitta! This is explained further in the next verse.

What is explained here can also be understood in terms of the two types of trainees on the path: those of intelligent faculty and those of dull faculty. Those of intelligent faculty investigate thoroughly before they actually undertake any activity or practice etc. whereas those of dull intelligence or faculty don't really have the means to thoroughly investigate. They just accept and engage in the practices without too much investigation.

It is explained in the teachings that when those of intelligent faculty make a promise, the commitment is much more firm and stable than from those with dull faculty. That is because the promise or commitment is made after employing thorough investigation and analysis.

However, there is also a phrase in a text which says that siddhis or attainments may be obtained more swiftly by those with dull faculty because they immediately engage in the practice. By taking much more time to investigate and analyse, those with intelligent faculty sometimes get held back and don't engage in the practice right away. So there can be some drawbacks in taking a longer time to achieve their goals.

This relates to stories about some trainees who actually investigated bodhicitta for twelve years before finally feeling committed enough to engage in the practice, whereas those who did not have much intelligence but strong faith, just engaged in the practice, and would have developed bodhicitta sooner.

In comparison to actions done without considering the benefits and drawbacks, or minimally analysed with further room to be investigated and decided upon, the next verse points out:

3. *But how can I discard that
Which has been analysed
By the buddhas and their children with great wisdom*

And also analysed by myself repeatedly.

The meaning of this verse is explained with a quote from a sutra. It reads:

As it is stated in the Sutra Requested by Subahu, the buddhas, and their children such as Maitreya, ...

At this point you can relate to an earlier explanation about the close children or disciples of the Buddha, such as Maitreya, Manjushri and so forth, who ... investigated with great wisdom the mind, praised its qualities and taught it to be indispensable in the Array of Stalks Sutra and others. One had also investigated with various reasons why one should definitely take this mind, by thinking about its benefits and so on.

The sutra says investigated with great wisdom the mind, which refers to the mind generation of bodhicitta. The close disciples of the Buddha investigated with great wisdom the benefit of bodhicitta, praised its qualities and thought it to be indispensable in Array of Stalks Sutra and other sutras. Likewise one had also investigated with various reasons why one should definitely take up this mind by thinking about its benefits.

So, what is being explained here is that if one had already investigated and analysed the various reasons why one should definitely generate the mind of bodhicitta, by thinking of its numerous benefits (which were explained in the first chapter) then one should definitely see reasons to actually adopt it. Having taken such action to consider the benefits of bodhicitta, how can one discard it? One needs to protect it from degenerating until attaining enlightenment.

2.1.2. The fault of giving it up

This outline is further subdivided into three:

2.1.2.1. The fault of going to the lower realms

2.1.2.2. One will degenerate from the welfare of others

2.1.2.3. One has become far from attaining a ground

The thought of giving it up refers to the two stages of bodhicitta: aspiring and engaging. When one first takes the vows, one generates a genuine aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, and to bring about ultimate benefit and remove all suffering. Based on this very sincere and very strong intention, the aspiration to achieve enlightenment for that purpose is developed. So the aspiring bodhicitta is developed first and then based on that, one goes further and makes a commitment to actually engage in the practices of a bodhisattva in order to accomplish one's aspirations. So the pledges one makes when one takes the bodhisattva vows have great benefit in themselves. It is a great fault to give up bodhicitta after having taken the vows.

In one prayer about generating this mind, it mentions that one invites all sentient beings as guests to partake in the ultimate happiness and bliss of enlightenment. So having invited all sentient beings as one's guests, one then makes a further commitment to engage in the practices to serve the invited guests, to help them partake in ultimate happiness.

The fault, if one were to give up bodhicitta, is going to the lower realms. As one will have degenerated from the welfare of others, one has become far from attaining a ground.

2.1.2.1. THE FAULT OF GOING TO THE LOWER REALMS

This is subdivided into three

2.1.2.1.1. The reason for going to the lower realms

2.1.2.1.2. Stating supporting evidence

2.1.2.1.3. Refuting objections

2.1.2.1.1. The reason for going to the lower realms

The text reads:

4. *After having made this promise
If one does not engage into the actions,
Then one deceives all sentient beings.
How could one become a migrator?*

The commentary clearly explains the meaning of this verse:

Having made the promise to place all sentient beings in the state of enlightenment, if one then does not practice the path to achieve this aim, then one will have deceived all sentient beings. How will one then become a migrator, as one will never go beyond the lower realms?

The first part of the explanation begins with having made the promise to place all sentient beings in the state of enlightenment, if one then does not practice the path to achieve this aim. Many of you, who have already taken bodhisattva vows, will recall that taking the vows initially involves making the promise of generating the aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings. Based on that strong aspiration to free all beings from suffering and lead them to ultimate state of happiness, you then generate the mind, 'I definitely need to achieve enlightenment myself'. So, based on that aspiration, the promise involves willingly making the pledge to engage in practices of the six perfections and the four means of gathering disciples.

The pledge one makes when taking the vows is done in the presence of all enlightened beings, the conquerors and their children, i.e. all buddhas and bodhisattvas, so it is in their presence that one generates the aspiration to achieve enlightenment. If it were just an aspiration then there wouldn't be much more responsibility than just being an aspiration, but the pledge involves making a conscious commitment to engage in the practices to achieve enlightenment. So since these vows and pledges are willingly made in presence of all buddhas and bodhisattvas, one has already taken upon oneself the commitment.

One has already promised sentient beings that one will do that. So having made a pledge, if one gives it up, then one will have deceived all sentient beings. Why? Because it is a lie. One promised to do something but one is not keeping that promise. One is not just deceiving one being. Telling a lie to one being is a non-virtue, so you can imagine the negativity one would incur by deceiving all sentient beings. How will one then one become a migrator implies how then could one ascend to higher and more fortunate realms? One would not. Having incurred the negativity of deceiving all beings one is certain to take rebirth in the lower realms. It is commonly accepted in all religions traditions that lying and deceiving others is a non-virtuous act, and that is what is being explained here.

2.1.2.1.2. Stating supporting evidence

5. *If one will become a hungry ghost
When one does not give to the person
Even the common objects
That one already offered in one's mind,*

In explaining the meaning of this verse, the commentary reads:

Regarding not giving the object of offering that one has already given in one's mind, even if it is just one morsel of food, it states in the Sutra of Close Placement by Mindfulness:

The sutra presents the faults of this mind using a particular example, the fault of not giving something that one has already promised to give. The fault relates to not giving even to one being something as small as a morsel of food. In relation to pledges made to provide happiness to all the sentient beings invited as one's guests; in the presence of all buddhas and bodhisattvas, one has made the pledge to offer them the temporary happiness of high status of humans and gods, and ultimate happiness which is the definite goodness of liberation and enlightenment. That is what one has promised to do for all sentient beings in the presence of all buddhas and bodhisattvas. The commentary next gives explanations from the sutras about the fault of not giving even a small object, such as a morsel of food.

The quote here from the Sutra of Close Placement by Mindfulness reads:

If they do not give even the little they intended, they will take rebirth as a migrator in the hungry ghost realm. If they do not give what they promised, then the sentient being will go to the hell realm.

The Sutra Dividing Migrators also states:

Whichever person, by not giving the rice and vegetables, the roots and fruits they intended to, they will experience the hungry ghost world and terrifying suffering.

The meaning of the sutra is quite easy to understand. It states quite clearly that for whichever person, by not giving the rice and vegetables, i.e. the roots and fruits they intended to give, but does not give it afterwards, the consequence is that they will experience the hungry ghost world and terrifying suffering.

The next verse in relates to this same subheading:

6. *Then how could one go to a happy migration
If one deceives all sentient beings
Concerning the highest happiness
To which one invited them from the depths of one's mind*

The commentary explains the meaning of this verse:

If this is regarded as a cause to be reborn in the hungry ghost realm, then if one deceives all sentient beings with regards to the highest happiness and the temporary happiness of gods and humans, to which one invited all sentient beings, not just in mere words, but respectfully from the depth of one heart with a loud and clear voice, by discarding them, then how can one migrate to the happy realms? One will not.

The commentary clearly explains that when one makes a pledge and then does not give one's own food to others as intended, it creates the cause to be born in the hungry ghost realm.

If one deceives all sentient beings with regards to the highest happiness and temporary happiness of gods and humans, to which one invited all sentient beings, not just in mere words but respectfully from the depth of one's heart with a loud and clear voice: One has actually made a pledge, analysed the benefits and seen the purpose, so the decision is made from the depth of one's heart and one is not taking it lightly. One has considered the vows in all seriousness, not just mumbled them barely audible, but made the pledge in a clear loud voice. This relates to when we took the bodhisattva vows, when we all knelt down and put our palms together respectfully and we repeated the vows quite loudly after the master.

This point relates to those of us who have taken the vows and made those promises. We have followed in these footsteps, so while there are benefits in having taken the vows we also need be mindful of the faults of not upholding them.

2.1.2.1.3. Refuting Objections

As the text explained that the fault of giving up bodhicitta is that one will go to lower realms, an objection is raised:

The commentary first states the objection:

Question: The superior Shariputra, after having previously generated bodhicitta, was engaged in the practice of the perfections when he was asked by a demon for his right hand. Shariputra cut off his right hand and gave it to the demon with his left hand. Because of this he was severely abused by the demon and so Shariputra became sad and gave up bodhicitta. Yet he later attained the state of an Arhat. Does this not contradict what is taught in the quotes?

The objection here is that Shariputra apparently had given up bodhicitta, so Shariputra should have gone to the lower realms instead of attaining liberation.

The commentary explains that Shariputra, having previously generated bodhicitta, was engaged in the practice of perfections. When a demon disguised as Brahmin asked for his right hand and then abused him for giving it him with his left hand, Shariputra became disheartened thinking, 'I can't even help or please one sentient being', and that is when Shariputra gave up bodhicitta. So, we need to take notice that if one gives up the intention to benefit even one sentient being, one is giving up bodhicitta. From this account, we need to understand that giving up on one sentient being becomes a cause for giving up bodhicitta.

The objection here is how could Shariputra later attain the state of an arhat? Does that not contradict what is taught in the sutras?

The verse explains:

7. *Whichever person who gave up bodhicitta,
Their striving for liberation
Is karmic beyond thought,
And only known to the omniscient.*

In explaining the meaning of this verse, which refutes that objection, it explains that

Answer: When Shariputra, or anybody else for that matter, attains Arhatship despite having abandoned bodhicitta, then that is a karma that is beyond the knowledge of ordinary beings and can only be understood by an all knowing Buddha. It cannot be understood by anybody else.

The point here is that despite having given up bodhicitta, Shariputra attained arhatship. This is actually a result of previous karma, but it is an aspect of karma that is beyond the knowledge of ordinary beings. Only a Buddha with an omniscient mind is able to see the subtlety of the karma which became the particular cause for him to attain arhatship. It is generally explained in the teachings that the subtleties of karma are known only by an omniscient mind.

The subtleties of karma are inconceivable in relation to the time a particular karma was created, the individual who created it, and particular circumstances under which it was created. These details are said to be known only by an omniscient mind, the all-knowing Buddha. Consider a contemporary example such as a glass. It is a fact that glass is a combination of many billions of atoms. How many atoms make up this glass and where they came from? It is not something that we are not able to know. It is only something that the mind of a Buddha would know. Likewise, karma with subtleties of time, duration, manner and location, details of previous karmas committed a long time ago, is only known by an omniscient mind. I recall one of the previous masters in Sera monastery, Gyalrong Khensur Rinpoche often used to mention the quote 'karma is unconceivable' is something.

Despite Shariputra having given up bodhicitta at a particular time, and later obtaining the state of arhatship, he not only obtained that state of arhatship as a personal liberation but also to benefit many others who had particular karmic connection with him. They definitely benefited from Shariputra after he had obtained arhatship. So these factors then, the karma that Shariputra would have created in the past to obtain those results is really something which is said to be inconceivable, something which just cannot be known and conceived by ordinary minds.

There are various other explanations as to why, rather than falling to lower realms, Shariputra actually obtained liberation. One explanation is that when Shariputra gave up bodhicitta it was only the conventional bodhicitta he gave up and he did not give up the ultimate bodhicitta which is the realisation of emptiness. And so because he did not give up the realisation of emptiness that is what caused him to obtain the state of liberation. Another explanation is that even though he had given up bodhicitta, it actually became the cause for him to obtain liberation because he hadn't given up his determination to obtain liberation. Both explanations are valid. The first explanation, that is because Shariputra didn't give up ultimate bodhicitta (the realisation of emptiness), is in accordance to Gyaltsab Rinpoche, the author of this commentary. It actually has a profound meaning.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེད་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

11 March 2014

As usual we will now spend some time in meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now we can generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

In order to liberate all sentient beings from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I definitely have to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

If we carefully think about the meaning of this very brief motivation, we will realise that it encompasses both the aspirational bodhicitta attitude as well as the engaging bodhicitta attitude. It is aspirational in the sense of making a determination to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, whilst listening to the teachings and making a commitment to practise well encompasses engaging bodhicitta.

2.1. Meditating on conscientiousness for bodhicitta

2.1.2. The fault of giving it up (cont.)

2.1.2.2. ONE WILL DEGENERATE FROM THE WELFARE OF OTHERS

It is good to keep the essential points of the chapter in mind by relating to the outline.

There are three sub-divisions under this category:

2.1.2.2.1. If one's bodhicitta degenerates, then it is a heavy downfall and one's work for the welfare of others will degenerate

2.1.2.2.2. Even if one obstructs the virtue of another bodhisattva it is similar to that, and one will go to the lower realms

2.1.2.2.3. The reason why this is so

2.1.2.2.1. If one's bodhicitta degenerates, then it is a heavy downfall and one's work for the welfare of others will degenerate

If one's bodhicitta degenerates, then it is a heavy downfall, because it is one of the eighteen root downfalls of the bodhisattva vows. Relinquishing bodhicitta is said to be one of the heaviest of the eighteen root transgressions. One's work for the welfare of others will degenerate refers to the fact that if one gives up bodhicitta then that entails giving up the pledge to engage in the practice of the six perfections. As the very basis for benefitting sentient beings, i.e. bodhicitta, is uprooted, one will not be able to adequately benefit sentient beings.

The verse relating to this outline reads:

8. *This is for bodhisattvas
The heaviest of downfalls.
Therefore, if one receives it
One harms the purpose of all sentient beings.*

In his commentary Gyaltzab Je gives this explanation:

To degenerate from bodhicitta is for bodhisattvas, out of the root downfalls, the heaviest one. Since the wish to benefit degenerates, if one receives this downfall, then it harms the welfare of all sentient beings, because the basis for practice degenerates.

As the commentary clearly explains, allowing bodhicitta to degenerate is the heaviest of the root downfalls of the bodhisattva vows. Giving up bodhicitta harms the welfare of sentient beings because one's bodhicitta has degenerated as a result of having given it up. One harms the welfare of sentient beings because one breaks the pledge to help sentient beings. It is good to take note that giving up bodhicitta is one of the three ways in which a bodhisattva's vows degenerate. Another is giving up working for the welfare of even one sentient being; and the third is having an inclination to follow a path of the Lower Vehicle, e.g. the hearer's path.

Gyaltzab Je further explains that it harms the welfare of all sentient beings because the basis for practice, which is bodhicitta, degenerates. When bodhicitta degenerates, then the very basis for the practices of the six perfections, which are the means to bring about the welfare of sentient beings, is harmed, and hence the welfare of sentient beings is harmed.

Then the commentary quotes from a sutra:

From the Superior Compendium:

Although one has practised the path of the ten virtues
For 10 million eons, if one generates the wish to be a self-liberator arhat,
At that moment morality has received a fault and degenerates.
Generating such a mind is heavier than the defeat of a fully ordained monk's vows.

As explained here, if one generates the wish to be a self-liberator arhat (a state of liberation in the Lower Vehicle) then, at that moment, morality has received a fault and degenerated, even though one has practised the path of the ten virtues for millions of eons. Generating such a mind is heavier than the defeat of a fully ordained monk's vows.

Here we need to take note that bodhicitta degenerates the moment one generates the mind of a Lesser Vehicle goal, by thinking, 'Alas, achieving enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings is too hard'.

Furthermore, as mentioned previously, one gives up bodhicitta if one develops the thought, 'I will never, ever do anything to bring about benefit for this particular sentient being'. It is mentioned in another text that if one part of something degenerates then the whole is affected. The analogy given in the teachings is that if just one bead of a rosary falls off or is damaged, then the whole rosary is incomplete. Those of you who do the six session guru practice will recall that it mentions that giving up bodhicitta is a downfall of the root bodhisattva vows. Also, the tantric vows are broken if one gives up love for sentient beings.

The promise made in the bodhisattva vows is to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, who are as vast as space, and for that purpose one promises to engage in the practices of the six perfections. Thus, taking the bodhisattva vows encompasses all sentient beings. If the promise made was to help only some sentient beings, then not working for the welfare of one sentient would not necessarily be giving up bodhicitta. But a pledge has been made to work for all sentient beings, so if, at some stage, one decides from the depths of one's heart, 'I am not going to benefit this sentient being or engage in working for their welfare', then the bodhisattva promise has been broken. It's good to know why giving up on even one sentient being is giving up bodhicitta.

Gyaltsab Je then explains the meaning of the quote:

As it is stated, if a bodhisattva with vows gives up bodhicitta, he receives a root downfall. If he has no vows, then his negativity is still heavier than the root downfall of the vows of individual liberation.

In Tibetan the last line of the verse, translated here as one harms the purpose of all sentient beings, contains the word men, which has a connotation of being inferior. As some commentaries explain, a bodhisattva, overwhelmed by the goal of achieving enlightenment for the purpose of all sentient beings, might change their goal to that of achieving the liberation of the Lower Vehicle. If they give up bodhicitta in that way, and then attain the state of an arhat, they will, of course, still benefit beings to their capacity. However, compared to the buddhas' ability to benefit sentient beings it is quite inferior; after all, buddhas are able to help liberate countless sentient beings with just one ray of light emanating from their body; that is one explanation of the meaning of this verse.

2.1.2.2.2. Even if one obstructs the virtue of another bodhisattva, it is similar to that and one will go to the lower realms

The verse relating to this reads:

9. *When another, even only for one instant,
Obstructs their merits,
They harm the purpose of sentient beings,
There is no other possibility than to go to the lower realms.*

Gyaltsab Je begins his explanation with:

Whoever obstructs the merits, which are the virtues of a bodhisattva for even just one moment, harms the ability of that bodhisattva to accomplish the welfare of sentient beings. Where else could he go but to the lower realms infinitely?

Here Gyaltsab Rinpoche is emphasising a point made in the teachings, a point that I have presented several times in the past. The meaning of whoever obstructs the merits, which are the virtues of a bodhisattva for even just one moment, harms the ability of that bodhisattva to accomplish the welfare of sentient beings is quite clear. The consequence of this is that there is no other possibility than to go to the lower realms many times over.

Since any activity of a bodhisattva has the sole purpose of leading all beings to the ultimate state of enlightenment, anyone who obstructs the activities of a bodhisattva is obstructing the cause for the ultimate happiness of sentient beings. Such a person definitely creates the cause to take infinite rebirths in the lower realms. Another way of understanding obstructing the merits is that it refers to causing the bodhicitta of a bodhisattva to degenerate. As mentioned previously, that would be a very heavy misdeed, which will be a cause for infinite rebirths in the lower realms.

The main point being emphasised here is that every deed of a bodhisattva is a cause for the unsurpassable happiness of all sentient beings, and if one obstructs those deeds even for a moment then one is obstructing the unsurpassable happiness of all sentient beings; that incurs great negativity.

To back up this explanation Gyaltsab Je quotes from a sutra.

From the Sutra of Magical Emanations Definitely Pacifying:

It is heavier to obstruct the virtue of a bodhisattva of offering one instance of food or drink to an animal, than to rob all sentient beings of Jambudvipa of their food and kill them.

As the quote says: It is heavier to obstruct the virtue of a bodhisattva of offering one instance of food or drink to an animal, than to rob all sentient beings of Jambudvipa (or the world) of their food and kill them. This clearly explains that obstructing a bodhisattva's deeds incurs much more heavy negative karma than actually robbing others of their food and life.

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary further explains:

Because there are quotes like that, one should be careful regarding this point. One does not know who is a bodhisattva and so it is very easy to make this mistake. If one is able to protect oneself from this, then one is able to abandon the door of creating most faults with regard to people.

Here Gyaltsab Rinpoche is re-emphasising a point that he makes in his other works. We cannot judge other people from their appearances, and we cannot know another person's status just from their appearance. In other texts he says that one has to be very mindful and careful about judging and criticising others, because it could be similar to walking over a pit of fire that has been camouflaged with branches. If one is unaware of the pit of fire and, based on the external appearance, steps onto the branches, one will fall into the pit of fire and will be consumed by it. This analogy illustrates how we need to be very careful when it comes to judging and being critical of others, because we cannot know who is a bodhisattva. As Gyaltsab Rinpoche emphasises here, we cannot know who is actually a bodhisattva, because real bodhisattvas hide their qualities, and would appear as anything but a bodhisattva.

Here we can consider the example of the great Khunu Lama Rinpoche. When I had the great privilege of meeting him in Bodhgaya, he was wearing very simple clothes, almost rags really, and living very simply with only basic needs. If you saw Khunu Lama Rinpoche walking around in the street, you might think he was an ordinary beggar. People who didn't know him would not see his great qualities, but he was in fact a great practitioner of bodhicitta and a real bodhisattva. Even though I have not received any formal teachings from him I definitely had the opportunity to make a good Dharmic connection with him. When I went to see him he gave me a seed from the bodhi tree, and said I should recite the mantra of the Buddha and eat the seed as, 'That will be really good for you'.

Even though I didn't take particular note of it at that time, when I look back I really feel that it was a very significant gesture. Receiving that seed and instruction from Khunu Lama Rinpoche was almost a prediction that I would really try to take strong interest in teachings such as the Bodhisattvacharyavatara. I received teachings on the Bodhisattvacharyavatara from His Holiness, who received it from Khunu Lama Rinpoche. So it is a very close lineage—I received the teachings from a bodhisattva who received it directly from Khunu Lama Rinpoche himself. I have had that privilege of studying the Bodhisattvacharyavatara and now I have the opportunity to teach and share it with you.

When I met Khunu Lama Rinpoche I definitely had the opportunity to make a good connection with him. Even though I did not have much money I did have a silver coin with me which I was able to offer to Khunu Lama Rinpoche; it was the greatest offering I could make at that time. And in return Khunu Lama Rinpoche gave me that seed from the bodhi tree.

To return to the commentary, since one doesn't know who is a bodhisattva and who is not, if one refrains from this misdeed of criticising and being judgemental of others, or, worse, harming them and their good deeds, one is able to avoid the great misdeed of potentially harming a bodhisattva.

Also, as explained in the Precious Garland, harming others who are engaged in virtuous deeds such as Dharma practice is a great misdeed, because one is depriving them of the opportunity to create the causes for their happiness over many future lifetimes. So we also need to be really mindful about not harming the Dharma practice of others by causing them to give up the Dharma and so forth; we really need to be mindful of these points.

So we really need to take on board this succinct advice from Gyaltsab Rinpoche and try implement it in our own lives, then we won't create those misdeeds.

2.1.2.2.3. The reason why this is so

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section with a question.

Why are the abovementioned actions of infinite negativity?

The relevant verse reads:

*10. If one degenerates just by harming the happiness
Of even one sentient being,
What need is there to mention
Harming the happiness of beings infinite like space?*

Then Gyaltsab Je states:

If one destroys the happiness of abiding with life of just one sentient being, one degenerates from one's high status.

What need is there to mention that one will be reborn in the lower realms if one destroys the cause for the highest happiness of all sentient beings equalling space?

If one destroys the happiness of abiding with life of just one sentient being is basically saying that if one robs just one sentient being of their life, then one's high status degenerates. This is an unequivocal statement that the consequence of taking the life of just one sentient being isn't restricted to the loss of life of the other, but has the inevitable consequences of causing one's own high status to degenerate. That being the case with the life of one sentient being, what need is there to mention that one will be reborn into the lower realms if one destroys the cause for the highest happiness of all sentient beings equalling space? Again, we have a very clear explanation of the great negativity that one will incur in that instance; we need to be very mindful of that.

These explanations explain why obstructing the merits and virtues of a bodhisattva are a cause for infinite rebirths in the lower realms. If one creates a great misdeed of harming the happiness of even one sentient being, then by implication, obstructing the happiness of infinite numbers of sentient beings, who are as vast as space, will definitely be a cause for infinite negativity and infinite rebirths in the lower realms.

This is another very meticulous presentation: first there is an explanation, which is followed by logical reasons, which are illuminated with analogies and examples. It is important that when we read a text we are able to make that connection between its earlier and later parts, and so derive the full meaning of the text. It is good for us to know how to relate to the texts we study in this way.

The explanation we have just covered is also a profound explanation of the cause and effect sequence of karma. As mentioned earlier, one's high status degenerates if one destroys the happiness of abiding with life of just one sentient being. The implication is that those who are ignorant of the cause and effect sequence of karma will engage in acts of negativity, such as taking the life of others. It is basically through the ignorance of the law of karma that one incurs the fault of allowing one's high status to degenerate. So we can regard ourselves as being extremely fortunate to have been introduced to the law of karma. Through having some understanding and faith in the law of karma we are protected from creating misdeeds that would be the cause for one's own high status to degenerate.

2.1.2.3. ONE WILL BECOME FAR FROM ATTAINING A GROUND

As will be explained in the verse and in the commentary, it is implied here that if one generates very strong bodhicitta at one point, gives it up later and then strongly regenerates that bodhicitta, one will still be far from attaining a ground.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

*11. Thus, those with the heavy downfall
And with strong bodhicitta,
Should they further alternate in cyclic existence
Shall be far from attaining a ground.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Thus as explained earlier, those who have received the heavy downfall of abandoning bodhicitta, as well as those who re-generate bodhicitta strongly afterwards, will further circle in cyclic existence alternately, by taking alternate rebirths in the lower realms and in the higher realms due to afflictions and karma. It will take a long time to obtain the grounds such as Very Joyous and so forth. Therefore one should strive to avoid the degeneration of one's bodhicitta, even at the cost of one's life.

This is clearly explaining that for anyone who has incurred the heavy downfall of abandoning bodhicitta, as well as those who regenerate bodhicitta strongly afterwards, will further take alternate rebirths in the lower realms and higher realms due to afflictions and karma. Thus, as explained here, it will take a long time to obtain the grounds such as Very Joyous and so forth.

This explanation is quite specific: once bodhicitta has been developed strongly it has to be maintained without degeneration to obtain the intended result of enlightenment for the sake of all beings. Even though this explanation is directed towards bodhisattvas who have developed bodhicitta, it is also relevant to us. We sometimes have a strong aspiration to develop a good attitude and meditate, and we try to practise the Dharma with a lot of zest. But sometimes we completely forget about that and allow the delusions to run rampant. This is particularly the case when we leave this room. During a session we might assume a pious aspect of meditating and so forth, and then as soon as we leave we become completely crazed with attachment. We need to take the advice given here as personal instruction, which is to maintain continuity in our practice. The habit of vacillating between practising and not practising does not bear any fruit.

2.2. Being conscientious in the trainings

This section is divided into three:

2.2.1. Conscientiously abandoning faults

2.2.2. Conscientiously meditating on virtue

2.2.3. Conscientiously abandoning the afflictions

2.2.1. Conscientiously abandoning faults

Here there are five subheadings:

These are quite empirical points; it is good to have a general understanding of the structure and sequence of the sub-headings.

2.2.1.1. If one does not abandon negativity and downfalls one will stay in the lower realms

This shows us the importance of recognising negativities and downfalls. Then we can protect ourselves from committing them, and if they are created, we need to purify them. Otherwise we will have to endure the consequence of staying in the lower realms for a long period of time.

2.2.1.2. The buddhas and bodhisattvas will remain impartial

This indicates that if we don't take the initiative to develop and to uphold the bodhicitta vows and so forth from our own side, then the buddhas and bodhisattvas will remain impartial because there is not much more they can do for us. They can't do anything extra for us if we don't take the initiative to implement these vows in our own practice.

2.2.1.3. The freedoms and endowments will be difficult to find

2.2.1.4. If reborn in the lower realms one has no opportunity to generate virtue

2.2.1.5. Why it is difficult to find freedoms and endowments

2.2.1.1. IF ONE DOES NOT ABANDON NEGATIVITY AND DOWNFALLS ONE WILL STAY IN THE LOWER REALMS

Again, this is a personal instruction; it is really important to ensure that whatever activities we engage in become a cause for attaining liberation and enlightenment. Thus it is important for us to check whether an activity is in line with creating the causes for liberation and enlightenment, or whether it could become a cause to be reborn in the lower realms. One needs to investigate and analyse one's activities in this way to protect oneself from these unwanted consequences.

The verse that relates to this outline is:

*12. Therefore I should practice respectfully
According to my promise.
If I do not strive starting from today
Then I will go from low to low.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Therefore I should practise respectfully the trainings to attain enlightenment for the welfare of sentient beings according to my promise.

If, after having generated bodhicitta and taken the vows, I do not make an effort, I will continuously go from lower realm to lower realm due to heavy downfalls.

As the commentary clearly explains, because of the reasons explained earlier, I should practise respectfully the trainings to attain enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings according to my promise. Having considered the consequences of giving up bodhicitta (or allowing bodhicitta to degenerate), one commits here to practise respectfully, which means with great reverence, and one practises and engages in the training with great humility to attain enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings in accordance with the promise that one has made earlier. So this is what is clearly explained.

Furthermore, if after having generated bodhicitta and taken the vows, I do not make an effort, I will continuously go from lower realm to lower realm due to heavy downfalls reminds us again of paying heed to avoiding the downfalls. Here, downfalls refer to breaching a commitment of the bodhisattva vows. Likewise for those who have self-liberation vows, one incurs a downfall if one breaches a commitment of the self-liberation vows.

2.2.1.2. THE BUDDHAS AND BODHISATTVAS WILL REMAIN IMPARTIAL

The root text is introduced with this rhetorical thought:

One may think: I shall be all right because the buddhas and bodhisattvas will rescue me.

This section indicates that one cannot be complacent and think in this way. It is also indicating the unique manner in which the Buddha's teachings benefit sentient beings. You should take note of this.

The main point presented here is that we cannot be complacent, thinking, 'Even though I've not managed too well to date, things will be better later on'. We often fall into this habit of thinking, 'Oh, maybe I didn't do so well this year, but that's fine. I will do better next year' or 'Next time round, I will do better!' We often procrastinate in this way and rather than taking the initiative to put everything into practice now, we leave it for later.

Here, the fault is along the same lines: even if I have incurred some faults and so forth, the buddhas and bodhisattvas who are comparatively kind, will definitely rescue me and I will have no problem.

The verse which relates to this is:

13. *Although innumerable buddhas benefiting
All sentient beings have passed,
Due to my faults
I was not an object of their help.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with:

Innumerable buddhas and bodhisattvas who have worked for the benefit of all sentient beings have passed already, but due to one's own fault of degenerating bodhicitta and the trainings, one did not become the object of their cure.

As the commentary explains, innumerable buddhas and bodhisattvas who have worked for the benefit of all sentient beings have passed, which means that they have come to this world and have passed on. But due to one's own fault of degenerating bodhicitta and the trainings, one did not become the object of their cure.

This is also in line with a verse in the Guru Puja, which states

Even with the countless buddhas who have descended,
I have not been able to be subdued.

The implication of the heading The buddhas and bodhisattvas will be impartial is that if one allows one's bodhicitta and practices to degenerate then even though they are kind and have descended, one will not be an object of benefit from the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Then, Gyaltsab Je quotes this line:

From the Ornament of Clear Realisation:

Although the king of gods shower rain, and so forth

This is an analogy: even though the gods may send down heavy rains, if the seed in the ground is actually faulty or rotten then no matter how much rain descends, it will not be able to sprout. The fault is not the lack of rain, but lies with the seed. Likewise, the rain of Dharma from innumerable buddhas has fallen, but because of their faults many sentient beings have not benefitted from that, and thus realisations and so forth have not sprouted in their minds.

Then Gyaltsab Je continues his commentary with this:

One may then think: I will be all right because they will rescue me later.

Then follows the second verse under this sub-heading:

14. *If I continue to act like this
It will be the same again and again.
I will experience sickness, bondage,
Being cut and mutilated in the lower realms.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation of the meaning of the verse reads:

If I continue to act recklessly, I shall not become the object of their cure and will have to experience suffering continuously. I will have to take rebirth in the lower realms and even if I take rebirth in the happy realms I will have sickness and lack of freedom.

Either that or I will have sickness in the lower realms, and experience innumerable sufferings there, such as my arms and legs being cut off, and my body being lacerated.

This is explaining that after having made the pledge and generated bodhicitta, if one actually gives it up and acts recklessly, then one will not become an object of their cure. Rather, one will have to experience suffering continuously.

In relation to the ripened results, one will have to take rebirth in the lower realms. The environmental results are that, even if I take rebirth in the happy realms, such as the human realm, I will have sickness and lack of freedom. Even when reborn in the human realm, one may still experience innumerable sufferings such as arms and legs being cut off and my body being lacerated and so forth. So these are the types of sufferings that can be experienced even in a higher rebirth.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

18 March 2014

As usual we will now spend some time engaging in the meditation practise.

[meditation]

It is important to generate the appropriate motivation to receive the teachings. The main point is to ensure that the motivation is not tainted with self-interest. Then it is important to familiarise our minds with the wish to benefit others, as this naturally reduces self-interest. We need to intentionally develop this approach because otherwise almost every activity in which we engage has 'What is in it for me?' at the forefront of our minds. The practical benefit of generating the wish to benefit others is that the more we familiarise our minds with this wish, the less likely we will intentionally harm others. At the very least it will prevent us from harming others and actually help us to benefit whenever possible. By cultivating this approach we can start to measure the extent to which we have developed the genuine wish to benefit others.

Lama Tsong Khapa highlights that if we genuinely engage in benefiting others then our own needs will be fulfilled subsequently; this is an essential point. At his recent teachings in India His Holiness the Dalai Lama twice emphasised this point; we need to derive the real meaning from this. And that is, if we genuinely benefit others, our own needs will naturally be fulfilled subsequently, which in turn implies that we do not need to intentionally think or worry about our own needs. This approach prevents one from feeling discouraged from benefitting others. To summarise, the main point is that if one knows that one's own needs will be met and that we are not missing out by benefiting others, then one will not feel overwhelmed or discouraged about helping others. These are the essential points to bear in mind.

2.2.1. Conscientiously abandoning faults (cont.)

2.2.1.3. THE FREEDOMS AND ENDOWMENTS WILL BE DIFFICULT TO FIND

In relation to oneself, the point here is that if we give up bodhicitta (as mentioned previously), then this causes difficulty in finding the freedoms and endowments again.

As the outline here presents, the freedoms and endowments will be difficult to find, so we need to take this as a personal instruction to be conscientious in utilising the freedoms and endowments that we have now obtained. This heading is subdivided into two:

2.2.1.3.1. If bodhicitta degenerates, the freedoms and endowments with the condition of four wheels are difficult to find

2.2.1.3.2. Although attaining one, as it disintegrates quickly make an effort

2.2.1.3.1. If bodhicitta degenerates, the freedoms and endowments with the condition of four wheels are difficult to find

Due to a lack of conscientiousness, if one's bodhicitta degenerates, then the freedoms and endowments and the conditions of the four wheels, which are necessary to traverse the Mahayana path, will be difficult to find.

I will list and then explain the four wheels:

1. Living in a conducive place
2. Relying on a sublime being
3. Making aspirational prayers
4. Accumulating merit

1. The first is to abide in a place which is conducive for the Mahayana path to be actualised. This is also presented simply in some texts as living in a place where one can accumulate virtue.

2. The second is to associate and rely on a sublime being, such as a virtuous friend, who leads one on a path to abandon negativity (overcoming faults) and adopt virtue (acquiring good qualities). Thus, the first indicates the kind of place that one should abide in, and the second is in relation to the kind of being that one should rely upon.

3. The third is to be endowed with the results of aspirational prayers that one has previously made.

4. And the fourth is to be endowed with the results of previously accumulated merit.

The conditions of the four wheels were also presented in Precious Garland. As direct advice to the king, Nagarjuna highlighted that the freedoms and endowments with the condition of the four wheels are difficult to obtain in the future. He exhorts the king, 'since you have obtained the eight freedoms and ten endowments with the conditions of the four wheels now, you must definitely use them to ensure that they don't go to waste, by practising the Dharma'.

To take this as personal instruction, we need to relate all the points in the four conditions to our own lives; that is, to actually see the significance of making aspirational prayers and see the significance of accumulating merit etc. Whatever attempt we make to accumulate merit is extremely important because the merit that we accumulate now will be experienced later as ripened results with favourable conditions. Likewise, making very strong aspirational prayers now when we have the opportunity is also important and has great significance. As mentioned in other sutras and teachings, the enlightened beings are constantly benefiting sentient beings now as a result of their past aspirational prayers. These are the points we need to keep in mind by understanding their significance.

The main point here is that it is not sufficient just to have the eight freedoms and ten endowments and the conditions of the four wheels. What we need to do is ensure that they are utilised by practising the Dharma to bring about the ultimate goals we seek. That is the main point. It is presented here that the freedoms, endowments and conditions of the four wheels are extremely difficult to find, so we definitely need to utilise them wisely. You will recall that at the end of the Guru Puja there is a dedication, 'May I not be separated from the four Mahayana wheels'. This is exactly what is being explained here.

The commentary introduces the meaning of this verse with a hypothetical query:

One may think: I will make an effort when I attain the freedoms and endowments later on.

One may become complacent by thinking I will make an effort when I attain the freedoms and endowments later on. So, as a way to overcome this sort of apathetic resolution in one's mind, the verse presents:

15. *The coming of a tathagata
Faith and the attainment of a human body—
These, making it possible to meditate on virtue,
Since they are rare, when will they be attained?*

The commentary then reads:

To have attained the five personal endowments and the five circumstantial endowments that make it possible to meditate on virtue, is as rare as the Udumbara flower.

These are, among others:

- A tathagata has descended.
- One has faith in the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings.
- One has also attained a human body.
- One has been reborn in a central country.
- One has complete faculties.
- One has not transgressed the border of karma.

The commentary explains that a tathagata (or a buddha) has descended relates to one of the endowments. The ten endowments are categorised into five personal or internal endowments, and five that are circumstantial or external endowments. That a Buddha has descended to this earth is an external endowment. It relates to the fact that we are born in a light eon or an illuminated eon, which is at a time when the Buddha has descended to this earth; thus this condition is intact for oneself. There is also the period called a dark eon, which is a time when the Buddha has not descended.

The next line in the verse, One has faith in the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings is a personal endowment. The Lam Rim teachings present this in abbreviated form as having faith in the source, which is having faith in the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings. It is very rare indeed to have genuine faith in the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings.

The next lines are: One has also attained a human body and not only has a human body been obtained, but one has been born in a central country. These are both personal endowments.

The final two lines are: One has complete faculties and One has not transgressed the border of karma (or extreme actions).

The five personal endowments have been explicitly presented here: one has faith in the Buddha's teachings; one has obtained a human body; one has been reborn in a central country; one has complete faculties and one has not transgressed the border of karma, for example having wrong views about karma is concluding that karma doesn't exist, or that the objects of refuge don't exist and so forth.

Among the five circumstantial endowments 'a tathagata has descended' is presented here. The remaining four after the Buddha has descended are: the Buddha has taught; the teachings still remain in the world; there are those who are practising the teachings; there are those who are kind and support practitioners.

For us, all these endowments are intact. There is no question we've been born a human; born in a light age when the Buddha has come to this world and taught, and where the Buddha's teachings remain; born in a central country where the Buddha's teachings are taught; and being born with full faculties. Even though we may not have met the actual Buddha Shakyamuni, the teachings are presented to us by great teachers of his direct lineage. As these teachers represent Buddha Shakyamuni, we have received the unbroken lineage of the teachings from the unmistakable masters who are practicing at this time.

The commentary continues:

If this is so rare, then to have attained a precious human rebirth where one trains in the two minds is even rarer.

The precious human rebirth refers to one with the endowments, and where one trains in the two minds refers to the two minds of bodhicitta. The key point here is that if it is difficult to obtain the endowments, then to actually attain a state where one develops the two minds of bodhicitta is even rarer.

2.2.1.3.2. Although attaining one, as it disintegrates quickly make an effort

The next verse is preceded by another hypothetical doubt:

One may think: This body I have currently attained has no obstructing conditions against it and is endowed with conducive conditions. Hence I shall practise later.

This doubt represents the need to contemplate on death and impermanence as a way to show how such doubts and queries occur and obstruct one from utilising one's perfect opportunities.

The verse reads:

16. *A day like this without sickness,
Although there is food and no harm,
Life is deceptive on a momentary basis,
The body is a one-time loan.*

The commentary begins with:

One should not act as if one has leisure.

We need to really consider this point, as we often procrastinate about our practise of Dharma by falling under the illusion that we have time to practise later. When we look at how this thought affects us in what we do now, it leads to mostly non-virtuous activities which incur negativities. One must judge one's own activities. If one finds one is leaving one's practise until later, then what is being done now is activities that will incur negativity. This is the fault of thinking that we have leisure and that we have plenty of time to practise later.

An understanding of death and impermanence definitely relates to this point in that the reason why one should not act as if one has leisure is because one's life with the freedoms and endowments could end at any moment and then one's opportunity to practise Dharma would have been completely wasted.

The commentary further explains:

A human body without the obstructing condition of sickness is like a day in the context of saying: 'A day like this'.

The key here is the word 'a day' (or 'a sun' in Tibetan) which means a day without sickness.

The commentary goes on:

But a day like this, without sickness, without the obstructing conditions of harm...

This line refers to factors that oppose one's health or wellbeing, oneself in general, or one's life conditions

...and with the conducive conditions of food and so forth, is deceptive....

This line explains that it is deceptive to maintain the view that one has everything going well for oneself (food etc.) because, as the commentary goes on to explain:

Life does not abide even for one moment and disintegrates quickly. This body is only a one-time loan and one has no power over it.

The point presented here is that our life is being used up on a momentary basis, and it can end at any given moment. Thus one should not fall under the deception that one has time to practise the Dharma later on.

The commentary uses the analogy that the body is like a one-time loan. This is a very significant analogy to illustrate the point that our body is indeed like a loan, because we have to give it back—we don't have real power over it; i.e. all the good conditions that we have with this body can end at any moment. Recall using something borrowed: we always know we do not have complete control over the object because it belongs to someone else, and eventually will have to be given back. Also, we cannot use it for as long as we want, or do anything we like with it. Because it is on loan we have to take good care of it and give it back at the appropriate time. Similarly, our bodies are like this. An analogy presented in the thirty-seven practices of a bodhisattva compares our bodies to a guest house with the guest being our consciousness. So just as a guest stays in a guest house for a short time and then moves on, our consciousness comes into this body, remains for a short time and then moves on.

The teaching emphasises that our body is like something which is on loan. If we ask ourselves whether our body belongs to oneself, then technically it does, however we also recognise that we don't have real power or ownership over it because we have to discard it. At the time of death, the consciousness moves on and we have to leave our body behind. The Lam Rim teachings state that since our consciousness will definitely depart from our body, only the Dharma will help us at that time. This is the point to recognise: that it is only the Dharma that will help one at the time of death when our consciousness departs the body. As only the Dharma can help us, we need to try and implement it in our everyday lives to the best of our ability. I have tried to emphasise these points to you, and of course I do this out of great concern and kindness for your well-being. Recognise that you have an opportunity to accrue virtue even in everyday activities such as eating and drinking, by making offerings, by reminding oneself that one is eating for the sake of benefitting all sentient beings, that one is drinking for the benefit of all sentient beings etc. In this way, whatever activity one does, when one walks, sits, does tasks at work, in short, whatever activity one engages in can be utilised, and incorporated into one's practise so that it becomes a means to accumulate virtue. The practise of Dharma in short is to engage in creating virtue.

The commentary concludes:

Therefore, do not act as if there is time, and make an effort.

2.2.1.4. IF REBORN IN THE LOWER REALMS ONE HAS NO OPPORTUNITY TO GENERATE VIRTUE

Try to embrace what is being presented here and take it to heart. As I remind you again and again, don't lose the opportunity to practise or accumulate merit and virtue in whatever way you can now, when you have the opportunity, because if you were to lose that opportunity, it would be an incredibly great loss. It is hard for us to imagine being reborn in the lower realms (such as an animal) where one would not have the same opportunities again. In comparison to losing wealth, losing the opportunity to practise Dharma is a far greater loss. Recently you might have heard of instances where some very wealthy people, due to certain circumstances, lost their wealth and consequently became depressed, sick and died soon afterwards. All the sickness, the worry and the sadness was caused merely by losing material wealth. Compared to losing the opportunity to practise Dharma, losing material wealth is not really significant at all. Losing material wealth will not cause one to go to the lower realms, but losing the opportunity to practise Dharma is definitely a cause to go to the lower realms and be reborn as something like an animal. Therefore, pay attention to the following points.

Under this heading there are three subdivisions:

2.2.1.4.1. There is no opportunity for virtue in the lower realms

2.2.1.4.2. If one does not strive while in the happy realms one will be confused in the lower realms concerning what is to be practised and abandoned

2.2.1.4.3. It is extremely difficult to be liberated from the lower realms

2.2.1.4.1. There is no opportunity for virtue in the lower realms

The verse is again preceded with a hypothetical query:

It is unsuitable to relax, thinking: I will attain a succession of precious human rebirths, so I will practise later on.

The verse reads:

17. *With behaviour like this
I will not even attain a human body.
If I do not attain a human body
There will be only negativity and no virtue.*

The commentary reads:

Someone like myself, through actions that create negativity and no virtue, will not even attain a human body in the next life.

If I take rebirth in the lower realms, without attaining a human body I will only generate non-virtue and not the slightest amount of virtue, and it will be difficult to be reborn again in the happy realms.

As the commentary indicates we need to take the advice here as personal instruction. When looking into one's own behaviour, someone like myself, one is one's own best judge; one knows oneself best. Therefore looking honestly into oneself, if one's actions incur negativity and hardly any virtue through actions that create negativity and no virtue then the result is that one will not even attain a human body in the next life. This aims to counteract the notion we may have that: 'Oh, if I don't get around to doing well in this life I shouldn't worry too much because in my next life I can continue to practise.' But what does obtaining a human rebirth in the next life depend on - virtue or negativity? If the causes depend on virtue, then the question one needs to ask oneself is, 'Have I accumulated virtue?' Is one actually engaging in virtue now, or is one engaging more in negativity? This is something we have to look into. If, when you look into your actions you find that you are creating virtue and no negativity, then a good rebirth in your next life is guaranteed. But if, after looking into your actions you find you are creating more negativity and hardly any virtue, then, as the commentary states, you will not even attain a human body in the next life.

The commentary continues: If I take rebirth in the lower realms, I will only generate non-virtue and not the slightest amount of virtue, and it will be difficult to be reborn again in the happy realms. So, if one has found that one's actions are mostly negative, then the result is rebirth in the lower realms. If one were to be born in the lower realms, the opportunity to accrue virtue is almost none. Thus, since it is hardly possible to accrue virtue in the lower realms, it will be extremely difficult to be reborn again in the happy realms such as a human again.

The emphasis here is the importance of ensuring that one engages in virtue and shuns negativity. The cause for a fortunate rebirth in the happy realms is virtue, and the cause for rebirth in the lower, unfortunate realms is non-virtue. To be free from a rebirth in the lower realms, we must shun negativity and adopt virtue. At the time of death we don't disappear and become nothing; there is a continuity. Even those who believe in a creator or God agree that we don't completely disappear or disintegrate at the time of death and that there is continuity. They believe that if one has acted according to God's wishes then one will progress into a good state, and if not, one will go into an unfortunate state. The explanation here is the same: if we have created negativity we will have an unfortunate rebirth, and if we have accumulated virtues we will have a fortunate rebirth. The point is, as we will not disappear and become nothing after our death, we need to take responsibility for ensuring that we have a good rebirth. His Holiness explains that what the Christian faith calls the soul is similar to what we call the 'self'. So even in the Christian faith they say that after death the soul continues.

Again, why is it difficult to be reborn again in the happy realms? Firstly, we can relate to the existence of unfortunate rebirths. So, if we were to be reborn in any of these unfortunate states, such as the hell realms, the hungry ghost realms or the animal realms, we would be completely immersed in suffering. If this occurs there would be hardly any opportunity for virtue to occur in the mind. Take the example of the animal realm, where we can see that with many, their very existence depends on preying on other animals and consuming their flesh. They must actively go out and kill other living beings for their very survival. If they didn't do that they would not survive. Imagine how much negativity they incur just having to survive by killing other beings. Hence there is hardly any opportunity for animals to accumulate virtues when in the lower realms, which is why it is difficult to go from a lower realm to a higher realm. Note that it is easy to go from a higher rebirth to a lower rebirth—that is very easy! However, ascending from a lower rebirth to a higher rebirth is very difficult.

To summarise the meaning of the text in more practical terms, it is suggesting it is better not to go to a place where you would have much suffering and misery and in which it would be very difficult to accumulate virtue. Rather, wouldn't it be better for you to remain in a happier state where you can accumulate virtue? If you're enjoying some leisure now in this realm, wouldn't it be better to be reborn into such a realm again in the future, rather than having to take rebirth in a state of much suffering? If you agree that you don't want to be reborn in a realm where there is more suffering, and you want to be reborn continuously in happy rebirths, then what you need to do is intentionally avoid creating negativity and proactively accumulate virtue. This is how we need to practise to create the causes for that outcome.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

25 March 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation.

[meditation]

Now we can generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, to alleviate all their suffering and bring them to ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put it into practice well.

2.2.1. Conscientiously abandoning faults

2.2.1.4. IF REBORN IN THE LOWER REALMS ONE HAS NO OPPORTUNITY TO GENERATE VIRTUE (CONT.)

2.2.1.4.2. If one does not strive while in the happy realms one will be confused in the lower realms concerning what is to be practised and abandoned

We need to consider how fortunate we are to have obtained this perfect human rebirth with its freedoms and endowments. If we were to be reborn in the lower realms we would hardly have any opportunity to engage in virtue, because of the lack of wisdom, and thus no opportunity to create the causes to obtain higher rebirths. So we need to remind ourselves again and again that it is like a miracle and pure chance that we have obtained such good conditions now. When we think about it in great detail we can see how incredibly fortunate we are to have these amazing conditions now, and in that way develop a great sense of joy. It would be extremely foolish to waste the good conditions that we enjoy now!

When we think of our own circumstances we can see how remarkable it is that we have all of these perfect conditions now. In my case it may seem more natural, in that that I was brought up as a Buddhist because of my birth into a Buddhist family. Traditionally, the very first thing Tibetan parents do is bring their child to a revered and respected lama or geshe. This happened in my case and I was given the name Lobsang Dorje. So we could say that the conditions were already there for me to be a Buddhist. Of course there was no choice—it was my destiny to be brought up in that way. As amazing as that is, your situation is even more amazing. Considering your background and so forth, it is really quite amazing for you to have met all of these conditions now.

The main point in considering all of this is that it should encourage us to engage in the practice of Dharma. Having considered how we enjoy these great conditions now, and how they will not come our way again easily, we need to take the initiative to utilise every minute of the day to practise the Dharma.

Newer students seem to find it hard to deal with the explanations of the sufferings. As many of you are already quite familiar with them it might be easier for you, but it seems to be really difficult for new students to listen to the extensive explanations of sufferings. At his recent teachings in Sera, His Holiness the Dalai Lama commented on the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey's great skills in presenting the teachings. Those of you who were there would have heard him say that. Indeed, when Geshe Ngawang Dhargye presented teachings on bodhicitta, the students' minds would naturally become subdued. Apparently there was one occasion when a new student attended a class where Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey was teaching on bodhicitta and the kindness of others. He went into great detail and explained it in a way that made this person really inspired and drawn to the teachings. However, when Geshe-la started to explain the sufferings, it became difficult for this student to take it in, so he started to slowly come out of the teachings. He just didn't want to listen to accounts of suffering.

In 1985 when Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey came to Australia he gave teachings at Atisha Centre. This time there was a lady from Germany who later commented that when she went to the teachings she was really inspired and it was very helpful for her mind. She did, however, confess that when it came to the topic of suffering, it was hard to accept all of it. About three years later she came to see me and confided, 'Those sufferings that Geshe-la was explaining in detail were hard for me to accept then, but later I actually experienced those very sufferings. It was exactly as Geshe-la described them'.

Initially it was hard for her to accept some of descriptions of the sufferings—even the sufferings of the human realm were hard for her to accept. However, later she found from her own experience that they were definitely true. This is an instance of where it might be difficult to fully grasp some aspects of the teachings initially, but because they are the words of truth, they gradually become much clearer due to one's understanding and experiences.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

*18. If, although having the fortune to practice virtue,
I do not create virtue,
Then what am I going to do
When completely confused by the lower realm's sufferings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

If, although having the fortune to practise virtue, I do not make an effort now to practise virtue, then how am I going to practise when I am in the lower realms?

At that time I am miserable because of continuously experiencing the feeling of suffering of the lower realms, and I am confused concerning what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned. As a result, I cannot practise anything.

Hence I need to make an effort now at this time when I have obtained freedom and endowments.

First of all, the commentary acknowledges that one has the fortune to practise virtue. Here we can use ourselves as an example of a fortunate one who is endowed with two types of fortune; the fortune of not being deprived of material necessities, and not being deprived of the conditions for practising the Dharma. I consider one is fortunate if one is endowed with both good external and internal conditions.

The Tibetan term kal-den, translated into English as fortunate, has the literal connotation of someone who possesses their share. So if we use that literal meaning from the Tibetan word, then fortune can relate to having our share of the perfect conditions to practise the Dharma, as well as having our share of material conditions.

As the commentary explains, although one does have this fortune to practise virtue, i.e. the good conditions that enable us to practise virtue, that is not sufficient in itself if I do not make an effort now to practise virtue. It is not sufficient to have these good conditions if we don't strive to put them into practice.

Here we need to understand that the emphasis is on the necessity for engaging in the practice of Dharma if we are to be saved from the sufferings. What is being implied here is that the Dharma Jewel is the real protector which needs to be cultivated within oneself. As the Offering Prayer reads:

To supreme teacher, the precious Buddha;
To the supreme protector, the precious Dharma;
To the supreme guides, the precious Sangha;
To these Three Jewels, the objects of refuge, I make this offering.

The Dharma developed within oneself is indeed the real protector, which implies that one is one's own saviour and liberator.

What we really need to consider is how we are our own protector and guide. The person who guides us to fortunate rebirths in the higher realms is none other than ourselves. So we are the ones who need to take the initiative to guide ourselves to a higher rebirth and protect ourselves from lower rebirths. How foolish would it be to practise the reverse, and guide ourselves to the lower realms? Why on earth would you want to work towards an unfortunate rebirth? That wouldn't be wise at all. No-one else but ourselves can guide us to a higher rebirth, so it is up to us to take the initiative. Likewise, no one can lead us, or drag us down to the lower realm but ourselves. We are the ones who must take the initiative to prevent being reborn in the lower realms. Likewise, one cannot ultimately guide others to the higher realms or lead them to the lower realms. The point here is that we have to take personal responsibility for securing good conditions for ourselves in the future.

Thus, in very simple terms, if the finger is to be pointed, it has to be pointed at ourselves; we need to constantly remind ourselves, 'Don't lead yourself down to the lower realms, but lead yourself up to a higher rebirth'. This is the sort of internal dialogue we need to engage in to ensure that we are creating the causes for higher rebirth.

Even though it is not in the Tibetan root text, the commentary poses a rhetorical question: how am I going to practise when I am in the lower realms? The point here is that one will not be able to practise in the lower realms, because at that time I am miserable because of continuously experiencing the feeling of suffering of the lower realms. There is a Tibetan word here, which has a connotation of intense suffering. The point is that being completely immersed in intense suffering deprives one of the initiative to practise Dharma.

Furthermore, I am confused concerning what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned. As a result, I cannot practise anything. The point here is that because one lacks the intelligence or wisdom to be able to know what is virtue, which is to be adopted, and negativity, which is to be abandoned, one cannot engage in practice. How can you abandon what you don't know? These are actually quite pertinent and pointed points. They are a personal instruction that we really need to apply in our everyday thinking. Hence, Gyaltsab Je concludes, we need to make an effort now when we have obtained the freedoms and endowments.

It is also then good to complement these points with our understanding of the Lam Rim teachings, which explain the need to practise Dharma, and the need to practise Dharma right now.

2.2.1.4.3. It is extremely difficult to be liberated from the lower realms

One might think, 'If I were to go to lower realms, then I would eventually be able to free myself from that'. However, once in the lower realms it is very difficult to leave them.

Again, we need to relate this point to our understanding of the difficulty of finding the freedoms and endowments that we have gained from the Lam Rim teaching. The Lam Rim explains that finding the freedoms and endowments is difficult because accumulating their causes and so forth is extremely difficult.

The relevant verse reads:

19. *One did not generate virtue
And one accumulated negativity easily.
Even for ten million eons
One will not hear even the words 'happy realm'.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

It is extremely difficult to later obtain the freedoms and endowments because in this life one has not generated any virtue, and accumulated negativity easily, and so one will not even hear the words 'happy realm' for ten million eons.

The essential point here is that it is extremely difficult to later obtain the freedoms and endowments. While the explanation in the commentary is quite easy to understand, the main point is that we really need to incorporate it into our minds so that it is a constant source of encouragement. As explained here, the reason why it is extremely difficult to obtain the freedoms and endowments in the future is because in this life one has not generated any virtue and has accumulated negativities. If one has not generated any virtue and accumulated negativities, then it is difficult to obtain the freedoms and endowments in the future. Again, we can relate this to the explanations in the Lam Rim, which say that the cause of obtaining the freedoms and endowments is virtue.

If we have not accumulated the causes then naturally we will not be able to experience the result, specifically the result of the freedoms and endowments. If one is reborn in the lower realms then one will not even hear the words 'happy realms' for ten million eons. This means that if one were to be reborn in the lower realms then, let alone being able to create the causes for the freedoms and endowments, one will not even know what the freedoms and endowments are, just like a creature in the depths of the ocean could not be aware of other types of existence. Without even knowing about them, the chances of creating the causes for a happy existence would be very remote, to the point of being virtually impossible. Again, the main point here is to take this as an encouragement to actually practise the Dharma.

To explain this in practical terms, if we wish to obtain a perfect human rebirth with its freedoms and endowments in the next lifetime, then we need to shun negativity and accumulate virtue. We can wish as much as we want, to obtain good conditions and be born as human beings, but if we continuously create negativity and put little or no effort into accumulating virtue, then we are not creating the causes to enjoy these good conditions again in the future. All too often we fall into a state of procrastination thinking, 'Well, even if I don't do too well this time round I will probably obtain a human rebirth again next time and it might be better the next time round. I will do better then'. However, being able to obtain a perfect a human rebirth again in the future is dependent on the causes and conditions that we need to be creating now.

2.2.1.5. WHY IT IS DIFFICULT TO FIND FREEDOMS AND ENDOWMENTS

The relevant verse reads:

20. *For that very reason the Bhagavan taught That merely becoming human is extremely difficult,
As it is for a turtle
To put its neck through the yoke floating on the great ocean.*

Gyaltsab Je begins his explanation of this verse with:

Because it is very difficult to find a happy rebirth from the lower realms, the Bhagavan taught in his perfect scriptures:

Then Gyaltsab Je quotes the Perfect Sutra:

Bhikkhus, if all this ground were to become a great ocean on which a yoke with one hole is moved by the wind. And in that ocean if there was a blind turtle that only sticks its neck out of the water once a hundred years.

Bhikkhus, what do you think? Is it easy for the turtle to catch the yoke with its neck? 'Tathagata, it is not so'. The Tathagata replied: Bhikkhus, similarly is it difficult merely to attain a human rebirth.

The commentary then continues

If one does not create virtue and accumulates negativity, then one does not even hear the word 'happy migration'. For that reason, the Bhagavan taught that merely to attain a human rebirth is much more difficult than for the blind turtle that comes up only every hundred years, to stick its neck into the single hole of the yoke floating on the surface of the ocean, being moved here and there by the wind.

Therefore one needs to make an effort to practise virtue when one is in the happy migration.

As the commentary explains, the freedoms and endowments are incredibly difficult to find, and even more so when one is in the lower realms. In the Perfect Sutra the Buddha gave a hypothetical example to illustrate the degree of difficulty this entails. We imagine the whole ground becoming an incredibly vast ocean, and on that the ocean is a single yoke with only one hole in it, and this yoke is constantly moved by the wind. At the bottom of the ocean is a blind turtle, which surfaces only once every hundred years. The likelihood of that blind turtle entering its neck into that single hole of the yoke is very remote indeed.

Then the Buddha asked his disciples, 'What is the likelihood of this happening? Is it easy for a blind turtle to enter its neck into the hole?'. They replied, 'It is not so, it is very difficult'. This, said the Buddha, is as difficult as attaining a human rebirth.

As explained in the teachings, each part of this example is an analogy.

- The blind turtle represents ignorant beings who are ignorant of the wisdom as to what to adopt and what to discard.
- Once every hundred years is an analogy to the fact that it is very rare to be reborn as a human being with all the perfect conditions.
- The turtle surfacing is analogous to being reborn in a higher rebirth.
- The yoke on the surface of the ocean represents the Buddha's teachings.

Just as the likelihood of that blind turtle placing its neck into the yoke is a near impossibility, taking a higher rebirth, with the chance of meeting with the Buddha's teaching is very, very remote. One might be reborn as a human, but in the country or place where his teachings are not available, or where there are no conditions for the Dharma to be taught or practised. So one might be born as human, but without the conditions to practise. From this analogy, we can see how extremely difficult it is to find all these freedoms and endowments intact.

Obtaining the freedoms and endowments of a higher rebirth, with all the perfect conditions, is said to be even more remote than this hypothetical example of the chance of a blind turtle sticking its neck into the hole of the yoke. That is how it explained in the teachings.

Then the commentary on this section concludes with, Therefore one needs to make an effort to practise virtue when one is in the happy migration.

2.2.2. Conscientiously meditating on virtue

This section is subdivided into three:

2.2.2.1. It is appropriate to strive in abandoning the infinite negativity accumulated previously

2.2.2.2. Why a single suffering in the lower realm exhausts that karma, but does not exhaust the karma of the lower realm

2.2.2.3. Why it is appropriate to strive in the antidote to negativity

2.2.2.1. IT IS APPROPRIATE TO STRIVE IN ABANDONING THE INFINITE NEGATIVITY ACCUMULATED PREVIOUSLY

This explanation follows on from the earlier explanation that if creating negativity is the cause for one to be born in the lower realm, then it is most appropriate that one strives to purify the infinite non-virtue accumulated previously.

The verse relating to this outline reads:

21. *If one remains in the naraks for eons
Due to one moment of negativity,
Then why even mention that one won't go to the happy realms
Due to the negativity accumulated in beginningless samsara?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

If one has to remain in the hells without respite for eons due to only one moment of anger at a bodhisattva, then what need is there to mention that one will not go to the happy migrations due to the negativity in one's continuum that has been accumulated since beginningless time, and has not been destroyed by an antidote?

One should train in purifying negativity by way of the four powers.

When the commentary says, If one has to remain in the hells without respite due to only one moment of anger at a bodhisattva, it is referring to the impact of just one moment of negative karma. This is in contrast to the intense negative karma that is created over a long period in many previous lifetimes. Here, because the object of one's anger is a bodhisattva, a very superior object, the negativity created is a cause leading to the hells without respite, for a long period of time. We can also relate this to the fact that karma multiplies greatly, which is one of the four characteristics of karma. So the main point here is that even a short moment of negative karma such as anger can have heavy negative consequences.

The duration of the cause might only be a moment of anger at a bodhisattva but the result is that one has to remain in hell without respite for eons. Because of the short duration of the negative deed, one might think, 'Oh, this is a very small negative deed over a short period of time, so the consequences may not be too bad'. However, as explained here, if one were to create negative karma in relation to a supreme object such as a bodhisattva, even if it is of short duration, the consequence is that one will have to experience being born in the hell realms for many eons. Gyaltsab Rinpoche also explains this point very clearly in his other works, where he exhorts us to be mindful and particularly careful not to criticise and be judgemental of others with anger, because we cannot know who is a bodhisattva. So we need to protect ourselves from this grave misdeed lest we end up criticising and becoming angry with a bodhisattva.

The commentary then further explains that if one will remain in hell without respite for eons just from one moment of anger towards a bodhisattva, then what need is there to mention that one will not go to the happy migrations due to the negativity in one's continuum that has been accumulated since beginningless times and has not been destroyed by an antidote? As we have been in samsara since beginningless time, we have accumulated infinite negativities in the past. For as long as those negativities are still within our mental continuum, not destroyed by an antidote, there should be no doubt about the possibility of being reborn in the lower realms. The point here is that these negativities that have been accumulated since beginningless time can be destroyed when the antidote is applied. So one should train in purifying negativity by way of the four powers.

The four opponent powers were explained previously, and we need to take this advice to heart as a personal instruction. We need to remind ourselves again and again that we need to be constantly mindful of purifying the negativities that we have accumulated in the past by applying the four opponent powers. Then we need to guard ourselves from creating even more negativities. When we adopt this as our practice in our daily life then we will definitely be applying the antidote for overcoming these negativities. If we adopt the reverse of that i.e. keep virtues at bay and embrace the negativities, then the price will be rebirth in the lower realms.

However we also need to be mindful about not becoming disheartened because we have accumulated so much negativity in the past, or the fact that we find ourselves continuously engaging in negativities now, seemingly without control, which is due to our habituation with these negativities. While that prospect may seem quite daunting, we do have the ability to purify negativities. We have the knowledge and we have the means to firstly identify what is negativity, and when we find that we have engaged in some negativities, we have the means to purify them by applying the four opponent powers.

So it is not at all a hopeless situation because we do have that opportunity to purify our negativities. As I have mentioned previously, while an immediate negativity may be the trigger for a purification practice, when we actually engage in that practice it is very important that we also bring to mind any negativity that we have created in the past. In relation to this life we can definitely recall negativities that we had created in the earlier part of the day, last night, last week, last month, last year, and in the earlier part of one's life. By recalling them we can inevitably feel strong regret about accumulating those negativities.

As the teachings mention, when one develops a very strong regret then that suffices to purify a great amount of negativity. The four opponent powers entail being profoundly regretful that yet again one has been compelled to engage in these negativities; taking refuge, as a quick way of applying the antidote; and then resolving not to commit these misdeeds again. If we find that we have created negativity in the morning, we try to purify it by noon. If further on in the day one finds one has again created negativity then, towards the evening one again applies the four opponent powers of developing regret and so forth. In this way, by applying mindfulness we are able to apply the measures of purifying negativities through the four opponent powers, by taking refuge and so forth.

In fact, the practice of purification is, by default, also the optimum means for accumulating merit. So purification practice is incredibly worthwhile. When we conduct ourselves in our daily life by regretting negativities we have created in the past, then that regret will be the impetus to purify these negativities. Likewise, when we think about the virtues we have definitely created, we can rejoice. If we conduct our daily life in this way, rejoicing in good deeds and purifying our negative deeds, then we will secure a meaningful life. As we purify negative karma and engage in these practices the mind naturally becomes happier and happier, and there will naturally be more joy in one's mind. That is a practical positive result of the purification practice.

A Dharma practitioner is one who, based on their understanding of karma, understands that virtue results in happiness and non-virtue results in unhappiness. Based on that simple principle, if we find that we have created some non-virtue, then, because we don't want to experience the result, which is unhappiness and suffering, we can take the initiative to purify those accumulated negativities. And then, in every possible way, we try to adopt a virtuous mind, and engage in virtuous deeds, because we wish to experience the positive result of happiness. When we conduct ourselves in that way then that constitutes a real Dharma practitioner.

Put simply, when we apply the purification practice with the four opponent powers then that very practice becomes the means to block the passage or doorway to the lower realms. And then, as when we engage in virtues and accumulate merit it opens the doorway or passage to a higher rebirth.

There are only two doorways and it is up to us to choose which one we want to enter. We have no other choice but these two doorways, so we need to make the right choice.

2.2.2.2. WHY A SINGLE SUFFERING IN THE LOWER REALM EXHAUSTS THAT KARMA, BUT DOES NOT EXHAUST THE KARMA OF THE LOWER REALM

The next verse is explained in the context of overcoming another hypothetical doubt; we might again think, 'If experiencing the sufferings in the lower realms will exhaust one's karma to be in the lower realms, then I will be reborn again in higher realm'. However, by virtue of being in the lower realms one will be continuously creating more causes to remain there, which is why it is not easy to free oneself from the lower realms.

As will be explained, once born in the lower realms one will quite naturally and spontaneously create further negative karmas to remain in the lower realms, continuously propelling one from one unfortunate rebirth to the next. We can avoid that by using our current fortunate rebirth to apply the causes and conditions to be born again in the higher realms. That would be a crucial way to practice, for just experiencing the consequences of one unfortunate rebirth does not mean that the karma to be born in the lower realms will be completely exhausted.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

1 April 2014

When we recite the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer at the beginning of any practice, it is really good to reflect on it as an opportunity to generate the optimum motivation for doing the practice. We need to remember that taking refuge is the essential criteria for ensuring that the practice is a Buddhist practice, whilst generating bodhicitta ensures that the practice is a Mahayana practice.

It seems that every religion has its own form of refuge prayer that is recited at the beginning of every ceremony.

So, based on the motivation we have generated during the recitation of the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in our meditation practice.

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teaching, and put it into practice well.

2.2.2.2. WHY A SINGLE SUFFERING IN THE LOWER REALM EXHAUSTS THAT KARMA, BUT DOES NOT EXHAUST THE KARMA OF THE LOWER REALM

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section of the text with this query:

One may think: It is not difficult to become liberated from the lower realms because after the result is exhausted I will take rebirth in the happy migration.

This query is yet another excuse to procrastinate in one's Dharma practice, where one thinks, 'If I were to be reborn in the lower realms, then when that karma is used up I will be able to take a higher rebirth, and I'll be able to achieve liberation then'. This thinking is based on the fact that the karma to be reborn in the lower realms occurs as a result of previous karma, and that karma exhausts itself. Reasoning that rebirth in the lower realms means using up negative karma, thus leaving it possible to be able to take rebirth in the higher realms sooner rather than later, and then achieve liberation, can lead to laziness and procrastination about practising the Dharma.

The verse relating to this outline reads:

22. *Only through the mere experience
One will not be liberated, because
During the experience
One generates other negativities.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

A person will not be liberated from the lower realms merely through experiencing the result of only one negative action, because while one is experiencing the suffering result of previous karma one adventitiously creates other negativity that brings forth powerful suffering.

As explained here, merely experiencing the results of previously created negative karma does not mean one will be liberated from the lower realms. The commentary further explains that while one is experiencing the suffering result of previous karma, one adventitiously creates other negativity that brings forth powerful suffering. In addition to experiencing the sufferings of the lower realms, the conditions there are a cause to repeatedly create even more negative karma, which brings about even more suffering. Here we can use the example of the animal realm, a lower realm with which we are very familiar. We can see that most animals have to constantly engage in negative actions for their very survival. They cannot recognise their actions as negativity, let alone know that they can be purified. Due to their state of ignorance they have no knowledge of the ways to create virtue, or to shun negativity. Even we humans, who do have that intelligence and knowledge, find it difficult to avoid negativity and adopt virtue. Animals have no such choice.

The personal instruction here is that being reborn in the lower realms will be a perpetual cause for creating further negative karma, and thus continuous rebirth in the lower realms over a long period of time. To avoid that situation we need to use the good conditions we have now to avoid the negative causes that will lead to rebirth in a lower realm, and adopt the positive causes or virtue that will ensure that we have a good rebirth. Then we can continuously go from one fortunate rebirth to the next, continuously engaging in creating virtue and merit until we reach the ultimate goal. Just as the result of previous negative karma is to be reborn in the lower realms, rebirth in the fortunate realms is definitely the result of positive, virtuous karma.

Since we have now achieved that fortunate rebirth, we need to ensure that we do not use up our positive karma. Just as the karma of lower realms can be exhausted, our karma in the fortunate realms can also be used up. If we don't seize the opportunity to create further virtuous karma, then there is no other possibility than a lower rebirth. Then the situation of repeatedly creating negative karma will befall us. Therefore, we need to really understand that we are responsible for our own future, and whether we have a fortunate rebirth or an unfortunate rebirth lies entirely within our own hands. So we need to take the initiative if we are to achieve our goal.

On a personal level, the advice here is that we should not relate being reborn in lower realms to external circumstances, i.e. as only happening to others. Rather, we need to personalise this advice and keep in mind the fact that it relates to oneself. So, one needs to be thinking, 'If I were reborn in the lower realms then it will be extremely difficult for me to escape from that'. That will be an impetus to really take this advice to heart for the need to practise the Dharma.

Then Gyaltsab Je concludes his commentary on the verse:

On the basis of the lower realms, virtue is weak and negativity is continuously accumulated. Therefore one should strive to stop the cause of the lower realms.

Here Gyaltsab Je is re-emphasising Shantideva's advice. If one were to be reborn in the lower realms there will be hardly any opportunity to accumulate virtue, because the conditions for accumulating virtue are very minimal. Furthermore, because of the conditions in the lower realms we would be continuously creating negativity. We see the truth of this when we look at the animal realm. What opportunities do they have to accumulate virtue? We might help a pet to create some virtue by taking them around a holy object like a stupa, or say some mantras, but apart from that they don't have any opportunity to willingly create virtue. When we think about the prospect of having to experience those kinds of conditions ourselves, we will see why we need to strive to stop the cause of the lower realms. We need to take this as a personal instruction to constantly remind ourselves, 'Be careful, be careful. Now that I have these good conditions I have to use them wisely and not waste them'.

The crux of the advice is in the words the cause of the lower realms—we need to reflect on the causes for rebirth in the lower realms. Here we consider the ten non-virtues. Killing, such as taking the life of another being, is a cause for the lower realms; taking what belongs to another is a cause for the lower realms; and engaging in sexual misconduct is a cause for the lower realms. We need to take note here that sexual misconduct applies to lay people, who don't have the vow of celibacy.

We can see here how kind and skilful the Buddha was in his advice on accumulating virtue and abandoning non-virtue. It would be extremely difficult for lay people to completely abstain from sexual activity, so here the advice is to abstain from sexual misconduct. If one wishes to practise on a higher level one can take the self-liberation vows of an ordained monk or nun, which include the vow to completely abstain from sexual activity, i.e. the vow of celibacy. So the Buddha meticulously presented many opportunities for engaging in virtue and abstaining from negativity on various different levels, in accordance with the capacity of his followers.

Further causes for rebirth in the lower realms are lying, slander, harsh words, idle gossip, covetousness, ill will and wrong view. Engaging in these non-virtues is a cause to be reborn in the lower realms, whereas willingly abandoning the ten non-virtues and thus adopting the ten virtues is the cause for a fortunate rebirth. None of these ten virtues are beyond our capacity. We can all abstain from killing, stealing, sexual misconduct and so forth, while engaging in virtuous deeds such as protecting the life of others, practicing generosity and so forth.

Here we need to engage in a personal dialogue. 'If you have the choice, would you rather go to the lower realms or take a fortunate rebirth in the next lifetime?' The natural answer should be, 'I definitely want to have a fortunate rebirth'. 'So, if you want to have a fortunate rebirth and avoid an unfortunate one, then you need to create the causes for it. If you just lie back and do nothing, then how could you possibly create the causes for a fortunate rebirth?' Reprimanding oneself with a personal dialogue like this is a good method to encourage oneself to accumulate virtue. It is in this way that we gradually develop more faith in the Dharma and an aspiration to engage in the practice. Adopting a life of accumulating virtue and shunning negativity will gradually become more stable for the sublime Dharma to take root in one's life.

As I mentioned previously, while we acknowledge that we should avoid negativity and adopt virtue, we may still find ourselves uncontrollably engaging in non-virtues. You might find yourself (accidentally or intentionally) taking the life of another sentient being, or taking something without permission, or engaging in sexual misconduct. These things may occur from time to time because we are habituated to them. With a proper understanding of the Dharma that should not become a cause for despondency and feeling that things are hopeless. Rather you should remind yourselves again and again of the teaching that purification is a powerful means to purify negative karma.

When you remember that you can purify negative karma, then the great privilege of understanding the Dharma means that you will be able to apply the antidote to any negativity immediately. When you find you have created some negativity, rather than feeling hopeless and depressed, and thinking, 'Oh, I have created so much negativity I am definitely going to the lower realms. There is no hope for me anymore', one should immediately remember, 'OK, I have created some negativity but negativity can be purified'. That is why the kind Buddha presented us with the means for purification. The first part of purification is feeling regret, and based on regret one applies the appropriate antidotes.

By taking the Dharma to heart in this way, when you do find yourselves unwillingly creating some negativity out of habituation, you can rest assured that you can still purify that negative karma; that will prevent rebirth in the lower realms. We need to also use that as a reminder to ensure that we are creating the causes for a fortunate rebirth.

This is how we need to apply ourselves if we want to take the Dharma practice to heart. If one thinks, 'Oh, I don't care anymore' then one has definitely fallen victim to one's own negativity; one will not purify negativities because one does not care about it. In fact, one may even start to feel joyful about creating negativity and regretful about creating virtue. When we think about it we will see how, even though we have this incredible, fortunate rebirth with the freedoms and endowments intact, somehow there are times when we regret not having been able to create some negativity, and feel hesitant about opportunities to create virtue. Feeling glad that we have had the opportunity to create non-virtue and sad that we have missed an opportunity to create non-virtue or negativity would be a really pitiful situation, to say the least, given the great conditions we have now.

In summary, the main point to consider is that we definitely have the capacity to obtain a fortunate rebirth in the next lifetime. The causes to obtain such a fortunate rebirth, as well as taking another fortunate rebirth from a higher rebirth are not difficult or obscure. What is difficult, is obtaining a higher rebirth from the lower realms. Thus, we must take matters into our own hands. There is no-one who puts us into a lower rebirth but ourselves. Likewise, no-one else can obstruct us from taking a fortunate rebirth except ourselves. Who creates the causes for a fortunate rebirth? Again, it is none other than ourselves. The causes definitely lie within our hands as we have the capacity and we have the means. The main thing to consider is that this explanation is a way to encourage us to use these good conditions we have now to create the appropriate causes for a good rebirth.

In simple terms, Shantideva is saying, 'You have the full capacity and the appropriate conditions to create the causes for a fortunate rebirth. If you go to the lower realms it will be very difficult freeing yourself from that. Now, when you have those good conditions to create a cause for a fortunate rebirth, is the time to create those causes'. These incredible conditions that we all possess right now are such that we can create extensive merit even in just a second. As you would have heard many times, if an ordinary person generates the mind of bodhicitta, even for just a second, the amount of merit they accumulate would be difficult for all the buddhas to articulate.

2.2.2.3. WHY IT IS APPROPRIATE TO STRIVE IN THE ANTIDOTE TO NEGATIVITY

We can relate this section to Nagarjuna's definitions of negativity and non-virtue, which have been explained in past teachings. Nagarjuna defined negativity as that which is an onset to rebirth into the lower realms, whereas non-virtue is defined as that which is shunned by the noble ones. Here Nagarjuna is making a distinction that is very pertinent to this outline.

This outline is subdivided into four:

2.2.2.3.1. If one does not strive in virtue upon having obtained the freedoms and endowments, then one is deceiving oneself

2.2.2.3.2. One will experience suffering in this life

2.2.2.3.3. Later one will be tormented by the sufferings of the lower realms

2.2.2.3.4. Why it is appropriate to abandon negativity and practise virtue

2.2.2.3.1. If one does not strive in virtue upon having obtained the freedoms and endowments, then one is deceiving oneself

The point here is that no-one is depriving us of this opportunity to create virtue but ourselves.

The relevant verse reads:

23. *If, upon having found this freedom,
I do not meditate on virtue,
Then there is no greater deception,
There is no greater ignorance.*

With respect to this verse Gyaltshab Je's commentary reads:

Having found this freedom which is difficult to find, and when found has great meaning, if I do not strive in and meditate on the cause for higher status and liberation, then there is no better method of self-deception.

There is also no greater ignorance than the ignorance concerning what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned.

The commentary gives a very clear explanation of the verse. Having found this freedom which is difficult to find refers to the freedoms and endowments that we enjoy now. We had to create many virtuous causes in the past to obtain these great conditions, and having found this life there is great meaning refers to the great capacity one has to obtain the causes for one's future goals.

This not talking about goals like finding the necessities for survival. Rather, it is referring to the great potential we have to obtain the causes for a fortunate rebirth. Based on the conditions we have now, we have the full capacity and means to avoid the ten non-virtues and to engage in the ten virtues. That then becomes the cause for a fortunate rebirth in the next life. Furthermore, on the basis of the conditions we have now, we have the full capacity and potential to generate renunciation, which becomes a cause to obtain liberation, becoming free from rebirth in cyclic existence. And finally, with these conditions we also have the full capacity to generate bodhicitta and gain the realisation of emptiness, which are the causes to obtain the ultimate goal of enlightenment.

Because we have these freedoms and endowments we can create the causes for these three goals. So, if I do not strive in, and meditate on, the cause for higher status and liberation, which includes enlightenment, then there is no better method of self-deception. As I have mentioned previously, if we do not utilise the good conditions we have now, and just focus on our survival and worldly concerns, then that would be a great deception. Indeed, the greatest deception is to waste this incredible opportunity and potential we have to obtain these supreme goals. Furthermore, there is no greater ignorance than to be ignorant of what is to be adopted and practised, and what is to be abandoned. So we are being encouraged to use these great conditions to ensure that we do not fall victim to self-deception, and apply these good conditions to creating the causes to obtain our goals. While it is easy to understand what is being explained here, we need to take it to heart and really try to implement it in our daily life and practice.

2.2.2.3.2. One will experience suffering in this life

The verse relating

24. *Should I, after having understood this,
Still be indolent due to ignorance,
When the time to die comes
Great misery will arise.*

Here Gyaltshab Je's commentary reads,

Should I, after having realised that I have to strive in achieving virtue and abandoning negativity, still be indolent with regard to the mind of enlightenment, the practice of the perfections and so on, then at the time of death, when I know I am going to the lower realms, great misery will arise. Therefore I should strive with great effort.

The meaning of the commentary is quite clear. The significant point is that when, if one has realised that one must adopt virtue and abandon negativity but disregards this and continues to engage in frivolous activities, or if one has not adopted the mind of bodhicitta, not practising the perfections such as generosity and so forth, then at the time of death one will generate great sorrow and misery. Realising at that time, when one reflects upon one's life, that negativity is the cause for rebirth in the lower realms, and that one has mostly engaged in negativity and not accumulated virtue, one will be tormented and have great regret in one's mind.

It is a fact that when people are in the last stages of death appearances occur to them that are linked to what they have done in their life. Some appearances cause them real joy because they have accumulated virtues. However, for those who recognise they've mostly engaged in negativity, the appearances bring great fear and unease in their minds. This definitely occurs. Here in the west, dying people who are in pain are often sedated with morphine which seems to numb their mind and senses, so even if they have some experience of these appearances they may not be able to express it. However, when body and senses are not numbed there are clear signs of anxiety at the time of death from those with strong regret.

For yourself, the advice here is to strive with great effort. By bringing to mind the great misery that will occur at the time of death, and wanting to avoid it, one will create the causes for a fortunate rebirth. One needs to apply great effort to adopt virtues and refrain from negativities. The crucial point is realising that one has to strive to adopt virtue and abstain from negativity. If one does not apply the practice, one becomes complacent. There is a Tibetan term describing this which has the connotation of becoming immune or desensitised to the Dharma. This is a very dangerous situation to be in, and one to avoid, so take it to heart and apply the practice of Dharma sincerely now.

The teachings explain that great practitioners have only joy in going onwards at the time of death. A medium-level practitioner has no hesitation in facing death and the lowest-level practitioner will not have any regrets in their mind. Thus, one needs to ensure that at the very least, one can prevent strong regret arising at the time of death. It would be a good achievement to know one has done one's best to adopt virtues and purify negativities, and that there is no need for regret at the time of death. It is important to ensure that we practise the Dharma wholeheartedly now, when we have the opportunity.

We can see how Nagarjuna's definition of negativity, which is that it is the onset to rebirth in the lower realms, is very relevant here. This means that creating negativity is like being in the state that is one step away from the lower realms. For individuals who have created a lot of negativity, there will be fear, anxiety and sorrow at the time of death, due to the prospect of what will come next. In relation to that, we can see that Nagarjuna's precise definition of negativity is very pertinent. Nagarjuna and Chandrakirti were great masters. His Holiness mentioned recently that Lama Tsong Khapa clearly matched their attributes and their capacity for reasoning and discernment. In both ancient and modern times there are hardly any other masters who equal them. As their explanations and advices are extremely clear and precise, we really need to take heed of them.

The first Dalai Lama said that the real enemies to overcome are the delusions, and these lie within oneself. Take this advice to heart and recognise that the real enemy lies within; as such, the delusions are the main culprit that cause all the turmoil and harm for oneself.

Recognising this means that we need to protect ourselves from the intensity of the negativities. It might be difficult for us to completely prevent negative states of mind such as anger, jealousy or attachment from arising occasionally, but while they are difficult to prevent, we can stop them from escalating. We can stop anger becoming intense anger such as hatred; we can stop intense jealousy that harms our mind and causes harm to others, and we can stop attachment from becoming obsessed with the object.

We have the means to overcome strong emotions, so we can apply antidotes to anger etc. But if one doesn't apply them and holds onto the anger, one is then befriending anger. Again, with attachment, if, rather than applying the antidote, one actually befriends attachment, one makes oneself a slave to attachment, listening to whatever attachment (or anger) says. One might find it hard to listen to the advice of one's gurus, but when it comes to listening to our anger and our attachment we have no hesitation. We become completely submissive to our attachment, anger and ignorance and allow them to be our masters, who we willingly serve. In summary, the delusions, which are the real cause of harm and destruction, lie nowhere else but within oneself, so we need to recognise and overcome this.

Although it will be explained further in the text, I want you to prepare yourself now and to familiarise yourself with identifying the delusions, particularly the six root delusions and the 20 secondary delusions.

2.2.2.3.3. Later one will be tormented by the sufferings of the lower realms

In case one feels that one could enjoy oneself in the lower realms, what is being explained here is that one will be tormented by the sufferings of the lower realms.

The next verse in the outline reads:

25. *When my body is burned by
The difficult to bear fires of hell for a long time,
The fire of terrible regret will light up,
And the mind will be despondent, this is certain.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains :

Through the faults of degenerating the mind of enlightenment and so forth one will take rebirth in the lower realms. When then the difficult to bear fires of hell burn my body for a long time, the fire of terrible regret will light up and my mind will be tormented. Since this is certain, make an effort to not incur any faults and downfalls.

The commentary explains here that the fault of allowing the mind of enlightenment or bodhicitta to degenerate is one of the heaviest of the downfalls. Previously, this was explained extensively. What is being explained here again is that through the faults of degenerating the mind of enlightenment, one will take rebirth in the lower realm. If one were to be born in a hell realm, such as the hot hell realm, one's body and fire become inseparable, and it is as if one's body and the fire is of one entity. So in that kind of situation, how could one even imagine that one's mind will not be tormented; there is no question about how much unceasing torment one would experience in both body and mind. The commentary explains here that this outcome is certain and that such consequences definitely have to be experienced.

What one needs to take to heart now is to make an effort not to incur any faults and downfalls. The main point is that once one takes those pledges of practising, one should ensure that one does not incur faults and downfalls, and that as one has the ability to apply the antidote to negativity, one should do so, as this serves as the means to overcome negativity.

2.2.2.3.4. Why it is appropriate to abandon negativity and practise virtue

Having contemplated the consequences of negativity, what logically follows is that it is appropriate to abandon negativity and practice virtue. So this is again subdivided into two:

2.2.2.3.4.1. Having wasted the freedoms and endowments, if one goes to the lower realms again, then one resembles something mindless

2.2.2.3.4.2. It is appropriate to contemplate the cause of ignorance

2.2.2.3.4.1. Having wasted the freedoms and endowments, if one goes to the lower realms again, then one resembles something mindless

I have elaborated on the fact that if one does not actually put these incredibly good conditions of the freedom and endowments to use, and seize that opportunity to use them optimally to create virtue and abandon negativities, and if one lays back and engages in frivolous worldly activities, then one has wasted those good conditions. Thus, having wasted the freedoms and endowments one goes to the lower realms. It is as if there is no common sense at all. This is what is being reflected here.

The verses under this heading read:

26. *Having found somehow
This extremely difficult to find basis of benefit
If I return to the lower realms later again
Despite having knowledge,*

27ab. *Then, similarly to one confused by mantra,
This makes me someone without mind.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

This basis of benefit, the precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments, is extremely difficult to find and, if found, is of great purpose.

Having found it somehow by chance, should I again go to the lower realms despite having knowledge of what is useful and what is harmful, then that makes me someone without a mind achieving just the purpose of the moment for self, similarly to a person confused by mantra.

The commentary explains here that the basis of benefit is the precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments, and that this is extremely difficult to find. Reflect back on the explanations given in the Lam Rim teachings about why it is difficult to find the freedoms and endowments, where three reasons are given: the causes are difficult to accumulate; explaining with an analogy why it is difficult; and because of the number of precious human rebirths being minimal in comparison to the numbers of living beings in other realms.

As mentioned in the commentary, having found this precious human rebirth is of great purpose. As explained previously, the great purpose is to achieve one's temporary and ultimate goals, and one can achieve all this having found, as if by chance, this precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments. So, if one were to go back again to the lower realms, despite having known what is useful and what is harmful, makes me someone without a mind. This means that it is as if one does not have a rational mind that knows what is good and beneficial and what is harmful to oneself.

Achieving just the purpose on the moment for oneself, refers to being completely immersed in temporary gratification and goals, rather than thinking about virtuous actions, and the necessity for long-term achievements. The analogy for being mindless is that it is similar to a person who is under the spell of a mantra of another person. They would be completely confused, and do things that are completely irrational, because they are completely dominated or influenced by the spell of the mantra. Thus, wasting one's perfect opportunities now with its freedoms and endowments would be similar to one who is mindless (lacking any common sense), like being under the spell of a mantra.

2.2.2.3.4.2. It is appropriate to contemplate the cause of ignorance

In presenting the meaning of the next two lines of verse, Gyaltsab Je opens his commentary with a query:

Query: How did one become confused?

Then as a response to that query the two lines of verse read:

*27cd. I do not know how I got so confused
What is lurking inside of me?*

Then the commentary explains:

Answer: I also do not know due to which cause I got confused and thus deceived. What cause for confusion is lurking inside me? I think there definitely is something.

If one falls into laziness, then one should think in this way.

What is again being reflected upon here is that even though we have all the good conditions such as the eight freedoms and ten endowments, and the knowledge and understanding of what is to be adopted and what is to be shunned, one still finds that one is not taking full opportunity and wastes the opportunities with frivolous worldly activities that focus on oneself. 'What could be causing that? There must definitely be something inside of me that is causing that confusion. What could it be?' This is a means of recognising that it is the delusions within oneself that are causing the confusion.

This introduces the next verse which refers to my enemies of anger, craving and so forth.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Adair Bunnett and Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett and Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe*

Edited version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་བ་ལ་འཇུག་བ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

8 April 2014

Based on the motivation we have just generated we can engage in the practice of meditation. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to become enlightened myself, and so for that purpose I will engage in the teaching, and put it into practice well.

The tong len meditation practice that we have just attempted to do is, of course, the basis for developing love and compassion, which is the core practice of Buddhism. We cannot possibly assume that we are engaging in any real practice if we leave this essential element aside.

This is in line with an understanding of what it means to be a practising Buddhist. A practising Buddhist is someone who, based on the teachings on non-violence that the Buddha gave, wholeheartedly entrusts themselves to the Three Jewels (the Buddha, the Dharma, the Sangha), seeing the Buddha as their protector and teacher, and following his teachings. It is essential that we, who consider ourselves Buddhists, know what Buddhadharma encompasses. It would be quite pitiful if, when we are asked what Buddhadharma is, we hesitate in giving an answer. Several years ago at one of the Easter courses, I recall that when Vanessa's younger sister was present and showing interest, I told her to take the question 'What is Buddhadharma?' to her discussion session. When she posed that question, no-one seemed to be able to give a succinct and good answer to it.

It is particularly important that those who present Buddhism to newer students respond to questions with succinct answers that encompass the essential points. As I regularly share with those who present the classes for beginners, you need to prepare yourself not only for the presentation, but also be prepared to answer any questions that are asked.

When classes are advertised as an introduction to Buddhism, people will inevitably ask such questions as 'What is Buddhadharma?' It would not be sufficient to answer, 'It is the practice of abandoning the ten non-virtues such as killing and so forth' because the morality of abandoning killing is common to other traditions as well, such as Christianity and so forth. So we cannot present the practice of abandoning negativities and adopting virtue as being unique to Buddhism.

2.2.2.3.4. Why it is appropriate to abandon negativity and practise virtue

2.2.2.3.4.2. It is appropriate to contemplate the cause of ignorance (cont.)

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with a query:

Query: How did one become confused?

Why is it that one is not taking the freedoms and endowments, which enable us to engage in the practice, to heart? Why are they not being utilised to engage in practice?

Something must be causing this confusion and inability to act. As the verse states:

*27cd. I do not know how I got so confused,
What is lurking inside of me?*

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

Answer: I also do not know due to which cause I got confused and thus deceived. What cause for confusion is lurking inside me? I think there definitely is something.

If one falls into laziness, then one should think in this way.

The hypothetical query at the beginning is presented as a way to really look into the main culprit that is causing one to not adopt the practices. As the commentary states, I also do not know due to which cause I got confused and thus deceived. What cause for confusion is lurking inside me? I think there definitely is something. Presenting this point in the form of a personal dialogue brings to light the fact that, although we see the value of observing morality, and engaging in the practices of listening, contemplating and meditating, and have the inclination to practice, there seems to be something that is preventing us from really embracing that practice on a continuous basis. So what is it that is preventing us from practising?

We need to take particular note that this presentation is suggesting that we undertake a personal investigation. The very words what cause for confusion is lurking inside me indicates that there is definitely something lurking within that is the cause of our procrastination and hesitation about practising. So, as suggested here, we need to take the measure of checking within to identify the main cause of the confusion that causes the hesitation, laziness and so forth. Then, as emphasised here, lest one falls into laziness and becomes complacent, one should be thinking in this way, again and again, about how there is something within that is causing such confusion.

Then the text presents the causes of that confusion.

2.2.3. Conscientiously abandoning the afflictions

This heading implies that having identified the afflictions, one needs to apply conscientiousness and joyful effort as a way to abandon the afflictions.

This section of the text has three subdivisions:

2.2.3.1. Contemplating the faults of the afflictions

2.2.3.2. How it is unsuitable to tire of the difficulty of abandoning the afflictions

2.2.3.3. Meditating on joy knowing that if one makes an effort it is possible to abandon the afflictions

2.2.3.1. CONTEMPLATING THE FAULTS OF THE AFFLICTIONS

This has three further subdivisions:

2.2.3.1.1. Contemplating how the afflictions harm oneself

2.2.3.1.2. How it is unsuitable to meditate on patience for the afflictions

2.2.3.1.3. Generating courage to destroy them

2.2.3.1.1. Contemplating how the afflictions harm oneself

This is subdivided into four:

2.2.3.1.1.1. They take away our freedom

2.2.3.1.1.2. They generate boundless suffering

2.2.3.1.1.3. They harm over an infinite amount of time

2.2.3.1.1.4. The reason why it is unsuitable to befriend the afflictions

Following the earlier presentation where the great master Shantideva entreated us to look into ourselves and really contemplate the sources of the confusion that cause all of the aforementioned faults - hesitation about practising, procrastination and so forth - when we genuinely and honestly look within we will be able to identify that it is the afflictions that are the main cause. So, as a way of overcoming them, we need to think about the disadvantages of these afflictions. Shantideva then presents four disadvantages.

2.2.3.1.1.1. They take away our freedom

Once we are dominated by the afflictions, they overpower us and we are completely under their control.

The verse that relates to this heading reads:

28. *The enemies of anger, craving and so forth
Do not have legs, arms and so forth,
They are neither brave nor wise,
How did they make me like their slave?*

We need to see this presentation as being related to our own circumstances, right now, and not just as some dry hypothetical presentation. While we are easily able to acknowledge the very good conditions that we enjoy now, we also need to identify what prevents us from fully utilising our potential, and taking full advantage of these conditions. It is not sufficient to look within once or twice, but rather we need to implement this in our regular daily practice, investigating our minds again and again.

The more we analyse our own state of mind, the clearer it becomes that the afflictions, or delusions, are the real cause of all our faults. It is not immediately apparent to us that anger, for example, is a cause of our faults and our mistakes. When it comes to attachment, it is even more difficult for us to recognise attachment as being a fault. Thus it requires careful analysis again and again, and careful attention to fully identifying and recognising these delusions such as anger, attachment and the like as being the real causes of all our problems. When we take initiative to really personalise this investigation in our contemplations, then that, in itself, becomes a very worthwhile and productive object of meditation.

Gyalsab Je's commentary on the verse reads:

My enemies of anger, craving and so forth, which are contained in the root and associated afflictions, do not have legs, arms or weapons in their hands and they are not very brave with great effort, nor are they wise with skilful means.

How did they take away my freedom and make me their slave?

In order to acknowledge the afflictions as being faults, we need to first identify them. To understand what the afflictions are, the Lam Rim presents them under these headings: identifying the delusions; the stages in which the delusions develop; the causes of delusions and the faults of the delusions. Some Lam Rim texts present the delusions under four headings and some under three, however, the main structure is essentially the same: identifying the delusions, understanding how they are developed, and knowing their causes and their faults.

Here, the identification of the delusions is presented in summary form. In order to abandon the afflictions, they definitely need to be identified. If one doesn't even recognise the afflictions for what they are, then there is no way that one can abandon them. For example, if one doesn't acknowledge anger as an affliction then there is no way one will take the initiative to abandon anger; it is the same with attachment and so forth. One will be able to recognise anger as a faulty state of mind when it is clearly identified as a delusion that is not based on reality, but on a faulty perception, and thus has no sound basis. Then the initiative to abandon this affliction can be strongly generated and one will make the effort to abandon anger. It is the same with the rest of the afflictions: first we need to clearly recognise and identify what they are, and then, based on the understanding that they are faulty states of mind, we then take the initiative to abandon them.

The text presents the afflictions identifying two of them, the enemies of anger, craving and so forth—which includes all other afflictions in summary form. As explained clearly in the text, the real enemies that hinder our wellbeing are the delusions or afflictions.

As indicated here, these delusions such as anger, craving and so forth are the real enemies, yet they do not have legs, arms or hold weapons in their hands. The comparison here is with an enemy that has form, such as a well built, muscular person protected by amour and carrying weapons and so forth. It would be difficult to face such a powerful enemy if we are comparatively smaller in size. However, these afflictions are not like that. As they are not form, they don't have legs, arms or weapons and so forth. Again we can take note of how, as explained in the teachings, it is seemingly easier to practise a bit of patience with a powerful figure because of our sheer incapacity to be able to combat or to fight them. So it is no wonder that we show a bit more tolerance toward someone who is more powerful! But practising patience with someone who is weak and meek and thus much easier to defeat, is much harder. So when one is able to practice patience with such weak beings, it is much more admirable.

Unlike a powerful external enemy, the delusions such as anger and craving and so forth are not equipped with any physical protection or intimidating size. Furthermore, it is not as if these delusions are also very brave with great effort, meaning that they are not very persistent. We need to also remind ourselves that one reason why the delusions are not very persistent is that they are aided by another delusion, called laziness. Furthermore, it is not as if these delusions are wise and have skilful means; in fact, they are not based on sound wisdom or intelligence of any sort. That is because they associate with yet another delusion, which is ignorance.

So if the afflictions do not have any of the aforementioned attributes then how did they take away my freedom and make me their slave? This is a significant point, implying, by means of a rhetorical question, that one is essentially enslaved by the afflictions. A powerful master can make his slaves do anything he commands, because the slaves are completely under his control. The slaves have to follow every wish or command of their master, who completely dominates them. Likewise, we are enslaved by our own afflictions. Why else would we do things that we know are not really wise or favourable to our wellbeing? Yet still we find ourselves following the commands of afflictions such as anger and craving and engage in actions that ultimately harms us.

This is a very significant point about why we continue to create negative actions, even though we understand that they are faults, and know the consequences are not favourable. There is no other reason than being dominated by the afflictions that overpower us. It is the same with the faults or misdeeds that others commit. When they see others committing murder or stealing and so forth, some people comment 'Why is there so much violence in the world? Why are people killing each other?' We need to understand that the reason they engage in the negative actions of killing and so forth is because they are completely dominated by the afflictions. When the afflictions compel them to engage in those actions it is as if they don't have any control over their own actions. Analysing things in this way enables us to understand the real motivator behind the negative actions others commit, and thus becoming more tolerant and compassionate towards them, rather than seeing them only as negative and evil. These are important points to keep in mind.

For as long as the delusions have complete control or dominance over us, we don't have much choice. But if we recognise the afflictions for what they are, then we have a chance of not being influenced by them. About two years ago, Maria's daughter, who was sitting in the very place where Maria is sitting right now, commented that having been introduced to the afflictions and their disadvantages, she came to a point in her meditation where she was able to recognise how those afflictions affected her. Even though this recognition did not prevent the afflictions from arising, she felt that recognising them had definitely helped her to become a little more wary, and helped to reduce their intensity. She said that she had been meditating for about a year and found it had been really helpful for her. She was making a really significant point, and had used a lot of intelligence and understanding to come to that conclusion.

In summary, we need to recognise the delusions for what they are. But if we don't do anything once we have recognised them, then the act of recognising afflictions would be quite pointless. As Shantideva has so very precisely presented here, we do have the potential, and we do have the ability to overcome the afflictions. So it is possible not only to identify the delusions, but to apply the antidotes and overcome them as well. Shantideva is giving us really profound advice: we have these great conditions of the freedoms and endowments, so it is definitely possible for us to overcome and abandon the afflictions.

2.2.3.1.1.2. They generate boundless suffering

Having briefly identified the afflictions, the next section presents their disadvantages.

As I have mentioned many, many times, these are very essential points to keep in mind, because this is a profound practice that can really protect your mind. When seeing others engaging in inappropriate deeds or saying inappropriate things, we need to be able to identify that it is the fault of the delusion, rather than a fault of the person per se. That will help to generate a sense of compassion for them rather than agitation and feelings of annoyance and anger. This is a really profound practice that we need to keep in mind. That recognition and understanding in relation to others can only come about when we have fully identified and recognised the delusions within ourselves, and understood how they actually dominate us so that we are then compelled to engage in negative deeds and actions, even though we don't want to. Then, based on our understanding of our own difficulties, we can recognise and apply that to others. It is really important to remember this if we want to maintain a good harmonious relationship with those around us. I have spoken about this many times in the past, and the point cannot be stressed enough.

The following points on the faults or disadvantages of the afflictions will encourage us to really try to overcome the afflictions, and apply the appropriate antidotes. Why should we want to do that? Because delusions generate boundless suffering and so forth.

The verse relating to this heading is:

29. *While they remain in my mind
They harm me joyfully.
Bearing this patiently without anger,
Is unsuitable and this patience is an object of criticism*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of the verse in this way:

To practise patience with regard to those that joyfully create the sufferings of the lower realms whilst they abide in my mind is unsuitable. This patience is an object of criticism and one should regard the afflictions as enemies and strive to abandon them.

Having identified and recognised the delusions or afflictions for what they are, it would be inappropriate to patiently and willingly allow them to remain within us, because not only do the delusions that lurk within us cause immense suffering, but they lead us to the extreme sufferings of the lower realms. Willingly being patient with these causes of immense suffering is not appropriate. As you would recall, not retaliating to the harms and sufferings inflicted by others is one of the classifications of patience. However, willingly enduring the dominance of the afflictions, rather than ensuring that one overcomes them, is inappropriate.

This patience is an object of criticism indicates that the buddhas and bodhisattvas would take a dim view of such patience, and not regard it as an appropriate type of patience. Being patient with anger would mean allowing anger to arise and infest our minds. Even from a worldly perspective we can all see that wrong deeds, such as killing and so forth, come from none other than the influence of delusions such as anger. Such misdeeds arise from being willingly submissive to anger and following its dictates. Just as we recognise this in others, it is exactly the same for ourselves. Being patient here means becoming submissive and allowing anger or attachment to arise and then following every command they give.

As the commentary explains, one should regard the afflictions as enemies and strive to abandon them. This means that as soon as an affliction arises, we need to immediately recognise it as harmful and, rather than willingly becoming submissive and patient with it, apply an antidote to overcome whatever affliction it is.

In order to do that, the commentary further explains:

One should work at understanding the definitions, divisions, causes and functions of the afflictions as they are explained in the Knowledge Treatises and mainly meditate on their disadvantages.

The author of the commentary, Gyaltsab Rinpoche, is explaining that one should know the afflictions in detail and mainly meditate on the disadvantages, which is the key point. For as long as we don't recognise or contemplate the disadvantages of the afflictions, then the need to overcome or abandon them will not arise. Therefore, contemplating the disadvantages of the afflictions again and again is, as explained here, a key point.

This relates back to that very intelligent and wise comment which I related earlier, about the fact that even just recognising the delusions definitely helped that student to become a little more wary, and helped to reduce their intensity. Recognising the afflictions for what they are definitely helps to minimise their intensity.

As presented in the teachings, the definition of an affliction is, that which causes discomfort and unease in our mind as soon as it is developed. We know this from our own experience; we can see that the moment certain kinds of afflictions are generated, we immediately feel weighed down, uncomfortable and unsettled. The fact that there is this discomfort is the sign that it is an affliction.

There are many people who make comments about how they sometimes, without any apparent reason, feel unsettled, unhappy, or disturbed. If we contemplate the real cause of that, it will be understood that is because of the delusions being prevalent in the mind.

As presented earlier in the commentary, there are six root delusions and twenty associate or secondary delusions.

The Lam Rim teachings present six causes of the delusions.

1. Basis: This means having the very seed or imprint of the delusions within one's mental continuum.

2. Object: It is very easy to understand that one develops attachment to an attractive object, and aversion or anger towards an unattractive object.

3. Social context: This refers to the people with whom you associate, where conversations with them can cause delusions such as attachment, anger and so forth to arise.

4. Faulty narration: This refers to faulty treatises and so forth that cause delusions to arise. For example, there are treatises that define sexual positions and so forth, which would cause attachment to arise and manifest themselves within one's mind. Likewise, friends might talk about things that can cause various delusions to arise.

5. Habituation: The more one is familiar with a particular delusion, the more likely it is that the delusion will be generated—and we can be affiliated with certain delusions from a very young age. We see people who are intolerant with the most insignificant and minute things, such as feeling strong attachment when they see an attractive object, or feeling angry and great disappointment when things don't go their way, or feeling despondent and so forth. These are delusions that manifest easily due to long-time habituation.

So we need to use our situation now to try to minimise our familiarity with the delusions as much as possible by applying the appropriate antidotes. If we continuously allow ourselves to become more and more familiar with delusions, then that will be the cause for the delusions to become more dominant and increase even more. Therefore we need to utilise our conditions to de-familiarise ourselves with the delusions.

6. Inappropriate attention: This refers to paying attention to the objects that cause the delusions to arise. We might see something that looks very attractive. If it is a mere glance and we pay no further attention then it may not cause much attachment to arise, however if we pay further attention to the details of that attractive object, then the more attention we pay to the colour, shape and so forth, the more the attachment will increase. If we take the example of a man being attracted to a woman, then the more the man thinks about her attractive figure, the smoothness of her hair, the complexion of her skin and so forth, the more his attachment will increase, to the point where he is obsessed. Likewise with anger, when one thinks about someone who has inflicted harm upon us, the more we pay attention to what they did; and thinking how they have harmed me in the past, 'They used this kind of measure to harm me', 'They harmed me just the other day, and they will harm me again in the future'. So in this way the more we pay attention, thinking again and again about how they harm us, the more reasons we find to become angry with them, to the point where anger becomes intense like a burning fire in one's heart. Many of you would have had the experience of paying attention to past memories of particular incidents and so forth, resulting in feeling sad or angry, despondent and so forth. These, in brief, are the six causes of delusions.

This explanation here is in accordance to the knowledge treatises, the Abhidharma in which three primary causes for delusions to arise are presented. I have explained this to you several times in the past, and they are very significant points to keep in mind. As presented in the Abhidharma, when 1) the delusions are not been abandoned, and 2) one is in close proximity with the objects of delusion, and 3) one applies incorrect attention to those objects, then the causes for the delusions to arise are all intact.

As presented here, for an ordinary being whose afflictions have not been abandoned, even if the delusions are always dormant, even though they are not manifest at present. Thus, the delusions manifest immediately as a result of not having abandoned the delusions, when one is in close proximity to an object that causes delusions to arise coupled with the incorrect attention that one applies whilst perceiving that object. The incorrect or improper attention is a faulty state of mind which taints one's perception to exaggerate the qualities or faults of the objects. So, just recognising a delusion as a fault will help to prevent incorrect attention from overpowering one's perceptions when perceiving any object.

The functions of the afflictions will be presented later on in the text. As I have mentioned previously, it is good for you to be able to identify and understand the six root delusions which are attachment, anger, ignorance, pride, and deluded doubt and wrong views. Wrong views can have a fivefold and a ten-fold classification. Basically there are five wrong views and this becomes ten if you include the five non-views.

The reason the term 'wrong views' is used is that there can also be correct views, such as the view of realising emptiness. Likewise, not all doubts are necessarily afflicted or deluded. There can be some virtuous doubts, so to be included as one of the six root delusions, the doubt must be a deluded or an afflicted doubt. The associated afflictions are belligerence, resentment, concealment, spite and so forth.

As presented in some of the texts I have come across—although not many mention it—the distinction between the root delusions and the associated delusions is that root delusions are generated in many different ways with many different objects whereas secondary delusions are more targeted at specific objects. The associated delusions are described as being closely related to either of the six root delusions¹. When we understand that associate delusions are closely related to one of the six root delusions, we can see how they stem from one of the main root delusions.

It would be good to have a list the six root delusions and the secondary delusions along with the six causes, as such a list is good for those who are not familiar with them. The delusions are clearly explained in the Lam Rim texts and it also good to go to other sources and become more familiar with their explanations.

© Tara Institute

¹ Translator's note: Proximate delusions might be an appropriate term.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

15 April 2014

Based on the motivation we have generated we can now engage in meditation practice.

[Meditation]

For receiving the teachings, we can generate our motivation along these lines: in order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for this purpose I will listen to this Mahayana teaching, and by studying and understanding it, I will put it into practice well.

2.2.3.1.1.2. They generate boundless suffering (cont.)

The two verses under this heading read as follows:

30. *Even if all the gods and demi gods
Arise against me as enemy,
They are not able to guide me into
The fire without respite.*
31. *This enemy of the powerful afflictions
Throws me in an instant into Where even the ashes of Mount Meru
Do not remain upon contact.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains these verses.

Even if all the gods and demi gods arise as my enemies, if I do not fall under the control of the mental afflictions, then they are not able to guide and place me into the fire without respite.

But this powerful enemy of the afflictions in my continuum throws me in an instant into the fire without respite, where even the ashes of Mount Meru do not remain upon contact.

Therefore one should strive to destroy the enemy of the afflictions.

The verses explain that the afflictions which are within oneself are extremely powerful, more so than any kind of external enemy or entity. Powerful enemies could include gods, such as Brahma, who is said to be extremely powerful in terms of might and ability; also demigods and their retinues who have extremely powerful means to engage in combat. Even within humans, there are certain individuals known to be very brave and skilled in combat. There are stories of how one human being was capable of killing thousands of people. So there are definitely powerful humans who could be our enemies.

What is being explained here is that even if all of these powerful enemies: gods, demigods and powerful humans, were all combined together and simultaneously rose up as one's enemy, they cannot place one in the hot hell realms, such as the fire without respite. It is, of course a given that if from one's own side one does not allow the afflictions to overpower oneself, then all those powerful external enemies cannot place us in the hell realms from their side.

Note here that if someone were to kill another living being, then just through the act of taking the other's life they are not placing them in the lower realms. Rather through the negative act of killing, they are creating the karma to go to lower realms themselves.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on the next verse begins with, But this powerful enemy of the afflictions in my continuum.

The main point one needs to reflect upon here is that the powerful enemy of the afflictions are within one's own mental continuum and it is none other than these internal afflictions that lead one to the lower realms. The main instruction here is that the afflictions are not random categories of phenomena that lie outside of oneself. If one thinks 'Yes there is anger, there is attachment, there are delusions' - relating to them as a mere categorical list, then that doesn't help one to identify the delusions within oneself. Even if one is able to list many afflictions and describe them in detail, if one doesn't recognise the afflictions within oneself, one will not be able to take any initiative to overcome them. The emphasis here is that one must look within one's own mental continuum to identify the delusions within oneself, so that one can take the initiative to overcome them.

As mentioned previously, the first step to overcoming the delusions is to identify them, and then to contemplate the causes and the disadvantages etc. As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains, it is these afflictions within one's mental continuum that throw me in an instant into the fire without respite, which is the hot hell realms. Even Mount Meru, the most grandiose of mountains, will be rendered to ashes upon mere contact with the intensity of the heat in the fire without respite. Thus the consequences of being born in such a place of unimaginable suffering is the result of the afflictions. Here, Gyaltsab Je highlights that one must destroy the enemy of the afflictions.

To take on board what is being explained here, it is by engaging in personal reflection to identify the afflictions or delusions within oneself, recognising their causes and particularly their faults, that one can slowly and gradually take the initiative to overcome them. Even the process of identifying them is a gradual process—the afflictions are not something that we are able to recognise right away.

Of course it is easier to recognise delusions in others! It is easy to identify the faults of someone else's anger, attachment and so forth. However, when it comes to one's own faults of anger and so forth, we always have good excuses thinking, 'I am OK, there is no problem.' If we are not able to identify the anger within oneself, then that is a real problem. Even if one recognises it, but rationalises it, and thinks that there is no problem, then that will prolong the process of taking the initiative to abandon it. So one really needs to take to heart the need to recognise the shortcomings of the afflictions within oneself, and that one's own anger and attachment etc. have been the cause of all of then one's problems.

I am not referring to those of you who don't have any delusions. But for those who are able to identify the delusions within yourself, then you need to take careful consideration in recognising how the delusions affect your wellbeing. Harboursing the delusions in one's mind causes turmoil and an unsubdued mind.

The very function of a delusion is to make one's mind unsettled and troubled. Therefore if one aspires to achieve a subdued mind, one definitely needs to take the initiative to recognise and really acknowledge the afflictions within oneself, then one can gradually take the initiative to overcome them. We need to take a gradual approach, the afflictions are not something which can be abandoned quickly. Even the study and understanding of them takes time and needs to be a gradual process. We need to ensure that the study and understanding of Dharma becomes integrated with our mind-set, slowly but steadily transforming our minds.

When studying texts which identify the delusions, the main point is not to treat it as a mere list that one goes over, as if they are not related to oneself. Rather we need to use these explanations as way to identify the delusions within oneself. Having identified and clearly seen the faults of the delusions, one can then take the initiative to slowly abandon them. As Dharma practitioners we need to ensure that whatever we do becomes the means to subdue the mind and overcome the delusions. The great Kadampa master Geshe Potawa said that regardless of whether one is engaged in the Dharma or worldly activities, if the activity becomes an antidote for overcoming the delusions, then it has served its purpose well. This is the kind of advice that the great Kadampa masters give; not many words but really to the point.

If one does not ensure that our so-called Dharma practice is an antidote for overcoming delusions, then the very aspect of the Dharma practice can become a worldly concern. This is because one has not protected one's practice to ensure that it overcomes delusions.

The Lam Rim teachings explain that the way to measure one's progress in studying and practising the Dharma is that if one's practices actually help one to gain more and more confidence, and more faith, and one's mind gradually becomes more subdued, then one can feel confident that one's practice is working (whatever form it may take). However if we find that certain practices or study are making one more and more agitated, more and more deluded, and one is losing one's faith in the Dharma, then that is a sign that it is not making a positive effect within oneself.

In relation to developing love and compassion, particularly in the section of how to develop the superior intention, the Great Lam Rim text explains that meditating just once in a while is not sufficient to develop this mind. Rather one must meditate on love and compassion again and again for the superior intention to develop in one's mind. Quoting from another text the Lam Rim uses an analogy to illustrate this point—it would be like attempting to sweeten a big sour tree with just a few drops of a sweetener. If one wishes to transform a sour tree into a sweet one, one needs to put many, many drops of a sweet substance over a long period of time. Then eventually it is possible for a sour tree to actually become sweet. His Holiness the Dalai Lama uses this analogy in his teachings regularly. The delusions within our mind are like a sour taste which is hard to transform into a sweet taste. If one meditates on love and compassion just once in a while we cannot expect to transform the afflictions in our mind and develop superior intention; we cannot expect a positive outcome from just a few attempts. Rather we need to make a consistent effort in identifying the delusions, seeing their disadvantages, and applying the antidote, whereby we will gradually overcome the delusions within oneself.

It will be good for you to refer to that quotation by reading the section in the Lam Rim that explains how to develop the superior intention. These are important points for us to reflect upon and as way to improve our practice.

We need to consider the fact that we are not deprived of the means—we do know how to engage in Dharma practices. What we need to keep in mind, is that if we leave aside certain practices that we already know how to engage in now, and try to adopt other practices that may well be beyond our reach, then that would be completely missing the mark. It is far more productive to actually implement the practices that we are familiar with now. Lama Tsong Khapa mentions that we do not have the fault of not knowing the practices, but rather we might be incurring the fault of not implementing the practices that we do know. The point is that we need to take the initiative to actually apply the practices with which we are already familiar. Then a gradual but true transformation takes place.

To summarise Shantideva's main points, what he is advising us in simple terms is this:

The trouble maker for all your problems is not something which lies outside, but rather within yourself which are called the afflictions. When you recognise them within yourself, you can then take measures to apply the antidote and abandon them. So, you need to apply effort in doing just that.

If one really uses one's study and practice as a means to combat the real troublemaker within oneself by taking that initiative at the very outset, that motivation can make a tremendous difference in our approach to the study or practice of the Dharma. I am not implying that I have gained great insight or developed realisation from my attempts, but what I can assure you is that I have definitely had a proper motivation from the very outset. Early on when I was studying in the monastery, studying the texts and engaging in the debates, my intention was always, 'When I finish my studies, I definitely want to put what I have learnt into practice by spending time in meditation and doing retreats'. This was definitely my intention. That has not become a reality because I have come to a foreign country to teach instead, so I have not had the opportunities to do long-term retreats. However because the studies were done with that intention, I can definitely say that they have had a positive effect on my mind. What I am sharing here is that if from the very outset one has the proper motivation for doing the studies and practice, then to that extent there will definitely be a positive effect.

2.2.3.1.1.3. They harm over an infinite amount of time

The afflictions are unlike external enemies, which no matter how powerful and mighty they might be, will eventually disintegrate of their own accord, even without us taking many measures to try to vanquish them. Over time that is what will occur. However with the internal enemy, by leaving delusions as they are they will not just disintegrate by themselves. Even after a long period of time they remain intact. If we don't take any measures to apply the antidotes and just leave them as they are, they can become even more powerful rather than disintegrating.

This point is explained in the following verse:

32. *No other enemy has
Such long term ability
Like the enemy of my afflictions,
With extensive time, without beginning or end.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of the verse:

Another drawback of the afflictions to contemplate:

No other worldly enemy has such an ability to live for a long time like the enemy of my afflictions, who abide for extensive time, without beginning or end.

Since meditating on the antidote to the afflictions only for one session at a time does not do anything, one should strive to have an uninterrupted stream of effort in destroying the afflictions.

As the commentary clearly explains here, no other worldly enemy has such an ability to live for a long time like the enemy of my afflictions, who abides for extensive time without beginning or end. Unlike the external enemy which won't live for long, the inner enemy of afflictions abides much longer and harms one to greater extent. The external enemy can give us a certain amount of harm periodically, but because it cannot take us to the lower realms it cannot give us extensive sufferings. However the internal enemy of afflictions is the one that can lead us to the most extreme sort of sufferings.

Following that is, Since meditating on the antidote to the afflictions only for one session at the time, does not do anything, one should strive to have an uninterrupted stream of effort in destroying the afflictions. In relation to the earlier analogy, a big sour tree cannot be expected to become sweet by pouring just one drop of sweetener a few times. But if one were to constantly apply sweeteners then there is a possibility to transform it into a sweet tree. Similarly with the afflictions within oneself: we cannot expect to subdue them by meditating on the antidote just once, or periodically, rather we need to constantly apply vigilance over one's state of mind and apply the antidote whenever the afflictions arise. It should not be as if one aims to go out and have a good time outside, and doing one or two meditation sessions when one feels like it. Otherwise one could spend all the time just going around and having a good time. That sort of attitude will not overcome the delusions.

The analogy also shows that one should strive to have an uninterrupted stream. The Tibetan word actually refers to a stream of water. In the same way as a small stream of water can be consistent and run for a long period of time, our practice should be like that. Even though we might not be able to apply great measures of practice right away, whatever practice we can apply with uninterrupted effort, continuously will have an effect. Where we have a burst of energy and get excited about a certain practice, that is something which we need to be a wary of because it may not last too long and might actually cause discouragement afterwards.

2.2.3.1.1.4. The reason why it is unsuitable to befriend the afflictions

This heading explains that one may attempt to befriend external enemies by being kind to them or generous to them, and with this it is possible that they will start to become friendly to us. However with the internal enemy of afflictions, one cannot expect that by befriending the delusions they will not harm us; the more we befriend the delusions, the more powerful they become in harming us. This is explained in the next verse and commentary.

33. *When agreeably and respectfully relied upon
Then everybody acts beneficial and causes happiness,
But if one relies on the afflictions
They will retaliate and cause harm.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning:

When one relies on the outer enemy after having honoured them agreeably by serving them food, drink and so forth, then they will benefit us and help us to have happiness.

But if we rely on the enemy of the afflictions and act agreeably to them, then they will increase in strength, retaliate and cause us harm. To destroy them is the only method to attain happiness.

I have summarised this earlier, but to reflect again upon the main point. If you relate to an individual external enemy kindly, followed by giving gifts, food and so forth then it is possible that someone who was once disagreeable to one, or who considered you an enemy, can turn around and actually become a friend. With an external enemy, if we keep our distance and show an attitude of antagonism then that will only cause the rift to become bigger and the dislike greater. Then there is no possibility of befriending them. It is a very significant point that if we don't want enemies we should take the initiative ourselves. The great beings will act in ways that show gratitude and repay harm with kindness, whereas ordinary worldly beings will return harm for harm. Returning kindness for harm inflicted upon oneself is an act of a great being who takes the initiative to engage in this way.

Unlike the external enemy, if one acts kindly to the internal enemy of afflictions, as though they are our masters. By saying 'yes' to whatever the delusion wants, bowing down and not doing anything to confront them or combat them from within oneself, they will increase in strength, retaliate and cause us harm. You will notice through your own experience that certain delusions or afflictions act like adding fuel. If we harbour them and keep contemplating on them, the stronger they become. So if you find yourself in a situation now where the delusions are occurring like a stream of water, continuously affecting you one after another, then that is because we have not applied the antidotes previously and we are not making any attempts to apply them now. If we make an attempt to apply the antidote to whatever extent we are able, during the time we apply it, the delusions will actually stop. In this way one can see that it is possible to begin to overcome an otherwise continuous stream of delusions. If we don't apply the antidotes then the afflictions won't subside naturally by themselves. If destroying the delusions within oneself is the only method to experience genuine happiness and wellbeing, then we have no choice but to apply the antidotes.

2.2.3.1.2. How it is unsuitable to meditate on patience for the afflictions

This has two sub-headings

2.2.3.1.2.1. Contemplating how they harm the mind

2.2.3.1.2.2. Contemplating how they harm the body

2.2.3.1.2.1. Contemplating how they harm the mind

The root text states:

34. *Therefore, if this continual long time enemy,
The singular cause for the increase of the accumulation of harm,
Takes up permanent residence in my heart,
How can cyclic existence be fearless and joyful*

The commentary on this verse reads as follows:

Therefore, if this continual long time enemy, who is the singular unrivalled cause for the strong increase of the accumulation of all harm, takes up permanent residence in my heart, then how can cyclic existence be fearless and joyful?

Since there is no chance for happiness, strive in destroying the afflictions.

Gyalsab Je's commentary states that if this continual long-term enemy (the afflictions), identified here as the singular unrivalled cause for the strong increase of the accumulation of all harm, takes up permanent residence in my heart (meaning that if we don't do anything to overcome the afflictions and therefore maintain them in our heart), then while we abide in cyclic existence, how can we be fearless and how can we be joyful? We need to take this as real personal advice on how to overcome the causes for our own unhappiness. What is being explained here is that the real cause for one's unhappiness, whatever the situation, are the afflictions within one's own mind. So regardless of the external situation, the actual causes of mental agony lie within oneself. If we fail to identify this and constantly try look outside for external causes and so forth, we are completely missing the point.

Harbouring the enemy within, and looking for solutions outside to overcome them will not bring real joy and fearlessness to one's life. Again, one needs to reflect that if we make a genuine attempt to slowly identify the real enemy (the afflictions within) and make genuine attempt to gradually apply the antidote and overcome them, then it is possible for one to gradually experience a real sense of joy regardless of external situations. Wherever one goes, one will be able to maintain some inner sense of tranquillity within one's mind which can definitely have a positive effect upon one's physical body. There are clear signs that a joyful and happy mind can contribute to good health. Take this into considerations for your own benefit.

Practical measures that assist one to develop the inclination to overcome the delusions really rely upon identifying the negative effects the delusions have within oneself. One can reflect upon one's own state of being and ask oneself, 'Would I want to be in a very angry state, or would I rather be free of anger? Would I like to be feeling completely attached, and upset with attachment or would I rather be in a state free from the pangs of attachment?' Likewise with jealousy, would you like to harbour jealousy in your mind, or would you rather be appeased and not have jealousy? Likewise with pride and so forth. By having an internal dialogue with oneself, and clearly and honestly answering that one would rather be free of these negative states of mind (the afflictions), then knowing there is a means to overcome them, one needs to apply the antidotes.

Equally and naturally we would all like to have mental and physical happiness. There might be other measures presented by other traditions, or even worldly means to gain some happiness, but these may or may not contribute to genuine happiness.

We are in the category of people who look internally to attempt to resolve afflictions to develop genuine mental and physical happiness. To recap, to do this one must identify the causes for mental agony and physical suffering which are the result of afflictions. As we can consider ourselves as beings who look internally to deal with our internal world, we might as well actually make that attempt now and put this understanding into practice. This is how to take this explanation as personal instruction.

We can assume that you coming here is a rare opportunity and you can take pride in yourself for coming here. In a normal worldly situation, after work people might say, 'I have gone to work. I have been busy all day so I am tired now, and I'd just like to lie down and relax and take it easy'. So while many of you have gone to work during the day, and are busy and tired, you have still taken the initiative to come to a teaching here and listened to it. So having sacrificed relaxation time at home don't feel that it is a waste of time. Making an attempt here will definitely have a positive effect and will help overcome hardships and difficulties. On a practical level, if you were to stay home, you may not really have a full opportunity to relax and have a good time anyway. You might get into an argument with your partner, or be annoyed by the children, and not have a very relaxed time at home. So you might as well come here to have a genuine relaxing time.

Some have confided in me that even before they leave work, they already feel anxious about what they have to face at home. Some lament saying, 'I have a headache when I think of what I have to do when I get back home.' I tell them, not to worry about the next job before finishing the first one. This is giving oneself extra worries and agony. Some seem to see going home to cook, and do the washing up, and take care of the children as an extra burden. If one thinks about these as a chore then it does present itself in that way, so try to have a proper attitude. It often seems that causes for conflict and argument are based on who is trying to do what in the household. Indeed the outside work may seem harder and more difficult in comparison to someone who is staying home, but I would think that the work involved with staying at home and cleaning up, looking after children etc. is not easy work either. It is very important to look after the wellbeing of children. For example someone that I know has a family of three children, and the mum said 'If I have another child I might go crazy' and she related how difficult it was to care for the young one's. I can relate to that.

Again, I acknowledge you coming here to the teachings. I definitely admire it and am happy about it and appreciate that you take the initiative and sacrifice some time to do the study. While that is incredible and such a fortunate occasion for you, what I am attempting to add on to what you learn here, is to encourage you to try to implement it in your life. Try to put the teachings into practice a bit and that will be really worthwhile and beneficial for you. Even though I am not able to practise extensively, as I mentioned earlier, I do feel there is definitely great benefit to be achieved as a result of practice.

In the material you have already studied, for example the previous text Precious Garland by Nagarjuna, recall how precise and practical the advice was; one verse after another on how to engage in practice. We went through the extensive explanations according to that text: first of all what causes us to achieve high status, then how to achieve the definite goodness. Prior to that was Aryadeva's 400 Verses text which explained the path based on the conventional truth as well the ultimate truth, again these were presented very precisely. We have studied these, we have all heard them and we have created a very, very positive imprint in our mind by going through these texts.

Prior to that we studied Chandrakirti's Madhyamakavatara, where again explanations of the five paths and ten grounds were very clearly presented.

Having the opportunity to study these texts and reflect upon them is a great fortune. We need to acknowledge that, then and now, as we can still derive benefit from these teachings every time we rejoice, and dedicate the merits of the attempts we have made, to the study and practice. Rejoicing helps to increase the virtue, then we can dedicate the virtue we derive, and benefit from that.

Before this was the teaching Liberation on the Palm of your Hand. You indicated that you didn't care how long it took and we actually spent about six years on it. With all this time spent, we were able to go into great detail on this Lam Rim teaching and actually many of you have been able to use it as a basis for presenting and teaching to others. This again is a significant point to recollect as a way to generate joy in one's mind, and to acknowledge the great fortune one has had to be able to study these texts. However one should also make prayers to be able to continuously meet with the conditions to study and practice these teachings, from life to life, in all one's future lifetimes.

Up until now we may all equally assume that we have not had much opportunity to accumulate much external wealth, however we have definitely spent time and energy acquiring some inner wealth. We have obtained something that is indestructible. No matter how much external wealth we might have accumulated, it is not something that we can take with us—not one single dollar can we take with us to our next life. However with the internal wealth of the studies and the practices, and good positive imprints in our mind is something that we can all confidently take with us to our future life. In making a choice between external wealth and internal wealth, we have made the choice to spend more time and energy acquiring internal wealth. So we have definitely made the right choice.

However, I have also regularly said that we do need external means. While we are making attempts to acquire internal wealth, we also need access to external wealth as for our survival, for ongoing, good conditions for our life. It is a reality that without adequate external conditions we will not be able to practise the Dharma.

I recall when I escaped from Tibet, on the route there were certain occasions where we passed some really beautiful areas, like beautiful valleys. When you looked up there were mountainous regions and I could even detect that there might be a cave up there. On a few occasions I definitely thought, 'Oh how nice if I could just go up to the cave and stay there to meditate. Wouldn't that be wonderful?' And even though there was a strong intention to want to do that, immediately the next thought was 'Who would feed me?' 'How would I get anything up there?' There were no villages around, and it was doubtful whether there would be any natural plants that I could eat. In the winter especially there is hardly anything growing in that remote area, up so high. So that was the practical aspect which prevented an otherwise noble thought of wanting to go into the little cave.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་ལ་འཇམ་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

6 May 2014

Based on the motivation that we generated during our recitation of the refuge and bodhicitta prayer, we can now engage in the meditation practice. If we ensure our mind is focused on the object of refuge with strong faith, and then generate bodhicitta in relation to all sentient beings, then these two elements will ensure that our practice, even if it is for only a few minutes, will be really meaningful. We need to keep that in mind while engaging in the practice.

[meditation]

As a motivation for receiving the teaching, we can strengthen the earlier bodhicitta motivation by generating this thought:

In order to benefit all sentient beings, to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching, and put it into practice well.

2.2.3.1.2. How it is unsuitable to meditate on patience for the afflictions

2.2.3.1.2.1. Contemplating how they harm the mind (cont.)

In the text we are up to the section that explains the faults of afflictions and so forth. Rather than treating it as some intellectual understanding, we need to really pay careful attention to these explanations and relate them to our own mental continuum. In this way we will ensure that what we understand from these teachings serves its purpose, which is to reduce the afflictions in one's own mind. Conversely, if our study of the teachings serves to increase afflictions, then it completely defeats the purpose of our study.

We need to pay careful attention to our state of mind, so that our study does not increase the afflictions in our mind, specifically the delusion of pride. If, having understood some points in the teachings, we start to feel pompous, thinking, 'Oh, now I have much better understanding and knowledge of the Dharma than others' and develop a puffed-up superior attitude, then our study has increased the delusion of pride.

Initially when we didn't have much understanding of the Dharma we might not have had much pride in relation to the teaching. But when we gain some understanding then a newly formed pride may arise. It is not that there was no pride to begin with, as the basis of pride is always there. Here we are referring to the pride in thinking, 'Now I have some understanding of the Dharma, I know it better than others'. That is a newly formed pride which comes about as a result of having studied the Dharma.

Likewise, one may not initially have much jealousy in relation to others who are studying the Dharma. In the beginning one didn't have much knowledge of the Dharma, but as one begins to study and gain some knowledge, then that is when a sense of jealousy may arise in relation to others who are also studying and trying to practise the Dharma. Likewise, a sense of competition may arise. This is the classic example of where the Dharma has been completely misused and turned into a poison. Now, of course that doesn't mean that the Dharma itself turns into poison, because the essence of Dharma can never turn into poison. But if the Dharma is completely misused, then it actually becomes a cause for afflictions to increase. In this case, rather than serving as medicine to subdue the mind the Dharma becomes a means to further escalate the poisons in the mind.

These are really important points we need to take into consideration so that whatever study, understanding and practice one has in the Dharma does not become a further means to strengthen the afflictions. That would defeat the whole purpose of studying and practising the Dharma, which would be a disgrace. In sharing this point with you I am not implying that I'm skilled in Dharma practice myself, however I really do feel that these are important points that we need to keep in mind. I share this with you out of a genuine concern for you and your Dharma practice, so that your attempts to study and understand the Dharma do not go astray, and that the Dharma actually fulfils its intended purpose.

It is when the Dharma nourishes the afflictions in the mind rather than benefiting the mind that followers of a tradition will start to squabble and come into conflict. That is a mark of real degeneration. It is not the fault of the Dharma or the religion, but it is the fault of those who follow the religion or the Dharma having not utilised the teachings to really subdue their minds. When that happens amongst the followers of any particular religion or tradition it becomes a disgrace to the religion itself.

It is really important that we relate the faults of the delusions to our own mind and not use them as a means to judge others. The faults of the delusions that are described in the teachings should relate to one's own state of mind. If one is not careful, situations such as those that have occurred in our very own study group can arise. Several times in the past people have brought to my attention that some students who were quite new to the study group had a sense that they were being looked down upon by those who had a little more understanding, and they felt that they were being put down. This problem has now subsided, but there may be occasions where it can happen again. So we need to be really mindful and careful that this doesn't occur.

The faults of the delusions are described in the teachings very meticulously, and the best way to validate this is by relating the teachings to the delusions that we find within ourselves. Seeing the faults of our own delusions is the best reference point to test the truth of the Dharma.

The great master Shantideva mentioned that we need to really protect ourselves against the attitude of jealousy towards those who are higher than oneself, against pride and contempt towards those who are lower than oneself, and competitiveness with those who are on the same level as oneself. When we think about it, these three attitudes are the cause of a lot of distress and turmoil in any society. As Shantideva mentioned, it is very hard to please worldly beings who are completely engrossed with these types of attitudes, for as long as they maintain these attitudes in their mind they will not be able to relate to the truth of the Dharma.

It is not sufficient to merely recognise the faults of the delusions, but rather, having recognised the faults, we need to apply the antidotes to overcome the delusions. That is what we really need to take on board. The process of identifying the delusions and seeing the faults of the delusions is something we need to do on a regular basis in our everyday life. Although we don't have the ability to recollect the faults of delusions that we have committed in previous lifetimes, we can, in our everyday life, do a thorough analysis of the delusions that are affecting us now on a daily basis. If our day begins with feeling unsettled and a particular delusion becomes manifest and prevalent, then we can notice how it affects the rest of the day. We might feel unsettled throughout the day and become prone to even more delusions manifesting in our mind. That is what occurs when we have not really paid attention to the delusions that lie within, and made genuine attempts to apply the antidotes. Whereas if we check our state of mind every morning, and ensure that it is not affected by any strong delusions, and if it is, then make genuine attempts to apply an antidote, then we will find the rest of the day will be quite fine, that there will be no big drama or upheaval taking place. Towards evening we can feel quite content and happy that we've had a good day, a day where we have not been completely overpowered and consumed by negative states of mind. That is how we can feel content and happy that we have had a worthwhile day. We can then rejoice and dedicate our good virtues and merits of the day.

As explained earlier, we need to combat the delusions by applying an antidote, making sure that we don't allow them to overpower us. We need to follow the examples of Kadampa masters such as Geshe Bayen Gun-gyal, who used to have dialogues with the delusions saying, 'If you become relaxed then I will be relaxed too, but if you start becoming powerful then I am going to use force to overcome you'. You will find these quotes in the Lam Rim teachings, and it would be good for you to refer to them. This is the sort of measures that earlier practitioners used as a way of combatting the delusions in their mind; applying the antidote the moment the delusions arise.

If we don't take the initiative to recognise the delusions and apply an antidote, then it is most likely that we will become completely overwhelmed and overpowered by the delusions as they arise. As beginners, even just recognising a delusion for what it is when it manifests will reduce its intensity and strong hold on our mind. It is to that extent that we gain the benefit of recognising the delusions within oneself. That is the measure of how we need to apply our practice on a daily basis. It will take some time before we actually get to the point of being able to apply an antidote to overcome the delusions completely. However we need to begin the process by gradually taking these steps in our everyday life.

The Lam Rim teachings, and indeed all the Buddha's teachings, explain that the purpose of overcoming the delusions and afflictions is to subdue our mind. So we need to ensure that we are taking that onboard, and that we are applying the teachings at a level within our capability. That is where we begin. If we leave that aside and start thinking that there are grander practices that we should be doing, then that is again missing the point. We need to begin with the basis and develop a strong foundation. I am sharing this as a way of reminding you of the essential point of the whole study and practice of the Dharma, so that it benefits you and that you don't miss the point.

There is no way to become a real practitioner without paying attention to death and impermanence. Through logic you will be able to find that this is true, because the focus of all the activities of a person who does not recollect death and impermanence will be merely on the benefits and affairs of this life. Thus they cannot become a true practitioner. Without recollecting death and impermanence, our activities will be those that are focused on staying in this world rather than moving on to the next. We need to be prepared for our inevitable onward journey, rather than thinking that we will remain here for ever.

The last line of verse 34 asks:

How can cyclic existence be fearless and joyful?

There are different interpretations of the meaning of this line. Gyaltsab Je's explanation implies that if one does not combat the afflictions in one's mind, then how could remaining in cyclic existence be fearless and joyful? Other commentaries explain that if one does not have a fear of cyclic existence then one may regard cyclic existence as being joyful. However, regarding cyclic existence as being joyful is completely contrary to how we need to regard cyclic existence. That joy arises because one lacks any fear of cyclic existence. That is a slightly more profound explanation.

2.2.3.1.2.2. Contemplating how they harm the body

The relevant verse is:

35. *If this guardian of the prison of cyclic existence,
Who becomes the executioner and torturer in hell,
Abides within the net of attachment in my mind,
Then how can I have happiness?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

These afflictions do not grant freedom from cyclic existence. Rather they become the guardians of the prison of cyclic existence and the hell realms. They also become the executioners killing in the upper and lower realms.

If these afflictions abide within the net of the mistaken conception, within the net of attachment in my mind, then how can one have a chance for happiness?

There is no chance for mental or physical happiness

These afflictions do not grant freedom from cyclic existence, this identifies the specific cause that imprisons us in cyclic existence, which is none other than the afflictions themselves. It is afflictions that prevent one from being free from cyclic existence. Further, the afflictions become the guardians of the prison of cyclic existence. That which guards us in cyclic existence and keeps us there is none other than the afflictions. Also the torturers in the hell realms that inflict the harms in the hell realms are none other than manifestations of one's own afflictions.

Furthermore they also become the executioners killing in the upper and lower realms. In hell realms, as you would have heard, after the body has been torn apart in every direction the body regenerates itself and has to experience the sufferings all over again, and if one faints one is revived and has to experience the sufferings again. The cause of that is none other the afflictions. Even in the upper realms such as the human realm, as we all know, there are many who take their own life, which is caused none other than the afflictions. As Shantideva mentions in another text, the afflictions in the mind, such as anger, can cause someone to take their own life. With this understanding we can understand the point about the afflictions being like executioners.

The main cause for all the sufferings that will be experienced, regardless of whether one is of higher status or lower status, is none other than the afflictions. What is being implied here in simple terms is that for as long as the afflictions are not abandoned no one is spared by them. The net of mistaken conceptions can apply, on a broader sense, to any kind of delusion that manifests itself in the mind, but more specifically it is applied to self-grasping. So the root of the delusions, grasping at a truly existent self, is the primary root of all our mistaken conceptions. Thus, held within the net of mistaken conceptions we are trapped in samsara. Here net is analogous to the net of a bird cage that prevents the bird from escaping.

How can one have a chance of happiness, implies that for as long as the afflictions abide in one's mind there is no chance at all for mental or physical happiness.

Mistaken conceptions also relates to the inappropriate attention that we place on objects when we perceive them. As I have already explained this in detail previously, we need not elaborate on it again here.

2.2.3.1.3. Generating courage to destroy them

Merely acknowledging the afflictions as being harmful, and seeing their faults is not sufficient. Just thinking about these faults could be overwhelming unless one also thinks about the possibility of overcoming them. Therefore this heading is saying that we need to develop the courage to destroy the delusions.

The verse relating to this outline reads:

36. *Thus, as long as I do not destroy this enemy directly
For that long I shall not give up striving here.
The very proud ones that become angry even due to small harm,
Sleep will elude them until they have destroyed it.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Since everything unwished for is generated by the afflictions, for as long as I have not definitely destroyed this terrifying enemy directly, it is appropriate that I shall not give up even for one moment striving in the antidote to the afflictions while I am here in this migration.

If the very proud worldly people get angry at even small harms such as harsh words, they will be very vengeful, sleep will elude them and they will not rest until they have destroyed their enemy.

Therefore it is appropriate to strive in destroying the enemy of the afflictions.

The commentary begins with since everything unwished for is generated by the afflictions, so we need to apply that understanding to any unwanted or unpleasant experience. These experiences don't occur randomly without any reason or without any causes. Rather, as stated here, every unwanted experience is caused by delusions.

For as long as I have not definitely destroyed this terrifying enemy directly implies that having understood that the cause of unwanted or unwished for experiences is generated by the afflictions will not be sufficient to overcome the manifest level of delusions. Rather, one needs to strive to overcome them from their very root. Here, directly has the connotation of from its very root. Thus what is being explained here is that until and unless one overcomes the afflictions from their very root, it is appropriate that I should not give up for one moment striving in the antidote to the afflictions while I am in this migration. What is being implied here is that one will not experience any real happiness until the afflictions have been completely uprooted.

The intent to not give up even for one moment striving in the antidote explains that having generated the antidote, one should not give up applying that antidote.

When the commentary mentions if the very proud worldly people get angry, it is referring more specifically to the mental factor of spite. Very proud worldly people can become very spiteful. As explained previously, spite is a specific state of anger that escalates to the point where you do not give up on the intention of harming the person who harms you. As stated here, even with small harms, such as harsh words, sleep will elude them and they will not rest until they have destroyed their enemy. Some individuals cannot rest until they have taken revenge on someone who has harmed them, either with actual words or by harbouring ill-will and thinking, 'I have to get back at them'. As mentioned here, they may not even be able to go to sleep until they have been able to take revenge. Some individuals are affected by such strong pride that they are not able to endure even small harms.

This example of very proud individuals who constantly think about how to get back at those who have inflicted even trivial harms is used to indicate how it is far more appropriate to strive to destroy the enemy of the afflictions, who harm us on a constant basis. For as long as we harbour the afflictions in our mind, they constantly harm us and affect us in a negative way. It is far more appropriate and worthwhile to apply the antidote for overcoming the delusions at all times, rather than wasting time trying to take revenge on external enemies. Therefore, day and night, we should be concerned with applying the antidotes to overcome the afflictions.

2.2.3.2. HOW IT IS UNSUITABLE TO TIRE OF THE DIFFICULTY OF ABANDONING THE AFFLICTIONS

Having recognised the afflictions and seen the need to abandon them, one might become discouraged and give up striving to overcome them. This section is explaining why one should not tire in this endeavour.

What is implied here is that abandoning the afflictions is not going to be an easy task. The delusions are powerful and they are very persistent in harming us. When we apply some antidote and reach a point where we may have some control over the delusions, they very sneakily arise in another guise. So the delusions find so many different ways to harm us. We are not dealing with an easy enemy here, so abandoning the afflictions will require farsighted endurance from our side. But we should not tire of the difficulty. As outlined in the heading this is exactly what the following verses encourage us to do.

This heading has three sub-divisions:

2.2.3.2.1. Donning the armour that will enable one to destroy the afflictions, it is unsuitable to tire of the difficulties

2.2.3.2.2. The benefits of striving to destroy the afflictions

2.2.3.2.3. It is appropriate to strive in the trainings that destroy the afflictions

2.2.3.2.1. Donning the armour that will enable one to destroy the afflictions, it is unsuitable to tire of the difficulties

There are two verses under this heading.

37 *The afflicted ones, who suffer anyway due to dying naturally,
At the height of battle, deeply wishing to destroy,
They disregard sufferings inflicted by weaponry, arrows and spears,
And will not retreat until their purpose is achieved.*

38 *What need is there to mention that they who strive
In destroying the natural enemy, which is the continual Cause for all suffering, strive without despondence or laziness,
Despite hundredfold sufferings.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation explains the meaning of the verse:

The afflicted ones, whose nature it is anyway to transform into the suffering of death, even without being killed, are the object of compassion.

When they are doing battle with the strong will to fight and to overcome the enemy, they will disregard the suffering inflicted by weapons such as arrows, spears and so forth, and will not retreat until their aim is achieved.

What need is there to mention that it is appropriate for me, who has taken up austerity, wishing to destroy the enemy of the afflictions, who has treated me as an enemy from the day of my birth, to not give up striving to destroy this enemy, and to not give in to despondency and laziness despite hundredfold sufferings such as cold, hunger and thirst.

As the commentary explains, the afflicted ones refers to the worldly enemies, who are afflicted by the delusions.

Because they are afflicted by the delusions they will naturally experience the consequences of their afflictions in the form of suffering, in particular the suffering of death. In other words, these external enemies, who are afflicted by the delusions, will naturally be vanquished by death, even without someone taking measures to destroy them. So, because they are afflicted by the delusions and will consequently experience the suffering of being completely destroyed by death, they are in fact an object of compassion.

When these afflicted worldly beings try to destroy others, they go into battle with a strong will to fight and to overcome the enemy. With the intention of overcoming their enemy, who will naturally be consumed by death anyway, they will have to experience the suffering inflicted by the enemy's weapons such as arrows, spears and so forth. Yet despite all of the harms inflicted on them by their sworn enemy, they are intent on fighting until the end, and will not retreat until their aim is achieved.

As the commentary explains, those intent on destroying external enemies generate great willpower and thus endure the harms inflicted on them. Despite all the harm inflicted on them, they still face the enemy with the intent of destroying them. That is the measure that worldly beings take. That being the case, the main point being emphasised here is, what need is there to mention that it is appropriate for me, who has taken up austerity, (i.e. one has willingly taken up austerity practices) wishing to destroy the enemy of the afflictions who has treated me as an enemy from the day of my birth. It is not as if the delusions became our enemy later in life, because from the very moment we were born the delusions were there to harm us. That being the case, we should not give up striving to destroy this enemy, and not give in to despondency and laziness despite hundredfold sufferings such as cold, hunger and thirst.

As explained here, based on having seen the faults of the delusions, and understanding how they have harmed us since we were born into this life, we need to develop the courage to not give up striving to destroy this enemy and not give in to despondency. This implies that there are some who, having made few attempts to overcome afflictions, resort to thinking, 'Oh, this is hopeless! I can't overcome the delusions'. Once one makes that decision one falls into despondency and laziness, and will no longer strive to apply the antidote. Lest one falls into despondency, we are urged that despite the sufferings of cold, hunger and thirst that will naturally accompany one's practices of austerity, one should not give up the intent to destroy the enemy of the afflictions.

As the outline presents, we need to don the armour of joyous effort to maintain our enthusiasm. Just as those who go into battle put on armour so that they are not harmed by their enemies' weapons, one needs to put on the armour of joyous effort in order to engage in austerity practices, and overcome the delusions. The Guru Yoga Puja also refers to donning the armour of joyous effort.

So the main point being emphasised here is that we need to apply joyous effort as a way of combatting the delusions.

2.2.3.2.2. The benefits of striving to destroy the afflictions

This is subdivided into three

2.2.3.2.2.1. Being the cause for one's welfare austerities are suitable to bear

2.2.3.2.2.2. Being the cause for other's welfare, austerities are suitable to bear

2.2.3.2.2.3. Why one needs to complete the earlier given promise

2.2.3.2.2.1. Being the cause for one's welfare austerities are suitable to bear

The verse from the root text reads:

39. *They sustain scars from the enemy for no purpose
And wear them on their body like ornaments.
If I strive stridently to achieve the great purpose
Why should sufferings be something that harms me?*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Worldly beings sustain scars for no purpose at all and wear them like ornaments, saying: 'this scar I got at such and such a time'.

As the commentary explains, worldly beings sustain scars for no purpose at all and wear them like ornaments. The scars received in a fight become something to show off to others as a mark of bravery. They take great pride in those scars, saying, 'I got these scars in my fight'. That is how some worldly beings view their scars.

That being the case:

Why would one then be harmed by the sufferings endured while striving stridently in the austerities? They are to achieve the great purpose of complete enlightenment!

Since they are only of benefit one should rely on them.

What is being implied here is that it is worthwhile to endure the hardships of austerity practices to overcome the afflictions, since these practices are a cause to achieve the great purpose of complete enlightenment. Since they are of only benefit for oneself and they cause no harm, one should definitely rely on these practices.

The main point being emphasised here is that when ordinary, worldly people take great pride in their scars and so forth for even small meaningless purposes, one, who has committed to overcome the afflictions, which serves the great purpose of achieving enlightenment, need not be overwhelmed by the difficulties and hardships that one may incur. That is because the hardships serve as the means to achieve a great purpose.

The main point is that it is definitely worthwhile to bear those austerities as a way to obtain one's ultimate welfare. The ultimate result is to achieve the excellence of one's own purpose, which is enlightenment. When one achieves enlightenment, then that fulfils the purpose of obtaining the excellence of one's own welfare.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

13 May 2014

Based on the motivation we have generated during the recitation of our Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in the meditation practice. [meditation]

You have just meditated on the Giving and Taking practice, and I am sure you have done it to the best of your ability. With the 'taking' you imagine taking in three types of phenomena from all sentient beings: all their sufferings; the causes of their sufferings, which are the afflictions and karma; and the imprints or latencies of those afflictions. In the 'giving' part of the practice, in return you imagine giving three of your most valuable objects: your body, your possessions and all your virtues of the three times. It is important to recollect these main points when you engage in the meditation practice and apply them to the best of your ability. That will make the practice really worthwhile.

2.2.3.2.2. The benefits of striving to destroy the afflictions

We have covered the first subdivision Being the Cause for One's Welfare Austerities Are Suitable to Bear. Now comes the second subdivision.

2.2.3.2.2.2. Being the cause for other's welfare, austerities are suitable to bear

The verse reads as below and is accompanied by examples in the root text:

40. *Fishers, butchers, farmers and the like
Are bearing cold, heat and such Solely with thoughts for their livelihood.
Why can one not bear this for the happiness of migrators?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Fishers, butchers, farmers and the like kill fish, do lowly work, work on the fields and so forth, and are bearing difficulties like cold or heat and such, all this solely with the thought of their livelihood.

If that is so, then why can one not bear similar sufferings to accomplish the happiness of all migrators? It would be appropriate to bear them.

The message from the commentary and the verse is quite easy to understand: if one is able to bear hardships to achieve trivial purposes in life, then why shouldn't one strive to bear some hardships to achieve the highest purpose for oneself?

Beings who exert a lot of effort and bear hardships for trivial purposes, like fishers and butchers who take the life of other beings merely to sustain themselves in this life, or farmers who toil year round in the cold, the rain, and in the heat of the sun, do this lowly work and bear difficulties solely to sustain themselves for this life. These examples show how some people have to put in so much time and effort, and endure so many hardships just to sustain their basic needs. When we see examples of this around us, we should be inspired not to complain about our lives and ready to bear some difficulties ourselves for our own welfare.

Individuals who expend effort and bear hardship to achieve their goals, even if they may be temporary ones, do achieve significant results. Of course, whenever one endeavours to achieve something, one should understand that there are always some necessary conditions that are required, as well as some obstructions that need to be overcome. As such, the method for achieving one's goals should encompass strategies for establishing the conducive conditions and eradicating any obstructions. This requires a significant amount of time and effort, and bearing hardships. So we can learn from others who expend energy and bear hardships to achieve their goals. In order to achieve the great purpose, one needs to make this resolve, if that is so, then why can one not bear similar sufferings to accomplish the happiness of all migrators? It would be appropriate to bear them. To accomplish the happiness of all migrators one needs to achieve the ultimate goal of enlightenment. That is the highest aspiration and goal for anyone who has taken bodhisattva vows. Since many of you have taken the bodhisattva vows and promised to work for the welfare of all sentient beings until achieving enlightenment, it is important for you to continue your practices and willingly bear whatever difficulties and hardships that may occur. The phrase it would be appropriate to bear them has the connotation in Tibetan of being patient with them; that means to be patient when facing hardships. So, in order to achieve the great purpose one needs to apply the patience of willingly enduring hardships. This is the resolve we need to make when engaging in Dharma practice.

Of course the advice here is mainly directed at the practices of a bodhisattva. While we aspire to do these practices, in reality we may not be able to apply our practices at a bodhisattva's level right now. However, the personal instruction here is to generate a strong aspiration to be able to practise like a bodhisattva. Bodhisattvas bear hardships with farsightedness, engaging in the practices over long periods of time, withstanding many adversities, and continue to practice whilst not giving up their bodhisattva vows or bodhicitta. This should inspire us to generate a strong veneration and genuine respect for them, along with an aspiration that we may also practise in a similar way.

The point here is that it is most fitting to bear sufferings by applying the patience of willingly enduring hardships. The definition of patience is not to allow one's mind to become disturbed in the face of adversities such as harm and sufferings. We should apply this understanding of willingly bearing hardships, because if one is not able to bear hardships and difficulties, it will affect one's mind negatively, and one will become distraught and overwhelmed. When there is agony in one's mind because of hardships, those feelings will then cause anger to arise. Anger is always preceded by a feeling of discomfort or agony, which one is not able to bear. The best way for our mind not to feel overwhelmed is by willingly accepting and bearing hardships, and to regard them as being worthwhile.

The ultimate result of having born hardships and difficulties on the path is to become an enlightened being. An enlightened being, such as Buddha Shakyamuni, is an individual being who has willingly born many hardships as a practitioner, and having completely traversed the path, finally achieved the state of enlightenment. If we aspire to become like Buddha Shakyamuni, how can we expect to succeed if we easily become distraught and willing give up our practices when faced with the slightest difficulty or hardship? We may not be able to practise on a bodhisattva's level right now, however we can definitely generate the aspiration to practise like a bodhisattva. Admiring the bodhisattva's deeds leaves very positive imprints on our mind, which helps to develop our capacity to practise just like a bodhisattva in the future. So, these are significant points to keep in mind.

2.2.3.2.3. Why one needs to complete the earlier given promise

The verse is preceded by a doubt:

Doubt: One has made the promise to destroy the afflictions in the continuum of others and it is unsuitable to strive in destroying the afflictions in one's own continuum, because one would fall into the extreme of peace.

To explain the hypothetical doubt: having made the promise to destroy the afflictions in the continuum of others, the doubt is that it would be unsuitable to strive in destroying the afflictions in one's own continuum because one would fall into the extreme of peace i.e. the peace of self-liberation or nirvana. The doubt is that if one works towards destroying the afflictions or the delusions in one's own mental continuum then once destroyed this would imply that one would reach the state of self-liberation, with the risk of abiding in a state of personal peace. This reminds me of a similar doubt raised some time ago by Vanessa. She said that as Mahayana practitioners "if we are striving to overcome our personal sufferings, wouldn't that contradict the Mahayana attitude that we should be developing?" These are significant doubts.

When you really think deeply about the meaning of the teachings, doubts will arise. This is significant because they arise as a result of contemplation and investigation of the topic. In relation to the earlier doubt, for someone merely seeking self-liberation the main object of abandonment is the afflictions, and the main purpose for abandoning them is to attain personal liberation. So when the afflictions have been abandoned they reach the state of self-liberation, a state where one abides in perpetual bliss. An arhat or foe destroyer is an individual who has abandoned the afflictions and has reached that blissful state and remains in a blissful state of meditative equipoise. That is what is being referred to here as the extreme of peace.

The corresponding verse and a half read:

41 *When one made the promise to liberate
Migrators equalling the expanse of space
From the afflictions,
Oneself was not free from afflictions.*

42ab *As one did not know one's abilities
How was it not crazy talk?*

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains the meaning:

Answer: At an earlier time when one generated the mind and made the promise to liberate all migrators equalling the expanse of space from their afflictions, if oneself is not free from afflictions, then not to mention the welfare of others, one cannot achieve even one's own welfare. Being under the control of the afflictions one does not know one's own measure. How is it not crazy to say that one will liberate others from their afflictions?

If one is bound by cyclic existence, one cannot complete the welfare of others and therefore one should strive to abandon the afflictions in one's continuum.

What is being explained is that since one has earlier generated the mind of bodhicitta and made the promise to liberate migrators equalling the expanse of space from their afflictions, then in order to fulfil this promise one must abandon one's own afflictions. Otherwise one cannot achieve the welfare of others.

The verse explains that being under the control of the afflictions one does not know one's own measure, or state of mind, so how can one liberate others from the afflictions. What is being presented here is that to claim that one would free all beings from their afflictions while doing nothing about abandoning one's own afflictions would be similar to a crazy person's approach. The commentary goes further: if one is bound by cyclic existence, one cannot complete the welfare of others and therefore one should strive to abandon the afflictions in one's continuum. The conclusion is that one definitely needs to strive to abandon afflictions.

This relates to the meaning of the outline Why One Needs to Complete the Earlier Given Promise, which is that in order to complete an earlier promise to work for the welfare of all sentient beings and ultimately free them from all afflictions and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, one needs to abandon the afflictions within one's own mental continuum. That is why the conclusion here states: one should strive to abandon the afflictions in one's continuum. This is similar to an analogy presented in the Lam Rim teachings of the father of a starving family who finds a piece of meat. He reasons that if he were to share the piece of meat with his family there will be little benefit for each of them. So he decides to eat it all himself in order to gain enough strength and energy to find sufficient food to feed the whole family.

The analogy illustrates the importance of first freeing oneself from the afflictions; otherwise there is no possibility to help free others from the afflictions. This is why one needs to achieve enlightenment and become a buddha oneself before one can lead others to buddhahood. When one practises developing bodhicitta, one first practises developing the aspiration to benefit others, and then based on that, one generates the aspiration to achieve enlightenment oneself in order to achieve that purpose.

This is how one trains one's mind and how the path is traversed; another key point to keep in mind.

2.2.3.2.3. It is appropriate to strive in the trainings that destroy the afflictions

An earlier verse explained that it is appropriate to abandon the delusions or afflictions. The verses below explain the appropriateness of striving in the trainings which destroy the afflictions.

This is subdivided into two:

2.2.3.2.3.1. Strive in the antidote to the afflictions

2.2.3.2.3.2. Strive to never let the mind fall under the control of the afflictions

These are really significant points to apply to our own practices. Striving in the antidote to the afflictions means to work towards developing the antidotes in one's mind to overcome the afflictions. The next point, striving to never fall under the control of the mental afflictions, means working towards control over one's mind, so that one does not fall under the dominance of the afflictions.

In our daily practice bring to mind the importance of applying the antidotes. Whatever antidotes one has not yet developed, one should strive to develop as a means to overcome the afflictions within oneself. And whatever antidotes one has already developed, one should ensure that one further strengthens them. Likewise with the afflictions: whatever afflictions one has not yet abandoned, strive to abandon them. And whatever afflictions one has successfully controlled or has reduced, ensure that one applies continual measures and diligence to keep those delusions at bay so that they don't arise strongly again.

It is similar with virtue: whatever virtues one has not yet developed, strive to develop them, and whatever virtues one has already generated, strengthen and further develop them. Try to bring these to mind as an aspiration: "May I be able to overcome the afflictions which I have not yet overcome and apply the measures to overcome them; and may I be able to develop the virtues that I have not yet developed and maintain the virtues I have already developed".

This becomes a really significant aspiration. When one applies this, the aspiration itself can bring solace and ease to the mind. It is good for us to relate to these seemingly simple practices which we may easily neglect, thinking we should be doing some grander practices. I feel that often our shortcoming is that we neglect practices within our own reach and try to aim for something higher or grander; we need to pay attention to this.

A key point from the outlines is that when an affliction arises in our mind, rather than just leaving it and doing nothing about it, we need to recognise that this only creates a condition for the affliction to increase in intensity. What we are being encouraged to do here is that as soon as an affliction arises, we need to immediately remember to apply an antidote to overcome it. Next, since the afflictions arise at any given moment, when they do arise, we should not allow ourselves to fall under their dominance or control. These are both things that we are able to do. We can take measures to apply antidotes and ensure that we are not under the complete control of the afflictions. These are reasonable practices that we can apply in our daily lives.

2.2.3.2.3.1. Strive in the antidote to the afflictions

The parts of the verse which relate to this are the second two lines of the earlier verse and the first two lines of the next verse.

*42cd Therefore I shall never reverse
From destroying the afflictions.*

*43ab One should hold onto it
And meet them in war with a vengeance.*

The last two lines of verse 43 will be explained later on.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Since they are suitable to be abandoned one should never reverse from the thought and action of abandoning them. One should hold onto the antidote and destroy the afflictions by meeting them in battle with a vengeance.

The commentary highlights that since they are suitable to be abandoned (having given reasons earlier) one should never reverse from the thought and action of abandoning them. One needs to be committed to never reversing from the thought and action of abandoning the afflictions. Having seen their faults and disadvantages, one needs to develop the determination never to reverse, never to waiver from the thought of abandoning the afflictions. The next line explains the extent to which one makes that commitment: one should hold onto the antidote and destroy the afflictions by meeting them in battle with a vengeance. 'Battle' here is used as an example to illustrate the forceful extent to which one needs to engage in the application of an antidote.

A second doubt is raised here:

Doubt: That which is to be abandoned and the antidote are attachment and anger, and revenge for that to be abandoned is an affliction, and therefore to be abandoned too.

The hypothetical doubt raised here is: isn't being attached to the antidote, generating anger and a vengeful attitude towards what has to be abandoned, i.e. the delusions, an affliction in itself? Doesn't that have to be abandoned too? In other words, attachment to the antidote and anger towards that which is to be abandoned would be an affliction in itself, so wouldn't that have to be abandoned as well?

The next two lines of the verse relate to this:

*43cd Afflictions with such an appearance
Are the destroyer of afflictions, nothing else.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Grasping on to the antidote and the vengeance to that which is to be abandoned, appear like afflictions but they actually belong to the side of the antidote that destroys the afflictions. Thus they are not contained in that to be abandoned.

What is being explained here is that grasping at an antidote and generating vengeance towards that which is to be abandoned may appear to be like afflictions, but actually they help to destroy the afflictions. Generating a vengeful attitude towards the afflictions (which are to be abandoned) is having thoughts such as, "I have recognised you, afflictions, to be the one that constantly harms me; I will definitely overcome you now. I will not rest until I have destroyed you". So when one targets the mind at overcoming the afflictions in such a way, that is the type of vengeance needed. As mentioned here, it belongs to the side of the antidote.

2.2.3.2.3.2. Strive to never let the mind fall under the control of the afflictions

The next verse is preceded by this query:

Query: Is it not better to follow the afflictions since to abandon the afflictions brings hundreds of sufferings with it?

These are exactly the kinds of doubts we have when being wary of applying the antidotes to the afflictions. We find that "it is so difficult to overcome these afflictions, so maybe it is better to just follow them". It is this kind of attitude which has kept us in samsara for so long, and which prevents us from making any genuine attempts to overcome the afflictions. A very significant doubt has been raised here.

The verse which relates to this reads as follows:

*44 Dying due to being burned,
Or even being decapitated is easy.
But one should never submit
To the enemy of the afflictions.*

The point to examine here is which is better: the difficulties and hardships in overcoming the afflictions, or waiting for the afflictions to completely control our mind so that we must experience their more serious consequences at a later time? This is the choice we need to make.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of the verse as follows:

Regardless of whether one dies by being burnt or whether one is decapitated, it is still easy, because at that time one is only separated from this life's body.

But one should never submit to the enemy of the afflictions that causes us to take birth in the great sufferings of the hell realms, and is an obstacle to attaining our wishes. We should never fall under their control.

The explanation: regardless of whether one dies by being burnt or whether one is decapitated, 'it is easy', implies that being burnt or consumed by fire or experiencing death from decapitation is merely a suffering one experiences from being separated from this life's body, and this will not in itself lead one to the lower realms e.g. the hell realms. These are regarded as easy in comparison to the great sufferings one would have to experience being under the influence of the afflictions. The commentary continues: but one should never submit to the afflictions that cause us to take birth in the great sufferings of the hell realms and is an obstacle to attaining our wishes. If one were to give power to the enemy (the afflictions), this is what causes one to take birth in the great sufferings of the hell realms and so forth, as well as being an obstacle to attaining our ultimate goal of enlightenment. The conclusion here is that one should never fall under the control of the afflictions.

2.2.3.3. MEDITATING ON JOY KNOWING THAT IF ONE MAKES AN EFFORT IT IS POSSIBLE TO ABANDON THE AFFLICTIONS

This heading presents the meaning of the next few verses, which is that one should generate joy in one's mind; one should not feel daunted by the difficulty of overcoming the afflictions but rather generate joy; and that if one makes an effort, it is definitely possible to abandon the afflictions which should cause some joy. This heading is subdivided into three:

2.2.3.3.1. Once the afflictions are expelled from one's continuum they have no other basis in which to abide

2.2.3.3.2. If one makes an effort they can be abandoned because they arise from a mistaken cause

2.2.3.3.3. If they are abandoned from the root, there is no other basis on which they can abide so they are suitable to abandon!

2.2.3.3.1. Once the afflictions are expelled from one's continuum they have no other basis on which to abide

This verse is preceded by another query:

Query: Afflictions are like worldly enemies in that, after having been expelled from one's place, they find again strength and harm again. So it is appropriate to follow them likewise.

The doubt here is that one may feel daunted in overcoming the afflictions if one perceives them as external enemies, because with external enemies, even if you overpower them for the time being and expel them from your area, they might congregate in another area, regain power and strength and again come back and cause you more harm. So if one uses an external enemy as an example for one's afflictions, one may have that doubt that "even if I were to overcome the afflictions now, they might reoccur later and affect me and harm me, so what is the point in trying to overcome them; I might as well just follow them".

The verse relating to this reads:

45 *When the ordinary enemy gets expelled from one place
They conquer another place and remain there.
Having regained strength they return.
The way of the enemy of the afflictions is not like that.*

The commentary provides an answer to the query:

Answer: It is not the same. When the ordinary enemy gets expelled from one place they conquer another place, regain their strength there and then return to take their revenge. The way of the enemy of the afflictions is not like that. Once they have been expelled from the root they cannot remain in another place and they cannot return.

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains, external worldly enemies and the afflictions do not have the same meaning. When an ordinary enemy gets expelled from one place, they conquer or reside in another place and regain their strength and return to take their revenge. That is what an external enemy is capable of doing. As explained further: the way of the enemy of the afflictions is not like that because once they have been expelled from the very root they cannot remain in another place and they cannot return to harm oneself.

If one makes an effort, afflictions can be abandoned because they arise from a mistaken cause. If the causes were based on a valid basis then one would not be able to abandon them because they would have a substantial base. But because the very causes of the afflictions are mistaken there is no sound basis for them and therefore one is able to abandon them. Understanding this gives one further encouragement to apply the antidotes to overcome the afflictions.

With the cause, we can again reflect upon the explanations in the Abhidharma which outlines three main conditions for afflictions to arise: When the afflictions have not been abandoned; when one is in close proximity to objects; and when concepts based on inappropriate attention is applied then all the conditions for the delusions to arise in one's mind are present. Inappropriate attention is in itself a mistaken consciousness which is one of the causes for afflictions to arise. It is precisely because inappropriate attention arises based on a mistaken consciousness that it can be eradicated, because a mistaken consciousness is not based on a valid basis.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

20 May 2014

The Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer that we have just recited will suffice as our motivation for engaging in our meditation practice. [meditation]

As mentioned many times in the past, prior to engaging in the Giving and Taking meditation practice one needs to first spend some time trying to cultivate a sense of love and compassion towards all beings who we visualise in front of ourselves. As a result of contemplating how beings lack true happiness, one develops a strong wish that they abide in happiness which is how one generates love for all beings. Then, by contemplating the various sufferings sentient beings are experiencing one generates the very strong wish that they be free from all those sufferings. That is where one generates the sense of compassion for all beings.

When one ensures that one has generated the mind of love and compassion for all beings, then to whatever degree one has developed these positive states of mind, to that extent the practice itself becomes really meaningful and fruitful. As a result of having spent some time focusing on these positive attitudes when we come out of the meditation practice we will be able to detect real transformation taking place in our minds. We will notice that the earlier chaotic and negative state of mind has been now replaced with a kinder and gentler state of mind which is a direct benefit of the practice. Generating love and compassion for other beings definitely has a positive effect on our mind, for when love and compassion is prevalent there is no room for any harmful intentions to arise. So, our mind will naturally be calmer and more peaceful because of the lack of harmful intent. It is important that we check whether our meditation practice is contributing to a positive change in our mind or not. It is not sufficient to merely focus on an object single-pointedly if it doesn't contribute to a positive change to one's mind.

As Lama Tsong Khapa said, one must abandon mere calm abiding and strive towards developing the union of calm abiding and special insight. This is a very significant point to bear in mind.

The main point here is that while we may have studied and have accumulated a great deal of knowledge, if we don't put that knowledge into practice it will not help to transform our mind. This point is emphasised at the end of this chapter.

2.2.3.3.2. If one makes an effort, they can be abandoned because they arise from a mistaken cause

The verse relating to this reads:

46. *The deluded afflictions are abandoned by the eye of wisdom
When cleared from the mind where will they go?
Where will they abide to gain strength and return?
The weak mind does not let me strive.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Once the afflictions have been abandoned from their root they have no other base. Since the afflictions arise from a faulty or mistaken root, one should strive to abandon them with the eye of wisdom that realises emptiness.

Once they are cleared, or what is called abandoned, from the mind, where will they go and find new strength to return and retaliate? It is impossible. Although it is like this, the weak mind does not let me strive to uproot them once and for all.

What is being explained here is that once the afflictions have been abandoned from the very root they will not return. When the manifest afflictions are overcome that does not mean that they will not return. So, the emphasis here is on abandoning the afflictions from their very root so that there is no other base on which they can abide. This also relates to the doubt raised earlier in the text, which says that once afflictions have been overcome wouldn't it be possible for them to return just like an enemy? If you vanquish an enemy temporarily they can regroup and return to harm one again in the future. So, this verse further clarifies the response to the earlier doubt.

When the commentary states, since the afflictions arise from a faulty or mistaken root, the root refers to the self-grasping ignorance that is a faulty state of mind. Some teachings relate this to the misconceptions that arise from inappropriate attention, as presented in the Abhidharma. However, the main root is the grasping at a truly existent self which is the basis for all misconceptions to arise. As explained in other texts as well, it is because of grasping at a truly existent self that all the afflictions manifest themselves.

With this understanding one can see how attachment actually arises from grasping at a truly existent self. It is because of this faulty state of mind which superimposes and causes objects to appear as being truly existent, and further grasps at them as being truly existent, that afflictions such as attachment manifest themselves. Even though self and other phenomena do not exist inherently, it is the misconception that perceives them as being truly existent and inherently existent that makes them appear in that way. So, it is this faulty and mistaken mind that has to be eliminated from its very root.

As mentioned in the commentary, one should start to abandon them with the eye of wisdom that realises emptiness. Having identified the root of the afflictions, the way to strive to abandon them is, as mentioned here, with the eye of wisdom realising emptiness. Just as eyes see things directly, it is the wisdom that realises emptiness directly that overcomes or abandons the afflictions. The implication here is that just as one sees objects nakedly with one's eye, one uses the wisdom that realises emptiness directly as an antidote to abandon the afflictions.

With respect to once that has been cleared or what is called, abandoned from the mind, the Tibetan word sal translated here as cleared has the connotation of separating them from one's mind. So, once they have been cleared or separated from one's mind, the rhetorical question is: where will they go and find new strength and return and retaliate? implies that once abandoned, the afflictions do not and cannot return. What is specifically being explained here is that it is the wisdom realising emptiness directly that serves as the antidote to abandon afflictions from their very root. This wisdom severs the continuum of the afflictions. Thus, because the very continuum of the afflictions has been completely severed, a similar affliction cannot arise in the next moment. Once the afflictions have been completely severed there is no continuity, i.e. they cannot produce the next moment of afflictions. The very meaning of being uprooted means that it cannot produce any more results. Thus, once the afflictions have been completely uprooted there is no way for them to return, and there is no other place for them to abide. To give a contemporary analogy, it is like the Tasmanian tiger which is extinct. It is because there is no continuity of the Tasmanian tiger that it can never return.

However this is not the case with an external enemy. As mentioned previously, when an external enemy is expelled from a place it can regroup and return. When the Communist Chinese took over Tibet many Tibetans left Tibet and relocated in India, and from there into many other countries. At this point Tibetans cannot stand up and fight back because there is no might. However, the fact is that if there was enough might and power then some Tibetans might want to retaliate and try to fight the Communist Chinese and return to Tibet. And it is possible for Tibetans to return to Tibet because even though they have been expelled the continuum of Tibetans has not been severed.

Unlike this example, when the afflictions have been overcome by the wisdom realising emptiness (which is the ultimate method to completely uproot the afflictions) then where would they go and find new strength to return and retaliate? This rhetorical question implies that it is impossible for them to return. Like the earlier analogy with the Tasmanian tiger, they can never return. The wisdom realising emptiness serves as an optimum antidote for overcoming the afflictions at their very root. This point has been explained many times in the past and you have to relate it to those earlier explanations as well. The reason I explain this again and again is so that you can derive the real meaning and gain an unmistakable and clear understanding of emptiness. Though the teachings explain this in many different ways, it all comes down to the same essential point.

When we take this explanation at a personal level then we really need to acknowledge that we have been able to identify the afflictions, i.e. we have a good understanding of what afflictions are. We also have quite a good understanding of what the antidote, the wisdom realising emptiness, implies. So with this understanding we need to try to overcome the afflictions within ourselves to the best of our ability. We have gained some really precious and valuable understandings and it is now up to us to actually apply this by taking measures to overcome the afflictions, in particular the root affliction of grasping at a truly existent self. To the extent that we can recognise and apply some antidote to overcome the grasping at a truly existent self, the strength of the afflictions, such as attachment and anger and so forth, will also be naturally reduced. Conversely, the stronger our grasping at a truly existent self and the more rigidly we hold onto this misconception, the greater the strength of the afflictions will be. So, to the best of our ability we need to apply the antidote for overcoming that grasping at a truly existent self.

When the commentary states although it is like this, it is referring to the fact that it is impossible for the delusions to return once they have been uprooted. However, the weak mind (a mind that lacks wisdom), does not allow one to strive to uproot the afflictions once and for all. Unless and until one has completely uprooted the delusions, they will reoccur. So if we find that we are affected by the continuity of afflictions, it is none other than because we have not applied the antidote—we have not applied a sufficient amount of wisdom to actually uproot the delusions. If we had done that previously, then we would not be affected by afflictions now.

An arhat or foe destroyer is no longer affected by the delusions because of the fact that they have uprooted the delusions through the wisdom realising emptiness. Furthermore, as explained in the teachings, those on the Great Vehicle path of seeing have reached the state where they have the direct realisation of emptiness. The power of that realisation will not allow the grasping at a self to strengthen and to become a means to create a newly formed throwing karma which would propel them into rebirth in cyclic existence once again. As explained in the teachings, what prevents beings on the path of seeing from creating a newly formed karma to be reborn again in cyclic existence is the wisdom realising emptiness directly. Of course, even though they do not create any new throwing karma due to the strength of their wisdom directly realising emptiness, that doesn't mean they are completely free from being reborn in cyclic existence.

When a being realises emptiness directly then, even though the grasping at a truly existent self has not been completely uprooted yet, it is nevertheless overpowered by the wisdom realising emptiness. Thus they do not create any new throwing karma. Likewise, even though we still have afflictions, they will be weakened with whatever wisdom we accumulate. So the more we increase our understanding of emptiness through study and practice, the more we will reduce grasping at a truly existent self. Conversely, the stronger our grasping at the self, the more likely it is that we will continuously create throwing karmas, which perpetuates our cycle in samsara. The stronger our grasping at a truly and inherently existent self, the stronger the notion of 'I' or 'me' will be. And the stronger that sense of 'I', the more likely it is that one will reject anything that opposes the 'I', and be attached to whatever pleases that 'I'. That is how we continuously create karma through aversion and attachment, and this is what we need to understand.

2.2.3.3.3. If they are abandoned from the root, there are no other bases to abide. Thus they are suitable to abandon

The explanation of the meaning of the next two lines of verse is preceded by this doubt:

If you say, the afflictions are also generated from one's own continuum and exist inherently and thus they cannot be abandoned.

In answer to that doubt the next two lines of verse are presented:

47ab. Afflictions do not abide in the object, not in the faculties nor in-between.
Since they are also nowhere else, where do they go to harm all sentient beings?

In his commentary Gyalsab Je begins his explanation of the meaning of these lines thus:

Answer: The afflictions do not abide in objects such as form, otherwise arhats would also generate afflictions when they see forms and so forth.

The answer to the doubt is that the afflictions do not abide inherently. If they were to abide in an object such as form, then an arhat (who has in fact abandoned the afflictions) would generate afflictions when they see forms, because they still perceive forms. This implies that the arhats, as a consequence of having interacted with forms, would also generate afflictions. But that is not the case. Furthermore:

They also do not abide in the collections of the sense powers of the eyes and so forth, because when one contemplates the actual mode of existence, the eyes exist, but the afflictions do not.

A being on the non-interrupted path of seeing who has the direct realisation of emptiness still has the sense powers of the eyes and so forth, but because they have the direct realisation of emptiness the afflictions are not manifest. If they were to abide in the collections of the sense powers of the eyes and so forth, then that would imply that afflictions are still manifest in the being on the uninterrupted path of seeing. The commentary further explains:

They also do not exist in-between or somewhere else.

Since it is like this, once abandoned where can the afflictions that were uprooted in this way, and which exist from their own side, go to inflict harm? They do not abide anywhere.

Then the next two lines of verse are presented.

47cd. Since they are like illusions, abandon fear in the heart and rely on striving for wisdom. Why harm myself meaninglessly with the hells and so forth?

The commentary explains the meaning of these two lines as follows:

These afflictions are like illusions. They are empty of inherent existence and yet appear as if they exist from their own side. Therefore, abandon the fear in your heart that they cannot be abandoned because of existing inherently.

Having generated the wisdom that realises emptiness it is suitable to strive in abandoning the mental afflictions. Since one has this ability, why would one create meaninglessly the harm of the lower realms of the hells and so forth? This is unsuitable.

This explanation is quite clear. It follows the earlier explanation that used this analogy of the afflictions being like illusions.

Summary

48. Strive to achieve the trainings, That were thus explained and contemplated. There is no medicine that can cure If one does not listen to the advice of the physician

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Contemplate in the above way repeatedly. Make an effort to strive with conscientiousness in how the Buddha earlier explained bodhicitta, and to protect the trainings. There are no sicknesses that can be cured only by medicine without listening to the instructions of the physician that contain many truths. Strive in abandoning the afflictions according to the instructions of the great physician.

Contemplate in the above way repeatedly refers to all the instructions that were given earlier as well as the advice given by the Buddha in his teachings. So the emphasis here is to make an effort to strive with conscientiousness to protect the trainings which serve as the basis for developing bodhicitta. This is really an exhortation to put into practice the instructions that were given earlier. The analogy which is used here is that there are no sicknesses that can be cured only by medicine without listening to instructions of the physician. The analogy is that when a sick patient goes to see a physician, a skilled physician would give the medicine along with specific instructions on how to take the medicine with possible dietary restrictions. If the patient doesn't take the medicine then they cannot be cured, but if they take it without following the physician's specific instructions then again that will affect the chances of being cured. In this analogy Buddha Shakyamuni is like the skilled doctor, and the holy Dharma, which consists of the practices of hearing, thinking and meditating, is like the medicine. One is like the patient, and the afflictions in one's mind are analogous to sickness.

As mentioned earlier, the Dharma was presented by the Buddha on the basis of the three trainings—training in moral ethics, training in meditation and training in wisdom—and the various different teachings which have been precisely presented along with the unmistakable instruction, is the medicine itself. If we don't put these instructions into practice then there is no way that we can be cured of the sickness of the afflictions. More specifically, without putting these instructions into practice there is no way that we will be able to overcome the root affliction of grasping at the self.

Gyaltsab Je is exhorting us to strive in abandoning the afflictions according to the instructions of the great physician, the Buddha. So the emphasis here is to make every effort to apply conscientiousness to our training.

Then Gyaltsab Je concludes his commentary on this chapter with this verse:

Freedom from the quagmire of faults within one's own continuum,
Increasing virtues without degeneration,
These depend with certainty on meditation on conscientiousness.
Therefore those proficient should always rely on conscientiousness.

So with this verse Gyaltsab Je points out that being free from the quagmire of faults and increasing virtues without degeneration, depends on meditating or maintaining conscientiousness. Therefore, he exhorts the wise need to always depend on conscientiousness. As mentioned here, in order to increase virtue within ourselves and prevent it from degenerating we need to apply conscientiousness. As presented earlier, the definition of conscientiousness includes being constantly mindful of that which needs to be adopted.

Conscientiousness was explained at the very beginning of this chapter so one needs to relate it to that explanation, otherwise we would have to explain it each time it is mentioned again. I don't blame some geshe who seem to be a bit exasperated. Some have said that they put quite bit of effort into explaining things clearly, and at the time it seems that the students have understood it, but after a while they seem to have completely forgotten the points, and it has to be explained all over again.

The importance of remembering the instructions actually leads us into the next chapter, which covers mindfulness and introspection.

II. THE NAME OF THE CHAPTER

This is the fourth chapter of Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas called Applying Conscientiousness

The commentary reads:

This is the commentary on the fourth chapter of the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called Applying Conscientiousness, from The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

Now we come to the fifth chapter, Introspection.

To explain the context of this chapter we need to return to the subdivisions introduced in chapter 1.¹

2. THE ACTUAL EXPLANATION OF THE STAGES OF THE PATH

2.2. The method for taking the essence

2.2.2. Explaining the individual meanings²

2.2.2.2. THE WAY OF TRAINING IN THE PRACTICES OF GENERATING THE TWO MINDS

2.2.2.2.2. The Way of Training in the Actions, the Perfections

2.2.2.2.2.1. The way of meditating on conscientiousness, the limb preventing the degeneration of the training in the mind of enlightenment³

2.2.2.2.2.2. Explaining the way of training in morality, by relating it to introspection and mindfulness, the methods for keeping virtuous dharmas pure⁴

CHAPTER 5: EXPLAINING THE WAY OF TRAINING IN MORALITY BY RELATING IT TO INTROSPECTION AND MINDFULNESS, THE METHODS FOR KEEPING ALL VIRTUOUS DHARMAS PURE

The point here, as in other teachings, is that morality through pure conduct is the very basis for one to keep virtuous Dharma pure.

The importance of mindfulness and introspection is encapsulated in this verse which will come later in the text.

*Those who wish to guard their mind
Definitely need to adopt mindfulness and Introspection and keep that,
I implore you to please keep the heart.*

So Shantideva, putting his palms at his heart, respectfully says, 'I implore you to adopt this'. He is pleading with us to guard and protect our mind with the optimum methods of mindfulness and introspection. So he is showing us the great importance of applying these methods in our practice.

The chapter is in two sections:

1. General Presentation
2. Individual presentation

GENERAL PRESENTATION

This has three parts:

1. Having generated the mind, why it is necessary to cultivate the trainings
2. Training in method and wisdom separately will not lead to enlightenment
3. The sequence of cultivating the trainings

1. HAVING GENERATED THE MIND, WHY IT IS NECESSARY TO CULTIVATE THE TRAININGS.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Merely generating the wishing or aspiring mind has, of course, great benefits, but it is impossible to attain enlightenment without making the perfections the essence of one's practice.

Generating the wishing or aspiring mind to achieve enlightenment definitely has great benefits, and one gains an incredible amount of merit from just generating that aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings. However that aspiring mind in itself will not be sufficient to become a cause to achieve enlightenment unless it is accompanied by the commitment to engage in the practice of perfections.

Hence one should engage in the practice of the perfections.

Then Gyaltsab Je provides some quotes:

From the King of Concentration Sutra :

Youth, therefore, make practice the essence. I shall explain why: For someone that makes practice the essence, the attainment of highest enlightenment is not difficult.

Furthermore the Initial or First Stage of Meditation states:

Thus, bodhisattvas that have generated bodhicitta, after having understood the subdued and the unsubdued, need to strongly engage into the trainings of practicing generosity and so forth. Without practice they will not attain enlightenment.

Practice here refers solely to the training concerning the vows, after one has taken them.

This is a reference to the bodhisattva vows.

2. TRAINING IN METHOD AND WISDOM SEPARATELY WILL NOT LEAD TO ENLIGHTENMENT

Under this heading Gyaltsab Je states:

The method for attaining enlightenment that one engages in must be an unmistakable method. A mistaken method will not bring about the desired result although one engages in effort.

This very meticulous explanation is quite clear. A mistaken method will not bring about the desired result although one engages in effort is emphasising that one needs to adopt an unmistakable method from the very beginning.

Then the commentary continues:

One's effort will also not bring about a result if the engaged method is incomplete, even though it is unmistakable. Therefore one needs to train in a complete, unmistakable method.

This is a prelude to what will be presented as the unmistakable and complete method for training.

Next, Gyaltsab Je quotes from the text, Purification of Vairochana,

The transcendental wisdom that knows all, the keeper of the secret, arose from the root of compassion, arose from the cause of bodhicitta, is the culmination of method.

Gyaltsab Je then explains the meaning of that quote:

As quoted, one goes beyond through great compassion, conventional and ultimate bodhicitta, and the method of generosity and the other perfections.

In order to go completely beyond to the state of enlightenment, one first needs develop great compassion. Then one realises conventional bodhicitta, followed by the realisation of ultimate bodhicitta, which is the wisdom realising emptiness. So basically method and wisdom are presented here with conventional bodhicitta and ultimate bodhicitta, and the following methods or trainings of generosity and the other perfections.

3. THE SEQUENCE OF CULTIVATING THE TRAININGS

Having explained the trainings in brief, how does one engage in those trainings sequentially?

¹ See the teaching of 26 March 2013.

² Introduced in the teaching of 2 July 2013.

³ Covered in chapter 4.

⁴ Covered in chapter 5.

Gyaltsab Je explains that:

Upon taking the wishing bodhicitta, one trains in the aspiration to engage into the trainings. Following this, one takes the bodhisattva vows, and then practises the trainings accordingly.

One first develops a wishing or aspiring bodhicitta, and with that one develops the commitment to engage in the trainings. Following this, one takes the bodhisattva vows and practises the trainings accordingly. So having first generated aspirational bodhicitta, one develops the wish to engage in the trainings. That is followed by the development of engaging bodhicitta, where one actually makes a commitment and takes the vows to train in the practices of perfections. That is how the sequence is presented.

Then Gyaltsab Je explains:

If the different types of trainings are summed up in accordance with the Ornament of Mahayana Sutras, then they are the six perfections.

The various practices and the many trainings a bodhisattva engages in can be subsumed into the six perfections. As explained here, this is in accordance with the Ornament of Mahayana Sutra. There is also an extensive explanation of this in the Extensive Lam Rim. It would be good for you to refer to that because having quoted the Ornament of Mahayana Sutra the commentary gives only a general presentation of why the practices of bodhisattvas are subsumed into the six perfections.

Gyaltsab Je begins this brief explanation with:

Six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of:

- Higher status.
- The two purposes
- The complete achievement of the welfare of others
- Containing all the Mahayana
- Complete path or method
- The three higher trainings

So the practice of the six perfections suffices for obtaining higher status, the two purposes and so forth. I have presented this in detail many times in the past.

The commentary presents this classification but does not go into much detail. So it would be good to refer to the explanations in the Extensive Lam Rim which will help to develop a better understanding of these points. If we can relate these classifications to the explanation in the Extensive Lam Rim then they will be quite clear. Otherwise it would take a lot of time to explain them. So it would be beneficial to refer to a more extensive explanation to gain a better understanding of what is being presented here. Those of you who have the Extensive Lam Rim can bring your book to class next week.

Indeed, if the Bodhisattva's Way of Life were to be explained in conjunction with the explanations in the Lam Rim teachings, the Madhyamika text, the tenets (which will be explained in the ninth chapter) and the Prajnaparamita text we could spend our entire life studying it. The Bodhisattva's Way of Life really subsumes all of the other texts, and what is referred to here in passing is explained in greater detail in these other texts. Because it covers all the meaning of all of the other texts, one could spend a very long time going through this text in detail.

It is really good to read and develop a familiarity with the Extensive Lam Rim, which many of you have. It was composed with the intent of subduing the mind, and there is no more supreme text for subduing the mind. If we read it and become familiar with its explanations it will definitely help to settle down and subdue our mind, and we will notice that any sort of upheaval in the mind will naturally subside.

Dr Tony Hammond, who used to come to study group, used to mention that without engaging in studying in this way we might be similar to a long life god. Do you recall why the long life gods are considered to be in a state without leisure? It is because they spend their entire existence absorbed in a worldly meditative concentration and don't have the time to practise Dharma. That is why they are an example of someone who does not have the leisure to practise Dharma.

This indicates that just engaging in some sort of gross or worldly concentration is not sufficient. It will not suffice as engaging in the real practice of holy Dharma as it does not help to subdue the mind. This is an important point.

Shantideva is really exhorting us to engage in the real practice of Dharma. I try to emphasise this essential point again and again, with the intention that you might actually pay heed to this advice and use your understanding and knowledge for the practice of subduing the mind. Otherwise, if we don't make any effort now when we have the opportunity, our mind will remain unruly and unsubdued for an infinite period of time. These are really important points that we need to keep in mind.

If being absorbed in some meditative concentration brings some sort of bliss then we cannot say that it has no benefit at all. It does have some temporary benefit, but it won't help to actually subdue the delusions. So it cannot be a cause for liberation; indeed, it enhances the conditions to remain in cyclic existence for a longer time. I am relating all this to you as a friend who has genuine concern for your wellbeing!

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

27 May 2014

Based on the motivation that we have already generated during the recitation, we can now engage in the meditation practice. (pause for meditation)

We can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

When one generates this motivation, even as an aspiration, we can see how incredible and expansive the thought: "in order to benefit all sentient beings, I, myself, will need to achieve enlightenment" actually is. One individual being thinking of all sentient beings and meditating for their wellbeing is really wonderful, and a powerful means to accumulate extensive merit.

From our last session we are at the point where it states:

If the different types of trainings are summed up in accordance with the Ornament of Mahayana Sutras, then there are the six perfections.

All the practices of the bodhisattvas can be subsumed into the six perfections. In other words, there is no practice which does not fit into the category of the six perfections.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of higher status.

The six perfections serve as a means for obtaining higher status. If one were to ask: "why do bodhisattvas need to obtain higher status?", then it is because engaging in the bodhisattva's deeds to perfect their practices can take up to many lifetimes. So, in order to be able to practice continuously with the conducive conditions in all future lifetimes, the excellence of high status is needed. There are four excellences of high status: excellent body; excellent resources; excellent entourage; and excellent activities or actions.

The practices of the six perfections serving as causes to obtain these excellences are also referred to in the early parts of the Extensive Lam Rim:

In particular, to obtain complete leisure and opportunity requires many roots of virtue, such as having a foundation of pure ethical discipline, augmenting it with generosity and the like, and when dying making a connection with your next lifetime through stainless aspirational prayers.

For bodhisattvas to continuously train in the practices to achieve enlightenment, they need to have a good basis (sound body) in all successive life times. While we may not yet be able to engage in the practices of the six perfections to the extent of a bodhisattva, we can however practise a similitude of the six perfections. So, as explained in the teachings the specific cause for obtaining a good body is the practice of morality.

Just having the excellent base of a sound body is not sufficient, one also needs good resources to sustain one's body. So, generosity is a specific cause for obtaining good resources such as wealth and so forth.

Furthermore, it is not sufficient just to have good resources, if one lacks good companions. Thus, a good entourage (excellent companions) are also required as a necessary condition to engage in the practices. The specific cause for obtaining excellent companions is the practice of patience.

Finally, in order to obtain what one wishes to achieve, one needs to have the excellence of activities. Because reaping the fruit of any activity is dependent on the completion of that activity, one needs to conduct excellent activities. The cause which for excellence of activities is joyous effort or enthusiasm.

Thus, these four are called the four excellences. Having acquired them one needs to ensure they do not become causes for afflictions to arise, so the next two perfections are presented as a means to prevent that. This is an essential point because for us in our situation, we will find that whenever we acquire these excellences they can very readily become a cause for afflictions to manifest. For a practitioner aspiring to achieve enlightenment, if the excellences become a cause for afflictions to arise, then it will defeat the very purpose of one's endeavours to achieve that state. So the next two perfections, concentration and wisdom become the specific causes that prevent the excellences or good conditions from becoming a cause for afflictions to arise. Concentration is the means to control or subdue the mind and will prevent manifest afflictions from arising. Wisdom (which encompasses analytical wisdom) allows one to recognise and distinguish between what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded and so stops afflictions from developing further; ultimately removing them from their very root.

Each of the six perfections has a specific result. If one were to ask "what is the result of having practiced morality?" the positive result is explained precisely. Likewise this is the case with generosity, patience etc. The specific results to be reaped by engaging in the six perfections are explained in detail in the teachings.

The point here is that we need to be mindful that our practices (e.g. meditation) do not become the means to escalate the afflictions in our mind. A practitioner such as a bodhisattva uses the practice of concentration as the supreme means to overcome the delusions and afflictions in their mind. In our situation, if we are not mindful of our practice of (for example) meditation, it is very easy the delusions, such as pride, competitiveness, jealousy and so forth to escalate. Rather than the practice becoming a means to subdue the mind it becomes the means to further strengthen the delusions, which is a disgrace. This is an important point to bear in mind. Of course if we don't pay heed to this cautionary advice, then it is mere words and we would not get any benefit.

So, if it is possible for practices such as meditation to serve as means to further enhance the eight worldly concerns, then one needs to be really mindful. From when I was quite young I have paid particular attention to the practice of meditation. When I analyse and look back now, I notice that there were definitely taints of worldly concerns in the early years. However these days I can assure you I am quite free from that. I'm declaring to you openly what I feel is true for myself, which is what His Holiness the Dalai Lama has repeatedly encouraged us to do.

Explanations on the six perfections are clearly and extensively explained in Lama Tsong Khapa's Extensive Lam Rim, so please take the initiative to read the text. It specifically covers the way each perfection serves as a specific cause to acquire a specific result, and serves as a good condition to further enhance our practice. It also explains that if one were to be missing any of these good conditions, then that becomes an obstacle for one's practice.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of the two purposes

Bodhisattvas have made the pledge to work for the welfare of all sentient beings, and aspire to achieve enlightenment for that purpose. The bodhisattvas' purpose for engaging in practice is two-fold: to fully actualise one's own ultimate potential and to benefit other sentient beings.

Generosity becomes a most important practice to benefit others. The first means of fulfilling others' purposes is to benefit others by providing material wealth, including food and clothing; then grant them with the wealth of dharma knowledge. Providing material assistance will make them more receptive to receiving the ultimate help of the Dharma. If one is generous to others but harms them at the same time, then while some benefit may remain from the generosity, most of it will be nullified. So while engaging in the practices of generosity, one must refrain from harming the beings to whom one has been generous by using the practice of morality—this is the most essential element for accomplishing pure benefit without harm.

While one may successfully refrain from harming others, they may cause us harm; but if one retaliates, then again, one will be harming them. Even if initially one didn't have any intention to harm them, when one retaliates they will be harmed. So, to prevent oneself from retaliating and bear harms upon oneself, one needs to practise patience. As such the practice of patience is most essential in order to willingly accept harms inflicted by others.

The text explains one must acquire wisdom to obtain liberation and freedom. For wisdom to assist one achieve liberation, one has to be free from a distracted mind because if one is distracted one will not be able to utilise wisdom. The practice which serves as an aid to free oneself from distractions is concentration, which refers here to the concentration of being able to focus on an object for as long as one wishes, i.e. the state of calm abiding. Thus, this level of single-pointed concentration supported by the wisdom realising emptiness becomes the supreme means to achieve liberation.

One cannot possibly develop concentration and cultivate wisdom if one is affected by laziness. So the optimum means to overcome laziness is to practice joyous effort or enthusiasm. This is how the practices of the six perfections are meticulously presented as the means to fulfil both purposes.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of complete achievement of the welfare of others.

The Extensive Lam Rim presents:

You first relieve others' poverty by giving away material goods. Then you do no harm to any living being and, in addition, are patient with harm done to you. Without becoming dispirited you joyously persevere at helping those who harm you. You depend on meditative stabilisation and inspire them through displaying supernormal powers and so forth. When they become suitable vessels for the teachings, you rely on wisdom and give good explanations, cut through their doubts and thereby bring them to liberation. Because you do all this, the perfections are fixed as six in number.

As explained, to relieve others from the suffering of poverty one first helps others with the practice of generosity, by providing them with material goods. To prevent oneself from harming them one needs to practise morality. That which serves as the means to protect oneself from other's harm is patience. As there is the danger of losing one's patience if one feels daunted or overwhelmed when facing the harm by others, one needs to practise joyous effort so that one doesn't give up benefiting others.

When one obtains the ability to perform miraculous feats which is depended on the practice of concentration, one can then enchant others and draw them close to you. Thus when others become the perfect recipients for receiving Dharma teachings, by relying on wisdom, the bodhisattva can then provide the clear explanations that completely eliminates all doubts and leads them to the state of liberation.

This, then, is how the six perfections serve as a means for the complete achievement of the welfare of others.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of containing all the Mahayana

As further presented in the Extensive Lam Rim:

You are indifferent to resources because you are not attached to those you have and do not pursue those you lack. Since you then have the ability to safeguard precepts, you adopt and respect ethical discipline. You are patient with the suffering that comes from living beings and inanimate things, and you are enthusiastic about whatever virtue you set out to cultivate, so you do not get dispirited by either of these. You cultivate a non-discursive yoga of meditative serenity and a non-discursive yoga of insight. These six comprise all the Mahayana practices through which you advance by the six perfections, for you accomplish these practices in stages by means of the six perfections and you do not need any more than these six perfections.

The text explains that when one practices supreme generosity, one can become detached from the resources one already has and will not engage in pursuing resources which one lacks. In other words, one is content with what one has. With that ability one can safeguard one's practices of morality so they become purer. Basically, it becomes a supreme practice for having less desire and being content, hence one becomes an object of respect. Based on the achievements of the earlier practices, when one engages in patience one is able to endure the suffering caused by other sentient beings or inanimate objects. Because one is able to endure these sufferings, that is be enthusiastic or joyous in one's virtues, that is how the practice of patience induces joyous effort.

As explained in the text:

You are enthusiastic about whatever virtue you set out to cultivate so you do not become dispirited by either of these.

Furthermore, you cultivate a non-discursive yoga of meditative concentration, which is the state of clam abiding, and the wisdom of special insight. These six then comprise all the Mahayana practices, through which you advance by the six perfections.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of the complete path or method

The Extensive Lam Rim presents:

The path—i.e., method—for not being attached to the resources that are your possessions is generosity, because you become free from attachment to your things by becoming habituated to giving them away.

The text explains meticulously that the supreme means to overcome attachment to one's own possessions is by actually giving them away. When you are generous with your own possessions it becomes the method for overcoming attachment to them.

The text continues:

The method for restraining yourself from the distraction of trying to possess what you do not possess is ethical discipline, for when you maintain a monk's vows, you do not have all the distractions of making a living.

What is being explained here is that ethics or morality is the best basis for preventing one from having distractions in one's mind.

As mentioned earlier, within the three trainings the first is morality because by engaging in the practice of morality it will reduce the gross levels of our distractions. Then when one is free from the gross distractions, through the practice of concentration one can then further enhance the ability in one's mind, overcoming more subtle distractions.

The text continues:

The method for not abandoning living beings is patience, because you do not despair at the suffering caused by the harm others inflict.

The reason we would feel discouraged and abandon working for the benefit of sentient beings is when we lose our patience. When we are unable to endure hardships, either when others harm us or due to our own sufferings, then that experience may cause us to give up helping beings. So, the practice of patience protects one from this.

The text continues:

The method to increase virtues is joyous perseverance, because you increase them when you joyously persevere at what you undertake.

If someone were to state "I really want to practice meditation", or "I really want to study. How can I best do that? What is the best method?", then the text explains that the best method is to develop joyous effort or enthusiasm, which becomes the supreme method to increase one's ability to practice and study.

The text continues:

The methods for clearing away obscurations are the final two perfections, because meditative stabilisation clears away the afflictions and wisdom clears away the cognitive obscurations. Thus the perfections are fixed as six in number.

As explained, meditative stabilisation clears away the afflictions and wisdom clears away the cognitive obscurations or the obscuration to omniscience. Thus as the text states, the perfections are fixed as six in numbers.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of the three higher trainings

The Extensive Lam Rim explains:

The nature of the training in ethical discipline [the first of the three trainings] is the practice of ethical discipline.

The precondition of the training in ethical discipline is generosity, because once you have generosity that is indifferent to resources, you can properly adopt an ethical discipline.

This is similar to what was explained earlier: through generosity, when one has less attachments and more contentment, it becomes easier for one to actually practice discipline or morality.

The Lam Rim text continues:

The aid to the training in ethical discipline is patience, because the patience of not retaliating when scolded, etc. safeguards your properly adopted ethical discipline.

Patience here refers to an aid to training in ethical discipline. The verse explains how they are all interrelated—to practice one needs the base of the others as well.

The Lam Rim text continues:

Meditative stabilisation is the training of mind [the second training, the training of meditative concentration], and wisdom is the training in wisdom [the third training]. As for joyous perseverance, it is included in all three trainings, so the perfections are fixed at six in number.

This concurs with Gyaltsab Je's commentary of the Bodhicharyavatara which lists the six reasons of why the six perfections are definite in number and we have covered all of them.

CAUSE, NATURE, DIVISION, MEANING OF THE NAME AND RESULT OF THE SIX PERFECTIONS

Gyaltsab Je's commentary presents the six perfections under the headings: Cause, Nature, Division, Meaning of the Name, Result of the Six Perfections. Again, the actual practices of the six perfections are those that only a bodhisattva or true Mahayana practitioners will possess as they are practices which have to be combined with bodhicitta (as explained later). However at our level, even though we have not actually developed bodhicitta, and our practice may not be an actual practice of the perfection of generosity etc., to whatever extent we can engage in the practices, we can say that we have a similitude of the practice of the six perfections within ourselves now.

CAUSE

Under this heading Gyaltsab Je states:

It is bodhicitta that is held by method and wisdom and focuses on the three baskets of the Mahayana teachings and depends on the special Mahayana lineage and the condition of a Mahayana teacher.

Bodhicitta is the cause for the practices of the six perfections. Take the example of generosity, whether our level of generosity becomes a practice of the perfection of generosity or not is dependent on whether we have the conditions in ourselves or not. So if we find that we lack the condition, then of course our practice of generosity will not be an actual perfection of generosity.

NATURE

Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

The nature of generosity is the virtuous mind of giving and all the actions of body and speech that arise from it.

The definition of generosity is the virtuous mind that wishes to give.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Morality is contained in the thought of abandoning harm to others and abandoning sole personal liberation.

Harm here refers to the ten non-virtuous actions. The first seven of these encompass the three of the body (killing, stealing and sexual misconduct), the fourth is speech (allowing harmful or divisive speech and idle gossip), all of which cause direct harm to others. The basis is in the three non-virtues of the mind (covetousness, harmful intent and wrong views).

Morality contains the actual deeds, and the causes of those negative deeds towards others, as well as abandoning sole personal liberation. While sole liberation is not an abandonment for those following the lower vehicle, for a bodhisattva sole liberation is definitely something which has to be abandoned. If bodhisattvas do not protect themselves from the thought of self-liberation they will degenerate their bodhicitta. Therefore protecting themselves from sole liberation is part of their ethical practice.

In brief, the definition of morality is the mind that restrains from harming others.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Patience is a mind that abides in its natural state, unaffected by harm and suffering and also strongly abides in the dharma.

Patience as a mind that abides in its natural state refers to being able to remain in a natural or calm state in the face of harm or suffering. Other texts define patience as a mind which does not become troubled in the face of harm and sufferings. Patience has three types: not being disturbed in the face of harm; or sufferings; and strongly, i.e. definitely, abiding in the Dharma.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Enthusiasm is the joy of accumulating virtue and achieving the purpose of sentient beings and the actions of the three doors which arise from it.

Enthusiasm or joyous effort is the state of mind which takes joy in accumulating virtue. Thus when one derives joy from accumulating virtue, then naturally the actions that arise from the three doors (mainly body, speech and mind) are in accordance with benefitting others and overcoming negativities.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Mental stabilisation is the single pointed abiding on a virtuous object.

To the statement mental stabilisation is the single-pointed abiding on a virtuous object some texts add from its own side, meaning through its own power. This carries more weight.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Wisdom is the discerning that occurs upon analysing ultimate and conventional objects.

DIVISIONS

Generosity has [three sub-divisions:] generosity of the Dharma; material generosity; and generosity of fearlessness.

The generosity of fearlessness refers to protecting the lives of other beings.

Morality has [three sub-divisions:] the morality of vows (observing vows); accumulating virtue and achieving the welfare of others.

There are actually eleven ways of achieving the welfare of others as the divisions of morality encompass all the virtuous deeds of a bodhisattva. The morality of the vows and the morality of accumulating virtue relates to fulfilling one's own ultimate purpose while the morality of achieving the welfare of others is fulfilling the purpose of other beings. As Lama Tsong Khapa mentions in the prayer Foundation Of All Good Qualities:

Even if I develop bodhicitta, but don't practice the three types of morality,
I will not achieve enlightenment.
With the clear recognition of this,
Please bless me to practice the bodhisattva vows with great energy.

These are really essential points to keep in mind. The morality of vows is also presented as the morality of restraining from faults.

Patience has [three subdivisions:] the patience of thinking nothing of being harmed by others; tolerating one's suffering; and definitely abiding in the Dharma.

In the first division of patience, what is being emphasised is not allowing one's mind to be disturbed when others harm oneself. This implies willingly enduring or willingly accepting harm from others; when one is able to do this then it does not cause one's mind to become disturbed, and thus harm others by retaliating.

In the second division, tolerating one's suffering, again being able to willingly bear or accept the sufferings becomes a means for one's mind not to become disturbed. These are important points for one's practice. Indeed, for whatever one wishes to achieve because whatever one's endeavours, there are bound to be hardships and difficulties, and if one is not able to endure them or accept them, then it can cause the mind to become daunted and the mind can start to get upset and angry.

Enthusiasm has [three divisions:] armour-like enthusiasm; enthusiasm in accumulating virtue; and enthusiasm in achieving the welfare of sentient beings.

Mental stabilisation has [three divisions:] mental stabilisation to abide in happiness in this life; for achieving qualities; and for accomplishing the welfare of sentient beings.

Wisdom has [three divisions:] the wisdom which realises the ultimate; the conventional; and the actions for the benefit of sentient beings.

THE MEANING OF THE NAME

In Sanskrit the word for generosity is dhana. You will notice some temples have dhana written on the donation box as a way to encourage generosity when making offerings. Here:

Dhana means to willingly give up that which is to be offered, hence generosity.

Shila means to cool the heat and misery of the afflictions, hence morality.

Patience because of being patient with aggression. In Tibetan the term sopa has the connotation of bearing or to tolerate aggression.

Enthusiasm because of training for the highest.

Mental stabilisation because of mentally holding.

Wisdom because of knowing the ultimate.

RESULTS

As explained in Precious Garland:

From giving there arises wealth, from ethics happiness,
From patience a good appearance, from joyous effort
[effort in] virtue, brilliance,
From concentration peace, from wisdom liberation,
From compassion all aims are achieved.

The result of generosity is that one will obtain wealth, and the result of morality is that one will obtain the happiness of the high status.

As a result of patience, one will obtain a good complexion,
As a result of practising patience, one obtains lustre and a good appearance.

As a result of joyous effort one obtains virtuous brilliance.

As a result of practising concentration, one obtains a subdued mind.

As a result of practising wisdom, one obtains liberation or a liberated mind.

With compassion one obtains the two purposes which encompass one's own purpose and the purpose of benefitting others.

Having explained how the six perfections serve as a means for obtaining all these excellences, if we were to ask ourselves, "would I like to have these good conditions?", our answer would definitely be "Yes! I would like to have these good conditions, all these excellences".

Again, we might not yet be capable of engaging in the actual perfections of these practices, but we do have the capacity to practice a similitude of them to the best of our ability, so to that extent it is most meaningful and most worthwhile for oneself. When it is accompanied by the right (altruistic) motivation then it definitely becomes a really meaningful practice.

As Gyalsab Je's commentary presents:

The nature, division and so forth of the six perfections should be ascertained more extensively from the Small and Great Stages of the Path. The way of practising them is explained extensively here in this text.

To understand a more extensive presentation of the nature, division and so forth one would need to refer to the Extensive Lam Rim teachings. However as the commentary states, the way to practice is presented in this very text in the following verses.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

3 June 2014

Based on the motivation we generated in the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer that we have just recited we can now engage in the practice of meditation. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

In our last session we covered a general presentation of the way of training in the six perfections. A lot of material was presented then, and it is good to keep it in mind as we cover the individual presentations of each of the perfections.

INDIVIDUAL PRESENTATION

CHAPTER 5 EXPLAINING THE WAY OF TRAINING IN MORALITY BY RELATING IT TO INTROSPECTION AND MINDFULNESS, THE METHODS FOR KEEPING VIRTUOUS DHARMAS PURE

There are two parts to the chapter:

- I. Explaining the text of the chapter
- II. Explaining the name of the chapter

I. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

This has two subdivisions:

1. Explaining extensively how to practice
2. Concluding summary showing that one has to practice the meaning and not just the words

1. EXPLAINING EXTENSIVELY HOW TO PRACTICE

This is subdivided into four sections.

- 1.1. Guarding the mind as a method for guarding the training
- 1.2. Guarding mindfulness and introspection as methods for guarding the mind.
- 1.3. Practice of guarding the mind with mindfulness and introspection
- 1.4. Method for perfecting the trainings

With these outlines, we need to take note of how meticulously the material is being presented. If we pay particular attention to this, we will notice that we are being presented with a supreme technique for meditation practice. We may assume that we are meditating, but if we fail to apply these points, we are not actually meditating properly.

1.1. Guarding the mind as a method for guarding the training

As most of us have taken many vows and agreed to comply with certain commitments, this section presents the trainings on how to protect our vows and commitments.

There are three sub-divisions:

- 1.1.1. By protecting the mind all will be protected
- 1.1.2. The reason for this
- 1.1.3. Striving in guarding the mind

1.1.1. By protecting the mind all will be protected.

This is again subdivided into three:

- 1.1.1.1. Showing in brief the necessity of protecting one's mind
- 1.1.1.2. The fault of degenerating the mind
- 1.1.1.3. The benefits of protecting the mind

1.1.1.1. SHOWING IN BRIEF THE NECESSITY OF PROTECTING ONE'S MIND

This is presented in the first verse of the chapter:

1. *They who wish to protect the trainings
Protect the mind after focusing it strongly.
Without protecting this mind
It is impossible to protect the trainings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

They who wish to protect the trainings of generosity and the other perfections from degeneration must strongly focus their mind on the trainings, and then protect the mind from wandering off to mistaken objects.

This explanation is in fact a personal instruction. As mentioned here, those who wish to protect the trainings of generosity and the other perfections from degeneration must strongly focus their mind on the trainings, and protect the mind from wandering off to mistaken objects.

Basically, those who wish to engage in the trainings such as the six perfections—generosity and so forth—as well as the three higher trainings—the trainings of morality, training of concentration and the training of wisdom, need to protect their minds. For example, those who wish to train in morality must definitely protect their minds, likewise those who wish to train in concentration and wisdom also need to protect their minds.

One needs to understand what protecting the mind means in this context. Here it specifically relates to protecting the mind from being influenced by the delusions that obstruct one's training. With respect to the six perfections, if one's mind is influenced by the delusion of miserliness then there is no way one can practise generosity. If one's mind is influenced by corrupt ethics, then there is no way one can practise pure ethics or morality. If the mind is influenced by anger then one cannot practise patience. If one's mind is influenced by laziness then again there is no way that one can practise joyous effort. If the mind is influenced by distraction and excitement, then it cannot engage in the training of the perfection of concentration, and if the mind is influenced by corrupt wisdom then one is not able to practise wisdom properly.

This is how we need to understand the need to protect the mind from the delusions. You will have noticed that when I introduce the meditation technique I always emphasise that meditation is a method for protecting the mind, and why it is important to do that. Some of you might wonder why I emphasise this point again and again. The reasons that I share it with you are precisely as presented here. I place great importance on these points because, as explained here, it definitely relates to the core practice.

I have said many times that there is a difference between protecting the mind and restraining the mind. You might have taken notes, although if you just left it on the paper as notes then I don't know if you will recall it. Restraining the mind means to make the effort, from the very beginning, not to allow the mind to be influenced by the delusions. Protecting the mind means to take notice when the mind is being influenced by delusions, at which point one immediately applies antidotes to turn the mind away from them.

As the commentary mentions, if one does not focus the mind strongly on the trainings and protect the mind from wandering off to mistaken objects, then it is impossible to engage in the trainings such as generosity and so forth. We should follow the example of the Kadampa masters who, as mentioned previously, practised protecting the mind in the form of a dialogue with the delusions. 'When you are strong, I will apply the antidote to combat you with great force. When you relax then I will also relax'. That is the scope of one's attack on the delusions. If one relaxes when the delusions are strong they will overpower the mind and, as one has not protected the mind, one will be unable to apply the actual training or practice.

This is a really succinct point about meditation as well as the practice of Dharma. As I have mentioned previously, meditation and the practice of Dharma really come down to the same point. Meditation, as I explain regularly, protects the mind from being influenced by the delusions, by keeping it focussed on a virtuous object. Likewise the practice of Dharma protects the mind from the delusions, by withholding the mind from negativities and mistaken conceptions. That measure of withholding the mind from following misconceptions and mistaken views is called the practice of Dharma. As you can see, my regular explanation on these points is similar to the very point that Shantideva is presenting here—if one does not protect the mind from wondering off and from focusing on mistaken objects then it is impossible to engage in the trainings.

This succinct point is an explanation of the meaning of training or practising Dharma, and the meaning of meditation.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

If one does not protect the mind from wandering off, then it becomes impossible to protect the trainings.

Here wandering off specifically implies that the mind is being influenced by the deluded distractions. If one does not protect the mind from this then the consequence is that it will be impossible to actually protect one's training, meaning that one will not be able to apply the trainings or the practices of the Dharma.

We should keep these explanations in mind whenever we refer to the text or read it, as a way to be mindful and contemplate the main points. The reason to contemplate these points is so that when the delusions arise we will be able to immediately recall that following these delusions will cause one to lapse from one's training and practice. It is when we notice the delusions arising that we need to apply particular attention and apply the methods for protecting one's mind.

The delusions that we need to protect ourselves from were explained in detail in the earlier chapter which identified the delusions, their faults and so forth.

1.1.1.2. The fault of degenerating the mind

This relates to the faults that arise from allowing the trainings to degenerate as a result of the influence of the delusions on the mind. The verse relating to this reads:

2. *Letting the elephant mind wander
Creates harm beyond pain.
The unsubdued crazed elephant
Does not do as much damage here.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation of this verse in his commentary reads:

Letting the crazed elephant mind wander off to mistaken objects creates the harm beyond pain of the naraks [hell realms]. The normal unsubdued and crazed elephant does not create as much suffering here in this world. Hence one should strive in protecting the mind.

The explanation here is quite clear. However to give some further clarification, the state of our mind is presented here as being analogous to a crazed, untamed elephant. If an untamed elephant is let loose it will cause a lot of havoc. Likewise, if we allow our mind to just wander off towards objects of delusion then that will create a lot of harm. The harm that it causes is, of course, not only the sufferings in this life, but also in our future existence, such as the sufferings in the hell realm. Some may think, 'What's wrong in allowing the mind to just wander off and become distracted? How could a distracted mind possibly harm oneself?' This presentation explains that the consequence of allowing the mind to wander off and be distracted by mistaken objects, or objects of delusions, is that it will cause great sufferings, in this life and future lives.

When the commentary states, the normal unsubdued crazed elephant does not create as much suffering here in this world, it is referring to stories about untamed elephants being given intoxicants like alcohol to make them even wilder, and then letting them loose in battle. They cause a lot of damage which can be used to overpower the enemy. In the analogy here, an elephant that is already untamed is given mind-altering substances such as alcohol or drugs. When an elephant in such a crazed state is let loose it can cause lot of damage.

The implication here is that the damage will at worst be physical damage to the environment, the buildings and people, who might be crushed and lose limbs, or even die. However such a crazed elephant cannot bring about the intense sufferings of the hell realm. In comparison, as mentioned previously, the consequences of allowing a mind to become distracted by the delusions are much more severe, not only in this life, but in the immeasurable sufferings of lower realms, such as the hell realm, in future lifetimes.

By reflecting on this illustration, and really thinking about the gravity of the consequences of having an unsubdued distracted mind, the conclusion, as presented here, is that hence one should strive in protecting the mind. We could elaborate on how the mind is like an untamed elephant, but this should be sufficient for now.

1.1.1.3. The benefits of protecting the mind

Having first explained the faults of not protecting the mind, one might wonder, 'Well, what is the benefit of protecting the mind? Does protecting the mind have any benefits?' So we can see that this is a very systematic and logical presentation which relates well to our normal state of mind, with its many queries and doubts. These doubts are being systematically addressed one after another. So we can see that this is a really marvellous presentation.

The benefits of protecting the mind is explained in two subdivisions:

- 1.1.1.3.1. In brief
- 1.1.1.3.2. Extensive

1.1.1.3.1. In brief

The relevant verse reads:

3. *If one tightly fastens the elephant of the mind
Comprehensively with the rope of mindfulness,
All dangers become completely non-existent
And all virtues will come into one's hand.*

This explanation is similar to that in the Essence of the Middle Way.

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Through tying the crazed elephant mind to the virtuous object by tying all one's actions of body, speech and mind comprehensively with the rope of mindfulness, all the general dangers of this life and the next become non-existent, and all the virtues of the practices of the three types of beings of the graduated path to enlightenment fall naturally into one's hand.

Therefore, one should never let one's mindfulness of the virtuous object degenerate.

The mind is analogous to the crazed untamed elephant; The virtuous object is analogous to the pillar to which you would tie the elephant so that it does not cause havoc; The rope to tie the crazed elephant is analogous to mindfulness.

What one is binding to the pillar is one's mind as well the three doors of body, speech and mind.

If one were to apply mindfulness as a means to bind our crazed, untamed mind to a virtuous object then all the general dangers of this life and the next become non-existent, and all the virtues of the practices of the three types of beings of the graduated path to enlightenment fall naturally into one's hand. This is implying that one will naturally be able to engage in all of the practices of the three scopes.

So we can see how wonderful this text really is, as it presents the essential practices for meditation and Dharma practice.

One needs to take particular notice of the essential meaning of this presentation. The object to which one binds one's mind with mindfulness, is not any random object; as specified here it has to be a virtuous object. If it were possible to subdue our mind by being mindful of any object, there would be no need for the text to specify that it needs to be a virtuous object. So the essential point being presented here is that the meditation object has to be a virtuous object if it is to serve as an antidote to overcome negativities.

In summary, the commentary states, therefore one should never let one's mindfulness on the virtuous object degenerate. This is an essential instruction. I regularly emphasise when I introduce meditation that meditation is the optimum means to protect one's mind. The specific emphasis here is that one should never let one's mindfulness of the virtuous object degenerate or lapse. Applying mindfulness means that during the meditation session one will be able to protect one's mind from mistaken conceptions and views, and delusions. Then, through that familiarity with mindfulness during the meditation practice, one will be able to maintain that awareness of the virtuous object, even when one has come out of the formal meditation sessions.

As we familiarise ourselves with the virtuous object throughout the day, and the following days and weeks and months, then due to that familiarity we will naturally be able to recall the virtuous object at the end of our life when we come to our death. As explained in the teachings, if, at the time of death one's mind is in a virtuous state then there is no possibility of taking rebirth in the lower realms. This is how we need to see the way in which our everyday practices are related to the crucial juncture of passing on from this life to the next.

By engaging in practice through being mindful of the virtuous object we are able to take the essence of our precious human life and make it meaningful. Of course the optimum way to make our life meaningful is to create the causes for enlightenment, next best is liberation, and at the very least we take a good rebirth in our next lifetime with all the good conditions.

What we can derive from this explanation is that protecting our mind from delusions lies within our own hands. If we take the initiative to apply mindfulness then we can actually protect our mind from the influence of the negativities, delusions and so forth. Protecting one's mind protects one from immediate external dangers, as well as from future sufferings. That is what is being explained here.

1.1.1.3.2. Extensive

The extensive explanation reads:

4. *Tigers, lions, elephants and evil spirits,
Snakes and all other enemies,
The guard of sentient beings in the hells,
Evil mantras [or sorcerers] and likewise blood drinkers [or blood thirsty demons],*
5. *Simply by fastening this mind
They all become controlled.
Solely by subduing the mind
They all become subdued.*

The commentary on this verse explains:

It is appropriate to fasten the mind to a virtuous object. By subduing the mind one overcomes all dangers such as tigers, lions, crazy elephants, evil spirits, snakes, and all human enemies. One also overcomes the looming danger of the guards of the sentient beings in hell, those that harm others with evil mantras such as sorcerers, as well as the harm of the different types of spirits called blood thirsty demons and the like. Stopping the cause for any threat in this way, solely by fastening the mind with the rope of mindfulness completely to a virtuous meditation object, equals binding all dangers, and one will not be harmed in the least.

Solely subduing the mind with mindfulness and introspection, and thus stopping engagement in negative actions, equals subduing all dangers. Therefore one should strive in subduing the mind.

While this presentation is quite clear, the point that we can derive here is that stopping the cause for any threat in this way solely by fastening the mind with the rope of mindfulness completely to a virtuous meditation object, equals binding all dangers. In other words, fastening our mind to a virtuous object will protect us from all the other dangers mentioned earlier, and one will not be harmed in the least.

Other texts explain that harms, like those mentioned earlier, will not befall upon someone who observes ethics purely. The concluding exhortation is that subduing the mind solely by mindfulness and introspection, and thus stopping engagement in negative actions, equals subduing all dangers. Therefore one should strive in subduing the mind.

1.1.1.2. THE REASON FOR THIS

This is presented in two subdivisions:

- 1.1.1.2.1. Faults depend on the mind
- 1.1.1.2.2. Qualities depend on the mind

1.1.1.2.1. Faults depend on the mind

This is a presentation showing that both faults and qualities are dependent on the mind itself. The way the faults are dependent on the mind is presented under three subheadings:

1.1.1.2.1.1 Quotes

These are unmistakable citations from the sutras, from the teacher himself

1.1.1.2.1.2. Reason

1.1.1.2.1.3. Summary

1.1.1.2.1.1. Quotes

The verse that relates to this section is:

6. *That all dangers
And the boundless sufferings
Arise from the mind
Is shown with faultless quotation.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

One's experiences of dangers and sufferings are created by one's own mind. The reason is because all dangers and the boundless suffering of this life and future lives arise from one's own negative mind; this is said by the Able One, who explained faultlessly and perfectly all objects of knowledge.

Gyaltsab Je first states that one's experiences of dangers and sufferings are created by one's own mind. The reason is that all dangers and the boundless suffering of this life and future lives arise from one's own negative mind. All dangers and sufferings that we experience are created by one's mind, because all the dangers and boundless sufferings of this life and future lives arise from one's own negative mind. This was said by the Able One (Buddha Shakyamuni) who explained faultlessly the objects of knowledge. Then the commentary gives a number of quotations:

As he said in the Sutra of Clouds of Jewels:

If one controls one's mind one controls all phenomena.

He also said:

Whether it is virtue or virtuous karma, it is accumulated by the mind.

He also said:

The mind precedes all phenomena. If one knows the mind well, one knows all phenomena well.

Also from the Perfect Compendium of Phenomena:

All phenomena depend on the mind.

The Buddha also said that a subdued mind is a happy mind.

1.1.1.2.1.2. Reason

7. *The weapons of the hell beings,
Who made them with purpose?
Who made the burning iron ground?
From whence did the burning inferno arise?*

8ab All the likes of these Arose from negativity, taught the Able One.

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of these lines:

If the sufferings that are experienced by sentient beings in the hells, and elsewhere, do not arise from the person's own preceding negative mind, then who forged purposefully the weapons of the hell guardians, these swords, spears and so on? These were not made purposefully by a creator god, nor were they made purposefully by someone else. Who created the burning iron ground, who created the hosts of females that cause one to climb and fall off the crystal mountain? There is no other cause or creator.

The points at the beginning are quite easy to understand, the emphasis being that these sufferings of the hell realms and elsewhere were not made purposely by a creator god, and nor were they made purposely by someone else. If we were to take the example of this very building, it was created by someone else, and then we partake of the good conditions here. However, unlike the physical conditions that we experience in this world, the various types of hell realms are said to be created by none other than one's own mind. It is not as if someone specifically created the hell realms for someone else to take us there. It is actually the creation of our own mind. The point made in answer to the opening rhetorical question is that there is no such god which created these sufferings realms, nor were they made by someone else.

Then the commentary asks, Who created the burning iron ground, who created the hosts of females that cause one to climb and fall off the crystal mountain? Those of you who are familiar with the explanations presented in the Lam Rim teachings will recall the specific hellish state where, due to one's own negative actions in the past, in particular severe, lustful attachment to women resulting in sexual misconduct, one would have visions of women on top of a mountain calling out to you. As you hear the sirens beckoning, you try to climb up the mountain but there are downward facing swords that cut you. Then, having reached the top, you hear the sirens beckoning you from the ground, but when you try to go down, the swords are facing up at you, and again you are pierced by them.

These suffering experiences arise from a hallucination that there is someone calling you. It is due to familiarity with the object of attachment and, in particular, engaging in sexual misconduct that one really believes the sirens are calling out to you. In the process of listening to that, one experiences immense suffering. When we think about it, this is not too farfetched at all. Even in their dreams, someone who is really affected by strong, lustful desires can have all sorts of unimaginable experiences. This is explained extensively in the Lam Rim teachings, so you can refer to that. As Shantideva emphasises, there is no other cause or creator for such things, other than being the consequence of one's own state of mind.

Then Gyaltsab Je continues in his commentary:

Since it is also incorrect to say that they are generated without cause, the Able One taught in the Close Placement with Mindfulness Sutra and others that they are generated from one's own negative mind.

From Close Placement with Mindfulness Sutra:

The mind is the greatest among all enemies.
There is no enemy like the mind.

We'll just read through the commentary as I have explained the points that are presented here when I taught the Madhyamakavatara.

An allegorical opponent: They were generated from the aggregation of fire, but this is a faulty parable.

An opponent without refined reasoning who wishes to deny karmic cause and effect poses this quailm: Where a pure water stream appears to humans, blood and pus appears to hungry ghosts. This is however only an appearance created by the ripening of previous negative karma, and the blood and pus cannot be used by hungry ghosts in the slightest. Because if it existed, then it would have to also appear to humans.

Answer: This is thoroughly mistaken. That something does not appear is possible of course, but if we accept that it is necessarily non-existent, then also the fires of hell are only mere appearances due to previous negative karmas. If we have to say here also, “Fire does not exist”, then it would be the same up to the eons and finally we also say that the hells do not exist. The need to deny karma then arises.

That it is suitable to appear to humans is also not established. According to the view of the nihilists and you, there are no hot or cold sensations when suffering is generated.

As these are points which have been presented earlier you can refer back to those teachings.¹

1.1.1.2.1.3. Summary

*8cd. Thus, in all the three realms
There is nothing as dangerous as the mind*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Since all faults arise from mind, all three realms are created by one's mind. There is no danger apart from this.

What, since all faults arise from the mind, all three realms are created by one's own mind. There is no danger apart from this, means that just as all qualities arise from the mind, all faults also rise from the mind. Therefore, in order to increase one's qualities, one needs to apply one's mind appropriately. To minimise and overcome all faults, one has to apply antidotes and so forth, which are generated within one's own mind. That is the main point.

That covers the verses that specifically explain how the faults depend on the mind.

The main point we need to understand as a personal instruction is that since we all have faults and many shortcomings, the best way to address that is to look within. While we might not be able to detect subtle faults or shortcomings, the grosser levels are not too obscure. At a manifest level we can detect some negative states of mind and the faults that arise from them, and it is up to us to take notice of that, and apply appropriate measures to overcome those shortcomings. That is the most practical approach, because if someone else were to point these faults out to us we might become very angry and defensive, rather than accepting what they say.

Geshe-la says in English that a good mind, which is very pleasant and filled with compassion, does good actions, and is liked by everyone. There's also a bad mind that no-one likes. We need to see them as separate, enemies even, and make sure the good mind works to defeat the bad mind. I always say that a good mind is a good friend. My best friend is my mind of loving kindness and compassion—I don't have much bodhicitta though. I encourage the good mind and say 'go away' to the bad mind. I do this all the time and day-by-day my good mind wins.

It is through applying these measures that we will then become accustomed to right ways of thinking. This is a point that is good for us in the western context to understand. It's good to make a distinction between yourself and the negative state of mind. Then it is more acceptable to point the finger at the fault, 'It's not me that's at fault. It's my negative state of mind that is at fault'.

The point here is that we need to make that distinction between oneself as an individual being who has qualities and good potential, and the faulty negative states of mind. When one is able acknowledge and accept that it is the negative state of mind that is influencing one to engage, seemingly without control, in negative actions that are harmful, and which are not appreciated by others. When we recognise that within ourselves, then when we relate to others it will be easy to accept that it is not the person who is at fault but their negative state of mind that is compelling them to say, or do things that are inappropriate and so forth. Then one will protect oneself against becoming angry at the person. Rather one will feel compassion for them, knowing that they are influenced by their negative states of mind.

In this way we can see for ourselves that one way of looking at things will lead to compassion and love for the other, but a different kind of view of the same object can generate anger and hateful thoughts. Then we can understand how our own state of mind influences our attitudes and perceptions and so forth. When we can detect that for ourselves then we will reach the crucial point of understanding that when we have a wrong perception that causes us angst, and hatred and anger and so forth, then we need to transform and change that perception. These points are the crux of our practices, and are not to be taken lightly.

If two individuals living together are sincerely practising in this way, then there will be no reason to frown at each other—they will always be nice and smile at each other. So even in this life you can see that there are great practical benefits to be had from practising the Dharma.

Based on these mind training practices we can then reach a point where we are capable of feeling love and compassion for the enemy, rather than anger. By using correct ways of perceiving things we can see that there is no real enemy, and that there is no person out there aiming to get us. Rather, the harm that they are inflicting upon us doesn't come from the person themselves but from the influence of their delusions, and negative states of mind. So this is where we can develop real compassion for them, rather than becoming angry with them. When one trains in this way, it is definitely possible to see one's enemy as one's best teacher or best friend.

In fact, this way of training is the subject of the following verses presenting the practices on generosity, morality, patience and so forth.

1.1.1.2.2. Qualities depend on the mind

This relates to the practice of the six perfections, which we will cover in our following sessions.

Basically the presentation is that the six perfections depend on the mind: generosity depends on the mind; morality depends on the mind; patience depends on the mind; joyous effort depends on the mind; and concentration and wisdom depend on the mind.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version © Tara Institute*

¹ See, for example, the teaching of 30 September 2003.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

10 June 2014

Based on the motivation we generated during the recitation, we can now engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

You can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: for the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. For that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

1.1. Guarding the mind as a method for guarding the trainings

1.1.1.2. The reason for this (cont.)

1.1.1.2.2. Qualities depend on the mind

Here there are six subdivisions:

1.1.1.2.2.1. Generosity depends on the mind

1.1.1.2.2.2. Morality depends on the mind

1.1.1.2.2.3. Patience depends on the mind

1.1.1.2.2.4. Enthusiasm depends on the mind

1.1.1.2.2.5. Mental stabilisation depends on the mind

1.1.1.2.2.6. Wisdom depends on the mind

So, what is being presented here is that the practices of the six perfections are all dependent on the mind. Actually, the giving and taking meditation practice we engaged in earlier also combines all the essential points of the six perfections. When we visualise giving our body, wealth, merits etc. this includes the practice of generosity. With the sincere intention for other beings not to experience any suffering, when we take their suffering upon ourselves one is naturally refraining from harming them, thus it includes the practice of morality. When we generate a sense of compassion for other sentient beings we naturally refrain from feeling anger towards them, thus it encompasses the practice of patience. When we do the practice willingly and joyfully, then that encompasses joyous effort. Having a focused mind while engaging in the practice includes the practice of concentration. Likewise, because the intelligence of differentiating between what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded—the intelligence of knowing what is beneficial and what is harmful—increases through repetition of this practice, it includes wisdom as well.

Thus when we do this practice sincerely with all the conditions intact it definitely becomes a very profound practice. While we may not be able to incorporate the actual practices of the six perfections in our meditation practice yet, we can, however, still adopt an approximation of the six perfections. Our ability to do this depends on our motivation. As explained in the teachings, three conditions need to be intact for the practice to become a perfection. For example, when the practice of generosity is accompanied with actual bodhicitta, the realisation of emptiness, and sealed with the profound dedication of complete enlightenment, then it becomes the perfection of generosity and so forth. So, if we generate the bodhicitta motivation to the best of our ability, recall the view of emptiness during the practice, and seal our virtues with the dedication towards obtaining enlightenment at the end, this will then ensure that our practice becomes an approximation to the actual perfection of the practices of generosity and so forth.

The Heart Sutra clearly indicates the need for the practice to be accompanied by the understanding of emptiness when Shariputra asks Avalokiteshvara, How should any son or daughter of the lineage train who wishes to practice the activity of the profound perfection of wisdom? and Avalokiteshvara replies Any son or daughter of the lineage who wishes to practise in the activity of the profound perfection of wisdom should look upon it like this, correctly and repeatedly beholding those five aggregates also as empty of inherent nature.

While each of the six perfections are not explicitly mentioned in the Heart Sutra the way the perfection of wisdom is to be practised relates to each of them and this is how we derive an understanding of the teachings. So, if one wonders, 'what is the difference between the individual practices such as generosity and so forth and the perfection of those practices?', then you need to understand it as was explained earlier.

In relation to the three conditions mentioned earlier, we already have the basis of love and compassion, we also have some understanding of emptiness, and we know how to dedicate our virtues. So the reason I emphasise this point again and again is to remind you that you already have a good basis for understanding the teachings. It is now a matter of putting your understanding of the Dharma into practice. Whenever we have any time to engage in a practice it is good to draw upon the understanding we have already gained from the teachings and then actually apply it in our practice. That makes it much more meaningful. For example, with love and compassion the general description is wishing other beings to be happy and to be free from suffering. However, we can make that practice much more profound with the understanding we have gained from the teachings. This is how we can develop the essential practice and make it more meaningful for ourselves. I encourage you in this because you have already received so many teachings and ways of applying these in your practice, and it would be a pity not to utilise that. It is with the intention of benefitting you that I encourage you again and again.

What I am trying to emphasise is that we need to use what we have already received and what we already know. With that serving as a basis we can then endeavour to acquire some new understanding or knowledge. Often we fall short in our practice by not utilising what we already know and keep looking for something new or grander. Often I find that many people fall short in their practice because of this attitude, and don't really advance themselves. I am not saying that gaining more or new knowledge is wrong. I am not implying that and you should not misunderstand me. What I am emphasising here is that we need to utilise what we already have, and if we acquire new understanding or knowledge, based on that, then it can only enhance our practice and will not confuse it.

As I emphasise regularly, love and compassion is the basis, and by maintaining this we can then incorporate other understandings, or knowledge, to enhance that within ourselves. That would be good—otherwise we could completely go astray. If I were to relate something as my personal practice I would say that it is the attempt to adopt love and compassion in my everyday life. This is actually a point I related to the late Khensur Rinpoche when I was in India. I spent about an hour with him, listening and talking, when he asked me, 'What are you meditating on these days?' and I said that I take love and compassion as my main practice and we had a discussion about that for about an hour.

Rinpoche said, 'Oh, that is a simple practice, even lay people and elderly people, who are not monks and nuns, would practice that'. Perhaps Khensur Rinpoche was expecting me to give a much more profound answer. So when he questioned me further I said that I felt that this practice encompasses a lot of other practices. Of course I was sharing what I truly believe. Indeed, when we train our mind more and more on love and compassion, then every time we generate that mind it brings us closer to enlightenment. So this is why I see it as an essential practice. Sadly, Khensur Rinpoche passed away shortly after this meeting.

The three main conditions that help to subdue the mind are love, compassion and concentration (or mental stabilisation). So if we can take these three as our essential practices then there is no question that we can work towards subduing our mind.

With the first perfection of generosity, what is being explained here is that it actually depends on a state of mind which is generated within oneself. This dispels the doubt that if generosity were to depend on material objects then how could one practise generosity if one lacked material objects to give? So, to clarify this point, what is being explained is that the perfection of generosity does not depend on external material objects but actually on one's state of mind.

The worldly perspective is that if someone were to give $100 to another person we would say they are very generous, because they gave $100. We immediately relate to the object they give as a mark of their generosity, as if the giving of that physical money was the actual practice of generosity.

A literal translation of the Tibetan term for the perfections par-chin is gone beyond, which relates to the practices that have gone beyond the states of samsara and nirvana and reached the state of complete enlightenment. The Svatantrika middle-way school gives a very literal explanation of the term gone beyond and says that the perfections of the practices of generosity and so forth are found only in a buddha's mental continuum. However, the Prasangika middle-way school differentiate between that which is actually gone beyond and that which is in the process of going beyond. Thus, the perfected practice of generosity, which has actually gone beyond, is indeed found only in a buddha's mental continuum. However the practice of generosity, which is in the process of going beyond, is in the trainee's (bodhisattva's) mind. According to the Prasangika, it would be a case of applying the name of a result upon the cause: the perfection of generosity is the practice of generosity that is in the process of going beyond in the bodhisattva's mind. It is good to understand the difference in interpretations from the different schools.

1.1.1.2.2.1. Generosity depends on the mind

This heading is subdivided into two:

1.1.1.2.2.1.1. Completing the perfection of generosity does not depend on eliminating the poverty of all migrators.

1.1.1.2.2.1.2. It is perfected through the acquaintance with the mind of giving.

1.1.1.2.2.1.1. Completing the perfection of generosity does not depend on eliminating the poverty of all migrators

The verse reads:

9. *If generosity goes beyond
Through eliminating the poverty of migrators,
Since migrators still have poverty,
How could the previous refuge have gone beyond?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

If it were necessary to eliminate the poverty of all sentient beings to complete the perfection of generosity, then, since impoverished migrators still exist, how could the generosity gone beyond exist?

How could the previous Buddha protectors possibly have completed the perfection of generosity? It would be impossible.

Bringing up this hypothetical query Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains that, if it were necessary to eliminate the poverty of all sentient beings to complete the perfection of generosity then, since there are still impoverished beings in need of things that would imply that the Buddha has not perfected the practice of generosity. This doubt is a way to present that the practice of the perfection of generosity does not depend on eliminating the poverty of all living beings.

We need to understand that our practice of generosity should not depend on the other, whether they are rich or poor, in great need or not. From our own side we need to be able to engage in the practice of generosity that is generated in our own mind.

Another practical illustration is that if the practice of the perfection of generosity depended on being generous with material objects that would mean that ordained Sangha would not be able to perfect the practice of generosity, because they don't have many material possessions to give away.

Another more prominent illustration would be Buddha Shakyamuni's own life. In his early days he would not have given up the wealth of his royal kingdom because that would have deprived him of the means of being able to practice generosity. Later, he actually left behind all his princely wealth, and become completely renounced.

Here again, the point is that the practice of generosity is not dependent on actual material wealth or completely satisfying other's needs. Rather it is dependent on the intent of giving, which is generated with one's own mind.

The means to perfect the practice of generosity is explained under the next heading.

1.1.1.2.2.1.2. It is perfected through the acquaintance with the mind of giving

The verse reads:

10. *Through the mind offering to all sentient beings
All possessions including their results,
Generosity goes beyond it is taught.
Therefore it is only mind.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

It is taught that the generosity gone beyond is perfected through acquainting one's mind with the wish to give away one's body, possessions, roots of virtue including their results, and one's merits to all sentient beings.

For this reason generosity depends on the mind.

The commentary clearly explains that the resultant or perfected state of generosity, which is completely going beyond, which is the mental continuum of an enlightened being, is reached through acquaintance with the mind that wishes to give away, now, one's body, possessions and roots of virtue including the results.

Again, the actual definition of generosity is the mind of giving or the intention to give. So the way to practise generosity is by generating the state of mind of wishing to give away one's body, possessions, roots of virtue etc. Again, we can relate to the giving and taking practice we did earlier. I need not elaborate too much on the importance of this practice, as it is exactly what is being presented here by Shantideva and further explained in the commentary, as being an essential practice. So we can see that our earlier practice, when done fully, encompasses all of these points.

So the way to engage in the practice, for it to become an authentic practice of generosity, we train our mind, gradually and slowly, to increase the intention of giving. To become an actual practice of generosity try to make it free from miserliness and, to the best of our ability, encompass an understanding of emptiness—that oneself, the giver, what is being given, and the action of giving, is empty of inherent existence. Incorporate that understanding as much as possible and then dedicate at the end. In this way our practice of generosity becomes really profound and we get so much merit from engaging in these practices. Giving away these merits as well makes it a profound practice.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

For this reason generosity depends on the mind.

We gain a better understanding of this point after the explanation.

1.1.1.2.2.2. Morality depends on the mind

This is subdivided into two:

1.1.1.2.2.2.1. Completing the morality gone beyond does not depend on the absence of sentient beings that one could kill

1.1.1.2.2.2.2. It is completed by acquainting the mind of abandoning.

1.1.1.2.2.2.1. Completing the perfection of morality does not depend on the absence of sentient beings that one could kill and so forth.

This does not depend on the absence of beings that one could harm. The point explained in the next the verse is that the perfection of morality is actually completed by acquainting the mind with abandoning the intention to harm.

*11ab. Fish and so forth, where should they flee to
So as not to be killed?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

It follows that the completion of the morality gone beyond does not depend on removing all sentient beings that could possibly be killed, because it is unfeasible to move all the animals such as fish and so forth to a safe place.

The explanation here is that completing the perfection of morality does not depend on removing all sentient beings that could be possibly killed, because it is not feasible to move all animals such as fish to a safe place where no one could harm them. We may be able to move some fish to a safe place where they would not be killed, but to remove all fish to where no one would be able to kill them is something that cannot possibly be done. Also there is no person who could always guard them, so that no-one comes and harms them.

1.1.1.2.2.2.2. It is completed by acquainting the mind of abandoning

The first two lines of the next verse explain this:

*11cd. Through the mind of abandoning,
Morality goes beyond, it is taught.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary highlights:

For this reason the morality gone beyond is achieved by acquainting the mind of abandoning, such as on the mind abandoning the thoughts of killing or stealing.

The practice of morality, relating to the perfection of morality, is dependent on a mind where from the depths of one's heart one makes the commitment that, 'I will not harm others. I will not kill even if my life is at stake. I will not take the life of other sentient beings'. In the commentary, for this reason, aligns to the earlier point that it is not even possible to find a safe haven for all of the animals and so forth, so they can never to be harmed. The perfection of morality is not dependent on establishing the situation (or place) where no beings will be harmed. Rather, as explained here, the morality gone beyond is achieved by acquainting the mind with abandoning the thoughts of killing and stealing. When one generates the mind of abandoning negativities such as killing and stealing (and likewise the other ten non-virtues), this clearly illustrates that while refraining from killing and stealing etc. is a good deed, doing so when one makes an actual commitment and intentionally generates the mind to refrain from such misdeeds, one gains much more virtue.

Many of you would already have vows which would include these sorts of commitments, but again even with the vows it is good to refresh them. It is much more meritorious to have vows than not, so one gains much more virtue when one actually intentionally develops the mind of refraining from engaging in misdeeds. Whenever one generates the mind of intentionally refraining from the ten non-virtues, such as making a commitment like, 'Today, at all costs, I will not engage in the act of killing or taking others' lives. Likewise I will not engage in the act of taking others' possessions. I will not engage in the act of sexual misconduct. Likewise I will not engage in lying, stealing, harsh words, divisive speech, idle gossip and so forth', then that is acquaintance with abandoning those negative deeds, and what we call the practice of morality. Each time we generate the intention of refraining from these misdeeds we accumulate great merit, much greater merit than if one were to just naturally refrain from these misdeeds.

The quote from a sutra encompasses the definition.

From a sutra:

If the morality gone beyond is explained: It is the intent to give up harming others.

1.1.1.2.2.3. Patience depends on the mind

Patience is the mind which, in the face of harms and sufferings, does not become disturbed. This has three subdivisions:

1.1.1.2.2.3.1. Meaning

1.1.1.2.2.3.2. The example

1.1.1.2.2.3.3. Relating the meaning and the example

1.1.1.2.2.3.1. Meaning

The verse reads:

*12. Unsubdued sentient beings equal space,
Destroying them is impossible.
Merely destroying this mind of anger,
Equals destroying all enemies.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Patience is completed by destroying one's anger, which equals destroying all external enemies. It is not achieved through the extinction of the objects of one's anger.

This is conclusive because unsubdued sentient beings equal space and it is impossible to destroy them all. Therefore patience also depends on the mind.

I have referred to the explanation patience is completed by destroying one's anger which equals destroying all external enemies several times. What is being implied here is that the practice of patience is not trying to overcome all external enemies since that is impossible. The actual practice of patience is dependent on one's own mind.

It is dependent on one's mind as it specifically destroys the anger in one's mind. Completing the perfection of patience is dependent of destroying anger in one's mind, rather than trying to overcome the external enemies. The commentary goes further when it says this is conclusive because unsubdued sentient beings equal space and it is impossible to destroy them all. The commentary concludes, therefore also patience depends on the mind.

1.1.1.2.2.3.2. The example

The verse reads:

13. *To cover the whole earth with leather,
Where should the leather come from?
To cover one's soles with leather
Equals covering the whole earth.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary proceeds:

Where would one find enough leather to cover the whole earth to prevent one's feet from being harmed by thorns and other sharp objects on the ground?

Covering the soles of one's shoes with leather will do the trick and prevent the feet from being harmed by thorns, sharp stones and the like. It equals covering the whole earth.

The verse poses the rhetorical question where would one find enough leather to cover the whole earth?, which implies that it is not possible to find enough leather to cover the whole earth to prevent one being harmed by thorns and other sharp objects. However covering the soles of one's shoes with leather will do the trick and prevent the feet from being harmed by thorns. So that is the method that equals covering the whole earth.

1.1.1.2.2.3.3. Relating the meaning and the example

The verse reads:

14. *Similarly, I do not oppose
External phenomena.
I should reverse this mind of mine,
Where is the need to oppose others?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

Similar to the analogy, it is impossible to oppose all harmful external phenomena. Instead one focuses one's mind on these objects and reverses the mind from generating anger. By acquainting the mind in such a way, patience is completed. Why should I oppose the objects of anger, it is impossible and unnecessary.

The commentary explains that, similar to the analogy of not being able to find enough leather to cover the earth to prevent sharp objects from harming oneself, it is impossible to oppose all external phenomena. The method used to perfect patience is to focus one's own mind on these objects, and reverse the mind from generating anger. This is a very profound point—the actual practice of patience implies overcoming anger within oneself. By acquainting the mind in such a way, patience is completed. The point is emphasised again with another rhetorical question, why should I oppose the other objects of anger since it is impossible to oppose them and actually quite unnecessary. There is no reason to try to oppose all others and objects when it is possible to overcome the anger in one's own mind.

What is being explained here is that the practice of patience implies overcoming anger within oneself, rather than trying to overcome all external enemies. So if one thinks that, 'I can only be patient if all my enemies are overcome', then that is missing the point. If one wishes to overcome enemies then one needs to overcome anger within oneself. That is equivalent to overcoming all the external enemies and will be the mark of perfecting the practice of patience.

That completes the explanation on patience and how it is dependent on the mind. For the practice of patience to become a perfection of patience, again it would have to encompass the three essential conditions of bodhicitta: the altruistic motivation of bodhicitta; understanding the view on emptiness; and the dedication. This applies to all of the practices of the six perfections in order for them to become the actual perfections.

1.1.1.2.2.4. Enthusiasm depends on the mind

The definition of enthusiasm or joyous effort is the mind which takes joy in virtue.

The verse reads:

15. *The results of generating a clear mind
Is Brahma and so forth.
Results of inferior practice endowed
With body and speech are not like that.*

The first part of Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

The complete acquaintance of enthusiasm also depends upon the mind that has completed meditation. A clear mind of joy for meditating on an absorption of the first concentration brings about results contained within the grounds of absorption, such as rebirth in the place of Brahma.

This part of the commentary explains the reason why the complete acquaintance of enthusiasm depends on the mind. A clear mind of joy for meditating on an absorption of the first concentration which is a higher state, brings about results contained within the grounds of absorption, such as rebirth in the place of Brahma. This means that when even a moment of clear mind and joy arises from the absorption in the first concentration, because one applied joyous effort and achieved that state of mind, the result is to be born in the heavens of Brahma. Achieving this state also implies strength of the mind. The emphasis here is that when the mind is clear and strong, accompanied with the joy of practising such a meditation, then it can bring about a great result.

The next part of the commentary reads:

If one's actions are unrelated to such a strong mind, then one's mind is endowed with actions of body and speech, and such actions with lesser enthusiasm do not have the ability to produce a mind of the first concentration and so forth. Such a result depends on a strong mind.

When the mind lacks that strength and there is no joy in practices such as meditation, then one's physical and verbal actions will also carry less potency. So even if one were to attempt to meditate it will not bring about the results of obtaining the first concentration and so forth. Thus, such results depend on joyous effort, which actually depends on the strength of one's mind.

1.1.1.2.2.5. Mental stabilisation depends on the mind

Mental stabilisation is the mind which in its own power has the ability to focus on an object for as long as one wishes.

16. *All recitations and austerities,
Even if practiced for a long time,
Done with a wandering mind
They are meaningless, the Knowledge teaches.*

This is indeed a direct reprimand for ourselves.

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

The completion of mental stabilisation gone beyond depends on a clear mind free from mental excitement and mental sinking and held by the mental application of renunciation.

Although one practices the recitation of mantras and austerities such as Nyung Nye for a long time, the mind is distracted to other objects.

We need to understand that in order for mental stabilisation to be an authentic mental stabilisation it has to be a clear mind that is free from mental excitement and mental sinking, or stupor. This can be helped by the mental application of renunciation.

From the Buddha's sutras,

Bhikhus, austerities, prayers and so forth that distract the mind to the desire realm do not have a result.

They are shown to be meaningless because of not giving the desired result.

We need to understand this quote in relation to recitation of mantras, austerities such as Nyung Nye, practices, retreats etc. which have been shown to be meaningless, because of not getting the desired result.

This explanation does not mean that there is no benefit at all in these practices; there is definitely a benefit even if one's mind is a little distracted. For example, there is still benefit in reciting mantras as you stop any other verbal negativities such as idle gossip etc. So to that extent there is definitely some benefit. However if one's mind is distracted, one will not reap the full benefit of the practice. This applies to any practice including the Nyung Nye practice. If one does a Nyung Nye of course one derives some benefit from merely engaging in the practice, but if the mind is distracted one will not reap the full benefit, just a minimal benefit.

The personal instruction here is that when we are doing any practice it is highly advisable to try and do it without a distracted mind. If one were to do one's practices in this way one will reap the actual intended benefit. Thus, it is good for us to prevent ourselves from being distracted.

1.1.1.2.2.6. Wisdom depends on the mind

- 17 *They who do not know the main supreme Dharma,
This secret of the mind, although wishing
To attain happiness and destroy suffering,
They will wander meaninglessly in the hells without respite.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

Wisdom also depends on the mind. A person that is not a vessel for the main dharma or the supreme meaning, and is thus not shown these, does not know the secret of mind, the ultimate truth.

Although they wish to attain highest happiness and destroy the sufferings of cyclic existence, they naturally wander to the realm without respite, where there is nothing of these things they wish for.

Therefore wisdom depends on the mind.

Again, the definition of wisdom is the mind which is able to clearly differentiate and discriminate between the subtleties of the objects to be examined.

The commentary clearly explains that wisdom depends on the mind, and that a person is not a vessel for the supreme meaning if they do not know the secret of the mind, the ultimate truth. This refers to the nature of the mind which is its non-inherent existence (or emptiness). To perfect wisdom, when the mind realises emptiness of all phenomena it also needs to realise the emptiness of one's own mind. For someone who does not know the ultimate truth of their mind, then although they wish to attain higher status and destroy the suffering of cyclic existence, they can actually wander in the samsaric realm without respite where there are none of the things they wish for. In other words, we could wander in the cycle of samsara, the nature of suffering for limitless time. However, by understanding the ultimate reality of all phenomena in relation to one's mind, one would free oneself from this, and attain liberation, or enlightenment.

Wisdom is perfected to the state of going beyond, to the state of enlightenment, when one understands the ultimate reality of one's mind. The commentary concludes therefore wisdom depends on the mind.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

17 June 2014

Based on the motivation we have just generated we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

Generating this motivation to the best of our ability is really worthwhile.

1.1.3. Striving in guarding the mind

This section of the text is divided into two:

1.1.3.1. Showing, or the presentation

1.1.3.1. Explaining

1.1.3.1. SHOWING

18. *This mind of mine, therefore
I shall hold it well, I shall guard it well.
Apart from the discipline of guarding the mind
What shall one do with many disciplines?*

In his commentary Gyaltzab Je presents the meaning of this verse with the following:

Abandoning faults and achieving qualities depends on the mind. Therefore I shall hold this mind of mine well with mindfulness and introspection, and guard it well, so as to not let it degenerate.

Apart from the discipline of guarding the mind, what shall one do with the many other disciplines of prayers and so forth that don't guard the mind? They are unnecessary.

I have explained the meaning of the line, abandoning faults and achieving qualities depends on the mind many times over in the past. It's a point that I regularly emphasise in my teachings. Abandoning every fault and achieving all qualities depends on none other than one's own mind. Here, faults includes all non-virtues as well as all the delusions, and qualities can range from the simplest qualities up to the greatest qualities that can be achieved. That all of these faults and qualities are dependent on one's own mind is an incisive point, showing that the responsibility for overcoming faults lies with ourselves and that we cannot rely upon others to overcome them for us. Likewise, we cannot rely on someone else to develop qualities for us because they depend solely on our own mind, and thus we need to develop good qualities for ourselves.

Having presented that abandoning faults and achieving good qualities depends on the mind, the commentary goes on to say, I shall hold this mind of mine well, with mindfulness and introspection. This point indicates that the way to abandon faults and achieve qualities is to apply mindfulness and introspection. As mentioned previously, mindfulness in this context relates to constantly keeping in mind what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded. Introspection refers to keeping constant vigilance over the three doors of our body, speech and mind, checking whether one is adequately adopting things that need to be adopted, and discarding what has to be discarded.

Guarding the mind so that it does not degenerate relates to not allowing the virtuous mind to degenerate. In order to protect the qualities of kindness, love and compassion and so forth, so that they don't degenerate, we need to always guard the mind with mindfulness and introspection. This also relates to whatever vows and commitments we have undertaken—we have to guard them so that they don't degenerate. To take that further, when the commentary asks, apart from the discipline of guarding the mind what shall one do with other disciplines and prayers and so forth that don't guard the mind?, it is saying that if one does not apply the discipline of guarding the mind, then practices such as doing prayers and so forth will have minimal effect. That is the main point.

What we need to derive as a personal instruction here is that the main discipline that one needs to apply is to guard the mind from non-virtue and negativities. If our practices such as reciting prayers and mantras are done with mindfulness as a way to create virtue, then they will have a positive effect. But if we don't apply mindfulness then they won't really have much positive effect. This explanation should encourage us to remember this crucial advice and to try to apply mindfulness whenever we engage in our regular commitments and practices. In this way our practice will be intact and we will gradually gain positive effects from it.

What we really need to understand from this presentation is that if we do our prayers and normal commitments with a mind that is distracted by the objects of delusions, then our practices will not have much effect. If we wonder why we are not obtaining any significant result from our practices, then we need to check whether we are applying mindfulness during those practices. We all know from experience that when we engage in practices with a distracted mind we don't derive many results from our practice.

So, as much as we can, we need to apply mindfulness while doing our practice. As I regularly emphasise, it is important to try to ensure that our practices are intact and that we fully utilise our time in practice. It is only by engaging in practices fully with mindfulness that they will bring about significant positive effects. This is exactly the point that is being emphasised here. It is a really significant point and it is appropriate to pay heed to it.

1.1.3.2. EXPLAINING

The previous verse showed that one needs to apply mindfulness. This section explains how to do that in four subdivisions.

1.1.3.2.1. The way of guarding the mind

1.1.3.2.2. The reason why it is necessary to guard the mind

1.1.3.2.3. The benefits of guarding it

1.1.3.2.4. Generating mindfulness to guard the mind wholeheartedly

¹The outline shows us how meticulously the text is presented. The logical and systematic presentation addresses the topic in a way that is suitable for those who wish to follow this practise. Gyaltzab Je's outlines highlight the systematic manner in which Shantideva composed his text. First it shows that it is necessary to guard the mind. We then naturally wonder how we do that, which he explains under these four headings. The way to guard the mind is presented first. That is followed by the reasons why it is necessary to guard the mind. Then, if one wonders what the benefits would be, the benefits are presented. Finally, there is a presentation of how to actually generate mindfulness to guard the mind wholeheartedly. So Gyaltsab Je's commentary shows us how Shantideva very meticulously, and very logically and systematically, presents advice for us to incorporate into our practice.

¹ Here there was a pause as the heating was adjusted. Geshe Doga then explained in English that the underfloor heating was installed over the concrete floor for health reasons, and that it was funded by a donation from a student called Radim, who had offered Geshe Doga two gold bars. Geshe Doga said that he could not accept them, so Radim gave them to Tara Institute. They were sold for around $12,000, which paid for the underfloor heating. Later, when Radim became ill, the Centre paid for his trip back home.

You can see the significance of this presentation by relating it to taking an interest in meditation. Do we really consider why we need to apply mindfulness? Do we know the manner of actually applying it and the benefits of applying it? Do we really contemplate these points? Probably not. These initiatives don't come about easily. We can see how Shantideva presents his material here in a very systematic way so that we can really understand the significance and take the practice to heart.

1.1.3.2.1. The way of guarding the mind

19. *If one is in the midst of a restless crowd,
One will focus and be conscientious of one's wound.
Similarly, in the midst of unruly people,
One guards continuously the wound of the mind.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

A person with a wound on his body who is in the midst of a restless crowd will apply himself very strongly to protect the wound. Similarly, if one is in the midst of unruly people, who could serve as a condition for afflictions to arise in one's mind, then one needs to continuously guard the wound of one's mind.

If one does not guard one's mind, then it will be the condition that cuts off the life of one's higher status and liberation.

This presentation is quite clear. The essential point is made with an analogy: when a person with a wound goes into a hustling, bustling crowd they would be very vigilant about protecting their wound, so that it isn't further damaged, thus causing more pain. If one is in the midst of unruly people who could serve as a condition for afflictions to arise in one's mind, refers to the way in which others can easily influence us in such a way that we generate delusions in our minds. In such an environment, one needs to continuously guard one's mind, just like the earlier analogy of protecting a wound in a crowd. One needs to pay particular attention to guarding the mind at such times.

Furthermore, if one does not guard one's mind then that would be the condition that cuts off the life of one's higher status and liberation. This means that not guarding the mind will prevent one from achieving one's higher goals. This is a very clear explanation that we really need to take to heart and carefully contemplate in our practice.

It is when one meets with the conditions for afflictions to arise that one needs to pay particular attention to guarding the mind. This is the essential point that is being presented here. Our minds are so easily influenced by the delusions, so we need to always be on guard. We need to guard our wound-like mind against any conditions that will cause delusions to be generated. If we find that delusions such as anger and attachment arise from even the slightest conditions, then that is a sign that we need to pay particular attention to guarding the mind. These are significant points.

If we are easily influenced by objects of delusion, then even minor conditions will cause the delusions to arise. That is a clear sign of a mind that needs to be guarded well. Some people actually get very upset when they can't find an object of delusion, such as an object of attachment. They actively seek out objects of attachment and experience misery and suffering when they can't find them. Craving objects of delusion shows how habituated the mind actually is with the delusions.

On a further note, paying particular attention to guarding the mind applies in all forms of practice. Many of you would have heard the story of the person who was meditating and when asked what they were meditating on they responded, 'I am meditating on patience'. But when some critical remarks were made, they immediately became upset. That is a sign of not guarding the mind. While generally assuming that they were meditating on patience, they failed to guard their mind, lost their temper and were not able to practise patience in that moment. These are examples in the teachings that show how we need to be constantly vigilant. I also remember an instance where someone came up to me and said that he wanted to become a monk. I questioned whether he should consider it more deeply and he said, 'Oh no! I am really adamant about this! I am very sure that I really want to become a monk'. Then two weeks later he found a partner, and moved in with them!

The main point here is to be extremely careful about guarding one's mind when the conditions for the delusions to arise are present. The teachings tell us that when there are no apparent conditions for delusions to arise someone may look like a real Dharma practitioner, but as soon as particular conditions arise they may act as a very ordinary person.

1.1.3.2.2. The reason why it is necessary to guard the mind

This is again a very important point that we need to keep in mind. The reason is presented in the next verse along with an example.

20. *If one is afraid of even the small suffering
Of a wound and guards it,
Then why does one not guard, frightened by the catcher
And crusher mountains, the wound of the mind?*

Again, this is explained quite clearly in the commentary, but the main point here is the need to take it to heart.

If it is suitable to guard a wound due to fearing slight physical pain, then why does one not guard the wound of the mind from negativity and downfalls due to fearing the sufferings of being crushed by the mountains of the Catcher Mountain Hell and the Crusher Mountain Hell? Both of these would be the result of mental degeneration.

One should guard one's mind with the thought: 'It would be a great mistake not to guard it'.

As presented in the commentary, because of the fear of physical pain from further injuring a wound, it is considered reasonable or suitable to guard any wound one may have so that it does not come into contact with anything that would cause physical pain. We pay so much attention to guarding a wound, because of fear about experiencing physical pain, so why do we not guard the wound of the mind from negativity and downfalls out of fear of the suffering of the hells of mass destruction, where, some of you might recall from the teachings, beings are crushed between two giant masses of mountains? These hellish experiences and great suffering are none other than the result of not guarding the mind from negativities and downfalls. So they are the ultimate result of allowing the mind to degenerate. The conclusion, as explained in the commentary, is that one should guard one's mind with the thought that it would be a great mistake not to guard it.

Here it is good to relate this to our understanding of karma, knowing that when one creates negativity the result will be the undesirable result of experiencing suffering. Therefore, if one does not wish to experience suffering it is appropriate that we prevent the cause of suffering, which is guarding the mind from negativity and downfalls.

When we really contemplate the reasons why we need to guard the mind we will be encouraged to actually apply the methods to do so. So contemplating these reasons is a very significant point.

1.1.3.2.3. The benefits of guarding it

This is similar to the very reason why we practise Dharma—simply put, we want happiness and we don't want to experience suffering.

The verse relating to this heading is:

21. *If one lives by such a conduct
One is suitable to abide amongst unruly people
Or amongst women.
The stability of striving in the vows will not degenerate.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

If one continually practises stopping the afflictions, the stability of the mind striving in the vows will not degenerate, regardless of whether one abides in the midst of unruly people with much anger, or whether one abides in the vicinity of women with much attachment.

The point, if one continually practises preventing the afflictions from arising, is something that we can apply to ourselves. If we find that the afflictions are arising quite readily, then perhaps we are not applying the antidotes on a continuous basis. If we apply them sometimes, and relax at other times, then, of course, that will have little effect on the delusions. The point here is that we need to continuously practise preventing the afflictions from arising, and then the stability of the mind striving in the vows will not degenerate.

This is how we protect self-liberation vows, bodhisattva vows, tantric vows, and whatever other vows or commitments we may have made. The way to protect vows is, as mentioned previously, to apply the antidotes to the afflictions on a continuous basis. Then, regardless of whether one abides in the midst of unruly, angry people, or whether one abides in the vicinity of beautiful goddesses, it will not affect one's mind.

Here we need to recall that Shantideva was giving this advice to fully ordained monks, so we need to understand his examples and illustrations in this context. Nevertheless Shantideva's advice applies to all who are striving to guard their mind and practise the Dharma.

The point here concerns guarding the vows and commitments one has taken. Of course, if those who have taken ordination do not guard their minds against the afflictions, then the vows will be given up at a later stage—in some cases very quickly. However, in a broader sense, the point relates to any vows; the layperson's vows, the self-ordination vows, the bodhisattva vows and the tantric vows many of you have taken. The best method to guard and protect these vows from degenerating is to continually practise mindfulness to stop the afflictions, and to apply antidotes to the afflictions when they arise. That will help to stabilise the mind so that the vows do not degenerate.

1.1.3.2.4. Generating mindfulness to guard the mind wholeheartedly

Having mentioned its benefits, we need to use mindfulness to guard the mind wholeheartedly. Therefore mindfulness is specifically presented as a very important element of our practice. The verse relating to that is:

22. *It is easy not to have gain, or praise,
A body, or livelihood.
It is also alright for other virtues to degenerate,
But do not let the mind degenerate at all.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Although one gains no food, clothing and the like, receives no praise such as veneration, and has no livelihood to support body and life, that is easy.

To lose virtue unprotected by the mind is easy as well, but the mind of the Great Vehicle should not be allowed to degenerate under any circumstances.

Again, this is not too difficult to understand. Although one gains no food, clothing and the like, receives no praise such as veneration, and has no livelihood to support body and life, that is easy, refers to the fact that these conditions are not really all that important.

When the commentary states that to lose virtue unprotected by the mind is easy as well, it is referring to virtues that are stained by worldly concerns. While on one hand they are classified as virtues, on the other hand they are stained because they are not protected from the stains of the worldly concerns, or self-interest. So if these virtues were to decline or degenerate, then that is not so important. This relative unimportance is measured in comparison to losing the mind of the Great Vehicle, which is bodhicitta, which should not be allowed to degenerate under any circumstances.

Compared with bodhicitta, virtues that are stained by worldly concerns or self-interest and other basic needs in relation to our immediate needs are quite insignificant. But the bodhicitta mind must be protected under all circumstances, and one should never allow it to degenerate.

While we may not yet have developed bodhicitta, any level of kindness, particularly the mind wishing to benefit others, is, as I regularly emphasise, a really precious mind. When that is further developed, we develop love and compassion, which serves as a cause to develop bodhicitta. The greater the wish to benefit others, the greater the conditions for bodhicitta will be. Once developed, of course, the bodhicitta attitude will be sustained by the continuing wish to benefit others. Therefore, one should not under any circumstances underestimate this state of mind of kindness and wishing to benefit others.

We can develop that wish to benefit others to a certain extent, and the instruction here is to always protect that mind and never lose that wish to benefit others, because that is the most valuable asset that we can ever have. It should be the centrepiece of our practice, like a fortress, and then all of the remaining practices will enhance that bodhicitta. That is the significance of this instruction.

As I have shared before, at our level a substitute for the actual bodhicitta attitude would be generating the attitude, 'I will not harm any living being, even slightly, and I will endeavour to benefit others to the best of my ability'. We can definitely manage to generate such a highly beneficial state of mind on a regular basis. As it is a substitute for bodhicitta for us, it is a highly significant state of mind.

1.2. Guarding mindfulness and introspection, which are the methods for guarding the mind

This section is explained in two subdivisions:

1.2.1. Showing, or the presentation

1.2.2. Explaining

1.2.1. Showing

The relevant verse is:

23. *You who wish to protect your mind,
Guard with wholehearted effort
Mindfulness and introspection,
I request with hands folded.*

The commentary explaining this verse reads.

You, who wish to guard your mind, since one cannot guard one's mind if one is separated from mindfulness and introspection, do not let the mindfulness that does not forget the virtuous object, and the introspection that analyses the situation of the three doors, degenerate, I, called Shantideva, request this with my hands folded.

What is being presented here very clearly is an exhortation. Shantideva is pleading with us, saying, 'You want to guard your mind, but it cannot be guarded without mindfulness or introspection. Therefore you must definitely not let mindfulness, which does not forget the virtuous object, and introspection, which analyses the three doors, degenerate. Having folded hands is a gesture showing that Shantideva is imploring us to adopt mindfulness and introspection. We can see this in everyday life. When we make a specific request to someone there are gestures like putting one's palms together and saying, 'Please do this'. Referring to this gesture is a way of showing the importance of mindfulness and introspection as a method of guarding the mind.

I have already explained the significance of mindfulness, and the actual explanations of what mindfulness is in detail, so we can leave the explanation of this verse at that.

1.2.2. Explaining

This is subdivided into two:

1.2.2.1. The faults of lacking introspection

1.2.2.2. Guarding mindfulness as the method for guarding introspection

1.2.2.1. THE FAULTS OF LACKING INTROSPECTION

This heading is further sub-divided into five:

1.2.2.1.1. Any action devoid of introspection lacks power

1.2.2.1.2. One does not generate pure wisdom

1.2.2.1.3. One does not generate pure morality

1.2.2.1.4. Earlier accumulated virtue is destroyed

1.2.2.1.5. It obstructs the achievement of virtue not accumulated earlier

1.2.2.1.1. Any action devoid of introspection lacks power

Here, action refers specifically to virtuous actions. What is explained under this heading is that when introspection is not applied to any virtuous action then the power of that virtuous action is reduced.

The verse that relates to this is:

24. *A person that is wracked by illness
Does not have energy for any work.
Similarly, a mind disturbed by ignorance
Does not have energy for any work.*

As clearly explained clearly in the commentary:

A person who is wracked by strong illness does not have the ability to work in the fields. Similarly, a mind that is wracked by the ignorance of not knowing what needs to be practised and what needs to be abandoned does not have strength for any type of virtuous action.

The analogy used here is that someone who is weighed down with heavy illness won't have the physical energy to be able to work in the fields of the farm, and so forth. Similarly, a mind that is riddled or wracked with the ignorance of not knowing what needs to be practised and what is to be abandoned, will not have the strength for any virtuous actions.

While wisdom is specifically emphasised in the next verse, this verse refers to the fact that a mind that is dominated by the ignorance of not knowing what is to be practised and what is to be abandoned will not have sufficient strength for any type of virtuous action. If, through ignorance, you don't know what is to be abandoned and what is to be adopted, you won't understand the significance of any virtuous action you may create. So your virtuous activities won't carry as much weight as they would if you understood their significance.

Basically, when the introspection that is particularly vigilant about one's actions of body, speech and mind, is not applied, then whatever virtuous actions one engages in, such as listening, will not have much effect. This even applies to listening to the Dharma. Further, the proper means to contemplate will be affected by the lack of introspection, and thus not carry much weight. As well as this, meditation will not carry much weight if introspection is lacking. That is the point being made in this verse.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnnett or Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

24 June 2014

Based on the motivation we have just generated, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

To generate the motivation for receiving the teaching think, “For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well”.

1.2.2.1 THE FAULTS OF LACKING INTROSPECTION

1.2.2.1.2. One does not generate pure wisdom

If we lack mindfulness and introspection our ability to generate pure or perfect wisdom will be hindered. The following presentation will be relatively easy to comprehend as the meaning is not too difficult to grasp, but what we need to keep in mind is that it is advice we need to apply to ourselves, in relation to our own practice. All of us have already spent significant time listening to the Dharma, thinking about it and even trying to meditate. What is being presented here is that even though one has spent significant time engaging in this, if one does not continuously apply mindfulness and introspection then it is still possible for one's practice to degenerate. This is a really key point to keep in mind. As I emphasise regularly, we see cases where certain individuals may have spent quite a bit of time and energy studying and so forth, but then after some time they give up the Dharma. What causes them to give up their Dharma practice is not having applied mindfulness and introspection in their regular life.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

25. *Even the listening, contemplation and meditation
Of someone having a mind devoid of introspection,
Like water in a leaking vase,
Will not be kept in mind by memory.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the verse:

If one is separated from introspection, then one will not generate perfect wisdom. A person may even have the wisdoms of listening, contemplating and meditating from before, but if they lack introspection then, like water that does not remain in a broken vase, they do not abide in mindfulness and thus their wisdom degenerates. This is due to degenerated introspection.

The advice here is really succinct, but for us to incorporate its meaning into our life, we need to take this advice as a personal instruction. When we consider the fact that this advice is given by Shantideva—a bodhisattva himself—from his own insight and profound wisdom, illustrating that the most crucial point on the path to enlightenment is to maintain mindfulness and introspection. That should then encourage one to actually take this advice to heart.

The commentary starts with, If one is separated from introspection. Introspection here refers to the mind that is constantly vigilant of the way we conduct ourselves through our mind, through our physical actions, and through our speech. What is being presented here is the result of not applying introspection, which is something we need to recall again and again, for example, ‘What are the thoughts occurring in my mind?’, ‘How am I conducting my physical actions?’, ‘What kind of speech am I uttering?’ One must check on the basis of distinguishing between what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded, then analyse how one is conducting oneself through one's body, speech and mind. In a meditation session, having applied mindfulness and identified the object and focused on it, after a while that which checks whether we are still keeping our focus on the chosen object is done by introspection. So if our mind has wandered off and we've become distracted, then it is through introspection that we will notice that, and then we need to reapply mindfulness. This approach is being explained here in terms of mindfulness with our body, speech and mind in our daily lives.

Thus, as the commentary explains, if one is separated from introspection then the consequence is that one will not generate perfect wisdom. The Tibetan term te implies that a reason is to follow, which is presented here with the example of a broken or cracked vase. In the regular offering prayer that we do here before tea and meals there is also the word te; however some teachers have said the meaning would be more profound if the word nyi (or sole) is used instead, which would reflect that the lama is the sole creator of all.

So, what is being explained is that even if a person has previously gained a certain amount of wisdom through listening, contemplating and meditating, if they lack introspection, then that would affect their mindfulness as well. A lack of mindfulness arises because of not applying introspection, they are mutually supportive of each other—to have good mindfulness one needs to have adequate introspection.

The example of a cracked vase presented here is similar to that given in Lam Rim teachings, in which the analogy extends to three types of vases describing the conditions from which one needs to be free in order to listen to the teachings: the upside down vase; the dirty vase and the leaky vase. As the Lam Rim explains, it is really important to be free from these conditions in order to be a good recipient for the teachings, so they can benefit one's mind. I have emphasised this point previously.

Using the first example, if one were like an upside down vase when listening to teachings, then, just as one cannot pour water into the vase, likewise when one listens one cannot pay attention, and no matter how many teachings are presented they will not go into one's mind. With a dirty vase, if clean food and drink are put into it, then it will spoil the food. In relation to listening to teachings, this analogy shows that one needs to be free from a negative motivation as this will spoil the teachings. Even if the teachings themselves are pure, one will completely misinterpret them and get the wrong meaning. Thirdly, a vase may be upright and clean, but if it has a leak then no matter what is put into it, it will all come out. Common sayings support this, e.g. ‘what goes in one ear comes out the other’. So whatever the teaching one has listened to, one needs to be able to retain it. The point is that we need mindfulness to retain whatever instructions or teachings we receive.

We need to understand the proper manner of listening to the teachings. The Lam Rim states one needs to be free from the three adverse conditions (the analogy of the three vases) and apply the six recognitions. These are important points. Just as water does not remain in a broken vase, someone who lacks introspection will not be able to abide in mindfulness. This again shows how mindfulness is supported by introspection. If one lacks introspection that affects one's mindfulness, and also the wisdom of listening, contemplating and meditating, then whatever wisdom one has gained will degenerate. This is all due to the degeneration of introspection.

1.2.2.1.3. One does not generate pure morality

This indicates that someone who lacks introspection will not be able to generate pure morality.

The verse reads:

26. *A person listening, having faith
And striving strongly in many ways,
Because of having the fault of lacking
introspection,
Becomes sullied by the dirt of downfalls.*

Gyaltsab Je explains this verse as follows:

A person with faith who has listened to many teachings and strives strongly in many different ways to practise virtue, but who has the fault of not having introspection that knows what is right and what is wrong, will be sullied by the pollution of the dirt of the downfalls. Therefore one should strive in guarding introspection.

This explanation is very relevant at this time. If a person already has faith, has listened to many teachings and has striven strongly in many ways to practise virtue but has not maintained the introspection of knowing what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded, then their practice is sullied by the pollution of the stains of the downfalls.

We can see so many examples of this within the Tibetan community itself, with geshe and even lamas giving up their vows. Some have practised significantly for many years and later gave up their vows. We can also see many westerners who were once ordained Sangha, monks and nuns, who have now given up their vows. On a personal note, when I was in India many years ago I met a monk who was from Amdo. I recall I was really taken by his good composure, and apparently he had spent 12 years in retreat. He seemed like a very subdued monk, a very unique and genuine sort of monk at that time. However, at a later stage apparently he gave up being a monk and started living a lay life. This is quite astonishing to see.

I have heard many accounts of otherwise quite learned and good monks who have later disrobed. I recall another instance in the year 2000 at a Kalachakra initiation teaching in Bodhgaya. I was sitting up in front with Geshe Sonam and just in front was another youngish monk. As His Holiness passed by to the throne he would stop and pat me on the back and talk to me. The young monk in front recognised me and called me by name. I asked Geshe Sonam who he was and he told me he was quite a learned monk, actually a geshe from Sera Je who teaches the young monks in Namgyal Monastery, His Holiness' personal monastery in Dharamsala. Apparently His Holiness was fond of him because of his good knowledge and ability to teach other monks. This young geshe was fond of me and started to ask me questions on debate topics. The answers I gave him seemed to satisfy him. He said that if I needed any text books or anything from Dharamsala he could send them to me. He would even help me during the tea breaks to go to the private toilets inside, so I didn't have to go outside. So anyway, we had a good rapport. Then about a year later I heard that he had travelled to Canada, is no longer a monk and is now living a regular life as a lay person. This brought to my awareness how pitiful it is to lose such great teachers to an ordinary life.

At the conclusion of this verse Gyaltsab Je mentions Therefore one should strive in guarding introspection. The implication here is that even if one is quite learned and has gained quite a lot of wisdom from listening to the teachings over many years, contemplating the meanings and even meditated to a certain degree, then, if all of this is not supported with continuous mindfulness and introspection there is still the chance for one to be sullied by stains of the downfall. Thus, introspection is presented as being essential to maintain one's practice.

A commitment that many of you are already doing regularly, called the Six Session Guru Yoga, is structured as a means to maintain mindfulness and introspection continuously. One meditates and reviews the vows and commitments three times in the morning and three times in the afternoon/evening which helps one maintain one's mindfulness and introspection throughout the day.

The Six Session Guru Yoga practice requires not just reciting the words, but recalling the meaning to the best of our ability. Again, we have all spent significant time hearing a lot of teachings, thinking and contemplating so it would be a great pity if we lost whatever wisdom we have gained now, or if it degenerated. So, in order to maintain the understanding we have gained we definitely need to apply mindfulness and introspection. I regularly encourage you by saying 'always protect your mind with mindfulness and introspection'. This includes myself too; I also need to be mindful and careful of my practice. There is a Tibetan expression which says that the teacher shouldn't be like a trumpet. This analogy is used as the opening of the trumpet is faced outward and the sound goes out loudly. So it is for mutual benefit that we need to be reminded of this point.

I acknowledge that you already spend a lot of time studying and paying attention to the teachings, which is great. Now the only thing is to remind you to maintain that by practising with mindfulness and introspection. The main point is to maintain a continuity of practice.

1.2.2.1.4. Earlier accumulated virtue is destroyed

This indicates that earlier accumulated virtue can be destroyed with the lack of introspection.

The verse reads:

27. *The thief of a lack of introspection
Follows degenerated mindfulness.
Although having accumulated merits
The thief steals them and one goes to the lower realms.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning, along with an analogy:

A person without introspection will be robbed by the thief of the afflictions of their earlier accumulated wealth of merits due to degenerated introspection, which forgets the virtuous object.

When earlier accumulated wealth is stolen the person becomes a beggar. Similarly, when earlier accumulated merits are stolen the person becomes destitute of merits and goes to the lower realms.

When a person lacks introspection the afflictions will rob them like a thief. What they are being robbed of is their accumulated merit. Usually a thief would rob someone of their wealth and the analogy here relates to our accumulated merits. This explains that merits accumulated earlier can be taken away due to a degenerated introspection which forgets the virtuous object. The connection here is that if one is not mindful of the virtuous object then one will forget it. Furthermore, with a lack of introspection one does not bring one's mind back to the virtuous object. Thus, because one does not bring one's focus back to the virtuous object, one's earlier accumulated merits will degenerate. Referring to the analogy, when accumulated wealth is stolen a person becomes a beggar, even when a wealthy person is robbed, because their wealth is gone they will be left with nothing and become a beggar. Using this same analogy, when earlier accumulated merit is stolen, the person becomes destitute and goes to the lower realms. The significant point here is that if one forgets the virtuous object, which is all the accumulated virtues that one has accumulated, (and the causes for one to obtain a fortunate rebirth) then, with a lack of introspection, all of those virtues can degenerate, which is the cause for one to go to the lower realms.

So we need to be really careful not to lose the virtues that we have put so much effort into accumulating earlier. In relation to ourselves, we have definitely listened to the teachings, accumulated knowledge and understanding and engaged in practices for accumulating merits. When all that we have acquired does not degenerate then they would be significant causes for a fortunate rebirth. However, if they were to degenerate through forgetting the virtuous object due to lack of mindfulness and introspection, then we actually lose the causes we have already accumulated. That is why we need to take this instruction to heart.

1.2.2.1.5. It obstructs the achievement of virtue not accumulated earlier

This means that lacking introspection will prevent one from accumulating further virtue which one may not have accumulated already.

If one maintains introspection then one's earlier accumulated virtue will not be destroyed, and one will not be obstructed from achieving virtue one has not yet accumulated. In contrast to that, if we were to lack introspection, then earlier accumulated virtue is destroyed and we are further obstructed from achieving virtues that we have not yet accumulated. This is how we need to incorporate the need to apply and always maintain introspection, as opposed to lacking it, and the consequences of that.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

28. *This gang of affliction robbers
Looks for an opportunity.
If they get a chance they steal virtue
And kill off the life of a happy rebirth.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning:

This gang of affliction robbers looks for an opportunity to steal the wealth of virtue. If one does not protect oneself with introspection, and they get a chance, they will steal one's virtue and also destroy the result, happy migrations and the life of liberation, in the progress.

Having contemplated the faults of not having introspection one should strive in introspection that checks the situation of the three doors

The commentary is quite clear and the analogy highlights the main point. Just as a gang of robbers look for an opportunity to steal others' wealth, as soon as there is an opportunity, they will not hesitate—they will rob immediately. Likewise the afflictions we have in our mind are like the gang of robbers who are waiting for an opportunity to steal away our virtues. If one does not protect oneself with introspection and the afflictions get a chance, they will steal one's virtue and also destroy the results of one's virtue, which is a happy migration and the life of liberation which we are in the process of building. In conclusion, having contemplated the faults of not having introspection, one should strive in the introspection that investigates how we conduct ourselves through our three doors. Periodically we should check how we are conducting ourselves through our three doors of body, speech and mind. As mentioned earlier, the explanation here is quite clear: the main point is for one to actually take the advice to heart and put it into practice.

1.2.2.2. GUARDING MINDFULNESS AS THE METHOD FOR GUARDING INTROSPECTION

Mindfulness and introspection are presented as supportive of each other: in order to guard mindfulness one needs to apply introspection and vice versa. To have introspection we need to also apply mindfulness. This heading is divided into two:

1.2.2.2.1. Showing

1.2.2.2.2. Explaining

1.2.2.2.1. Showing

The verse reads:

29. *Therefore, do not send mindfulness
Away from the door of the mind.
Should it happen, place it closely
By recalling the sufferings of the lower realms.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning thus:

Because there are many faults if one does not have introspection, do not send the mindfulness of not forgetting the virtuous object away from the door of the house of the mind. In case mindfulness weakens and does leave, remind yourself of the sufferings of the lower realms, and immediately protect the house of the mind again.

Because of the many faults associated with losing introspection, using the analogy of mind as a house, one should not allow mindfulness (particularly forgetting the virtuous object), to leave from the door.

The commentary further explains 'in case mindfulness weakens' and it does go (because a beginner's mindfulness is hard to maintain all the time), one needs to remind oneself again of the sufferings and the pitiful situation of the lower realms, and that this is the consequence of a lack of mindfulness. Then one will immediately protect the house of the mind again.

1.2.2.2.2. Explaining

Having thus presented how to guard mindfulness, next follows the various conditions for guarding mindfulness as a method of guarding introspection. These are subdivided into three.

1.2.2.2.2.1. Relying on the outer condition of a virtuous friend

1.2.2.2.2.2. How to generate the inner condition of correct mental application

1.2.2.2.2.3. How to generate the inner conditions of mindfulness and introspection

1.2.2.2.2.1. Relying on the outer condition of a virtuous friend

What are the various conditions for guarding mindfulness as a method of guarding introspection? The first is relying on the outer condition of a virtuous friend, or what we call a teacher or guru. The teacher is a virtuous friend, thus relying on the lama is relying on a virtuous friend. This then becomes an external condition for one to be able to maintain one's introspection.

The verse reads:

30. *From following the lama,
Through to advice by the abbot,
Out of fear, the fortunate ones are respectful,
And generate mindfulness easily.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

The fortunate ones respect the trainings and will follow the advice of their abbot, preceptor, friends in pure training and the like out of a feeling of shame and consideration and fear of being degraded by others. These are methods for protecting mindfulness.

Since they generate easily the mindfulness that does not forget the virtuous object, regardless of whether they listen, contemplate or meditate, they base their practice on mastering mindfulness.

The method for protecting mindfulness presented here is that those who are the fortunate ones will respect the trainings and follow the advice of the abbot and the like out of a feeling of shame and consideration. For those in the ordained community the abbot is the one from whom vows are received. A preceptor gives precepts to the lay community who take lay precepts. Friends in pure training would be in the larger sangha community—those who help one accumulate virtue - friends in pure training. As one has taken vows and precepts from a prominent being and made promises to such a prominent being, it would be improper to breach them. It is said that the significance of receiving the vows and commitments from highly accomplished masters is that the mere recollection of them will help one to be more mindful of not breaching the vows. The hesitation to break those vows will be stronger because of the great respect one has for the lama (qualified virtuous friends—teacher, abbot etc.) With the fear of being degraded by others, means that when one has fear of being looked down upon, or where others may say something to put one in a bad light, then through consideration of this one will be able to apply mindfulness. These are the methods for protecting mindfulness since they generate easily the mindfulness that does not forget the virtuous object. The key point here is that since the mindfulness of not forgetting the virtuous object can easily lapse, regardless of whether one has listened, contemplated or meditated, you must base your practice on mastering mindfulness in order to protect your earlier merit and vows etc.

Shame and consideration are two very important virtues we need to maintain. The difference between shame and embarrassment is that the focus of shame is one's commitment to others, such as one's lamas and Buddha etc. If one avoids engaging in faults that would cause disgrace to those others, this is shame. Embarrassment arises because an action is not good for one's own reason i.e. it is not good for me to break these vows. This uses oneself as a reason to avoid faults in consideration of others.

In summary, take relying on outer conditions as a personal instruction to recall the importance of relying on qualified spiritual masters and virtuous friends who encourage us and to help us accumulate virtue. On a wider scale, one can rely on Dharma brothers and sisters in our life, like-minded people who help remind us of the Dharma. Having respect for them and relying upon them is meaningful for oneself as a method to protect one's mindfulness, and as a way to guard introspection.

1.2.2.2.2. How to generate the inner condition of correct mental application

Having explained the outer conditions next the method to generate the inner conditions of correct mental application is presented. This next verse serves as a proclamation, or what we should recall.

The verse reads:

31. *Buddhas and bodhisattvas
Are endowed with unobstructed sight of everything.
Say, 'I am always in the field of vision
Of their five eyes.'*
32ab. *By contemplating this, shame,
And likewise respect and fear are attained.*

As explained by Gyaltsab Je in the commentary:

Further, the buddhas and bodhisattvas can see all phenomena without obstruction, regardless of place or time. So one remains at all times clearly in the sight of their five eyes. Considering this generates shame, which takes oneself as the reason, and because one has respect for the teacher and the Dharma and fear of the fruition, one should take care and practise mindfulness.

The first line presents the extent of the buddhas' omniscient mind, and it is because the buddhas have five wisdom eyes that one is always in their presence. Bringing this to mind, along with the qualities of the buddhas' omniscience and the qualities of the bodhisattvas, one should always feel their presence, because they are in constant awareness of our being.

The way to envision shame is that if one recalls that one is always in the presence of the buddhas and bodhisattvas then one does not want to show disrespect, so one refrains from engaging in misdeeds. This is how one applies mindfulness and introspection in relation to shame.

As the commentary continues, because one has respect for the teacher and the Dharma and fear of the fruition, one should take care and practise mindfulness.

The next point, which is the consideration for others, comes because of the respect one has for the teacher and the Dharma and fear of the results of one's negative consequences (one's misdeeds). By recalling the reason of others, one again applies mindfulness, and it is in this way that one practises mindfulness on a continuous basis. Again, what is being explained is not obscure, it is quite clear. The main thing for one to take to heart as personal instruction is to apply this in our practice.

To summarise the main point: recall that the Buddhas are omniscient. This means that they know all existence completely and entirely; past, present and future. Think, 'I am always in their presence and so I dare not engage in misdeeds, lapse from my commitments etc.' This recollection is how our mindfulness is supported with introspection.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version © Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་ལ་འཇམ་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

1 July 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation practice.
[Meditation]

We can generate a positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the benefit of all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. Therefore I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

I regularly emphasise the importance of the motivation and this is exactly the point which is presented in the next verses. These verses are very poignant explanations about the significance of our state of mind and so forth, so we really need to pay attention to them.

1.2.2.2.3. How to generate the inner conditions of mindfulness and introspection

This has two subdivisions:

1.2.2.2.3.1. How to generate mindfulness

1.2.2.2.3.2. How to generate introspection from mindfulness

1.2.2.2.3.1. How to generate mindfulness

Here, there are two lines:

32cd. They also repeatedly generate Recollection of the Buddha.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on these lines reads

A person who thinks in this way will also recollect the qualities of the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha. Because this happens repeatedly, they will easily generate mindfulness of the Three Jewels.

This explanation follows last week's presentation in that a person who thinks in this way refers to using shame and embarrassment to apply mindfulness. An individual who conducts themselves with shame and embarrassment in mind will recollect the qualities of the Buddha, the Dharma and the Sangha, which are three of the six recollections. In addition to the recollection of the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha, the six recollections also include recollection of the downfalls, recollection of morality and recollection of the deities.

As presented here, the qualities of the Three Jewels are interrelated in the sense that the more one reflects on the enlightened activities of the Buddha, the greater the admiration and faith in the Buddha's words, i.e. the Dharma. Generating strong faith in the Dharma will then naturally bring about a keen admiration and faith in those who actually practise the Dharma, i.e. the Sangha. So in this way one recollects the qualities of the Three Jewels, the Buddha, the Dharma and the Sangha.

Furthermore the more one recollects the qualities of the Three Jewels, the more mindful one will be about not creating the downfalls, and the recollection of morality and so forth will come about as well. Constantly bringing to mind an awareness that one is in the presence of the buddhas and the deities at all times will help one to generate a sense of shame about breaching any vows one has taken, and then through that shame there is a hesitation about incurring the negativities or the downfalls. The same applies to embarrassment with respect to others. So the recollection of the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha helps to generate a sense of shame and embarrassment about incurring the downfalls and so forth.

1.2.2.2.3.2. How to generate introspection from mindfulness

Here again, we take note of the way mindfulness and introspection are interconnected. If one applies mindfulness well, then that will help to generate introspection as well. The verse relating to this is:

*33. When mindfulness remains at the door
Of the mind for the purpose of protection,
At that time introspection is born
And the one that left returns.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse thus:

At the time when one, through mindfulness, remains alert to protect oneself from the afflictions, then introspection, which analyses which action is suitable and which is unsuitable, comes into existence, and that which has degenerated at a time will return.

Since the skill in practice depends on mindfulness and introspection, one should become adept in this.

As the commentary explains, by applying mindfulness one remains alert to protect oneself from the afflictions. Here mindfulness relates to being either mindful of a virtuous object, or mindful of what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded. So mindfulness means being alert to the possibility of afflictions arising and thus protecting oneself from them. This is really the most significant point about applying mindfulness.

Here we can recall one of the great Kadampa masters Geshe Byel Kunkyen who said, 'I always guard my three doors, lest I fall victim to the afflictions'. One really needs to apply mindfulness in this manner, as a means to guard the mind against the afflictions, and thus ensure that they do not take root. That is the positive outcome of applying mindfulness.

As the commentary further explains, the consequence of following the practice of maintaining mindfulness to protect oneself from the afflictions, is that introspection, which analyses what actions are suitable and what are unsuitable, comes into existence. This presentation is systematically showing us how introspection arises by virtue of applying mindfulness. When one applies mindfulness appropriately, and maintains it, then introspection will naturally arise, which in this context is a mind that vigilantly analyses and checks what actions are to be adopted and what actions need to be discarded.

I regularly stress the importance of maintaining mindfulness of one's virtuous object while in meditation. When we have mindfulness of the object, then the introspection that checks whether the mind has become distracted or not will arise naturally. The same applies to mindfulness and introspection about what actions are to be adopted and what are to be abandoned. This is a very systematic explanation that clearly shows how mindfulness and introspection support each other.

When the commentary says, that which is unsuitable comes into existence and that which has degenerated at a time will return, it is referring to the fact that if mindfulness or introspection start to weaken, they can easily be restored. The more one maintains mindfulness about one's activities and actions, the more it will help the development of introspection. In the event that mindfulness or introspection start to degenerate or lapse, then, because of the earlier application, they will easily be able to return. So that is the point being explained here.

Furthermore, as the commentary explains, since the skill in meditation and practice depends on mindfulness and introspection, one should become adept in this. The point here is that becoming skilled in meditation and practice depends on how much mindfulness and introspection is being applied, and held without degeneration.

1.3. The practice of guarding the mind with mindfulness and introspection

Having explained the necessity of applying mindfulness and introspection, the next part of the text deals with the actual practice of guarding the mind with mindfulness.

This is subdivided into three:

- 1.3.1. Training in the morality of restraint
- 1.3.2. The way of training in the morality of accumulating virtuous dharmas
- 1.3.3. Training in the morality that accomplishes the welfare of sentient beings

1.3.1. Training in the morality of restraint

This has two subdivisions:

- 1.3.1.1. Striving to purify the actions of the three doors
- 1.3.1.2. Protecting the three doors from degeneration

1.3.1.1. STRIVING TO PURIFY THE ACTIONS OF THE THREE DOORS

Here there are three sub-headings

- 1.3.1.1.1. Investigating the actions of body and speech
- 1.3.1.1.2. Investigating the actions of the mind
- 1.3.1.1.3. Explaining the permitted and forbidden actions

1.3.1.1.1. Investigating the actions of body and speech

This is subdivided into four:

- 1.3.1.1.1.1. Investigating the motivation before a physical action
- 1.3.1.1.1.2. Advice related to looking and so forth
- 1.3.1.1.1.3. Relating it to other actions
- 1.3.1.1.1.4. Investigating the action of abiding

These are important points that I regularly emphasise. This part of the presentation is also very suitable for beginners, as they will find it systematic and very logical. They are able to relate to this explanation very well, because it relates to normal, everyday activities.

Investigating the motivation before a physical action relates to the fact that the mind is paramount in all our actions. The mind is the forerunner of all physical and verbal activities. Whether we conduct a positive physical activity, or whether it is harmful depends on our motivation prior to engaging in that action. Likewise whatever speech we utter, whether it is positive and beneficial, or harmful or negative, is also dependent on the motivation that precedes the speech. This presentation shows how the mind is the forerunner of all activities.

1.3.1.1.1. Investigating the motivation before a physical action

The verse that relates to this heading is:

- 34. *Initially investigate
Whether this mind is flawed.
At the time I shall remain
Steady like wood.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains:

Before engaging in any physical action, such as walking, investigate this mind of yours to see whether the motivation for the action is flawed or not.

In case a flawed motivation has arisen, then, while remembering the antidote against the afflictions, remain steady like wood, and not be moved by the motivation.

As the commentary explains, before engaging in any action such as walking, first check or investigate this mind of yours to see whether the motivation for the action is flawed or not. As explained here, prior to engaging in any action such as walking or going about, one checks one's state of mind to see what is motivating this action. 'Is the motivation a positive one? Is it an appropriate motivation for the action I am about to engage in? Or is it tainted with some negativity?' This is how to check one's motivation prior to engaging in the action itself.

As the commentary further explains, if one finds that a flawed motivation has arisen or taken root, then, the moment one notices that the motivation is stained, by remembering the antidote to the affliction, one remains steady like wood.

To understand this analogy it is necessary to know that the Tibetan term shing applies to wood in general, and it is also the term for trees. In this case, as some other commentaries indicate, the example relates to a massive tree that remains steady during a storm and is not moved by gusts of wind. This example is used to illustrate how one needs to apply the antidote to remain steady and not be moved by the afflictions.

When one notices that one's motivation is tainted and applies the antidote to the afflictions, then one will be able to remain steady and not be moved by that tainted motivation or superstitious thoughts and so forth. So the mind itself remains steady and not moved by a faulty motivation or the afflictions.

As I regularly emphasise, whatever the practice we do, particularly with meditation, we need to be mindful that the practice serves its purpose of overcoming the afflictions in one's mind. As I have related to you in the past, I spent a significant amount of time in my youth attempting to meditate. As I have confided in you in the past, despite my earnest efforts to apply the meditation practice, trying to lead a modest life, being content with whatever I had and not concerned about nice clothing and food, these efforts could, at times, have been tainted with some worldly concern, wondering how others would view me and so forth. Nevertheless the attempts I made at that time have definitely had a positive effect on my wellbeing now that I am older. Judging by the positive effects that I experience now, the earlier attempts to meditate and so forth have not been in vain, and may have been focused in the right direction. At this stage in my life I can confidently say that my meditation practice is pure, without the stains of worldly concerns.

Geshe-la in English: When I was 20 years old, 21 years old, 22 years old, 23 years old, at that time when there is good food and bad one, I chose bad one! If there is good cloth and not good one, I choose not good one. At time very, very good learning—now I no attach food, no attach cloth, no attach reputation! That time I learning, now beneficial for me! Normally I say I need small food, easy food, not need many different food; stomach full and good for health that is enough! Some people two hours cooking, eat ten minutes, finished! Important healthy food need, delicious or not delicious not really important, healthy need. Delicious only here [pointing to tongue]—afterwards gone! Some people eat rotten egg, rotten meat, not knowing, say 'yes, yes', then stomach pain and some dead. Most important health!

Coming back to the main point, our motivation is of paramount importance. Whatever activity we engage in we need to first check our motivation. Those of you who live with a partner know from experience how, if you do not check your state of mind and allow negative states of mind such as anger to become prevalent, you can easily engage in inappropriate gestures and behaviours that can upset your partner. Behaving in this way will not be received well, even by someone who is close to you. We see so many examples of the complications, harm and hostility that arise as a result of not having paid attention to one's state of mind, prior to engaging in the activities that affect your companion.

If you take this advice to heart, and really pay attention to your state of mind, then, having contemplated the faults of anger, when you notice anger arising you will know that it is not a really suitable state of mind with which to interact with others. By virtue of recognising that, you will be able to prevent yourselves from mishaps and harming others. This is the practical approach to protecting yourselves.

1.3.1.1.2. Advice related to looking and so forth

Here again we can notice the very practical advice Shantideva is giving to those listening to his teachings. His practical advice on how to conduct oneself and behave properly, just the same as the advice and care that a parent would give to their children.

Having mentioned the importance of checking the mind before engaging in physical actions, now comes advice about how to look with one's eyes.

This has four subdivisions:

- 1.3.1.1.2.1. The general conduct of looking with the eyes
- 1.3.1.1.2.2. How to look when tired
- 1.3.1.1.2.3. How to act when another person comes close
- 1.3.1.1.2.4. How to act after one has rested

1.3.1.1.2.1. The general conduct of looking with the eyes

The verse that relates to this is:

35. *I never allow myself to be distracted
And do not look around meaninglessly.
Rather, with a firm mind,
I always look with my eyes downcast.*

These are quite easy points to understand and the commentary is also quite clear.

I shall never allow myself to be distracted and look around meaninglessly, because this causes the mind to degenerate. With the virtuous object firmly in mind I shall always look with my eyes cast down the length of one yoke in front of me.

As the commentary explains one should never allow oneself to be distracted and look around meaninglessly. This means not looking around without any purpose. One should guard against that sort of conduct. If one were to look around meaninglessly then that would cause the mind to degenerate, through losing its focus on the virtuous object.

Then the commentary further explains that while maintaining the virtuous object firmly in mind I shall always look with my eyes cast down the length of one yoke in front of me. In some texts such as the Vinaya Sutra, the distance is described as the span of one arm's length.

The main point is that one maintains one's focus on the virtuous object, and that when one walks, one looks just at the space in front of oneself. That covers the general conduct of looking with the eyes.

1.3.1.1.2.2. How to look when tired

Next comes how to look when one is tired. This is covered in these two lines:

- 36ab. *To rest one's sight
One should occasionally look around.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

To refresh one's constitution, and if tired, one occasionally lifts one's gaze and looks around.

When one is tired or looking for a resting place, one can occasionally lift one's gaze and look around.

Holding one's gaze at a certain distance for too long might lead to physical discomfort, and mentally one may start to feel a bit tired. So, in order to refresh one's physical constitution, and to revive the mind, we are advised to occasionally lift up our gaze a bit and look around in order to refresh ourselves.

We know that whenever we are engaged in some sort of task, after a while we get a bit tired and we need to look up and stretch out our arms. This is how we normally refresh ourselves. However, this does not imply that we should forget the virtuous object and just look around meaninglessly. The purpose of looking up is just to refresh ourselves, and it should not be a means to become distracted again.

1.3.1.1.2.3. How to act when another person comes close

At this point we can again reflect upon the heart-warming nature of Shantideva's advice. I have heard people say, 'My parents never taught me how to receive guests and how to care for them!' Shantideva is showing us here how to relate to others in appropriate ways.

Some people become very shy when guests arrive, and are not really able to say much. This indicates that they are not really able to interact with and relate to people at a social level.

36cd. When someone appears in the field of your vision

Look up and say, "It is good you came".

37ab. To check whether there are dangers on the road

Look repeatedly in the four directions.

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning as follows:

If someone comes into one's field of vision, while we have our eyes downcast, once they are in front of us we smile at them and say 'How good you came'.

Also, while walking along a path one needs to repeatedly look around in the four directions to check whether there are any dangers or not.

As explained here in the commentary, if, while you are engaged in gazing downward, someone comes near you, then you look up and greet them with a smile. Even just a smile can make others feel at ease and comfortable. Following this pleasant facial gesture, one utters welcoming pleasant words. That is how to conduct oneself.

Furthermore while walking along the path, the conduct one needs to adopt is to repeatedly look in the four directions, to check whether there are any dangers or not. This is very practical advice. One should always be vigilant as one walks about, otherwise accidents will happen. We can see the very practical nature of this advice. It is also applicable to driving, isn't it? Basically, Shantideva is presenting, with reason and logic, the most suitable way to conduct ourselves virtuously in all our activities, much as parents give advice to their children.

1.3.1.1.2.4. How to act after one has rested

This of course is quite easy to understand. Having given advice on how to rest when one is tired, how does one conduct oneself after a rest?

The following four lines explain this:

37cd. Having directed your sight outwards during the break

Look behind your back.

38ab. Having checked in front and behind

Go or come.

The commentary explains the meaning as follows.

Further, after one has rested and set out again, direct your attention outwards and look also behind your back for your possessions. Having checked whether in front or behind are any cliffs and so forth, one either continues along one's path or goes back, as is appropriate.

Having applied the advice on resting, as one sets out again, we are next advised to direct your attention outward, and also behind your back for your possessions. This refers to making sure that there are no obstructions, or dangers, either behind or in front.

Having checked in front and behind that there aren't any cliffs or so forth refers to the fact that some routes can be treacherous, and very dangerous. So one needs to look carefully in front, to see if there are any cliffs or not, and then, ensuring that there is no danger, one proceeds along the path.

Looking backward ensures that it is possible to turn back if needed, as well as ensuring one does not leave one's possessions behind. Again, this is very practical advice.

1.3.1.1.1.3. Relating it to other actions

The relevant two lines are:

38cd. Act in this way at all time

Upon understanding the purpose.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

Having understood the need for the benefit of self and others, act like this with all your physical and verbal actions.

In summary, whatever one's actions, whether verbal or physical, one needs to first check their purpose, whether they benefit oneself or others, and then, if there is a benefit, engage in those actions.

We will recite the King of Prayers for Kim Foon's father who has just passed away in Malaysia. Kim, her sister Kim Yoke, and William are three of our more dedicated students, and it is good for us to do prayers for them at this time.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Judy Mayne

Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

8 July 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation practice. [meditation]

Aim to receive the teachings with a bodhicitta motivation such as:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, in order to free them from all sufferings and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. For that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

Such a motivation is crucial for ensuring that your approach is a proper practice.

We have explained the headings How To Act When One Rests and Relating It To Other Actions. Recall how those explanations gave very practical advice about how to conduct oneself in such situations. In relation to protecting oneself from dangers after resting, when one starts to move about, the advice was about how to be cautious: look behind to make sure no possessions have been left behind; ensure you are not in danger; look in front and make sure there is no precipice or danger points around and then move with caution. This was very practical advice.

This line from Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains what is meant by relating it to other actions and serves as a summary that relates to all of our actions.

Having understood the need for the benefit of self and others, act like this with all your physical and verbal actions.

Whatever actions we engage in, physical or verbal, in all instances first check whether there is a benefit for oneself or a benefit for others. Having thoroughly checked, if one finds there is a benefit for oneself and/or others then engage in the actions. Again, this is immaculate advice as it encourages us to use our own wisdom to assess our actions.

1.3.1.1.4. Investigating the action of abiding

The verse reads:

39. *Initiate your actions thinking:
'I shall abide with my body like this.'
From time to time check
How your body is abiding.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

After having had the thought, 'I shall remain in this position', stop the actions of the body and place it for the time being in the planned position.

Look in the explained way, from time to time to check how the body is abiding, and strive to act without fault.

When engaging in a virtuous deed on a physical level (it can relate to body, speech and mind but here it relates to the physical), and after having the thought 'I shall remain in this position,' an example of an action may be if you decided to engage in a focused meditation. You would think 'Now I will position myself in the seven-point posture of Buddha

Vairochana, and having taken this initiative you would adopt the appropriate posture. Then, having adopted the posture you would strive to maintain it for the duration. You would periodically check how your body is abiding, and whether you have adopted the correct posture or not. This applies to any physical action; sitting, standing or moving about—adopt the physical posture and strive to act without fault. The succinct advice here is to constantly be aware of one's actions, whether physical, verbal or mental state, and be vigilant in checking 'how am I conducting myself?' This ensures that you are conducting yourself without fault and in line with creating virtue. If you find yourself at fault, immediately try to overcome it. This is the main advice. Having given detailed advice on how to conduct oneself physically, next is investigating the state, or conduct, of the mind.

1.3.1.1.2. Investigating the mind

This is subdivided into two

1.3.1.1.2.1. Fastening the mind to the virtuous object

1.3.1.1.2.2. Analyse whether it is single-pointedly focused on virtue or not

1.3.1.1.2.1. Fastening the mind to the virtuous object

The verse reads:

40. *Check with all your effort
That the crazy elephant mind
Does not lose the great Dharma pillar
The way it was fastened to it.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Check with all your effort that the unsubdued and crazy elephant mind does not lose the great pillar of the Dharma object that one accepted to contemplate single-pointedly, the way one fastened the mind to it.

The main point of the explanation here is how to ensure that one's mind is fastened to a virtuous object. The mind here is likened to an unsubdued and crazy elephant which would cause havoc due to its completely wild nature. Firstly, it is untamed, and on top of that it is crazed, so an elephant like that would go on a rampage and cause huge destruction, unless it was secured tightly to a strong pillar.

This analogy illustrates our state of mind, which is untamed from the three poisons of attachment, anger and ignorance, and crazed with different delusions. Such an untamed and crazed mind, if it is not fastened to a pillar like a Dharma object, can cause so much damage and destruction. Therefore the advice here is, in order to prevent one's mind from causing so much damage and destruction, check with all your effort that the unsubdued and crazy elephant mind does not lose the great pillar of the Dharma object. For us, the pillar or object must be a virtuous object, and just as one would tie an elephant to a pillar, one ties the focus of one's mind to the virtuous object, or what the commentary calls the Dharma object that one accepted to contemplate single-pointedly the way one fastened the mind to it. This line indicates that as one has previously determined to contemplate on a chosen object, one needs to constantly ensure one does not lose focus on that virtuous object.

1.3.1.1.2.2. Analyse whether it is single-pointedly focused on virtue or not

After one has fastened one's mind to a virtuous Dharma object (pillar), next one needs to analyse whether it is single-pointedly focused on it or not. This is very succinct advice on how to conduct oneself on a mental level. One can derive so much meaning from just going over the outline and relate to the significance of the meaning of the verse.

The verse reads:

41. *However I strive in concentration
I shall not let loose for even one moment.
'What does this mind of mine do?' I ask.
Analyse the mind in detail in this regard.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse:

I shall not even for one moment lose my concentration on the virtuous object and be distracted to something else. Analyse your mind repeatedly, saying: 'This mind of mine does suitable and unsuitable actions.'

The significant point here is that while the advice is to focus one's mind single-pointedly on the virtuous object to develop concentration, at the same time, internally in one's mind, one should also analyse one's state of mind checking what kind of thoughts are occurring, what kind of actions are being initiated. The mind has the ability to constantly initiate either suitable or unsuitable actions. So there is a need to check what kinds of thoughts are being manifested in one's mind. Note that from the very onset it is extremely crucial to train oneself in meditation, to develop not only calm abiding, but also special insight, because calm abiding, a state of single-pointed concentration on an object for as long as one wishes, in itself is not sufficient to further enhance one's progress along the path to enlightenment. The teachings constantly emphasise this point. So in addition to calm abiding, one needs to develop special insight, and it is with this combination of concentration and special insight that one can start to really engage in an actual meditation practice capable of removing the subtle afflictions and delusions in the mind. This is a crucial point: while engaging in meditation we should not allow ourselves to feel comfortable just focusing single-pointedly on a chosen object, and maintaining just that. Rather we must also constantly investigate our state of mind, which serves as the basis to develop special insight.

The analysis one employs to check one's state of mind is one which is done while maintaining one's focus on the object, not wavering away from it. So while maintaining this single-pointed focus on the object, one must also employ an analysis that investigates one's state of mind, i.e. what thoughts are occurring and whether they are virtuous states of mind or negative states of mind. Employing this sort of analysis enhances one's intelligence and wisdom, and further develops that wisdom, which can later become special insight.

Lama Tsong Khapa advocates abandoning mere single-pointed concentration, and striving to develop the union of calm abiding and special insight. This is a significant and unique point which we really need to understand. We need to make attempts to develop this training now in our meditation so it will leave a positive imprint in our mind. When we apply this technique it becomes a means to sharpen the mind and further enhance wisdom. Otherwise if one only develops single-pointed concentration, and it is not done in an appropriate manner, then there is a danger of the mind becoming duller and duller rather than sharper, clearer and more intelligent. It is crucial that we apply the proper technique.

1.3.1.1.3. Explaining the permitted and forbidden actions

First, to give an idea about what this heading means in relation to explaining the meaning of the verse: the Buddha presented certain actions as being permitted and certain actions which are forbidden. Within those which were forbidden there are certain actions which may be temporarily relaxed a bit, as a way of adopting another practice. This is the meaning of practicing equanimity in this context. Thus here, equanimity means that with certain forbidden actions one may temporarily relax the rules a bit, as the means to adopt another virtuous practice.

The verse reads:

42. *If, in the context of dangers or prayer
You are unable, be as comfortable as you can.
In the same vein, at the time of generosity
Morality is treated with equanimity, it is taught.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the verse:

If one is unable to perform certain extremely subtle actions of body and mind at the time of:

- Danger to one's life,
- Making offering to the Triple Gem with prayers,
- Actions for the superior purpose of others,

At such times it is permissible to relax one's state or being, even if one is not able to engage those subtle forbidden actions.

From the Sutra Requested by Inexhaustible Wisdom:

Thus, at the time of generosity, contain morality and practise equanimity.

The commentary explains that at a time when there is either danger to one's life, or when one is making extensive offerings to the Triple Gem, or particularly when one is engaging in superior actions of benefiting or helping other beings, if one is unable to perform certain extremely subtle actions of body and mind at that time, then 'one should practice equanimity and put one's mind at ease.'

The citation to qualify this presentation is from the Sutra Requested by Inexhaustible Wisdom.

Thus, at the time of generosity, contain morality and practice equanimity.

This is saying that at a time when one is not able to practise both simultaneously, and it is the time for mainly practising generosity, then one should practice equanimity, and leave one's subtle practice of morality. The purpose is to be skilful in accomplishing the path sequentially.

Further down, the commentary explains:

This is to achieve the proper sequence of the path, because if one mistakes the sequence then one will not achieve the former or the latter.

The points of the path should be practised sequentially. In order to practise the points sequentially, first adopt those which are initially presented and relatively easy to practise before engaging in a more difficult practice. The quote from the sutra indicates this point.

The commentary presents a hypothetical doubt which may occur:

Query: How can one regard it with equanimity since morality is greater than generosity?

This is a reasonable doubt, for it is indeed a greater virtue to practise morality than generosity, because morality is harder to practise. Generosity can be practiced by lay as well as ordained practitioners, while certain practices of morality, like observing the self-liberation vows, can only be practised by ordained Sangha. Therefore morality is said to be harder to practise than generosity.

Thus, if we had to identify the main focus of the practice and who is appropriate to do those practices, lay people would focus mainly on generosity, and ordained Sangha would need to practise primarily on morality as their main practice.

So, as the query states, if morality is more virtuous, how can one leave that in equanimity, meaning how can one relax the practice of morality?

The next two verses serve as an answer to the query and read:

43. *After initiating the intended action
Do not think about anything else.
For the time being accomplish that very action
With your thoughts focused on it.*
44. *In this way all is accomplished well.
Otherwise neither will be accomplished.
The secondary afflictions, which are non-
introspection,
Will not increase in this way.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains exactly why:

One does not divert mentally from the first practice in a series that have to be practised sequentially. Generosity, which has to be practised first, is practised alone with a firm mind for the time being. This is to achieve the proper sequence of the path, because if one mistakes the sequence, then one will not achieve the former or the latter.

In relation to the first part - One does not divert mentally from the first practice in a series that have to be practiced sequentially - this highlights that some practices are presented in sequential order. When practices are presented in a sequential manner it is important to primarily focus on the first practice as a way to establish a firm basis to engage in the next practice of the sequence. As explained here, This is to achieve the proper sequence of the path, because if one mistakes the sequence, then one will not achieve the former or the latter.

Take the analogy of constructing a wall: the foundation must be firm and stable. If it is not stable, when you start building the wall and putting the next layer on top it can very easily topple over. The consequence is that you neither have a good foundation nor a wall which comes on top of it. With this analogy it is very clear that when a practice is presented sequentially one needs to focus on the first practice to serve as a basis to practise the rest.

Hence the commentary continues:

By knowing and following the stages of the path the secondary afflictions, which are not introspection and which do not know the sequence, will not increase. Hence, one should strive to become proficient in the sequence of the path.

So this is all very clear.

1.3.1.2. PROTECTING THE THREE DOORS FROM DEGENERATION

This is divided into two subdivisions:

1.3.1.2.1. Protecting the training of the body from degeneration

1.3.1.2.2. Protecting the training of the mind from degeneration

1.3.1.2.1. Protecting the training of the body from degeneration

This is further divided into three meticulously presented subdivisions:

1.3.1.2.1.1. Not letting the body fall under the control of distractions

1.3.1.2.1.2. Abandon meaningless activities

1.3.1.2.1.3. Analysing the motivation at the time of the action

1.3.1.2.1.1. Not letting the body fall under the control of distractions

45. *Various types of idle gossip
And many great plays,
If one becomes involved in any of these,
Abandon attachment to them.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the verse:

Do not engage in meaningless talk, such as gossip about kings or robbers, and also do not engage in dance or one of the many other kinds of spectacular performances. If there is a purpose or if it is to harmonise with someone, then one should abandon attachment for the action.

This succinct and practical advice is good for us, as it explains how to conduct ourselves in our daily life. The advice is that, whenever possible, one should not engage in meaningless talk such as idle gossip. The text cites gossip about kings or robbers, however for us it would be like gossiping about politics etc. There are sayings that express sentiments like, 'when one engages in gossip the whole day can just pass by', and one has just squandered a whole day gossiping. Engaging in gossip can increase delusions such as anger or attachment. According to the ten non-virtuous actions, by nature gossip is said to pose the least heavy negative karma. But if one is not mindful, it can end up being the worst as it wastes one's time. Because one may not perceive it to be very severe, one thinks it is OK to gossip. But if in fact one spends most of one's time just gossiping, then this will deprive you of your precious time to engage in other practices. So, while by nature gossiping is said to be the least heavy in negative karma, by doing it habitually we can actually waste our whole life. Furthermore, the advice extends to not engaging in dance or one of the many other kinds of spectacular performances, which would include watching movies etc. Again, such performances can cause delusions to arise in one's mind.

An exception is presented: If there is a purpose or if it is to harmonise with someone one may engage in an action. Here harmonise means 'if it is in accordance with someone else's wishes'. For example if someone said 'Please come to the movies with me. You definitely have to come with me', if you had a choice you would not go because you wouldn't want to waste your time. However, in order to please the other, and not to go against their wishes, you may find yourself sometimes having to comply and say, 'OK, I will go with you'. In situations like this, the advice is to do so without strong attachment—one should abandon attachment to the action.

There are certain categories within the Vinaya vows which are forbidden actions, but which are, under certain circumstances, permitted. For example, singing is actually a forbidden action for ordained Sangha because it can create attachment and distraction. However, if it seems necessary to sing to benefit others, then under those circumstances it is permitted. There are also other categories of actions which a Sangha member maybe permitted to engage in, if it is for the sole purpose of benefiting others. This shows the great kindness of the Buddha in presenting the vows in a way where, under certain circumstances, if it is beneficial to sentient beings, the actions are allowed. In summary, we can see how meticulously the Buddha presented vows which say: 'avoid such actions normally but if there is a benefit for others then you can engage in it'.

1.3.1.2.1.2. Abandon meaningless activities

The next verse provides advice on how to conduct appropriate physical actions.

The verse reads:

46. *Meaningless digging, cutting of grass,
And drawing in dirt: if one does these,
Upon remembering the trainings of the Tathagata,
Out of fear, abandon them immediately.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Even if one is not a bhikhu, when one is engaged in meaningless activities such as digging, cutting grass, drawing in the dirt etc., then one should remember the trainings of the Tathagata and, being afraid of the shortcomings of one's actions, stop them right there.

The definitions of meaningless activities are contained within the vows of a fully ordained monk, and they are not to engage in them. For example, digging, cutting grass and drawing in the dirt. However, the commentary indicates that even if you are not a bhikhu or a fully ordained monk—not all bodhisattva trainees are ordained—you should also avoid engaging in meaningless activities such as digging, cutting grass or drawing in the dirt. By remembering why the Buddha actually presented these activities as needing to be avoided, and being afraid of the shortcomings of one's actions, one needs to refrain from such activities. Activities are meaningless not just because they don't have any specific purpose. Some can harm other beings, such as cutting grass. At certain times of the year there are lots of bugs on the grass so by cutting grass, you would actually harm the lives of many insects.

1.3.1.2.1.3. Analysing the motivation at the time of the action

Similar advice was presented earlier. Basically, whatever action one engages in, really check and investigate one's motivation for engaging in the activity first.

This point has three subdivisions:

- 1.3.1.2.1.3.1. Showing
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2. Explaining
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.4. Summary

1.3.1.2.1.3.1. Showing

The verse reads:

47 *If you wish to move
Or wish to speak
First analyse your mind
And then be smart through steadfastness.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

At the time when one wishes to move one's body or wishes to speak, one should first investigate one's mind to make sure it has not fallen under the control of the afflictions or self-cherishing, and then engage accordingly in what has to be practiced and what has to be abandoned.

While the explanation is quite clear, the commentary further explains that at all times when one wishes to move one's body, or wishes to speak (i.e. any physical or verbal actions), one should first check one's state of mind to ensure that it is not influenced by delusions, particularly the self-cherishing mind. Then when one is sure that it is not influenced by any of these negative states of mind, one can engage in the action according to what is to be practised, and what is to be abandoned.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2. Explaining

This is subdivided into five categories:

- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2.1. What to do when one wishes to generate afflictions
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2.2. What to do at the time of mental excitement
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2.3. What to do at the time of praise and so forth
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2.4. What to do when one thinks about the welfare of others
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2.5. What to do when one wishes to generate anger or sadness

If there is a wish for anger to be generated, or if sadness occurs, then what can we do at that time? We can notice the manner of how to conduct oneself in such circumstances will be presented very meticulously and succinctly. So we can leave the explanations for our next session.

I would like to thank those who organised the lunch for His Holiness' birthday last Sunday again. Everyone really enjoyed and appreciated the lunch, and I feel that our requesting prayers for His Holiness' long life was fruitful. So, our efforts have been really worthwhile. On a personal note, that night I had a very auspicious dream with His Holiness. His Holiness was present at an offering ceremony, so after some conversations I took the initiative to go up to him to offer a khatag, but he indicated that it was not necessary. He then proceeded to consecrate a big jug full of inner-offering nectar, and afterwards indicated that I could have some. When I presented a small container in which I normally keep my inner-offering, he commented 'Oh, that is such a small container, while my jug is really big'. However, when he poured some nectar into my small container, miraculously a really tiny flow of nectar came down to fill my container just to the brim.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱུང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

15 July 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation.

[meditation]

Generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

1.3.1.2.1. Protecting the training of the body from degeneration

1.3.1.2.1.3. Analysing the motivation at the time of the action (cont.)

1.3.1.2.1.3.2. Explaining

This has five sub-divisions which we listed last week.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2.1. What to do when one wishes to generate afflictions

This heading refers to the actions to take when afflictions are about to be generated. The relevant verse reads:

48. *When one's mind wants to be attached
Or when it wants to be angry
Do not move and do not speak,
Abide like a tree.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on the verse is quite clear:

When the mind wishes to get attached or wishes to become angry, do not engage in a physical action and do not speak. Rather, abide like a tree and be able to hold the antidote.

As the commentary explains, the moment the mind generates that thought of attachment or anger, one should avoid engaging in any physical or verbal actions. Rather, as the analogy explains, one should abide like a tree. The analogy is referring to a big tree, which cannot be moved by gusts of wind. Thus, one needs to remain unshakeable like a tree, being able to hold the antidote in the face of afflictions arising in the mind, not engaging in anything but remaining firm and stable.

The analogy of remaining unshakeable like a tree refers particularly to the times when afflictions such as attachment and anger are prevalent. One knows from one's own experience that when strong attachment or anger are prevalent any physical actions will be inappropriate actions. So at those times one's actions could not be virtuous actions. This is obviously the case with anger. We all know that any physical actions during a moment of anger cannot be a constructive or virtuous one. Likewise, we all know through experience that when our mind is influenced by strong anger our speech will not be appropriate. Likewise, any words uttered when strong attachment is arising will be flawed and inappropriate, and not virtuous speech. So, as presented here, the moment one notices the afflictions arising one should remain firm and steady, and temporarily not engage in any activity.

This is really very practical and personal advice that we need to take on board. From our own experiences, we know that whenever we have acted out of moments of intense anger our physical actions have not been appropriate; likewise, our speech has been hurtful and inappropriate. The consequence of acting either physically or verbally in moments of intense anger is clearly undesirable, and we can all easily relate to that. It may be a little bit harder for you to accept and understand that physical actions and verbal speech in moments of intense attachment are also inappropriate. Nevertheless the fact remains that when one acts out of strong attachment those actions also become tainted and faulty.

However, as indicated previously, some of the advice about avoiding some inappropriate actions out of attachment is intended for those who have ordination vows. So you also need to understand this advice in its proper context.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2.2. What to do at the time of mental excitement

The verses relating to this heading read:

49. *Having mental excitement or mocking,
Having pride or conceit,
Or thinking about criticising,
Being cunning or thinking about deceit,*
50. *When being ready to praise oneself
And belittle others,
Telling others off or being argumentative,
Then one should remain like a tree.*

[The English commentary we have presents the following explanation in point form, although it reads as straight text in the Tibetan version.]

- When there is mental excitement with an object;
- When mocking others in jest;
- When full of pride due to qualities;
- When being conceited due to youth and other reasons;
- When thinking about criticising others;
- When one is cunning, and wants profit out of discontentment;
- When one thinks about deceiving others with pretension and dishonesty;
- When one praises oneself wholeheartedly by expressing one's qualities, and puts others down by mentioning their faults;
- When scolding others and being argumentative and quarrelling.

At these times one should remain unshakeable like a tree while being self-supporting with the antidote.

First is mental excitement with an object. You will recall that one of the main obstacles during meditation is excitement, which is when the mind waivers away from the meditation object and starts to focus on another object. Thus, diverting one's focus from the object of meditation to another object is called excitement.

Next is mocking others in jest. This refers to ridiculing someone for the amusement of others. Putting down someone else in this form is a fault. Again we are being given practical advice about what to avoid.

Third is how to counteract pride due to being puffed up about certain qualities one may have. Such pride manifests itself in the form of feeling pompous, thinking 'I know better than others. I have more knowledge than they do'. With an attitude like that, one is putting down others while making oneself seem more important. We have discussed this delusion in detail in the past.

As mentioned previously, we should be really careful that whatever knowledge we gain from the Dharma, or from the teachings we study, does not become a cause to further strengthen one's pride. One needs to remember that all of the Buddha's teachings were intended to overcome pride, and not strengthen it. Bearing that in mind, if one is feeling a bit pompous about knowing more than others, and has the tendency to look down upon others, one should immediately remember that the purpose of having knowledge of the Dharma is to overcome one's own pride.

We need to take these verses as personal advice, remembering that Shantideva is giving this kind of advice for our benefit. When excitement occurs we can remember his advice to apply an antidote for overcoming excitement. If one finds oneself mocking or making fun of others, one should again remember, 'Shantideva has cautioned me against this negative tendency, so I need to counteract it'. And it is the same with pride and so forth.

Fourth is when being conceited due to youth and other reasons. [Some translations use the word, haughtiness, for the translation of the Tibetan word gyakpa.]

There are five conditions that can lead to conceit or haughtiness. These are youth, having a good form or physique, wealth, status or a good lineage, and an abundance of hearing.

There is a distinction between haughtiness and pride. When we studied Nagarjuna's *Precious Garland*¹, we went into detail about the different kinds of pride, so we won't go over that again. In relation to the earlier mentioned five conditions i.e. being youthful, having a good physique, having sufficient wealth, being from a good family and having good knowledge, pride is a state of mind that has the tendency to look down upon others because one has these conditions and they don't. Whereas conceit or haughtiness² entails a sense of satisfaction about having these good conditions. So conceit or haughtiness has an element of attachment to one's good conditions and feeling a sense of joy or satisfaction about that.

Nagarjuna also highlighted the significant point that haughtiness is the root of a lack of conscientiousness. Feeling conceit about having these good conditions can lead to a lack of conscientiousness about one's Dharma practice. Nagarjuna supported this significant point with a quote from the sutras.

The sense of conceit in relation to an abundance of hearing refers to the knowledge one may have gained from hearing, which can lead to thinking 'I have a significant amount of knowledge now'. In relation to wealth, there is both material wealth and the wealth of knowledge. So here it refers to being conceited about the wealth of knowledge one has. One must be wary about that.

So we can clearly see how being conceited over having these five conditions is related to attachment. It is because of strong attachment to these favourable conditions that one generates that sense of conceit about having obtained them. Hence the teachings say that conceit fits into the realm of attachment.

Fifth is thinking about criticising others. This may easily come about when we are dealing with others, so we need to be very mindful about that.

Next is when one is cunning and wants profit out of discontentment. This refers to being discontented and because of that discontentment seeking to profit from others. The advice here is to apply an antidote to overcome and counteract that discontentment, which basically means practising less desire and more contentment. As I mention regularly, I can personally vouch for the fact that anyone who practises less desire and has more contentment will not have any real worries. The person who practises having less desire and contentment is the person who has no worries!

This is really the prime practice for ordained Sangha. As His Holiness the Dalai Lama has indicated, monks from other traditions such as Christianity definitely adopt this practice, and show clear signs of their success with it.

If there is no contentment with whatever wealth one has, then that will naturally give rise to worry, being constantly anxious and wanting to acquire more profit and more gain. When one practises contentment with whatever one has, the mind will naturally be more subdued, and definitely less anxious. However, practising contentment needs to be understood in the proper way. It doesn't necessarily mean to avoid having possessions and wealth entirely, and that one should give away everything. Practising poverty and having nothing is not necessarily practising contentment.

The real meaning of practising contentment is to have less attachment to one's wealth and so forth. The main thing one needs to understand here is that being content, or not, is a mental state related to attachment to one's wealth.

Indeed, without strong attachment one can actually utilise one's wealth to better one's conditions, and really enjoy them. With strong attachment, on the other hand, there's always that thought of, 'oh I am spending too much!' so there is always that sense of unease. Despite using one's wealth in trying to improve one's conditions, there is always a little bit of unease. However, although such miserliness has many faults, one of its qualities could be that it does contribute to saving money.

Geshe-la speaks in English: People save money but not happy. Same job, same money, but always 'I no get money ... I no get money, I no get job... Money is hidden away.

There are similar stories among the Tibetans about people having hidden money somewhere!

Seventh is when one thinks about deceiving others with pretention and dishonesty. As the teachings explain, the two ways to deceive others are pretence and dishonesty. Pretence refers to pretending that one actually has certain qualities in order to impress others, when in fact one lacks those qualities. Dishonesty is trying to hide one's faults, so that one is not seen in a bad light by others. As I regularly emphasise, one needs to be really mindful of the danger that one's own Dharma practices, such as meditation and so forth, don't become a means for pretence and dishonesty.

Next is praising oneself wholeheartedly by expressing one's qualities, and putting others down by mentioning their faults. This immoral practice is a breach of one of the bodhisattvas' commitments, and counted as one of the downfalls. We need to really take this to heart and see how easily our actions can become tainted with our views about our qualities. Whenever one talks about one's practice, one needs to be constantly mindful that one is not boasting about it. We must also be just as mindful about not putting others down.

¹ See teaching of 26 June 2012.

² See teaching of 19 June 2012

There's a particular word in Tibetan kurdep, which has the connotation of uttering things that are not true, such as proclaiming that one has qualities when one does not have them. Another example of an untrue proclamation is to hide the qualities of others, ridiculing and finding fault in them.

Lastly, scolding others and being argumentative and quarrelling.

Gyaltsab Je concludes his commentary on this section of the text with:

At these times one should remain unshakeable like a tree, while being self-supporting with the antidotes

With respect to at these times, it is said that whenever one finds oneself engaging in one of these eight activities, then, in order to counteract them, one should remain firm and stable like a tree, while applying the self-supporting antidotes. Then one will not be influenced by these negative tendencies, and one will be able to remain steadfast.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2.3. What to do at the time of praise and so forth

The verse relating to this heading is:

51. *When wishing for gain, honour and fame
Wishing for servants and entourage,
If one's mind wishes for service,
At these times remain like a tree.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

- When wishing for gain of wealth and so forth.
- When seeking the honour for others to put down one's mat and so forth.
- Wishing for a good reputation.
- Wishing to acquire servants and entourage.
- If one's mind wishes for service such as treatments for the body and so forth.

Also at these times one should remain like a tree, while having the power of the antidote.

This is a clear presentation of what to do about wishes such as wanting material gain such as wealth and so forth. The Tibetan word kurte can read as either honour or service, indicated here with the example of others putting down one's mat and so forth. One might also wish for a good reputation so that others talk well about one and so forth, or to acquire servants and entourage.

Wishing for service such as treatments for the body and so forth includes massages and so forth. The advice here is to avoid seeking such treatments merely out of attachment. The Vinaya text indicates that with some physical ailments it is necessary to apply oil to the body and to massage it in order to restore one's vitality, in which case it is permissible and accepted. This advice also needs to be understood in its proper context.

We need to take this as practical advice. If one completely immerses oneself in wishing for gain or wealth, seeking honour and a good reputation and so forth, then one's whole life can be preoccupied with trying to achieve this. We can spend a whole lifetime being completely immersed just thinking about how to gain these things. We may not actually put much effort into really doing anything practical to achieve our wishes, but we just go around thinking about it over and over again. That sort of daydreaming can be a distraction that wastes your life. So the advice here is to remain like a tree, referring back to the earlier analogy of an unshakeable tree, while having the power of the antidote.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2.4. What to do when one thinks about the welfare of others

The verse relating to this is:

52. *When casting aside the welfare of others,
And desiring one's selfish aims,
And having a mind wishing to speak,
At these times remain like a tree.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

When one considers the welfare of self and others, ...

This refers to the bodhisattva training, the aspiration to benefit others. Having made that aspiration,

... if one casts aside the welfare of others, wishes to work only for one's own welfare, and has a mind wishing to speak, such a person should remain like a tree.

If one casts aside the welfare of others, and wishes to work only for one's own welfare, at that time if one has a mind wishing to speak, then it is better not to speak or act. Such a person should remain like a tree.

When someone who is committed to working for the welfare of others actually casts aside the welfare of others then that is, without doubt, a grave fault. While that aspiration to benefit others remains in one's mind, if the wish to work only for one's own welfare occurs, then whatever one says will be tainted with a desire to gain something for oneself. Thus, whatever words one utters will not have the effect of benefitting others. Therefore the advice here is that when one has selfish motives, or is thinking about only one's own welfare, then it is better not to speak and remain like a tree.

From the perspective of an ordinary person, the normal way of thinking is to cast aside the welfare of others and think only about one's own welfare. So this is what one needs to avoid. If we really think about how we normally conduct ourselves, and do a thorough self-evaluation of how we normally think, it will become quite apparent that we neglect others by default, because we think only about our own achievements and accomplishments. This is only apparent when we actually stop to think about it. This is how we begin to transform ourselves, noticing how our normal habituated mind thinks. Understanding that leaves room for real transformation, and then we can actually change.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2.5. What to do when one wishes to generate belligerence or despondency

The verse relating to that is as follows:

53. *When being impatient, lazy and afraid,
Likewise, when stubbornness, incoherence
And a partisan attitude arise,
At these times remain like a tree.*

This section relates counteracting belligerence and despondency when they occur.

The commentary reads:

- When being impatient due to belligerence or suffering;
- When being afraid of practising virtue and so forth, due to laziness that is not joyful about virtue;
- When one is stubborn because of being unrestrained or incoherent;
- When the mind favours one's own side, friends and so forth.

At these times one should remain like a tree while practising the antidote.

In Tibetan the words for anger and belligerence are similar. As presented previously, belligerence is one of the secondary mental factors. As you will recall, there is a difference between anger and belligerence. Anger is one of the root afflictions, while belligerence is listed as a proximate or secondary affliction. When anger targeted towards a living being becomes more intense, it then turns into belligerence. So belligerence is a more intense form of anger.

The object of belligerence, as presented previously, is an animate object, not inanimate objects, whereas anger can be focussed on any object. There are the three types of objects of anger: suffering, sentient beings and inanimate objects. You can generate anger towards all three objects, whereas belligerence is targeted only towards living beings.

Thus the first situation is being impatient due to belligerence or suffering.

Next is being afraid of practising virtue and so forth due to laziness that is not joyful about virtue. When the mind is in a heightened state, one is more prone to feeling belligerent. When the mind is feeling despondent then that is when laziness occurs. Therefore, as presented here in the commentary, being impatient due to belligerence or suffering, and being afraid of practising virtue and so forth due to laziness that is not joyful about virtue are at the opposite ends of the spectrum. At one end, if one's mind is feeling very heightened, then it is more likely that belligerence will arise, and at the other, laziness can occur when the mind is feeling despondent.

In relation to feeling despondent with a sense of, 'I can't do it, I can't manage', on a recent visit to the Drolkar centre, Carol came up to me and conveyed, 'I don't really have a strong inclination to go to the Kalachakra. I feel hesitant to taking a lot of commitments. If I am not able to observe them, then that will be a cause for me to go to the lower realms and I wouldn't wish that for myself. I would rather stay here with you Geshe Doga and be on a safer plain'. She was teary when she relayed that to me.

However she had already organised to travel with Geshe Sonam, who was encouraging her to go. Of course I wouldn't stop Carol from going—after all, she had decided to go anyway. Therefore I encouraged her to go and receive the blessing 'and take on as much as you can do'. However, her intention of taking the commitments seriously was a good sign.

Carol was expressing her hesitation even in taking the lay-person's vows, saying that 'I might not be able to keep them'. Of course, the way to take vows is to first establish the basis by taking the self-liberation vows. Then based on that, one can take the bodhisattva vows and later the tantric vows. That is the sequence of how one takes these vows.

The next situation is when one is stubborn because of being unrestrained or incoherent. The Tibetan term chetol has the connotation of someone who is not able to really think things out clearly, and just does things randomly. It is used to refer to someone who doesn't really have many values, and who does anything they want. Even in the everyday world such a person would not be considered as reliable or trustworthy, because they just do whatever they want. Incoherence refers to the lack of a relationship between what is said earlier and what is said later.

The final example is when the mind favours one's own side, friends and so forth, which means to favour taking the side of one's friends and colleagues and so forth, and abandoning all others.

In summary, the commentary states:

At these times one should remain like a tree, while practising the antidote.

1.3.1.2.1.2.4. Summary

The verse relating to the summary reads as follows:

54. *Having thus analysed the strong afflictions
And the mind striving in meaninglessness,
The brave person will then guard
The mind steadfastly with antidotes.*

Here Gyaltsab Je explains:

Thus, having investigated the mind that strives in the afflictions and meaninglessness, one should not allow this mind to engage in negative actions with the antidote that is like a powerful hero, but keep it steady.

Having presented all of the conditions where one needs to practice applying the antidotes appropriately, and having investigated the mind that wishes to engage in the afflictions and meaningless activities, one should not allow this mind to engage in negative actions with the antidote that is like a powerful hero. Here, the antidote is likened to a very powerful person, who is not easily overcome by foes and so forth. One applies powerful antidotes against the delusions or afflictions and thus keeps it steady.

This summary verse encapsulates all of the earlier points about afflictions, and summarises how to actually apply the antidotes.

At the conclusion of our regular prayers, we can do the Eight Verses of Mind Training which we also did last week. Mary-Lou's father passed away yesterday, so we can dedicate the practice for her late dad.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

22 July 2014

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta we have generated as a motivation for the practice we can now engage in the meditation.

[meditation]

We can set the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: for the purpose of benefiting all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will engage in this teaching and put it into practice well.

At this point please remember the verses we covered in our last session. Recall how meticulously that advice was presented and how really applicable it is to our daily situation. It is very important to keep that essential meaning in mind.

1.3.1.2.2. Protecting the training of the mind from degeneration

This is subdivided into three:

1.3.1.2.2.1. Protecting with the individual antidotes

1.3.1.2.2.2. The common antidote

1.3.1.2.2.3. The way of training in meditating on the antidote

1.3.1.2.2.1. Protecting with the individual antidotes

The verse reads as follows:

55. *Strong ascertainment and strong faith
Stability, respect and politeness,
Knowing shame and having fear,
Peaceful and striving to please others.*

There are two verses under this heading. Gyaltsab Je's commentary addresses verse 55 first. It reads:

If one were to ask 'how does one protect the mind'? Strongly ascertain the points of advice by abandoning doubt and wrong consciousnesses with regards to them; generate strong faith through belief in the Three Jewels and the points of advice, faith and aspiration; stable intent and practice; being polite by being respectful and humble with everybody; shame that is fearful of negativity by reason of oneself; being afraid of the ripened result by contemplating the shortcomings; having pacified senses and striving for the purpose of making others happy.

The five senses are normally engaged in objects of distraction, so to protect the mind is to protect it from being completely drawn into the objects of distraction through the five senses. Take note of the distinction between protection and restraint. The very term 'protection' infers that in the likelihood of the mind becoming distracted, it should withdraw from the object of distraction (withdrawal implying protection of the mind). However 'restraint', suggests not allowing the mind to become distracted with the objects of distraction from the very beginning.

The emphasis here is to protect the training of the mind from degeneration. If one does not protect the mind it is likely that degeneration from one's training or practices would occur. The heading of the verse is explicit here: 'Protecting with individual antidotes'. In relation to the degeneration that occurs in the mind, the cause is distraction through the five senses. Primarily we need to be cautious of our eye sense, mental sense, the mind itself which generates thoughts, and the ear sense. As you can notice, these cause most distractions.

Our thoughts present distraction on a more continuous basis as the object of our mental faculty. One must be cautious and protect the mental faculty from engaging in distracting, discursive thoughts, because they can occur randomly at any time. The next main distraction comes through our eye sense, and because there are so many external objects, we naturally become influenced by them. Likewise we hear a lot of things through our ear sense, and are very easily influenced by them, and thus become distracted.

Indeed when the eye sense comes into contact with beautiful objects it causes the mind of attachment to arise. Conversely, when it comes into contact with unappealing visual objects, anger arises. Likewise jealousy can arise when we see with our eyes the prosperity and good things others have. It is similar with objects of the ear sense; when we hear praise etc. this easily provides the means for attachment and ego to arise. However when we hear unpleasant things, these can immediately cause distress, agitation and anger to arise in our mind. So we do know from experience that a lot of our emotions, particularly the delusions in our mind, are very much influenced by the objects we encounter through our senses.

Again, protection here means being able to withdraw our mind from our engagement with objects as soon as we notice distraction occurs. Protection is really important for us because we are easily influenced by our senses. Our eye sense sees a beautiful object and then grasping starts to develop. It is this grasping at beautiful objects that causes attachment to increase in our mind. That in turn can cause the sense of wanting to own or to possess the object, and if one is not able to possess it, distress arises in the mind due to strong grasping. As the term itself suggests, grasping is holding onto, and not being able to let go of certain objects, whether they be objects of attachment or objects of anger. When we come into contact with certain objects we immediately grasp onto them and don't let go, which causes the delusions in our mind to become intense and strong.

Whether it is our eye sense or other senses that come into contact with objects of distraction, if we protect our mind by not interacting with them, then the delusion and its consequences will not arise strongly and affect us in a negative way. So, we must sever the connection with that object. While this specifically applies in our meditation session, it also relates to our everyday life.

In explaining how to protect the mind the commentary says: Strongly ascertain the points of advice. Advice here means upholding the commitments or vows one may have taken. In relation to the practices, we need to apply the measures explained forcefully. If we do not protect our mind we will degenerate or lapse from the commitments and pledges we have taken and thus fail to engage in the advice or the practice. The commentary continues: by abandoning doubt and wrong consciousnesses with regards to them. This very clearly states that one needs to abandon doubt and the wrong consciousnesses which come to wrong conclusions about this advice. The way to do this is to engage in thorough investigation, gain a thorough understanding of the practices in the beginning, during the actual practice and at the end. You need to investigate and understand at all three times to remove doubts and wrong consciousnesses (leading to mistaken understanding or conclusions) in relation to this advice.

Abandoning doubt refers to abandoning the mind that wavers in two directions. In this state one cannot confirm anything and one is unable to gain the necessary conviction.

In relation to the advice and instructions to be followed, if we have qualms about it, if we start to hesitate or become influenced by other possibilities that are maybe not valid and so forth, then as soon as this doubt arises in the mind, we are very vulnerable to giving up the practices or allowing them to degenerate. As mentioned earlier, thorough investigation needs to be employed to completely remove any doubt. This first requires hearing about the advice extensively, then we use the wisdom and understanding gained from hearing to contemplate or investigate what we have heard. Having thoroughly investigated and thought about it, we can apply the meditation, and once experience is gained from this, a firm conviction develops in the validity of the practices such that it will not degenerate.

This is how an intelligent trainee engages in the study of the practices: thorough investigation and analysis, again and again, then conviction is established. Engaging in one's practice then becomes very firm and stable. This is why the method employed by intelligent trainees is said to be the most suitable.

The commentary then explains: generate strong faith through belief in the Three Jewels and the points of advice. Generating strong faith in the Three Jewels indicates gaining an understanding that the Three Jewels are infallible in protecting you, thus they are suitable as your refuge and will not deceive you. The method of gaining conviction in the Three Jewels arises first from investigating the Dharma Jewel and understanding its qualities. When you develop a good understanding and see the qualities of the Dharma Jewel, you can then naturally generate admiration, faith and conviction in the one who taught it, which is the Buddha Jewel. Then having developed faith in the Buddha and Dharma Jewel, since the ones who follow these are the Sangha Jewels you naturally develop faith in them as well. This is how one generates conviction in the Three Jewels.

One needs to have strong faith and aspiration in the Three Jewels and the points of advice, and stable intent, which means developing a firm and stable intention toward the practices and advice. Furthermore, one needs to adopt a conduct where one is polite by being respectful and humble with everybody. These are all methods to protect one's training and adopt the advice.

Continuing with the commentary's explanation, the next part expands upon engaging in the practice by maintaining shame that is fearful (afraid of committing) negativity by reason of oneself. Shame was explained earlier. The commentary continues with: being afraid of the ripened result by contemplating the shortcomings, which refers to being afraid of the ripened results of the negativities by contemplating their shortcomings. It continues: having pacified senses and striving for the purpose of making others happy. A bodhisattva has intention only to benefit others, so for the purpose of benefitting others needs to engage in conduct which will inspire them, not cause them to lose faith or be critical etc. If a bodhisattva were to cause others to lose faith in the Dharma, or feel critical towards them that would cause the others to create huge negative karma. So, as a means to protect others from the negative mind of losing faith or criticising a bodhisattva, a bodhisattva needs to ensure that they are engaging in the means and conduct of making others happy.

When others are made happy with your good conduct then there is no reason for them to criticise you, because they are happy and inspired with what you are doing, your behaviour etc. This is a very important point to take as personal instruction: when we have the means to make others happy, which we all do, why would we intentionally engage in behaviours and conduct that would make them unhappy? It would be totally inappropriate to intentionally engage in the means to make others unhappy or cause unnecessary discomfort and sorrow in their minds. This behaviour will make others unhappy with you, criticise you etc. Therefore, taking this on a personal level, we need to try to employ means for making others happy in all situations.

The next verse under this same heading:

56. *Do not be put off by the desires
Of the childish that strive with each other
And think with affection, "They have these minds
Due to their generation of afflictions."*

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

Do not be put off by the contradicting desires of childish people where, having benefitted one, the other one gets angry. Have compassion for them thinking, 'this mind is generated within them due to afflictions and without them having any control over themselves. I will liberate them from their afflictions.'

In such a way do not fall under the control of the afflictions.

Again this is relevant advice for us in our daily lives as these sorts of occasions occur quite regularly. When in the commentary it explains, do not be put off by contradicting desires of childish people where, having benefitted one, the other one gets angry, relate it to when you take the measure of being kind to someone, then even without an intention to hurt them, the others get upset. We can see this happening readily in a circle of relatives: if you are nice to one relative then another might start feeling jealous about that and may start to complain.

In relation to beings who act childishly towards you, the advice says not to be put off by their behaviour. 'Put off' here means you should not be put off the intent of benefiting them nor generate a negative mind towards them. Instead you should have compassion towards them, thinking that this mind is generated within them due to afflictions and without them having any control over themselves. You can see the advice here is very true; that when certain beings are under the influence of the delusions e.g. intense anger, even one individual can create so much destruction and kill so many others out of an angry mind. We have examples right here. In Tasmania an individual killed 32 people, and in another coastal place again some other killings occurred, and many people were killed. This was done by one individual—out of his mind, the cause was being obsessed, or completely dominated by delusions such as anger. When we witness this sort of account our natural response might be to become appalled, condemn the person and become angry with them. But in fact when one thinks about what compelled them to engage in such grave negative acts, it is none other than the delusion in their own mind, mainly anger. And when one contemplates that, one sees reason to feel great compassion for them rather than condemning them, seeing how under the influence of the delusion they have no control over their own actions.

We can see too that there are certain individuals who, if they are at a trial say, 'I was given the order to kill so I had no control'. These are examples of how when one engages in negative actions such as the act of killing etc., one does not have control over oneself. Normally we would think that someone is independent and has control over whatever they want to do. If they had control they would not commit the act, but the implication of having no control over their actions is that they are compelled to do that act. Normally we would feel reason to condemn them if we thought they had control, like they had a choice and did it anyway, but the implication here is to feel compassion for them because they have no choice and control over their own actions. That is the main point.

With this understanding one should find oneself resolving to liberate them from their afflictions, rather than condemning them and becoming agitated with them. In understanding such situations, the next piece of advice says: 'In such a way do not fall under the control of the afflictions' oneself. So when relating to others who have engaged in great misdeeds, one needs to protect oneself from the influence of the afflictions. If one doesn't protect oneself then we fall short and become agitated and angry towards the other. So therefore this is a direct instruction for oneself to be responsible for one's own state of mind.

In order to back up this explanation of how one needs to practice in such a way, the commentary presents a citation:

From the Ornament of Mahayana Sutras,

By thinking how they are without power due to constant faults,
Possessing the mind, do not hold it against beings.

As clearly presented in this quote, when someone is afflicted by the faults or the delusions, they don't have the power to control what they do. Thus, one should not hold their negative actions against them. It is really important to understand how every action one engages in, be it positive or negative, there is always a state of mind that compels one to engage in those actions.

The commentary then cites another text.

From the Four Hundred Verses:

Just as a physician is not upset with,
Someone who rages while possessed by a demon,
Subduers see disturbing emotions as the enemy,
Not the person who has them.

The verse from the Four Hundred Verses clearly explains with the analogy of a physician. A physician will not be upset with someone who is possessed by, for example, a demon, because when someone is possessed they might do things which a normal, rational person would not do, such as fighting back, doing wild things like hitting etc. However the physician knows they are affected by their ailments and will not be upset, rather they will be intent on treating them. Likewise the buddhas see disturbing emotions as the enemy. They do not consider the person who has anger as negative, rather it is the afflictions within them that need to be overcome. That is because it is the afflictions in the mind that cause them to engage in actions which are harmful.

As I regularly advise, when someone is really angry you should be cautious around them; they might do anything, they might hit you or hurt you because in intense moments of anger they are not able to act rationally. With the recent unfortunate circumstances of the Malaysian Airlines plane being shot down, my comment was, when the plane is in an area where rebels are carrying their weapons with an agitated mind and angry, and just want to kill, then an accident on such a scale can occur. They would not analyse well and would see no reason to not to use their weapons to shoot anything down. This is an example of how we need to be very wary and cautions around people who are really agitated because we might get hurt ourselves. So if your partner is really upset and angry, you must be careful and cautious.

With this unfortunate event of the plane being shot down, why would the aeroplane go in that direction? Why would they take that route when it is so dangerous? Damien was looking at a map and said that it is actually the normal flight path. Even though I wasn't looking at any map, and I didn't exactly know the location, it was my assumption that the plane pathway shouldn't go that far off in the north of Europe. Apparently they are still investigating how it actually might have gone off route. The routes should be the same for Singapore Airlines and Malaysian Airlines.

Anyhow the main point is that when people are agitated and angry they will have no qualms, they will not hold back in using their weapons, and that is when disasters can occur.

1.3.1.2.2.2. The common antidote

What is being referred to here are common antidotes which could be applicable to all afflictions.

The verse reads:

57. *Objects free from the unutterable
Are for self and sentient beings.
Without ego, always protect this mind,
Like an emanation.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

The engagement in virtuous actions, which are free from forbidden and natural misdeeds, is for the purpose of oneself not degenerating and for the benefit of sentient beings. Engage in actions as if they are illusions or magical apparitions by holding them with the wisdom realising emptiness.

Thus always protect your mind without pride or exaggeration.

In The engagement in virtuous actions which are free from forbidden and natural misdeeds, the term used to reflect misdeeds is also translated as 'unutterable' and 'unmentionable'. We'll use 'unmentionable' as it refers to misdeeds of a certain kind where the consequences are so grave that they cannot even be mentioned by the supreme beings, let alone engaged in. We have discussed the forbidden and natural misdeeds earlier. Forbidden misdeeds specifically relates to the misdeeds laid down by decree, and natural misdeeds are negative regardless of context. So engaging in virtuous actions which are free from such misdeeds is done for the purpose of oneself, not to degenerate from that advice etc. and for the benefit of sentient beings. That being the case, the advice here is that one needs to engage in actions while remembering that they are like illusions or like magical apparitions, as a means to prevent the delusions from arising. That is how we need to view things, seeing them as not truly existent, by holding them with the realisation of emptiness, realising that they are empty of inherent existence, then that understanding will prevent strong negative minds of delusions such as anger and attachment etc. from arising. When one has an understanding of how things are not truly existent this serves as an antidote to overcome all afflictions and thus all misdeeds. In this way always protect your mind without pride or arrogance.

As explained in other texts, a being who has a realisation of emptiness during meditative equipoise will view all existence like the sky, empty like space, and when they are in a post-meditative state they will be able to see all phenomena as being like mere illusions. This is how one needs to maintain one's view of phenomena as a way of not being affected by the afflictions in the mind.

1.3.1.2.2.3. The way of training in meditating on the antidote

The verse reads:

*58. Having repeatedly contemplated one's attainment
Of supreme freedom after a long time,
Hold on to that mind
As immovable as Mount Meru.*

Think: After a great accumulation, which lasted for a long time, I have attained the precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments. By contemplating repeatedly the great purpose and rarity of the precious human rebirth, generate the intent to definitely achieve the great purpose. Then firmly hold that mind, as immovable as Mount Meru.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary clearly explains here that having engaged in a great accumulation, incurred over a long period of time, as a result one attains a precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments. Contemplating on the difficulty of obtaining a precious human rebirth, obtaining something which has been so difficult to obtain, repeatedly contemplating the great purpose and rarity of the precious human rebirth, one generates the intent to definitely achieve the great purpose. One needs to hold this intent firmly in the mind, as immovable as Mount Meru.

The main point of the advice is that one needs to repeatedly contemplate the precious human rebirth one has obtained. One aspect of this advice can be how we should not feel discouraged, even if it takes a long time to accumulate certain merits, the results are definitely achieved. So by relating to the good consequences we have obtained now, it can encourage us to further develop and engage in the practices to gain further good results in the future. This is how we need to maintain a mind which is free from despondency and have a courageous mind to continue with the practices and hold our mind firm and stable.

1.3.2. The way of training in the morality of accumulating virtuous dharmas

This is subdivided into two:

1.3.2.1. Abandoning attachment for the body which is the cause not to train in morality

1.3.2.2. To be skilful in practising virtue

1.3.2.1. ABANDONING ATTACHMENT FOR THE BODY WHICH IS THE CAUSE NOT TO TRAIN IN MORALITY

The meaning of morality here specifically refers to accumulating virtuous Dharma. Generally the definition of morality is the mind which employs restraint; restraint is presented as the definition of morality. However this refers mainly to restraint from a particular misdeed. In relating to this morality, accumulating virtuous Dharma, it is explained specifically in Lam Rim teachings how all virtues of a bodhisattva's conduct encompasses morality. In other words, all virtuous Dharma can be an aid to further enhancing a bodhisattva's morality. In a broader sense, all virtues engaged in by bodhisattvas are said to be morality.

The general definition of morality as the mind of restraint may be more suitable for that: for the morality of restraining from misdeeds.

Under the first subheading there are five subheadings.

We can leave this explanation for the next teaching session.

As you are aware the next session will be the discussion followed by the exam. So as usual it will be good to engage in the discussion with a proper motivation and proper conduct and also the exam as well.

And then also for the seminar which is coming up at the end of next month, you need to have a good discussion amongst yourselves as how to conduct that.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

12 August 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation.
[meditation]

Generate the positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

1.3.2. The way of training in the morality of accumulating virtuous dharmas

In our last session we identified what the morality of accumulating virtuous dharmas means.

This section of the text has two sub-headings:

1.3.2.1. Abandoning attachment to the body, which is the cause not to train in morality

1.3.2.2. To be skilful in practising virtue

1.3.2.1. ABANDONING ATTACHMENT TO THE BODY, WHICH IS THE CAUSE NOT TO TRAIN IN MORALITY

Here we need to understand that this refers to abandoning attachment to the body, and that it is not suggesting in any way that one should abandon caring for and looking after the body. This distinction will be explained in more detail later on.

What we need to understand here is that attachment to the body needs to be abandoned because it is a cause to prevent one from training in morality. In order to practise morality we need to overcome the obstacles that prevent us from training in morality. Here, the obstacle that needs to be overcome is attachment to the body. This text, as well as other teachings, tells us that the method for abandoning attachment to the body is to contemplate and meditate on the imperfections of the body.

First of all we need to understand how attachment to the body arises. One perceives the body as attractive or appealing, and when that perception is overlaid with attachment, it sees qualities superimposed on the body, which make it more appealing than it actually is.

We have presented this distinction many times in the past. If the question is whether there are some appealing features of the body, then of course the body does have attractive and appealing features. However the mind of attachment exaggerates those qualities and then superimposes those exaggerated qualities on the perception of the body. So the perception goes beyond the limits of the reality, and one becomes attached to the body. Hence we need to overcome the wrong perception that exaggerates the qualities of the body by focussing on its natural imperfections.

We need to reflect on the shortcomings of being attached to the body, because it can lead to a lot of unethical behaviour. Thus, being overly attached to the body causes one to not practise morality. While this section presents the impurities of the body and how to overcome attachment, more detailed explanations will be given in the eighth chapter on concentration.

We have a very strong sense of cherishing our body due to our attachment to it, and the stronger the sense of cherishing and clinging to the body, the more likely it is that we will experience the shortcomings of this attachment. So training our mind in overcoming strong attachment to the body will reduce our clinging to and cherishing of the body, which will definitely have a significant impact on our practice, particularly at the time of death.

It is possible to experience great agony and suffering at the time of death—not so much on the physical level but mental suffering. Therefore, if we train our mind now so that we don't have strong attachment to the body, then that will really help at the time of death. Even though there might be some physical discomfort, there will definitely be less mental agony, because of our mental training and practice of reducing attachment to the body. Then one will not experience the intense sufferings of being separated from one's body.

As mentioned in the teachings, by training now to reduce strong attachment and cherishing of the body, at best one will experience great joy in discarding this body and moving on to the next existence. That of course occurs at the highest levels of this practice. But even at our level, if we can secure a mind where at least we have no regrets at the time of death, then that would be a significant achievement. These are really important points for us to consider—if we practise now we will definitely reap great results later on.

To the extent that we have trained our mind to reduce attachment to our body, then, at the time of death, fear and anxiety about having to leave the body will not be experienced. Otherwise there can be great suffering at the prospect of having to be separated from one's physical body. Through understanding the Dharma one develops the understanding that naturally the body will be discarded at the time of death, and that what continues on is the individual self, and the mind that accompanies that self or 'I'. Thus, whatever merits and virtues we have accumulated will accompany the mind and self.

Thus, as I emphasise regularly, our real protector is the positive state of mind of virtue, and it is this positive state of mind that will protect us at the time of death. So if at that time we recollect the Three Jewels, thinking about the essence of the Buddha's qualities of love, compassion, and wisdom, then there is no doubt that one will be saved from an unfortunate rebirth in the next lifetime.

We really need to contemplate and understand these essential points. The benefits of doing the tong len (giving and taking) practice now will also be reaped at that most crucial time. If, at the last stages of our life we experience any physical ailment or difficulties, or mental suffering at the prospect of having to discard our body, and we apply the tong len practice, taking in the sufferings of all beings, and giving our virtues and merits to them, then what a wonderful state of mind to be in at that time! That would be the best preparation for our transition to the next life.

As the teachings explain, at that time we leave behind everything that we are familiar with in this life. Our physical body will not protect us at that crucial time; whatever possessions we have will not be able to protect us at that time; even our relatives, close and dear ones will not be able to protect us at that time. The only thing that can help us at that time is, as explained in the teachings, Dharma practice. Therefore we need to identify the essence of the practice that will help us at that time.

This is important not just as preparation for the time of death, but the practice we engage in now will also be a great solace as we age. The best preparation for old age, as well as for the time of death, is to familiarise ourselves with these practices now.

As I regularly emphasise, if we were to boil all the teachings down to their essence, then it is love and compassion. That practice of generating love and compassion and trying to implement it in our daily lives is, as I regularly mention, our unfailing friend and companion, and our real protector. It helps to protect us in this life, it helps and protects us at the time of death, and it will help and protect us in our future lives. In all aspects of our existence—now, at the time of death, and in future lifetimes—kindness, love and compassion are our unfailing friend and protector.

We need to understand that, as the teachings mention, death can occur at any time. We have just heard the news that Robin Williams was found dead this morning. He was someone who brought a lot of laughter and joy to others by being humorous, and was really appreciated by many people. Apparently he was also a nice person too. He was not even very old, just sixty-three, but his life ended suddenly and abruptly. However he definitely had a worthwhile life because he made many people happy. He made people laugh and feel joyful, so he made a really significant contribution to the happiness of others. Even the American president seemed shocked and was struggling with words when he was giving his condolence speech. So, it would be appropriate that we repay Robin William's kindness by doing some prayers for him.

This is a reminder that age does not determine the time of death. The point here is that one cannot hold on to the body forever. Inevitably, we have to discard it. What we need to derive from the advice given here is that while we need to abandon attachment to the body, we still need to protect it and put it to good use by practicing the Dharma. This of course will be explained in more detail later on.

The presentation here is about how to contemplate the natural imperfections of the body. By following these methods of reason and logic one is able to overcome the mind of being overly attached to the body by seeing it as an overly appealing or attractive object.

There are five sub-divisions under this heading:

1.3.2.1.1. An example of why it is unsuitable to be attached to the body

1.3.2.1.2. Meditating on the impurity of the body

1.3.2.1.3. Contemplating the lack of essence of the body

1.3.2.1.4. The reason why it is unsuitable to be attached to the body

1.3.2.1.5. Because the body disintegrates quickly it is suitable to practise virtue

1.3.2.1.1. An example of why it is unsuitable to be attached to the body

*59. Vultures, out of their attachment for flesh,
Push and pull it back and forth amongst them.
If you do not have any dislike then,
Why do you cherish it now?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

When one is dead, although the vultures push and pull the body back and forth amongst them out of attachment to it, if you mind do not generate dislike at that time, then why are you attached to your body and cherish it now? It is unsuitable to be attached.

This explanation is, of course, quite clear. However, to reflect on some of the main points, what is being explained here is that when one is dead, the body becomes food for vultures, who tear it open and pull it around. It becomes quite repulsive, so nothing remains of the body that the mind could be attached to. If that is the case, then 'why do you have strong attachment and cherish your body now?' The conclusion is that it is not suitable to be strongly attached, because the nature of the body is the same as that of a corpse. The impermanence of our body is a really significant point to contemplate.

When we really think about it, the body that we seem so attached to now will, in the end, become a repulsive corpse. Contemplating that now will help to reduce attachment to our body.

Next comes the reason for that attachment, which is presented in these two lines:

*60ab. Having claimed the body as mine
Why mind do you guard it?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Hence, why mind do you guard it, having claimed the body as mine and cherishing it, since much that is unwanted arises from attachment to the body?

As presented here, it is through our strong familiarity with the body as being 'mine' that we have a strong sense of our body as being our prized possession. Amongst all our possessions we consider our body as being the most intimate and cherished possession. We have an instinctive notion of the body as being 'mine', and with that strong attachment the strong sense of clinging to the body arises.

This point is presented in the commentary as a dialogue with one's own mind:

Why mind are you so attached to this body when so many unwanted things arise out of that attachment?

The hypothetical response as presented in the commentary is:

Because I definitely require it.

Of course this response is not unreasonable, because we are attached to our body, and when that is challenged then we might instinctively feel 'but I really do need my body'. The rejoinder to that is contained in the next two lines of verse:

*60cd. Since both of you are distinct
What is it doing for you?*

The commentary presents a very logical point in its explanation of these two lines:

Answer: Since both you and this body are distinct from each other, you will leave this body behind very quickly, and the body will also abandon you. Hence, what is it doing for you? It is unsuitable to hold it as 'mine'.

Here, further reasons as to why it is not suitable to be attached to the body are presented. The fact is that the body and oneself are not the same; at death your mind leaves the body, and when you leave the body behind, it will disintegrate.

Since you will be abandoning the body, and the body will in effect be abandoning you, then what is it doing for you? As one has to eventually discard it, the body gives no real lasting benefit. So it is unsuitable to hold the body with a very strong mind of possession, viewing it as 'mine'. So the point of impermanence is being presented once again. It is inevitable that one will have to be separated from one's body, so reduce strong attachment to the body from now on.

We need to familiarise our mind with these significant points, and incorporate them into our practice.

1.3.1.1.2. Meditating on the impurity of the body

A further means to overcome attachment to the body is to contemplate the natural defects of the body. This particularly relates to attachment to the bodies of others, such as when men are attached to a woman's body or a woman to a man's body. This attachment seems to arise purely by focusing on attractiveness of the body itself. One needs to bear in mind however that it is possible to see the qualities and perfections of the person while also contemplating the natural imperfections of their body, as a way to overcome attachment to that body. In most cases the attachment to a member of the opposite sex seems mostly related to the appearance of their body. Some even make comments such as 'they don't really love me, they just like my body'. This can be very true! In this case there is no real concern about the individual, just attraction to the appearance of their body.

In this context one needs to understand that while one overcomes attachment to the body by seeing its natural defects and impurities, that does not in any way undermine seeing the person themselves as being warm-hearted and appealing, and feeling love and compassion for them. So here the training is to reduce attachment to the body, whilst still cherishing the person. This is important to understand.

As I regularly relate, when two people come together and wish to live together, their initial reason may well be out of attachment. In fact, it is attachment that causes the initial attraction to one another and then a feeling of fondness for each other develops. Having decided to live together in a committed relationship, if they start to practise genuine love and compassion for each other, then this is the key to a genuine relationship.

Even in the event that attachment for each other ceases or differences in opinions arise, and a couple consider to live separately, if genuine love and compassion was practised mutually, then a good relationship can still be maintained. While the intimate physical relationship ceases, they can still have a mutual fondness for each other. In fact, some have confided in me that their relationship had improved after separation took place and they were better friends.

As lay Dharma practitioners, you really need to take this important point into consideration. When you have a relationship with another you really need to go beyond mutual attraction and attachment, and develop a genuine sense of love and compassion for each other. That will then be a significant relationship.

These are really important points that you need to take into consideration. As many of you are in committed relationships it is really important to have a genuine harmonious relationship with your partners. If, as mentioned previously, one takes initiative to really base the relationship on genuine concern, love and compassion for each other, then that will definitely contribute to less arguments, and fewer reasons to become angry and upset with one another. The fewer the occasions of anger, the more it helps to protect the virtue in one's mind. A relationship maintained with a virtuous frame of mind, where one does not have to become angry, argue, bicker and so forth, will be a worthwhile relationship.

[Geshe Doga says in English, 'If I'm happy, with love and kindness, then angry less and argue less. Together less angry, then more happy! More angry, more arguments, then lose all happiness'.]

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section with a hypothetical argument:

Argument: It is unsuitable to give it up because I have held it to me as 'mine' for a long time.

The argument is that it is unsuitable to give the body up because it has been 'mine' for a long time. This is another significant point. Because we have had this body for as long as we remember, it is our prized possession. So giving up our body seems to be quite unthinkable. It's hard to even contemplate that one can give up attachment to the body.

61. *Deluded mind, why do you
Not grasp at the clean form of wood?
This machine that is an accumulation of filth,
These bones, to guard this now, how is it appropriate?*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Answer: If you, the deluded mind that holds that which lacks a self as having a self, holds the impure as 'mine' then why do you not hold a clean piece of wood as 'I' as well?

Instead you guard this machine, which is an accumulation of filth and bones. How can this be suitable?

It is unsuitable to be attached.

The point here is that it is a deluded mind that holds something that lacks a self as having a self. Similarly, it is also a deluded mind that holds something as pure when in fact it is impure. So if the mind were to hold something that is impure by nature as pure or clean, then why do you not hold a clean piece of wood as 'I' as well? This is the significant point being made here.

Then as further explained, instead you guard this machine of the body, which is an accumulation of filth and bones. How can this be suitable? This implies that it is not suitable.

Our bodies are, in effect, like a machine that produces filth. We can understand this when we think about the clean substances going in, and how what comes out is foul, putrid, and rotten. As this is the natural condition of the body, how can we consider it as being pure? Therefore it is not suitable to be attached to it.

1.3.1.1.3. Contemplating the lack of essence of the body

This has two sub-headings

1.3.1.1.3.1. If one separates the different parts of the body and analyses them one will not find any essence

1.3.1.1.3.2. It is unsuitable to be attached to that without essence.

What we need to derive from this explanation is that it is a logical presentation of the way to contemplate the natural defects and imperfections of the body. Rather than giving a general instruction to meditate on the impurities of the body, the instruction is to analyse the natural circumstances of the body. Then through that analysis one comes to understand and accept that the body is indeed impure. By meditating on the natural defects and imperfections of the body in this way one will be able to implement it into one's practice.

1.3.1.1.3.1. If one separates the different parts of the body and analyses them one will not find any essence

Here essence refers to the essence of purity. The relevant verse is:

62. *First peel off this sheath of skin
With your awareness.
Then also separate the flesh from the grid of bones
And place it apart with the scalpel of wisdom.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation of the meaning of this verse is:

First of all, if you mentally peel off this sheath of skin from the rest of the body, then it does not have any essence. Then remove the flesh from the grid of bones with the scalpel of wisdom, and analyse whether there is any essence.

This is another very logical and systematic presentation of the way of looking into the body. Where is its essence?

What is being suggested is that the analysis begins with first peeling off the skin that covers the body and then looking at what is beneath that. In most cases attachment arises through being attracted to a beautiful face, in which case you would start the analysis by removing the skin from the face, and then look beyond that.

The way to investigate the essence of an appealing nature is to begin with the attraction to the skin, which is indeed what you are looking at when you are attracted to the body. However the skin is of course not the body. So when one goes beyond the skin one looks at the flesh. If one feels there might be some essence beyond that, one goes further and takes the flesh away, leaving the grid of the bones. Then, when one goes further into the bones, there is marrow.

This analysis is done with the scalpel of wisdom. Just as a scalpel is able to dissect these layers of the body, one uses the wisdom of analysis like a scalpel to look through these layers to find whether there is any essence. Then one will find that there is no essence at all.

The next verse shows how to further analyse with the scalpel of wisdom. It reads:

63. *Then divide the bones as well
And scan all the way down to your feet.
Analyse and ask yourself,
'Where is the essence in this?'*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Then divide up the bones as well, scan all the parts down to your feet and ask yourself, 'Where is there the essence that could bear analysis?'

Analyse like this with your own wisdom. There is not the slightest essence that can be relied upon.

This second verse is also quite clear. Even when the bones have been divided and one looks into the inner parts of the body from the feet upwards then one asks where is the essence that could bear the analysis?, which implies that there is no real essence to be found. So as the commentary says analyse like this with your own wisdom. There is not the slightest essence that can be found and relied upon.

This meditation is a means to contemplate the natural impurities and defects of the body. The fundamentally unclean nature of the body will help one to reduce attachment to one's own body. And, when one applies this to others who appear attractive and thus an object of attachment, this is a way to reduce attachment to the bodies of others as well. So it is more practical to train our mind by first looking into our own body and accept its natural defects, and then we will understand that it's the same with the bodies of others. If one trains the mind in this way, it will definitely help to reduce strong attachment.

These verses present an analysis that can be used to look for the essence of the body, leading to the conclusion that there is no essence to be found.

1.3.1.1.3.2. It is unsuitable to be attached to that without essence

The verse relating to this reads:

64. *If, even when looking with effort
You cannot find any essence in this,
Then why do you persist
In guarding this body with attachment?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

If, even when looking for any essence with effort, you mind, do not see any essence, then for what reason do you mind, continue to guard this body due to being attached to it and grasping at it?

This excessive grasping is unsuitable.

This reflects on the fact that if one has not given up the object of attachment from the depth of one's heart, then attachment will continue to exist despite employing these methods of analysis. Having a theoretical understanding that, 'Yes, it is obvious that the nature of the body is impure', is not enough if one does not actually give up attachment to the body. Even with that analysis and understanding, one could still be holding on to the object of attachment. That is because deep inside, one still holds the object of attachment and sees it as appealing and having essence.

These points are quite clear.

1.3.2.1.4. The reason why it is unsuitable to be attached to the body

Again, this heading begins with a hypothetical argument.

Argument: However, if you say that it is suitable to be slightly attached to this body?

One may question, 'Is it OK to have a little bit of attachment to the body?' So as a way to overcome this doubt the next one and a half verses say:

*65. You are unable to eat filth
As well as unable to drink blood,
And unable to suck the innards.
What is the body doing for you?*

*66ab. At second best, it is suitable to be guarded
As food for foxes and vultures.*

The commentary to these lines reads:

Answer: It is unsuitable to be attached to the body because the body is an impure aggregate. You cannot eat the impure substances of the body and you can also not drink the blood. Likewise you cannot suck the innards, so what action is the body doing for you that is of use? If you were to protect it then at second best the body is only suitable to be guarded as food for foxes and vultures.

As the commentary explains, it is unsuitable to be attached to the body because it is an impure aggregate. Further reasons for the body's impurity are that we do not have any use of this body for ourselves: we cannot consume our own body to nourish ourselves; we cannot drink our blood; and we cannot suck our innards. So what real benefit does the body give us?

As one would not consider consuming one's own body, the only other good reason to protect it would be that the body is suitable as food for foxes and vultures. This means that if our body can help other beings such as foxes, vultures and so forth, then it might be worthwhile to protect it. Otherwise it has no personal benefit.

A significant point being made here is, while it is inappropriate to protect one's body merely out of attachment to it, if it can be used for the benefit of others then it is worthwhile to protect the body.

We conclude here for the evening. Let us recite the Eight Verses of Mind Training, and dedicate it to the late Robin Williams. I have seen some of his shows which were very funny; they made me laugh and laugh. Some people have that natural gift of being amusing and funny just by the virtue of being seen. Whatever the circumstances of his death, it is sad to lose a person who has benefited others. So it is appropriate that we dedicate some prayers for him.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མཉམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

19 August 2014

If, prior to taking refuge, you generate the following motivation, 'in order to liberate all beings from all sufferings and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness I need to achieve enlightenment myself, so for this purpose I take refuge in Buddha, Dharma and Sangha', this then becomes what is called 'special refuge'.

When we add to this special refuge the intention to achieve enlightenment quickly, very quickly, then it becomes what is called a 'special bodhicitta' intention.

I convey this to you now so that when you come across practices where it indicates taking special refuge and generating special bodhicitta, you will know what it means.

So, based on the refuge and bodhicitta motivation we generated earlier, along with this profound understanding, we can now engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

We can now generate the following motivation for receiving the teachings: In order to free all sentient beings from all sufferings and lead to them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So, for this purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

The very meditation practice that we engaged in earlier is a practice to further enhance and develop the love and compassion within ourselves. If we were to really take the initiative to put this into practice rather than leave it as a mere wish, and really develop practising love and compassion within ourselves, the benefit would be unimaginable. It is incredible benefit for oneself as well as for others. There is only a positive result to be gained from developing love and compassion in one's heart.

You might find it hard to detect how extending love and compassion to all living beings actually directly benefits them or yourself. The positive effects take place over a long period of time, so the benefits are experienced more in an indirect way. However we can relate to the more direct experiences with our immediate relations, who we deal with on a daily basis. If one has really taken the initiative to cultivate genuine love and compassion, then due to familiarity with the practice, and the positive impact it has on one's mind, it will definitely contribute to less agitation and less anger—particularly with our close relationships.

In relation to close relationships we have now, or from the past, we are easily affected by what they say and what they do. As such, anger can arise if we have not taken the initiative to develop a genuine sense of love and compassion towards them. The way to develop love and compassion towards them is to really understand that when they express inappropriate gestures or words etc. it is because they are influenced by the delusions, and thus affected by a troubled state of mind. When one understands that they don't have control over what they are saying and doing, and that their mind is completely confused (which is why they are expressing inappropriate gestures and so forth), one doesn't take it too personally. Instead one can feel a sense of love and compassion towards them.

We can notice that when inappropriate gestures are laid upon oneself, or vice versa, it is because of the fact that we have a close relationship with the other, now or from the past. It would be quite unlikely that we would express our feelings openly, especially feelings of agitation etc., to strangers. If we were to approach strangers and start relating what we have on our mind, we might even get punched and start a fight. So we usually express what's on our mind to those with whom we are closest, which at times may be agitation and unease, and this can create discomfort between oneself and the other.

Knowing that it is because we have a close relationship with the other, it is most appropriate that one generates genuine understanding based on a sense of love and compassion. If one practises in this way then it becomes a supreme method to transform agitation and anger into love and compassion. If one takes the initiative to practise love and compassion then, if the other was to utter inappropriate words or make inappropriate gestures, one would not take it personally and it would be able to express even more understanding and concern for them. This is how their negative attitudes or gestures can be transformed into something more positive due to the love and compassion in our heart.

As we know from the Buddha's life story, when the Buddha was in the indestructible concentrated state of meditation, and evil forces such as demons attempted to harm the Buddha out of jealousy, their arrows and spears transformed into flowers. The deep concentration and love and compassion in the Buddha's heart overpowered the destructive weapons, and transformed them into something beautiful. We need to understand the significance of the Buddha's great feats, and be encouraged to practise similarly oneself.

When we really take the initiative to practise in this way, with the understanding that inappropriate gestures and words are due to the negative emotions or delusions in the other's mind, one should not take it personally but rather think of the other as an object of compassion, because of the afflictions in their mind. When we practise in this way, what would otherwise be a very uncomfortable situation can be transformed into something more meaningful, and becomes a means to enhance our love and compassion towards them. So turning unwanted things, such as difficulties and problems into the path means precisely this practice. Otherwise what other practice would there be? Beginning with the hardships and unwanted things we experience now, we can learn to transform anger into love and compassion. This is the practice: in a situation where one would have otherwise reacted out of anger, one feels love and compassion instead. Doing that shows how our mind has been transformed.

We need to understand that this is the very foundation of the mind training teachings. The main emphasis here is turning unwanted situations, difficulties and problems into the path. So we need to understand that.

It is as presented in this verse from the Guru Puja practice:

Should even the environment and the beings therein
Be filled with the fruits of their negative actions
And unwished-for sufferings pour down on me like rain,
I seek your blessings to take these miserable conditions as a path
By seeing them as causes to exhaust the results of my negative karma.

So when one next recites these lines from the Guru Puja, it is good to reflect on the meaning.

1.3.2.1.5. Because the body disintegrates quickly it is suitable to practise virtue

From the heading itself we can derive a sense of the profound advice being presented here. Since death is inevitable, and our body disintegrates and nothing is left behind, then while we have this body, it is suitable to employ it in order to accumulate virtue as much as possible.

The practice here is to contemplate the certainty of death. The time of death is uncertain, and that time our body can't help us, as it will be destroyed. The Lam Rim teachings explain in detail that when death occurs none of the things we cherish now can protect us, e.g. our body, our possessions and relatives. None of that can help us at that time. So if we can really contemplate on death and impermanence, and take it to heart, then the practical benefit will be that our attachment to our body, possessions and relatives will reduce to the point of having no attachment to them at all. If one has not even the slightest attachment to these cherished objects, then this will be a cause for so much relief and ease in our mind—not only at the time of death but even in our daily lives now. If we don't take the initiative to let go of the attachment to our body, possessions and relatives, then this can cause a lot of mental agony. When one has strong attachment to close and dear ones in particular, and if they let go of us first, prior to us having trained our own mind to let go of the attachment to them, then that will cause so much agony in one's mind. So to prevent a painful situation like this from happening, you need to take the initiative to train your mind to let go of attachment to these objects. Then you will have great solace.

Most of you would have the experience of being abandoned at one time or another by someone who is close and dear to you. If you can recall the pain and hurt you felt at that time this will be a good impetus to practice the Dharma.

Apparently psychologists have stated that one of the greatest sufferings someone can undergo is the suffering of being abandoned by loved ones. This suffering can be so great that someone who is experiencing that kind of hurt would even consider taking their own life, because they are not able to bear it. Many of you might already be familiar with psychology, and may have heard those explanations. I would say that it is definitely true. The suffering of being abandoned and unloved is a great suffering. So if situations like this were to occur, then the best way to avoid experiencing the sufferings is to train our mind now to let go of the attachment to others. It is in this way that we can see how we can derive practical benefit from these practices: letting go of the attachment to these objects and possessions (particularly other beings) will be of benefit even in this very life.

The point of this subheading is that the body disintegrates quickly and death occurs quickly. Reflecting on the inevitability of death is something which really becomes a strong impetus for one's practice of Dharma. As the teachings and some of the great masters have mentioned, we need to practise to the extent that we generate fear of death now as a way to prevent fear of death at the actual time of death. In other words, cultivating a fear of death now can become the impetus for us to practise the Dharma in a way that actively prepares us for the actual time of death. When there is no fear at that time then there is no hesitation in our mind, and we will be able to joyfully or peacefully go on to the next existence. The fact and reality is that none of us will survive forever—death will definitely occur. The longest one could possibly hope to live for would be 120. Apparently in the past some have lived up to 140. I am not sure of this, but no-one could live much longer than that.

We might aspire to live up to 100, but even that is not a very long time. In terms of the number of years we live, no matter whatever significant older age we might hope to live for, the reality is that the years go by very quickly. In relation to my own experience, it doesn't seem long since I arrived in Australia. When I look back, the time seems to have gone quite quickly, but it is over 30 years. As a reminder of that, someone came to a Geelong teaching last month and showed me pictures saying 'Remember this picture?' It was a picture of this individual taken with me 30 years ago. He told me that the photo was taken in his kitchen, and he has it with him all the time. When he showed the picture, I actually couldn't even recognise the person right away, and that was a reminder of how much time has passed since then.

He had lived in Japan for many years and that is why he was not around here. Apparently he had come to His Holiness' event last year at the Quang Minh temple and he said that he noticed me from a distance, and immediately remembered 'Oh, that is Geshe Doga'. He said he could recognize me right away from a distance.

Referring back to the point about generating fear of death as an impetus to practise the Dharma, if we can really improve our Dharma practice so that we are prepared for the time of death, then this will be of great benefit at the inevitable time of death. In the number of years that I have associated with others here, there have been a few examples of individuals who have faced death with great ease and peace of mind. So there is real significance in this point that we need to pay attention to.

Under this heading Because the body disintegrates quickly it is suitable to practise virtue there are four subheadings.

1.3.2.1.5.1. A body that will soon be destroyed by death is suitable to be ordered to practise virtue

1.3.2.1.5.2. An example of how it is inappropriate to do nothing and procrastinate due to grasping

1.3.2.1.5.3. Having given a wage one should get what one wants

1.3.2.1.5.4. It is appropriate to work for sentient beings by adapting the recognition of a boat

1.3.2.1.5.1. A body that will soon be destroyed by death is suitable to be ordered to practise virtue

The verse reads:

*66cd. This human body
Is only to be used.*

*67. Even if you protect it,
The lord of death, without any mercy,
Will take it away and give it to the birds and dogs.
At that time what can you do?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of the verse.

There is no real purpose of the body from the point of view of its nature. This human body that is intact with its freedoms and endowments is only suitable to be put to work to accumulate virtuous karma.

Although you protect it without achieving this purpose, the merciless lord of death will take it from you and, having separated it from life, will offer it to the birds and dogs. Mind, at such a time what will you do, as you do not have the slightest power to prevent that separation.

The main point the commentary expresses is that there is no real purpose for the body from the point of view of its nature. Its actual composition is a contaminated aggregate so there is no real, substantial pure nature. However the human bodies that we have obtained are intact with the freedoms and endowments, enabling one to pursue the Dharma. Only this kind of body is suitable to put to work to accumulate virtuous karma. This is the only purpose of having obtained a precious human body.

Verse 67 explains that if we were to try to protect our body, without trying to achieve a virtuous purpose, the reality is that the Lord of Death, (which is a mythological being used as a euphemism for death) is merciless and will separate our consciousness from our body. One has to experience death, and once our bodies are separated from this life, it will be offered to the birds and dogs. The point is that our bodies will naturally decompose and be of no use for oneself. So, if we don't reflect on this now, then at the time of death we won't have the power to do anything.

We put great measures into protecting our body by feeding and clothing it etc. If the body didn't age, decay and eventually disintegrate, then perhaps there would be some point to protect it in such a way. However the reality is that our body naturally starts to decay no matter how much we protect it. It will gradually fail us and eventually completely disintegrate, and we will have to separate from it. Taking this natural decay of our body into account, putting in all that time and energy just to protect it, without using it for any great purpose, would be meaningless.

The personal instruction to derive here is to contemplate the inevitability of death and really take the initiative to engage in a greater purpose. The mind, or the individual self will go on, while the body will be left behind at the time of death. This is something that will definitely occur and trying to ignore it will not prevent it. It is better to acknowledge it and actually prepare for the time when it occurs by practising to the best of our ability. Then, when the actual event takes place, it will definitely lessen unnecessary anxiety and fears and benefit us at that time.

1.3.2.1.5.2. An example of how it is inappropriate to do nothing and procrastinate due to grasping

It is natural that we experience birth, aging, sickness and death. This is part and parcel of our existence. Ignoring this and not acknowledging it will not prevent it from happening. The very fact that we are born means that we have to experience death. This is part of our natural existence of suffering.

We can derive the meaning from the heading itself: An example of how it is inappropriate to do nothing and to procrastinate due to grasping. Doing nothing here refers to doing nothing to practice the Dharma, not doing nothing in general. This can be misunderstood if people think 'I am not just doing nothing and sitting around, I am actually very busy, I have a job and so forth, so I am really busy – this advice does not apply to me'. So to clarify, here, doing nothing means doing nothing to generate the causes for one's liberation and enlightenment, or more immediately, doing nothing to prepare for our future life. At the very least, Dharma practice involves practices to prepare oneself for one's next life. If we don't engage in any practice towards achieving the goals of our future lives, ultimately liberation and full enlightenment, then this would be referred to as doing nothing from the Dharma point of view, and this is inappropriate.

The verse reads:

*68. You would not give cloth and so forth
To servants that cannot be ordered around.
Hence, if this body leaves you despite your care,
Why do you build up your flesh to make it firm?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary quite clearly explains the meaning of this verse.

If in the world, for example, slaves and entourage are not able to do the work or if they do not serve food, clothing and so forth to their master, then they are punished.

As this body will leave you, without your control, despite having nourished and cared for it with effort, then why do you build up its flesh to make it firm?

It is unsuitable.

The example presented here refers back to ancient times when great kings or masters had slaves and an entourage of people (for example a king would have an entourage of ministers and so forth). If slaves who worked for the lords were not actually able to do the work, such as serving food or making clothing etc., then they would be punished or even expelled. Similarly if the ministers didn't do the work required of them, they could be punished or even expelled from their position. Even these days we can see people fired from their jobs if they don't work properly, so we can relate to this example.

The commentary further explains that: as this body will leave you, without your control, despite having nourished and cared for it with effort, then why do you build up its flesh to make it firm?, implying this is unsuitable. What is being explained here again reflects the reality that we have to discard this body. No matter how much we nourish it and care for it, it will have to be discarded and left behind. With no intention to achieve a greater purpose with this body, merely eating and consuming as a way of protecting its flesh is futile and of no real benefit. The personal instruction here is that while we do need to protect our body by consuming, eating, clothing it, drinking and finding shelter for it etc., we should do it with the intention that the very purpose of feeding and clothing our bodies etc. is so that we can engage in the practice of the Dharma to benefit other sentient beings. With a sense of love and compassion in one's heart, one can perform the numerous normal daily activities as a practice of Dharma, by remembering to make appropriate offerings each time one eats or drinks. After that one should generate the mind that thinks, 'May consuming this now become a means to nourish my body so that I can use it to engage in Dharma practices to benefit other sentient beings'.

With this intention in our mind, our normal activities of drinking and eating become a great means to accumulate merit to further enhance love and compassion. In this way you can see that by just changing one's attitude towards normal activities, it can turn them into a great practice. These are the instructions for those who really want to take the initiative to try and engage in the practice of Dharma. Make it part of your life: turn whatever you do into a Dharma practice. This instruction is very, very valuable. I personally definitely try to remind myself of this point each time I drink and eat. I don't eat mindlessly, I try and use it for this purpose.

If we can remind ourselves of these points, then whatever activity we engage in to sustain ourselves will become an activity that acquires the conditions for the practice of Dharma. When we talk about the conditions for Dharma practice, we might think of something grand, or something which is beyond our normal activities, but if we can understand that the appropriate conditions for practising Dharma begins with a sound body, then whatever helps to nourish a healthy body definitely becomes the conditions for practising Dharma.

1.3.2.1.5.3. Having given a wage one should get what one wants

Again, using the example of work and wages, if you give a wage to someone to work for you then you expect them to do their service.

The verse reads:

69. *After giving the body its wage,
Put it to work for your purpose.
Without any return
Do not offer everything to it.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary clarifies the meaning.

Having given the body its wage of food, clothing and so forth one should put it to work now for one's purpose of creating virtuous karma. Without the slightest benefit one should not offer the body all this food, clothing and so forth, without getting any benefit in return.

The commentary explains that when we feed and clothe our body it is as if we are giving it its wage. For example, when you pay workers a wage you expect the work to be completed. Similarly, feeding one's body with food and clothing it, the body should then work for one's intended purpose—to create virtuous karma. Creating virtuous karma is in direct contrast to creating non-virtuous karma. Non-virtues of the physical body include killing, stealing and sexual misconduct, and if one used one's body to create non-virtue, then that would definitely have defeated the purpose of having such a body.

However, if one can refrain from these negative deeds and employ the body to create virtuous karma as a means to obtain a good rebirth next life, or better still, to become a cause to obtain liberation and ultimately enlightenment for the purpose of all living beings, then the benefit ranges from a temporary benefit to the ultimate benefit that one can use one's body to achieve. Without the slightest benefit one should not offer the body all this food and clothing without getting any benefit in return means if we were not to get anything in return, then it is meaningless to serve this body. There is another connotation here too. If, instead of benefit, one generates harm with one's body then there is no point supporting it. In this case it would be better not to feed it and give it care. A contemporary example of this may be individuals who have fed their body to the point where it becomes so obese that they can't even stand up or walk around. What benefit is the body in this situation? This is an implication that one needs to also understand.

1.3.2.1.5.4. It is appropriate to work for sentient beings by adapting the recognition of a boat

This heading presents the example of a boat as a means of ferrying passengers from one side of a river to the other. Similarly, we need to use our perfect conditions to bring ourselves from the shore of samsara across to the other shore, which is the state of liberation and ultimately enlightenment—just like the boat.

The verse reads:

70. *Regard the body as a boat
Merely for coming and going.
Transform it into a wish fulfilling body
To accomplish the welfare of sentient beings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the concept further.

This body is here, in this life, merely as a basis for striving in virtue as it is the basis for coming and going. In such a way, view it with the recognition of it being a like boat for crossing the ocean of cyclic existence, and transform it into the precious wish-fulfilling jewel of a Buddha's body, so as to achieve the welfare of all sentient beings.

The point explained here is to regard our body as the basis for striving in virtue. We use our body to come and go, but it should be the basis for actually striving in virtue. The analogy presented here: In such a way, view it with the recognition of it being like a boat for crossing the ocean of cyclic existence, which uses the boat as an example. Just as a boat is used to ferry passengers from one side of a river to the other, so we should use our body to cross the ocean of samsara, from cyclic existence to the shore of enlightenment.

As the commentary highlights, by using our body like a boat to cross the ocean of cyclic existence, having crossed to the other shore of enlightenment, we need to transform our body into the precious wish-fulfilling body of a buddha's body. By engaging in the practice and having generated the altruistic mind of bodhicitta, then the practice one engages in is the six perfections. So, through the combination of the altruistic mind of bodhicitta and the actions of the six perfections, we engage in the practices on the path to reach enlightenment. Thus we need to use our body now as a means to achieve a complete transformed state, where one achieves the two bodies of a buddha: the wisdom truth body and the form body of a buddha. This becomes the means to fulfil one's aspiration to benefit all sentient beings.

1.3.2.2. TO BE SKILFUL IN PRACTISING VIRTUE

The presentations under this heading are very practical and applicable advice for our everyday life, which we really need to take on board. There are three subheadings:

1.3.2.2.1. Making ordinary actions beautiful

1.3.2.2.2. Skilfully interacting with others in a virtuous way. The literal explanation is being skilled about engaging with others as a way to be free from misdeeds.

1.3.2.2.3. Being skilful in the actions of the three doors

1.3.2.2.1. Making ordinary actions beautiful

This is subdivided into three:

1.3.2.2.1.1. How to act when meeting others

1.3.2.2.1.2. How to handle one's possessions

1.3.2.2.1.3. Always perform actions in a courteous manner

1.3.2.2.1.1. How to act when meeting others

This addresses how to act when you encounter others. It reflects on what kind of gestures to express and so forth.

The verse reads:

71. *Thus those possessing control
Should always wear a smile,
Clear away wrathful grimaces and frowns,
Be migrators' friend and be honest.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary expands upon this:

Thus one should take control of one's body and mind and always smile at others. Clear away wrathful grimaces and frowns and be a good friend to migrators. When talking be gentle and truthful.

The line from the verse which says: Thus those possessing control, means having control over one's body and mind, particularly one's own mind. When one encounters others one should always have a smiling face and a pleasant gesture, and refrain from wrathful grimaces, like a dark face or frowns. By taking the initiative to be a good friend to migrators, one will always be close to others and have affection towards others. Further, the advice when talking is to be gentle and truthful. The Tibetan word translated here as gentle has the connotation of using words which are likeable and suitable for the others to hear. How to act when meeting others is something we need to take on board and try to put into practice.

1.3.2.2.1.2. How to handle one's possessions

This relates to handling things in our area, in our room, in our surroundings. It is very practical advice about how to take things out from somewhere and how to put them back in an appropriate way. This affects immediate neighbours or people that live next to you. The main point is that we need to be considerate and not to disturb them in any way.

The verse reads:

- 72ab. *Do not throw beds and so forth
Around noisily without consideration.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary adds:

Do not throw possessions like beds and so forth noisily around because this harms others.

While the explanation here is quite clear, the verse relates to being considerate to others who are living with you, next to you, or close by, such as neighbours,. When the commentary says do not throw it means do not handle possessions roughly. For example, when you are opening doors, or when you are taking things out, be considerate. One might unintentionally have no consideration, but apparently there are those who actually do things noisily, like banging the doors or taking things noisily, as a way to annoy their neighbours or roommates. If you see them also showing a dark or sullen face, these are inappropriate gestures in relation to the handling of things.

1.3.2.2.1.3. Always perform actions in a courteous manner

The third subdivision refers to always being mindful not to disturb others when engaging in any activity. This means to be considerate of others' needs and acting appropriately in any given situation.

The verse reads:

- 72cd. *Also, do not open the door roughly
And always delight in being quiet.*
73. *Water fowl, cats and thieves
Go quietly and are inconspicuous
Thus achieving their goals.
The able ones always act in such a way.*

While this is quite clear we can go into a little bit more detail in our next session. Here we need to reflect on how Shantideva is presenting really practical ways of being considerate, and how to behave appropriately in accordance with others' needs and space and time. This is very appropriate practical advice that we need to apply in our daily life.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke.

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

26 August 2014

Based on the motivation that has been generated during the recitation of the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, let us now engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

1.3.2.2. BEING SKILFUL IN PRACTISING VIRTUE

1.3.2.2.1. Making ordinary actions beautiful

1.3.2.2.1.3. Always perform actions in a courteous manner (cont.)¹

73cd. *Also, do not open the door roughly
And always delight in being quiet.*

74. *Water fowl, cats and thieves
Go quietly and are inconspicuous
Thus achieving their goals.*

The able ones always act in such a way.

These lines give us examples showing how, when we engage in any kind of activities we need to be courteous and mindful of the needs and space of others. Basically, the advice comes down to how to be polite with others.

In this and the following verses, Shantideva exhorts us to practise in a manner that is courteous and pleasing to others, and which will bring them joy. I regularly emphasise the importance of being considerate to others and the need to relate to others in a proper way. We can see here that Shantideva is presenting the very points that I regularly emphasise, so I have very good support from him.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the last two lines of verse 72 in this way:

Because it harms those that are also at home, do not open doors roughly. Always delight in being quiet and in actions that make others happy.

As presented here, when you come in or leave a room be mindful about not shutting the door loudly, as it will disturb the person inside. This is particularly important when there are lamas, such as our own teachers and so forth, meditating and doing their practices. And, of course, shutting the door noisily will definitely upset ordinary people who are easily irritated. Therefore we need to be mindful about not disturbing others in this way.

When Gyaltsab Je states Always delight in being quiet and in actions that make others happy, he is exhorting us to have a quiet demeanour, and to engage in actions that always make others happy.

Thus far the presentation has been on how to engage in actions out of consideration for others. Next comes a presentation of how acting in a gentle manner becomes a means to achieve one's own purpose. Gyaltsab Je gives us these examples:

Examples for achieving one's purpose with gentle actions: water fowl, cats and thieves go quietly and inconspicuously and in such a way achieve what they desire. The Able One, or otherwise the disciplined bodhisattvas always conduct themselves in this manner.

The literal translation uses the term 'water birds', referring to birds that rely on rivers and lakes to catch fish, such as storks. When they are hunting for fish they stand in the water very quietly and still so that they don't disturb the surroundings and frighten the fish. In this way they are able to catch any fish that come close to them.

Likewise when cats go about catching mice they are quietly inconspicuous and move in a very, very gentle and quiet manner. And, of course, in order to be successful, thieves have to move about quietly if they are to achieve their purpose.

Furthermore, the commentary explains, the Able One or bodhisattvas following the discipline always act in this way. When bodhisattvas engage in actions to benefit others they always do it in a very quiet, dignified manner. They are always gentle with their speech and actions, engaging with others in a very gentle and pleasing way.

This is how bodhisattvas, with their intention to benefit sentient beings, act in ways that are completely in accordance with the wishes of others, in order to please them and give them joy. By reflecting upon this, we need to be inspired to always act in the same manner. Even as an aspiration we need to generate thoughts such as, 'May I also be able to practise just like the bodhisattvas'. Thus, by appreciating the gentle ways and manners of bodhisattvas, we should aspire to be like them.

On a personal level we need to reflect upon the great significance of engaging in our everyday actions so that they don't affect others in a negative way. Of course there are times when we have a bad day, where we might act or speak in a less than courteous manner. While we might not have immediate control over our behaviour, in hindsight we can think, 'Oh, that was not proper'. Then, in order to prevent them from escalating further, we can remind ourselves, 'I have listened to Shantideva's advice from this precious text, so acting in this way is not at all appropriate for me now. As there is no benefit for me and it definitely harms others, I shall definitely overcome such behaviour'. When you remind yourself in this way, it will help to prevent negative behaviour from escalating ¹ Last week 'Achieve all in a quiet way' was used as the heading.

Chapter 5

1.3.2.2.2. *Be skilled in interacting with others, free of misdeeds*²

This refers to ensuring that, when we interact with others, we are not engaging in negative deeds. There are five sub-divisions:

1.3.2.2.2.1. How to act in relation to well-meant advice

1.3.2.2.2.2. How to act in relation to speaking the truth

1.3.2.2.2.3. How to act in relation to creating merit

1.3.2.2.2.4. How to act when the qualities of others are praised

1.3.2.2.2.5. The benefit of making others happy

Here we can see how Shantideva is presenting very practical advice relating to our normal, everyday actions. We often encounter others who offer well-meant advice with the best intentions, and we need to know how to respond to that. Likewise, when others speak the truth, we also need to know how to act in that situation. Another situation is how to react when one sees others creating merit. Then there is the situation of knowing how to act when the qualities of others are praised. This section of the text concludes with a discussion of the actual benefit of making others happy. These are very practical points of advice that we really need to take on-board and implement in our lives.

1.3.2.2.2.1 How to act in relation to well-meant advice

74. *Skilful in inducing others and,
Through placing unsought beneficial
Words respectfully on your crown
Become the student of all.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Be skilful in inducing others to practising virtue.

Although one didn't ask for it, if someone gives well-meant unsolicited advice, one should place that advice joyfully and respectfully on one's crown. Without pride one should always become the student of all that have provided good advice.

The first point is to be skilful in inducing others to practise virtue. This has two elements.

- When one intends to present advice to others about accumulating virtue one should be skilled in knowing what is right and wrong. Then, based on that clear understanding, one should encourage others to practise virtue.
- The second element relates to receiving advice from others about engaging in virtue. One should have the discriminating wisdom to analyse what is correct and right, and then apply the advice according to that understanding. As the commentary clearly presents, when well-meant unsought advice is presented by others, one should take that advice joyfully and respectfully place it on one's crown. This means that when the advice is presented in accordance to the Dharma then, without pride one should always become the student of all who have provided good advice.

There might be situations where some may feel, 'I have much more knowledge than you. Who are you to give me that kind of advice?' Rather than accepting that advice one may be offended, thinking, with a sense of pride, 'I know better than you'. That would be an inappropriate response to well-meant advice.

Here we are being presented with some very, very practical advice. As a matter of fact, advice may come from any of these three sources: someone who has greater knowledge than oneself, someone who one considers one's equal, or from someone normally considered to have less knowledge than oneself, such as a youngster. In any of these situations, the bodhisattva's practice is to really welcome well-meant advice, receiving it very graciously and without a sense of pride, generating the attitude of seeing all as one's teachers. Although these are specific instructions relating to receiving Dharma advice, we can also apply this to worldly affairs as well.

Normally the instruction is to really check and investigate whether the advice one receives is appropriate and whether one should accept it. This section, however, refers to well-meant advice, where the practice is to take and appreciate such advice. The implication is that one should willingly appreciate advice that is meaningful and useful and place it on top of one's crown with respect, and thus regard oneself as a student of all.

1.3.2.2.2.2. How to act in relation to speaking the truth

The first two lines from the next verse are presented here:

*75ab. Everything that is said well
Should be commented on as virtue.*

Here the commentary states:

Everything well said as the truth should be commented on as virtuous speech.

Of course the meaning of these lines and the following verses is quite clear. Everything well said as the truth should be commented on as virtuous speech refers particularly to all speech on the Dharma, which is of course based on truth and reality. Whenever others speak about the Dharma one should comment on that as being really wonderful and virtuous speech. So one should praise the well-spoken truth of Dharma words, and, in that way show appreciation, rather than scorn or ridicule. This also prevents jealousy from arising.

When others are presenting the Dharma, or sharing advice with others, we should rejoice, and praise them, saying, 'That is really wonderful virtuous speech'. Such comments are the opposite of comments one might make out of jealousy. If one's mind is affected by jealousy then one could not make such nice comments. So we need to take this advice on-board, and when others are presenting the words of truth of the Dharma, comment on that as being virtuous. It is said that when we praise others without any sense of jealousy, it is a really meritorious deed. So conducting ourselves in this manner is a way to accumulate virtue or merit.

We need to relate this point about speaking the truth without jealousy to the earlier heading which is to Being Skilled in Interacting With Others, Free Of Misdeeds.

² This subdivision was first mentioned on 22 July 2014, as Skillfully Acting with Others in a Virtuous Way.

1.3.2.2.3. How to act in relation to creating merit

This relates to witnessing others creating merit. The next two lines read:

75cd. When seeing somebody being meritorious Inspire joy through praise.

Here Gyaltsab Je explains:

When seeing somebody being meritorious, making offerings and so forth to the Triple Gem, inspire joy and happiness in their minds by directly praising them.

Of course these points were explained extensively in the third chapter on the virtue that is accumulated from rejoicing in the deeds of others.

These lines of verse make the same point. When one sees others engaging in meritorious deeds, such as making offerings and so forth to the Three Jewels, then, if appropriate, one comments on what great deeds they are doing. And if it is not possible to do that, the main thing is to rejoice, and mentally praise them. That will prevent negative minds such as jealousy, pride and so forth from arising.

As presented earlier, when one rejoices in the good deeds of someone who has greater realisations than oneself, then one gets nearly half of that merit oneself. If the one who is generating that virtue and merit is of lower status than oneself, then one gains even more merit. This is how the teachings present the great benefits of rejoicing.

1.3.2.2.4. How to act when the qualities of others are praised

The verse from the text reads:

*76. Comment on qualities secretly,
When qualities are mentioned, agree.
If one's qualities are mentioned,
Check whether there are qualities.*

Here Gyaltsab Je explains:

As it may cause doubts of flattery if one expresses them directly, secretly praise the qualities of others. When others praise the qualities of a third then agree by saying, 'It is like that'.

If your qualities are praised, then without conceit analyse whether the mind really has these qualities or not. If you have, then simply recognise that you have that quality without becoming proud.

The first part of the explanation in the commentary is that if there is a doubt that one's praise might be perceived as flattery, then in order to prevent that possibility, one should practise praising others in secret. If one were to praise others just to flatter them, then that wouldn't be genuine praise, because one is expecting something in return.

If you are not mindful when you praise someone, it may cause them to feel, 'Oh, I wonder why they are praising me. Maybe they want something from me and are just saying that to make me think well of them'. Because of this danger the safest practice is to praise others in secret.

The next point presented in the commentary is also very, very significant and relevant to our normal dealings with others. When others praise the qualities of another person, then we should agree with that praise by saying, 'Yes, it is like that, just as you say'.

The reason why this practice is emphasised here is that if the person being praised is someone who is likeable, then, even if it is not fitting praise, we might say, 'Yes, that is true. They have a lot of qualities'. Whereas if it is someone one doesn't like, then even though they are being rightly praised, we might say, 'Oh, I'm not sure about them'. The main point here is that whether the person to whom the praises are offered is agreeable to oneself or not, the best practice is to acknowledge that praise and say, 'It is like that'. Adopting such conduct not only prevents one from engaging in misdeeds, but we also accumulate great merit by acknowledging the qualities of others.

Furthermore, agreeing in that way also makes the one who is offering the praise joyful too.

The next point in the commentary is also very relevant and significant advice. It relates to when others praise your qualities: If your qualities are praised, then without conceit analyse whether the mind really has these qualities or not.

If someone were to talk about qualities they may see in you and so forth, then reacting with a sense of, 'Oh, I might be great. Oh, they have mentioned my qualities so I might be someone special', would be only increasing one's pride. To assess whether what they say is true, one should first check as to whether one does actually have those qualities, and that the praise is fitting. If one does have those qualities, accept that praise but without any conceit or pride.

1.3.2.2.5. The benefit of making others happy

What are the benefits of making others happy?

*77. Because all efforts are to bring joy,
It is so precious that it is priceless.
Thus, enjoy the blissful happiness
That comes from the virtue of working for others.*

*78. In this life one will be peerless
And also on the other side will be great happiness.
Faults cause unhappiness and suffering
And also on the other side will be great suffering.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

All the actions of the three doors of bodhisattvas are to make others happy. Because this happiness of others is so precious, it is priceless, like a rare object that cannot be bought even with great wealth.

As presented in the commentary, all the actions of the bodhisattvas through their three doors—physical, speech and mental intentions—are performed as a means to make others happy and bring them joy. Bodhisattvas are always engaged in actions that make others happy, because they are aware that the happiness others experience is priceless, like a rare object that cannot be bought. No matter how much money or wealth you may have, you cannot use it to purchase the happiness of others.

Thus, bodhisattvas always use the most appropriate ways and means to make others joyful. As mentioned here, that is because the joy and happiness of others is priceless. I regularly emphasise that we need to engage in actions that will make others joyful and happy. We all have that potential, so it is worthwhile to actually utilise it to bring about joy and happiness to others.

As much as possible, we need to minimise, and try to rid ourselves of any gestures, mannerisms, and behaviours that cause misery to others. If we notice our actions are bringing about misery and agony, then we need to definitely refrain from those actions. Conversely, we need to engage in actions that bring joy to others.

The second paragraph of the commentary reads:

Therefore, with the quality of making others happy, others will not be jealous of one in this life. By practising making others happy, joy in this life will not decline, and one will without doubt also receive possessions and so forth, and in the life beyond one will also attain great happiness.

There are unintentional benefits from making others happy.

- The commentary explains that with the quality of making others happy, others will not be jealous of one in this life. When, from one's own side, one sincerely engages in making others joyful and happy, then that will prevent others from being jealous. That is because one is actively engaged in making them happy.
- One also creates the causes for possessions and wealth to increase.
- The happiness and so forth of this life will not decline, rather it will be restored and established well.
- As a positive consequence of making others happy, one will also attain great happiness in the life beyond, meaning the next life. Here, happiness can range from attaining the happiness of the humans or gods, to obtaining the happiness of liberation and the ultimate happiness of full enlightenment.

So these are the great benefits of making others happy.

Next, Gyalsab Je explains a very significant point:

Otherwise, [meaning if we practise contrary to the aforementioned conduct] as the shortcomings of being angry at the qualities of others, one will experience in this life mental unhappiness and physical suffering, and also in the next life one will experience great suffering.

Having mentioned the benefits of making others happy, if one were to practise the opposite, which is being angry at others' qualities, then, rather than rejoicing in them then, one will immediately experience mental unhappiness and physical suffering in this life.

Generally, being unhappy is the basis on which one generates anger. Anger and mental unhappiness usually support each other. If you check, you will notice that anger usually arises when the mind is unhappy. So when one is not happy with someone else's qualities, then that is the basis for starting to become upset and angry. The main point here is if we generate anger about qualities of others, then that will cause further mental agony, as well as physical suffering. So, here again we find some very pertinent advice, which is that being angry affects our mental health, as well as causing us physical harm.

Through their investigations, scientists have come to the conclusion that those with a very temperamental nature, who are always irritated and angry, are more likely to have physical ailments such as strokes. Apparently anger can induce the blood clots that cause strokes. I have also heard that a perpetually angry attitude suppresses the immune system, making the person much more prone to illness and disease.

The main point mentioned in the text is that if we adopt a mind of joy, make others happy, and praise the qualities of others and so forth, we will receive benefits both in this life and the lives to come.

Conversely, if we practise being angry and upset with the qualities of others, then it will cause mental agony as well as physical suffering in this life and future lives.

That is really the main point. We are being encouraged to practise in accordance with the benefits for oneself.

1.3.2.2.3. Being skilful in the actions of the three doors

The three subdivisions under this heading are:

- 1.3.2.2.3.1. How to act while one speaks
- 1.3.2.2.3.2. How to act while one looks
- 1.3.2.2.3.3. Relating oneself only to virtuous actions

1.3.2.2.3.1. How to act while one speaks

79. *When speaking it should be agreeable and coherent,
Clear and pleasant.
Without attachment or anger,
One should speak gently and appropriately.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains:

As it is explained in the Sutra of the Ten Grounds, when speaking with others it should be agreeable from the heart, coherent, easily understandable, clear and pleasant, in order to be acceptable to their mind.

Having abandoned the motivations of attachment and anger, one should speak gently and appropriately in regard to time and amount.

As explained in the commentary, when speaking with others, one should speak from the heart. One should use only truthful words and say them in an agreeable way.

In the Tibetan version the word translated in the commentary as coherent has the meaning of there being a consistent connection between the first and second parts, making it easily understandable. The point about being clear and consistent in what you are saying is so that others can trust your words.

Next, speech should be clear and pleasant, and acceptable to the minds of others. Here clear has the significance of serving to clear away doubts that others might have. If one is not clear, then even after explanation people will still have doubts about what you said. If you are clear in your speech then that will remove any potential doubts from their mind.

Furthermore, the motivation of one's words or speech to others should be one that is removed from attachment and anger, thus ensuring that whatever words one relays to others are not based on attachment or anger.

One should speak gently as opposed to speaking harshly. Speaking appropriately in regard to time and amount refers to making the length of the presentation in accordance to what is acceptable to others.

As the commentary states, this is as explained in 'The Sutra of the Ten Grounds'.

1.3.2.2.3.2. How to act while one looks

This explains how to look at others and how to act in such a way.

80. *When looking at sentient beings say,
"In dependence on this very sentient being
I will become a buddha",
And look at them honestly and lovingly.*

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Here, Gyaltsab Je explains:

When we look at sentient beings then, similar to the happiness we receive from drinking a refreshing drink after having been thirsty, we think, 'In dependence on this very sentient being I will attain enlightenment', and look at them with a clear mind in a loving manner.

*Transcript prepared by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

As explained in the commentary, the analogy is that if one is really thirsty any drink that quenches our thirst will be really refreshing and rejuvenating.

The point of the illustration is that being thirsty is an unpleasant experience and that the suffering of thirst is removed when one quenches one's thirst with water. Similarly, that which relieves the overall suffering in our life is, of course, reaching the state of enlightenment. So when we encounter sentient beings, we can remind ourselves, 'Through this very sentient being I will achieve enlightenment'.

From the accounts in the Buddha's life stories and so forth, the very first stage in the generation of bodhicitta is in relation to developing love and compassion for sentient beings. And of course all the practices in which the bodhisattvas engage in the middle are also in relation to sentient beings. Finally, the ultimate state of enlightenment is attained in relation to sentient beings. Therefore, all the stages, from the beginning to the end result of enlightenment, relate to sentient beings.

The thought to generate in our mind as soon as we encounter any sentient being is, in dependence on this very sentient being I will attain enlightenment. With that thought in mind we look at others with a clear mind and a loving attitude, thus generating love and compassion toward the sentient being. If, when we encounter sentient beings we can adopt this advice then we will only have a positive state of mind, free from judgement and prejudice and so forth. Having such a clear state of mind recognises this person in front of us as the very sentient being who will help us to become enlightened.

1.3.2.2.3.3. Relating oneself only to virtuous actions

This is subdivided into three. The three subdivisions under this heading are:

- 1.3.2.2.3.3.1. Practising generosity to the special field of offering
- 1.3.2.2.3.3.2. Creating virtue out of one's own power
- 1.3.2.2.3.3.3. Increasing one's virtue evermore and thinking about the purpose.

We can go through the explanations of these subheadings in the next session.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

2 September 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation.

(pause for meditation)

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines—in order to benefit all sentient beings I will strive to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

1.3.2.2.3.3. Relating oneself only to virtuous actions (cont.)

This has three subheadings:

1.3.2.2.3.3.1. Practising generosity to the special field of offering

1.3.2.2.3.3.2. Creating virtue out of one's own power

1.3.2.2.3.3.3. Virtues are progressively superior, therefore think about the purpose before the action

1.3.2.2.3.3.1. Practising generosity to the special field of offering

This is similar to the explanation we covered in Precious Garland by Nagarjuna.

The verse reads:

81. *Whether arising continually through a clear wish
Or through the antidote itself, in dependence
On the fields of qualities, benefit and suffering,
Great virtue is generated.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of the verse as follows:

Engaging in virtue on a continual basis motivated by a clear wish, i.e. a strong aspiration; and an antidote against the opposing side—such as attachment and so forth; in relation to the three supreme fields:

- Field of qualities: The Triple Gem and so forth.
- Field of benefit: One's parents and so forth.
- Field of misery: The destitute, sick, disenfranchised and so forth.

Making offerings to these objects in this manner creates great virtue, thus one should strive in it.

As the commentary explains, accumulating virtue is not to be done sporadically, but rather on a continual basis. There shouldn't be times when one accumulates virtue and other times where one leaves it out. If one wonders when the appropriate time to engage in virtue is, the answer presented here is, at all times, on a continual basis.

Furthermore, engaging in virtue must be accompanied with a clear wish, which is a strong aspiration, and serve as an antidote against the opposing side i.e. the delusions such as attachment and so forth. Thus, the accumulation of virtue has to be accompanied with a strong aspiration, and ensure that it serves as an antidote to overcome the opposing side. For example, when one engages in practising the virtue of generosity, one needs to ensure that it becomes an antidote for overcoming miserliness, and when practising morality ensure that it serves as an antidote to overcome corrupt ethics and so forth. The emphasis here is that when one accumulates virtue, one needs to ensure that it actually becomes an antidote to overcome an opposing non-virtuous state of mind, specifically the delusions. If you do not apply the practice in this way, you will find that there is not much transformation taking place in your mind. As the great Kadampa master advised: one needs to engage continuously in practising virtue and ensure that it serves as a means to subdue one's mind, by overcoming the delusions in one's mind. So that should be the main purpose of accumulating virtue.

In this explanation three particulars are being pointed out:

- The particular of time or duration for accumulating virtue—which is on a continual basis;
- The particular of an antidote—which is to overcome delusions in one's mind; and
- The particular of relying on the three supreme fields—which are the fields of qualities i.e. the objects of refuge; the fields of benefit i.e. one's parents; and the fields of misery i.e. the destitute, sick, disenfranchised.

One should strive to make offerings to these objects in the manner described, thus accumulating great virtue. You need to also understand that in relation to the three supreme fields the opposite is also true; that if you create negativity in relation to any of these objects then it will be a grave negativity. You need to be mindful when relating to the three supreme fields, so that you protect yourself from creating heavy negativities.

As you have noticed, I regularly emphasise the need to be kind to one's parents, particularly one's aging parents. So, you can see that this presentation is supporting me.

1.3.2.2.3.3.2. Creating virtue out of one's own power

This indicates that engaging in virtue should occur from one's own side. In other words, one needs to take the initiative to create virtue oneself and not rely on others to create virtue for you.

The root text and commentary both present the meaning for this heading, which is quite clear and easy to understand. However the emphasis is that we need to take the initiative—to try and put this into practice by being mindful in our daily life.

The verse reads:

82. *Having become proficient and faithful
I will continuously engage in the actions.
In all my actions I will not Depend on anyone.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Having become proficient in what has to be adopted and what has to be abandoned, and in what one should engage in and what one should not, as well as having generated faith in virtue, I shall now continuously practise virtue.

I shall not depend on anybody in my actions of virtue in the sense that I will not order others to do them.

In relation to having to become proficient in what has to be adopted and what has to be abandoned, one needs to know the clear distinction between what is to be adopted and what is to be abandoned. Without a clear understanding, one will not be able to adopt certain necessary qualities and abandon certain detrimental faults. This would be a drawback to our spiritual progress. Although on the one hand one may be putting some effort into adopting virtues, on the other hand one could be failing to discard certain faults detrimental to our progress (e.g. negative behaviours and so forth). If one fails to recognise what the faults are from the very beginning, then it will be hard to take the initiative to overcome them. While adopting positive qualities ensures progress in one's Dharma practice, this can only happen when the opposing faults and negativities within oneself begin to decrease. When, by adopting qualities the faults naturally decrease, then that is a true mark of one's Dharma progress, and a sign that a real transformation is taking place.

Again, a clear distinction between what one should engage in (virtues), and the negativities one should avoid should be clearly understood. This, along with generating faith in virtue, becomes a proper way to engage in the practice of accumulating virtue. Generating faith in virtue specifically means having faith in the infallibility of virtue; that by engaging in virtue positive consequences are definitely experienced. In contrast, if one were to engage in non-virtue, then the infallibility of the consequences of an unwanted result, such as various types of sufferings, also occur. Basically the infallibility of karma is applied here. So, when one has faith and a strong conviction in the infallibility of virtue, then one will develop a natural, keen wish to generate virtue. One will actually be motivated to create virtue, because one has a strong conviction in the positive consequences, so one is inspired to continuously engage in virtue.

The essential points here are twofold: to become proficient, that is to gain a good, clear understanding of what is to be adopted and what is to be abandoned; and on top of that, generating strong faith in the very virtue that one wishes to engage in. When sound faith and conviction are developed, one will develop a strong, keen initiative to continuously practise virtue. The commentary states the resolve one needs to develop: I shall now continuously practise virtue. Again this is not a casual approach, but rather taking the personal responsibility and resolving to accumulate virtue at all times. These points are really pertinent guides for our practice. I find these verses very helpful for my mind. When you read these verses and pay attention to their meaning, not just to gain an intellectual understanding, but with the intention to implement them in one's practice, then they will be very helpful for your mind.

The commentary emphasises: I shall not depend on anybody in my actions of virtue. This implies that one will not order others to accumulate the virtue for oneself; rather, accumulating virtue is dependent on one's own resolve. This is similar to other sutra teachings where Buddha says that liberation is dependent entirely upon oneself.

That means attaining liberation is not dependent on someone else but entirely dependent on oneself.

1.3.2.2.3.3.3. Virtues are progressively superior, therefore think about the purpose before the action

In relation to the six perfections, the later practices are progressively superior than the earlier, which means the later practices are of greater virtue than the earlier ones. However when engaging in the practices, one needs to be mindful to adopt practices of greater purpose in accordance to the time and need to benefit other sentient beings. The verse reads:

83. *The perfections of giving and so forth
Increase them one after the other.
Do not abandon the big for the small,
Mainly think towards the purpose of others.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

The perfections of generosity and so forth up to the perfection of wisdom, are progressively developed and increased.

Do not give up the practices of generosity, morality and so forth that are smaller from the point of view of purpose and virtue, to the generosity and so forth that are bigger. Strive in the bigger.

This shows implicitly that if we cannot practice both together and have to choose, then we should abandon the smaller for the bigger.

Query: How does one posit small and big?

Answer: For example, if in this life, out of the purpose of self and the purpose of other, practising one affects the other to decline, then one should make the purpose of other the main practice.

In relation to the six perfections, Gyaltsab Je states that the practice of morality for example, would be of higher virtue than the practice of generosity. With this explanation, one would create far more virtue practising morality for one day, than practising generosity for many days or weeks.

Those who have done the nyung nye practice would have noticed the description of the merit for keeping the eight Mahayana precepts even for one day or 24 hours, is incredibly high.

The commentary explains: Do not give up the practices of generosity, morality and so forth that are smaller from the point of view of purpose and virtue to the generosity and so forth that are bigger. Strive in the bigger.

Practising morality in the sequence of the six perfections would generally be considered a greater virtue than generosity. However, when there is a greater purpose for practising generosity to benefit others, then one should not pass up this opportunity in favour of the practice of morality. To understand it in its proper context, if one were to practise morality with a strong self-interest, then if an opportunity arose to practice generosity with total dedication to the benefit for others, then the practice of generosity would be greater than the practice of morality which is contrived or stained with mere personal interest.

The commentary explains that if we cannot practise both together and have to choose, then we should abandon the smaller for the bigger. The emphasis is that one should abandon the smaller practice and adopt a bigger practice. The hypothetical query is How does one posit small and big?

The answer asks you to consider two choices: engaging in the practice merely for one's own purpose and concern for this life, and engaging in the practice for the purpose of others. If by practising one the other declines because they oppose each other, then one should make the purpose of others the main practice. The emphasis here is that if one engages in practices with the intention to benefit just oneself, such as benefit for this life, compared to a practice where the main focus is for the purpose of other beings, then the practice focusing on other beings is the greater practice. One needs to make the distinction between the two, and adopt the practice which is for the purpose of others. As other teachings have emphasised, when one fully dedicates a practice for the purpose of others, then one's own purpose will be fulfilled naturally.

What is being emphasised here is that one needs to ensure that the practice one does is really for the purpose of others. Otherwise, if it is done merely for one's own interest or short-term goal, it will not ultimately fulfil even one's own purpose. One needs to have a clear understanding to derive the main point here. We can see how skilful the advice is here in making the clear distinction between what is a great practice and what is a small practice. And of course, when there is a choice, we would naturally want to choose something which is of greater benefit.

We need to think about our own practice; we might be in the category of those who are choosing small practices instead of bigger ones. Practices that involve mere self-interest for this life's benefit, and practices where the sole intention is to benefit others, are mutually exclusive, and cannot be practised at the same time. If these two practices were presented to you, which one would you choose? As they cannot be practised together, which one would you choose? If one has a bodhisattva motivation one needs to choose the practice which is for the purpose of others. This is also in the motivation for tantric practices.

1.3.3. Training in the morality that accomplishes the welfare of sentient beings

This subdivision has three subcategories:

1.3.3.1. Diligence in the welfare of others

1.3.3.2. The action of gathering others without incurring a fault

1.3.3.3. Protecting sentient beings' minds and training in the action of not incurring fault

1.3.3.1. DILIGENCE IN THE WELFARE OF OTHERS

The two first lines of the next verse relate to this heading.

The verse reads:

84ab. Having understood this, they abide always Striving for the welfare of others.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary presents the meaning by beginning with a query:

Query: Bodhisattvas strive to always abide in working for others, on the basis of having understood what needs to be practised and what needs to be abandoned. But since they need to engage into a variety of actions to achieve the welfare of others, do they not receive faults?

This reflects a question raised previously in a Wednesday night teaching which asked whether bodhisattvas incur faults or not. This is exactly the same point.

The query is a reasonable doubt which comes when one witnesses a bodhisattva engage in various different kinds of actions. The question raised a few weeks ago by Vanessa was about the example of when a bodhisattva had to kill someone in order to save the other four hundred and ninety-nine people.

An answer is presented in the next two lines of the verse:

84cd. Those with compassion have the long view and allow them the forbidden

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Answer: The compassionate buddhas also see directly the phenomena hidden very far in the future. Out of this knowledge they permit the seven non-virtuous actions of body and speech, which they prohibited for hearers and self-liberators who work primarily for their own purpose, for bodhisattvas when necessary. As a result, bodhisattvas do not only not incur a fault, but for them it becomes a great accumulation when they engage in these actions.

Within the ten non-virtues, the first seven, i.e. the three of the physical and four of the speech, were completely forbidden for hearers and solitary realisers. Under no circumstances were practitioners of the Lower Vehicle permitted to do these actions. However, bodhisattvas are permitted to do these actions when it is deemed necessary for the benefit of other sentient beings. What will be presented next is a story where, if it were necessary to benefit a greater number of sentient beings, even engaging in an action of killing does not incur negativity, but in fact becomes a means to accumulate large amounts of merit.

As an example the commentary quotes from the Sutra of Being Proficient in the Great Secret, which reads:

From the Sutra of Being Proficient in the Great Secret it is taught that because the captain killed the evildoer, his time in cyclic existence was reduced by many eons. It is also like it was taught to the Brahmin's son Karma'i Jungwa.

This refers to the bodhisattvas who were permitted the seven of body and speech by those with great compassion, who see far ahead.

This story is from ancient times when merchants had to travel on ships for long distances. The earlier part of the story tells that a ship was carrying 500 traders and merchants with an evil person amongst them, referred to here as an evildoer who had the intention of taking the lives of the rest of the merchants as a way to gain the profits for himself. The captain of the ship, who happened to be a practising bodhisattva, understood the evildoer's intention. So out of great compassion, as a way to protect the evildoer, and out of great compassion for the rest of the merchants whose lives would be taken, the captain of the boat took upon himself the action of taking the life of the evildoer. This protected the evildoer himself from committing a negative act, which would result in him being reborn in the hell realms, as well as saving the lives of the rest of the merchants. It was said that instead of creating negative karma, the Captain's act became a means for him to accumulate a great amount of merit, to lessen his time in samsara by many aeons. The benefit was to protect the four hundred and ninety-nine merchants from imminent death and protect the evildoer person from incurring negative karma.

One should note that while this is one example of where the seven non-virtues forbidden for practitioners of the Lesser Vehicle whose main practice is for self-liberation are permitted for practitioners of the Great Vehicle, who only have the intention to benefit other sentient beings. So whatever activity they engage in is solely for the benefit of other sentient beings; even acts such as killing—otherwise a great misdeed—are permitted and become a means to accumulate great virtue. However, bodhisattvas with the ability to engage in such negativity only with the intention to benefit other beings with understanding and clairvoyance, would only be high-level bodhisattvas, not lower-level bodhisattvas.

Another example is an account of the Brahmin's son Karma'i Jungwa. In this story the Brahmin's son had adopted the practice of abstaining completely from sexual intercourse. For 12 years he had practised chastity, but there was a young maiden whose life was endangered because of a condition which could be cured only by sexual intercourse. Apparently, with this condition if sexual intercourse was not done the lady would have died. So out of great compassion for this young maiden, he broke his vow of chastity to save her life.

So the example of misdeeds such as killing, forbidden for practitioners of lower vehicles, becomes a means for accumulating great merit when done with the sole intention to benefit other sentient beings. For a lower-vehicle practitioner, sexual activity would be a misdeed, but when engaged in by a bodhisattva with the intention to protect someone from imminent death, it becomes a means to accumulate great merit. These are particular examples from accounts in the past and there are likely other accounts of stealing and lying etc. done solely for the benefit of others, out of compassion.

These accounts are presented in answer to the query as examples of acts actually becoming a means for them to accumulate great amounts of merit, rather than incur negativity.

Gyalsab Je's commentary highlights that:

This refers to the bodhisattvas who were permitted the seven of body and speech by those with great compassion, who see far ahead.

It explains that permission to act on the seven of body and speech are only to bodhisattvas who are practising great compassion and who have farsightedness.

One needs to understand committing these acts in the proper context. Non-virtues are permitted to bodhisattvas with the ability to practice extensive benefit for other sentient beings, but beginner bodhisattvas who do not yet have the ability to engage in such extensive benefits for others would not be permitted to do them.

1.3.3.2. THE ACTION OF GATHERING OTHERS WITHOUT INCURRING A FAULT

This is divided into two subcategories.

1.3.3.2.1. Gathering with the mundane

1.3.3.2.2. Gathering with the Dharma

1.3.3.2.1. Gathering with the mundane

This in turn is subdivided into three:

1.3.3.2.1.1. The difference between offering food and not offering food

1.3.3.2.1.2. Do not harm the body for small actions

1.3.3.2.1.3. Explaining the time and necessity for offering the body

1.3.3.2.1.1. The difference between offering food and not offering food

The verse reads:

*85. Share with those fallen into the wrong direction,
With the protectorless and those abiding within austerities.
Eat only in a measured fashion and Offer everything apart from the three robes.*

In response, Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

Whilst using food, share with those fallen into the wrong direction, i.e. animals and hungry ghosts, with the protectorless sick, and with those that practice pure action and abide in austerities, if they are there as well.

As it is said, It is appropriate for oneself to measure everything, oneself should eat just enough according to the correct portion, without incurring faults in relation to food, and with the motivation for eating that is explained in the Letter to a Friend.

An ordained bodhisattva should offer everything apart from the three robes or nam-jar, la-go and tang-go. If one has more of the three robes then one should also offer these, but if one has only one set, then one should not offer one's robes. It becomes an obstacle to the practice of pure action.

The literal translation of the distinction between when to offer food and not to offer might relate more to sharing food with those falling into the wrong directions i.e. animals and hungry ghosts etc. In the normal practice of eating, a fully ordained monk separates some of their food, offers it to the objects of refuge, then a portion to the hungry ghost, and a portion to the animals, and dedicates it. In this way one actually divides the food to be consumed with the intention to offer it to others as well.

Having presented how to divide one's food with others such as animals and those who abide in austerities, in relation to oneself, the text quotes Precious Garland:

It is appropriate for oneself to measure everything,

The right measure of what one can consume should be likened to prescription medicine: if one takes too much, then rather than curing one's disease it could actually aggravate it and create harm. But if one does not take enough of the medicine, it will not help to cure the disease. Likewise, when consuming food, if one eats too much one can make one's body feel heavy and bring about a feeling of slothfulness and the onset of sleep, thus not being productive for one's practice. Whereas if one eats too little, and the body is not well nourished, it can become weak and one will not be able to engage in it properly.

Gyalsab Je's commentary further explains that:

...oneself should eat just enough according to the correct portion without incurring faults in relation to food,

Without incurring faults means ensuring that one does not incur misdeeds in relation to food, e.g. eating food just for the sake of vanity, of beautifying oneself (e.g. I might look beautiful if I eat this kind of food), or just for the sake of filling oneself up for the pleasure of feeling full with food etc. In accordance with the explanation from the Letter to a Friend, one should avoid such motivations when eating and consuming food, and eat the correct portion: not too much, not too little and for the purpose of sustaining one's body to practise the Dharma.

Gyaltshab Je's commentary provides more explanation in relation to knowing the distinction between what is to be given and what is not to be given:

An ordained bodhisattva should offer everything apart from the three robes or nam-jar, da-go and tang-go. [which are particular robes for the fully ordained] If one has more of the three robes then one should also offer these, but if one has only one set, [that means if one has like two or three sets then one could offer the extra set to others] however if one has only one set then one should not offer one's robes. It becomes an obstacle to the practice of pure action.

It becomes an obstacle to practice pure action or pure conduct would be in relation to e.g. an ordained monk who has these robes intact. If one gave away everything there would be a fault from a fully ordained monk's perspective, as they should not be separated from one particular robe, even for a day, as being separated from it incurs a fault. But in terms of maintaining oneself e.g. if one is too cold etc. then it would harm one's practice as one would not be able to continue to practise. So it is important to know the distinction between what to give and what portion, how much to give and when not to give. Of course, how to offer the food was also explained clearly in the Letter to the King or Precious Garland as well by Nagarjuna. So it would be good for you to familiarise yourselves with this explanation, and read other commentaries as well. It is not too obscure and hard to understand, but to get a better understanding it is good to refer to other commentaries as well.

As presented earlier, there were particular ways of offering the food, and the intention held when offering it. These you can also revise. You also need to be mindful of ensuring that you are free from misdeeds in relation to consuming food, because if one is not mindful, the very process of consuming and acquiring food to sustain oneself, one may incur misdeeds. One needs to be mindful of that as well.

We can see how the advice presented here is very practical. In terms of consuming food, how to consume it when sharing with others. When consuming by oneself: how to consume it; knowing the right portion; not having too much or too little as it can harm oneself. This advice is given like a parent would give their child; very detailed advice on how to conduct oneself properly. Here, this advice is given to us by Shantideva.

In summary, the presentation is about how to engage in normal daily activities such as eating and drinking, and use them to serve as a means to accumulate virtue, and not become a cause for non-virtue, and incurring misdeeds. This is the value of the advice that we need to take in.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་ལྷན་པ་ལ་འཇམ་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

9 September 2014

As usual, we can spend some time in meditation.

(pause for meditation)

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I will strive to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

1.3.3.2.1. Gathering with the mundane (cont.)

1.3.3.2.1.2. Do not harm the body for small actions

The verse relating to this heading is:

86. *Do not harm for insignificant actions
This body that practises the supreme Dharma.
If one acts in this way, the wishes of sentient beings
Will be accomplished swiftly.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

One's body, which is the basis for practice of the holy Dharma that accomplishes extensive benefit for self and others, if it is guarded well, should not be harmed for a small benefit of others. Rather it should be guarded like a wound.

If one does this, then by way of completing the three higher trainings on the basis of the precious human rebirth, one will be able to quickly accomplish the wish of sentient beings.

From the Four Hundred Stanzas,

Although one of course views the body as enemy
One still protects it.
If one lives for a long time with discipline
Great merit will arise from it.

In this context, the precious human body, which is the basis for the practice of the holy Dharma that accomplishes extensive benefit for self and others, refers to a bodhisattva's body with all those conditions intact. However we can also relate this to the good conditions that we have now, such as having access to the Dharma teachings and so forth.

Here we are being advised that guarding the body means that we should not harm this precious human body, which accomplishes the ultimate wish of sentient beings, for the sake of small gains or benefits for others. The commentary uses the analogy of guarding a wound to illustrate how the body should be protected; just as one would guard a wound from further damage and harm, likewise we need to protect and guard our body at all times. This analogy was presented in earlier teachings and I also explained the meaning at that time.

As the commentary explains, if one protects one's body well, then because of having all the right conditions for one's practice by way of completing the three higher trainings on the basis of this precious human rebirth, one will be able to quickly accomplish the wishes of sentient beings. When one fulfils one's ultimate goal of the practice of the three higher trainings, which is to achieve enlightenment, then one will naturally be able to fulfil the wish of other sentient beings as well.

In the first two lines of the Four Hundred Stanzas verse, Although one of course views the body as enemy, One still protects it, one refers to the one who sees reality, such as the noble bodhisattvas who understand ultimate truth. They see this contaminated body, which is the basis for external and internal harms and so much suffering, as an enemy. Even so, one still needs to protect this body.

The next two lines of the quote from the Four Hundred Stanzas, If one lives for a long time with discipline Great merit will arise from it, indicate that if one lives for a long time by protecting one's body with the discipline of observing morality, then one will accumulate great merit. Here, great merit refers to both the accumulation of wisdom as well as the accumulation of merit.

If I recall correctly, this verse is presented as a response to this doubt: if the body is to be seen as an enemy, then why would one want to protect it? You can also check the commentary on the explanation of this verse.

While the earlier explanations are quite clear it is good for us to reflect on their meaning and try to implement it in our practice.

1.3.3.2.1.3. Explaining the time and necessity for offering the body

When practising generosity with one's body one needs to know the appropriate time and necessity or purpose. This explanation follows the earlier indication that one shouldn't harm one's body, such as giving one's arms or legs to others, for a very minor purpose. Now the text explains the right time and purpose for offering one's body.

87. *Do not offer this body with Impure thoughts of compassion.
Offer it in any way to accomplish
Great purpose here and yonder.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Although from the very beginning bodhisattvas have offered everything including their body, to sentient beings from the depth of their mind.

However, if one feels despondent with the prospect of being asked for the flesh of one's body and the like, and generates feelings of regret afterwards and so forth, then until the pure mind of compassion that cherishes others more than oneself has been developed, one should not give this body.

Although from the very beginning refers to the time when a trainee first becomes a bodhisattva by entering the path of accumulation. Although bodhisattvas on the preliminary stages of the path of accumulation and preparation have developed the courageous mind of offering everything for the sake of sentient beings, which would include their body and so forth, they are nevertheless still on the preliminary stages of the practices. Because there is a probability that bodhisattvas at the initial levels of practice could feel despondent at the prospect of having others ask for their flesh or body parts and so forth, the practice of offering one's body parts is not advised. Furthermore, it is possible that one will later feel regret, rather than rejoice in giving one's body.

Until the pure mind of compassion which cherishes others more than oneself has been fully developed refers to the development of ultimate bodhicitta, which is within the mental continuum of those who have reached the first of the ten grounds and above. Thus, what is being explained here is that until bodhicitta has been fully developed one should not give this body.

The text backs this up with reference to the Compendium of Trainings.

This is extensively explained in the Compendium of Trainings, where the untimely offering of one's body is described as an action of mara.

As explained here, giving one's body before one has fully developed bodhicitta is considered an action influenced by mara or demons, which indicates that it is not a completely pure practice.

Next the commentary explains the appropriate time, which is:

One should offer it when one is really free from the obstacles to generosity, such as miserliness and so forth, and the offering becomes a faultless completion of great accumulation, and most certainly when it becomes a cause to achieve a great purpose in this life and beyond.

Thus, the appropriate time to offer this body is when the bodhisattva develops ultimate bodhicitta from the first ground onwards, when they are completely free from the obstacles to generosity and so forth. The necessity or purpose of offering one's body is when it becomes a cause to achieve a great purpose in this and future lives.

This encompasses the two main points of the appropriate time, and the necessity or purpose.

1.3.3.2.2. Gathering with the Dharma

The previous section referred to gathering others as disciples and so forth, through being generous with material aid and so forth. Now comes the explanation on gathering others through offering the Dharma.

This section is subdivided into three:

1.3.3.2.2.1. The physical behaviour of an audience that one should not teach

1.3.3.2.2.2. Analysing the distinction of the motivation of a vessel

1.3.3.2.2.3. Do not lead those with the wish for the great to the small

1.3.3.2.2.1. The physical behaviour of an audience that one should not teach

The physical behaviour of an audience that one should not teach refers to the inappropriate physical gestures of those who are not suitable to receive the Dharma teachings.

So as the verse reflects here:

88. *Do not teach the Dharma to the disrespectful.
Not to those who, while healthy, wear
headbands,
Umbrellas, sticks, carry weapons,
Or cover their heads.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

One should not explain the Dharma to those that do not have respect for the Dharma and the teacher, or to those whose behaviour is unsuitable, such as wearing headbands when not sick, carrying umbrellas, sticks, weapons or covering their heads with cloth and so forth.

The first part of the commentary is that one should not explain the Dharma to those who don't show respect for the Dharma and the teacher. This refers to not respecting the qualities of the Dharma. Because the Dharma has such highly esteemed qualities, it would be inappropriate to present the profound and sacred Dharma to someone who does not respect it. Those who do not have respect for the Dharma are by default not suitable vessels to receive the Dharma. Furthermore, teaching the Dharma to those who do not respect the teacher or the Dharma would cause them to incur the negativity of disrespecting the Dharma. In this way, rather than bestowing benefit it becomes the cause for them to experience harm from the negative consequences. So, the first part of the explanation, one should not explain the Dharma to those that do not have respect for the Dharma and the teacher, refers to those whose minds are not pure enough to receive the Dharma.

The second part of the explanation refers to those whose physical behaviours are unsuitable. They might have a pure intention to receive the Dharma, respecting both the Dharma and the teacher, but it would be inappropriate to present the Dharma to them because of their inappropriate behaviour. The text lists some examples.

Unsuitable behaviours include wearing headbands when not sick. This implies that while it is permitted to wear a headband because one is not well, wearing a headband for no particular reason would be a sign of disrespect. Likewise, carrying umbrellas, or sticks, or weapons, or covering their heads with cloth and so forth are examples of disrespectful conduct when listening to a Dharma teaching.

For example, as monks we are not allowed to put our zen (upper robe) over our heads while listening to the teachings. During His Holiness' teachings, when there is no roof and it is quite hot and sunny, he gives the Sangha permission by saying, 'Put your zens on top of your head to protect yourself from the hot sun'. The usual practice however is not to cover the head, out of respect for the teachings.

1.3.3.2.2.2. Analysing the distinction of the motivation of a vessel

This refers to further checking the intention or motivation of those who are coming to listen to a teaching. The relevant verse is:

89. *To those holding the lesser to be great and profound,
To women without their spouse,
Hold equal respect for the lesser and supreme Dharma
And practise it all.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je explains:

One does not teach the profound and extensive Dharma to those who are not a vessel due to a lesser motivation and also not to women alone, without their spouse.

It is taught that if one discriminates between the superior Mahayana and the lesser Hinayana on the basis of being wholesome or bad, suitable or unsuitable, becoming the method for enlightenment or not and so forth, is abandoning the Dharma.

One should therefore have equal respect for all paths and practice them all.

This explanation mentions that one should not teach the profound and extensive Dharma to those who are not a suitable vessel, due to a lesser motivation. Another way of explaining this is that it would not be suitable to teach the profound and extensive Dharma to those who have the motivation of the Lesser Vehicle. Because of their intention or motivation they are not ready to hear the profound and extensive Dharma, so one should not teach it to them.

With respect to women alone without their spouse we need to understand the specific context of the advice, which applies to those who are presenting the Dharma. For example, it is said to be very dangerous for their vows for a fully ordained monk to teach a woman while they are alone; others might also form negative views about the propriety of that. Likewise, if the teacher is a nun then it would be inappropriate if they were to teach a man alone, without their spouse being present. We need to understand that while one gender is mentioned here it refers equally to the other gender. It is important to understand these points in their proper context.

Furthermore, as mentioned here, one will incur the fault of abandoning the Dharma if one discriminates between the superior Mahayana and the Lesser Vehicle, on the basis that one is wholesome and the other is not wholesome; that one is suitable and the other is not; that one has the method to become enlightened and the other does not. It is said that the karma of abandoning the Dharma is a heavy negative karma.

Therefore, as Gyaltsab Je emphasises, one should have equal respect for all paths and practise them all. So Gyaltsab Rinpoche is definitely sharing some really profound advice with us.

1.3.3.2.3. Do not lead those with the wish for the great to the small

This heading indicates that it would be totally inappropriate to suggest to those who have a genuine, keen interest in practising the Great Mahayana Vehicle, would be better practising the Lesser Vehicle.

The verse that relates this is:

90. *Do not bring those that are a vessel
For the extensive Dharma to the lesser Dharma.
Do not cause them to give up the training,
Do not mislead with sutra and mantra.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Do not lead someone with Mahayana lineage that is a suitable vessel for the extensive Dharma to a lesser Dharma, such as the hearer's path. It is taught that this becomes a downfall.

One should not lead someone with a Mahayana lineage, meaning someone who has the actual capacity of mind to practise the Mahayana, and who is a suitable vessel, from the extensive Dharma to the lesser Dharma, such as the hearer's path. As such that would be a downfall.

The next part of the commentary reads:

Also do not cause someone that is a suitable vessel for the morality of restraint to give up their practice of morality while they are suitable vessels, through misleading them with sutra and mantra, saying that they will become pure merely by reading sutras and mantras.

In this way do not mislead others with sutra and mantra.

The point being emphasised here is that while someone may be a suitable vessel to study and practice morality, telling them that to become liberated it will be sufficient for them to purify their mind by merely reading sutras and mantras would be very misleading advice.

This reminds me of the comments made by someone I met from Singapore who was one of the co-founders of an institute in the Kagyu tradition. He commented to me that while the advice to recite, for example, 100,000 Vajrasattva mantras, or do 100,000 prostrations without any further explanation and saying that it will lead one to reach enlightenment, may have some significant purpose, he was not really sure about the actual benefit. I felt that his comments on how doing extensive practices without the basis of a proper understanding could be misleading were valid.

The emphasis here is that misleading suitable vessels who are capable of understanding the teachings by saying that they will become pure just by reading sutras and reciting mantras, is inappropriate. If they are not suitable vessels and lack the capacity and intelligence to understand the teachings and fully grasp their meaning, then it would be skilful to present practices for them to do at their level. However, if trainees who have the intelligence and capacity and are thus suitable vessels were to be given tasks of merely reciting mantras or reading sutras, then that would be misleading them.

Those who have that approach may be presenting it in that way because they don't have much knowledge of the teachings themselves, and cannot present them thoroughly. Saying, 'You don't need to study much; you don't need to understand much. That's OK, just do these mantras and recite these practices and everything will be fine' would be the act of misleading others.

1.3.3.3. PROTECTING SENTIENT BEING'S MINDS BY TRAINING IN THE ACTION OF NOT INCURRING FAULTS

This is definitely a very important point for bodhisattvas. Because they are such noble beings, engaging in inappropriate actions could cause others to generate a negative mind, and if they were to cause others to be critical of the bodhisattva, then that would be a cause for them to create really heavy negative karma. Therefore bodhisattvas have a great responsibility to engage in appropriate conduct and behaviour to protect the minds of other beings from the faults of criticism and so forth. This is an important point for us also to keep in mind.

This heading has two sections

1.3.3.3.1. Extensive explanation

1.3.3.3.2. Summary

1.3.3.3.1. Extensive explanation

The extensive explanation is subdivided into three:

1.3.3.3.1.1. Abandoning faulty behaviour that causes others to lose faith

1.3.3.3.1.2. How to act when showing the path

1.3.3.3.1.3. How to do the action of sleeping

1.3.3.3.1.1. Abandoning faulty behaviour that causes others to lose faith

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section of the text with these words:

Ordained bodhisattvas must apply restraint, which is explained in the general basket of teachings on morality, unless there is an exemption that permits them otherwise. As it will cause a loss of faith in the minds of others, even lay bodhisattvas must apply this restraint.

As mentioned here, there are certain forms of conduct that are specifically prescribed for the ordained. There are some circumstances where there are exemptions, but otherwise ordained bodhisattvas have to abide by all of those vows, because not doing so can cause others to lose faith. For the same reason, even lay bodhisattvas have to abide by certain forms of conduct. This was also explained in Precious Garland, which we have previously studied.

Then comes the verse relating to this:

91. *If one leaves behind tooth woods and spittle
Then they should be covered.
To urinate and the like, on water and ground
Used by all is inferior.*

92ab. *Do not eat with a full mouth noisily,
Or with an open mouth*

Then the commentary continues:

If one leaves behind the wood used to clean the teeth and leaves one's spittle on the ground, then these should be covered up with earth and the like. One should also not pollute commonly used water or land with faeces, urine, and mucus as this is frowned upon by the gods and others.

Traditionally in India they use wood from a nim tree as a substitute for toothbrushes. They chew on a piece of the wood to make it like a bristle, which they use to clean their teeth. Having cleaned the teeth in such a way, the advice is that one should not just throw the piece of wood down on the ground for it to be seen by others; likewise one should not just spit onto the ground. Both should be covered up. This of course doesn't really apply in Australia where there is a good tradition of putting the garbage into the garbage can, and you don't see people spitting on the street at all. This is an excellent system.

In general however, one needs to be careful not to cause others to feel disgust, or a bit uncomfortable, when they see behaviour such as spitting out food after one has eaten it. That would be considered as very disgusting. At the moment someone sees that, and thinks it is disgusting, then they become critical of the person who has done that. So if a bodhisattva were to engage in such behaviour, it would cause disgust in others, and if, out of that disgust, they are critical of the bodhisattva, then that will be the cause to create the negative karma of being critical of bodhisattvas. Therefore the advice is that the bodhisattva always needs to engage in conduct and behaviour that protects the minds of others.

Likewise, one should also not pollute commonly used water or land with faeces, urine and mucus as this is frowned upon by the gods and others. This is not only a cause of disgust, but is also a cause of harm for others.

Furthermore:

Do not eat with a full mouth, making noises like chag-chag and so forth while eating, or eat with an open mouth.

Again, these explanations are for monks with vows. When eating one should not eat with one's mouth open, or make sounds such as indicated here, or have too much food in one's mouth, or eat noisily, or with an open mouth. This sort of behaviour will disgust others and is inappropriate.

The next six lines of verse are:

92cd. *Do not sit with the legs stretched out,
Do not rub your hands together.*

93. *When riding or sitting on a mattress or place,
Do not be together with another woman.
Abandon anything that causes worldly beings to lose faith,
That observed and that to enquire about.*

The explanation in the commentary is quite clear.

While sitting on a bed or the like, do not sit with both legs stretched out on the ground. One does not rub both hands together at the same time, but there is no fault if one rubs them sequentially.

One does not ride together with someone else's women on a horse and so forth, or sit together with them on the same seat or place. Lay bodhisattvas also should not sit together with another woman who is not a relative.

In short, one should abandon any inappropriate behaviour that causes the worldly to lose faith, either by observing directly what is done or not done, or through informing oneself by enquiring what is appropriate and inappropriate according to that place and time.

In some cultures and traditions it is considered disrespectful to point your feet out towards others. It is also seemingly disrespectful to rub your hands in front of others, although there is no fault if one rubs them sequentially.

One does not ride together with someone else's women on a horse and so forth, or sit together with them on the same seat or place. Lay bodhisattvas also should not sit together with another woman who is not a relative. These are quite clear instructions.

In summary, as explained by Gyaltsab Je, one should abandon inappropriate behaviour that causes worldly beings to lose faith. One does this either by observing directly what is done or not done, or through informing oneself by enquiring what is appropriate and inappropriate according to that place and time. This means that if you are in a place where you don't know the traditions, and you don't know what is appropriate and what is inappropriate, you should ask about the proper ways to act.

This reminds me that prior to coming to Australia Pam, one of the teachers who taught English to the young monks at Kopan, gave me some instructions on things such as how to use cutlery and so forth. She said that in the West if you are invited to a place, there are different types of cutlery for different parts of the meal. Indeed, whenever we go to a new place, it is appropriate to know the traditions and customs of that place so that we act appropriately.

1.3.3.3.1.2. How to act while showing the path

This refers to acting in the appropriate way when you are showing the path to others. This is very pertinent and practical advice for our daily lives. The relevant verses read:

94. *Do not point with a finger,
But respectfully, with your Full right hand,
Show the way.*
95. *Do not move your hand excessively
But only just enough, with some words.
Snap your fingers and so forth,
Otherwise it becomes unrestrained.*

The explanation in Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

When indicating the way for somebody, do not do so with individual fingers from the left hand because this is regarded as insulting. One respectfully points in the right direction with the full right hand outstretched.

One does not wave unnecessarily with one's hand, as this would become excitement and be unconscientious. Instead wave with your hand a little bit, say something and snap your fingers. Otherwise, if one is too loud, then it becomes unrestrained.

This explanation is also quite relevant to our tradition here, where raising your fingers inappropriately is a very bad, even dangerous thing!

When pointing out the path to others in India, it is considered rude and disrespectful to the other when you point with one finger, or just a few fingers. The proper way is to stretch out your full palm and show the way with your right hand. That is the gesture to adopt.

The next part of the explanation is that one does not wave unnecessarily with one's hand, as this would become excitement and be unconscientious. Instead wave your hand slightly. If one has to call someone, instead of shouting out loud or waving one's hand wildly, one should slightly snap one's finger, which will gain their attention. Otherwise one is too loud and becomes unrestrained.

1.3.3.3.1.3. How to do the action of sleeping

This explanation is precisely in accordance with the presentation in the Lam Rim teachings, but we can leave this for the next session. When done in a proper way sleeping is referred to as the yoga of sleeping, so even the act of sleeping can become a practice.

*Transcript prepared by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

16 September 2014

As usual we can spend some time in the regular meditation practice.

[Meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching, and put it into practice well.

1.3.3.3. PROTECTING SENTIENT BEING'S MINDS BY TRAINING IN THE ACTION OF NOT INCURRING FAULTS

1.3.3.3.1. Extensive explanation (cont.)

1.3.3.3.1.3. How to engage in the action of sleeping

The verse relating to this heading is:

96. *Sleep like the Protector, when he passed
Into parinirvana, in the desired direction.
Make sure from the start, with introspection
about
The thought of getting up quickly.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je gives this explanation of the meaning of the verse:

For sleeping, assume the position of the protector when he passed into parinirvana. Lie down on your right side, with your head in the desired direction, putting your left leg on your right leg, and your head into your right hand, and then sleep well covered with the cho-go.

At the time of sleep put your mind onto a virtuous object with mindfulness and introspection and adopt the recognition of brightness. Adopt from the start the mind that thinks, 'I shall rise quickly', and sleep with the thought, 'Tomorrow I shall practise the Dharma with the newly regenerated body'."

As the commentary explains, when we sleep our body should be in a position that is similar to that of protector, Lord Buddha Shakyamuni, in the aspect of passing into nirvana.

Depending on the direction that you wish to face (such as holy images on your altar), you lie down on your right side with your head in that direction and placed on top of your right hand. This lying position is also referred to as the sleeping lion position. The Lam Rim teachings give detailed explanations on the significance of adopting this sleeping posture, which emulates the fearlessness of a sleeping lion.

The commentary continues with the description, putting your left leg on your right leg, which is quite clear. Then, having positioned oneself in this manner, one sleeps covered with the cho-go, which is the upper yellow robe of the Sangha.

The main significance of placing oneself in this position, which is the position the Buddha adopted when he showed the aspect of passing into nirvana, is to remember death and impermanence. Of course, in actuality the Buddha is immortal, however he showed the aspect of passing into nirvana for the purpose of teaching death and impermanence to his disciples. So sleeping in this position is a reminder for us of death and impermanence. That is what we need to understand here. As Praise to Buddha Shakyamuni by Way of the Twelve Deeds, states:

To exhort the lazy to be quicker,
At the pure site of Kushinagar
You destroyed your deathless, vajra-like body
Entering nirvana—Homage to this deed.

This shows that entering this aspect of passing into nirvana was a way to exhort his disciples to enter into the Dharma. That is why the Buddha's sleeping position is described in this text.

When the commentary states At the time of sleep put your mind onto a virtuous object with mindfulness and introspection, it is advising us to recall the practice we have done during the day, as a way of not forgetting the virtuous object.

Next the commentary states that before going to sleep one makes that determination, 'I shall rise quickly'. Due to that determination one will be able to wake up at whatever time one has set. Indeed, when we develop the strong determination to wake up at a certain time in the morning, then we really don't require any alarm and will naturally wake up at that time. Following that determination to wake up early, one sets the motivation for the next day: 'After I wake up I will continue to engage in the practice of Dharma as a way to benefit sentient beings'. So in this way, prior to going to sleep one sets one's motivation for the next day.

If one goes to sleep with a virtuous mind and love and compassion in one's heart, and determines to wake up with an attitude of love and compassion, then it is most likely that one will wake up in that state of mind. Waking in a virtuous frame of mind would really be a wonderful way to start the next day. So sleeping, in itself, can be a virtuous activity. That is why, among the fifty-two mental factors, sleep is specifically included in the category of the changeable mental factors. If one has a virtuous mind prior to going to sleep then the whole period of sleep will be virtuous. Whereas if one has a negative mind prior going to sleep then that period will be a non-virtuous or negative state, and if the mind is neutral then sleep will be in a neutral state. Thus it is possible to turn sleep into a virtuous deed.

This is very practical advice. By remembering love and compassion before going to bed, if one sleeps for six hours for example, then during those six hours one will have gained the benefit of leaving the imprint of love and compassion on one's mind. It is quite unlikely that we will find the time during the day to spend six hours meditating just on love and compassion, so if we go to sleep with love and compassion on our mind, then that will ensure that our sleep becomes a really virtuous deed.

We can see how this advice ensures that even normal activities become a means to accumulate merit and virtue, and further develop our mind of love and compassion. As Shantideva advised earlier in the text, with the proper motivation we can turn normal activities such as eating and drinking into virtuous deeds. We can see that this advice is very pertinent for our practice in daily life. Other teachings give further explanations on the different states of sleep.

As indicated in the commentary, prior to going to sleep one should develop the intention: Tomorrow I shall practise the Dharma with a newly regenerated body. This indicates that one engages in the act of sleeping as a way to rejuvenate the body. When one goes to sleep with that intention it ensures that the sleep itself will be free from attachment. As indicated earlier, one of the offering prayers with the practice of eating is, 'I consume this food not merely for myself, but in order to sustain my body for the practice of Dharma'. Here sleep is being presented in the same way—with the proper motivation it actually becomes an aid to the practice of Dharma.

Thus we can see how, as indicated in the teachings, whatever actions the bodhisattva engages in are only a means to accumulate virtue. From the preliminary motivation, every aspect of normal activity is turned into the practice of Dharma as a means to accumulate virtue. This can inspire us to try to follow this example with our own motivations and intentions in daily life.

1.3.3.3.2. Summary

The verse relating to this is:

97. *Out of the immeasurable actions
Of bodhisattvas, that are taught,
Until you can definitely practise them,
Take up the trainings of the mind.*

Here Shantideva sums up the practices that have been presented under the heading, Protecting Sentient Being's Minds by Training in the Action of Not Incurring Faults.

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

If one is not able to practise all the immeasurable divisions of the bodhisattva actions of generosity and so forth that are taught in the sutras and their commentaries, then one should first only engage in the practices of training one's mind that were explained earlier, until one is definitely able to carry out all the infinite bodhisattva actions.

As explained here, the practices of generosity and the rest of the perfections as well as the practices of the four means of gathering disciples have immeasurable divisions, meaning that there are incredibly extensive ways of engaging in these practices. Thus they have immeasurable divisions, and these immeasurable divisions are extensively explained in the sutras and the commentaries.

The Tibetan word jong can either refer to training in virtue or purification. As I have explained previously, when the word jong is used in context of virtue then it means to train one's mind to increase virtue. When it is used in the context of negativity then it means training one's mind to purify negativities by applying the antidotes so as not to experience the negative results of negativity. In this context it refers to training one's mind to generate bodhicitta. The earlier chapters presented very detailed and particular advice on how to train one's mind to generate bodhicitta. Therefore as the commentary explains, one should first only engage in the practices of training one's mind, until one is definitely able to carry out all the infinite bodhisattva's actions. Once one has trained one's mind well and generated bodhicitta, and that has been developed thoroughly and firmly, then one will be able to carry out all the extensive bodhisattva practices prescribed in the teachings.

Again, this is very pertinent advice about how to first train one's mind to generate bodhicitta, and then gradually engage in the practices. If one were to attempt to engage in all the extensive practices explained in the teachings, before having established a thorough basis, then one would not be able to follow any particular practice through. This is very relevant to our state of mind now as well.

So this summarising verse is very significant. If the teachings explain the many different aspects of the practices and so forth, they may not seem personally relevant if they are not subsumed into succinct practical advice that one can apply now. The most practical approach is to distil it down to something that is manageable for beginners so that they can use it as a basis to further develop their mind, and then later be able to engage in further practices.

1.4. The method for perfecting the trainings

The actual training of how to actually perfect the practices that were described earlier has two subdivisions:

1.4.1. The extended explanation

1.4.2. Concluding summary

1.4.1. The extended explanation

This is subdivided into four

1.4.1.1. The methods for purifying the training

1.4.1.2. The basis for training

1.4.1.3. The purpose of the trainings

1.4.1.4. The basis for engaging into listening and contemplating

1.4.1.1. THE METHODS FOR PURIFYING THE TRAINING

If one were to transgress some of the commitments, then this section provides advice on the method for purifying these downfalls.

In explaining the meaning of the verse Gyalsab Je raises this doubt:

Query: What should one do if one incurs faults despite practising the trainings?

To explain the meaning of the verse, he first says:

If one has received a root downfall, then, as it is explained in the Compendium of Trainings,

Recall the bodhisattva Akasgarbha in front and engage in purification.

If one receives the small or medium contaminations, the forty-six faults and other faults explained in the Compendium of Trainings then,

98. *Recite the Sutra of the Three Heaps,
Three times in the morning and in the evening.
Pacify the remainders of downfalls
In dependence on conquerors and bodhisattvas.*

So this verse is explaining how to purify the faults of the small and medium contaminations in one's training.

Those of you who recite the Six Session Yoga will recall after listing the eighteen root downfalls of the bodhisattva vows, there is a list of the four conditions that are necessary to incur a breach of those vows. What are they?

Student: Not regarding these as detrimental; not forsaking the wish to repeat such behaviour; delighting and taking pleasure in them; having no shame or consideration.

What are the two that do not need any of these conditions in order to breach that commitment?

Student: Giving up bodhicitta and holding distorted views

So, if all four conditions are intact then any breach of the vows will be a great contamination. Here, the small or medium contaminations refers to breaches of the vows that do not have all four conditions intact. Thus if one receives the small or medium contamination refers to breaching any of the bodhisattva vows, but without all four conditions intact. If one has the mind of not regarding the transgression as detrimental, then, regardless of whether some of the other conditions are intact or not, it becomes a medium contamination, which is, in fact, quite a severe contamination. A small contamination is when either of the other three conditions are present, except for not regarding them as detrimental.

As I have mentioned previously the forty-six faults refers to breaches or downfalls of the bodhisattva vows. If there are either small or medium contaminations of those forty-six faults, or other faults as explained in the Compendium of Trainings, then one needs to engage in the purification as presented in the verse.

Gyaltsab Je presents the meaning of the verse:

...then one should confess three times in the day and three times at night, accumulate merits and recite the method to increase virtue and prevent it from being exhausted, i.e. the Sutra of the Three Heaps.

By taking refuge and in dependence on bodhicitta one pacifies the remaining downfalls with the four powers.

As the commentary explains, the way to purify these faults is by confessing them three times in the day and three times at night, and also engage in the means to accumulate merit. So this practice encompasses both confession and the means of accumulating merit. The way to increase virtue and prevent it from being exhausted is by engaging in the practice such as The Sutra of the Three Heaps, which is basically the Thirty-Five Buddhas' Confession Prayer.

As explained previously, the three heaps encompasses the heap of negativities, the heap of dedication and heap of rejoicing. By engaging in these practices one purifies both small and medium contaminations. This means that if one has not breached a commitment to the degree that it is a root downfall, then one can purify it through this practice. So this is a practice to purify minor breaches of the vows.

If one has actually broken the vows and incurred a root downfall, then one will have to apply the method of actually taking the vows again. Here, the text explains that by taking refuge and in dependence on bodhicitta, one pacifies the remaining downfalls with the four powers.

The first power, the power of reliance, is explicitly indicated here with taking refuge and generating bodhicitta. Then one applies the remaining three powers of the practice. This is the supreme method for purifying negativities. The four opponent powers were mentioned in detail in chapter two, so you can refer back to that. The main point presented here is that one needs to rely on these methods to purify the faults one has incurred through the breaches of one's commitments

1.4.1.2. BASIS FOR TRAINING

Here there are two verses, the first of which is:

99. *Whether from the point of view of self or other.
Whatever you do, on whatever occasion,
As taught, make it with effort
An occasion for the trainings.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Regardless of whether it is for the purpose of self or others, whatever action of body, speech and mind one engages in, and during whatever occasion, the Conqueror taught all of these as opportunities for practice.

One should always make an effort not to receive a fault of the trainings while using these different occasions for one's practice.

As the commentary explains, the Buddha taught that whatever the occasion may be, regardless of whether it is to accomplish one's own purpose or the purpose of others, and whatever actions one engages in through one's three doors of body, speech and mind, they are to be treated as an opportunity for practice. Using these different occasions for practice is really the basis of all the trainings one engages in.

In stating one should always make effort to not to incur a fault of the trainings, the commentary is saying that in order to make the training pure, one should ensure that one does not incur any faults when engaging in that training. Thus one should always make an effort not to incur any fault while engaging in the trainings. More specifically, the time when one engages in practice is the time when one needs to ensure that one does not incur a fault.

The second verse in relation to this heading reads:

100. *There is nothing the children of
The conquerors do not practise.
For those proficient who abide in this manner
There is nothing that does not become meritorious.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

There is no object of knowledge the bodhisattva children of the conquerors do not use for practice. For those that are proficient in training in all objects, there is no action that does not become meritorious. Therefore, one should never allow the generation of faithlessness.

As explained here, there is no object of knowledge the bodhisattva children of the conquerors do not use for practice, which is a point that was emphasised earlier. For the purpose of benefiting others, bodhisattvas may engage in various forms of practice, or acquire skills such as the five major sciences of arts and crafts, medicine, grammar, logic, and philosophy as a means to benefit other sentient beings. To some, these may appear as mundane practices, making it very easy to be critical of a bodhisattva who is engaged in these. As you will recall, Nagarjuna presented all of these five sciences, emphasising that they are needed for the purpose of helping others. The point being raised here is that for those that are proficient in training in all objects, there is no action that does not become meritorious. Therefore, one should never allow the generation of faithlessness, which causes one to lose faith in a bodhisattva.

Gyaltsab Je is emphasising the need to protect one's mind from losing faith in a bodhisattva's deeds, in the belief that they are engaging in some sort of mundane activity. We need to take this as a personal instruction. As it is hard for us to know who is actually a bodhisattva it is possible that we might generate a critical mind if we see someone engaging in some mundane activity, and thus incur the heavy negativity of criticising a bodhisattva. The author of the commentary, Gyaltsab Je, emphasises this point in many of his other teachings. We need to be very careful about being critical of others, particularly of those who are engaging in various activities to benefit other beings.

1.4.1.3. THE PURPOSE OF THE TRAININGS

Here there are two sub-headings

1.4.1.3.1. Dedicating the virtue for the welfare of all sentient beings

1.4.1.3.2. Never give up the Mahayana spiritual friend and the training

1.4.1.3.1. Dedicating the virtue for the welfare of all sentient beings

The verse relating to this reads:

101. *Regardless of whether it is directly or indirectly
Do nothing but work for the purpose of sentient beings.
Solely for the purpose of sentient beings
I dedicate all to enlightenment.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Whether it is directly or indirectly for the welfare of sentient beings, always act for their welfare, and in no other way. Dedicate all virtues towards enlightenment, solely for the purpose of sentient beings.

As explained in the commentary, whether engaged directly or indirectly, bodhisattvas are always engaged in acts of benefiting other sentient beings. Whatever activities they engage in are for the benefit of other sentient beings, and they do not engage in any activity other than that. That summarises the activities of bodhisattvas—they are always for the benefit of other sentient beings. They then dedicate the virtues of those deeds towards enlightenment, solely for the purpose of sentient beings.

The very beginning of generating the altruistic mind of bodhicitta itself is for the benefit of sentient beings; the middle of engaging in the practices such as the six perfections is for the benefit of sentient beings; and then the ultimate goal of achieving enlightenment is also for the benefit of sentient beings. Therefore whatever activities bodhisattvas engage in are dedicated towards achieving ultimate enlightenment for the purpose of benefiting sentient beings.

Reflecting upon the bodhisattvas' deeds as being solely for the benefit of sentient beings—at the beginning, in the middle and at the end, the very achievement of enlightenment—inspires us to practise similarly. Setting the right motivation at the very beginning of the practice, engaging in the practice itself, and dedicating it at the end, making sure that it is intact, is a fruitful and purposeful practice. It is good to recall the example of the bodhisattvas' deeds to ensure that our actions are meaningful and purposeful.

1.4.1.3.2. Never give up the Mahayana spiritual friend and the training

The first section encompasses the qualities of a virtuous spiritual friend. The verse relating to this is:

102. *The constant virtuous friend is one who
Is proficient in the meaning of the Mahayana,
And never gives up even at the cost of their life,
The supreme bodhisattva disciplines.*

Here the Bodhisattvacharyavatara is presenting the qualities of the Mahayana guru or spiritual friend.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

The constant Mahayana virtuous friend is one who is an expert in all of the great Mahayana teachings as well as those who abide in the Mahayana vows, and the supreme Mahayana austerities and do not give them up even at the cost of their life.

The main point is that the qualities of the Mahayana virtuous friend are that they are skilled in all of the Mahayana treatises, as well as abiding in the Mahayana vows, the supreme Mahayana austerities, and do not give them up at the cost of their life. Such are the qualities of the Mahayana spiritual friend, presented here in brief.

1.4.1.4. THE BASIS FOR ENGAGING IN LISTENING AND CONTEMPLATING

There are two subdivisions:

1.4.1.4.1. Training in dependence on sutras

1.4.1.4.2. Training in dependence on the commentaries

1.4.1.4.1. Training in dependence on sutras

Here there are two lines of verse

103ab. *Emulate the biography of Shrisambava
In the training of relying on the guru.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

From the life story of Shrisambava in the Array of Stalks Sutra,

The way of relying on the teacher: Child of good family, the bodhisattvas who are perfectly guided by virtuous friends will not fall into the lower realms.

One should train according to how it is explained extensively in this sutra.

This explains that the sutras confirm that bodhisattvas who are perfectly guided by virtuous friends will not fall into the lower realms.

This indicates that those who rely on a virtuous friend without breaking their commitments will not fall into the lower realms. So the advice here is one should train as explained extensively in the sutras.

Of course, there are more extensive explanations on the ten different ways of relying on a spiritual friend in the Lam Rim teachings.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

23 September 2014

As usual we can spend some time in our meditation practice. [meditation]

You can generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching, and put it into practise well.

1.4.1.4. THE BASIS FOR ENGAGING IN LISTENING AND CONTEMPLATING

Having presented the qualities of a Mahayana spiritual friend, the text then presents the basis on which to engage in perfecting the trainings in two subdivisions:

1.4.1.4.1. Training in dependence on sutras

1.4.1.4.2. Training in dependence on the commentaries

1.4.1.4.1. Training in dependence on sutras

This section is covered two verses:

103. *Emulate the biography of Shrisambava
In the training of relying on the guru
Understanding this and other advice by the buddhas,
Through reading the sutras.*

104. *The sutras generate understanding of the trainings
Therefore read the sutras.
First, read the
Sutra of the Essence of Space.*

We covered the meaning of the first two lines last week. In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of the remaining six lines thus:

Furthermore, the points of advice from this treatise and other advice taught by the Buddha should be understood by reading the Mahayana sutras.

One should read the sutras because in them the trainings are explained extensively. Specifically, those that have generated the engaging vows should read first of all the Sutra of the Superior Essence of Space.

When the commentary states the points of advice from this treatise, it is referring to the biography of Shrisambava, which gives advice on how to rely on a spiritual friend. We covered that last week. Relying on other advices taught by the Buddha, refers to the advice given in the sutras on the bodhisattva trainings, which should be understood by reading the Mahayana sutras. So one needs to read and familiarise oneself with the Mahayana sutras in order to understand the advice on how to train in the bodhisattva practices.

The commentary then explains, one should read the sutras because in them the trainings are explained extensively. This is also very clear so I don't think it needs any further clarification.

As further explained, specifically, those that have generated the engaging vows should read first of all the Sutra of the Superior Essence of Space, which has extensive explanations of the bodhisattva vows. This sutra identifies the eighteen root downfalls of the bodhisattva vows, and how transgressions of those vows are incurred. It also explains very extensively how to purify each of those transgressions. As indicated in the commentary, one should refer to these explanations from the very beginning so as to avoid transgressing these vows, and also to learn how to purify any transgressions of those vows if they were to incur.

Those of us who have taken the bodhisattva vows need to take this as personal advice. It is not sufficient to take the vows and then just sit back and relax. Rather, one needs to endeavour to really understand the eighteen root downfalls, and how to purify them if one were to transgress them. It is very important that we really familiarise ourselves with the bodhisattva vows and the advice on how to avoid any transgressions. While you may not have access to a translation of the Sutra of the Superior Essence of Space, you do have access to the many texts and commentaries that explain the bodhisattva vows, what the transgressions are and so forth. So it is important to become familiar with them. Also, as presented earlier, if the transgression is a small or medium contamination, then one purifies it by reciting the Thirty-five Buddhas Confession Prayer with the four powers intact.

1.4.1.4.2. Training in dependence on the commentaries

There are two verses relating to this heading, the first of which reads:

105. *Since that which one practises continuously
Is shown even more extensively
In the Compendium of Trainings, one must
Read it repeatedly as well.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Those that train and practise should also study repeatedly the Compendium of Trainings, where it explains extensively in thirty-two aspects how to give, protect, purify and increase one's body, possessions, and roots of virtue.

When the commentary explains those that train and practice should also study repeatedly the Compendium of Trainings it is referring to another text by Shantideva, in which he explains very extensively the ways and means of engaging in the bodhisattva trainings. His Holiness the Dalai Lama has presented teachings on the Compendium of Trainings on a number of occasions. If you have access to any translations of it in English, it would be good to read them.

The Compendium of Trainings has an extensive explanation of the thirty-two aspects of how to give, protect, purify and increase one's body, possessions and roots of virtue.

One engages in the practice of giving one's body at the appropriate time, and as well as engaging in mental training on giving one's body for the benefit of others. One also has to engage in the practice of protecting it, as we need our body for achieving higher purposes. Thus we need to understand the proper contexts for both giving and protecting one's body. We need to purify our body to ensure our generosity is not soiled with negativities, or by any physical defects that would hinder our practice. Then we need to increase our virtue, by accumulating the appropriate causes to continuously obtain a body that is endowed with the eight ripened qualities in future lifetimes.

Just as there are the four practices of giving, protecting, purifying and increasing with respect to one's body, the same practices are applied to giving one's possessions.

The practice of being generous with one's virtue refers, for example, to dedicating one's virtue to the welfare of others. Protecting virtue refers to protecting whatever virtue one has accumulated from being destroyed by anger. Purifying means ensuring that the virtue is not soiled or stained with self-interest for the sake of this life, or even a future life. If one were to accumulate virtue just for the mere intention of protecting oneself from the lower realms, then that would be accumulating virtue out of self-interest. Rejoicing in one's virtues is the way to increase one's virtue.

With reference to the thirty-two aspects of giving, protecting, purifying, and increasing, there are four aspects of giving the body, four aspects of giving possessions and four aspects of giving virtue, making up twelve aspects of the perfection of generosity. We can also apply these four aspects to the remaining perfections of morality, patience, joyous effort and so forth. That makes twenty aspects, making thirty-two aspects in all.

The four aspects of giving are specifically explained in Liberation in the Palm of your Hand, and you can relate that to all the perfections. As you have easy access to the English translation it would be good for you to take the initiative to read it for yourselves. Next time I might quiz you on whether you've checked it out or not.

This also applies to any explanations in texts that have been translated in English; you need to take the initiative to actually refer to those texts and read their presentation. That is how you will benefit from my reference to them. If I mention a text and you think "OK, it must have been mentioned there" and just leave it at that, then you will not derive the benefit of understanding the topic in greater detail.

As a personal instruction, it is good to try to recall these four aspects of giving, protecting, purifying and increasing whenever we engage in any practice. For example, whenever we accumulate virtue or purify negative karma, it is good to relate that practice to these four aspects.

The next verse in this section of the text reads:

*106. Or, read at least the Compendium of Sutras
Which summarises, and
Put also effort into reading the second one
Composed by Nagarjuna.*

As Gyalsab Je explains in his commentary:

If one is not able to do this, then one should read at least the Compendium of Sutras, composed by the master himself, and the second one composed by Nagarjuna, which summarise the sutras.

If one is not able to do this, refers to not being able to relate to the extensive explanations presented in the Compendium of Trainings. That being the case, one should at least read the Compendium of Sutras, which is also composed by the master himself, indicating Shantideva. And the second one composed by Nagarjuna, refers to another commentary of same name, Compendium of Sutras, which was composed by Nagarjuna, in which the meaning of the sutras is summarised.

Basically the advice is to refer to these texts on the bodhisattva vows: the Compendium of Trainings, or if that is too extensive, the Compendium of Sutras, or the text with the same name that was composed by Nagarjuna.

1.4.2. Concluding summary

The verse relating to this reads:

*107. That which has not been prohibited
Should be practised.
To protect the minds of worldly beings,
Practise correctly upon seeing the trainings.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

One should abandon that which has been prohibited in the sutras and commentaries and one should practise that which has not been prohibited. The purpose is to protect the minds of the worldly beings and prevent the generation of faithlessness. To this end one should, upon recognising the trainings of a bodhisattva, practise them and train in them.

This is a very clear presentation of the distinction between what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded. Put succinctly, one should abandon that which is prohibited or forbidden in the sutras and commentaries.

If one is uncertain as to what one should abandon, then refer to the sutras and the commentaries that explain what is forbidden, and which therefore should be abandoned. If the text states 'This act is forbidden', then the practice is to avoid engaging in that forbidden action. The teachings also present the practices that one should engage in, or adopt. This is how, by relying on the sutras and the commentaries, one makes the distinction between what is to be abandoned, and what is to be adopted.

Yet all too often we seem to adopt what has been forbidden in the sutras, and abandon what has not been forbidden! Out of confusion we ordinary beings actually adopt the opposite of what the sutras and commentaries advise. Here we are being advised to change our approach, and to gain a clear understanding of what is to be abandoned and what is to be adopted.

Furthermore, as explained here in the commentary, the purpose of engaging in this practice is to protect the minds of the worldly beings as a way to prevent the generation of faithlessness in ordinary or worldly beings, which means to protect their mind from losing faith in the Dharma.

2. CONCLUDING SUMMARY SHOWING THAT ONE HAS TO PRACTISE THE MEANING AND NOT JUST THE WORDS

This is subdivided into two:

- 2.1. Guard always with mindfulness and introspection
- 2.2. The actual meaning

2.1. Guard always with mindfulness and introspection

The relevant verse reads:

*108. Investigate repeatedly during
Actions of body and mind.*

*Merely this, in brief,
Is the definition of introspection.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Investigate repeatedly, while engaging in the actions of body, speech and mind, with the wisdom that can distinguish between having transgressed the training or not and neutral actions, and whether or not one has fallen under the control of the afflictions.

This alone is in brief the definition of not degenerating introspection.

This is very pertinent advice, which, of course, I also emphasise regularly in my teachings. Its relevance for our daily life and practice cannot be underestimated. As presented here very clearly, we need to investigate our actions of body, speech and mind repeatedly at the time of those actions. In other words, we need to maintain constant mindfulness throughout all our actions.

Check whether any physical action is virtuous, non-virtuous or neutral, and whether it is in line with the trainings or not. Likewise, check whether your speech is virtuous, non-virtuous or neutral and whether one is transgressing the trainings. Do the same with the mind. We need to conduct a constant dialogue with our mind, always being vigilant of our actions of body, speech and mind.

This, in brief, is the definition of not degenerating introspection, which means maintaining our introspection, and not allowing it to degenerate. This act of investigating our body, speech and mind throughout all activities is called introspection, and we should not allow it to degenerate.

In summary, the main point being presented here is that we need to be constantly vigilant about our state of mind in all our actions and activities. As presented earlier, one way to check whether one's physical, verbal or mental actions are virtuous or not is by acquainting oneself with the explanations in the teachings. If we are engaging in something that is forbidden then it is a non-virtuous action; if we are engaging in something that is not forbidden, or something that is encouraged, then that is a virtuous action; if actions are not specified in the teachings as needing to be adopted or to be discarded, then they are considered to be neutral.

2.2. The actual meaning

The relevant verse is:

109. *They all have to be practised with the body.
What is accomplished by only talking about it?
Is the sick person cured
Merely by studying medicine?*

The first part of the explanation in the commentary reads:

Having understood these points and the need for them to be practised, one needs to put them into practise accordingly with this body. Without practice, merely by reciting many lists, what purpose will one achieve? None whatsoever! For example, is a person cured merely by studying the instructions on the medicine? No, they are not.

As explained in the commentary, they all have to be practised with the body, means that these points actually have to be put into practice. It is not enough to merely know about them—one should actually engage in practising them.

As further explained in the commentary, if one merely recites many lists or quotes from many texts and so forth, but without practising what they advise, then what purpose will one achieve? This is a rhetorical question, and the answer 'none whatsoever' indicates that there is no purpose at all.

In response to the lines from the root verse, What is accomplished by only talking about it? Is the sick person cured merely by studying medicine? the commentary explains that when a patient is prescribed a medication, they have to actually take the medication in order to be cured. It is not sufficient for them to merely read the instructions on how to take the medicine—that won't help to cure them.

Gyaltsab Rinpoche goes on to say:

In brief, although there are the three types of morality, it is important to initially train in the morality of restraint, either by actually adopting the rules of individual liberation or those which are in common with them ...

As presented here, there are the three types of morality, and it is important to initially train in the morality of restraint, which means not committing misdeeds. One practises the morality of restraint by adopting the rules of individual liberation, or those which are in common with those vows. As I have indicated many times in previous teachings, morality serves as the basis of all other practices. Without sound morality, one will not be able to accomplish any other more advanced practices. So the self-liberation vows are the very foundation on which to take and observe the bodhisattva vows, as well as the tantric vows. Refraining from the ten non-virtuous deeds is common to all three sets of vows. As I have indicated previously, protecting oneself from the seven misdeeds of body and speech is the basis for refraining from many other misdeeds. In other words, when you apply the practice of refraining from the seven non-virtuous deeds of body and speech, you will naturally refrain from many other misdeeds. Thus the morality of restraint serves as the basis for other practices.

Next the commentary presents the reason why it is essential to practise the morality of restraint:

...for if one protects them, then the others will also be protected, if one does not protect them then the others will also not be protected. If the morality of restraint degenerates, then all vows degenerate, as explained in the Compendium.

This directly relates to our own practice, and so it is a personal instruction.

As Gyaltsab Je further mentions:

If one thinks that the vows of individual liberation belong to the hearers and practises the trainings of bodhisattvas apart from them, then that is a great fault. One should train in the morality of restraint that abandons the natural non-virtues and is the basis for the morality of accumulating virtue and benefiting sentient beings. One should rely repeatedly on restraint to the opposing conditions of morality, and practise it in conjunction with the six perfections.

This is all quite clear. The morality of restraint should be practised in conjunction with the six perfections.

Moreover, each of the perfections can be practised in conjunction with the rest of the six perfections. Thus there is the generosity of generosity, the generosity of ethics, the generosity which is practised in conjunction with patience, joyous effort and so forth. Of course I have presented this many, many times previously but I'm not sure if you have retained it. I'm not implying that you don't have the understanding, rather I say this as a way to refresh your memory, to remind you that you do have the knowledge of these topics presented in earlier teachings.

Summarising Verse

Gyalsab Je ends his commentary on this particular chapter with this summarising verse, in which he very succinctly mentions the essence of this whole practice.

The person taking the essence
Of practising the sequence of the path of the three kinds of beings,
Depends on protecting mindfulness and
introspection.
Hence they should always endeavour to be proficient
in these.

As mentioned very clearly, taking the essence of practising the sequence of the path of the three kinds of beings—which are the practices in conjunction with the small scope; practices in conjunction with the medium scope and the great scope—depends upon protecting mindfulness and introspection at all times. Therefore one should endeavour to completely understand, be proficient, and have full knowledge of introspection and mindfulness.

II THE NAME OF THE CHAPTER

The final outline that concludes the chapter is a presentation of the name of the chapter. The root text reads:

This is the fifth chapter of Introduction to the Action of Bodhisattvas called Protecting Introspection.

Gyalsab Je's commentary concludes:

This is the commentary on the fifth chapter called Protecting Introspection from the commentary on the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

That concludes the fifth chapter.

To explain the context of the next chapter we need to return to the subdivisions introduced in chapter 1.¹

2. The actual explanation of the stages of the path

2.2. The method for taking the essence

2.2.2. Explaining the individual meanings²

2.2.2.2. THE WAY OF TRAINING IN THE PRACTICES OF GENERATING THE TWO MINDS

2.2.2.2.2. The Way of Training in the Actions, the Perfections

2.2.2.2.2.1. The way of meditating on conscientiousness, the limb preventing the degeneration of the training in the mind of enlightenment³

2.2.2.2.2.2. Explaining the way of training in morality, by relating it to introspection and mindfulness, the methods for keeping virtuous dharmas pure⁴

2.2.2.2.2.3. Explaining the way of training in the remaining four perfections:

This is subdivided into four:

2.2.2.2.2.3.1. The way of training in patience

2.2.2.2.2.3.2. The way of training in enthusiasm

2.2.2.2.2.3.3. The way of training in the common and uncommon mental stabilisations that are contained in calm abiding

2.2.2.2.2.3.4. Training in the nature of superior insight—wisdom

CHAPTER 6: THE WAY OF TRAINING IN PATIENCE⁵

There are two parts to the chapter.

I. Explaining the text of the chapter

II. The name of the chapter

I. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

There are two main subdivisions of the explanation:

1. Meditating on patience earnestly by eliminating the obstacles to establishment and abiding

2. Applying to the mind the methods to establish patience

1. Meditating on patience earnestly by eliminating the obstacles to establishment and abiding

This has two subdivisions:

1.1. The faults of anger

1.2. The benefits of patience

1.1. The faults of anger

This is subdivided into three:

1.1.1. The unobservable faults

1.1.2. The observable faults

1.1.3. A summary of the faults

1.1.1. The unobservable faults

Here there are two subdivisions:

1.1.1.1. Anger destroys one's roots of virtue

1.1.1.2. Discerning the faults of anger and the benefits of patience and making an effort to meditate on patience.

1.1.1.1. ANGER DESTROYS ONE'S ROOTS OF VIRTUE.

In our next sessions we can go through the first verse under this heading.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright

Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

¹ See the teaching of 26 March 2013.

² Introduced in the teaching of 2 July 2013.

³ Covered in chapter 4, introduced on 25 February 2014.

⁴ Covered in chapter 5, introduced on 20 May 2014.

⁵ The numbering recommences with the new chapter.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེད་མཁའ་མཁའ་ལྷན་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

30 September 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

The sixth chapter, which we are about to start, explains the antidote to anger, beginning with:

1.1. The faults of anger

1.1.1. The unobservable faults

1.1.1.1. ANGER DESTROYS ONE'S ROOTS OF VIRTUE

Generally, understanding the relevance of practising patience is said to be developed when one contemplates the disadvantages of anger. So the more we contemplate the disadvantages of anger, the more we will see the need to practise patience. I have presented the definition of anger previously, so I need not go into it again as you can refer to that earlier explanation.¹ It may also be presented later in the chapter.

Anger destroys the roots of virtue is to be understood as explaining that basically, anger obstructs that which brings about a pleasant result, which is virtue.

The first verse of the chapter reads:

1. *All the wholesome actions
Of generosity and offerings to the tathagatas,
Built up over a thousand eons,
Are destroyed by anger.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads as follows:

Since anger is the ultimate obstacle to the generation and abiding of virtuous dharmas in one's continuum, one should initially meditate on the faults of anger, and then consequently strive to abandon anger.

One instance of anger at a bodhisattva destroys from the root all the virtues arising from generosity accumulated over one hundred and one thousand eons, as well as all the wholesome actions of having made offerings to the Three Jewels such as the tathagatas, wholesome actions of meditating and morality.

As presented here, anger is the ultimate obstacle to the generation and abiding of virtuous dharmas in one's continuum. This is a significant point. The ultimate obstacle for the initial generation of virtue is anger, which means that when anger arises it obstructs the ability to actually generate virtue. Moreover, if one has already accumulated some virtue, then anger will prevent that virtue from abiding and remaining in our mental continuum. So anger is really the main obstacle to both accumulating and retaining virtue. We need to regard these significant points as a personal instruction.

Indeed, no-one is happy when they are angry. The more anger someone has in their mind, the less peace they will experience. So the more we reflect on the disadvantages of anger, the more likely it is that we will be able to prevent anger from taking root in our mind. In the event that we do become angry, then reflecting on the disadvantages of anger will help to reduce the intensity of that anger. So the advice presented here is really great personal advice for us.

The commentary then explains that one should initially meditate on the faults of anger, and strive to abandon anger. This means contemplating again and again the faults of anger. From our own experience we know that from the moment anger arises in our mind we feel unhappy and unsettled. We really need to reflect on these experiences and understand how anger actually affects us.

As further explained in the commentary, one instance of anger at a bodhisattva destroys all virtues. It is explained in other teachings that this relates mainly to an intense form of anger. Thus, even an instant of such intense anger will destroy all the virtues arising from generosity accumulated over one hundred and one thousand eons, as well as the wholesome actions of having made offerings to the Three Jewels, such as tathagatas. This means that whatever virtues one has accumulated from wholesome actions of offerings to the Three Jewels, or from taking refuge in the Three Jewels and so forth, as well as the wholesome actions of meditating and practising morality, is destroyed in a moment of intense anger. Thus the virtues that arise from these three main actions of positive deeds such as making offerings, meditating and morality, will be destroyed in an instant of intense anger. When the commentary refers to destroying virtue from its root, it is to be understood that this does not mean that anger completely destroys the actual root of virtue itself. Rather, it significantly postpones the pleasant results of virtue, which will be experienced much later in the future. This is explained in other teachings.

Then Gyaltsab Je goes on to say:

Not only this, but in a quote used by the Sarvastivadin², and which is cited in the Compendium of Trainings, it says that if a fully ordained monk humiliates a companion in the pure trainings, then he has destroyed the merit equalling the merit of being reborn as a thousandfold wheel-turning king for as many times as the particles one covers, down to the golden wheel, with one's body when prostrating. This merit is accumulated when one makes a prostration to a stupa that contains the hair or nails of the Buddha.

As explained in the commentary, the merits that one accumulates from prostrations is to be reborn as a thousandfold wheel-turning king for as many times as the particles one covers, down to the golden wheel, with one's body when prostrating. This is a description of the depth and breadth, from the surface down, of the particles that are covered when one prostrates. As explained in the treatises, the golden wheel marks the end of the earth. Of course, that is something that cannot be seen or proven scientifically.

But then again, have there not been cases in recent times showing that not being seen, even with scientific means, doesn't necessarily mean that there is nothing there? We can take the recent example of the disappearance of the Malaysian Airlines plane. Despite all the searching by so many countries they were not able to find the plane or debris anywhere. But not being able to find it doesn't mean that it doesn't exist. Despite all the modern instruments it has not yet been found, so it seems that scientists are not able to find everything that exists.

¹ See, for example the teaching of 27 February 2007.

² Those That Assert That All Exists—a school of Buddhism.

In any case, the main point here is that the merit one obtains from doing prostrations is that one will create the cause to be reborn as a thousandfold wheel-turning king—a universal monarch—as many times as the particles that one's body covers when prostrating. However this merit can be destroyed when one humiliates, criticises or becomes angry with a companion in the pure training. A companion in pure training doesn't necessarily have to be a bodhisattva, so becoming angry with pure practitioners can also destroy one's accumulated virtues.

What we can derive here as a personal instruction is that even though we put an effort into accumulating virtues with practices such as prostrations and meditating, that merit can be destroyed in a moment of anger. There are those who have commented that while they can adopt a seemingly calm and composed mind during meditation, the moment they go out into the world again they soon become upset and angry once more. That is the point being addressed here: we need to be very mindful and careful to ensure that we don't destroy the merit from our positive deeds by becoming angry.

At this point we can also recall the great benefits of dedication. As explained in the teachings, if, after we have accumulated a certain amount of virtue, we immediately dedicate it to the ultimate goal of enlightenment, then that will protect one's virtues from being destroyed by anger. The analogy that is presented to illustrate this is that when a drop of water falls into an ocean it merges with that ocean, and we cannot say that it has evaporated until the whole ocean has evaporated. Similarly, when one dedicates one's virtues to the ultimate goal of enlightenment for the benefit of other sentient beings, then that merit will not be exhausted. It is also explained that one can partake of the benefits of that virtue. The more we experience the positive virtues, the more we will continue to experience their positive benefits. I have explained this in detail previously. So dedicating one's virtues is also another means of protection.

Also, as presented previously, one of the most powerful antidotes for anger is, of course, meditating on emptiness. The realisation of emptiness is the ultimate antidote that protects one from anger.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

It is taught that the anger that destroys the virtue of one hundred or one thousand eons has to be directed at a bodhisattva, which is also taught in the Introduction to the Middle Way. The statement in the beginning of the chapter on the four resting places in the Great Commentary on the Vinaya, says that anger destroys one's vows, clearly refers to the fact that strong anger destroys one's roots of virtue.

This is quite clear. The commentary then states:

Further, since it is also stated in the Blaze of Reasoning that wrong views and harmful intent destroy one's roots of virtue, one should strive, among other things, to contain one's anger.

Blaze of Reasoning, composed by Bhavaviveka, states that it is not only anger that destroys one's root of virtue, but wrong views can do the same. Holding onto wrong views can also destroy one's roots of virtue. This is explained very clearly in that treatise.

The main point here is that one should strive to contain or control one's anger for these reasons. Of course more detailed explanations about the faults of anger and benefits of patience and so forth can be found in the Lam Rim teachings. So you can also refer to those explanations.

1.1.1.2. DISCERNING THE FAULTS OF ANGER AND THE BENEFITS OF PATIENCE, MAKE AN EFFORT TO MEDITATE ON PATIENCE

As presented here, the supreme means to overcome anger is to discern the faults of anger and contemplate the benefits of patience.

The sequence of this presentation is really very practical because without seeing its faults there will be no initiative to overcome anger. Furthermore, if one does not see the benefit of practising patience, then there will be no impetus to develop patience. So discerning the faults of anger and meditating on patience are crucial.

The verse relating to this outline is:

2. *There is no negativity like hatred,
There is no austerity like patience,
Therefore meditate on patience
In earnest in various ways!*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

There is no negativity like anger for obstructing the generation of the path and destroying virtue, and there is no austerity like patience for destroying the painful heat of the afflictions. Therefore meditate on patience in earnest in a variety of ways and methods!

This presentation is similar to that in the Lam Rim. In saying, There is no negativity like anger for obstructing the generation of the path and destroying virtue, the commentary is indicating that anger has two fundamental disadvantages.

The first is that it will hinder the ripening of the positive consequences of virtue. We all want to experience the positive consequences of the virtue that we have accumulated, and anger prevents the actualisation of those positive consequence.

The second is that the moment anger arises, it generates the causes to experience negative ripened consequences, such as being reborn in the hell realm, or one of the other unfortunate realms. Just as we want to experience happiness, we don't want to experience any kind of negative consequences. However, the moment anger arises it establishes the causes for unwanted experiences.

When we contemplate these two disadvantages then we can begin to get a sense of the gravity of the consequences of anger. Of course, there are many different kinds of negativities, but there is no greater negativity than hatred or anger.

Further, as explained in the commentary, there is no austerity like patience for destroying the painful heat of the afflictions. Here the misery of the afflictions is likened to the physical pain of experiencing extreme heat. This analogy illustrates the extent of the mental misery and anguish that one experiences from the afflictions.

This misery is overcome by the practice of patience, and as the commentary states, there is no austerity like patience. This is a very significant point. As you will recall, patience is classified into the patience of willingly enduring difficulties and hardships, and the patience of not retaliating when harm is inflicted by others. Hardships can arise from external problems and difficulties, and more particularly from one's practices. So willingly enduring and accepting hardships and harm is indeed a great practice of austerity.

Therefore, as the commentary states, meditate on patience as a prelude to all the different methods of applying patience that will be presented later on in this chapter using logical reasons and so forth. So having contemplated these points one must strive to meditate in earnest to practise patience. Earnest in a variety of ways and methods includes the different classifications of patience mentioned earlier, as well as the various techniques and reasons and so forth.

1.1.2. The observable faults

Having considered the unobservable faults of anger, we now turn to the observable faults of anger. These are faults which we can immediately relate to, as we can see them in our life right now.

Observable faults are subdivided into two:

1.1.2.1. Anger takes away the opportunity for physical and mental wellbeing

1.1.2.2. It turns away friends and so forth

We have all experienced the effects of intense anger on our physical health and mental wellbeing, and we also know how anger turns away friends and so forth.

1.1.2.1. ANGER TAKES AWAY THE OPPORTUNITY FOR PHYSICAL AND MENTAL WELLBEING

Basically this heading is stating that anger robs us of opportunity for either physical or mental wellbeing. The verse relating to this outline reads:

3. *If one holds the painful mind of hatred
Then one's mind will not experience peace.
One will not attain joy or bliss,
Sleep will be elusive and there will be no stability.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Since it generates intense suffering, if one holds the pain-like mind of anger, one cannot experience the joy of having pacified mental suffering. One will also not attain mental joy or physical bliss, sleep will be elusive and the stability of a mind abiding in its natural state will be non-existent.

Pain-like mind of anger indicates that while anger does not produce actual physical suffering, the mental anguish generated by anger is equated to intense physical suffering. So, if one holds the pain-like mind of anger one cannot experience the joy of having pacified mental suffering. Because of the anguish of anger, one cannot experience the joy of having overcome mental suffering.

As indicated earlier, anger robs us of any sense of joy or happiness, meaning that we will not have the opportunity to have a mind that has pacified mental suffering. This means that when we experience mental anguish and suffering there is a lack of joy and happiness in our mind. As a consequence, one will also not attain mental joy or physical bliss. The point here is that because of the lack of mental happiness, one will not experience any physical wellbeing as well, and thus sleep and so forth will be elusive.

Furthermore, the stability of the mind abiding in its natural state will be non-existent.

1.1.2.2. IT TURNS AWAY FRIENDS AND SO FORTH

This heading refers to the fact that intense anger turns away friends and so forth, and is covered in the next one and a half verses.

4. *Even those who became dependent on
The offerings of wealth and honour
Will rise up and kill
The malevolent lord.*
- 5ab. *Friends will get disgusted,
Even those gathered with generosity will leave.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of these verses thus:

Even those that have become dependent on the extended offerings of wealth and honour will rise up and kill the malevolent lord. Anger will also exasperate friends and cause them to be disgusted. It will also disrupt the affection of those who were gathered with generosity. Therefore one should abandon anger.

The commentary explains that even those dependent on the extended offerings of wealth and honour will rise up and kill a lord who is infested with hatred or anger. Those who are dependent on a lord or master who provides them with all their basic needs will, in the event that the master or lord harbours ill-will and anger, rise up and kill him. The kindness of the lord towards his subjects in some cases could be similar to that of parents who meet all the needs of their children, who are completely dependent on their parents to feed and clothe them. Even though the subjects have similarly depended on and received benefits from their lord, it is possible that they will rise up and kill him if he treats them with a negative mind of anger.

Even these days we see so much destruction caused through anger, even between very close relations. There are those who kill their employer, and in the worst case, we even see children killing their own parents and parents taking the life of their own child, or a wife killing her husband, or a husband killing his wife and so forth. We can see so many destructive behaviours that are all initiated out of anger.

As explained in the commentary, anger will also exasperate friends and cause them to be disgusted. If a subject can kill their own lord or master out of anger, there is no need to mention that friends and so forth will be exasperated and disgusted by anger. This point is definitely relevant. We can see so many situations where it only takes a frown, or some unpleasant remark to separate good friends. We can become really disgusted with others out of anger. How often do we hear remarks such as, 'Oh, I will never go out with them again'? Inappropriate gestures expressed with anger, such as foul remarks, a frowning face and so forth can definitely destroy relationships.

The main point is that anger turns away friends, relatives or partners and so forth. We can definitely relate to this significant point, and we need to be really mindful of it. One can also understand that if anger disrupts relationships of all kinds, then the opposite of anger, which is patience, will bring one closer to others, and lead to more harmonious relationships. So this contrast between anger and patience needs to be understood.

Furthermore, anger will also disrupt the affection of those gathered with generosity. Some may have gathered friends or subjects and so forth through being generous. While on one hand being generous brings people closer to you, on the other hand anger will destroy that relationship.

Thus the conclusion is that having contemplated these obvious disadvantages and faults of anger one should abandon anger. The way to contemplate this point is to reflect upon how anger can lead to forgetting the kindness of others, and actually turn them against us. Anger can also create a distance between otherwise close friends or companions. This is how one needs to contemplate again and again the many great faults of anger.

1.1.3. A summary of the faults

The next four lines of verse summarise the faults of anger.

- 5cd. *In short, there is nobody
That abides in happiness through anger.*
- 6ab. *The enemy that is anger creates suffering
In the here and the thereafter.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

In short, due to anger there is no abiding in happiness. The enemy of anger is the supreme cause for the shortcomings explained earlier, such as suffering in the present and later.

As the commentary explains, due to anger there is no abiding in happiness, which relates to the very pertinent point that when anger is present in the mind there is no opportunity for the mind to abide in happiness and peace. So it is anger that causes the lack of a sense of joy and happiness in the mind. His Holiness the Dalai Lama also stresses this point and mentions it often in his teachings. He says that you can't find anyone who says that they are happy because they are angry! Anger gives no opportunity for any sense of joy or happiness in one's mind. That, in brief, is the main disadvantage of anger.

The commentary concludes, therefore, the enemy of anger is the supreme cause for the shortcomings explained earlier, such as suffering in the present and later, i.e. future lives.

1.2. The benefits of patience

I have, of course, presented this topic many times in the past. The relevant lines of verse read:

- 6cd. *Those who destroyed anger by focusing,
Will be happy here and thereafter.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Should a person, after having contemplated well the shortcomings of anger, focus their mind and destroy anger, then this will be the cause for their very happiness in this life and future lives.

As clearly explained in the commentary, when one has seen and fully acknowledged the faults of anger through contemplating and meditating, and taken the initiative to cultivate patience, then that act of destroying anger will be the cause for happiness to be experienced in this life right now, as well as in future lives.

This point was also explained by Lama Tsong Khapa. When the cause of the mental anguish that arises from anger has been removed, then what remains is happiness. What obstructs happiness is mental anguish and once that unhappiness has been removed, we find happiness. So, as Lama Tsong Khapa points out, when one takes the initiative to destroy anger, one will experience continuous happiness in this life. The happiness we experience now in this life will, as explained here, also be a cause for further happiness, as it will be a cause to obtain the high status of being reborn as a human or in the god realms, and ultimately to become a cause for definite goodness.

When one obtains such high status, it will be with perfect conditions, e.g. a human body with all the perfect conditions intact. That too causes happiness in future lives. Then the commentary continues:

Therefore one should strive in abandoning anger. If one does not abandon anger, then there are very great shortcomings, as explained in the Sutra of the Great Play of Manjushri.

On one hand one should contemplate the great advantages of abandoning anger, and on the other hand one should contemplate the great disadvantages of not abandoning anger. Even though it is not specified in the outline, what we can also understand here is that there can also be unobserved future benefits of practising patience, as well as the observable practical benefits we will experience in this life, where we will abide continuously in joy and happiness. So we can extract this further meaning from this section of the text.

2. BRINGING TO MIND THE METHOD TO ESTABLISH PATIENCE

This has two sub-divisions:

- 2.1. Eliminating the cause of anger
- 2.2. Meditating on the benefits of patience

2.1. Eliminating the cause of anger

Here there are four sub-headings:

- 2.1.1. The nature of the cause, including the shortcomings
- 2.1.2. Advice to strive in the method to oppose anger
- 2.1.3. The actual method to oppose anger
- 2.1.4. Striving in abandoning anger after having analysed the cause for anger in detail

We can conclude here for this evening.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

7 October 2014

As usual, we will spend some time in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings on these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

2.1. Eliminating the cause for anger

2.1.1. The nature of the cause, including the shortcomings

This is a presentation of the nature of the cause of anger, as well as its shortcomings. The relevant verse reads:

7. *Finding the nourishment of mental unhappiness,
Which arises from the undesired and
From obstructions to the desired,
Hatred grows stronger and destroys self.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary opens with a hypothetical query:

Query: How does anger generate suffering?

Answer: Mental unhappiness, which comes either from that which causes the undesired or obstructs that which is desired by the self and that which is close to the self, is the nourishment which increases anger. Having found the nourishment of mental unhappiness, the body of hatred grows stronger and destroys self in this life and future lives.

This is a presentation of how anger arises within us. On a personal level, this understanding is really very helpful as it enables us to detect what causes us to feel angry in the first place. Recognising this process can help us to prevent anger from spiralling out of control.

How does anger generate suffering? The commentary begins by explaining that mental unhappiness comes either from that which causes the undesired or obstructs that which is desired by the self and that which is close to the self, i.e. relatives and so forth. As presented here, mental unhappiness arises due to undesired events affecting either oneself or those close to one, or an obstruction to what one desires. It is that mental unhappiness that is the nourishment or fuel for anger.

When we relate this to ourselves, we can see how true it is that we become really unhappy when we get what we don't want to experience, or when there is an obstruction to what we do desire to experience for ourselves and our close ones. As soon as our mind becomes unhappy we are prone to becoming angry. That is because, as presented here, mental unhappiness serves as a fuel to anger. Unhappiness nourishes and sustains anger just like food nourishes and sustains the body as it develops and matures. Using this analogy the commentary says that, having found the nourishment of mental unhappiness, the body of hatred grows stronger, and thus destroys our happiness in this life and in future lives. These are really significant points about the underlying cause of anger.

We need to see the relationship between unhappiness and anger. We become unhappy when our desires are thwarted, or if we have to experience what we don't want. Then, because of that unhappiness, we focus on what we think has caused us pain and unhappiness, and anger arises. If it is an individual then our anger is directed at that person, and the more we think about how they have obstructed us, or caused us to experience something that we don't want, the more our anger increases. That is when we begin to regard the other person as an arch enemy.

We really need to understand how the process unfolds within our mind. We generate anger because we are unhappy. When we don't investigate thoroughly, we immediately blame the person who we consider has caused our unhappiness. However, if we investigate carefully, then we have to acknowledge that it is our own unhappiness that has caused the anger and which is creating so much mental agony and pain. When we use this sort of analysis we come to understand that it is that anger which is the real enemy, not the person.

Normally of course, we don't do that investigation, so we perceive external causes, such as a person or a particular situation, as the cause of our pain and unhappiness. When our mind is unhappy then, as presented here, that unhappiness fuels anger and nourishes it. As will be explained later, joy is the opposite of unhappiness, so being joyful will prevent unhappiness, which in turn prevents anger from arising. So, for example, if someone hits us with a stick, we start to feel unhappy as soon as we feel pain, and then, in a flash, we become angry with the person who inflicted that pain. But if we are not fazed by that one hit of a stick, and actually remain joyful, then there is no place for anger to arise.

The point made in the commentary is that as anger becomes stronger and stronger it destroys our happiness in this life and in future lives. Thus the exhortation, even though it is not mentioned specifically here, is that we must assiduously overcome anger.

When we consider the logic of the process by which we become angry we realise there is a state of mind between the event and the emotion of anger, which is our feeling of unhappiness. We are the owners of that unhappiness, so if we don't generate unhappiness then we will prevent the generation of anger. These are significant points that we really need to consider.

When we really embody this approach then we are practising the real meaning of patience. Many people comment on how amazing it is that His Holiness the Dalai Lama is so patient with the Communist Chinese. That is because His Holiness embodies this practice of patience so that what seems to be unimaginable becomes possible. If we really think about these significant points we will gain a very deep understanding. More details about this will be presented later on.

2.1.2. Advice to strive in the method to oppose anger

8. *Therefore I need to destroy the food
Of this enemy of mine,
An enemy who has no other function
Aside from harming me.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Therefore I should destroy mental unhappiness, the nourishment of this enemy of mine. There is nothing that harms me more than this enemy of anger, and I should strive in destroying this arch enemy of mine.

As has just been explained, our mental unhappiness serves as a fuel for anger, therefore I should destroy mental unhappiness which is nourishment of this enemy of mine, i.e. anger. Furthermore, because there is nothing that harms me more than this enemy of anger I should strive in destroying this enemy of mine. In other words, one needs to make an effort to overcome the real enemy that causes distress and agony. This is another significant point. When anger arises it not only harms others, but it also harms oneself. When one recognises that anger has no other function than to harm oneself, then one can recognise it as being the real enemy that needs to be overcome. Anger has no redeeming features. From our own experience we know that the moment anger arises we immediately feel unsettled and uncomfortable. Not only does it cause mental agony now, but anger also affects future lives as well.

The virtues of patience were presented earlier. The direct opposites of the virtues of patience are the faults of anger. Recognising that, we need to really embrace this on a personal level and do our best to overcome anger. Of course, our ultimate goal is to completely abandon anger. Meanwhile, we should, as much as possible, try to resort to these reasons and think about the disadvantages of anger when it does arise. This will help to lessen the intensity of our anger and prevent it from escalating. So we can definitely take measures now to prevent anger from taking root and increasing in intensity.

As personal practice, we need to put the most effort into protecting our own mind from anger, rather than finding excuses, like thinking, 'Oh well, they're angry so I have the right to get angry too'. If one uses that as a reason then there will be no end to one's anger. Even if one cannot stop the other person from becoming angry, one can at least make an attempt to control one's own mind and prevent anger from arising. To that extent it will benefit oneself, as well as defusing the conflict with the other.

Indeed, it is fuelling anger that causes more and more trouble in any situation. There are so many wars going on, and when we look at the situation we can see that those who are rising up are so fuelled up and angry, for whatever reason, that they will do anything to fight back. If, rather than trying to appease that anger and settle them down, one adds further causes for them to become upset, they will naturally rise up and fight with an even more intense anger. With these kinds of situations how can there really be world peace? We can never expect world peace when more fuel is added to already tense situations, with people who are already feeling unsettled.

In fact the patience practised by the stronger towards the weak is, as the teachings explain, the most supreme practice of patience. The Thirty-seven Practices of a Bodhisattva mentions that the practice of patience by the mighty against those who are weaker is a really supreme practice. As the mighty can very easily crush those who are less powerful, they have no need to practise patience. In contrast, the weaker have no choice at all. They often have to take whatever harm is inflicted on them because they don't dare to fight back with someone who is mightier. So practising patience in those circumstances is said to be not as great as the powerful being patient with the weaker. At a global level, a mightier nation should be able to tolerate those who are causing some disturbance and so forth. Then peace will be possible. However, I suppose that mighty nations would not find that reasonable.

When animosity or anger between two nations or groups of people is appeased, then there is room for negotiation and peace is possible, and when anger is not appeased, there is no possibility for negotiation and peace and so forth. That is really how it is. At a personal level it is exactly the same—when there is anger there is conflict.

In fact, when a really powerful enemy crushes you, you are so afraid that there is really no time to be angry. That was my response when the Chinese came into Tibet. Someone once asked me, 'When you had to flee, did you feel any anger towards the Chinese' and my response was, 'I didn't even have time to feel angry as I was so afraid. The only thing that came to my mind at that time was that my life was in danger, and so I had to flee'. When there are guns being fired, and heavy artillery being used, the constant fear leaves no time to feel angry.

The point is that when the stronger overpower the weaker, then the weaker ones have to accept that. We can see this also with parents and their children; if parents scold or spank a young child then, of course, the child cannot do anything in return as it is so small. So when the powerful practise patience, and do not inflict harm on the weaker ones, then that is indeed a supreme act of patience.

The current conflict in Syria and Iraq is a case in point. Syria is a small country, and it seems very easy for America and Australia to decide to go there. I'm not sure about that. America has a very big population. Australia is smaller so Australia has to be very careful, otherwise the conflict will come closer to home.

In the fourth chapter Shantideva used the example of an external enemy to show the danger of befriending the delusions. When you befriend an external foe it is possible that they will turn around and become your friend if you are kind to them. In contrast, if you are kind and nice to the delusions within, they will just become more powerful and cause you more harm. These are all significant points.

Another significant verse concerning overcoming the real enemy within explained that it is easier to cover one's feet to protect them against sharp objects than trying to cover the whole earth with leather.¹ Likewise, overcoming the inner enemy of the delusions is equivalent to overcoming all enemies. Some have confided in me that they have found this advice gives their practice real meaning and purpose. When we really contemplate these points they give us every reason to practise patience.

¹ Bodhisattvacharyavatara, chapter 5 verse 13.

As we are inclined to engage in Dharma practice we need to derive the real essence of what is being presented here, and try to put it into practice. As presented in the teachings, we need to regard our internal afflictions and delusions as our real enemy, and use all our energy to combat and overcome them. Conversely, we need to practise love for our external enemies. So, in short, extend love towards external enemies, and don't be patient with internal enemies. Try to use every means to overcome those inner delusions. That is, in essence, the practice we need to adopt if we are to consider ourselves Dharma practitioners.

2.1.3. The actual method to oppose anger

Once again we can take note of the sequence of outlines, although, of course, Gyalsab Je's commentary only reflects what is presented in the actual text. We have just covered the reasons why it is necessary to apply the method to oppose anger. Now we are presented with the actual methods that oppose anger. Gyalsab Je's meticulous outlines really bring out the logical presentation of Shantideva's text, and it is good for us to really relate to this text in a systemic way, as a way of integrating it in our practice. Rather than just thinking, 'Oh, this is just an outline', we can see that the outlines, just by themselves, have great purpose.

The actual method to oppose anger is subdivided into two:

2.1.3.1. It is unsuitable to generate mental unhappiness

2.1.3.2. The reason for that

2.1.3.1. IT IS UNSUITABLE TO GENERATE MENTAL UNHAPPINESS

The commentary on the verse begins this query:

Query: How then does one abandon mental unhappiness?

Here we can see the elegant simplicity of the presentation. The verse that relates to this reads:

9. *Whatever happens, I should never
Let this mind of joy be disturbed.
Though disliking, one will not attain one's desire,
And virtue will degenerate.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary goes on to explain:

Having contemplated the benefits of accepting suffering think: "I shall under no circumstances let my mental joy be disturbed." Contemplate this point well.

Mental joy is the antidote to mental unhappiness. Therefore, if one generates dislike upon meeting something undesired, then, though one generates dislike, one will not achieve one's wishes, and the virtue that bestows the desired result degenerates. In this way all sufferings are generated.

Having contemplated the benefits of accepting suffering, refers to the benefits of willingly accepting suffering, which will be presented in more detail later on in the text. The point here is that suffering does have some advantages and should not be viewed in a completely negative light. There are in fact many benefits in accepting suffering, and contemplating this one should think, 'I shall under no circumstances let my mental joy be disturbed'. This is a point I also make in my own teachings. I often remind people that preserving and protecting one's joy is of the utmost importance for one's wellbeing.

Having contemplated this point thoroughly, we need to make the personal commitment, 'Regardless of whether the circumstances are good or bad, and especially when things are not going well, I will not allow my sense of joy to be disturbed or diminished', and in that way maintain that feeling of joy and happiness.

As presented in the commentary, joy is the antidote to mental unhappiness. If upon meeting something that is undesired, e.g. being harmed, one generates dislike, however that dislike will not achieve one's wishes. In other words, developing a dislike for someone who harms us won't affect that person at all. Furthermore, rather than accomplishing one's wishes, developing dislike actually destroys the virtue within oneself, obstructing the desired result of happiness.

In summary, as the commentary states, In this way all sufferings are generated. The point here is that whatever the unfavourable circumstance, generating dislike will not help to accomplish our wish for our own wellbeing. Indeed, rather than accomplishing anything, generating dislike actually harms our future experience of joy and happiness, because it results in the degeneration of the virtue within us. Because it is a negativity, the moment anger is generated it destroys the virtue that we have accumulated, which is the cause of our future happiness. That is how, as explained in the commentary, all sufferings are generated.

2.1.3.2. THE REASON FOR THAT

This refers to the reason why it is unsuitable to generate unhappiness. The verse in relation to this outline is one that many have found to be extremely useful and beneficial. It is a verse that is often quoted, and you will all have come across it many times.

10. *If one can do something
What is there to dislike?
If one can do nothing,
What use is dislike?*

Gyalsab Je explains the meaning of the verse thus:

If one can do something about the object that generates mental unhappiness, then what reason is there to generate dislike? Right away one acts and the mental unhappiness vanishes. In case one cannot do something then what is the use to generate unhappiness? One can dislike that space lacks obstructions, but what is the benefit in that?

As so clearly presented here, if one can do something about an object that generates mental unhappiness then what reason is there to generate dislike? To take a contemporary example, if a car breaks down and the problem can be fixed then taking it to a mechanic to be fixed will solve the problem. There is no real need for dislike or an unhappy state of mind, because it is fixable. In the event that it can't be fixed and has to be written off then, again, there is no purpose in generating dislike. If it can be fixed then there is no need to worry; if it cannot be fixed then there is no purpose in worrying about that either. We can use other examples such as someone dropping a ceramic cup. If it is cracked it can be fixed, so you fix it and then you can use it again. So there is no need to generate dislike and an unhappy mind. Whereas if it is broken into pieces and cannot be fixed, then generating dislike and worrying about it will not help to solve the situation. It will just cause more mental distress.

This advice is particularly relevant with physical illnesses. When we are ill and there is a remedy or cure then there is no need to really worry and generate a mind of dislike, as it can be cured. In the event that it is a disease that is difficult to cure then one has to accept that. The mental anguish generated from worrying will just add mental suffering to our physical suffering.

As the commentary states, if it can be fixed, then right away one acts and the mental unhappiness vanishes. In the case one cannot do something then what is the use to generate unhappiness? So again we are being reminded that if a situation cannot be remedied, or cannot be fixed, then there is no use in generating unhappiness. A further analogy presented in the commentary is that one can dislike that space lacks obstruction but what is the benefit in that? If someone were to be really upset with space because it lacks obstruction, saying, 'Oh, this space is useless. It's empty and doesn't have any function', then what purpose would that serve? None at all.

2.1.4. Striving in abandoning anger after having analysed the cause for anger in detail

This has three subdivisions:

2.1.4.1. Showing the general division of objects for generating anger

2.1.4.2. Stopping anger at undesired actions

2.1.4.3. Stopping anger at obstructions to one's wishes

2.1.4.1. SHOWING THE GENERAL DIVISION OF OBJECTS FOR GENERATING ANGER

Here we are being presented with the different kinds of objects or situations that generate anger. Some use these same objects as objects for generating patience. In fact the objects of anger and the objects of patience are basically the same, aren't they? The objects of our anger are the very objects with which one needs to generate patience with.

Here Gyaltsab Je uses these objects in the context of anger. The relevant verse reads:

11. *I do not wish for myself or my friends
Suffering, criticism, harsh words
And unpleasant talk.
For the enemy it is the opposite*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

For myself and my friends I do not want these four: feelings of suffering, criticism, harsh words spoken to one's face and the spreading of unpleasant derogatory rumours. These I do not wish for, and wish to reverse them, but in relation to the enemy these likes and dislikes are the opposite. In short, they are the eight worldly dharmas.

In relation to ourselves and those closest to us we don't want to experience any kind of feelings of suffering, any kind of criticism, or harsh words spoken directly to us, or the spreading of any unpleasant or derogatory rumours.

In fact we wish to experience their reverse, meaning that we want to experience the opposite of what we don't want. We do not want to feel any suffering and we want to feel happiness; we do not wish for criticism and we wish for praise; we do not wish for harsh words but wish only for pleasant words to be spoken to us; and we do not wish for unpleasant or derogatory rumours to be spread about us, but wish to have a good reputation.

But in relation to our enemies we wish the opposite. We want them to feel suffering and be the object of criticism, harsh words and unpleasant, derogatory rumours. Meanwhile we don't want them to experience the opposite of these negative experiences.

Basically, with these eight worldly concerns we want to experience the positives, but don't want to experience the negatives, whereas we want enemies to experience the negatives and not the positives. When we see how true this is for ourselves, we can see how these objects are the basis for all anger. When we are experiencing the negative side anger arises, and we also feel anger when the enemy experiences the positive side. So basically these eight worldly concerns or dharmas serve as the basis of so many unwholesome actions and non-virtuous states of mind.

Maybe we can go into a little bit more detail about these eight worldly dharmas in our next session. In the meantime it would be good for you to really look into these and understand how you actually experience them: the four that I do not wish for, and their opposites which I do wish for, whilst for my enemies I wish the reverse.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མཁས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

14 October 2014

As usual we can devote some time to our meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now we generate the most positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

I need to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all mother sentient beings, so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

2.1.4.1. SHOWING THE GENERAL DIVISION OF OBJECTS FOR GENERATING ANGER (CONT.)

In short, one should refrain from the eight worldly dharmas, which are the causes of anger. As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

For myself and my friends I do not want these four: feelings of suffering, criticism, harsh words spoken to one's face and the spreading of unpleasant derogatory rumours.

When we, or our close and dear ones, experience these four unpleasant situations, then anger arises. Conversely we wish for their opposites: wanting to experience happiness rather than suffering; wanting to experience praise rather than criticism; wanting to hear pleasant words rather than harsh words; and wanting to have fame rather than experience derogatory rumours. We don't want to experience the four unpleasant situations and we do want to experience the four pleasant ones.

It is the complete opposite for our enemies—we are happy when they experience suffering, but unhappy and angry when they experience happiness. We don't want them to receive any praise, and are happy when they are criticised; we are unhappy when they have pleasant words spoken to them, but glad when harsh words are used towards them. If our enemies have fame, then that makes us uncomfortable and unhappy, and thus angry, and when there are unpleasant rumours about them, we are glad.

Those, in brief, are the eight worldly concerns: one wishes to avoid four unfavourable conditions, but wishes them upon one's enemies; one wishes to enjoy four favourable conditions, but hopes one's enemies will not encounter them. As I have said, it's important for us to really look into how we get caught up in the eight worldly concerns.

In short, we basically want to experience the happiness of the contaminated samsaric pleasures. Of course, there is nothing wrong with wishing to have a higher level of happiness, but here we are talking about a strong clinging and attachment to the happiness derived from samsaric pleasures, and an aversion to any unpleasant experiences. We want to be praised and not criticised. We cling to worldly fame, and are unhappy if we are the object of any derogatory rumours. Fame itself is not a bad thing if it is based on actual good qualities. For example, amongst sentient beings no-one could be more famous than a bodhisattva. Bodhisattvas are renowned for their deeds of benefiting other sentient beings, so a bodhisattva's fame only enables them to further benefit sentient beings, rather than being a source of harm to themselves. Thus, as the term itself indicates, we need to understand that the eight worldly dharmas refer to worldly concerns.

I have explained the means to counteract the eight worldly dharmas in detail previously, however as it is important to have a good understanding of them, I will go over it again now. So, as explained earlier, one wishes for the happiness that is derived from being attached to the contaminated worldly pleasures, and it is this happiness derived from worldly pleasures, fame, praise and pleasant remarks which are related to worldly views that we need to overcome. Whereas the happiness that one would experience from obtaining liberation or ultimate enlightenment is a happiness that we need to pursue, for it is a worthy goal. Wishing for the happiness of liberation or enlightenment will inspire us to achieve that great goal.

As explained in Nagarjuna's Letter to the King, as well as in the Lam Rim teachings, one needs to equalise the eight worldly concerns or dharmas. This means we need to adopt an attitude which is the opposite of our normal attitudes. Instead of wishing for happiness, one willingly wishes to endure suffering and hardship, and so forth. The way to understand this in its proper context is that the experience of even temporary happiness is the result of good karma, or the virtue that one has accumulated in the past. Thus, when we experience that wellbeing and happiness, we are actually using up our good karma. When we reflect upon this fact, then we won't feel too keen about wishing to experience samsaric pleasures, because we know that we will be using up our own good karma.

Suffering, on the other hand is the result of negative karma, and whenever one experiences suffering it is exhausting the negative karma that one has accumulated in the past. By contemplating in this way we realise that since suffering exhausts our negative karma, it is actually good for us, and the sooner our negative karma is expended, the better it is for us. By thinking in this way, we realise that it is quite reasonable to change our attitude from wishing to experience happiness and avoid suffering, to one of willingly wishing to experience suffering, and being very wary of experiencing the happiness arising from worldly pleasures. By adopting this attitude, one will not be daunted by suffering, because of the knowledge that it is expending one's negative karma. With this attitude one will also be practising the patience of willingly tolerating sufferings.

Another way to look at the significance of the practice of equalising the eight worldly dharmas is that by not engaging in this equalising practice and exchanging our attitudes, we are, in effect, longing to experience the happiness of worldly samsaric pleasures. Such a longing will increase our attachment, which will then hinder our practice. When our attachment to the happiness of samsaric pleasures increases, it further intensifies our anger when we experience its opposite, which is suffering.

Furthermore, when we anticipate the joy of experiencing samsaric pleasures, we are ignorant of the fact that such happiness is in the nature of contaminated pleasure, rather than long-lasting happiness. Holding onto this view increases our ignorance. Thus the three poisons are increased if one does not practise equalising the eight worldly concerns.

Taking up this practice of equalising the eight worldly concerns will strengthen our tong len (giving and taking) practice, which we attempt to practise in our regular meditation. As I have mentioned previously, someone who doesn't wish to experience happiness, and who willingly wishes to experience suffering, can really take the tong len practice to heart. If one does not want to experience suffering and wants to experience only happiness, it wouldn't be possible to even think of taking on the suffering of other sentient beings. Furthermore if one is really attached to happiness, one would not want to be parted from it, so giving one's happiness away to other sentient beings would not be possible. As I have mentioned previously, the tong len practice would be an appropriate practice for those who have taken up the practice of equalising the eight worldly dharmas.

To summarise the main points, the 'taking' part of the tong len practice is when one willingly wishes to take the suffering of others upon oneself. When one is wary about experiencing happiness, one will easily be able to give it to other sentient beings, which covers the 'giving' part of the practice. As mentioned previously, being able to practise the patience of enduring suffering will prevent anger from arising when one experiences hardships and difficulties. Rather than being unhappy when our enemies experience happiness, we will be glad about that, which will also prevent anger from arising when we see our enemies experiencing good conditions. This is really a great and profound practice, so it shouldn't be taken lightly. Indeed this practice has great meaning and purpose. This should be apparent when one sees the extent to which it transforms our mind. Further details about this will be presented later on.

2.1.4.2. STOPPING ANGER AT UNDESIRED ACTIONS

This section covers how to prevent anger from arising. There are three subdivisions:

2.1.4.1.1. Stopping anger at wrongdoings directed at oneself

2.1.4.1.2. Stopping anger at wrongdoings directed at one's friends

2.1.4.1.3. Stopping anger at those who benefit one's enemies

We can see how these three types of anger definitely relate to our immediate experiences in everyday life. The moment one experiences some wrongdoing directed at oneself or one's friends, one immediately becomes upset and angry. How wonderful it would be if we could actually prevent anger from arising when we face such situations! How gentle and calm our mind would be!

STOPPING ANGER AT WRONGDOINGS DIRECTED AT ONESELF¹

This has two main sections:

1. Tolerating the generation of suffering
2. Being patient with contempt and so forth

1. TOLERATING THE GENERATION OF SUFFERING

This section is subdivided into three:

- 1.1. Meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering
- 1.2. Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma
- 1.3. Meditating on the patience that does not think anything of harm.

This is where the three divisions of patience are presented:

- Meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering
- Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma
- Meditating on the patience that does not think of anything of harm.

As presented many times, the definition of patience is a mind that does not become disturbed in the face of harm and suffering. So this means if our mind is not disturbed when we experience harm from external conditions, or from our own experiences of suffering, then we are practising patience.

The opposite of patience is anger. The Lam Rim teachings specifically mention an opposite to each of the three types of patience listed here. However, in general, anger is the opposite of patience. The definition of anger is the malicious mind that intends to harm, which is focused on the three objects that cause one suffering.

The patience of willingly tolerating suffering is really a paramount practice for everyday life. Anger is mostly related to lacking the patience to tolerate suffering. So whenever we experience suffering we can contemplate, 'This is the result of my non-virtuous actions in the past, and therefore it is befitting that I experience this now, as a way to eradicate the results of my past negativities'. By contemplating in this way, suffering becomes more acceptable, and we will not become despondent when we experience it.

As I said earlier, the Lam Rim explains the opposites of these three kinds of patience. As I recall, the opposite to the patience of meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering, is a despondent mind that feels weighed down and worthless. The opposite to meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma, is a lack of interest in the Dharma, and no aspiration to practise it. The opposite of meditating on the patience that does not think of anything of harm, is basically anger. You can check the Lam Rim as well, but these are, as I recall, the opposite of the three kinds of patience.

1.1. Meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering

This is subdivided into five:

- 1.1.1. Contemplating that one is not beyond the nature of contaminated suffering

¹ To keep them manageable the heading numbers and styles start again at this point.

1.1.2. Contemplating the benefits of meditating on suffering

1.1.3. Contemplating how they are not difficult once habituated

1.1.4. The benefits of striving to abandoning afflictions

1.1.5. Extensive explanation of the benefits of suffering

1.1.1. Contemplating that one is not beyond the nature of contaminated suffering

One is not beyond the nature of contaminated suffering means that one definitely has to experience contaminated sufferings. Because one is still in samsara, one still has a samsaric nature.

The relevant lines of verse from the root text read:

*12ab. Causes for happiness come adventitiously,
Causes for suffering abound.*

In his commentary on these two lines Gyaltsab Je explains:

In cyclic existence the causes for happiness arise only occasionally and the causes for suffering abound. Since one is not beyond the nature of cyclic existence it is appropriate to tolerate sufferings.

As explained in the commentary, in cyclic existence the causes for happiness arise only occasionally. One needs to understand that the cause for happiness is virtue. Thus, for example, if you were to reflect upon whether you have accumulated virtue or non-virtue today, it may be quite evident that you have created more non-virtuous deeds than virtuous ones. If that is the case, you would have been creating more causes for suffering than causes for happiness. So, as indicated in the commentary, when the causes to experience happiness are generated only occasionally, then naturally, the result of happiness is also only occasional, and instead of happiness, one experiences more suffering. This can also relate to the fact that the immediate causes for our happiness are also scarce. Even on a daily basis there are far more occasions where things go wrong, which cause us suffering, than conditions for happiness.

Since one is not beyond the nature of cyclic existence the causes for suffering abound, relates to non-virtuous activities or negativities. If the delusions are prevalent in our mind, then it is more likely that we will be creating more non-virtues or negativities on a regular basis. If we find that this is true for ourselves now, then it would also have to have been true in past lives. Through having created abundant causes for suffering in the past, one naturally experiences more suffering now. Likewise, if we failed to create the cause of happiness, which is virtue, in previous lives, we will naturally experience the result of a lack of happiness now.

These are really significant points about karma. When one creates non-virtuous deeds and negativity, the result will be suffering. Whereas if one creates virtuous deeds, the result will be happiness. As the great Kadampa masters advised, on a regular basis one should, at the end of the day, count up how many deeds were influenced by the delusions, and were thus negative deeds, and how much virtue was accrued during the day. The results of this analysis show us our progress. Then we can slowly transform our lives by creating more virtues and shunning more negativities. This is a personal instruction on how to adopt virtue and abandon negativity. If we do that then we will then secure a better life right now, as well as preparing for our experiences in future lifetimes. This is very succinct advice that is being presented here.

In very simple terms, if we wish to experience real happiness in life, then we need to accumulate virtue. If you want to experience real happiness, then you must accumulate the causes for that, which is virtue. If you do not wish to experience suffering, then you need to abandon negativity which will eradicate the causes for suffering. One becomes a real practitioner when one abides by this code of training. When we really contemplate and think about how our experiences now are related to specific causes and conditions that were created in the past, we generate a real confidence in the importance of adopting virtue and abandoning negativity. We really need to take this on board.

1.1.2. Contemplating the benefits of meditating on suffering

One should understand that we don't need to be completely afraid of suffering, as there are actually benefits in experiencing it.

The following six lines explain this:

*12cd. Without suffering there is no renunciation
Therefore, mind be firm!*

*13. If the faithful of Durga and the Kanapa
Tolerate the meaningless feelings of
Being burned and cut, then why
Do I not have courage for liberation?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on these lines reads as follows:

It is appropriate to contemplate cyclic existence to be in the nature of suffering because without contemplating the suffering of samsara the mind definitely wishing to be free from samsara will not arise. Hence, "Mind be firm!"

It is appropriate to tolerate suffering. The faithful of the goddess Uma, in order to reverse and lessen the austerities of Ishvara, on the ninth of the middle month of autumn, fast and cut and burn themselves for one or three days in order to please her.

The people of Kanapa and so forth in the south, in order to compete with each other, endure the sufferings of cutting their bodies and the like. If one can tolerate sufferings for such meaningless purposes, then why do I fear the experiences of suffering for the great purpose of liberating all sentient beings from their sufferings? It is appropriate to tolerate them.

As explained here in the commentary, it is appropriate to contemplate cyclic existence to be in the nature of suffering, otherwise the mind wishing to definitely be free from samsara will not arise. As one of the great lamas, Drakha Rinpoche, who was from the same area in Tibet where I come from mentioned, there are no accounts of practitioners entering the path and gaining realisations by experiencing pleasures.

How this previously unknown booklet by Drakha Rinpoche came to be published was that there was an occasion when His Holiness the Dalai Lama was delayed in Patna for some time. In order to pass the time he said, "I'd like to check out what's in the library here, as I've heard it holds some rare texts in its collection". So

Dzongsar Rinpoche went to the Patna Library and found a collection of Drakha Rinpoche's works. When this was brought to His Holiness' attention, His Holiness was interested and wanted to see them. When he came across this particular text he was so impressed that he said "Oh, this should be made more available!" That was when this booklet was published. Apparently there is also a collection of Drakha Rinpoche's works in a library in America. It is quite amazing to think that a library in Patna and a library in America had held copies of his works, but this was not widely known.

After this text was published it remained relatively unknown until His Holiness the Dalai Lama mentioned in a teaching how he had found the advice given by Drakha Rinpoche to have been very beneficial for his own mind. The booklet was being distributed freely during a teaching, and so people quickly rushed to acquire a copy for themselves! Having gained access to this book, we can see its great significance.

Of course if we had ample time I would be referring to some of the appropriate passages in this book, along with the Lam Rim teachings. But because we don't have much time, we won't do that. In his text, Drakha Rinpoche says that there are many accounts of delusions increasing and negativities not being purified, as a result of enjoying the pleasures and happiness of samsara, and no accounts of practitioners who have lessened their delusions and purified their negativities through the experience of pleasures. However there are many accounts of practitioners who, having contemplated suffering, have lessened their delusions, purified their negativities, and accumulated extensive merit.

Then he quotes the great Kadampa master Chen-ngawa, who says one should cherish suffering, for it is through sufferings and hardships that the lamas and Sangha perform their great virtuous deeds. The great extensive deeds of the lamas are indeed the result of enduring a great amount of suffering and hardship in their practice. The sangha also endure the hardships of practising morality, and endure discomforts whilst engaging in virtues of the three doors of body, speech and mind. Thus, by willingly experiencing sufferings they are able to purify extensive negativities and accumulate very extensive merit to achieve the higher realisations of liberation and enlightenment. This is why, as explained, it is appropriate to cherish suffering.

The great lama Drakha Rinpoche was also known, amongst those who revered him, as a manifestation of Chenrezig. On a personal note, I had a classmate who came from the same town as Drakha Rinpoche. So he had an unequivocal faith in Drakha Rinpoche and he used to say to me, "Oh, there's really no lama like Drakha Rinpoche. He's a really incredible practitioner and a great being".

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains that it is appropriate to contemplate cyclic existence to be in the nature of suffering. As mentioned before, without contemplating the nature of samsara the wish to definitely be free from samsara will not arise. When one sees the great benefits from contemplating suffering, one will see the appropriateness of enduring suffering.

Furthermore, as explained in the commentary it is appropriate to tolerate suffering. Examples of such suffering include the faithful of the goddess Uma, who, in order to reverse and lessen the austerities of Ishvara, on the ninth of the middle month of autumn, fast and cut and burn themselves for one or three days in order to please her. So just to please this goddess, the devotees of Uma endure extreme pain and suffering.

Furthermore, the people of Kanapa and so forth in the south, in order to compete with each other, endure the sufferings of cutting their bodies and the like. If one can tolerate sufferings for such meaningless purposes, then why do I fear the experiences of suffering for the great purpose of liberating all sentient beings from their sufferings? So in comparison to such meaningless sufferings without much purpose, one's own sufferings, which arise from engaging in practices for the purpose of liberating all sentient beings from their sufferings, are worthwhile. By contemplating this we will not fear suffering. The implication here is that, as explained in the commentary, it is appropriate to tolerate suffering. More extensive benefits will be explained later.

There are many accounts of people enduring extremely painful acts such as putting fire on their heads and inflicting harm on their body in various other ways, for meaningless reasons.

1.1.3. Contemplating how they are not difficult once habituated

As indicated, tolerating suffering will not be difficult once one becomes acquainted with it.

That is subdivided into two:

1.1.3.1. Extensive explanation

1.1.3.2. Summary

1.1.3.1. EXTENSIVE EXPLANATION

This has four subdivisions:

1.1.3.1.1. It becomes easier with familiarisation

1.1.3.1.2. Establishing this with an example

1.1.3.1.3. The object to tolerate

1.1.3.1.4. Example of how, through familiarity the strength of patience increases

We can go over these in our next session. The main thing for you to do is to familiarise yourselves with the explanations, and try to understand them in relation to your own practice. As one of our real enemies is anger, finding ways of how to oppose this enemy is really worthwhile.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་གྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

21 October 2014

As usual we can spend some time in our meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now we generate a positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

1.1. Meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering (cont.)

1.1.3. Contemplating how they are not difficult once habituated

1.1.3.1. EXTENSIVE EXPLANATION

1.1.3.1.1. It becomes easier with familiarisation

This section of the text shows how, through becoming familiar with suffering, we are able to endure things that we may not have been able to endure previously. For example, suffering due to relatively minor ailments might be hard to endure initially, but if we familiarise ourselves with them, we will actually be able to tolerate them later on. Likewise, we may initially view harms inflicted upon us as unbearable or intolerable, but through familiarity with them we will come to tolerate them. The verse under this heading is a verse that is often cited to show that one of the characteristics of our mind is that it is possible to train it to manage things that we might previously have been unable to do. This is what it becomes easier with familiarisation means.

We really need to contemplate this point in relation to every aspect of our life. For example, even mundane tasks like work, or engaging in any kind of training, require some effort. If we don't develop the mind of being able to bear hardships and difficulties then we might easily give up because we think, "Oh this is too hard". All too often we see people give up their assignments, training and even their studies, saying, "Oh, this is too difficult". Thinking in that way can easily become a habit, leading some to give up as soon as there is some difficulty or hardship.

Developing a courageous mind that willingly accepts difficulties and hardships is part of the patience of willingly accepting hardship, as well as the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma. The patience of willingly tolerating harm is related to the harm that others may inflict upon us, whereas the patience of definitely relying on the Dharma can be applied to a range of different circumstances.

As the definition of patience suggests, a mind that does not become disturbed in the face of adversity or harm is definitely a calm and stable mind that is not prone to agitation. When the mind is not disturbed then that prevents anger from arising. That is how we need to see patience as being a direct opponent to anger. When the mind is not disturbed we will be able to accomplish whatever we need to accomplish. Conversely, when the mind is disturbed then it hinders whatever one is trying to achieve, and creates many negativities as well. When we really think about what patience really means, its benefits and how it is essential for our wellbeing, then we come to the natural conclusion, "I must definitely develop patience—I cannot afford to be without it".

Just as developing patience is essential for one's own wellbeing and relationships with others, it is also true for all the practices of the six perfections. Each one of the six perfections is essential for both our personal development and as a means of benefitting others. That is why the six perfections are the core practices of the bodhisattvas. As they practise the six perfections, bodhisattvas willingly undergo hardships and difficulties with joy, rather than any sense of suffering. That is how we need to understand the significance of these practices.

The practice of patience also strengthens the capacity of the mind to face hardships and difficulties. Whenever there is an occasion where harm is inflicted, practising patience will further increase the level of our tolerance. So the harm actually becomes an impetus to further develop patience, and make it even stronger. So, once one is committed to practise patience, experiencing harm only helps to increase and further strengthen our patience, rather than decreasing it.

The verse relating to this section of the text reads:

14. There is nothing that does not become Easier through familiarisation. Therefore, by meditating on small harm One will be able to tolerate great harm.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this oft-quoted verse begins with:

If one meditates on patience, then one will also tolerate suffering. All ways of apprehending arise through familiarisation, and therefore there is no object of the mind that does not become easier through familiarisation.

As the commentary explains, if one meditates on patience then one will also tolerate suffering. This is very succinctly pointing out that if one practises patience, then that will naturally enable one to also tolerate suffering. Conversely, one is unable to tolerate any kind of suffering when one lacks patience. These are very important points because as ordinary beings we are bound to experience some form of suffering or hardship at different times in our life. So if we don't develop a mind of being patient and tolerating suffering our minds will constantly be in a disturbed and agitated state. Then there will be no room in our minds to actually practise anything in depth. Indeed it is almost impossible to accomplish anything of significance when our mind is constantly in an agitated and disturbed state.

When we think about this we will come to the conclusion that patience is essential, and that we cannot function effectively without it. As the heading itself suggests, it is not beyond our capacity to practise patience because it is a matter of familiarising our mind with accepting and tolerating suffering and harm. As we train our mind in this way it becomes possible for us to tolerate even greater hardship and suffering, because the nature of the mind is such that there is nothing that cannot be developed through familiarisation.

The commentary explains that if one meditates on patience then one will be able to tolerate suffering, because all ways of apprehending arise through familiarisation. The very basis of the mind is that whatever is apprehended by the mind is based on familiarity with it. So whatever the mind apprehends now is possible due to that familiarisation. For that reason, there is no object of the mind that does not become easier through familiarisation. The very basis, and hence potential of the mind is that it knows and apprehends things through familiarisation. This implies that, through familiarisation with an object, it becomes easier and easier for the mind to apprehend that object. This point supports the earlier reasons.

The main point can be summarised in this way: If one were to ask whether an ordinary mind has faults, then of course the answer is that yes, an ordinary mind does have various faults. But it also carries the inborn ability to familiarise itself with good qualities, and is thus able to develop those good qualities. In other words, while the mind possesses many faults, it also possesses the ability to develop qualities, and thus carries the ability to remove those faults.

These are essential points. We often feel despondent, thinking, "Oh, I am riddled with faults, and therefore I cannot achieve anything; I am good for nothing". All too often we just focus on our faults and feel despondent and discouraged. We give up things easily and don't really consider going further to improve ourselves. When we experience these feelings, we need to remind ourselves, "Yes, we might have faults as ordinary beings. But the very nature of the mind is that it naturally carries the potential to develop qualities, and that is done through familiarisation".

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

For this reason, having meditated on tolerating small harms such as hot or cold, or harsh speech by others and so forth, know that one can also be patient with great harms such as the fires of the hell realms.

The commentary indicates that because one can learn to tolerate small harms such as hot and cold, or harsh speech by others and so forth, one is therefore able to train one's mind to tolerate greater sufferings. Before we can even attempt to think of tolerating greater suffering, we need to train our mind in being able to tolerate small suffering. Compared to the sufferings of hell realms, the suffering of feeling hot and cold, or being the recipient of harsh speech—which, as mere words, do not physically harm us—is really quite insignificant. However if we don't train our mind to tolerate minor suffering such as feeling a bit hot or cold, and hearing harsh words, then the mind becomes habituated with not being able to tolerate any kind of suffering, no matter how small. Whereas if we can train our mind to tolerate natural suffering like being a bit hot, or a bit cold, or occasionally hearing some unpleasant words, then it is possible to be patient with greater harms, specifically the sufferings of fire in hell realms.

This explanation is, of course, in the context of the great deeds of bodhisattvas. There are many accounts of bodhisattvas willingly accepting great sufferings - even going to the hell realms - in order to benefit sentient beings. This shows the great courage of the bodhisattvas and the extent to which they have developed their tolerance and patience in order to benefit sentient beings. They initially developed that level of patience and tolerance through familiarisation with smaller sufferings. So the point here is that if we familiarise ourselves with tolerating small harms such as heat and cold and harsh words and so forth, then it is possible for us to slowly, slowly be able to tolerate greater harms.

The main point is that developing the practice of patience is a matter of going through stages from being able to tolerate and endure small sufferings, and then slowly, slowly increasing the level of our tolerance and patience so that we are able to endure great sufferings. As mentioned here, if it is possible for bodhisattvas to endure the sufferings of the hell realms, then it is possible for us as well.

As a way to back this up, the commentary quotes from the sutra called the Sutra of the Meeting of Father and Son. This sutra is an account of the Buddha's life, and meeting the father is a symbolic expression that indicates reaching enlightenment. The quote reads:

The Bhagavan possesses the concentration called All Phenomena Become Happiness. Whoever attains this concentration will experience all objects of bodhisattvas only as happiness and will not experience suffering ... should they receive the harm of the hell beings they will still abide in the recognition of happiness.

The sutra is quite clear, so we don't need to explain it much more. The point is that should they receive the harm of the hell realms, bodhisattvas will still abide in happiness. As the sutra clearly states, due to practising patience, bodhisattvas are not troubled when they encounter suffering. Rather than experiencing suffering and unhappiness, they experience joy and happiness.

1.1.3.1.2. Establishing this with an example

This section presents an example of how patience becomes easier through familiarisation.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with a hypothetical qualm.

Qualm: If we meditate on small sufferings, the patience will not have power.

This hypothetical qualm is to remove any doubt that the patience developed through meditating on small sufferings will not have much power. In response to that, the next verse is presented.

15. *Snakes and insects,
The feelings of hunger and thirst,
Rashes and so forth,
Who has not seen it with these meaningless sufferings?*

The commentary goes on to say:

Answer: Why do you not see that if one meditates on patience for small and absolutely meaningless sufferings, such as the feelings of hunger and thirst, skin diseases, rashes and the like, that they then become tolerable, and if one does not meditate, they become difficult to bear. This is directly observable and it is therefore appropriate to meditate on patience.

This explanation is quite clear. The main point is why would you not see that if one meditates on patience for small and absolutely meaningless sufferings, that they will become tolerable. The commentary says that being hungry or thirsty or having rashes and the like are quite small inconveniences. They become tolerable if one practises patience, and they become difficult to bear if one does not practise patience. We can see how true this statement is from our own experience. If, when we are confronted with being hungry or a bit too hot, we allow our mind to become obsessed by that, and see that as a problem, then we start to become more and more uncomfortable. Whereas the moment we accept the discomfort and think, "Oh well, it's OK, I will tolerate it, and just deal with it", then it doesn't appear to be a big problem anymore. This reminds me that when we first went to India there were some who complained about the heat all the time. Other monks would say, "If you keep complaining about the heat, it will only get worse. Just forget about it. It is there anyway and you won't make it go away by complaining about it. Better to just accept it". When you accept something you don't think too much about it, and it doesn't bother you so much.

The main point is that if we develop a mind of accepting everyday difficulties and problems, and practise patience with them, then they become tolerable and not so much of a problem. Whereas if we don't practise the patience of tolerating them, then they always appear as problems, and the discomfort will become greater and greater. Think about today, which was a bit warm. If we have allowed our mind to accept it, then it will actually be quite pleasant. There are some who actually like the heat and don't see it as a problem. If we have accepted a warm day today and another warm day comes up tomorrow, then it will not be too difficult to bear, because you have already accepted it today. Whereas if you haven't accepted it today, and tomorrow is also a hot day, it will seem to be an even greater problem. We can definitely understand this from our own experience.

If we train our mind to accept a bit of heat, then, through that familiarisation, we will be able to tolerate heat, and it will not be a hindrance as we carry on with our lives. We will be able to do whatever we need to do, because we have trained our mind to accept it. Likewise, if we accept the cold then, through that familiarity, we will not be hindered when it is continuously cold. We will be able to carry on doing whatever we need to do. When we train our mind to accept things, then external conditions will not be a hindrance or an obstruction to our activities.

This reminds me of one time when I went to New Zealand. When I come out of the plane, the hostesses seemed very concerned that one of my arms was bare, but that's normal for me. It comes back to the practice of patience, particularly the patience of willingly accepting hardship. When one willingly accepts hardship, then through familiarity with accepting that hardship, it becomes easier to tolerate, and we will not experience any mental suffering. So we need to reflect the great benefit of tolerating suffering.

1.3.1.3. THE OBJECT TO TOLERATE

This basically refers to the object of patience that is to be tolerated, and the relevant verse is:

16. *I should not be impatient with
Heat, cold, rain, wind and so forth,
Sickness, bondage and beatings,
If I do so the harm will increase.*

Here Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of the verse as:

One should not be impatient with heat or cold, rain and wind, sickness, being bound by ropes or being beaten with a stick and so forth, because if one is impatient with small harms, this will only further increase the harm, as patience decreases.

We often experience heat, cold, rain, and wind, and there are definitely occasions where we feel too hot or too cold, and times when there is torrential rain or strong winds. And, of course, to different degrees we all have experienced some ailments and felt physical discomfort. Of course most of us would not have experienced being bound by a rope or beaten, but that does happen to others. These are some examples of the sufferings that occur on a regular basis.

It is because they occur so regularly that we should be patient with these relatively small discomforts. If we are not patient with them then our suffering will only increase. It won't be because the intensity of the actual harm increases, but because our mind does not accept it, and does not apply any patience or tolerance to the suffering. Then the suffering actually increases, by virtue of the sheer fact that our patience itself decreases. As we become less patient with the suffering, our discomfort seems to increase in our mind. Indeed, if we don't begin to practise patience with the small harms that we encounter regularly, then what else are we planning to be patient with? How else are we going to practise patience if we can't be patient with the regular suffering that we experience in our daily lives? We need to begin to develop a mind of tolerance and patience towards the regular discomforts we experience, which will then prevent our mind from becoming impatient with greater sufferings later on.

Of course there are many stories of how, through familiarity, things which may otherwise have been completely intolerable, are tolerated and accepted.

Recently I heard of a monk from the same province in Tibet that I come from, who was recently imprisoned because he had recited the Prayer for the Long Life of the Dalai Lama. While in prison he started to recite it even more, for which he earned more beatings. But the more they beat him the louder he shouted the long life prayer. It came to the point where the guards themselves were nonplussed. Rather than struggling and screaming, and begging the guards to stop the beatings, he increased the volume of his recitation of the verses of the prayer. The guards were amazed and came to a point where they didn't know what to do with him!

Willingly tolerating hardship and suffering is indispensable to our practice and wellbeing. If we don't tolerate them, it is as if the hardships and sufferings become our master and we, like slaves, are dominated by them. Once we willingly accept the hardships and difficulties, then we become the master rather than the slave. These are important points for us to consider.

1.3.1.4. AN EXAMPLE OF HOW, THROUGH FAMILIARITY, THE STRENGTH OF PATIENCE INCREASES

The relevant lines of verse are:

17. *For some, seeing their own blood,
Will increase their steadfastness and courage.
Some, when seeing the blood of others,
Faint and become unconscious.*

18ab. *This comes about due to natural
Firmness of the mind and fear.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads

For some brave person, seeing their own blood upon being injured by a weapon will only increase their steadfastness and courage. Some cowards will faint and become unconscious even when they see the blood of someone else. This does not come about through the force of the external object, whether it is large or small, nor does it come about due to a soft or hard body. It comes about solely through the mind being either firm or timid.

Therefore, one should strive in meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering.

Some brave people, even seeing their own blood upon being injured by a weapon will only increase their steadfastness and courage. When, out of bravery, people go into combat and see blood, then that further intensifies their eagerness to overcome their foe. Rather than becoming discouraged, seeing blood actually gives them even more courage. There are also some cowards who, let alone not being able to tolerate the sight of their own blood, become despondent and lose courage and actually faint when they see the blood of others.

You might also have come across people who faint when they see blood, because they have a mind that is not able to tolerate that. As explained in the commentary, this is not dependent on external conditions and objects. For some, blood makes their mind even more courageous, while others become discouraged, and faint. The difference is solely in the mind that interprets the situation. Therefore, as the commentary explains, one should strive in meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering. As the illustrations in the verse and commentary indicate, the benefit of tolerating suffering is that it makes the mind much more courageous.

As illustrated in the commentary, bravery is very much related to the intensity of the mind wishing to go into combat. This reminds me of an account that was related to me by someone from my home town. When the Red Guards came in, one man, who was known for his bravery, showed great courage. Using his simple gun he tried to fight the Chinese. At one point he was shot and fatally wounded, but he didn't drop dead right away. He kept on trying, unsuccessfully, to stand up and face the Chinese. Those around him saw his condition, and knew that he couldn't do anything, but they could also see his determination to try to overcome the person who shot him. After a while they were able to tell him that the person who shot him had been killed. Only then did the wounded man relax and pass on.

This story really shows the power of the mind. With intense determination it can even prevent immediate death and hold on to life. However, the moment someone lets go of such a mind then they pass on.

Then there is the situation of extreme fear. I heard another account of someone who was normally quite a skilled horseman, but in the face of the enemy coming, was so afraid that he was not even able to get onto his horse properly. In his haste, rather than putting his foot in the stirrup, he was trying to mount his horse by putting his knee into the stirrup! So, being really fearful can be a real disadvantage!

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Su Lan Foo

Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

28 October 2014

As usual, let us spend some time in meditation.

[meditation]

As we have just attempted in our short meditation, it is definitely highly worthwhile to familiarise yourself with the practice of tong len, i.e. giving and taking.

This should not be restricted just to this short session of meditation but is something you need to train yourself in in your everyday life, at every occasion and in any circumstance you find yourself in. In particular, this relates to any happiness you may experience in your daily activities e.g. the joys of eating and drinking etc. As soon as you experience these normal enjoyments, remind yourself to give that joy and happiness to other sentient beings. Then, whenever you encounter some difficulties or hardships, in whatever form, the moment you feel discomfort at any level, immediately try and use that as a way of taking the suffering of other sentient beings upon yourself. Remind yourself: "Since I'm experiencing this hardship now, may it become a means to take the suffering of other sentient beings upon myself." When you train yourself in this way you become more familiar with the actual practice of tong len. Then due to that regular familiarity, your meditation practice will become more profound.

The practical benefit you get from this practice is that it helps to reduce the negativity of generating attachment and anger when facing everyday life situations. When you experience joys and pleasures, if you are not mindful, these can cause increased attachment. But if you give that joy and happiness away to other sentient beings, there will be less attachment involved, which will reduce attachment to the pleasures and joys regularly experienced. Likewise, when you experience difficulties, willingly taking on the suffering of other sentient beings prevents anger from arising in your mind. In this way, tong len is a highly significant practice.

In this way we can see and relate to the effect of this practice outside of the formal meditation session. It would be a little strange if the practice is restricted to a few minutes of sitting in some formal meditation. If that were the case, then when you come out of the meditation, it may appear that the practice is not relevant and unnecessary. But that shouldn't be the case—that is the complete opposite of the significance of that practice. Whatever practice you attempt to do in a formal sitting, you need to ensure that the effects of it are carried through to your everyday lives, and then the real benefits of the practice will be felt. You will then have a constant 'guide' with you, reminding you of what is appropriate to engage in, and what is inappropriate and to be avoided.

Now you may set your motivation for receiving the teachings. As usual, generate the motivation along these lines: For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in the teaching and put it into practice well.

1.1. Meditating on the patience that tolerates suffering

1.1.3. Contemplating how they are not different once habituated (cont.)

1.1.3.2. SUMMARY

The verse reads:

18cd. *Therefore one should disregard harms
And not be influenced by sufferings.*

19ab. *The skilled, although receiving sufferings,
Remain with the clarity of their mind
unpolluted.*

The commentary then reads:

Therefore one should make one's mind stable, disregard any harm received and not be influenced by the suffering. Those who are skilled in meditating on the Mahayana path, although receiving sufferings, through meditating on patience remain with their mind clear and not polluted by anger.

Based on the reasons presented earlier, relating to the need to tolerate the sufferings etc. one should make one's mind stable or firm. 'Firm' in this context means not allowing the mind to become agitated or troubled, particularly in the face of harm or suffering that one may experience.

In disregard any harm received and not be influenced by the suffering, 'disregarding harm' means that while one may experience the difficulties of the harm, do not allow this to disturb one's mind and become influenced by the sufferings one experiences. What is particularly highlighted here is the way one needs to be able to willingly accept and tolerate the sufferings, which is the real mark of practising patience. As explained further on, those who are skilled in meditating on the Mahayana path, although receiving sufferings, through meditating on patience remain with their mind clear and not polluted by anger. This sentence explains that those who earnestly follow the Mahayana path are the ones who voluntarily accept the sufferings. Those who are skilled particularly refers to the bodhisattvas who are engaging in the Mahayana path. And while they experience suffering, by meditating on patience their minds remain clear and unpolluted by the faults of anger.

In summary, what is being presented here is that if one engages in the practice of willingly accepting suffering, then the mind will not be affected and become unhappy. Then, if the mind is not unhappy, there is no room for the pollution of anger to take effect. This is how one protects one's mind from the pollution of anger. In this way (with a clear state of mind) one's mind is undisturbed and protected from the negativity of anger. We need to understand that these are highly profound levels of practice, see their significance, and incorporate this approach into our lives now. If you relate to these passages and think, 'Oh it does make sense!', but then regularly leave it aside, you will never benefit from it. Whereas if you implement it into your daily life, you will see the real benefit and significance. These verses are actually speaking to us personally—they are a personal instruction. This is how we need to derive the benefit.

1.1.4. The benefits of striving to abandon afflictions

The relevant verses here are the second two lines of the previous verse:

19cd. *One wages war with the afflictions
And while waging war there is much harm.*

20. *Disregard all sufferings
And destroy the enemies of anger and so forth.
They who win thus are heroes,
The rest kill corpses.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary clearly presents the meaning of these verses:

The objects of abandonment, such as the affliction of anger, and their antidotes are at war, and during the time of waging war many sufferings arise. If in worldly terms someone who disregards the harm inflicted by weapons and kills the enemy is called a hero, then someone who disregards all physical and mental sufferings, destroys the enemy of anger and conquers the afflictions, should be definitely called a hero. The rest kill the ones who die anyway by themselves, which is just like killing corpses. They should not be called heroes.

As the commentary explains, the objects of abandonment, such as the affliction of anger, and their antidotes are at war. Using some examples, the antidote for attachment would be meditating on the imperfections of the objects of attachment. Therefore within one's mind, meditating on the imperfections of the object would be like a war (or battle) between the antidote and the affliction. Likewise, a mind meditating on the various categories of phenomena, and ultimately emptiness, would be at war with ignorance.

It is useful to use the analogy of an external battle to illustrate the internal battle of the antidotes overcoming the afflictions. Just as a lot of suffering (wounds and even death) is experienced with external wars, internal conflict also brings difficulties and hardships. What is being presented here is that it is worthwhile to endure those sufferings and difficulties when combating the inner enemies of the afflictions.

A further analogy given here is that in worldly terms someone who disregards the harm inflicted by weapons and kills the enemy is called a hero. This illustrates that if someone goes to war and vanquishes the enemy, they will be honoured as a hero upon their return, as they have willingly endured pain and suffering during the war. We can see for ourselves that elderly war veterans are proud to wear their medals! Using my own experience, I know that even when there is some suffering, it is easily disregarded during the time of conflict or fighting. When I was young and got into fights with another young monk, even when I had wounds on my head and was bleeding, I was still able to go forward and fight with him. So I can definitely say that it is true that one is able to disregard wounds and pain when fiercely attempting to overcome the enemy.

You need to derive an understanding of how this illustration fits the meaning of what is being explained. When ordinary beings go to war to overcome an enemy, there is a lot of hardship and harm inflicted upon them, but this is endured because of the willingness to do so. If one does not willingly accept the harms, one cannot go forth and overcome the enemy (and later be renowned as a hero). Being known as a hero is due to having endured the hardships and harms inflicted during combat. So it is not in spite of, but despite of the harms that one is later renowned as a hero. If it is the case that one who disregards the harm inflicted by weapons and kills the enemy should definitely be called a hero, then someone who disregards all physical and mental sufferings, destroys the enemy of anger and conquers the afflictions, should definitely be called a hero.

What is being explained here is that when in combat with the inner enemies i.e. the afflictions, applying antidotes such as meditating on imperfections to overcome attachment, and meditating on compassion to overcome anger, and meditating on emptiness to overcome ignorance, all require repeated meditation, again and again. It is not something that is quick and easy to apply. One cannot meditate once on the imperfections of attachment, and then attachment is suddenly overcome! In fact, sometimes the more we try to overcome attachment, the stronger it seems to become, and the more difficult it is to deal with.

In a worldly sense, someone can destroy the enemy and return from combat as a hero. The commentary states that this is similar to killing corpses as the external enemies will die naturally anyway, even without being killed. However inner afflictions are the complete opposite. If you leave inner afflictions and don't do anything about overcoming them, they will only become stronger and stronger. For example, if you don't apply antidotes to overcome attachment, and allow it to remain in your mind, indulging it, it only becomes stronger, even to the point of becoming seemingly impossible to overcome. This is also true for anger, ignorance and all other afflictions. So, unlike the external enemies, the inner enemies of the afflictions will only become stronger.

If ordinary beings who destroy external enemies are regarded as heroes, then someone engaged in the combat of overcoming the inner enemy of the afflictions should definitely be worthy of being called a real hero, as it is much more difficult to overcome the inner enemies. The commentary concludes by saying those who destroy their external foes should not be called heroes.

To reiterate the main point: having recognised the inner afflictions as the real enemies that destroy one's happiness and peace, one must destroy the afflictions by engaging in combat, which means applying the antidotes. Without this the afflictions cannot be naturally overcome. In addressing the afflictions one will be faced with hardships, but the hardships are worthwhile, because one has applied the antidotes, and so will definitely be able to overcome them. Once overcome, one will be a hero in the true sense, and worthy of veneration.

1.1.5. Extensive explanation of the benefits of suffering

The literal translation 'the benefits of suffering' may seem awkward so it can be understood as 'the benefits of seeing the faults of the suffering.'

21. *Further, the qualities of suffering are:
Through despondence it destroys pride,
It generates compassion for those circling in
samsara,
Fearing negativities and joy for virtue.*

Four benefits which are defined. The commentary reads:

Further, meditating on suffering is a great summary of the key points of practice. As the benefits of contemplating the shortcomings of sufferings are:

Seeing that one is controlled by suffering one becomes disheartened, which destroys the haughtiness of pride and arrogance.

Seeing that others are under the control of suffering one generates the compassion that thinks: How wonderful it would be if sentient beings were free from suffering.

Seeing that the suffering is the result of non-virtue and since one does not want suffering, one refrains from negativity.

Since one does not wish suffering and desires happiness, and seeing happiness to be the result of virtue one generates joy in virtue.

As Gyaltsab Je mentions in the opening line, Further meditating on suffering is a great summary of the key points of practice. Earlier I related that meditating, thinking, contemplating on the sufferings, really embracing them and seeing their benefits as a way to overcome them, is actually the main point of the practice. It really is a highly significant practice.

Then Gyaltsab Je elaborates on benefits of contemplating the shortcomings of sufferings.

As one experiences the sufferings one will be able to reflect upon the reality that one is still under their control and not completely free. Because of this one becomes disheartened and experiences a little sadness due to the suffering, and by being confronted with the fact that one is still controlled by the sufferings. That in itself helps to destroy any sense of haughtiness or sense that everything is fine for oneself; also pride and arrogance can be overcome.

Seeing others suffering refers to other ordinary beings who are still under the control of suffering. So seeing those in a pitiful state, one generates compassion thinking, "How wonderful it would be if they were free from suffering."

Understanding suffering as the result of non-virtue, and seeing that one does not want suffering, one will refrain from non-virtue. This, again, is a highly significant point in relation to our own practice. When one experiences suffering, one should immediately try and see that, "the suffering I am experiencing now is none other than the results of the non-virtue that I have created in the past." Since one does not wish for any kind of suffering, seeing it as a result of one's non-virtue can become an impetus to refrain from creating more negativity. In this way, experiencing suffering can help to prevent one from creating negativities such as killing and stealing etc. Thus, one refrains from the ten non-virtuous deeds.

The significant point here is that for those of us who already have a conviction in karma—this will not really make much sense if one doesn't already believe in karma—one can immediately relate to the unpleasant experience of suffering as being the results of non-virtue. One can take the suffering itself as caution not to create further non-virtues, shunning negativity and non-virtue, because one does not wish to prolong the unpleasant experience of suffering in the future. This then becomes the impetus. Since one does not wish for suffering, but desires happiness, and seeing happiness as the result of virtue, one will aim to generate virtue. The commentary specifically mentions how all are equal in wanting happiness and not wanting any kind of suffering: since one does not wish suffering and desires happiness, and seeing that happiness then is to be the result of virtue one generates joy or enthusiasm in creating virtue. So from the presentation here we can incorporate an understanding of karma as well as refuge. By contemplating this one has a way to overcome the sufferings.

These few lines really carry great depth in meaning and are an impetus for practice. The words one does not wish suffering and desires happiness are simple words. When we contemplate them and incorporate them into a broad understanding of the teachings, then because one does not wish for suffering, one thinks "I need to avoid non-virtues and stop creating negativity", and because one desires happiness one thinks "I must create virtue" and so adopt virtues to create positive karma. Take the line one does not wish for suffering and desired happiness as an impetus for your own personal practice. Shun non-virtue and adopt virtue. It also becomes a strong motivator to generate compassion for others. When one sees others experiencing suffering and deprived of happiness, this becomes a reason to generate strong compassion for them.

Thus one reflects, "just as I do not wish for any suffering and wish for every kind of happiness, it is exactly the same for others as well". When others are experiencing great suffering, one relates to that as being really unfortunate, and wishes that they experience happiness. When others are deprived of happiness, wishing them happiness becomes a strong motivator. So begin with yourself, relating to your personal experience, and then you can relate that to others. We can all immediately relate to the truth of these factors. Because of the great points presented in these few lines of verse Gyaltsab Je mentions they are a great summary of the key points of the practice.

As mentioned in recent sessions, there are many accounts of practitioners who, by having contemplated on suffering, and by experiencing it, have accumulated great amounts of merit and engaged in great practices of purification to achieve great goals. However there are no accounts of practitioners who have achieved these goals, or even engaged in these practices, by experiencing pleasures. When considering the benefits of contemplating sufferings, taken in the context of the entire path, it is definitely the case that practitioners of all three scopes—small, medium and great—experience significant results through not wanting to experience suffering due to seeing its disadvantages and faults. Therefore contemplating the faults of samsara is what leads you to liberation. Conversely, if one seeks the pleasures of samsara, then this is what keeps one in samsara, rather than being freed from it. If one voluntarily and intentionally seeks the pleasures of samsara, there is no way that one will be free from it. How can one possibly achieve liberation if one intentionally seeks the means to remain in samsara?

This is how we need to think in a broader sense: contemplating the sufferings is a highly significant impetus for the practices. If one can see that this is a way to ultimately become free from suffering, one can willingly take it on as a practice. Sometimes there are comments about people who feel a bit overwhelmed hearing about suffering again and again, who say "There is too much focus on suffering. I don't want to hear about suffering." This occurs when one does not see the benefits, or cannot relate to the purpose and real reason for meditating on suffering. While it may seem that hearing about suffering is unpleasant, when one thoroughly contemplates the disadvantages of suffering, such as remaining in samsara to experience birth, sickness, ageing and death, then one contemplates reality. That becomes the impetus to really generate a strong wish to be free from samsara, and then suffering has served its purpose. So if one does not want to think about the sufferings of samsara, and only seeks the pleasures of samsara, then the wish to be free from it will never arise in one's mind. If we don't see the benefits of being free from samsara then why do people long to be free? And why would we want to develop an aspiration for liberation?

This is how we need to understand the significance of meditating on the various types of suffering in samsara, as presented in the teachings in great detail. At the moment we may not immediately be able to relate to the various types of sufferings in different realms. But if we take the initiative to meditate on them, imagining we are experiencing those sufferings, then, through familiarity we can gain a real sense of what the sufferings would be like, even though we are not experiencing them now. One can imagine what it would be like, how unbearable it would be, if one were to actually experience such suffering. When one reaches that level in one's meditation it has become a personal experience. In time, a strong longing to be free from such suffering, and to be free from samsara, will definitely arise. One does not just feel the conviction to be free from the suffering of samsara in theory.

While it is true that without experience, it is hard for us to immediately relate to the sufferings, with familiarity we can gain that experience. This reminds me of a remark made by a lama some time ago. He was an ordained monk and a good student for many years, but later disrobed. Then he led a normal life, had a relationship, got engaged and went through the normal ups and downs of life. Later on, he related to some of his students, "Now I can understand what your suffering is all about". So he was able to relate the sufferings of relationships and so forth through his own personal experience.

Another account that I have mentioned previously is about a German lady who received teachings from Geshe Ngawang Dhargay when he was at Atisha Centre. She related to me that it was very meaningful, and that she got a lot out of teaching, but she confessed, "He talked a lot about suffering, and I am not too sure about all of that, but nevertheless, the teachings were very meaningful." She wasn't refuting the validity of those sufferings, but said "I am not too sure about that". Then, a couple of years later, when I met her again, she said, "Now I can definitely relate to the sufferings and I totally understand the significance of them. That is exactly true." Just as Geshe Ngawang Dhargay had related, she found it to be true for herself. This shows that when we have some experience or a deeper understanding, then we will gain a real conviction.

The significance of contemplating on the various types of sufferings, particularly thinking of death and impermanence, is that with a certain amount of familiarity it will become an integral part of one's practice. Furthermore, one will be able to maintain a constant impetus to be consistent with one's practice. In particular, meditating on the certainty of death, and the uncertainty of the time of death, one reaches the point where one recognises the truth in this. When one has a personal experience of it, rather than it just being a theory, it generates a conviction in one's mind and one will always be mindful of what one is doing—whether eating, walking or sitting. Whatever we may be engaged with, one will always try to incorporate that activity into one's practice, knowing that death can happen at any time, and that one should not waste time with meaningless activities. To that extent, the practice becomes authentic and one's purpose becomes that of a real practitioner. Without this sort of personal experience and conviction, it is very hard to claim to be a true practitioner. It is hard to regularly implement the practice in one's daily life, so we need to strive to generate some conviction in whatever practice it may be. Even if it is only a few points, to try to make an attempt to generate that conviction, whatever the practice may be.

Even though it might seem as though I am side-tracking from the actual topic, these are really important points for your practice, particularly in relation to recalling death and impermanence, which is really essential for one's practice to become more pure. Without familiarity with meditating on death and impermanence, cherishing this life and grasping at it will arise very easily. Then, whatever practice we do while clinging to this life will be mostly a worldly dharma.

Even if we meditated, the practice would only be a worldly concern rather than a real practice.

1.2. Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma

This is subdivided into two:

1.2.1. Extensive

1.2.2. Summary

Maybe we can cover this in our next session. So you can prepare yourselves by familiarising yourselves with the commentary, and also refer to the Lam Rim teachings.

Also it might be a little bit hard to read it all, and I don't know if you have access to it, but the Compendium of Practices by Shantideva himself is also a very good text to study. The chapter on patience also has a lot of information, and there are a lot of quotations from the sutras as a way to show the source of these teachings.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

4 November 2014

As usual let us spend some time in our meditation practice.

Meditation

We can set our motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will receive the teachings and put them into practice well.

Indeed, generating the bodhicitta motivation is of utmost importance. We have already established the basis of bodhicitta in our mind through our understanding of how to generate bodhicitta with either the seven-point cause and effect sequence, or the exchanging self with other technique. We need to further develop that basis by familiarising our mind with the bodhicitta motivation in every Dharma activity in which we engage. As mentioned regularly, the process of developing bodhicitta involves first generating the bodhicitta mind which has not yet been generated; once generated, to firmly establish it; and then further increase it to higher and higher levels. This is how we need to accustom our mind with bodhicitta at all levels of our practice.

Bodhicitta is the essence of the Mahayana teachings, with which we already have some familiarity. If we don't work on developing what we have already understood, and grasp on to some other form of practice, then we have entirely missed the point! Until we achieve enlightenment, we need to be continuously developing and perfecting the bodhicitta attitude, beginning with generating a contrived bodhicitta motivation, through to actually generating bodhicitta, and then engaging in the practice of the six perfections.

Although we have not yet actually generated bodhicitta, we can definitely generate a contrived bodhicitta attitude, which we can then further develop on the basis of that positive motivation. Furthermore, even though we are not yet able to practise the perfection of generosity we can definitely practise a similitude of that in the form of engaging in charitable activities. By familiarising ourselves with similitudes of both bodhicitta and the practices of the six perfections, we will gradually develop them within our mental continuum until we reach enlightenment.

1.2. Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma

This section shows us how to meditate on the patience that definitely relies on Dharma, which is one the three types of patience.

The previous section of the text explained how to rely on the patience that tolerates the suffering that we experience. As mentioned previously, this is the core practice that allows us to engage in the practice of the Dharma itself. This tolerance of suffering is developed by contemplating the benefits of suffering, rather than seeing it as an obstacle. As mentioned previously, it was only by enduring hardships and difficulties that the great practitioners of the past were able to engage in their practices. In fact, becoming a real practitioner can only be achieved by enduring hardships and difficulties—there is no other way to become a real Dharma practitioner. I could be wrong, but this is what I personally understand from these explanations.

Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma relate to the core Dharma of contemplating the two selflessnesses. Understanding selflessness and emptiness requires a lot of study, investigation and contemplation, and thus it involves hardship and difficulties. Although Nagarjuna and Chandrakirti elucidated the two selflessnesses very clearly, we still have difficulty in gaining a really good understanding of selflessness and emptiness. Thus we need to develop the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma.

The two subdivisions of this section of the text are:

1.2.1. Extensive

1.2.2. Summary

1.2.1. Extensive

The extensive explanation has three parts:

1.2.1.1. Anger and those getting angry depend on causes, and therefore lack independence

1.2.1.2. Refuting the existence of independent causes

1.2.1.3. The need for reversing anger

1.2.1.1. ANGER AND THOSE GETTING ANGRY DEPEND ON CAUSES, AND THEREFORE LACK INDEPENDENCE

This outline indicates that anger and the angry person are not independent; basically because things are dependent on causes and conditions. So what is presented here, in essence, is the dependent arising nature of all phenomena. Since everything is dependent on causes and conditions, neither anger nor the angry person can be independent.

If the angry person were to be independent, then it would not be possible for them to transform. It is because the angry person does not exist independently that it is possible for them to change and become a less angry person. Likewise, anger itself is also not an independent entity but arises due to causes and conditions. Therefore, by causing the cessation of the causes of anger, it is possible to overcome anger. We really need to understand this very profound point. In simple terms, what I derive from the explanation here is that we don't need to be slaves of anger, rather we need to be in control over our own mind, and abandon anger.

This section has two subdivisions:

1.2.1.1.1. Anger and the angry person are not independent

1.2.1.1.2. Their causes and conditions are not independent

1.2.1.1.1. Anger and the angry person are not independent

This in turn is subdivided into three:

1.2.1.1.1.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to be angry at an afflicted person

1.2.1.1.1.2. Anger is not generated volitionally

1.2.1.1.1.3. Since all faults are generated in dependence on conditions, they lack independence.

1.2.1.1.1.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to be angry at an afflicted person

This is a significant point that we really need to understand.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with a hypothetical argument.

Argument: Since the other person harms me, it is suitable to get angry at them.

The point of this hypothetical argument is that it is suitable to be angry with any person who harms us. The reasoning here is that the cause of anger is the person who inflicts the harm, and not the actual harm itself. Even though the actual cause of the pain is the harm, one does not use that as a reason to generate anger. Rather, the anger is directed at the person who inflicts the harm.

In answer to that hypothetical argument, these three lines of verse are presented.

*22abc. If one is not angry at bile disease and
Other great sources of suffering,
Then why be angry at the ones with mind,*

As an explanation of these lines, the commentary begins with a response to the original hypothetical argument.

Answer: It is unsuitable.

Then the commentary explains the reason:

One does not get angry at bile disease and the like, which are a great source for the suffering of the disturbance of imbalance. Why would one then get angry at a sentient being, i.e. a being with mind?

Basically, when we experience great suffering from diseases such as bile and so forth, we do not consider becoming angry with the disease that is the cause for that suffering. So why then does one find it reasonable to become angry with an individual being who has a mind, and consider them to be the cause of our suffering?

The irrationality of our response is that while we don't become angry with a disease, for example, we find reason to become angry with an individual, when in fact, as we perceive it, both have equally caused us suffering.

Then Gyaltsab Je presents another hypothetical argument:

Argument: Since bile disease and so forth arise without control one does not get angry at them.

In answer to that a counter argument is presented:

Answer: Then it follows it is also unsuitable to be angry at the person ...

Then the following lines from the root text are presented:

*22d. Which are also all induced by conditions.
23. For example, although one does not desire it,
The sickness arises anyway.
Similarly, although one does not desire it,
The afflictions are generated powerfully.*

One needs to relate this to our understanding of interdependence and emptiness. If there is no cause of suffering, then there cannot be a result. So suffering cannot be experienced as an independent result, because the cause lacks independent existence, and is, itself, dependent on causes and conditions. Therefore the results are also interdependent, as they only arise when the causes and conditions are intact.

When one relates this understanding of interdependent origination to the lack of independent existence, then that really contributes to an understanding of how everything is empty of independent existence. We should apply our understanding of interdependence and emptiness to derive a more profound understanding of why it is unsuitable to be angry with an afflicted person. Then one can really make progress.

The commentary concludes with:

... because afflicted beings are ordered around by the condition of their afflictions and hence do not have control of their actions.

For example, similar to this sickness arising against one's wish when the conditions are complete, this person does not desire to be angry, but due to the cause of mental unhappiness and the like, the afflictions arise strongly. Therefore, if one were to get angry, then one should get angry at the afflictions and not at the person.

As presented here, because afflicted beings are ordered around by the condition of the afflictions they do not have control of their actions. Everything is dependent on its own particular causes and conditions. Being under the control of the delusions, beings do not have control over their actions, and are compelled to engage in actions that cause harm. And these delusions are themselves also dependent on many causes and conditions.

So the individual who causes us harm is not really an appropriate object for our anger, because they are not engaging in those harmful actions voluntarily. Rather, they are engaging in harmful actions because they are under the control of the delusions.

As mentioned previously, people engage in harmful actions because their mind is unhappy. When the mind is afflicted by delusions it is not a happy mind. We know from our personal experience that when our mind is affected by any of the delusions it is in a state of turmoil, and it is a troubled, unhappy mind. And, as we have seen, an unhappy mind is the basis for anger.

When one contemplates these points then, rather than finding reason to become angry at the individual causing harm, one feels compassion. That is because they are completely under the control of delusions that are causing them agony and unhappiness, which is the cause of their harmful actions. Therefore they are actually an object of compassion, rather than an object of anger.

Then the commentary goes on to present the analogy that the delusions are similar to this sickness arising against one's wish when the conditions are complete. The analogy is that when all the causes and conditions for sickness are intact, then the inevitable effect is sickness. As presented in other texts, when all the causes and conditions are intact then there is nothing that can avert the consequences. So when all the conditions for sickness are present then the result of illness will definitely be experienced.

When the commentary says, this person does not desire to be angry, but due to the cause of mental unhappiness and the like the afflictions arise strongly, it is indicating that although people don't want to be angry, because they know that is not a desirable state to be in, anger will nevertheless arise when all the causes and conditions, particularly the cause of mental unhappiness and the like, are intact. Because of their unhappiness the afflictions arise strongly, resulting in harmful actions.

So the individual person is not really to blame. Being completely under the control of the delusions, they become angry when the causes and conditions are intact, and are compelled to engage in harmful actions. So the cause of their behaviour is ultimately the afflictions. If one is to become angry, then one should be angry with the afflictions and not the person. This is really the crux of the presentation: if one is to become upset, then it should be with the afflictions themselves, which are harboured within one's own mind.

On a personal level we can understand that just as afflictions cause other people to become angry and create harmful actions, our own afflictions cause us to become upset and angry. 'Just as those who cause me harm are affected by the afflictions, I too am afflicted by the delusions, so that is what I need to target, not the individual person.' By contemplating this point, one develops patience with other people through understanding how they are affected by causes and conditions.

However, we should not be patient with the afflictions themselves because that will only cause us further harm. So one applies measures to completely overcome and destroy the afflictions.

1.2.1.1.2. Anger is not generated volitionally

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section with another hypothetical argument:

Argument: Since the other person thinks 'I shall harm', it is not the same as with the afflictions.

We will be familiar with this hypothetical argument. We might reason that although the afflictions don't have an intention to harm us, the person definitely does. Using that reasoning, one might think it reasonable to become upset with the person.

The next verse presents the means to overcome such doubts:

24. *Although not thinking, 'I should get angry',
Beings become angry naturally.
Although not thinking, 'I shall generate',
Anger generates likewise.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse in the following manner:

Answer: Although the causes do not think 'I shall generate anger', when the conditions are complete then beings generate anger without any choice. Although afflictions do not think 'I shall generate', anger is generated likewise. They do not have any freedom of action.

Otherwise, the first half can be related to the person and the second to the condition of the afflictions.

When anger arises due to causes and conditions, it is not as though the causes themselves think, 'I shall generate anger', and then generate anger. Rather, when the conditions are complete, beings generate anger without any choice. So it is not a voluntary act, where the causes think, 'Now I will cause anger'. Rather, when all the conditions are complete, then, even without a prior intention, one becomes angry. In that very instant, without even thinking about the conditions being intact, anger is generated spontaneously, without any choice.

Although afflictions do not think, 'I shall generate', anger generates likewise, indicates that it is not as if the afflictions themselves are demanding that anger should arise. Rather, the anger just naturally arises when the conditions are intact. Therefore there is no freedom of action.

In saying, Otherwise, the first half can be related to the person and the second to the condition of the afflictions, Gyaltsab Je is indicating how on a practical level we may adopt the understanding that both the person and the afflictions have some role in the generation of anger. This explanation may sound a bit fairer to us.

1.2.1.1.3. Since all faults are dependent on conditions, they lack independence

25. *All the faults that are found,
And the variety of negativities,
They all arise through the force of condition,
They do not have independence.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

All the faults of afflictions that are found, and the variety of negativities that arise from them, also arise through the force of conditions, and do not have independence. Similar to it not being suitable to get angry at water flowing downhill, thinking about these reasons stops anger.

All the faults of afflictions that are found, and the variety of negativities that arise from them, also arise through the force of conditions, and do not have independence, refers to the fact that while we do not wish to be influenced by the afflictions and create negativities, it is as if we have no control over them. When the conditions for the afflictions to arise are intact, then one does not have any control. This is also true for others. By contemplating this reality, particularly in relation to those who inflict harm, we will understand that they are completely under the control of the afflictions, and therefore have no control over their own actions.

The analogy—it is similar to not becoming angry about water flowing downhill—uses an illustration from the reasoning of nature, which is one of the four types of reasonings.¹ One would not become upset and angry about water flowing downhill, because that is its nature. Likewise, when others have the conditions for afflictions to arise, then the natural consequence is that they will engage in harm. Thus we should not become angry with them, but instead blame the afflictions.

¹ There are six different modes of research or investigation, and the sixth is the research of reasoning, which in turn is subdivided into four: 1. The reasoning of dependence, 2. the reasoning of the performance of function, 3. The reasoning of nature 4. The reasoning of valid establishment.

Source: The Dalai Lama at Harvard, Snow Lion publications

1.2.1.1.2. Their causes and conditions are not independent

Here we should take note of the meticulous presentation of the teaching, which is designed to rule out the possibility of any independent existence.

First of all, to overcome any notion that the faults and afflictions are independent, the faults were presented as being dependent on causes and conditions. Thus they lack independence.

One may then wonder whether the causes and conditions themselves are independent. So, to rule out that possibility, this presentation shows that the causes and conditions themselves are also not independent.

In our system, no matter how far you take it back, you cannot come to a point where you can find an entity that is an independent cause for other things to be produced. When other traditions trace the causes back, they come to the point where they have no choice but to accept an independent creator who is the primordial cause of all existence. These views will be presented in the next few verses.

What is being refuted under the heading Anger and the Angry Person Are Not Independent, is that an independent cause can produce other dependent phenomena. This will be presented in more detail later on.

The verse that is presented under this heading reads:

26. The accumulation of conditions also Does not have the thought 'I shall generate'. That generated by them also does not Possess the thought 'Why was I generated?'

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Also the accumulation of conditions that generates the sufferings does not have the thought 'I shall generate these sufferings', and the generated sufferings also do not possess the thought, 'I was generated by them'.

Therefore it is unsuitable to be angry at the other person based on the reason that the other person thinks 'I shall inflict harm'.

The commentary quite clearly explains that it is not as though the accumulated conditions themselves have the voluntary thought, 'I will generate these sufferings'. Nor do the sufferings themselves have the thought, 'I was generated by them'. So therefore, it is unsuitable to be angry at the other person based on the faulty reasoning that the other person thinks 'I shall inflict harm'.

The afflictions themselves, and that which causes anger to arise, are all dependent on many other factors, i.e. the causes and conditions. In other words, they are not generated independently or voluntarily. Therefore one should not find reason to be angry with the person, thinking that they were actually in control, and saying, 'I shall inflict harm'.

1.2.1.2. REFUTING THE EXISTENCE OF INDEPENDENT CAUSES

Here there are three subdivisions.

1.2.1.2.1. Refuting the independent self and primary principle of the Enumerators

1.2.1.2.2. Refuting the independent self of the Logicians

1.2.1.2.3. It is unsuitable to become angry upon understanding all beings to be like an emanation.

1.2.1.2.1. Refuting the independent self and primary principle of the Enumerators

This is further subdivided into:

1.2.1.2.1.1. Refuting the generation of independent expressions by the principle

1.2.1.2.1.2. Refuting that the knowledge-being engages objects independently

The Enumerators are also known as the Samkhya school, which presents five characteristics of the self. We went over this in detail when we studied the Madhyamaka text.² In brief, the Samkhya school assert a permanent, unitary and independent self. They say that because the self is not momentary it is permanent; because the self lacks parts it is unitary; and because the self does not depend on causes and conditions it is independent. However this is all refuted in our system.

Next Tuesday there will be a teaching, the following Tuesday will be the discussion, followed by the exam, and there will be two more teachings in December. Tuesday, December 16, will be the Lama Tsong Khapa puja, which will conclude the sessions for the year.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Judy Mayne

Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

² See teachings of 22 April 2003, and 29 April 2003

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

11 November 2014

As usual let us spend some time in our meditation practice.
[meditation]

We can now set the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines—for the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will engage in the activity of listening to the teachings and put them into practice well.

The key factor of our motivation is the purpose of doing the activity, and the ultimate purpose here is that 'I must benefit other sentient beings'. So one has to put that at the forefront of one's aim in life and engage in virtuous activity for that purpose. Then our life becomes most meaningful.

1.2.1.2.1. Refuting the existence of independent causes

1.2.1.2.1.1. Refuting the generation of independent expressions by the principle

It was explained previously that the Samkhya school assert an independent entity called 'principle', or 'nature'. This is an entity which, while in itself is independent, causes other phenomena to arise from it.

The verses read:

27. *Whatever is accepted as that called principle,
And any imputation that is called self,
They do not arise volitionally, thinking
"I shall arise."*

28ab. *If the non-generated does not exist
How can one then posit generation?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse in the form of a syllogism.

Consider the dual subject—'The primary principle possessing five characteristics, which is an equilibrium of particle, darkness and courage¹, as well as the harms that are contained in its expressions' and 'the self that is imputed on the knowledge person'—it follows it is unsuitable to say that they are generated independently—because this very principle is like the horns of a rabbit that cannot perform actions. It does not arise volitionally thinking, "I shall arise to generate an independent expression" or "an independent experience of the object".

It follows it is unsuitable to assert that at the time of the generation of the result, a result is generated from the principle—because the principle itself is not generated. There is a pervasion because—if oneself is not generated, then one cannot generate a result. There is then a pervasion that one cannot generate a result.

So what is being presented here is the assertion of the primary principle (also known as nature or expression) by the Enumerators (the Samkhya non-Buddhist school), which possesses five characteristics that are the equilibrium of the three qualities: particle, darkness and courage. The five characteristics are:

1. It is the creator of all actions and so forth.
2. Since it is unproduced it is permanent.
3. Being partless it is a single entity
4. As it lacks consciousness it is merely an object.
5. It pervades the entire environment and all beings.

Some other texts present six characteristics, by combining the three qualities of particle, darkness and courage into one, and adding that to the five characteristics.

Some texts present the meaning of particle, or motility, as suffering, darkness as ignorance, and courage or lightness as happiness.

Detailed explanations have been presented numerous times in previous teachings, such as when we studied the Madhyamakavatara text² and also when we studied the ninth chapter of *Bodhisattvacharyavatara*³. It has also come up in the 400 Verses teaching⁴, in Nagarjuna's *Precious Garland*⁵ and of course in Tenets which I have taught twice. So when we come to a topic which presents these subjects it is good for you to refer back to those teachings, where I explained it in detail, as way to refresh your mind, and become more familiar with it. By referring to the texts again and again, eventually it will be implanted into our memory so that we won't forget it. This is what is meant by really putting an effort into understanding the Dharma texts and teachings.

According to Samkhya school, the primary principle possessing the five characteristics, which is equilibrium of the qualities of particle, darkness and courage, as well as all harms contained in its expression, arise independently. We need to reflect on whether this holds true. Is this explanation in accordance with the reality of how things exist? Do things exist independently as an expression of the primary principle? Would it be reasonable to accept that? This is how you need to reflect on their presentation.

The Samkhyas assert that what they call a knowledge-being, or conscious principle, is an independent entity. They consider the primary principle itself (with its five characteristics) as arising independently. They assert this, because they believe that the experiences of suffering and happiness arise independently. Thus, because feelings arise independently, the knowledge-being (or self), who experiences these feelings, also has to be independent. This is their assertion. By understanding this we will know what is being refuted. They believe the knowledge-being or self is a solitary, independent entity, which has only one consciousness, but which functions through the five senses. For example, if there is a person looking out of five different windows in a building, they assert that it is the same consciousness that functions through the five different senses. This is how they assert a single consciousness that functions through the five senses.

The Madhyamakavatara text presents the Samkhya's assertion of a self in this verse:

A self that is a consumer, permanent, not a creator,
Lacking qualities and activity is imputed by the Forders.
In dependence on very slight distinctions of that;
There are the different systems of the Forders.

² See the teachings of 22 April 2003, 29 April 2003, and 18 May 2004.

³ See the teachings 31 May 2005 (which contains a complete list of the twenty-five categories of objects asserted by the Samkhyas, 23 August 2005, and 13 September).

⁴ See the teaching of 9 September 2007.

⁵ See the teaching of 6 July 2010.

¹ Jeffery Hopkins translates these terms as motility, darkness and lightness

So, according to the Folders or the Samkhyas, there are five characteristics of the self:

1. It is a consumer of pleasant and unpleasant objects.
2. It is a functional permanent phenomena.
3. It is not a creator.
4. It lacks qualities.
5. It lacks activity.

When we understand their assertion of the self, and what the five characteristics are, then we can assess whether such a self is reasonable or not. With some slight variations, all the non-Buddhist schools, in general, assert a self as being a single, permanent, and independent entity. It is this self that is being refuted here.

As the commentary explains, the principle itself cannot be generated independently to begin with, as it is non-existent like the horns of a rabbit. So it follows that the result cannot be generated independently. The absurdity, which is highlighted here, is that if the cause itself is not generated, then how can the result be generated? So the syllogism used here refutes the assertion of a primary principle that is the cause of all existence.

What is being refuted here is the manifestation of a primary principle. When that is refuted, then the next step is to refute the knowledge-being (or conscious principle) that experiences objects independently, by showing that this cannot be independently existent either.

1.2.1.2.1.2. Refuting that the knowledge-being engages objects independently

The next two lines of the verse read:

*28cd. Since it would always be distracted by objects
It will also not cease.*

While you have some understanding of the basis of what is being presented here, it is good to know how the actual logic works. Once you understand this, you can then relate it to all other instances using the same line of logic, using syllogisms and so forth. To summarise the sequence: first the generation of independent expression by the principle is refuted, and then the individual being (the conscious principle or knowledge-being), who engages with the objects that they have caused, is refuted.

The commentary explains the meaning of these two lines:

Does the knowledge-person cease when it does not engage objects? It follows it does not because it is accepted to be a permanent functionality and if it is that, then it will always be distracted by objects, because there will be no time when it is not apprehending objects.

This refutation is based on pointing out the absurdity of a knowledge-being with this rhetorical question, Does a knowledge-being cease when it does not engage objects? According to this assertion, the absurdity is that engagement with an object is by a self that is a permanent functionality. As such it would perpetually apprehend objects. A simple example to illustrate this absurdity is that when a self is engaged in, for example, hearing sound, it would be perpetually engaged in apprehending sound. The same would apply for the other four senses: taste, sight, tactile sensations and smell. It would be difficult for the Samkhyas to accept this, as it goes beyond the bounds of obvious reality. So the refutation is based on the absurdity of their assertion.

1.2.1.2.2. Refuting the independent self of the Logicians

This has three subdivisions:

- 1.2.1.2.2.1. It is impossible for something permanent to produce a result
- 1.2.1.2.2.2. It is impossible for such a self to depend on conditions
- 1.2.1.2.2.3. Such a self cannot be related to conditions

The assertions of another non-Buddhist school are being presented here. It is similar to the earlier one, but with slight variations, which is why it is included separately.

1.2.1.2.2.1. It is impossible for something permanent to produce a result

The non-Buddhist Naiyayika school asserts a self that is by nature a permanent entity, but which temporarily becomes impermanent due to certain conditions.

The commentary first presents their assertion:

The Naiyayika assert a self that has form and is a permanent functionality, and they say it creates harm.

The next verse reads:

*29ab. It is clear that if the self is permanent
Then, like space, it cannot act*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary then refutes their assertion:

However, it is very clear that if such a self is a permanent functionality then, similar to non-compounded space, it cannot produce a result.

The commentary presents a refutation that points out the absurdity of their assertion. It is very clear that if such a self is a permanent functionality then, it will be similar to a non-compounded space. This means that like empty space the self is a permanent phenomenon, and so cannot produce anything. Like space, such a self cannot produce a result. This should be clear.

1.2.1.2.2.2. It is impossible for such a self to depend on conditions

Next they say that the self depends on conditions, but it is impossible for such a self to depend on conditions.

First, their argument is presented:

Argument: Although its nature is permanent, if this self meets with conditions then it can produce a result.

The lines that serve as an answer to the assertion read:

*29cd Although conditions meet
How can they affect the unchanging?
30ab. If it is like before during the action
What did the action do to it?*

As an answer the commentary states:

It is impossible for a permanent phenomenon to meet with conditions. Although the conditions of striving and so forth meet with other conditions, how could these conditions affect the self?

What is being highlighted here is that as they have already asserted the nature of the self as permanent, how then could it possibly change when it meets certain conditions? How can conditions affect the self so it can be temporarily impermanent, when its very nature is permanent? The very definition of permanent indicates that it does not change. This again points out the absurdity of the assertion.

The non-Buddhist schools such as the Samkhyas and the Naiyayika (or Logicians) assert a permanent self, based on their acceptance of past and future lives. According to their reasoning the self has to be permanent in order to have come from a past life to this life, and to be able to go from this life to the next life. They think that if the self was impermanent then it could not come from a past life to this, and from this life to the next? So while they accept past lives and future lives, and understand that some effects arise due to the past causes etc., the self, they say, has to be permanent, because if it changes or degenerates, then what would be left to go on to the next life? This is the reason for their assertion that the self is permanent.

We can readily relate to their limited reasoning, because we are not able to see the subtle momentary changes that occur in functional phenomena ourselves. The actual definition of impermanence implies that change occurs from moment to moment, and it is this momentary nature of change that we do not readily perceive. Thus we carry the perception of ourselves as being more or less the same self as yesterday, or the day before, etc.

Actually, the real understanding, and thus the realisation of impermanence, is actually quite difficult to obtain. While selflessness or emptiness are more profound than impermanence, and thus more difficult to realise, it seems that it is easier to understand the meaning of emptiness, rather than the subtle changes that occur from moment to moment. I definitely feel that understanding impermanence in terms of the momentariness of the existence is not easy to grasp. When we talk about impermanence it is usually in relation to the gross impermanence of phenomena, such as when a glass breaks. Because we see it break, we feel the impermanence of the glass is presented. In this way we can perceive and relate to the gross level of impermanence, whereas the actual impermanence of functional phenomena, the change which occurs from moment to moment, is subtle and difficult for us to realise.

While some of the non-Buddhist schools like the Samkhyas and the Naiyayika assert past and future lives, others do not. The self asserted by the non-Buddhist schools who don't believe in past and future lives is a self related to the body, i.e. the physical aggregate. Therefore, when the physical aggregate disintegrates, the self, which is dependent on that, also disintegrates. The analogy they use is that it is like drawings on a wall. When the wall falls down, the drawings that are dependent on the wall also disintegrate, because their very support has disintegrated.

The Christian faith, for example, does not assert past and future lives, or more specifically, reincarnation, but they do accept an individual being, which, in essence, seems to be called the soul, which doesn't disintegrate at the time of death. There is a continuity of the soul, as they present it. So, this is accepted in their religion.

His Holiness compares the Christian soul with what we call the self that goes on from past life to future lives. The common ground here is that both traditions posit a continuity that goes from the past to the future.

It is interesting to note that although there are differences between religions, there are also similarities. For example, when His Holiness speaks to other religions, he relates to them on the basis of commonality. That is something for us to also consider.

2.1.2.2.3. Such a self cannot be related to conditions

The commentary first presents the Naiyayika argument:

Argument: Although the self does not facilitate an action due to its own nature, actions are performed in relation to other factors.

30cd "These are its actions," you say.
How do they become related?

What they are saying is basically that, although the self itself does not facilitate an action by its own nature, it does perform actions in relation to other factors. So, this is what is being refuted here. The commentary presents:

Answer: This is also not valid—because if one says that the action which creates the result of this self is of a different entity, then how does it become related to the self? It could not be related to the self by nature or cause.

The assertion being refuted here is that of a self, which is permanent, but which can perform actions, and produce results in relation to other factors. What the commentary highlights is how these other factors are related to the self. If it is not related to the self by nature, or by cause (i.e. as a cause and effect), then there is no third option, and no other way to relate them. An example of something that is related through nature would be function and impermanence. Wherever there is a function, it is naturally related to impermanence through nature. Everything that functions is by nature also impermanent; so that is the relationship. Whereas the relationship between smoke and fire is that of cause and effect; fire being the cause and smoke the effect. If you assert that there is an independent, permanent self which produces some result, then there would have to be some relationship there. Any relationship has to have a relation either by nature, or by cause and effect. But that is not tenable here.

1.2.1.2.3. Understanding all beings to resemble emanations, anger is unsuitable

We can clearly see that interdependent origination is really the basis of the presentation here.

The verse reads:

31. Thus, everything is other-powered,
Through the power of this they are powerless.
Having understood this, do not become angry
At emanation-like phenomena.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Thus, all actions that produce a result are other-powered, and these conditions are again powered by earlier causes and conditions. Therefore, the result does not have any say in whether it arises or not, and hence is like an illusion or emanation.

When one understands that all functionalities perform actions while being empty of existence from their own side, one does not become angry at these emanation-like functionalities. Therefore one should train in realising the dependent arising that is the lack of existence from its own side, which destroys the seed of the afflictions.

The commentary presents the meaning of this verse. All actions that produce a result are other-powered implies that an action doesn't have control over itself, therefore actions are other-powered, meaning they are dependent on their previous causes and conditions. The point here is that the result does not have any say in whether it arises or not, and hence is like an illusion or emanation.

The commentary further explains that When one understands all functionalities perform actions while being empty of existence from their own side, one does not become angry at these emanations like functionalities. Therefore one should train in realising the dependent arising that is the lack of existence from its own side, which destroys the seed of afflictions.

The crux of the Prasangika view is presented here: that all things lack independent and inherent existence; that things are empty of inherent existence or they do not exist from their own side. If one understands these key points, then one really destroys the seed of the afflictions.

The very definition of illusion, or emanation, is something that is unreal or untrue, like a trick conjured up by a magician, and one should understand that phenomena arise like this, completely empty of existing from their own side. When one incorporates that understanding in one's perception of phenomena, then there is no room for one to become angry, because the very object which appears to exist from its own side as an independent entity harming us, does not actually exist in that way. Therefore there is no room for one to become angry towards it. Basically this is the crux of the explanation.

As I have presented many times before, when strong afflictions such as anger arise, it is because we relate to the object that is causing us harm, as if it were an independent object, completely arising from its own side. This is how it appears to us, so anger arises, and we feel justified in becoming angry. When one trains oneself to see that this appearance is false, that it is beyond reality, that the object one perceives is not inherently and independently existent, then that definitely helps to reduce the afflictions that arise in relation to the object of anger etc. This is hard for us initially, because we are habituated to perceiving things as independent and inherently existent. So overcoming that seemingly natural perception is not an easy task. However, to reduce the intensity of the negativities in one's mind, and eventually overcome the seeds of afflictions, we need to understand these points, and train our mind so that we can gain that realisation.

Having refuted some of the non-Buddhist schools in earlier verses, this verse is refuting the views held by all the Buddhist schools below the Prasangika, which assert inherent existence.

When one understands that all functionalities perform actions while being empty of existence from their own side, one does not become angry at these emanation-like functionalities. Therefore one should train in realising the dependent arising that is the lack of existence from its own side, which destroys the seed of the afflictions

The commentary implies the lack of inherent existence, which is the main point of the Prasangika presentation, and this refutes the earlier Buddhist schools.

1.2.1.3. THE NEED FOR REVERSING ANGER

The verse reads:

32. If it is said: What is supposed to oppose what? Also, opposing is unsuitable. There is nothing unsuitable about asserting That in dependence on that the continuity of suffering is severed.

Argument: If there is not even the slightest particle of inherent existence, then what antidote is supposed to oppose what object of abandonment? Since action and activity are invalid, even the action of opposing is unsuitable.

The argument is presented in the first two lines of the verse: If it is said: What is supposed to oppose what? Also, opposing is unsuitable. Then the counter argument, or answer, is presented in the next two lines There is nothing unsuitable about asserting that in dependence on that the continuity of suffering is severed.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary expands upon the meaning:

There is nothing unsuitable about the lack of inherent existence of the conception that grasps at the two truths as mutually exclusive, and due to which one cannot posit action and activity of something that lacks inherent existence; i.e., there is nothing unsuitable about the lack of inherent existence of the object of abandonment and the antidote.

It follows it is like that—because in dependence on realising the lack of inherent existence of the object of abandonment, and the antidote all afflictions of anger and so forth become extinct and the continuum of suffering is severed.

What is being presented here is the validity of the realisation of the lack of inherent existence. Thus, gaining the understanding that inherent existence is the object of abandonment, and its antidote is the realisation of emptiness, is valid. That is so because by abandoning the grasping at inherent existence, one will overcome all afflictions, as this is the very root of samsara. So when grasping at a truly and inherently existent self is completely abandoned, the consequence of afflictions such as anger and so forth, will also be completely severed. Thus the continuum of one's suffering is completely severed, and samsara will cease.

1.2.2. Summary

33. Therefore, whether it is friend or enemy, If one sees them acting unsuitably, Say 'it came due to those conditions'. Keeping this in mind be firm in happiness.

Under the first verse the commentary explains that:

For those reasons, if one sees someone, whether it is friend or enemy, doing something unsuitable that harms, think "this person has only become like this due to their afflictions. They do not have any freedom". Keeping this in mind, stop anger and make your mental happiness firm by not letting it degenerate. Be patient in such a way.

What is being presented here, in relation to one's practice, is that you will reach a point where, whenever you see someone—be it friend or enemy—engaging in an activity which seems inappropriate or harmful, you will immediately recognise they are doing this only due to the afflictions in their own minds. They do not have control over their own mind, and thus do not have control or real freedom over their actions, because they are dominated by the afflictions. When you hold this in your mind at all times, you will naturally not immediately react with anger. It will stop the anger and you will maintain your mental happiness. Because you are not getting angry, your mental happiness will not degenerate, and will be maintained. This is the way you tolerate harm and engage in the practice of patience. Within the different categories of patience this relates more to the patience of willingly accepting harm and suffering from others.

The main point here is that in order to protect the happiness in one's mind, the practice of patience is indispensable—one cannot do without it. As we all wish to have a happy state of mind—no-one voluntarily wants to have a sad or despondent state of mind—protecting it, by engaging in the practice of patience, becomes essential.

You need to take these points on board, and practise them regularly in your everyday life, particularly with close relations, associates or companions. As you have daily contact with them, you are prone to becoming upset or angry with them. Rather than immediately reacting, you can recognise that they don't have control over what they are doing and saying, because they are under the control of the afflictions, and that they are not in a happy state of mind themselves.

Use your own experience as a basis to understand how others act. When you are affected by the afflictions, and when you get upset and angry, you are not in a happy state of mind. In that sense, rather than taking it personally and retaliating, this approach gives you the distance to not react immediately, and allows your anger to subside.

An analogy I have given previously, demonstrating how those afflicted by afflictions do not have control over their own mind and actions, is when a car bumps your car from behind. When you look back, your immediate reaction might be to become upset with the car behind you. But when you see that the car behind you had no control, because it was pushed by the car behind it, then you realise there is no point getting upset with the car behind you, because they had no control at all about running into you. The afflictions are the one behind you, and they, themselves are also dependent on causes and conditions. If we understand that there is no independent entity that is voluntarily causing us harm, then our reasons for becoming angry will definitely subside.

These illustrations are effective in relation to our mind. Using the car example, we are in the first car, the one in the car behind is the individual that we perceive to be harming us. Whether it is our friend or companion or enemy, the only reason they would harm us is because they themselves are affected by delusions such as anger. Therefore the afflictions are like the third car. Just as we don't blame the person who crashes into us, we cannot blame the person who harms us, because they are affected by their afflictions. Therefore it is the afflictions which we need to overcome. This is how we protect our mind.

These ways of reasoning are supreme methods to protect our own mind so that our happiness does not degenerate. If we react with our normal perceptions and reasoning we will find every reason to become upset and angry in response to those who perpetrate harm. Blaming them only causes our own mind to become agitated and disturbed. When we become angry, the happiness in our mind completely degenerates, and we actually allow the conditions for our own happiness to degenerate, and our mind to become despondent and agitated etc. So the optimum protection is using these methods and reasoning as the way to actually protect oneself from harm.

Some make comments like, 'I could not give up the Buddhist principles or path because it is based on reasoning that gives me the freedom to use my own intelligence and reasoning. Why would I want to give up that? It gives me the freedom to rule my own life with reasoning and logic, rather than being completely dominated by others. Why would I want to give that up? I could never give it up.' These are actually very good points.

As you are aware, the next session is the discussion night. I have confidence that you will do the discussions well. Keep in mind that what is being discussed is a form of revision to make the topics we have covered a little clearer. Doing the exam fulfils the same purpose. Studying serves the purpose of revision, and discussion needs to be done with the same approach.

If one sees someone, be it friend or enemy, acting in an unsuitable way, think along the lines of the points of the teaching tonight. Who could disagree with them? No-one in a rational state of mind would disagree that practising in this way is beneficial.

One needs to understand from these presentations that the very reason that one is applying these protective measures is because not doing so is uncomfortable. We do not like to experience harm and we find ways to prevent ourselves from being affected by it. If it is our experience that the harms, inappropriate gestures etc. inflicted by others are uncomfortable, then we need to find the ways and means to protect ourselves. Applying these principles will do that. As much as they protect oneself from the harms of others, they are also a means of protecting oneself from harming others. That is how we need to understand it. These are really profound ways to understand the main points being presented here.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Su Lan Foo

Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

2 December 2014

As usual let us spend some time in our meditation practice.

[Meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching, and put it into practice well.

1.2. Meditating on the patience that definitely relies on the Dharma

1.2.2. Summary (cont.)

The second verse of the summary reads:

34. *In case they acted independently,
Since nobody desires suffering,
None of all the embodied beings,
Would receive any suffering.*

Some other commentaries place this verse under the next heading, Meditating on the Patience That Does Not Think Anything of Harm. This commentary relates it to the summary of the section, Meditating on the Patience That Definitely Relies Upon the Dharma.

Gyalsab Je's commentary on the verse explains:

If the result would be independently created out of their own wish, without the power of other conditions then, since not one sentient being desires suffering, none of all the embodied beings should have any suffering. Since we see that they receive suffering, and they do not have freedom, it is unsuitable to be angry at them. The mental afflictions are behind them.

What is being emphasised here is that results are not independently created. If suffering were to be created independently out of one's own wish or accord, then, since no beings would ever want to experience any suffering, they would not voluntarily or independently create that suffering for themselves.

If suffering were to be generated independently then, since no being would want to experience suffering, suffering would not be generated. However we all know that beings do experience suffering and that they do not have any control over that suffering. Thus it is unsuitable to be angry with them for their reaction to that suffering. The mental afflictions are behind them indicates that the cause of their suffering is the mental afflictions, and that is what has to be targeted, not the beings themselves.

1.3. Meditating on the patience that does not think anything of harm

This is subdivided into three:

1.3.1. Bringing to mind the method of compassion

1.3.2. Stopping the cause of anger

1.3.3. Considering it one's own fault if something undesired is received

1.3.1. Bringing to mind the method of compassion

This has three further sub-divisions:

1.3.1.1. Some harm themselves out of ignorance

1.3.1.2. If they commit suicide due to ignorance, it is no great surprise that they harm others

1.3.1.3. It is suitable to be compassionate with that person

1.3.1.1. SOME HARM THEMSELVES OUT OF IGNORANCE

Out of ignorance, some sentient beings actually harm themselves. Thinking about that should be a cause to generate compassion for them.

If we experience harm from others, then we need to remember that the harm is done out of ignorance. In fact, out of ignorance others cause harm to themselves. So if they are capable of harming themselves out of ignorance, then there is no question that they would harm others. Thinking about this factor gives reason not to react out of anger when others cause one harm.

The first verse under this heading is:

35. *The reckless harm themselves
With thorns and so forth.
In order to attain women and so forth.
They become obsessed and starve themselves
and so forth.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

These people that harm others through the power of the afflictions and a lack of conscientiousness also harm themselves. To attain liberation they roll on thorns, or jump from great heights. Some become obsessed with attaining wealth and women, and out of anger starve themselves and so forth.

As clearly explained in the commentary, those who harm others through the power of the afflictions and a lack of conscientiousness, also harm themselves. Thus, due to a lack of conscientiousness and the influence of the afflictions some people not only harm others, but they also harm themselves.

Furthermore, with their intention to be free from suffering, gain happiness and attain liberation, they are misled about the appropriate methods to reach liberation. They engage in actions such as walking on thorns, or jumping from a high cliff, and harm themselves, under the illusion that they are creating the cause of happiness, and freedom from suffering.

Others become obsessed with attaining wealth and women and out of anger starve themselves and so forth. We have all seen how some people become enraged, and even starve themselves to attain wealth, or for the sake of obtaining women and so forth. This is the extent of the harm that people are capable of inflicting upon themselves, due to the afflictions and a lack of conscientiousness.

What we can learn from this on a personal level is how incredibly fortunate we are in having obtained unmistakable methods for attaining liberation. There are so many who, in their quest for liberation, are presented with and follow incorrect or erroneous methods. This presentation of how some people harm themselves due to the afflictions, and an incorrect understanding, indirectly shows us how extremely fortunate we are to have been presented with unmistakable methods. Thus we need to really cherish these unmistakable methods, acknowledge them and put them into practice.

The next verse under this heading is:

36. *Some are obstructed and jump from heights,
Eat poison and other unbecoming things;
With unmeritorious actions
They harm themselves.*

These unthinkable things actually do happen—we see so much harm arising from drastic actions done out of ignorance. So we really need to be cautious and wary of the afflictions.

As Gyaltsab Je states in his commentary:

Some are obstructed by the afflictions and jump from great heights, eat poison and other disagreeable things. Through non-meritorious negative actions that are the cause for the lower realms they harm themselves in this and in future lives. How can it be appropriate to be angry when one is harmed by others?

Here, obstruction indicates an obstruction to one's life. Due to being weighed down by great suffering, and a longing to be free from that suffering, there are those who, out of ignorance, take their own life by hanging themselves, or, as mentioned here, by jumping off a cliff or bridges. Others take poison and other harmful substances and they do this out of ignorance, with the intention of ending their suffering. They want to be free from their suffering but because they don't have the correct method they have no choice but to resort to such actions.

These, as mentioned earlier, are everyday occurrences. So we can see the relevance of Shantideva's presentation even in our modern times: we see so many ignorant people taking drastic measures, thinking that they can free themselves from suffering.

Many ignorant beings, which includes ourselves, regularly create non-meritorious negative actions that are the cause for the lower realms. With the intention to either gain some happiness or remove some suffering we regularly engage in non-virtuous actions, such as the ten non-virtuous actions of killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, and so forth. I have mentioned previously that there are some who feel uncomfortable when they don't have an opportunity to create negativity, and glad when they have an opportunity to create some negativity. So you can see I was not making this up—this is indeed exactly what Shantideva is presenting here. We willingly create so many negativities, which are actually the cause for rebirth in the lower realms.

So if there are those who create harm for themselves in this and future lives, then how can it be appropriate to be angry when one is harmed by others? This rhetorical question implies that it is inappropriate to be angry with those who are constantly engaged in harming themselves in this and future lives. Rather than anger, one should develop compassion for them.

So the main emphasis here is that those who act in this way are an object of our compassion rather than anger.

This, in essence, is the meaning of the heading, Bringing to Mind the Method for Compassion.

1.3.1.2. IF THEY COMMIT SUICIDE DUE TO IGNORANCE, IT IS NO GREAT SURPRISE THAT THEY HARM OTHERS

This heading emphasises the point that if, out of ignorance and other afflictions, people can take their own life—one's most cherished and prized possession—then it is no great surprise that they would harm others. The verse under this heading reads:

37. *When under the control of the afflictions
Suffering sentient beings even kill themselves.
How could it be that at such time
They do not harm the body of others?*

We need to see how the practices, such as patience, that are being presented in this text and others are the profound practices of the great noble beings, the bodhisattvas. First of all, we need to see how profound these presentations are. Secondly, we need to recognise that the methods and means to actually practice are really profound. Thirdly, we can also acknowledge the fact that those who actually engaged in these practices, the bodhisattvas, are indeed great noble beings. Then a deep sense of veneration and genuine respect and admiration for bodhisattvas will arise. This is how we need to relate to the advice being presented here.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

When one falls under the control of the afflictions one will suffer at heart, and be despondent and even kill oneself. At this time, how could it come that one does not harm the body of other sentient beings? By thinking that it is impossible not to be harmed it is unsuitable to get angry.

What is clearly explained in the commentary is that any being who falls under the control of the afflictions will experience much mental agony. Then they become despondent, feeling completely hopeless and worthless. Under such circumstances some people will not hesitate to take their own life, and thus destroy their most prized possession. So if, under the influence and dominance of the afflictions, an individual is capable of taking such drastic measures as taking their own life, then it is no wonder that they are capable of harming others.

In the commentary this is presented as a rhetorical question, At this time, how could it come that one does not harm the body of other sentient beings?, which indicates that harming others is more likely, as it is a much easier task. Therefore by thinking that it is impossible not to be harmed, it is unsuitable to get angry.

By contemplating this point one understands how beings who become angry and harm themselves are an object of compassion rather than scorn.

1.3.1.3. IT IS SUITABLE TO BE COMPASSIONATE WITH THAT PERSON

Because of the examples given earlier, it is suitable to be compassionate towards such beings. This is the point where the emphasis is placed on those who engage in harming themselves. These of course are very important points, and this is an unmistakable presentation of how to engage in these practices. When we reflect on what we hear and study, we need to try to implement it as much as possible in our lives. If we just leave it to a mere act of listening out of curiosity, then while there might be some benefit in hearing these sacred words, our minds are not likely to change much. If we don't actually put it into practice, it won't have the benefit of transforming our mind.

We are, of course, under the influence of the afflictions, but if we take this advice to heart and try, at the very least, to aspire to these practices by emulating them, then it will definitely help to transform our minds. Even though anger still arises, we won't be completely dominated or influenced by it. The intensity of anger can definitely be reduced; this is how we begin to become a genuinely gentler and calmer person.

That transformation will definitely happen when we try to implement these points into our practice. On the next occasion when someone harms us, or wrongly accuses us, then instead of immediately reacting with anger and finding every reason to justify being angry with them, if we can just remember the points that Shantideva presents here, then it is most likely that we can protect our mind. Rather than becoming angry with this person, it is possible to develop some compassion for them.

The verse relating to this heading is:

38. *Even if one cannot generate compassion
For those that, due to generation of afflictions,
Commit suicide and so forth,
Why should anger have the last word?*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on this verse is not too obscure for us to understand.

It is suitable to practise compassion towards such a person that, upon having generated afflictions, harms others as explained above and even kills themselves. Even if compassion is not generated then how can anger be the final word? It is extremely unsuitable to get angry.

The main emphasis is that when one sees the condition of others, who upon having generated afflictions harm others, and even kill themselves, it is suitable to practise compassion for such individuals.

Even if one is not able to generate great compassion for them, then, at the very least how can anger be the final word? In response to this rhetorical question, the final point presented here is that it is extremely unsuitable to become angry with such individual beings who are driven by afflictions.

1.3.2. Stopping the Cause of Anger

This heading is sub-divided into three:

1.3.2.1. If childishness is their nature, then anger is unsuitable

1.3.2.2. Although the fault of harming is adventitious, anger is unsuitable

1.3.2.3. Anger is unsuitable when the direct causes are analysed

Of course the term childishness is not to be taken literally. It is a translation of a Tibetan word meaning 'like a child'. It refers to ordinary beings, as opposed to the supreme beings, the bodhisattvas.

In another text there is an indication of how, just as it is extremely difficult for a child to see a hair in the palm of the hand, all pervasive suffering is extremely profound and hard to comprehend. This is an analogy illustrating the meaning of the term meaning 'like a child'.

1.3.2.1. IF CHILDISHNESS IS THEIR NATURE, THEN ANGER IS UNSUITABLE

The verse under this heading is:

39. *In case harming others
Is the nature of the childish,
It is as unsuitable to be angry at them
As it is to be resentful at the burning nature of fire.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

If harming others is in the nature of the childish, who do not know what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned, and, then it is unsuitable to be angry at them; just as it is unsuitable to be resentful and angry at fire for being in the nature of burning.

There are two aspects to if harming others is the nature of the childish who do not know what has to be practised, and what has to be abandoned. The first aspect is not knowing what has to be practised, and what has to be abandoned. The second is that one might know what has to be abandoned and what has to be adopted but, through being overwhelmed by the afflictions, one does not engage in this practice.

Not knowing what is to be practised and what is to be abandoned may be excusable if someone has not had that explained to them, and so they have no understanding. However, some people receive the teachings, and have a clear understanding of what has to be abandoned and what has to be practised, but they are still so strongly dominated by the afflictions that they are not able to actually engage in the practices. Most of us fit into that category!

These are the shortcomings of the childish, or ordinary beings. So it is unsuitable to become angry with them, because they either don't know what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded, or because they are so overwhelmed with strong afflictions they are not able to engage in the practices of adopting what is to be adopted, and abandoning what is to be abandoned. Thus, because they have no control over their own minds, it is unsuitable to be angry with them.

The analogy that is used here is that it is unsuitable to be resentful and angry at fire for being in the nature of burning. The very nature of fire is that it burns. So being resentful or angry with fire because it has the nature of burning, is pointless. Just as it is silly to be resentful and angry with fire because it has the nature of burning, likewise it is unsuitable to be angry with the childish, who either don't know, or are completely overwhelmed by the afflictions. It is because of their nature that they harm themselves and others, so it is unsuitable to retaliate, or be angry with them.

1.3.2.2. ALTHOUGH THE FAULT OF HARMING IS ADVENTITIOUS, ANGER IS UNSUITABLE

The verse under this heading reads:

40. *Then, even if this fault is temporary
And the nature of sentient beings is wholesome,
It is still not suitable to become angry,
Like being resentful that smoke rises in space.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Even if the fault of harming others arises adventitiously and the nature of the mind of sentient beings is wholesome and gentle, it is still unsuitable to become angry at the harmer, because that would be as unsuitable as being resentful at space for letting smoke to arise.

The nature of the mind of sentient beings is wholesome and gentle, and thus the act of harming others arises only adventitiously. This means that harming others occurs only occasionally, when the all the adverse conditions are intact. As mentioned here, it is unsuitable to become angry with the harmer, just as it is unsuitable to be angry with space for letting smoke arise. Other commentaries use the example of clouds developing. If we desire a sunny clear sky, it would be pointless being resentful about any temporary obstruction such as clouds or smoke. In fact being resentful about the sky allowing smoke or clouds to arise would be quite silly.

1.3.2.3. ANGER IS UNSUITABLE WHEN THE DIRECT CAUSES ARE ANALYSED

The verse presented under this heading is often quoted in the teachings. Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with an argument:

Argument: It is suitable to get angry as the other person is harming me.

41. *Though I am contacted directly by the stick,
If I am getting angry at the wielder,
Since they are induced by hatred,
I should get angry at hatred instead.*

Then Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of the verse:

Answer: If I were to get angry at that which directly harms me then, since I am directly touched by the stick, weapon and so forth, and thus harmed by them, it would be suitable to get angry at them. Then, since they are not doing this independently, but are wielded by a person, if one were to get angry at the wielder, they are also without independence due to hatred. Instead of getting angry at these two I should get angry at hatred.

If we were to reason that we should be angry at what directly harms us, then we should be angry with the stick, or weapon, that actually makes contact with us. However common sense tells us that even though the stick caused us the direct pain, it would not be able to hurt us by itself, because it has to be wielded by someone. Therefore, even though it makes direct contact with us, it is not really the stick that causes the pain. Rather, the real cause is the wielder of the stick, so therefore one has reason to become upset and angry with that person.

In other words the stick is not hitting us independently, but is wielded by a person, so it is pointless being angry with the stick. The logic being presented here is that the wielder of the stick is also without independence, and is controlled by hatred.

If one is able to use logic and the common sense reasoning of not becoming upset at the stick because it is not independently hurting us, then that same line of logic also applies to the wielder of the stick, because they are, in turn, controlled by the afflictions. They are not acting independently as they are controlled by the afflictions.

So the conclusion is that instead of becoming angry at these two—the stick and the person—one should instead become angry at hatred, or the afflictions.

We can use this meticulous line of reasoning to further develop our own ability to use reasoning and logic to make the right decisions, followed by the correct means of engaging in whatever activity we do. We need to take, from the logic presented here, the proper way of conducting ourselves in all activities that we engage in. If one were to really contemplate these points, one can see that they give us a lot of room to use profound reasoning and logic in daily life. If one does not think much about them, then of course one will not really see their value.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcribed by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་ལ་འཇམ་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

9 December 2014

As usual we will spend some time in meditation.

[meditation]

The tong len practice is a profound practice that can really assist us if we actually implement it. With respect to the taking part of the practice, we may not see the relevance of taking the suffering of others upon ourselves at first, and so the benefit of that part of the practice may not be immediately evident. However there is an obvious direct benefit in the giving part of the practice, as it is the immediate cause for the generation of love and compassion. Once love and compassion has been generated within one's heart then one will naturally and spontaneously act to benefit other sentient beings. So we can easily relate to the benefits of the giving part of the practice.

When one wishes for others to be endowed with happiness and to be free from suffering, and has the determination to bring about their happiness and free them from suffering, then that can definitely lead one to act in ways to bring about happiness for others, and help to remove their suffering.

The meditation and mental training that we do now will be transformed into actions that benefit others. Those who are deprived of happiness definitely wish for happiness, and those who experience suffering definitely want to be free from suffering. So if we help them to achieve this, we are benefitting others in a very practical way. So we can see that this practice is really the essence of the Buddha's teaching.

When we generate these two most precious states of mind—love and compassion—then we are naturally inclined to benefit other sentient beings. As the second Dalai Lama, Gedun Gyatso mentioned, when one generates the mind of compassion, then that instils the wish to benefit other sentient beings. Thus, a mind of love and compassion is a most valuable and supreme state of mind, which serves as a basis for benefiting sentient beings.

A mind of genuine, unconditional love and compassion that is devoid of self-cherishing and attachment, which is accompanied with the sole intention of benefiting others, is indeed a most supreme state of mind. The more we familiarise ourselves with generating love and compassion, the more we will develop that genuine feeling within ourselves, and the kinder and gentler our mind will become. This is the practical benefit of the tong len practice.

The practice of giving encompasses giving one's body, possessions and root of virtue. It involves initially training the mind in selflessly giving one's body, possessions and root virtues to others. As indicated in the teachings, having trained our mind, we then need to actually practise giving to others, as way of directly benefiting sentient beings.

As the teachings explain, mind-training needs to be followed by actual practice. The way to measure our progress in this practice is to check whether our mind of giving has in fact increased. We do this practice in a form of meditation. However, reciting a prayer, and sitting for a few minutes with closed eyes is not sufficient, if it doesn't actually transform our mind into the mind of giving. When we can see that our mind of giving has actually increased and become more natural, then that is a true mark of progress, and a positive transformation.

The teachings indicate that we need to give away our body as well as our possessions and root virtues. Now, we may have not reached the point where we are readily able to give our body parts, which of course is the practice of the great bodhisattvas. However, by training our mind in giving our body in thought, we are familiarising ourselves with the practice, thus drawing closer to being able to actually give our bodies.

Practice needs to be manageable and practical, so that means engaging in practices that are in accordance with our ability. What we need to really contemplate is minimising the mind of wishing harm upon others. The true mark of progress is when the mind wishing harm upon others is reduced, and the mind of wishing to benefit others is increased.

As advised further, one needs to immediately regard any sentient being one happens to meet as being as kind as one's mother and remember that, 'They are the supreme field of my merit, because by relying on sentient beings I will be able to accomplish all the necessary conditions (such as accumulating merit and wisdom) for achieving enlightenment. Therefore this being is really precious to me. If I endeavour to please this sentient being then that will be the equivalent to pleasing all the buddhas and bodhisattvas'. That is how we need to relate to other sentient beings.

As Shantideva mentions

*When looking at sentient beings say,
"In dependence on this very sentient being
I will become a buddha",
And look at them honestly and lovingly.*

So we need to see any sentient being we encounter as being the cause for our enlightenment. In addition to reciting that verse and remembering its meaning, one also needs to put it into practice. We need to be able to look at any sentient being, and think, 'This sentient being is the cause for me to become enlightened', and hold that being with the mind of compassion.

Memorising a verse such as this and then reciting is a way to train the mind. As the teachings indicate, one needs to first train with words. So when we do the tong len practice we begin by reciting this verse from the Guru Puja:

And thus, O Venerable Compassionate Gurus, we seek your blessings,
That all karmic debts, obstacles and sufferings of
Mother beings,
May without exception ripen upon us right now,

And that we may give our happiness and virtue to others

And thereby invest all beings in bliss.

That recitation helps to instil the actual meaning of the practice into one's mind. That is why the teachings advise us to first train in the words, which means memorising those words and then, whilst reciting them, bringing the meaning of the words to mind.

In summary, the essential advice is to practise to the extent that one is capable. This eliminates excuses about not engaging in practices because one doesn't know enough, and so forth. In fact, as some teachers have advised, we are not deprived of the knowledge of how to practice, but we are deprived of the actual effort to put in the practice. So, beginning with the basics, we need to actually apply whatever we have learnt.

Essentially, this means integrating the practices into your minds. If we think of practices as being exterior practices, and live our life in a manner that is not in accord with the teachings, then that is where we will fall short of any true transformation. We need to integrate our practises into our minds so that we always carry them with us, in whatever we do.

When they hear such advice, anyone who is keen to put the Dharma into practice will say to themselves, 'Yes, this is meant for me. This is what I need to be doing'. But when someone who is not too keen on practice hears such advice they will think, 'Oh yes, I have heard that before. I already know that' and thus fall short in implementing the advice. They have reached a dangerous point where they have this false assumption that they know all that they hear, and they don't relate it to themselves. There is a particular term in Tibetan, cho drep, sometimes translated as immune to the Dharma, which is derived from the fact that no matter how long you boil some vegetables, they never really cook well. This sort of analogy is used to describe someone who hears advice and instructions in the teachings, but keeps thinking, 'Oh yes, I have heard that before. It doesn't relate to me, because I already know it'. If that is their attitude then how could the advice in the Dharma ever help them to transform their own mind? The Dharma only transforms the mind if one takes it to heart, and practises what one hears.

Another example of how we might relate something in the teachings to some external factor is the teaching on impermanence, which is an essential teaching for helping to transform the mind. If, for example, a glass breaks and one has heard the teaching on impermanence and how things are transitory and change moment by moment, then one might think, 'Oh yes, of course. This is an example of impermanence'. However, that does not actually instil any sort of personal realisation of how one is also impermanent and changing from moment to moment. In particular, one's own life is also fragile and changing moment by moment. If one is able to relate the glass breaking to oneself in that way, then one has then taken the teaching on impermanence as a personal instruction, and used the external event as an impetus to practise the Dharma.

For those who are keen to practise, witnessing someone's death will also be a very strong impetus to remind themselves of the fragility of their own life, and the need to practise before the moment of death arises. So we can see the difference it makes, when an instruction is applied on a personal level and put into practice.

Coming back to the main point, the practice of love and compassion is essential. We might not be able to generate the bodhicitta attitude right now, but we do have access to its base which is love and compassion. So it is just a matter of actually contemplating and putting effort into generating those states of mind. That is something we definitely can do, and generating the thought of love and compassion to the best of our ability, and meditating on that, is essential for our practice.

When we are able to generate the thought of love and compassion to a certain extent, then it becomes easier to actually move to the next step of developing the special intention in which one takes on the personal responsibility of benefiting sentient beings. One thinks, 'It is not sufficient to merely wish other beings to be free from suffering and endowed with happiness. I need to take responsibility for doing that myself. I need to take on the responsibility of freeing all beings from every type of suffering, and leading them to the state of ultimate happiness'. When we take personal responsibility in this way, then our minds become a much more fertile ground for the development of actual bodhicitta.

After having developed the special intention, we realise, 'Even though I wholeheartedly want to take on the responsibility of freeing all beings from suffering, and leading them to the ultimate state of happiness, the reality is that I don't have that ability right now'. So one contemplates, 'Who has that ability? How can I possibly achieve this ability myself?' That is when one contemplates reaching the state of enlightenment, and how it is a perfected state, where one is free from all adversity and has developed all qualities. At this point one thinks, 'When I have achieved that state of enlightenment, then I will have the capacity and ability to free all beings from suffering, and lead them to happiness'. It is at that point one has generated a very firm foundation for generating bodhicitta.

Over the past year we have been studying Shantideva's precious text together. Studying this text and making the effort together makes us real Dharma friends. From the teacher's side, I have tried my best in presenting it, and from your side, you have placed all of your attention on listening to the teachings, and trying to study them. We have made that joint effort to study this profound text by Shantideva, which presents the unmistakable methods of generating bodhicitta and then practising the six perfections. So we can all rejoice in our joint efforts.

As a result we have definitely accumulated a great amount of root virtue. So we need to secure and increase it so that it does not go to waste. Thus we rejoice in and dedicate that virtue, which is a supreme practice.

One of the greatest prayers of aspiration that is a means to dedicate one's virtues is the King of Prayers. As we did last year, we will recite it again, not only as a supreme means to rejoice and dedicate for our own virtues, but also as a means to dedicate that virtue to those who are connected to the Centre who are unwell, and those who have passed away. Because of the connection we have with them, and the connection that they have with the Centre, our practice will definitely benefit them as well. So this is not just a personal practice

Of course, as you recite it in English, I will have to recite it in Tibetan. However I don't necessarily feel left out, as I'm happy and proud to be reciting the text in Tibetan! Tibetan is now being accepted as being one of the most supreme languages for the study of the Dharma. Leaving aside the contents of the texts such as Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara, the language is incredibly rich with lots of deeper meanings in the words. It would be quite difficult to find any other language, even in other Buddhist countries, which presents the teachings so profoundly.

Only in Tibetan will you find all of the Buddha's doctrine intact. Many works were translated into Chinese, but a lot of them have been since destroyed. There are some Japanese translations, but I have heard that you need to know Chinese characters to be able to read them. So Tibetan is one of the rare languages that has kept all of the Buddha's doctrine intact. That is why I can claim Tibetan to be supreme. I value the language and don't wish to forget it.

Given that Buddha's teachings are preserved in the Tibetan language, it seems quite reasonable to think that being reborn as a Tibetan might be a reasonable aspiration.

There are now many Buddhist scholars in America and other countries who only became renowned after they learned Tibetan and studied the texts directly in the Tibetan language. Glen Mullin once told me that every big university in America has one student of late Geshe Ngawang Dhargye as a staff member, which has to imply that he was a great teacher. I have heard that Glen is a very learned man himself, with a very intelligent mind. I gather that he has translated many texts and also written the history of all the previous Dalai Lamas.

Glen presented me some of these translated works himself, and told me that the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargye had advised him that it will be good for him to engage in the Dharma activity of translation and so forth. But in order to do that, he advised that it would be good, not just to learn Tibetan, but to also have some understanding in the debate system. That is why Glen was advised to go to the Institute of Buddhist Dialectics in Dharamsala, where he studied for a while.

Apparently Glen indulged in a care-free hippie lifestyle in his youth. However, he developed a connection with Gen Rinpoche, Geshe Ngawang Dhargye. He would visit Geshe-la in the evening, and Geshe-la would reprimand him about his ways. Then slowly, slowly he began to transform himself to the point where he really got into the Dharma, and became a good scholar.

Before reciting The King of Prayers, generate a bodhicitta motivation that is based on the intention:

For the sake of all sentient beings, and to lead them to the ultimate state of happiness and free them from all suffering, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will recite this prayer, and dedicate it to that purpose.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

*Shantideva's
Bodhisattvacharyavatara*

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡེད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by Ven. Michael Lobsang Yeshe

2015 Notes

Tara Institute
3 Mavis Avenue
East Brighton VIC 3187
Tel: (03) 9586 8900

A branch of FPMT, the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition, a network of Buddhist Centres in Australia and worldwide.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

17 February 2015

As usual we can spend some time in meditation. For this we use the motivation that we generated in the refuge and bodhicitta prayer.

[meditation]

Today, we meet again to begin our study program for the year.

All of you will probably be aware of the discipline that is an integral part of the study group program, so I don't need to go into detail about that. It would, however, be good for the senior students to explain the commitments to any new students.

For the senior students it's good to remember these commitments. Just listing them is not sufficient—we have to actually put them into practice. For example, last year when we did our recitation of Shantideva's text, there were many who did not attend on the day, so I have to assume that you did that recitation at home.

One can be aware that these commitments are virtuous in nature, but if one fails to engage in that commitment then one should be able to recognise that as being a personal fault, and that something is missing. Not meeting that commitment indicates that one is not practising what one knows intellectually. This also applies in daily life.

This also brings to light the situation where people can relate to others by grandly talking about practice, and the points of Buddhism, but when it comes to themselves they fail to put it into practice. Personally, I find that discrepancy a bit strange. This discrepancy between relating the teaching to others, but not putting it into practice oneself, really comes down to not paying much attention to cultivating a true sense of love and compassion within one's heart. The giving and taking meditation practice that we did earlier is a practice that instils and further establishes this love and compassion within oneself.

If one actually lacks a true sense of love and compassion, or even just a keen wish to develop love and compassion, then all sorts of faults begin to affect the rest of our practice, and it will not be very effective at all. This is something we really need to pay attention to; ultimately the very basis of our practice is love and compassion, so that should be our primary focus.

If we are preoccupied with self interest, and always thinking about our own needs or agendas or interests, then that is where we fall short of putting the Dharma into practice. If we really think about it, is there any benefit in always focussing on oneself and one's own interest? Does it actually benefit one? Does it really help? Personally I don't find it helpful at all. I find that rather than benefitting oneself it is actually harmful to one's development.

Thinking only of one's own interests makes it very difficult to associate with others, because it becomes very hard to really relate to them. Whereas when one's mind is imbued with genuinely thinking about others and their welfare, it is much easier to relate to others. That is something which I'm sure you would have experienced for yourselves.

The main point that I'm emphasising here is the importance of really taking to heart the practice of cultivating love and compassion. We attempt to meditate on love and compassion at the beginning of each session, and the purpose of that is to help to really transform our minds. When we look back, has our practice of meditating on love and compassion over the past year brought about a significant change in us or not?

If we find there has been no change in our attitude and state of mind, then we need to acknowledge that the fault lies within ourselves and is not a fault of the practice. That is because we have not actually implemented that practice into our lives. If we see that there has been an improvement, then that is a good sign. Whatever we have practised in the last year should develop a little bit further this year; that is how we make progress in our practice.

That's also true for any normal mundane activity. Whatever we do in daily life should follow exactly the same procedure of using the experience one has gained in the previous year as a base on which to improve that activity in the new year.

With our progress in the practice of Dharma, if we have found that our mind has not improved over the previous year and that there is no improvement taking place this year, then we need recognise that as our fault, and not the fault of the Dharma. This is how we need to gauge our progress, by looking into where the fault really lies. The Buddha gave us the very clear analogy of how the doctor prescribes a treatment such as medication and so forth, but if the patient doesn't take the medication, they cannot hope to be cured. Blaming the doctor is completely baseless. It's not the fault of the doctor, it's not the fault of the medication or the treatment either; if the patient has not taken the medication, then the fault lies there. This illustration shows us how to engage in the practice of Dharma.

Rather than finding fault and always blaming others, our preoccupation needs to be with our own state of mind. I don't approve of those who always talk about the mistakes of others and pick on their faults, but never seem to take much initiative in improving themselves. When I encounter people who constantly complain and talk about the faults of others, that indicates to me that there is a lack of love and compassion in their heart.

We have all seen that there are some people, who, as soon as there is some sort of social engagement or meeting, quite readily talk about others' faults and so forth. I don't approve of that. Rather, one should be checking one's own state of mind, looking at one's own faults, and trying to improve on that. It's a matter of trying to work on one's own mind, rather than finding fault with others.

This is the real purpose of meditating on love and compassion. The tong-len practice that we do at the beginning of every session is said to be one of the best practices to develop love and compassion, and for a bodhisattva it is one of the greatest practices. We may not have actually cultivated genuine bodhicitta yet, and our practice of tong-len, or giving and taking, may not yet be a fully-formed practice. Nevertheless, even that contrived bodhicitta attitude, that similitude of the bodhicitta motivation that we base on the refuge prayer, is the basis of a sense of real purpose and deeper meaning. At our level that is what we base our practice on, and then we gradually improve on that. We really need to keep the essentials of the practice in our mind.

It is because of our acquaintance over many years, and with a sense of genuine care and love and compassion for you, that I say all of this to you. From the very beginning my commitment to remain and teach here has always been with the intention that sharing the Dharma with you will actually benefit your mind. Essentially the whole purpose of the Dharma is ultimately to help to transform one's mind.

As the great masters have repeatedly emphasised, we can gauge the effectiveness of our meditation practice when we see a decrease in the delusions in our minds. When one notices that there is a decrease in these delusions, then that is a true mark of the meditation practice and the Dharma practice having had a positive effect. This instruction indicates to us that we can gauge our progress in our practice for ourselves. We practise Dharma meditation so that the delusions decrease, so we can check for ourselves whether that is happening or not.

In fact, when we repeatedly look into the real cause of problems in our life we find that it is the unsubdued mind that is the cause of all our mental turmoil. We need to see that the ultimate purpose of our practice is to ensure that it actually hits the mark of reducing the real troublemaker in our mind, which is the delusions. That is the ultimate purpose.

You are not just interested in the Dharma, but you are also keen in practising the Dharma, therefore I consider you to be practitioners. I want to reassure you that the purpose of the practice of Dharma is to weaken the delusions in the mind. I want to remind you that when you see delusions such as attachment and anger and pride reducing, or when you see less competitiveness arising out of jealousy, then you will understand that it has been your practice that has been the means to serve that purpose. This is how we need to see the value of the Dharma.

We all wish to achieve and strive to have a positive, kind and happy mind. Conversely, none of us wishes to experience an unhappy state of mind. What I'm reminding you of here is the causes that will bring about a more positive, kinder and happier state of mind, and what will reduce unhappiness. When we really look into why we experience unhappy states of mind then we will find that the causes don't lie outside, and that the ultimate cause of an unhappy mind lies within.

Specifically, it is the delusions that cause unhappy states of mind. We need to be able to recognise that the more we apply the antidotes for overcoming negative states of mind (such as anger, jealousy, pride and so forth), the more our mind becomes genuinely happier. Applying the antidotes for overcoming jealousy, pride and so forth makes our mind more relaxed, calm and genuinely happier. We need to understand the antidotes, and actually apply them, so that they help to reduce negative states of mind.

The essential practice comes down to developing love and compassion. The more we do that, the more it actually helps the mind. In a practical sense a lot of the mental agony we experience is caused by our biased attitudes towards others. The practice of cultivating immeasurable equanimity, which precedes developing love and compassion is in fact a practice that really helps to develop an unbiased attitude towards others, not discriminating between friends, enemies and strangers. Attitudes like having a strong sense of clinging to those who are close, and being distant to others, can, at the very least, be reduced, and even overcome when one embraces the practice of, for example, developing immeasurable equanimity. Immeasurable love and immeasurable compassion, not to mention a lack of discrimination, actually leads to seeing everyone as being close. The way to cultivate that state of mind is to familiarise ourselves with these attitudes again and again, and really try to develop them within ourselves.

I spend a lot of time contemplating these points. I cannot claim in any way that I've developed love and compassion, but to the extent that I've devoted some time and energy towards developing that, what I can say is that it definitely helps my mind to become much more genuinely relaxed, and much more settled. As I often relate to you, my best companion is the positive state of mind of love and compassion, and the happy mind that follows from that. It definitely helps me in my life, and it seems to have a positive effect upon others too. I can definitely vouch for this from my experience.

I cannot emphasise enough that the essence of the Dharma is really love and compassion, specifically the love and compassion that is not stained by the self-cherishing mind. That is what pure love and compassion is—it is a love and compassion not stained by the self-cherishing mind. As mentioned earlier, developing that pure love and compassion needs to be based on developing our mind so that it does not discriminate between friends, enemies and strangers.

The practice of immeasurable equanimity involves overcoming the strong feelings of attachment when one focuses on friends, and overcoming anger when focussing on enemies, and overcoming a sense of indifference when focussing on strangers. It is these two different aspects of holding some close and others distant that cause a biased state of mind.

When one actually develops the mind of immeasurable equanimity, one will no longer have any sense of liking or dislike. Rather, one will embrace all equally. This is a point made by the Seventh Dalai Lama, Gyalwa Kelsang Gyatso. I'm not randomly making these points up. They are, in fact, all related to the sayings and writings of the great masters of the past, in which they explained the teachings from the perspective of their own practice and their own experiences. The important points that I share with you are based on those sources.

So it is important that we attempt to develop a love that is not sullied by a self-cherishing mind, and a compassion that is not sullied by the self-cherishing mind. Then we can really work on developing an unconditional love and compassion towards all beings.

Now while what I have said so far might not have been in an orderly, sequential manner, I have nevertheless been attempting to present to you the essential points of practice and so forth. So it is worthwhile that you really keep this in mind.

The great master Atisha gave us some very profound advice: 'The best instruction is to check one's state of mind'. Furthermore, he says 'Hide one's qualities and proclaim one's own faults, while hiding the faults of others and proclaiming their qualities'. That is an essential practice, and a very profound piece of advice that we need to really try to embrace at all times.

In his recent teachings in India, His Holiness the Dalai Lama mentioned something to the same effect. As those of you who were at the teachings might recall, he was reprimanding the abbots and saying it is not sufficient to hold a high position, while piously thinking "Oh I've done quite well, and things are quite OK", when things are actually falling apart, such as the discipline of the monks becoming lax, and other faults in the monastery. Pretending that there are no problems and that everything is fine is not a good practice. His Holiness was pointing out that it is very important to really look out for faults, and if things are not going so well, acknowledge that, and try to fix the problem right from the start.

These are some of the profound points made by the great Kadampa masters of the past. This essential advice is what we need to keep in mind at all times: always be ready to talk about your own faults, rather than proclaiming your qualities, and be ready to talk about the qualities of others, rather than bringing out their faults and criticising them.

As mentioned previously, the essence of the Buddha's teachings is love and compassion, and so every attempt we make to develop love and compassion is moving in the right direction. Fully developing love and compassion is our ultimate task. And a teaching that profoundly and unmistakably presents the methods for developing love and compassion, followed by developing the altruistic awakening mind of bodhicitta, is this very text that we are studying, Shantideva's Bodhisattva's Way of Life.

This is a text which has been praised by all the great masters. His Holiness the Dalai Lama praises it again and again, saying that the depth and breadth of the instructions of how to develop love and compassion that are found in Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavata are unequalled. When it is hard for us to consistently practise love and compassion, we need to, on a regular basis, read this text as much as possible and contemplate its meaning. As His Holiness the Dalai Lama has said, just remembering and acknowledging the value of such teachings can, in itself, be a great practice; reminding us again of the importance of love and compassion.

We, of course, have received many teachings on this text, and sometimes we may fail to see its real value. Yet other people who do not even consider themselves as Buddhists really seem to see its great value. Just last Friday I was invited out for lunch by a Chinese lady called Cynthia, and we went to a Chinese restaurant in New Street, a little bit up from Bay Street. We parked quite close to a very nice building and I jokingly commented that it must be worth millions of dollars.

When we returned to the car after lunch we noticed someone was watering the garden while someone else was feeding the dog. Then the man feeding the dog saw me, said "Hello", and came over to greet me. He said that he was not the owner, but was overseeing its renovation. He said, "I can show you inside". So he took us inside and showed us all of the features of the ground floor. He said that the house was over a hundred years old, and that a lot of those features were genuinely unique. Then he pointed out one element, and said that the only other building in Melbourne with the same sort of patterns and designs was Parliament House.

He was very courteous and very, very nice. As we came out of the building he asked me, "Where are you from?", and I replied "I'm actually a Tibetan Buddhist monk". Then he said "Oh, like the Dalai Lama. Are you following the same sort of tradition?" Then he went onto comment that the wisdom and knowledge that the Dalai Lama imparts is not just good, but indeed perfect.

Our conversation continued when he asked where I lived, and I replied that the building where I lived in might be even older than this house. He seemed quite surprised, and took down the details of the address of Tara Institute.

Then he asked me "How do you find Australia", and I said that I find Melbourne really nice. He said that although he was born here, his parents are of Italian descent. They had travelled around the world, and gone to many different countries, and then having come to Australia, had found that Australia was really the best place for them to live.

At this point he introduced his son, who was the person watering the garden, and went on to offer to show us the entire building when it's completely finished. It really is a very grand place, and must have been really expensive to buy and renovate. Then the other workers all came up and shook my hand, and were really happy to see me.

This is just one small example of how, even though I haven't, as I mentioned earlier, developed any kind of significant realisation, my attempts to embrace love and compassion, seeing them as being of paramount importance, has definitely been of benefit. Even without any sort of formal understanding or knowledge, people just seem to relate to me and are happy to greet me and so forth. That's my own experience. Relating this story to you is yet another attempt to point out that when one makes a genuine attempt to familiarise oneself with the attitudes of love and compassion, making it a core practice, it definitely helps to reduce a lot of negative mindsets. These negative attitudes are naturally overcome by the positive attitudes of love and compassion.

We can all relate to the types of delusions that lead to negative minds. All of us have had the experience that as soon as a delusion takes hold of one's mind it really weighs one down, leaving one feeling unsettled, with a very heavy, dark sort of mind. These dark feelings all arise due to the predominance of negative states of mind, which quite readily manifest themselves in our minds. The more we attempt to develop, cultivate and recognise the love and compassion which is within ourselves, the less the opportunity for the negative sort of minds to arise. Thus, as the delusions become less prominent, our mind becomes happier, lighter and more joyful. We can see that the state of our mind, whether it is happy or unhappy, is not related to external things. Rather, it's dependent on our own state of mind. In other words, our overall state of mind depends on the most predominant attitudes in our mind.

I am openly sharing all of this with you as friends, using my own experiences and the attempts that I have made which have definitely helped my mind. I can confidently predict that if you make the same attempt it will definitely help you in your life as well.

This is what I bring back from India to share with you. I don't have any material things such as presents and the like to give you. In fact, whatever money I had was used to make offerings there, so there was not much left to buy presents for you. However I consider the advice that I have just given as my present to you.

To summarise this pith instruction, the more we familiarise ourselves with generating a positive state of mind, the more the negative states of mind will be naturally reduced. We need to really reflect upon that again and again.

What part of the outline are we up to now? What verse are we on?

[A student replies that we have completed the heading, Anger Is Unsuitable when the Direct or Indirect Causes Are Analysed, which was covered in verse 41. Geshe-la complimented her saying "You seem to be right on the ball, and that's good. Others are still looking for it!"]

This outline was the second part of an earlier outline and it particularly relates to not retaliating when others harm oneself. Now we move to the third subdivision of that outline.

STOPPING ANGER AT WRONGDOINGS DIRECTED AT ONESELF

1. TOLERATING THE GENERATION OF SUFFERING

1.3. Meditating on the patience that does not think anything of harm

1.3.3. Considering it one's fault if something undesirable is received¹

Putting patience into practice relates to the significant point of not retaliating when others harm us. Our normal, immediate reaction when we receive any harm is to retaliate out of anger. When we contemplate these points and change that attitude, then we are practising patience.

The point of this outline is that we need to realise that it is our own fault if we have some undesirable experience. This is again referring to the point about not retaliating when others harm us. At this point in the training, one trains one's mind to understand that if one is experiencing harm, then that is due one's own faults, rather than any fault of the other.

This is actually a very profound point. In fact it's actually presenting the profundity of karma. Therefore it is really an essential point to consider when thinking about the importance of practising patience. If one wishes to benefit others one cannot do that without the practice of patience. If, out of a sense of love and compassion, one attempts to benefit others, they may either show a lack of appreciation or even harm us. If we don't practise patience then that is the point where it will be very easy for us to actually give up any sense of wishing to benefit the other.

The most essential tool for benefitting others is developing and practising patience. Geshe Chengawa said that the essence of the Dharma is contained in these two lines:

Refrain from harming others,
While benefitting others

He said that when these two lines are practised effectively, they encapsulate all of the Dharma. The teachings of the Buddha in the form of the three baskets, as well as the practices of the three vehicles, are actually subsumed into these two lines. Being able to refrain from harming others when others harm oneself requires the practice of patience. It also helps us to not become disheartened when we try to benefit others. So we need to realise how essential it is to develop patience.

This outline, Considering It One's Fault If Something Undesirable Is Received, is divided into two parts:

1.3.3.1. The actual meaning

1.3.3.2. Refuting objections

When Shantideva was preparing his instructions and advice he would have thought, "When one experiences harm from others, which stance would be most reasonable and beneficial? To think that it is their fault or one's own fault?" Of these two options Shantideva would have found that the greatest benefit comes from thinking that it is one's own fault. There is no actual loss but only gain in thinking in that way. Thinking that it is the other's fault will only serve to justify becoming angry and then retaliating.

So the practice of patience cannot be based on thinking that it's the other's fault. If one starts to understand that it's one's own fault that one is receiving the harm then that can be a sound basis to prevent anger from arising and for practising patience. So there is only gain in thinking in this way.

1.3.3.1. THE ACTUAL MEANING

This is subdivided into five:

1.3.3.1.1. Considering that it is one's own fault if one is harmed by others

1.3.3.1.2. It is the fault of holding onto the body which is a cause for suffering

1.3.3.1.3. It is the fault of having craved the cause of suffering in previous lives

1.3.3.1.4. The unsuitability of being angry at others by relating one's karma to the cause of their suffering

1.3.3.1.5 Anger is simply wrong and unsuitable

Having now listed the five subdivisions under this outline we can cover the verses relating to each of them in the following sessions.

We need to really contemplate this meticulously logical and systematic presentation. There is so much to contemplate here, and we really need to become familiar with it, and embrace it as the means for our practice.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcribed by Mark Emerson

Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett

Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Edited Version

© Tara Institute

¹ The other two outlines are:

1.3.1. Bringing to Mind the Method of Compassion

1.3.2. Anger Is Unsuitable when the Direct or Indirect Causes Are Analysed

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱུང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

24 February 2015

Based on the motivation we generated during the recitation of the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we will now engage in the practice of meditation. [meditation]

1.3.3. Considering it one's fault if something undesirable is received

1.3.3.1. THE ACTUAL MEANING

In our last session we introduced the five subdivisions under this outline.

The following verses contain very profound advice about why we need to practise patience with people who harm us. Taken at face value, this advice might seem quite unreasonable. How could being harmed by someone else be one's own fault? Without a proper understanding, this could sound quite crazy, so we need to understand this advice in its proper context.

1.3.3.1.1. Considering it one's own fault if one is harmed by others

The verse relating to this outline reads:

42. *I previously caused sentient beings
Harm similar to this.
Therefore it is suitable that I receive now the harm that sentient beings inflict.*

In essence, this is a presentation of cause and effect, the law of karma.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Because I have caused the same harm that I am receiving now to sentient beings in a previous life, it is therefore appropriate that I now receive the harm that sentient beings inflict. Practise patience by thinking in this way.

While this explanation is quite clear, it is in fact a presentation of the subtle workings of karma. To understand this subtlety, one needs to have a deeper understanding of how karma works. As presented here, one is receiving harm now because one has caused a similar type of harm to sentient beings in past lives. Having harmed others in a similar way previously, the harm one is experiencing now is the ripening of the result of that previous harm. Thus one thinks, It is therefore appropriate that I now receive the harm that sentient beings inflict upon me. It is by thinking in this way that one will be able to practise patience.

If one already has a good understanding and faith in karma then, as presented here, one will be able to willingly accept suffering, because one understands that in the past one created the cause to experience such results.

As mentioned previously, willingly enduring suffering is said to be a paramount practice of patience, along with the patience of thinking about the Dharma. We don't need these two types of patience a lot of the time. After all, we don't encounter people who actually harm us all that often. So you extend this practice of willingly enduring suffering to all forms of discomfort and suffering.

With conviction in karma, knowing that when the cause is created, then the effect will definitely be experienced, one can immediately see one's experience of suffering as being the result of the karma that one created in the past. Then the mind of blaming the other for causing that harm will definitely not occur. One will be able to point the finger at karma, rather than blaming the person who is attacking or harming one.

When one practises patience in this way then the real benefit will be that one's mind does not become disturbed in the event of hardships such as pain and suffering. That is the real benefit of this practice. Of course we need to engage in this practice each and every day, as it is only with familiarity that we gain the benefit of the practice.

To re-emphasise these points, without a good understanding of, and conviction in karma, it would be very difficult to put this instruction into practice. Conviction in karma is developed when one contemplates how happiness arises from virtue, and how suffering arises from non-virtue. One needs to really understand if one creates virtue, then, unless it is destroyed by some negative karma or negative act, it will definitely reap the positive result of happiness. Likewise when one creates negative karma, then, if the non-virtue is not destroyed by purification, the result of suffering will definitely be experienced.

When one thoroughly understands this, then one develops a conviction in the infallibility of karma, which is that when the cause is created, the result will definitely be experienced. Karma is not a separate entity out there that brings us bad results. That is the wrong way to understand it. The negative results of karma and the positive results of virtue are to be understood as happening within one's own mental continuum, i.e. karma lies within one's own mental continuum. When contemplating karma, it is important to personalise it, and integrate it into one's own life.

The whole point of gaining conviction in karma is that it will enable one to apply one's three doors of body, speech and mind to engaging in virtue as much as possible, and avoid engaging in non-virtuous deeds as much as possible. Of course, we have covered karma in more detail in previous teachings. The point here is that one needs to use this conviction in karma to put these verses into practice.

Having an understanding of karma is said to be one of the basic ways to adopt virtue and avoid non-virtue, and a more profound way is that an understanding of selflessness and so forth is the antidote for overcoming delusions and so forth. These are the steps that we take in our practice.

1.3.3.1.2. It is the fault of holding onto the body that is a cause for suffering

Here the root verse reads:

43. *Their weapons and my body
Are both causes for the suffering.
Weapons come from them and the body from me,
At whom shall I get angry?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on the verse reads:

Also for the following reason it is unsuitable to get angry: both the weapon of the other person and my body are causes for my suffering since my suffering is created by the other's weapon meeting with my body. At whom is one supposed to get angry? It is unsuitable to get angry at the other person alone.

Again, these are not obscure points. If we honestly check, we will accept this presentation as being very reasonable.

Normally we might immediately blame the person who inflicts physical harm on us, and become angry with them. Here, we are being asked to consider the causes of our pain, which are both the weapon that is used by the other person, as well as our own body. They are equally the cause of our suffering. When we consider this, then we see that it is unreasonable to see the other as the cause of the pain, and become angry with them.

If the weapon did not make contact with us we would not experience any pain. Likewise if our body were not in the nature of suffering, and therefore subject to pain, then, even if a weapon were to come into contact with our body, we would not experience pain. So the very nature of the body itself is that it is subject to pain. In other words, without a contaminated body we would not experience physical pain. Therefore it is our own body that is the cause of our pain. We may not be able to accept this immediately, but if we really pay attention, and analyse it carefully, we will come to accept that this is actually true.

Here again we are being presented with a variety of reasons to contemplate, all of which lead to the conclusion that it is reasonable to practise patience, and not retaliate when others inflict harm upon us.

Now of course being able to practise patience in this way will not develop overnight. Without conditions that make us feel angry, there is nothing to challenge us, and we might easily conclude that we are practising patience, and feel that it is very easy to practise patience. The real test is in the moment of being criticised or harmed. If we become upset and angry, then our claim to be practising patience is unfounded. Therefore we need to contemplate and become familiar with these reasons before conditions arise that might make us angry. If we do that they will become part of us.

The second verse under this heading is:

44. *This abscess similar to a human body
That is suffering and cannot bear touch,
If I hold on to it with blind craving
At whom should I be angry when it gets harmed?*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

This abscess that is similar to a human body if I hold onto this suffering body that cannot bear the slightest touch with craving, and ignorance that blinds intelligence, then since it can be harmed even by thorns, with whom should I become angry when it is harmed? One should think that it is one's own fault.

This verse is further elaborating on how our body is a cause of suffering, because its very nature is that it is subject to pain. The analogy used here is that the body is similar to an abscess, the Tibetan word for which has the connotation of the skin being scraped off. As it heals, a very thin layer of skin begins to form, but it is still very fragile, and the slightest touch might rupture it, with pus and blood then oozing out of it.

Our body is like an abscess, which can be pierced by the slightest touch or thorn, causing bleeding and so forth, and that is what causes so much suffering and pain. This relates to the nature of our body. Normally we have such strong craving and attachment to our bodies, and describing the nature of our body like this is also a way to reduce this strong craving and attachment. Contemplating in this way on a regular basis will help to develop a sense of renunciation. We might not be able to develop actual renunciation right away, but this contemplation will definitely become the basis for developing some disenchantment with the nature of our body and reduce craving for it.

As explained here, our body is really fragile, and when the slightest rough surface, or sharp object like a thorn, comes into contact with it, we immediately experience discomfort and pain. We place so much importance on our body—we care for it and we really cherish it. This presentation asks why, if our body is so fragile and easily harmed, is it reasonable to become angry with someone else if it is hurt. It is the very nature of our body that is so easily prone to hurt and pain.

What can be understood from this presentation is that we cherish our body so much, and due to that attachment, we experience agony when it is hurt. The point here is that by engaging in the practice of not retaliating when others harm us, we are also reducing strong craving and attachment to the body. In that way, as presented here, one should be thinking that it is one's own fault that one suffers, rather than anything others might have done.

1.3.3.1.3. It is the fault of having craved the cause of suffering in previous lives

The first of the two verses under this heading is:

45. *The childish do not desire suffering and
Are attached to its causes;
If one gets harmed though one's own fault
What reason is there to become angry with others?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads

The childish do not desire suffering but are attached to and crave the causes of suffering such as killing and so forth. Hence, since I receive a result of harm projected by my own faults, what reason is there to become angry with others? It is my own fault alone.

Here, the childish refers to ourselves when we are experiencing suffering. We do not desire suffering, but are attached to and crave the causes of suffering such as killing and so forth.

This is a really profound explanation about the workings of karma. Even though we do not desire the result of suffering, we readily engage in the causes of suffering, such as engaging in the ten non-virtues of killing and so forth. Thus, we will inevitably experience suffering as a natural consequence of the negativity created in the past. This verse has the similar meaning as verse 28 in Chapter 1, where Shantideva says that even though ordinary beings wish to discard suffering, they run towards the very causes of suffering, and although they want to experience happiness, they destroy the causes of happiness like an enemy, because of their ignorance.

These lines are really quite a profound presentation of karma. Although not wishing to experience suffering, beings are naturally drawn to its causes, and they willingly engage in those causes, which include non-virtuous acts such as killing, stealing and so forth. Furthermore, beings want to experience happiness, yet they destroy the causes of their happiness by intentionally discarding its causes, which are virtuous deeds. By not intentionally engaging in virtue, one is destroying the cause of happiness.

As mentioned previously this is really profound reasoning. There is no-one who voluntarily wishes to experience suffering, and there is no-one who does not wish to experience happiness, yet we create the very causes of our own suffering and we fail to create, and actually destroy, the causes of happiness. The unwanted results are the natural consequence of our own actions.

These are very significant points. Shantideva is meticulously presenting a very profound explanation of our situation, and the suffering that we experience. Therefore, to think since I receive a result of harm projected by my own faults, what reason is there to become angry with others, is very reasonable. In other words, there is no real reason to become angry with others, because one has created the causes oneself.

This advice is in line with the practices of the great Kadampa of the past. It is said that they would ask themselves, 'How many causes of happiness do I create in one day, and how many more causes of suffering do I actually create in a single day?' When they realise that they are creating more negativity, the Kadampa masters had the practice of using black and white stones. Every time they had a virtuous mind they would place a white stone in front of themselves, and every time they had a negative mind they would put a black stone there. At the end of the day they would count how many black and white stones there were. They used this technique as a deterrent to negativity, and to encourage themselves to engage in more virtuous deeds.

If you attempt to do this practice, you need to be warned that in the early days there will definitely be more black stones. This is natural for ordinary sentient beings. However that should not discourage you, because as with the examples of the previous masters, if you practise diligently, then gradually the number of black stones will start to reduce, and there will be more and more white stones in front of you. That will be a measure that you are constantly engaging in virtue.

If we don't take a farsighted view in our practice then we could easily be discouraged. We might attempt to be pious, and assume that we are practising virtue, but end up with more black stones at the end of the day, and think, 'Oh this is too much! I give up'. It is very important to have reasonable expectations. We need to understand that the process of practising Dharma requires tremendous patience and perseverance.

The next verse in this section is:

46. *For example, if the guardians of hell
And the forest of sword leaves
Are generated by one's karma
At whom shall one get angry?*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

For example, if the guardians of hell, the forest of sword leaves and so forth, which harm one, are not generated by someone else with purpose, but arise from one's karma, then one cannot get angry at them. Similarly, if harm is generated also from one's karma in one's life, then at whom shall one get angry? Since it is one's own fault alone, from now on strive in abandoning the cause for suffering.

Here, an example of those who inflict extreme suffering are the guardians of hell, likewise to experience the sufferings of being in the hell of a forest of sword leaves, and so forth. So, what is being explained is that no-one actually creates that tremendous suffering of the hell realms, and nor are the hell realms a place that was purposely constructed. Rather, the experience of being in that state is actually created by one's own karma. That is how it is to be understood. This explanation is quite clear so I won't go into any more detail.

1.3.3.1.4. The unsuitability of being angry at others by relating one's karma to the cause of their suffering

The workings of karma may seem mysterious. We can take the example of the Malaysian Airlines flight MH370, which was lost without trace at sea. Some say it fell into the sea, others are not sure. Regardless of what actually happened, the fact remains that they haven't found any trace of it, so all the passengers are presumed to be dead. However two passengers booked on that flight survived. One because they were too ill to travel that day, and the other decided to book another flight. If these two hadn't experienced these immediate conditions they would have been on that ill-fated flight and experienced the same fate as the other passengers. Something created events in their personal life that caused them to not board that flight. This is an indication that when one has created virtuous causes, then even dire situations can be averted.

I have often heard people say, 'I don't know much about karma, but it seems to be true that if you do good to others, good things will definitely happen to oneself, and if one is cruel to others then there are definitely negative consequences for oneself'.

A true mark of whether one has conviction in karma can be seen in their attitude to truth and honesty. An individual who abides by the law of karma would naturally be an honest person, whereas those who may have some understanding but who don't put it into practice, are those who would deceive others. This is a practical way to gauge whether one has some faith in karma or not.

Indeed, if we really think of the infallibility of karma, then it is as if one's own karma is compelling the other person to do things to hurt oneself. It is as if it's one's own karma is putting them in a position that causes them to harm one. This profound way of thinking about karma is the focus of this outline.

The verse relating to this reads:

47. *Having been induced by my karma
Harm givers come into existence.
If that throws them into the lower realms,
Have I not destroyed them?*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Further, having been induced by my previous negative karma, in this life people that give me harm come into existence. If through harming me the person is thrown into the hell realms, then have I not destroyed that person? Saying this to my mind, I should scold it by thinking: 'I have thrown them into the hell realms'.

Further, having been induced by my previous negative karma, in this life people that give me harm come into existence, refers to the reason why there are those who harm oneself. It is one's previous karma that induces them to harm one. So we reflect, 'Having harmed me, this person will be thrown into the hell realms. So have I not destroyed them?'

What is being presented here is that it is one's own karma that induces the other person to cause harm, and because they have engaged in the action of harming, they have created negative karma for themselves, which will cause them to go to the hell realms. So one has, in fact, actually caused them harm, because if it was not due to one's own karma there would have been nothing that compelled them to create that harm.

When one thinks about it from this angle, then it becomes apparent that it is we who are causing them to be born in unfortunate realms, where they will experience tremendous suffering. The point that is being presented is that seeing oneself as a cause for their future suffering is another way to prevent anger and retaliation.

1.3.3.1.5. Anger is simply wrong and unsuitable

This section shows how those who harm us are actually helping us, while also being a cause for them to go to the unfortunate realms, such as the hell realms.

48. *In dependence on them
I purify much karma through patience,
In dependence on me
They will be thrown for a long time into the hells.*
49. *I give them harm
And they give me benefit
Why, oh unsuitable mind
Are you mistakenly angry?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Further, by having taken that person as the object of patience I have meditated on patience and purified much negativity. In dependence on me that person will be thrown into the hells where they experience suffering for a long time. I am giving harm to the enemy and he is benefitting me. To be angry with someone who benefits one is mistaken. Why, you unsuitable mind, do you get angry? You should like them.

As presented quite clearly, if there was no-one to harm us, we could not possibly practise patience. So an object that causes us harm gives us the opportunity to practise patience. As His Holiness the Dalai Lama mentions, our teachers are not appropriate objects on which to practise patience. Rather, it is our enemies, those who harm us, who are the objects on which to practise patience. Our teachers teach us how to practise patience, but generally speaking there is no need to practise patience with them, because we consider them to be very kind and helpful. There might be some absurd exceptions, but generally speaking that's how it is.

So the object of one's practice of patience is those very beings who we consider as an enemy, or those who harm us in any way. The harm caused by these enemies is what motivates us to engage in the practice of patience, which accumulates great virtue or extensive merit. So our enemy has given us the opportunity to purify negative karma extensively and accumulate great extensive merit. Yet in dependence on me, that person will be thrown into the hells where they experience suffering for a long time. So I am giving harm to the enemy and he is benefitting me. Becoming angry with someone who benefits us is mistaken. Why, you unsuitable mind, do you get angry? You should like them.

If one contemplates and considers how one practises patience, then one can see that there is a deep truth here. Those who actively go out of their way to harm us are giving us the opportunity to practise patience and so forth. Since they are giving us the opportunity to accumulate great extensive merit and purify negative karma, then they are in fact benefitting us.

Being grateful might seem to run counter to common sense, but even in ordinary terms it would not be considered correct to be angry with someone who actually helps us. So while all these practices may not immediately seem reasonable, when one actually contemplates and thinks about them, then one can see that there is great truth in them. They are not ideas that have been conjured up, but in fact present the actual reality of the situation.

The Eight Verses of Mind Training explain how we need to view other beings as cherished, precious jewels, when one sees that how it is in dependence upon such beings that one actually engages in the practices such as generosity, patience and so forth. However it is a gradual process and doesn't happen overnight.

1.3.3.2. REFUTING OBJECTIONS

Here there are three sub-divisions.

- 1.3.3.2.1. Refuting that it is incorrect that others benefit us
1.3.3.2.2. Refuting that it is incorrect that one is harming others
1.3.3.2.3. Stop ill treatment to those who benefit one

1.3.3.2.1. Refuting that it is incorrect that others benefit us

This relates to the earlier explanation that the person who harms us is, in fact, benefitting us. It is presented as a refutation of a hypothetical doubt.

First Gyaltsab Je presents the argument:

Argument: Do I then not also go to the lower realms due to the condition of the negativity of others?

As explained earlier, one will be the cause for others to go to the lower realms, so would it not then be the case that: Do I not also not go to the lower realms due to the condition of negativity for others?

The response is in these two lines:

*50ab. If I have the quality of thought
Then I will not go to the lower realms.*

Gyaltsab Je responds to the hypothetical doubt that he raised at the beginning.

Answer: If one has the quality of the thought of patience, 'They benefit me', then one will not go to the lower realms but purify negativities.

The answer to the opening hypothetical argument is that if one has the thought of practising patience and engages in that practice, thinking, They benefit me, then one will not go to the lower realms, but will purify negativities. This, then, is the virtue of the practice of patience. If one's mind is not disturbed by the intention of retaliation and so forth, and one practises patience thinking, 'They are benefitting me,' then, far from leading one to the lower realms, it will be a cause to purify one's negativities.

What one needs to understand from this presentation is that if one were not to practise patience and retaliate, and returns harm for harm, then one will indeed be creating the negativity that will cause one to go to the lower realms as well. However, even though the harm one receives might possibly have served as a cause for the other to go to the lower realms, the positive mind that engages in the practice of patience means that the harm does not act as a cause for one to go to the lower realms.

There are so many situations that can serve as a cause for others to create negativity, so we need to be a bit cautious in making sure that we avoid, as much as possible, putting ourselves in a position where others might generate a negative mind and create negativity. That is something we can take as a personal instruction.

These presentations are not too difficult to understand. The main thing is to contemplate these points, and really think about them.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Edited Version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

3 March 2015

As usual, we can spend some time in meditation. For this we use the motivation that we generated in the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer.

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and then, through understanding their meaning, put them into practice well.

1.3.3.2. REFUTING OBJECTIONS

1.3.3.2.1. Refuting that it is incorrect that others benefit us (cont.)

In our last session we covered these two lines of verse:

50ab. *If I have the quality of thought
Then I will not go to the lower realms.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je prefaced these lines with this qualm:

Argument: Do I then not also go to the lower realms due to being the condition of the negativity of others?

Previously it had been explained that one becomes the cause for others to create negativity, and hence go to the lower realms. The doubt raised here is that if we are a cause for the other to create negativity, then wouldn't that also be a condition for us to go to the lower realms as well?

The response to that is that our practice of patience will protect us against going to the lower realms. And, as will be explained further on, the harm we receive from others actually benefits us. The implication here is that it is also important for us not to serve as a condition for others to create negativity. We need to be mindful that we don't put ourselves in a position where we engage in deeds that will cause others to create negativity.

Here we can see how the commentary presents this and the following verses as a way to overcome doubts or qualms that might arise from previous points. So the commentary prefaces each verse with a qualm, which is then answered by the verse.

1.3.3.2.2. Refuting that it is incorrect that one is harming others

Here the qualm presented by the commentary is:

Argument: Since the other person exhausts my negative karma they benefit me and therefore will also not go to the lower realms.

As mentioned earlier, the reason one does not go to the lower realms is because one engages in the practice of patience. So, since the other person has served as a condition for one to practice patience, wouldn't they also not go to the lower realms?

The answer is in these two lines of verse:

50cd. *If I guard myself
Then how could they receive anything here?*

Then Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of these lines:

Answer: Since I meditate on patience for my attacker, I protect myself from negativity, but how does the other person receive merit here in this life? They do not practise virtue, and only harm.

As the commentary meticulously explains, one is protecting oneself from negativity because one practises patience with the attacker. From this explanation we need to derive the understanding that the real protector is our own practice of patience, because it protects us from creating negativity, and hence unfortunate rebirths in future lives. This makes it very clear that the real protector is not an external entity, but that it lies within oneself. It is our own practice of patience that is the real protector: it protects us from creating an immediate negativity; and in the long run it protects us from being reborn in the unfortunate lower realms.

If practising patience is a way of gaining merit for oneself, then how does the other person receive the merit from our practise of patience? As explained in the commentary, they do not accrue any merit from our practice of patience because they only harm and do not practise virtue. So the merit that we have accumulated from practising patience cannot be a cause for the other to gain merit, and thus a cause to be born in the fortunate realms.

This is also a presentation of the infallibility of karma. As explained clearly in other teachings, such as the Middle Way teachings or Madhyamaka, there is no way that the karma created by one individual can be transferred to another. The karmic consequences one creates, whether they are virtuous or non-virtuous, will accrue only to the one who created it. Therefore karma is not transferrable. If it were to be transferrable, then the Buddha would definitely transfer all his merits to us so that we would not experience any kind of misery or suffering. But that is not possible. What we are being shown here is that we have to take the sole responsibility for creating virtue and positive karma, and for preventing negative karma.

We need to understand that the opposite of practising patience is allowing oneself to become angry. When one exhibits anger, then that becomes a cause for creating non-virtue and negativity, which is, in turn, the cause for rebirth in the unfortunate realms. Therefore we need to take initiative to subdue and overcome anger, and for that purpose practise patience. It is said that of the many methods to encourage one to practise patience, one of the best is to contemplate the disadvantages of anger. The more we contemplate the disadvantages and faults of anger, the more inclined to practise patience we will be.

To give an analogy to illustrate how karma is non-transferable, for example we cannot say to someone, 'You can take a leisurely rest, and I'll create virtue for you'. However that does not mean that one doesn't create any virtue in relation to someone else. When we engage in a virtuous deed for the sake of others, then because the other serves as a condition for us to accumulate virtue, we can definitely dedicate our merit to the wellbeing of the other. So although the complete results of our practice such as patience and so forth cannot be experienced by the other, they will definitely derive some benefit from our practice.

1.3.3.2.3. Stopping ill treatment to those who benefit one

Again Gyaltsab Je commences his commentary with an argument or doubt:

Argument: If harming is a benefit then it would also be suitable for me to retaliate.

The verse presented as a response is:

51. *However, if I retaliate with harm
They are not guarded.
Also, my actions will degenerate
Finally my austerity will disintegrate.*

Then Gyaltsab Je explains the answer:

Answer: When I harm the other person in retaliation they will not be protected, and my practice of the four dharmas of a monk and my promise to meditate on love and compassion degenerate. Thus the supreme austerity of patience disintegrates.

As the commentary explains, if one is harmed by another, and one benefits from practising patience, one might misconstrue that reasoning, and come to a conclusion that it would be suitable to retaliate and harm them in return. The answer is that when I harm the other person in retaliation they will not be protected, and my own practice of the four dharmas of a monk will degenerate.

The four dharmas are

- Not to scold another although being scolded;
- Not to become angry when incited to anger;
- Not to hit another when being hit;
- Not to reveal another's fault when they do the same

These four dharmas are part of the vows of a fully ordained monk, as well as a core bodhisattva practice, along with the practice of love and compassion.

If these essential practices were to degenerate then, as presented here, the practice of patience, which is the supreme austerity, would also degenerate. As The Bodhisattvas Way of Life mentions, the best austerity is the austerity of patience. So if one engages in the practice of retaliating then that supreme austerity will also degenerate.

I have contemplated these points many, many times. If someone were to harm us, we might initially think that it is reasonable to retaliate, but there is no benefit in that. In fact, rather than any benefit there's only real loss. If one's love and compassion degenerates, then there's really nothing of any real substance in one's being. The person who lacks love and compassion is someone who is empty of any real values or virtues. So retaliation is nothing but the greatest loss.

These presentations are not to be taken lightly; rather they need to be really contemplated very carefully. The more one contemplates and thinks about these points, the more one's inner wisdom will increase. This very logical and systematic presentation will also help to develop our analytical reasoning skills.

When we establish a practice based on profound analytical reasoning, then it becomes much firmer and more stable. We might superficially agree with what has been presented here, but if we don't really contemplate these points, then the next time someone says something that is inappropriate, critical or harmful in any way, the immediate reaction will be anger and the wish to retaliate.

Normally, it might seem that retaliating is a way to protect oneself, but far from protecting oneself, it only brings more misery, and more harm to oneself. The real protection is when one practises patience. If we contemplate these points again and again, using all these logical reasons, and meditate on them, then we will be well equipped to be able to actually practise patience when someone harms us. Then, rather than retaliating with anger one could, with a sense of compassion and love, actually benefit them. Even if one is not in a position to benefit them, then at the very least, one will definitely be inclined not to harm them.

We need to contemplate how these points give us a very practical way to benefit ourselves. Of course we all naturally carry the imprints of anger, so we are therefore prone to getting angry, but we also have the potential to practise patience. That is also well within our capacity. Since we have the imprints of both anger and patience we need to decide which of these two, anger or patience, we wish to follow. When we think carefully, it will become quite clear as to which option is the better one.

When we look around, it is quite evident that those who are perpetually in an angry frame of mind are those who are suffering more, whereas those who are more patient and tolerant have a happier mind. Since we all wish for happiness, and do not wish to experience any suffering, it is in our own best interest that we choose to practise that which brings the most happiness, and which reduces our suffering.

This is how we need to reason and what we need to implement in our practice. If we practise in this way then that will be the optimum means of taking care of ourselves. The practice of patience is the best protection, and the best contributor to our own wellbeing. Through these reasons and practices we can see how a genuine follower of Buddhism definitely gains the benefit of becoming a happier and gentler person. We can see that if the guidance in this presentation were to be actually practised, the result can only be that we will be genuinely happier.

There is a story about one of the former abbots of Gomang Monastery asking a visiting monk from Sera Monastery about the welfare of one of the former abbots of Sera Monastery, Khensur Lobsang Wangchuk (who was renowned as a great scholar and practitioner). The visiting monk happened to be Mongolian, and Mongolians are known to be very straightforward. His response to the enquiry about the welfare of Khensur Lobsang Wangchuk was, 'Khensur Lobsang Wangchuk is always joyful and happy. Whether he's going somewhere or just in his room, whatever he does, he is always in a joyful state of mind'.

2. BE PATIENT WITH CONTEMPT AND SO FORTH

As I have mentioned previously, we really need to pay attention to these practices, as they are very relevant to our situation.

There are four subdivisions under this heading:

- 2.1. Contempt, slander etc. do not harm my body
- 2.2. It is unsuitable to be angry with a person who is related, or connected to, the anger
- 2.3. It is unsuitable to be angry with obstacles to things like gain
- 2.4. It is unsuitable to be angry with others who lack faith in oneself

2.1. Contempt, slander etc. do not harm my body

The relevant verse reads:

52. *Since the mind is not physical
Nobody can destroy it.
If one grasps at the body
The body will harm me with suffering.*

Gyaltsab Je then explains the meaning of the verse

If I protect my mind then, since it is not physical, it cannot be harmed at all by harsh words, weapons and so forth.

Contempt, slander and so forth do not harm one's physical body, so, if one protects one's mind then it cannot be harmed at all by harsh words, weapons and so forth.

Then this hypothetical doubt arises:

Argument: I get angry because the body harms me with suffering, due to me grasping at the body.

The proposition is that when one actually experiences physical suffering, then it must be reasonable to become angry. What is being presented clearly here is that the physical suffering that we experience is because of our strong attachment to our body.

As an answer to that hypothetical proposition that even if one is able to protect one's mind, it must be reasonable to be angry when one experiences physical suffering, the next verse is presented:

53. *When criticism, harsh words and Unpleasant words
Do not harm the body
Then why, mind, do you get so angry?*

Gyaltsab Je explains:

Answer: If criticism, harsh words and unpleasant words do not harm, then why mind do you get so angry? It is unsuitable.

In explaining the verse, the commentary states if criticism harsh words and unpleasant words of others do not harm my body in the least, then, why mind, do you get angry? Implying that it is unsuitable to get angry. The point here is that it is unreasonable to get angry when criticism and harsh words and so forth are heard, because there is no actual harm to one's physical body.

2.2. It is unsuitable to be angry with a person who is connected to anger

This is similar to the previous heading. The verse is:

54. *If the dislike of others for me
Does not devour me,
Neither in this life nor in others,
Why do I have dislike for them?*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

If dislike by others for me does not harm and devour me in this life or in other lives, then why do I have dislike for them? As this only unnecessarily creates the cause for suffering, dislike is unsuitable.

It has just been shown that there is physical suffering due to strong grasping at one's physical body. However, when harsh words and so forth are spoken, they don't really hurt the physical body.

When one has accepted that there's no point in becoming upset with harsh words and so forth, then the next doubt which may arise is that whilst harsh words and criticism and so forth may not harm me physically or mentally, they still cause others to dislike me, so therefore there is a reason to become angry.

In order to overcome that doubt the commentary states that dislike by others for me does not harm and devour me in this life or in other lives. The reasoning is that even if others were to dislike me, then how could that actually really harm me, when it does not devour me, or the merits that I have accumulated in this life? One's merit and life will not decline now, or in future lives, as a result of dislike. Since it does not cause me any actual harm now or in the future, there's no real reason for me to become angry at those who cause others to dislike me. As this only unnecessarily creates the cause for suffering, dislike is unsuitable.

2.3. It is unsuitable to be angry with obstacles to things like gain

Now the text moves on to a doubt that harsh words and criticism might harm us through being an obstruction to material gain. As a way to point out that it is unsuitable to be angry in that case, the next five subdivisions are presented:

- 2.3.1. Since gain disintegrates quickly, anger at obstacles to gain is unsuitable
- 2.3.2. Stopping wrongful gain
- 2.3.3. Establishing by example that craving for gain is unsuitable
- 2.3.4. The reason why craving for gain is unsuitable
- 2.3.5. Refuting that it is suitable to establish gain

2.3.1. Since gain disintegrates quickly, anger at obstacles to gain is unsuitable

What is being presented here is that all gain is in the nature of being transient. So there's no point in being really attached to some impermanent thing that is transitory, and which disintegrates.

The first two lines of the next verse are presented as a qualm:

- 55ab. *If I have dislike for them
Because they obstruct my gain,*

Again, Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with a presentation of the argument or the doubt:

Argument: I do not like criticism, slander and harsh words as they obstruct my gain.

If one were to say that, then the next two lines of verse 55 serve as an answer.

- 55cd. *I destroy my gain in this
And negativities abide firmly.*

The explanation in the commentary is quite easy to understand. However the personal instruction is that we need to be mindful of not being too attached to things like gain and so forth. If one has excessive attachment to gain, then that will definitely be an obstruction to one's Dharma practice, which will really harm one. Therefore it is in our own best interest to reduce strong attachment to gain and so forth.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Answer: The gain, for which one meditates on anger, will be destroyed quickly in this life, and the negativity of anger will remain firmly in my continuum. It is easier to not achieve gain and it is unsuitable to get angry.

As the commentary clearly explains, the gain for which one familiarises oneself with anger, will be destroyed quickly in this life, and the negativity of anger will remain firmly in my continuum. Whatever gain one achieves will be destroyed in this life, but the negativity of anger remains firmly in one's continuum. That being the case, it is easier to not achieve gain, and it is unsuitable to get angry. In other words it is much better to avoid becoming angry, even if it means passing up the opportunity for gain.

2.3.2. Stopping wrongful gain

Wrongful gain basically occurs in conjunction with wrong livelihood. Having strong and excessive attachments to one's gains and so forth, will naturally fall into the category of wrong livelihood. We covered the five wrong livelihoods in the teachings on Precious Garland.¹

The relevant verse is:

56. *If I die today, that is easy,
To live long with wrong livelihood is unsuitable.
Even if someone like me remained for long,
One is the very suffering of death.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Even if I die today without any gain, that is easy, but it is unsuitable to live long with the wrong livelihood gained through anger. Even if someone like me abides for a long time, in the end I have to give up everything and am not beyond the very sufferings of death.

When the commentary states, even if I die today without any gain, that is easy, it is implying that it would be better to die (even if death comes tomorrow) without any gain, because it is unsuitable to live long with wrong livelihood gained through anger. A long life, sustained by gains that involve deceiving, cheating or harming others and anger, is unsuitable.

Even if someone like me abides for a long time, in the end I have to give up everything and am not beyond the very sufferings of death. Whatever gains one may have accumulated through wrong livelihoods, harming others, anger and so forth, will not sustain us for very long anyway, because when we experience death, we will have to give it all up.

If we really pay attention to this presentation, and think about the points carefully, it will make a lot of sense.

2.3.3. Establishing by example that craving for gain is unsuitable

The two verses relating to this are:

57. *If one is someone who wakes up After having experienced a hundred years of happiness in a dream
Or if one is someone who wakes up After having experienced only a moment of happiness,*
58. *For both, when they are awake
This happiness does not return.
For both, those of short life, or of long
It will be the same at the time of death.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Regardless of whether one is someone who wakes up from a hundred year dream in which one experienced happiness or whether one is someone who wakes up after only a brief moment of happiness in a dream, for either, when awake, this happiness will not return. Similarly, whether one has had a long happy life or a short happy life, at the time of death it becomes only a mere memory, and therefore it is unsuitable to crave for gain.

Here the commentary explains the examples given in the text. Regardless of whether one wakes up from a hundred year dream in which one experienced happiness, or wakes up after only a brief moment of happiness in a dream, that happiness will not return. Whatever the duration of happiness experienced in a dream, it will not return. Likewise, whether one has had a happy long life or short happy life, it becomes mere memory at the time of death. What is being indicated here is that whatever happiness one has one has experienced from mere worldly gains, out of attachment, or from sensual pleasures and so forth, is only a mere memory at the time of death. Therefore it is unsuitable to crave for gain.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcribed by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

¹ See teaching of 9 March 2010.
Chapter 6

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

10 March 2015

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along the usual lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

It is indeed important for us to familiarise ourselves with this positive motivation. It is through familiarity that we can readily draw on this positive motivation during our practice, which will make the practice truly meaningful. Even when we are not engaged in formal practice and are just going about in our everyday lives, we can periodically recall this motivation. In this way we consistently familiarise our minds with this motivation.

The optimum benefit from familiarising ourselves with this positive motivation is that once it becomes spontaneous, we will not need to spend much time generating a positive motivation when we sit down to practice, as it is already there. Thus we can go straight into the practice. If a positive motivation is not present, then one actually needs to take the time to cultivate it. It is similar to meditating on love and compassion. If we are already familiar with love and compassion then love and compassion will be present in whatever practice or activity we engage in.

2.3. It is unsuitable to be angry at obstacles to things like gain (cont.)

2.3.4. The reason why craving for gain is unsuitable

What is being presented here is something which we need to be really mindful of: craving for gain is unsuitable. The text however doesn't say that 'gain is unsuitable', but rather that it is the craving for gain that is unsuitable. This is an important point that needs to be understood. Otherwise one could easily think, 'As a Buddhist I shouldn't be thinking about any gains'. There are many who think in this way! As it clearly states here, it is craving or attachment to gain that is the problem.

One can relate this explanation to other teachings e.g. the Letter to a King, where Nagarjuna explains that the purpose of wealth is to be content. What prevents one from being satisfied with wealth is attachment, and in turn, as attachment does not allow a sense of contentment, the more you have, the more you want. If one had a satisfied mind through practising contentment, and sufficient means to sustain oneself, then wealth has served its purpose and one can feel very, very satisfied, content and happy.

What is being explained here is how gain through craving will only become a cause for misery, because later on, when we become old and frail, when we go on from this life, then everything has to be left behind. At that time a lot of suffering occurs; whatever has been gained through craving causes great agony and suffering, rather than being a means of bringing a sense of joy and happiness.

The important point here is to recognise craving as a cause for real suffering. Most ordinary people feel that attachment gives them a sense of satisfaction and pleasure, however that is of course an illusion. They can't be blamed as they don't know any better. When one really thinks about the situation, there is no satisfaction in craving. In fact, the more attachment one has, the more it becomes a cause for misery.

Someone who has strong attachment is someone who is really not settled; they experience great pain when their expectations are not met. This is true particularly in relation to friends, relationships, material wealth, gain, status etc. All of these cause suffering when expectations are not met, or when one has to be parted from them.

As previously stated, the most vulnerable time in life is old age, when one is frail and will soon pass on. At that time one can develop very strong attachments. For a practitioner it is said that one of the greatest obstacles for a good death is attachment and craving for one's possessions, friends and relatives. The significant point being presented here, is that if we work on craving now, then slowly, slowly we will become more attuned to its finer points, and be able to give up strong craving.

The great master Asvaghosa said: 'if someone lacks contentment due to very strong craving, there is no greater sickness than this state of mind'. This reinforces the point that craving causes a lack of contentment, which causes great mental agony; it is like a great sickness festering in one's mind. Some people say that when they didn't have much in the early part of their life they seemed to have a happier, more joyful state of mind. But as they became more successful and gained more wealth, the sense of joy and happiness started to fade away and they actually started to become more agitated and restless.

In brief, the main point here is that while we need possessions to sustain ourselves, we should not go to the extent of becoming so attached to them that they cause mental pain.

The relevant verse reads:

59. *Though I may attain much gain
And live for a long time happily,
Like being robbed by a thief
I will go naked and empty-handed.*

The commentary further explains the meaning:

Though I may attain much gain and live happily for a long time, at the time of death, like having been robbed by a thief, I will have to go naked without clothing and empty-handed without wealth.

While the explanation here is quite clear, I will reiterate some of the main points. The gain in I may attain much gain and live for a long time happily relates to gaining things that we perceive as giving us some sense of joy or pleasure. This refers to gaining pleasure from the five sense objects, such as: nice forms, i.e. acquiring material possessions and relations; pleasant sounds, i.e. acquiring the means to listen to pleasant sounds; nice fragrances, i.e. acquiring the means to enjoy pleasant scents; nice taste, i.e. acquiring the means to obtain delicious foods; pleasant touch, i.e. acquiring the means to have pleasant touch or sensations. So we perceive these objects of the five senses as pleasurable.

As ordinary beings we believe that a happy life is one which is filled with the most experiences of the pleasures of the five senses. Nevertheless, no matter how long one lives, and no matter how much one has acquired through craving, at the inevitable time of death, one is stripped of everything and one has to leave everything behind. The analogy used here is like having been robbed by a thief, I will have to go naked. So the time of death involves being naked and empty-handed, and leaving behind all the pleasures of the five senses.

If one has strong craving for one's possessions, then at the time of death one would have an unbearable sensation of being robbed, and completely stripped of all that one has cherished all of one's life. Then one will experience the suffering of having to part unwillingly, and being involuntarily separated from everything. What prevents this situation from arising is overcoming attachment and strong craving for one's possessions, i.e. the objects of the five senses. If one does not have strong craving and has practised virtue, then, at the time of death, a virtuous mind with no attachment to one's possessions arises. Then one will not have the empty feeling of being stripped of everything, but rather one would be sustained with a great sense of joy in one's mind, knowing that one is not leaving anything of real value behind. Rather, one takes the most valuable asset within one's own mind, which is one's virtue and merit.

Most worldly people, because of their way of thinking, and lack of training in the disadvantages of attachment and craving, will naturally apply great effort to accumulating wealth. They believe that wealth can provide a good house, a good car and also attract good friends or a companion who looks nice and beautiful. 'With money I can achieve all that.'

[Geshe-la says in English: I have said many times before that one needs to be really careful when choosing a friend or companion, one must not look just on the outside but look for qualities inside – a good heart! Some of us have so many things, piles and piles of clothes, many sets of shoes etc. but still want more and more. What use is all that? One needs to think carefully!]

The real point to consider here is this: does having possessions and wealth really make one happy? While some pleasure may be gained through sense experiences now, one may not experience any pleasure from those same objects later on in life. So the sense objects themselves are not a real source of satisfaction and happiness, as there are definitely many cases of people who are quite poor yet who are really quite contented and happy.

While possessions, particularly those relating to the five sense objects, may give some sort of fleeting pleasures, at the most crucial time of our existence, in the last days prior to death, then rather than giving a sense of joy and happiness, they become a cause for great suffering and misery. What purpose has the accumulation of gain served, when, rather than helping us at a time when we most need comfort and something to soothe our mind, our craving harms us? It has not served any purpose.

If we don't practise giving up possessions now, there will be a time when the possessions will abandon us. So even if you don't abandon possessions, they will finally abandon you anyway. There will be a time when we will have to go, without being able to take anything with us; all the things we worked so hard to acquire will finally abandon us. So, if one practises overcoming craving for possessions, then due to the virtuous mind of non-attachment, one will definitely experience a real sense of ease and a painless death.

Think about our existence right now. If we were stripped of all our belongings, even our clothing, and sent somewhere without anything, how unbearable would that be? Can we even imagine going somewhere without anything, not even our clothing? It would be a very pitiful and embarrassing situation to be in.

This is not a prospect that we would like to face at all, but that is what will occur at the time of death—we will be stripped of everything. It would be unbearable if it were to occur now, but it will actually occur later, and will be an unbearable cause of suffering and agony. However if we train our mind with non-attachment and non-craving now, so that our mind becomes familiar with non-craving and non-attachment, then, at the time of death there will be no sense of going naked and empty-handed. Rather, there will be fulfilment, and a sense of real joy with a virtuous Dharma mind. That is the point being emphasised here.

2.3.5. Refuting that it is suitable to establish gain

The point here, which is explained in the commentary but not mentioned in the heading, is that it is not suitable to establish gain through either anger or wrong livelihood. The heading could also read Refuting That It Is Suitable to Establish Gain Through Wrong Livelihood and Anger.

The first two lines of the verse are presented first

*60ab. If I live through gain,
I can purify negativity and shall be meritorious*

The hypothetical doubt or qualm raised here is:

Argument: If I live for a long time due to gain, then it is befitting that I achieve gain, in order to purify negativity with the four powers, and increase merits.

It is quite likely that even practitioners could have this doubt, thinking there would be nothing wrong in acquiring gain because this could sustain one for a long time and give more opportunity to make offerings to the Three Jewels, give to others and even purify negative karmas. They might conclude that having gains is a good thing. However this verse highlights it is not OK to have gains if they are acquired through wrong livelihood or through anger. As a response to this qualm the remaining lines of verse are presented:

60cd. If one gets angry for the purpose of gain Merits exhaust and doesn't it become negativity?

61. The life that I have lived for a purpose

*Should it degenerate,
What use was that life
Where I only created negativity?*

The explanation of the meaning of the lines in the verse is explained in Gyaltsab Je's commentary:

Answer: If one gets angry for the purpose of gain it will exhaust the merits accumulated over a thousand eons. Does one then not achieve negativity? If so, then what purpose did one's life serve, since it only becomes the condition for one's degeneration? The life where one only creates negativity, what shall one do with it as it is useless?

The commentary explains very clearly that, if one gets angry for the purpose of gain, it will exhaust the merits accumulated over a thousand eons. This relates to an earlier explanation in the text stating that one moment of anger can destroy the merit accumulated over hundreds of eons. So if the anger that has been generated over many lifetimes is exhausted, there is no question that anger will exhaust the merit accumulated over a thousand eons.

If anger is used as a means to acquire gains, then rather than benefitting from those gains, they will only become a means to harm oneself by exhausting one's merits. So if one were to continuously engage in the means to achieve gains using anger, then does one not achieve negativity? This rhetorical question implies that one will be only achieving more negativity and harm. So if that is the case, what purpose does one's life serve, since it only becomes the condition for one's degeneration? If one is engaging mostly in creating negativity then it only contributes to degeneration, rather than achieving one's purpose of happiness. The life that only creates negativity is useless, as it does not serve to achieve one's ultimate purposes.

2.4 It is unsuitable to be angry with others who lack faith in oneself

The teachings presented so far have been meticulous in relation to a doubt that may occur in one's mind: if someone accepts that gains are not conducive to their wellbeing, then they wouldn't get too upset if someone obstructs their gains. However this next heading is in relation to someone thinking that it is suitable to be angry with someone who lacks respect and faith in oneself. This outline explains that it is unsuitable to be angry with others who lack faith in oneself. It is subdivided into two:

2.4.1. If it is suitable to get angry when there is a loss of faith due to unpleasant words to oneself, then it is also suitable to be angry if there is a loss of faith due to unpleasant words to others

2.4.2. If one can be patient with a lack of faith for others then it is also suitable to be patient with a lack of faith in oneself due to the condition of afflictions

2.4.1. If it is suitable to get angry when there is a loss of faith due to unpleasant words to oneself, then it is also suitable to be angry if there is a loss of faith due to unpleasant words to others

What is being presented here is the absurdity of becoming angry with others if their unpleasant words cause others to lose faith in oneself. It would then follow that it would be reasonable to get angry when others use unpleasant words towards others, because it causes others to lose faith in them too.

The first two lines of the verse reads:

*62ab. If: Because it degenerates sentient beings
I shall be angry at the one saying unpleasant words.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary presents the doubt:

Argument: Though it is unsuitable to become angry at the obstacles to gain, I shall be angry at those who speak unpleasantly to me as it degenerates the faith of my faithful.

The next two lines of the verse answer that argument:

*62cd. Why do you not also get angry
When unpleasant words are said to others?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Answer: If you are angry because of a degeneration of merit, then why do you not get angry when unpleasant words are said to another person? Here also, the virtue of faith for others degenerates.

As the explanations presented in the commentary are quite clear, they don't need to be further explained.

2.4.2 If one can be patient with a lack of faith for others, then it is also suitable to be patient with a lack of faith in oneself due to the condition of afflictions

If one can reason that one can be patient when someone causes a lack of faith for others, because one sees there is a cause for others to do this, then with that reasoning it would also be suitable to be patient if someone causes lack of faith in oneself. That is because it is the afflictions that cause the lack of faith in oneself. It is not of their own doing, but caused by the condition of the afflictions.

The word 'faith' can also be used as a term to denote a lack respect. So when others use critical words and badmouth us, then that can cause others to lose respect, etc. for us. So lack of faith also means lack of respect.

To be clear with the reasoning here: If someone makes critical remarks toward oneself, one could say 'there is cause for me to be angry'. But if one says, 'I can be patient when someone makes critical remarks that cause a loss of faith in someone else, because they deserve to be insulted. They have given cause to be criticised'. If one uses that reasoning, then in the same way, you should be patient with the person who criticises and insults you, because it is the afflictions within them that is causing them to insult you.

The verse relating to this reads:

*63. If you can be patient with non-faith,
Because non-faith depends on others,
Then why are you not patient with unpleasant words
That depend on the generation of afflictions?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary gives a more literal translation:

If you can be patient and without anger with the loss of faith in another due to unpleasant words to them because the object depends on another person, then why mind, are you not patient with the unpleasant words said to me? It follows you should be because they depend on the generation of the other's afflictions.

To use an example to clarify this: let's say that if Wayne criticises me, I have a reason to get angry. But if Wayne criticises Ross, I don't get angry about that, because Ross has caused Wayne to insult him.

Following the same line of reasoning, one could argue: I can be patient when Wayne using insulting words to me because it is not actually Wayne himself, but the afflictions within him, that cause him to insult me.

These are very fine points of reasoning which indicate that there is really no point in becoming angry. In other words, there is no valid reason or excuse to get angry.

2.1.4.1.2. Stopping anger at that which faults relatives

This is subdivided into two

2.1.4.1.2.1. Stopping it with the patience of definitely relying on the Dharma

2.1.4.1.2.2. Stopping it with the patience that does not think anything of harm. (Other translations use: The Patience Of Not Retaliating Against Someone Who Harms You)

2.1.4.1.2.1. Stopping it with the patience of definitely relying on the Dharma

This moves on from the earlier point about finding reason to be angry at others criticising oneself, or preventing gain for oneself. This verse relates to stopping anger that finds fault with one's relatives and close ones.

It is also subdivided into two:

2.1.4.1.2.1.1. The reason why it is unsuitable if the holy bodies and so forth are harmed

2.1.4.1.2.1.2. It is likewise suitable to be patient with harm to friends and so forth

2.1.4.1.2.1.1. The reason why it is unsuitable if the holy bodies and so forth are harmed

The first subdivision is preceded by this hypothetical doubt:

Argument: Though it is unsuitable to be angry when oneself is harmed, it is suitable to be angry when the Triple Gem is harmed.

This is a very significant point because there are many who feel righteous about getting angry at those who harm for religious reasons. They say 'I can get angry with someone who harms my faith or religion.' Here it is clearly explained that even religion cannot be an excuse for anger.

The verse reads:

*64. Though the bodies, stupas and the holy Dharma
Are derided and destroyed
My hatred is unsuitable,
Because the buddhas and so forth do not have harm.*

The commentary presents the answer:

Answer: If the bodies of the buddhas and the stupas of great enlightenment and so forth and the holy Dharma are the object of idle talk or criticism, and even if the bodies are destroyed, it is unsuitable to be angry. The buddhas and so forth, the Triple Gem, do not possess harm, and the attacker is the object of compassion, and it is suitable to be affectionate towards them.

The meaning is that the Triple Gem does not generate mental unhappiness due to mental pain.

One of the main points the commentary explains is that when others criticise or even destroy holy bodies, then there is no actual harm to the holy beings. As the buddhas have abandoned the causes to be harmed, they cannot be harmed.

The Triple Gem does not generate mental unhappiness due to mental pain. This is a significant point to understand: the parts of the Triple Gem are beyond experiencing any kind of unhappiness and mental pain because they have abandoned every cause for that kind of suffering to be experienced. They will not reoccur. While some, due to their ignorance, think they are causing harm, they do not understand that they cannot harm holy beings.

Having understood that, one should not find reason to be upset and angry with someone who causes harm to the Triple Gem. Rather, we should consider them as great objects of compassion, because they create so much negativity due to their own ignorance.

Often when His Holiness talks about the perpetrators of harms in Tibet he refers to them as objects of great compassion. He often says 'Oh! Have great pity for those who engage in such negative deeds'. In recent times His Holiness has told Tibetans who are visiting India that when they go back to Tibet (of course he is also sending messages to people who are in Tibet), 'If there is an occasion where you are forced to criticise or ridicule me, don't hesitate to do so. There is no reason for you to be unnecessarily tortured or given a hard time just because you don't want to criticise me. In fact, the whole world knows about me anyway, so there is no harm in you ridiculing or criticising me. It won't harm me in any way'. Nowadays, the world knows what the Dalai Lama stands for, and who he really is. So the more the Chinese continuously criticise him and make ridiculous remarks about him, they more they ridicule themselves. People laugh about it when the Chinese continue to do that.

However, the present Premier of China seems to have more understanding, and has actually stopped a lot of criticism of His Holiness, probably for political reasons. Apparently he is scrutinising the internal affairs of the Communist party for corruption, unjust torture, unjust trials and unjust imprisonment.

What has been presented thus far is something from which to take personal instructions. It relates to practising patience and, rather than finding reasons to justify one's anger, to actually practise patience for personal benefit. In relation to gain, it explains that one finds reason to get angry when others obstruct gains, but one should consider how there is no real benefit in craving gain; it doesn't serve any purpose, as one will have to part from it, and that can cause more suffering for oneself.

It is also unreasonable to be upset with others who criticise oneself. If one gets upset it just causes more hurt for oneself. There is no benefit, so it is far better to practice patience when others insult you or your relatives etc. You have been given the tools that will assist you when you are most in need, when you are impoverished, or in times of strife when others may not be able to help you. These tools will help you at that time.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcribed by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

17 March 2015

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

As usual we can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

2.1.4.1.2. Stopping anger at that which faults relatives¹

2.1.4.1.2.1. Stopping it with the patience of definitely relying on the Dharma

2.1.4.1.2.1.1. Why it is unsuitable to be angry if holy bodies etc. are harmed (cont.)

Here, holy bodies refers to the actual holy bodies of buddhas, gurus and bodhisattvas, as well as holy objects such as stupas and so forth. In the past, stupas in Varanasi and other parts of India were destroyed by followers of other faiths, who acted out of evil intent or extreme ignorance. What is being explained here is that even in extreme cases where the buddhas are harmed and holy objects and so forth are destroyed, one should not find reason to become angry. Rather one should practise patience.

Instead of retaliating with anger, one needs to develop compassion for such people. This is a very significant point. When one really thinks about it, these people, who cause such destruction to holy objects, are an object of great compassion because of the heavy negativities they have created. In fact, the compassion developed for such beings of evil intent is said to be very subtle and profound.

2.1.4.1.2.1.2. It is likewise suitable to be patient with harm to relatives and so forth

It is explained here that one should also practise patience when harm is inflicted upon our teachers, close relatives and friends.

The verse relating to this is:

65. *Even if one's teacher and relatives
And friends are harmed,
Stop anger by seeing that it came about
Through the earlier way of conditions.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of the verse as follows:

It is likewise unsuitable to get angry when one's teachers, contemporaries, relatives or friends and so forth are being harmed or one sees them being harmed. One should stop anger by seeing that the friends and so forth are being harmed due to the karma accumulated through unsuitable actions in the past, that the harm had arisen through the earlier explained way of conditions.

Here, contemporaries refers to immediate relatives such as one's parents or siblings, while relatives refers to one's spouse and in-laws, as well as one's extended family. When they are being harmed, or when one sees them about to be harmed, one should stop anger, by seeing that the friends and so forth are being harmed due to karma accumulated through unsuitable actions in the past.

At this point, one needs to use the earlier explanation that harms to oneself cannot come about if one hasn't created the karma to experience that harm. Similarly, if others haven't created the karma to be harmed, they won't experience any harm. The harm they experience is a consequence of their own negative karma, rather than being entirely caused by the perpetrator. So by using the reasons that were previously explained in relation to oneself, one finds reason to practise patience when relatives and friends are harmed, rather than becoming angry.

As also explained previously, we benefit when others harm us, as that harm enables us to exhaust negative karma. Furthermore, they are giving us an opportunity to practise patience. So, rather than harming us, they are actually benefitting us. In addition, they will experience the negative consequences of their action. So they are in fact an object of compassion rather than anger. The same line of reasoning also applies when one's close relatives and friends and the like are harmed.

When we think about it carefully, these are very logical reasons. But we can't leave it at that. We need to remind ourselves to put this advice into practice. We might know about the significance of the practice, but if we don't attempt to practise it, then that knowledge won't be of much help in preventing us from becoming angry. Through training our mind, going over these explanations and meditating on them, we will not become angry even when the conditions for anger are present. That is proof that we are practising patience.

If we just skim over these explanations and think 'Oh yeah, this makes sense' and don't make any attempt to practise it, then, when the conditions arise, we will find ourselves becoming upset and angry. After we get angry we might then recall the practice and make an attempt to practise patience, but by then it's a bit too late. You've already become upset and angry, and if you had acted upon it then the damage would have already been done.

The real beneficiary of one's practice of patience is oneself. The mark of patience is that in the event of physical or verbal harm, one's mind is not disturbed and one does not become agitated. That is when one actually reaps the benefit of patience, which is maintaining a mind that is free from agitation.

Furthermore, as was mentioned previously, practising patience in the event of harm is also an optimum means to accumulate great merit, and purify negative karma. Thus it is one of the greatest virtues. As explained earlier, the austerity of patience is the supreme austerity of a bodhisattva's practice. In contrast, if we allow our mind to become upset and angry, then, as explained previously, even a moment of anger can destroy the virtues of many eons, and become a cause to be born in the lower realms.

¹ Here the heading numbering in the transcript reverts (temporarily) back to the structure of the chapter, rather than the abbreviated version used in the previous section. See the teaching of 14 October for the introduction of this heading.

These are essential points to keep in mind, to remind ourselves of the great advantage of practising patience, and the disadvantages of not practising it.

2.1.4.1.2.2. Stopping it with the patience that does not think anything of harm

Another way to translate the heading would be:

2.1.4.1.2.2. The patience of not retaliating against someone who harms you

This has four subdivisions:

2.1.4.1.2.2.1. Being angry only at that which has a mind is unsuitable

2.1.4.1.2.2.2. The reason why it is unsuitable to be angry

2.1.4.1.2.2.3. Contemplating one's fault

2.1.4.1.2.2.4. Contemplating the benefits of patience

2.1.4.1.2.2.1. Being angry only at that which has a mind is unsuitable

Harm can be inflicted by both animate and inanimate objects. The outline, by itself, indicates that it is not reasonable to be upset by focussing solely on animate objects.

The verse relating to this reads:

66. *Embodied beings are harmed by both
Those with mind and those without mind.
Why single out and take exception to those with mind?
Therefore be patient with harm.*

In his commentary, Gyalsab Je states:

The embodied beings that are our relatives and so forth are harmed both by the enemy that has mind, and the weapons and so forth that do not have mind. So why do I single out those with mind, and become angry and aggressive towards them? This is unsuitable and thus I should be patient with harm to relatives.

The commentary asks why, when embodied beings, such as relatives and so forth are harmed by an enemy that has a mind, and by weapons and so forth that have no mind, does one single out only the harm caused by the one who has a mind, and become aggressive towards them? It concludes by saying that it is unsuitable and thus one should be patient with harm to relatives.

The reasoning presented here is similar to what was explained earlier, which is that if someone harms you with the blow of a stick, for example, the one causing the direct harm is the stick. But of course one doesn't normally become angry with the stick, because one reasons that the stick is held by a person, and that if they hadn't wielded the stick, we wouldn't have experienced any pain.

With that same logical reasoning the text went on to explain that, as you don't get angry at the stick because it is controlled by the person, so too the person is controlled by delusions such as anger. Therefore one should not find reason to be upset with that person.

Although not elaborated as such, this section of the text is a similar explanation of why we should not be upset with people who harm us. However, if we don't relate this explanation to the earlier one, then we might ask, 'Why isn't it reasonable to be upset with the person who has a mind, when they have caused me harm?' If one didn't have an understanding of the previous explanation, then one might get stuck here and start thinking, 'Well, it should be reasonable to get angry at someone if they have harmed me?'

So it is important to be able to relate this verse to the logical reasons presented in the earlier explanation.

2.1.4.1.2.2.2. The reason why it is unsuitable to be angry

The verse relating to this heading is a very profound summary of the main points:

67. *Some commit faults due to ignorance,
Some become angry due to ignorance.
Who is without fault?
Who is with fault?*

Gyalsab Je's commentary begins his explanation with:

Some beings commit harms such as killing and so forth due to being ignorant of the law of cause and effect, and some become angry because of being ignorant of the faults of anger.

This is really a presentation of the fact that great harms are created due to being ignorant of the law of cause and effect or karma; and being ignorant of the faults of anger and so forth.

- Being ignorant of the law of cause and effect or karma, is the main cause for one to be reborn in the lower realms; and
- Being ignorant of the faults of anger and so forth, i.e. being ignorant of the fundamental truth of reality, is the cause to be reborn in higher realms within cyclic existence

That's how karma is created - through ignorance.

As specifically explained here, some beings commit harms such as killing and so forth, which includes some of the five heinous crimes of killing one's mother; killing one's father; killing an arhat and so forth.

Other heavy negative karmas implied by and so forth include stealing, which can be of varying degrees of severity. There is also sexual misconduct, as well as the heavy negative karma of holding on to wrong views. These are causes that create great misdeeds and negativity.

These heavy negative karmas are created due to being ignorant of the law of cause and effect. In other words, the immediate condition for creating these heavy negative karmas is the ignorance of the law of cause and effect. Although we have some understanding of karma, we continually find ourselves committing negativities and misdeeds, so we cannot blame those who, having no understanding of the law of cause and effect, create negative karmas out of sheer ignorance.

When the commentary states and some become angry because of being ignorant of the faults of anger, it is specifically explaining that when there's ignorance of the faults of anger, then, because one does not consider anger as a fault, one will find every reason to become angry. In other words, if one doesn't see the faults of anger then when the conditions for anger arise and are present, it will further escalate, and there will be no hesitation in expressing and acting out of anger.

On the other hand, if one has contemplated the faults of anger, then even if anger were to momentarily arise due to certain conditions, one will prevent it from escalating by immediately recalling the faults of anger. One of the younger students, who used to come to Wednesday evening classes, once mentioned that contemplating and thinking about the faults of anger does definitely help to reduce the intensity of that negativity. Recognising the faults of anger is, in fact, one of the primary methods for preventing the escalation of anger. The more one familiarises one's mind with its faults, the more it helps to reduce that mind of anger.

Gyaltsab Je concludes his commentary on the verse with:

Out of those two, how can one say who is without fault and who is with fault? Since both are equally with fault, it is unsuitable to return harm with anger.

Here he is presenting further reasons as to why it is unsuitable to return harm with anger. A perpetrator of harm is either ignorant of the law of cause and effect or ignorant of the faults of anger, and so they engage in negative deeds, and create so much negativity. When one really thinks about this, they are in a very pitiful situation. Through their creation of so much negativity, they are creating the causes for their own misery and suffering. If we don't contemplate these points it would be very easy to become angry with those who are guilty of such heinous crimes as murder, saying, 'How inappropriate that is! How dare they do something like that? How is it possible for them to do such evil things?'

But if we really think about these points to gain a deeper understanding, we will understand how people engage in these negative acts out of sheer ignorance. Then, instead of annoyance and anger, one will really start to feel a deep sense of compassion for them. So these are really profound methods to develop a much stronger compassion.

One needs to relate this passage to the earlier explanations of how to prevent anger when one is harmed, and practise patience instead. Just as that elaborate presentation showed us the necessity of engaging in the practice of applying the patience of not retaliating when someone harms you, this section of the text is related specifically to the harm inflicted on holy beings and one's relatives, friends, and so forth. Just as one trains one's mind in not retaliating when others harm oneself, one uses the same thread of reasoning to practise patience, and not retaliate when one's relatives and friends and so forth are harmed.

2.1.4.1.2.2.3. Contemplating one's fault

This relates to contemplating the faults of the person who is being harmed.

The first of two verses under this heading is:

68. *Why did I create previously
The karma to be harmed?
If all depends on karma
Then why do I take exception with them?*

Here Gyaltsab Je explains:

In the past, why did I create the karma due to which others harm me? If all the meaningless harms that I receive depends on my bad karma, then why do I become angry with the other person?

As the commentary explains clearly, the harm that I receive now is due to the karma that I've created in the past. If that is the case, then whatever harm I receive from another is none other than the results of karma that I've created in the past. Therefore one should not find reason to be angry with the other. The verse backing this up is:

69. *I shall make an effort to act meritoriously
So that all, upon seeing this,
Develop the mind of love
For each other.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Having seen that all harms and sufferings arise from karma one thinks, 'When will it come to be that all living beings have a loving mind towards each other? I will make this happen'. So in this way I must strive for the merits of compassion and so forth.

This is a really wonderful explanation of how to put this teaching into practice. As explained here, all harms and suffering are the results of previously created karma. Having understood that, one thinks, 'When will it come to be that all living beings have a loving mind towards each other?' Here, all living beings refers to close and dear ones, enemies, and strangers to whom one normally would feel indifference. For as long as that distinction between friends, enemies and strangers is present, harms and so forth will be inflicted upon each other.

How wonderful it would be if all beings could replace that mind of discrimination with a genuine sense of care, and a loving attitude towards each other. Having contemplated the value of that wonderful state, one thinks I will make this happen. I must strive for the merits of compassion and so forth. Generating this mind of great love and compassion is also the means to accumulate great merit.

So there is no reason to be upset and angry with others. Whatever harm that's experienced is only due to the results of previous karma. Wouldn't it be wonderful if, through seeing this, everyone was free from being upset and angry with each other, and instead generated love and compassion for each other?

2.1.4.1.2.2.4. Contemplating the benefits of patience

This is subdivided into three:

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.1. Striving not to allow one's virtue to degenerate

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.2. Purifying the causes for hell by tolerating small sufferings

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.3. It is suitable to like the austerity for the great purpose

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.1. Striving not to allow one's virtue to degenerate

Far from letting virtue degenerate, we should strive to further increase those virtues.

There are two verses under this heading, the first of which is:

70. For example, when a house is on fire,

*And the fire has started to spread to other houses,
The hay and so forth to which it has spread
Is suitable to be given up.*

The explanation in the commentary reads:

For example, if a house is on fire and the fire has moved to another house where it spreads to the grass and wood, then it is suitable that one sacrifices the hay and wood in order to save the wealth of the house. It would be unsuitable to have attachment to them.

The example that is used is that if another house is on fire, and the courtyard in one's house contains hay and wood, then to protect one's house and valuables one would be prepared to sacrifice or remove that hay and wood to remove the danger of sparks igniting it. If one were attached to the hay and wood in one's courtyard it could destroy one's own house and possessions.

The second verse extends this example:

71. *Likewise, when, through being attached to something,
The fire of hatred spreads,
And there is doubt that one's merits will burn,
Then of course one has to give it up.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Similarly, if the fire of hatred is spreading due to the condition of attachment to friends and so forth and there is the danger that the wealth of merits and so forth will burn, then the basis of one's attachment is suitable to be given up; thus it is unsuitable to be attached.

How often do we find ourselves engaging in negativities due to strong attachment to friends, relatives and so forth? For example, when they are harmed one finds reason to become really upset and angry, which will destroy one's own merit and roots of virtues. Therefore, one should give up attachment to one's friends and relatives as a means of protecting the great wealth of one's merit and virtues.

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.2. Purifying the causes for hell by tolerating small sufferings

This has two subdivisions:

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.2.1. Example

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.2.2. Meaning

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.2.1. Example

First of all Gyaltsab Je presents an argument:

Argument: If one is separated from friends and relatives one will suffer.

Here one is finding reason not to be patient when one's relatives and so forth are harmed, based on the point that if one is separated from friends and relatives one will suffer. So seeing them harmed or suffering is a reason to be upset and angry.

The answer is presented in this verse:

72. *How can it not be good if a person to be killed
Is released upon having his hand cut off?
How can it not be good if one is freed from hell
Through the human sufferings?*

The commentary explains the answer:

Answer: If a person condemned to death is freed upon having his hand cut off then how is that not good? It is good. Likewise, if one is freed from the suffering of hell merely by experiencing the human sufferings of hunger and thirst, then how is that not good? It is appropriate to tolerate small sufferings to reverse larger sufferings.

The explanation begins with the rhetorical question, if a person who is condemned to death is freed upon having his hand cut off, then how is that not good? This implies that an individual who is condemned to death would find the lesser suffering of losing one's hand to be more acceptable. In comparison with the unbearable suffering of being killed, the suffering of losing one's hand would be more bearable. The main point of this analogy is that it is appropriate to bear a small suffering as a means of relieving a greater suffering. In comparison to being killed, the suffering of having one's hand cut off is relatively minor.

Having presented this example the commentary further explains that likewise, if one is freed from the suffering of hell merely by experiencing the human sufferings of hunger and thirst, then how is that not good? It is appropriate to tolerate small sufferings to reverse larger sufferings.

As presented here, in comparison to the unbearable and intense sufferings of the hell realms, the suffering experienced in the human realm, such as intense hunger and thirst, is relatively minor. A very good example is the Nyung Nye practice. During the Nyung Nye one experiences extreme thirst and great pangs of hunger. However, that kind of suffering has a great purpose in that it is a way of purifying one's negative karma. When this practice is done appropriately it becomes a cause to relieve the sufferings of the hell realms. So it is worthwhile to bear small sufferings, if doing so becomes a cause to relieve a greater suffering. I've done many Nyung Nyes, and there is definitely great suffering. However even though it's not comfortable physically, when one sees its purpose, one does not allow that physical suffering to overwhelm one's mind, and so one continues with the practice. This is a good example to use in conjunction with what is being explained here.

These are examples of hardships that one goes through when practising Dharma. When one sees the value of the practice, then one will not be deterred by small sufferings and think, 'Oh it's too difficult. I can't bear this. It's not worthwhile doing it'. That would be losing the opportunity to accumulate great merit and purify great negative karma.

The main point here is that engaging in Dharma practices requires some effort, hardship and difficulties. But that is worthwhile when it becomes a cause to relieve greater suffering. This is what one needs to keep in mind. One can extend that understanding to practising patience beginning with small sufferings. As we become familiar with being patient with small sufferings we will develop patience with greater suffering. That is another way of looking at what is presented here.

As literally explained in the commentary, it is worthwhile being patient with smaller suffering as that becomes a cause to relieve greater sufferings. This also implies that if one cannot be patient with small sufferings, then there is no way that one will be able practise patience with greater sufferings. So it is definitely worthwhile to begin with being patient with small sufferings.

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.2.2. Meaning

The hypothetical argument used to introduce the verse is:

Argument: I cannot bear even these sufferings.

I cannot bear even these sufferings relates to the sufferings of the human realm. These include hunger and thirst, as well as other suffering such as being criticised, being beaten or bound, experiencing sickness and so forth. These are all sufferings experienced on the human realm.

The verse states:

73. *If I cannot bear
Even the present sufferings,
Then why do I not reverse anger
The cause of the sufferings of hell?*

Then the commentary explains that:

Answer: If I cannot bear even the small present sufferings of hunger, thirst and being cut with weapons, then why do I not make an effort to reverse anger which is the cause for the sufferings of hell? I should strive to reverse it.

As explained very clearly, we become angry because we cannot bear the small sufferings that we experience in this human existence, such as hunger and thirst, being cut and beaten and so forth. The reason why we become angry is because we're not able to bear that suffering. So if it's so hard and difficult to bear the suffering of the human existence, then why would one not make the effort to reverse the anger which is a cause for the great sufferings in the hell realms? The conclusion here is one should make every effort to reverse the cause of one's great sufferings in the hell realms, which is anger. So it is incredibly worthwhile to practise patience with the small sufferings of our current existence, as a means to prevent the creation of the causes to experience much greater suffering in the hell realms.

We need to keep this very significant point in mind and put it into practice. If we find it so hard to bear even the small suffering that we are experiencing now, then, with the prospect of having to experience great suffering in the future, why would we not strive to actually overcome the cause of that great suffering, which is anger. Why would one intentionally not want to practise patience? It would be really ridiculous and pointless to intentionally create the causes for much greater suffering. So the personal instruction here is that it is incredibly valuable to actually engage in the practice of patience.

It is reasonable to conclude that if one cannot bear small sufferings then one should, by every means, avoid creating causes for much greater suffering. However we often find the reverse, where someone, who cannot bear to experience some small suffering, takes the drastic measure of jumping off a cliff or a bridge to end their life, and ends up with much greater suffering through ending their life.

That's really quite ironic—they were intending to escape from the small suffering they were experiencing, and ended up having to experience much greater suffering. If we look at it from this point of view, then we can see that it is really very foolish to try to purposely create more suffering, especially as a means of trying to remove smaller sufferings. In fact, the opposite should be practised, which is avoiding the causes for greater suffering through experiencing lesser suffering now.

The text is showing us, with very logical reasons, that if we don't want to experience small sufferings, we should then use every means to avoid the causes for much greater suffering. There are many, many instances of people taking drastic measures in an attempt to rid themselves of some comparatively minor suffering, but end up in experiencing even greater suffering.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcribed by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་བལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

24 March 2015

While maintaining the motivation generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

As usual we can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the Mahayana teachings, and put them into practice well.

2.1.4.1.2.2.4. Contemplating the benefits of patience (cont.)

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.3. It is suitable to like the austerities for the great purpose

This has two subdivisions:

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.3.1. Having regret due to not having achieved the purpose of self or others, despite all the bodies that have already been wasted

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.3.2. It is suitable to be happy because of achieving the purpose of all sentient beings by being patient with the present austerities

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.3.1. Having regret due to not having achieved the purpose of self or others, despite all the bodies that have already been wasted

74. For the purpose of desire, I experienced
The sufferings of being burned and so forth in thousands of hells,
But I have not achieved the purpose
Of self or others.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning clearly:

Because before I was engaged in negative actions due to desire for the mistaken object of my craving, I have experienced for thousands of eons the sufferings of being cut and so forth in hell. Despite this, I have not achieved the slightest purpose of self or others.

Previously one has engaged in actions due to desire for the mistaken object of my craving. The mistaken objects of craving, as explained in other teachings in more detail, are the objects of attachment and anger. The engagement with these objects becomes mistaken, due to the mistaken perceptions through which we interact with them. That is why the objects of craving are referred to here as mistaken objects.

Neuroscientists also support this view, stating that when one sees a fault in an object (such as an object of anger), the perceived fault is only about ten percent coming from the object's side. Ninety percent of the perceived faults are actually a projection from one's own mind. This is a very significant scientific discovery, which of course has already been explained profoundly in the Buddha's teachings.

Likewise, the mind of attachment sees the object of attachment as having only appealing features of beauty. Whereas according to the earlier explanation, the appealing features of beauty in the object may be only about ten percent. The rest would be an overrated projected state of beauty in one's mind, due to the strong attachment to that object.

The commentary explains that due to desire for the mistaken object of my craving, one has created a lot of negative actions in the past, so due to that one has experienced for thousands of eons the sufferings of being cut and so forth in hell.

The first point explains how one has created many negativities in the past, for which one has already experienced the consequences over great lengths of time in the lower realms. Once reborn in the lower realms, such as the hell realm, it is very difficult to create any virtue.

Bringing this concept into one's present life, we can see how we engage in negativities due to our desires for mistaken objects of craving and so forth. In contemplating these very profound points about karma, one can see how one engages in negative actions due to mistaken perceptions in one's own mind.

Once in the human realm, if we do not use our suffering to purify our negative karma, then as explained: I have not achieved the slightest purpose for self and others. If one's suffering has not served the purpose of achieving either goals for a better rebirth in future lives, or for definite goodness, which is to achieve liberation and enlightenment, then we have not achieved the slightest purpose for self and others.

To take this as a personal instruction: one needs to develop regret for not having achieved the purpose of self and others. Contemplating how, despite the numerous bodies that one has already wasted, if one has not utilised one's life to counteract attachment and anger towards mistaken objects, then one has constantly created negativity. As the outline explains, we have wasted so many bodies and experienced various types of suffering, but we have not achieved any purpose. The reason we have wasted so many lives is because they have not served to fulfil the purpose of either oneself or others. You must understand that the outline serves as a great guide in extracting the meaning of the verse.

For example this outline, Having regret due to not having achieved the purpose of self or others, despite all the bodies that have already been wasted, directly relates to, and introduces the meaning of the next verse, which comes under the following heading: It is suitable to be happy because of achieving the purpose of all sentient beings by being patient with the present austerities.

This is how I understand the meaning of these outlines and I am confident that it is correct, as I am quite familiar with their content. We can see how the outline serves the purpose of showing the sequence and logic of the verses presented in the text. One should not underestimate the value of any text's outline. For example, if one wishes to meditate on the Lam Rim, it is on the basis of a thorough grasp of the outline itself that one is able to meditate on the various topics.

There was a time in the past when I spent many months meditating on the Lam Rim, which I did on the basis of having first memorised the outline. Memorising the outline is very useful, because it makes it possible to recall the topics precisely and get an overview of the entire Lam Rim. To give an analogy, it is like sitting on top of a high mountain and seeing everything below very clearly.

Similarly, when one has learned the outline of a text such as the Lam Rim, then the meditation practice becomes very meaningful, as one has an overview of the entire Lam Rim text. The reason why I regularly emphasise the importance of the outlines is because they present a sequential and logical manner for extracting the meaning of the text.

2.1.4.1.2.2.4.3.2. It is suitable to be happy because of achieving the purpose of all sentient beings by being patient with the present austerities

The verse reads:

75. *This does not harm me like that
And it also achieves great purpose
It is suitable to be only happy about
The sufferings that clear the harm of sentient beings.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains further:

This austerity at the time of achieving the purpose of others does not harm me that much, but in dependence on it, I achieve great purpose. Therefore, it is suitable to be only happy and accept the sufferings of the austerities that clear away all the harm of migrators.

The commentary explains that the austerity one could endure for the purpose of others would include practices of forsaking food or clothing and enduring hardships in the practices one engages in. These difficulties, while they may be hard, do not actually harm oneself to any great extent. In fact, whatever level of suffering we experience in our practice is a suffering within the human realm, so it is nothing compared to suffering in the lower realms. And rather than harming, austerities actually serve to help achieve the great meaning of serving the purpose of oneself and others: in dependence upon it I achieve great purpose.

We can relate to the great purpose of all the hardships one bears in one's practices as being a means for becoming the cause of either achieving high status in the future life, or definite goodness i.e. liberation, and ultimately enlightenment. So that is the great purpose one will be able to achieve by enduring the hardships of Dharma practice. Therefore, as the commentary explains: it is suitable to be only happy and accept the sufferings of the austerities. This relates specifically to the practice of the patience of willingly enduring sufferings. This is the type of patience that serves as the means that clears away all the harm of migrators.

When one achieves one's great purpose, such as attaining enlightenment, that then becomes the means to clear away the harms of all migrators. This is the extent of the great virtue, or great purpose, that one can achieve.

2.1.4.1.3. Stopping anger at those who benefit one's enemies

This point is very relevant and practical in our everyday life. It follows the earlier advice on how to not get angry and practise patience. It began with how to practise patience and not retaliate with anger in relation to harms inflicted on oneself personally. This was followed with advice on how to practise patience and not be angry when one's close ones, such as relatives and friends are harmed. This leads up to advice given now on how to practise patience when one's enemies are benefitted.

We can see how this is very much related to our everyday life situation. We see how we create so much negativity toward those who harm our close ones, and find reasons to get very agitated and angry. Then again, with those who help or benefit our enemies, we become really agitated and angry. This is how we seem to constantly create the situation for own mental turmoil and agony.

Everyday situations present so many occasions to get upset and angry, and create a great amount of negativity. So the sequential advice on how to practise patience is very relevant. It is not as if we are being asked to practise something which is totally unrelated to us, and beyond our reach. So we definitely need to embrace this advice and put it into practice.

This part of the outline is subdivided into three parts:

2.1.4.1.3.1. Abandoning intolerance to achieving praise and renown of enemies

2.1.4.1.3.2. Abandoning intolerance to achieving their happiness

2.1.4.1.3.3. Abandoning intolerance to achieving their gain

So from these outlines we can see great advice being presented.

In relation to the first subdivision, Abandoning intolerance to the achievement of praise and renown by enemies we can see how we don't favour an enemy being praised and receiving good comments, and because it makes us feel uncomfortable we find reason to get angry. Here we are being advised to abandon intolerance to this response.

The second subdivision, Abandoning intolerance to achieving their happiness, highlights how we are not happy when our enemies are happy. Getting angry when enemies achieve the means for happiness can cause one great pain, so this intolerance must be abandoned.

There are many who suffer precisely because they are unable to tolerate things like praise being given to one's enemies, or enemies achieving happiness. It causes many people sleepless nights, and a lot of anxiety in their mind. Many mental problems are created by none other than these ways of thinking that cause turmoil in one's mind.

Based on what is presented here we can see how people can be tormented with many reasons to become upset and angry. Elaborating on this from our own experience we can see that it is very true. We start out by not being able to tolerate good things happening to our enemies. Then, when someone helps them and benefits them, we find further reason to become more upset and aggravated. This can go further, when others help those who are helping our enemies, we find even more reason to get upset. In this way our mind becomes more and more agitated with so much anger.

When we look at reasons for the mind to become agitated and upset, so many factors and conditions can cause one to be in mental turmoil. This seems to be in fact the reason why so many people end up becoming depressed.

Some have related to me symptoms where they reach a state of mind where everything appears to be negative and everyone is against them. These are created by none other than the mind which is going round in a vicious circle, thinking about different scenarios, adding on more and more reasons to become angry. All of that then causes the mind to have so many disturbing thoughts, causing it to become tight and very vulnerable to being easily depressed. A feeling of hostility can arise in one's mind with everything appearing negative. That is what some have confided in me. We need to understand that these feelings are created by the mind getting out of control.

The mind escalates a small problem into a big one. To use the earlier example, we first get angry with our enemy, then with those who help our enemies, then with those who help those who help our enemies, and so on and so forth. All this is the cause for one's mind to be in turmoil and become depressed. This can all be stopped when one stops anger towards one's enemy, which is the main cause for all the other reasons to become angry. Thus, when one develops a genuine sense of love and compassion towards one's enemy, all the other reasons to be angry will also naturally subside.

This is how we can see the great value and power of love and compassion. It has the power to transform our mind in a positive way. This is why I regularly emphasise love and compassion as being really important, indeed most valuable in one's life. So we need to constantly familiarise our mind with it again and again. The mind of love and compassion is one of the greatest states of mind for establishing genuine peace and wellbeing within oneself.

Based on the teachings, we can see how the Buddha has presented such profound methods and means in the techniques of cultivating love and compassion in relation to not only one's close ones, but also to strangers and enemies. When one extends one's love and compassion on all three levels—friends, strangers and enemies—then it naturally becomes unbiased love and compassion, not discriminating between some who are close, others who are distant, and some as enemies.

When one overcomes that attitude, all beings will appear as very close and dear to oneself. This is an indisputable and profound teaching by the Buddha which is unequalled by any presentation in other traditions. It is quite unique. So when we refer to the Buddha's teachings we can then start to develop a genuine sense of admiration for the qualities of the Buddha himself, and the value of his teachings.

Encompassing all beings and not having antagonistic views towards others, comes from familiarity with love and compassion. With the attitude of love and compassion we can also develop genuine respect for other traditions, by maintaining an unbiased attitude towards other faiths.

2.1.4.1.3.1. Abandoning intolerance to the achievement of praise and renown by enemies

This is subdivided into two.

2.1.4.1.3.1.1. Since it is the cause for one's happiness it is suitable to want it

2.1.4.1.3.1.2. Since it is the cause for the happiness of others it is unsuitable to not want it

Again, the outlines alone are a meticulous presentation. The meaning of the following verses are presented in relation to abandoning intolerance to one's enemies achieving praise and renown. Abandoning this becomes a cause for one's own happiness, so it is suitable to want to abandon intolerance. Secondly, it becomes the cause for others' happiness; so not wanting to abandon it is unsuitable.

The teaching is really training our minds to change our negative attitude. This is why I emphasise again and again in my regular teachings, how a lot of the problems we create are just ways of thinking (or attitudes) that we have developed in our mind over time. It is necessary to recognise this and make attempts to change our way of thinking, change our attitude. What we call happiness or unhappiness is very much related to one's way of thinking.

2.1.4.1.3.1.1. Since it is the cause for one's happiness it is suitable to want it

The verse under that reads:

76. *By praising others who have qualities
One attains the happiness of joy
Thus mind, if they are praised
Why are you not happy?*

The second verse under that reads:

77. *That this happiness of joy of yours
Is an unflawed source of happiness
Was taught by those endowed with qualities.
It is also the best for gathering others.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse:

If others praise an enemy of mine saying, "He has qualities", then the person praising also gains happiness. In that case, why mind do you also not make the other person happy by praising the enemy? If you do, then the happiness of the joy of liking others' qualities will become the unflawed source of future happiness. This was taught by those with qualities, the conquerors and their children, and praised by them as such. It is also the best for attracting disciples.

If others praise an enemy of mine saying 'he has qualities' then the person praising also gains happiness. What is being explained in essence is that the very act of praising someone else's qualities brings joy and happiness to one's own mind. One wouldn't genuinely praise someone if one didn't like them. The very act of praising someone means that one has a sense of admiration for them, therefore one happily offers them praise.

So it is with a sense of admiration for the other that one offers praise. Normally one would criticise someone who one does not admire, instead of praising them. So when anyone praises anyone else it is done in light of genuine admiration and respect. Thus, praising others brings joy and happiness to one's mind.

Thus, why mind do you also not make others happy by praising the enemy? What is being explained is that just as the other person gains joy and happiness in their mind when offering praise to the enemy, if you were to follow the same example and offer praise to the enemy, it would also bring joy to the other's mind and consequently to yourself as well.

Thus, as explained in the commentary If you do, then the happiness of the joy of liking others' qualities will become the unflawed source of future happiness. In relation to oneself, by praising the qualities of the enemy, one gets the immediate benefit of gaining a more joyous and happy mind now, as well as becoming a cause of happiness for future lifetimes.

This was taught by those with qualities, the conquerors and their children, and praised by them as such. What is being explained here, in relation to praise, is that seeing qualities in others and praising them, especially an enemy, becomes the supreme means for gaining happiness for oneself in this life and future lifetimes. Furthermore, it is also the best means to gather disciples. As you would recall from earlier teachings there are four means of gathering disciples, such as using pleasant words that are in accordance with their minds, helping them in according to their needs and so forth.

So here, when one praises the qualities of someone, they would naturally appreciate that. And when others appreciate you for offering words of encouragement and praise, they are naturally drawn to you. They will not feel distant to you, rather they are drawn to you. So, for someone with a bodhisattva attitude of wishing to benefit others, this is one of the supreme means of gathering disciples, as a way to further benefit them.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcribed by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

31 March 2015

Based on the motivation generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice.

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

2.1.4.1.2. Stopping anger at wrongdoing which faults relatives

2.1.4.1.3.1. Abandoning intolerance to achieving praise and renown of enemies

2.1.4.1.3.1.1. Since it is the cause for one's happiness it is suitable to want it (cont.)

As explained last week when someone else praises an enemy, both the enemy and the person who gives the praise have a happy mind. Likewise, if one praises an enemy one will also experience a joyful mind. Praising an enemy will not only make the enemy happy, but one will also experience happiness. Thus it is appropriate to praise an enemy.

2.1.4.1.3.1.2. It being the cause for the happiness of others, not wanting it is unsuitable¹

This heading has two subdivisions:

2.1.4.1.3.1.2.1. If one does not wish others to have happiness, then one's happiness degenerates

2.1.4.1.3.1.2.2. Hence it is appropriate to wish others happiness

2.1.4.1.3.1.2.1. If one does not wish others to have happiness, then one's happiness degenerates

From the outline itself we can derive the understanding that not wishing others to have happiness causes one's own happiness to decline. This is explained in the following verse:

78. *Further, it is said: 'like this, happiness arises'.
If you do not wish for this happiness,
Through giving up offering wages,
The observed and unobserved degenerates.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains the meaning thus:

Further, by praising, the object of the praise becomes happy. If you do not wish for this happiness of praising others then, since the wages one pays one's servants makes them happy too, one should stop offering wages and so forth. By stopping this and other things, then in this life the servants will not work, and in a later life one will not have happiness. In such a way one's happiness degenerates in this observed life and in the unobserved future life.

As the commentary explains very clearly, the object of praise becomes happy when you praise them. The text then presents an example to illustrate the negative consequences of not wishing others to be happy. As presented, if you do not wish for others to be happy, then, since paying wages to one's servants or workers makes them happy, you might as well stop paying their wages. This phrase if you do not wish for others to be happy includes any means of making others happy, such as repaying the kindness of others with good deeds and so forth. If you really don't wish for others to be happy, then you will not take the initiative to repay the kindness of others with good deeds and gestures, or benefiting others in any way.

Following that, the commentary explains that by stopping this, i.e. not paying wages to workers, returning the kindness of others and so forth, then in this life your servants and employees will not want to work for you, or they will be very slack about their work. If they stop working for you altogether, then you will have harmed yourself, as no work at all will be done. Likewise if one does not return the kindness of others, people will start to shy away. Through losing one's workers, colleagues and friends and relatives, one will start to feel very lonely, and thus be deprived of happiness in this very life. Thus the observed or obvious happiness of this life will degenerate.

Furthermore, if one has not engaged in generosity in this life then one will not reap the positive benefits of generosity in one's future life. So by not engaging in acts of generosity such as paying wages, returning kindness, benefiting others and so forth, one will not reap the positive results of generosity in one's future life. Thus one's happiness in the unobserved, or less obvious future life will also degenerate.

In summary, if one dislikes others being happy, then the consequence is that one's own happiness in this life will degenerate. Furthermore, if one does not engage in generous acts, or acts that make others happy in this life, then one will experience the consequences in one's future life as well. So not wanting others to be happy is a cause for one's own happiness in both the present and in future lives to decline and degenerate.

Conversely, if one likes making others happy, one will act to benefit them and engage in acts of generosity. Then, as a consequence of making others happy, one will reap positive results in this life and in future lives. We need to take this as a personal instruction, and engage in acts that make others happy. We also need to ensure that we intentionally avoid things that will cause unhappiness. Sometimes it is very easy to make others unhappy with the simplest inappropriate gestures and remarks, so we need to try to avoid those things, no matter how trivial they may seem. We need to incorporate this way of thinking and acting into our daily life.

This dislike of enemies being happy, and wishing them unhappiness, is one of the main causes of mental agony. When we hear our enemies being praised, or see them being helped in some way, we can experience so much pain and agony. But if we actually begin to change that attitude to one of intentionally praising our enemies, speaking well of them and being happy when they experience good things and so forth, then that can really help to avoid that pain and agony. This is important to keep in mind.

We can also relate this to the practice of developing the equanimity that is part of the seven-point cause and effect practice of generating bodhicitta. When we lack that equanimity we will feel pain when our enemies experience benefit, and glad when they are harmed. Conversely, we will feel joy when our friends experience benefit and anger when they are harmed. When we develop our mind so that we experience joy when we see the both our friends and our enemies benefitting, then that will release one from the agony and pain of the earlier state of mind. This is very profound mind-training that changes one's mindset.

¹Introduced last week as Since it is the cause for the happiness of others it is unsuitable to not want it.

As I have explained many times, the equanimity that is to be generated within the seven-point cause and effect sequence relates to one's own equanimity towards friends, enemies and strangers. Whereas when you generate the four immeasurable forms of equanimity, you are generating the mind of wishing others to have that state of equanimity towards friends, strangers and enemies. One generates the mind of, 'How wonderful it would be if others were to be free from being close to some out of attachment, and distant to others due to aversion', because that is the cause for sentient beings to experience the shortcomings of samsara by endlessly circling in samsara. As well as developing the very genuine and strong wish for others to have that equanimity, one can also relate it to oneself.

The conclusion is that if one actually generates the mind of wishing others to be happy, then that will be of great personal benefit, whereas holding onto a mind of disliking others being happy will be a great loss. Therefore it is in one's own best interest if one practises transforming one's habitual biased attitude into a positive one. While these points are quite easy to understand, they are actually very profound. It comes down to the very core of our wrong ways of thinking, and why we need to transform those wrong attitudes and ways of thinking.

2.1.4.1.3.1.2.2. Hence it is appropriate to wish others happiness

We can take note again of how this heading follows on directly from the earlier one, by stating that it is appropriate to wish others happiness. The verse relating to this reads:

*79. When my qualities are expressed
I wish also others to have happiness
When the qualities of others are expressed
I do not wish happiness for myself.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

When someone else expresses my qualities, that person wishes to have happiness, thus to say that when I express the qualities of others, I do not wish to have happiness myself is unsuitable and contradictory. Just as others wish to be happy in praising you, you should also be happy in praising others.

When someone else expresses my qualities then that person wishes to have happiness means that when someone we regard as an enemy expresses our qualities, they generally do so out of a wish to be happy themselves. And of course, it makes oneself happy to hear one's qualities being expressed.

Therefore to say that when I express the qualities of others I do not wish to have happiness myself is unsuitable and contradictory. In other words, it is contradictory to say, 'I feel happy when an enemy expresses my qualities', and then say, 'Oh, I'm not happy to express the qualities of my enemies'. If it makes oneself happy to hear nice words about oneself, then it is contradictory to say that one would not feel happy about expressing the qualities of the other. That point is further emphasised with, just as the others would wish to be happy in praising you, you should also be happy in praising others, which emphasises that one should take the initiative of praising others, and thus making one's own mind happy.

Here again, we can see the profound logic that is used to show why one should find reason to express the qualities of one's enemies and others in general.

2.1.4.1.3.2. Abandoning intolerance to them achieving their happiness

*80. Since one wishes all sentient beings to have happiness,
Then, having generated the mind of enlightenment,
When sentient beings find their own happiness
Why do you get angry at them?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

One has generated the mind of enlightenment out of the wish to place all sentient beings in the highest happiness of enlightenment, and has accepted subsequently to practice the trainings. Hence, when sentient beings find a little of their own happiness and achieve their wish, then why are you now angry? It is suitable to be happy.

As the commentary clearly explains, someone who has taken the bodhisattva vows and dedicated themselves to the welfare of sentient beings has generated the mind of enlightenment, out of a wish to place all sentient beings in the highest happiness of enlightenment. In addition to this pledge, one has further promised to practise the trainings. So when sentient beings, from their own side, find happiness without having had to generate the cause for their happiness, why are you now angry? One should, in fact, be very pleased and happy that the very being one wishes to benefit is now experiencing some level of happiness. Even if it is a slight degree of happiness, it is still good for their wellbeing. So the reasoning presented in the text is that it is suitable to be happy rather than being angry. The actual point is that when sentient beings experience any level of happiness, then rather than becoming upset about that through jealousy and so forth, one should actually train one's mind to feel great joy.

Many of us have already taken these bodhisattva vows and made pledges. Even though we may not have actually generated bodhicitta yet, we have certainly generated a similitude of it, in addition to taking particular vows. So the advice given here applies to us because we have made those promises. It is good to consider these points as part of our personal practice.

2.1.4.1.3.3. Abandoning intolerance to them achieving their gain

This has two sub-divisions

2.1.4.1.3.3.1. Contemplating that it achieves one's wishes

2.1.4.1.3.3.2. Contemplating that there is nothing for one to not wish for

2.1.4.1.3.3.1. Contemplating that it achieves one's wishes

Here there are three further sub-divisions:

2.1.4.1.3.3.1.1. It is suitable to be happy if sentient beings achieve their gain

2.1.4.1.3.3.1.2. Example

2.1.4.1.3.3.1.3. If one does not wish for that, the mind of enlightenment degenerates

2.1.4.1.3.3.1.1. It is suitable to be happy if sentient beings achieve gains

This is similar to the previous explanation. The relevant verse is:

81. *One says 'May all sentient beings
Attain enlightenment honoured by the three worlds'.
Seeing that they receive some minimal gain and esteem
Why does that make one miserable?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

One has accepted the promise to place all sentient beings in the state of complete enlightenment that is honoured by the three worlds. Since one wishes this, when one sees that sentient beings attain some minimal gain and esteem then why does one's mind become miserable? One's wishes have been attained in part.

As the commentary explains, one has accepted the promise to place all sentient beings in the state of complete enlightenment that is honoured by the three worlds. The three worlds are the nether world, the world on our plane, and the world above, which basically encompasses the six realms. Since one wishes this, refers to the fact that one has made the promise to place all sentient beings into a state of complete enlightenment. Therefore when one sees sentient beings attain some minimal benefit, why does one become miserable? In fact, one's wishes have been partly attained.

This is similar to the previous point. One has promised to benefit all sentient beings and fulfil their wishes, so when from their own side sentient beings experience some benefit, then it is as if one's wish for all sentient beings to be happy and to attain all their wishes has been partly fulfilled.

2.1.4.1.3.3.1.2. Example

The previous point is clarified with the following example:

82. *If someone in need of nurturing who is nurtured
by you,
And is solely dependent on your generosity,
When this relative finds the means for their livelihood,
Are you not happy and instead get angry?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

If a relative who is in need of nurturing and who is nurtured by you, and is solely dependent on your generosity, such as a child and so forth, finds the means for their own livelihood, and it becomes unnecessary for you to give anymore. How is it that one is not happy and instead becomes angry? It is suitable to be happy.

When one has responsibility for nurturing a relative, e.g. a child, and that relative takes the initiative to look after their own wellbeing, then why wouldn't one be happy about that? It would be very appropriate to be happy. This is definitely true; in a family situation, for example where the father is responsible for finding the means to provide for his children. When the children grow up and start to take initiative to earn their own living and provide for themselves, that would make the father very happy. Far from being unhappy, the father would be very pleased indeed. There is no reason at all for the father to feel jealous of their children making money and so forth.

One needs to think very carefully in relation to situations where others are caring for one's close ones, otherwise that can be a cause for distress. I have heard of people making comments such as, 'Why are they interfering and providing for my child, when it is my responsibility! I will take care of them myself!' The same applies to jobs people have, such as here at Tara Institute. There have been cases where someone says, 'Oh, this is my responsibility' and refuses any help from others. Sometimes they are not able to do the job alone, but because they refuse help from others, the job doesn't get done well. When we reflect on that situation we can see that, at times, it can be appropriate to accept help.

2.1.4.1.3.3.1.3. If one does not wish for that, the mind of enlightenment degenerates

The verse relating to this is

83. *If one does not wish this for migrators
How does one wish them to be enlightened?
How can he who is angry at the wealth of others
Possess the mind of enlightenment?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

If someone begrudges migrators even small gains of food, clothing and so forth, then how can this person be someone wishing sentient beings to attain enlightenment? Once someone gets angry at the slightest wealth gained by others, then how can that person possess the mind of enlightenment that wishes to place all migrators in the state of enlightenment? Since the mind of enlightenment degenerates, one should strive to abandon jealousy toward the gain of others.

This advice seems to be targeted more for ordinary beings like ourselves, rather than bodhisattvas who have already generated bodhicitta—it seems unlikely that bodhisattvas would have such narrow-minded attitudes. If someone begrudges migrators even small gains of food, clothing and so forth refers to the situation of being unhappy with migrators who acquire even small gains or food and so forth. How could anyone who wishes for all beings to attain enlightenment, which is the highest happiness, be unhappy about the small gains and small happiness of others? The commentary makes this quite clear when it states: Once someone gets angry at the wealth of others then how can that person possess the mind of enlightenment that wishes to place all migrators in the state of enlightenment? This is quite clear. Then Gyaltsab Je advises: Since the mind of enlightenment degenerates one should strive to abandon jealousy toward the gain of others. So the main point is the need to abandon jealousy, which seems to be one of the main culprits for causing unhappiness about the gains of others.

2.1.4.1.3.3.2. Contemplating that there is nothing for one to not wish for

Again, there are three subdivisions.

2.1.4.1.3.3.2.1. It is unsuitable to be jealous of the gain of others

2.1.4.1.3.3.2.2. It is unsuitable to destroy one's qualities

2.1.4.1.3.3.2.3. It is suitable to grieve over one's negativities, but it is unsuitable to be jealous of the virtue of others

2.1.4.1.3.3.2.1. It is unsuitable to be jealous of the gain of others.

84. *Regardless of whether it is received from them
Or whether it remains in the house of the benefactor,
In any case, you will not have it.
So whether it is given or not, what use is it?*

The commentary reads:

Regardless of whether the enemy receives food, clothing and so forth from the benefactor, or whether it is food, clothing and so forth remaining in the benefactor's home, in either case it is the same that one will not get it. So regardless of whether it is given to the enemy or not, what use is jealousy? It is not suitable.

This example can be related to a monastic context where benefactors make offerings to the monks and so forth. Regardless of whether the enemy receives food, clothing and so forth from the benefactor, or whether the food, clothing, and so forth remains in the benefactor's home, one will not receive anything. If one has no direct relationship with a benefactor, it makes no difference whether the benefactor gives away food and clothing and so forth, or whether they keep it.

It is not as if one would receive it if the benefactor didn't give it to one's enemy. If that was the case, then one might find some reason to be upset when it is given to the enemy. But one would not receive it anyway, so regardless of whether it is given to the enemy or not, what use is jealousy? This indicates that there is no point in becoming jealous and unhappy when a benefactor gives something to the enemy, because it doesn't affect one either way. Thus, it is not suitable to be jealous. So again, the point being emphasised is the need to overcome jealousy.

2.1.4.1.3.3.2.2. It is unsuitable to destroy one's qualities

The root verse reads as follows:

85. *Whether it is merit or faith,
Why destroy one's qualities?
One does not find gain,
Say, 'why do you not get angry?'*

The commentary reads:

If one is angry at the gain of others and wishes gain for oneself, then why destroy with anger the causes for gain such as merits, the behaviour that causes faith in the lay person's mind, one's qualities of morality, listening and so forth. Without holding the causes for gain, which one destroys, 'Why do I not get angry at myself?'

The focus here is on those who are ordained. The verse is emphasising the danger of being angry at the gain of others, and wishing to receive the gain for oneself. As explained here, the causes for gain from lay benefactors and so forth, are one's merits, as well as the behaviour that causes faith in the lay benefactor's mind, such as one's qualities of morality, listening and so forth, i.e. the three higher trainings. Those who receive offerings from lay benefactors and so forth, do so because of the merit that they have accumulated, and their good conduct, which generates faith in the minds of lay people. Benefactors very willingly honour with gifts those who have these natural and genuine qualities. They never have to be asked to do that. This is an indication that the beneficiary has created the causes by previously engaging in virtue.

The point is that if one is lacking these causes for gain, then the fault lies with oneself. So becoming angry with the beneficiary is absurd if one hasn't actually created the causes for gain oneself. Rather than being angry at the other, if it were to be reasonable to get angry at all, then one should be angry with oneself for not creating those causes.

Furthermore, anger towards others actually destroys whatever merit one has accumulated from one's practices of morality, listening and so forth, which is the cause of gains. So if one becomes angry when others receive gain and esteem, then it would be appropriate to contemplate, Why am I not angry with myself?

To re-emphasise the first point, becoming upset and angry when others receive gain and esteem is inappropriate. If there were any good reason for one to get upset and angry, then the anger should be targeted at oneself. If one is not receiving any gain or esteem from others, that is because one has not created the causes such as accumulating merit and engaging in good conduct that earns respect. Furthermore not receiving gain and esteem now is a result of not having engaged in the trainings such as listening, meditating and so forth in the past, and not developing genuine humility with love and compassion. If one has not engaged in acquiring these qualities, which are a cause for beneficence, then the fault lies with oneself. Thus, rather than becoming upset with others, one should be upset with oneself. If one wishes to be respected and honoured, then the causes are clearly to be created by oneself. We need to take this as a personal instruction.

2.1.4.1.3.3.2.3. It is suitable to grieve over one's negativities, but it is unsuitable to be jealous of the virtue of others

It is totally inappropriate if one does not regret one's own past negativities, and becomes jealous of the virtue of others. That is the reason why one does not receive gain and esteem. The verse presented under this heading is:

86. *Not only do you not grieve,
The negativity you created,
You also compete with the merits
Created by others.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je states:

Not only do you not grieve over the causes for not receiving any gain, which are the negativities that you created earlier, you also compete with the merits previously created by others and are jealous because you cannot bear them. Is this not unsuitable?

One does not grieve about the causes for not receiving any gain, which are the negativities, refers to not regretting the negativities one has created in the past, which implies one has not confessed and purified those negativities. Then on top of that one actually competes with the merits previously created by others, and are jealous because you cannot bear them.

So on the one hand, one is creating the conditions for not receiving any gains by not confessing and purifying with remorse or regret the negativities one has created in the past, while on the other hand one actually competes with the merits previously created by others.

It is totally unsuitable to be jealous when others are merely reaping the result of their previously created merit. Rather than acknowledging and rejoicing in their good fortune, if we instead become jealous, then that is really inappropriate. In fact by being jealous we are creating further causes to lack gain and esteem for ourselves. Thus, unable to bear the gains of others is totally unsuitable.

At this point in the Tibetan text it states that the second *bumpo*² is completed. The term bumpo doesn't refer to chapters, but to a larger section of the text.

² See the teaching of 19 February 2013 for a fuller explanation of the term.

2.1.4.3. STOPPING ANGER AT OBSTRUCTIONS TO ONE'S WISHES³

This is presented in two sub-divisions.

2.1.4.3.1. Impatience with obstacles to the harm of one's enemies is unsuitable

2.1.4.3.2. It is unsuitable to be impatient with obstacles to one's own benefit, and obstacles to the benefit of those belonging to one's side

2.1.4.3.1. Impatience with obstacles to the harm of one's enemies is unsuitable

This is subdivided into three:

2.1.4.3.1.1. It does not benefit one if the enemy dislikes it

2.1.4.3.1.2. Generating harmful intent for the enemy does not harm the enemy

2.1.4.3.1.3. It harms oneself

2.1.4.3.1.1. It does not benefit one if the enemy dislikes it

The commentary introduces the next two lines of the verse with this argument:

Argument: If you say I am happy when the enemy receives harm and I get angry at what obstructs this harm.

This is further emphasising the earlier presentation about being glad when an enemy is harmed, and unhappy when, as a result of some obstruction, they don't receive the harm one thinks is due to them.

The next two lines of verse serve as an answer to the opening argument:

*87ab. Even though the enemy does not like it
What is there for you to like?*

Gyaltsab Je explains it in this way:

Answer: Even though one's enemy generates dislike and is unhappy, what is there for you to be happy about? It does not benefit you, but harms you.

The lines Even though one's enemy generates dislike and is unhappy, what is there for you to be happy about, are asking: What benefit do you receive when the enemy experiences some harm? What happiness can it bring to you? How can it cause you happiness when there is no benefit for you? As the commentary states, it does not benefit you. In fact, it actually harms you to be glad about the harm or unhappiness experienced by others.

2.1.4.3.1.2. Generating harmful intent for the enemy does not harm the enemy

Again, this heading follows on directly from the previous one. It states that just wishing harm on the enemy will not actually harm them.

The next two lines of verse read:

*87cd. Just your mental wish alone
Does not cause harm to them.*

The commentary explains:

Just your mental wish alone that thinks 'may the enemy receive harm' does not cause harm to the enemy. Therefore, since your purpose is not achieved in the slightest, abandon anger.

As clearly presented here, just having the mental wish 'may the enemy receive harm' does not cause harm to the enemy. There are many occasions where people hold a grudge with a mind of hostility, thinking, and sometimes even saying out loud, 'Oh, I hope something terrible happens to them'. Thinking and even saying such things, will not, in themselves, be a cause for the enemy to experience any mishap or harm in any way. In fact, the enemy might very well be enjoying life and having very good time, and sleeping soundly every night! Whereas holding that grudge and thinking about it again and again causes mental distress, and one will actually lose sleep oneself. We can see how, rather than harming the enemy, a hostile mind actually harms oneself, and therefore has no benefit whatsoever.

We can relate this to the categories of anger presented in the mental factors, such as vengeance. First one becomes angry with an enemy, and when that anger escalates, it can turn into a mind of vengeance, where one really wants to harm them oneself, or wishes some mishap to befall them. It is when these thoughts of anger go round and round in our mind that we experience the ill-effects of a disturbed and troubled mind.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcribed by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

³ The way this section relates to the structure of the text is:

1. Meditating on patience earnestly, eliminating obstacles to its establishment and abiding

2. Applying to the mind the methods to establish patience

2.1. Eliminating the cause for anger

2.1.4. Striving in abandoning anger after having analysed the cause for anger in detail

2.1.4.1. Showing the general division of objects for generating anger

2.1.4.2. Stopping anger at undesired actions

2.1.4.1.1. Stopping anger at wrongdoings directed at oneself

2.1.4.1.2. Stopping anger at wrongdoing directed at one's friends

2.1.4.1.3. Stopping anger at those who benefit one's enemies

2.1.4.3. Stopping anger at obstructions to one's wishes

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

7 April 2015

While maintaining the motivation generated during the prayers, we can engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along the usual lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

2.1.4.3.1. It is unsuitable not to be patient with obstacles to the harm of one's enemy (cont.)

2.1.4.3.1.3. It harms oneself

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.4.3.1.3.1. It is unsuitable to be happy over the suffering of the enemy

2.1.4.3.1.3.2. If one holds onto this happiness, it then becomes the cause for great harm for oneself

2.1.4.3.1.3.1. It is unsuitable to be happy over the suffering of the enemy

As the heading itself presents, it is unsuitable to be happy over the suffering of the enemy. The significant point being that if this wasn't unsuitable then one would actually be happy when the enemy suffers. This heading also implies that if one were to be happy over the suffering of the enemy, then the reverse would also be true i.e. one would be unhappy when the enemy experiences happiness.

It is important to bear these significant points in mind, and put them into practice—that would be really meaningful.

The relevant lines of verse read:

88ab. Even if the suffering you wish for Were established, what would be there for you to be happy?

Gyaltsab's commentary explains:

Even if the wish "may the enemy receive something unsuitable" were fulfilled and the other person would receive suffering, what would there be for you to be happy about? It does not benefit in the slightest.

Merely wishing unwanted things to befall the enemy, such as encountering various hardships and sufferings, will not make those unwanted things occur. Rather, it will definitely lead to more agony and suffering in one's own mind. Even if sufferings were to befall the enemy, why should one be happy about it, there is not the slightest benefit for oneself. Thus it is unsuitable.

2.1.4.3.1.3.2. If one holds onto this happiness, it then becomes the cause for great harm for oneself

The previous section highlighted that there is no benefit and that such thoughts become a cause for one's own suffering, so the next six lines of verse state:

*88cd. If it is said: "I will be satisfied,"
What would be sadder than that?*

*89. This fishhook cast by the fisher
Of the afflictions is very frightening.
Once hooked by it one will be cooked
In the cauldrons of sentient beings' hell by the hell guardians.*

The commentary's explanation begins with this hypothetical argument:

Argument: If the enemy receives harm, I will receive satisfaction because my wish will have been fulfilled.

As an answer to that the commentary explains:

Answer: What other method is there for destruction apart from generating strong harmful intent, since one will go to the lower realms? For example, as the fisherman cooks the fish upon catching them with his hook. Similarly, having been caught by the terrifying hook of the negative karma of strong harmful intent that was cast by the fisherman of the affliction of anger, one will definitely be cooked by the hell guardians in the cauldrons of sentient beings' hell.

The argument states that when the enemy receives harm, I will receive satisfaction because my wish will have been fulfilled. Thus the reason for me to be happy when my enemy is harmed, is because it fulfils my wish, and thus I feel a sense of satisfaction. As an answer the commentary presents this rhetorical question, what other method is there for destruction apart from generating strong harmful intent, since one will go to the lower realms?

This presentation highlights that holding on to such harmful intention and feeling satisfaction becomes the supreme method for one's own destruction, as it generates such a strong harmful intent. The negativity one creates from such harmful intentions becomes the means to destroy one's own current good condition as a human being. It is as if one is exchanging one's own good current human rebirth for an unfortunate lower rebirth in the next lifetime. For example, if a rich person intentionally destroyed his wealth just to become poor and impoverished, this would be a very foolish act.

To take this as a personal instruction, one can incorporate it in one's practice by reflecting upon the fact that even while one may still have enemies, there is no benefit, and only harm if one has malicious intent towards one's enemy. As logically presented here, holding onto such harmful thoughts does not have any harmful effect on the enemy and, in fact, it only becomes a cause to experience harm oneself. Thus, in one's own interest, and as a way to protect oneself, it is far better not to hold any harmful intentions and malicious thoughts against the enemy.

The incomparably kind Buddha has given so many reasons in his teachings on how one should actually extend good intentions based on love and compassion to the enemy. When one starts to develop love and compassion for one's enemy, then that is the highest form of practice that benefits oneself.

We need to consider this advice as a means for taking precautions in our own everyday life. Whilst there may still be people that we disagree with, or who do not like us, to protect our own calm state of mind, it is best not to hold onto malicious and harmful intentions. This is the main point here.

The example is quite clear, so there is no need to elaborate on that further. The main point to take from this as a personal instruction is that, in relation to our so-called enemies it is best that we don't hold onto any harmful intention. In fact we are incredibly fortunate in that we don't have any real enemy with an intention to destroy us.

In reality, when we have disagreements with others it is usually in relation to very minor issues. So to whatever degree we may consider the other to be an 'enemy', we need to remind ourselves that there is no point, and no purpose at all in having harmful intentions, as they are not going to be of any benefit to anyone.

If we allow our mind to harbour thoughts of anger, then the nature of anger is such that if you feed it with more reasons to feel angry, then it will just increase in intensity. If anger increases, it can reach such an intense state where one would, if one had any weapons to hand, be ready to use them and harm the other. Anger can reach such levels when it increases.

If, from the very beginning, one actually trains one's mind not to hold onto harmful intent etc. then anger towards enemies, and others in general, will actually start to lessen. Then even when the enemy annoys or criticises us, we will be able to protect our mind from becoming disturbed and angry. In that instance we are actually practising patience.

When we don't allow the enemies to hurt or disturb our mind, then we will gain the great virtue of practising patience. This is how we need to try and put it into practice in our lives.

2.1.4.3.2. It is unsuitable to be impatient with obstacles to one's own benefit and obstacles to the benefit of those belonging to one's side

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.4.3.2.1. Anger at obstructions to worldly dharmas is unsuitable

2.1.4.3.2.2. Anger at obstacles to the generation of merit is unsuitable

2.1.4.3.2.1. Anger at obstructions to worldly dharmas is unsuitable

This heading implies that one should be patient when there are obstacles either to oneself or to those who are close to oneself, e.g. one's friends and relatives and so forth. What it presents in the explanations of the next verses is the means to overcome the four pairs of worldly dharmas, such as being glad when you have gain or profits and unhappy when there is loss, or you don't gain, being happy when one is praised and unhappy when one is criticised, and so forth.

These are called worldly dharmas as they relate to worldly perceptions, e.g. what would make one happy is receiving gain and profits, but when one does not receive gain this makes one feel unhappy.

In relation to praise and criticism one needs to understand that it is not the praise and criticism themselves that are considered as worldly dharmas, rather it is the effect these have upon oneself. When a worldly person is praised it makes them feel elated and happy. It is that feeling of happiness that is actually the worldly dharma. Conversely, when one is criticised and feels unhappy, that feeling of unhappiness is the worldly dharma rather than actual criticism itself. That needs to be understood.

For worldly beings, this is what makes them either happy or sad. It is called a worldly dharma because the happiness is related to very trivial causes. Otherwise, if any sense of happiness was considered to be a worldly dharma then that would imply that bodhisattvas would have many worldly dharmas, because they have many reasons to feel joyful and happy.

The teachings explain that to apply the methods and practices to overcome the eight worldly dharmas, one needs to exchange and equalise these thoughts. In relation to praise and criticism, this means that whilst previously one would have experienced happiness when praised, and unhappiness when criticised, having trained one's mind, the reverse takes place whereby one actually starts to feel joy when one is criticised and unhappy when one is praised. That is how one exchanges and equalises these thoughts, so that it doesn't disturb one's mind. It is the same with other worldly dharmas, such as being glad when unwanted things, such as hardships, happen.

Equalising and exchanging the worldly dharmas becomes the real basis for mind training and for one to engage in the giving and taking practice of tong-len. Having trained one's mind in this way, one would be able to joyfully and happily take the sufferings of other sentient beings, and joyfully and happily give one's happiness to others. This is the result of having trained one's mind not to be too attached to one's circumstances.

The actual tong-len practice is an essential practice which serves as the very foundation of a bodhisattva's attitudes, deeds and practices. Even though we may not yet be capable of really practising it in its entirety, just training our mind in thought and contemplation is a very meaningful practice. So we need to take this on board as an essential practice.

While I have explained this many times previously, it is good to present it again as a way for you to really try and grasp the main points of equalising and exchanging the worldly dharmas.

If we do not exchange our mindset, and just maintain a worldly view, we will become habituated to feeling glad when good things happen and feeling extremely sad when bad things occur. Then because of the gladness, one develops attachment towards the things which makes one feel happy. If one is unhappy rather than glad when one experiences suffering, then when suffering occurs it will cause anger to arise in one's mind. It is in this way that maintaining a worldly view becomes the basis for one to repeatedly experience attachment and anger in relation to one's circumstances and experiences. Thus, equalising and exchanging our worldly concerns becomes a supreme means to overcome strong attachment and anger.

Another way to consider why it is inappropriate to feel joyful when one experiences happiness, and sorrow when one experiences suffering, is to see that happy experiences in any form actually use up one's virtue, because the cause for happiness is virtue. So if we strive to experience happiness and indulge in that experience, this uses up your good karma and virtues.

Using up one's virtue for trivial things is not good, as there be won't enough virtue left to acquire the more essential things for our wellbeing. So there is no reason for one to feel joyful about experiencing happiness if one is using up one's virtues. In contrast, when one experiences suffering one normally feels sorrowful and unhappy. However if one considers that in experiencing suffering the negative karma is actually being used up, then one can feel joyful about that. So actually there's no reason not to feel happy.

This section of the text has two subdivisions.

2.1.4.3.2.1.1. Anger at obstructions to receiving praise and reputation is unsuitable

2.1.4.3.2.1.2. Thinking in a beneficial way

2.1.4.3.2.1.1. Anger at obstructions to receiving praise and reputation is unsuitable

This is subdivided into four:

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.1. There is no need for mere praise and reputation

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.2. Mere mental happiness is unsuitable as an objective

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.3. It is distorted to make merely this one's objective

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.4. The reason for it being distorted

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.1. There is no need for mere praise and reputation

The verse presents a hypothetical argument:

Argument: I do not like it when praise or reputation is obstructed.

This becomes the justification for one to be upset and angry, because I do not like it when praise or reputation is obstructed.

With worldly concerns, when there are obstructions to one's praise and reputation one feels unhappy, and because one is unhappy, one finds reason to be angry. We need to understand that anger is generated out of an unhappy mind, and that if one is not happy about something then it causes anger to arise.

The verse and a half relating to this reads:

*90. The tribute of praise and reputation
Does not become merit or life,
One does not become strong or without sickness,
And happiness of the body is also not attained.*

*91ab. If one understands what is beneficial for self
Then what benefit for self lies therein?*

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse to answer to the argument:

Answer: Out of the five benefits that are explained for sentient beings, which does the tribute of direct praise and indirect reputation accomplish? It does not become merit and it does not become life. It also does not become the cause for increasing one's strength, and it does not provide physical happiness.

Therefore, if one analyses and understands the benefit for self, what benefit for self lies within praise and reputation? Not the least.

In explaining the verse, Gyaltsab Je asks one to analyse and reason whether praise and reputation bring real benefit to oneself or not. It states that out of the five benefits that are explained for sentient beings, which does the tribute of direct praise and indirect reputation accomplish? This is to imply that it really does not accomplish anything.

The benefits are then presented¹: 1) It does not become merit—praise and reputation do not transform oneself nor become a means to gain more merit; 2) It does not become life—it is not as if reputation and praise can help to prolong our life; 3) It also does not become the cause for increasing one's strength—again praise and reputation cannot in any way help us to gain more physical strength; and 4) nor does it produce any kind of physical happiness for oneself. Therefore, if one analyses and understands the benefit for self, what benefit for self lies within praise and reputation? Not the least.

In conclusion, since praise and reputation do not serve any purpose of bringing about true benefit for oneself, there should be no reason to be upset and angry when it is obstructed.

Training one's mind not to be upset when not receiving praise and good reputation, also means that when one does receive them one would not feel proud and elated.

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.2. Mere mental happiness is unsuitable as an objective

The next two lines of the verse read:

*91cd. If one wishes for mere mental happiness
Then one should also rely on gambling, alcohol
and so forth.*

The commentary explains,

If one's sole objective is mere mental happiness, or merely feeling happy mentally, then one would also rely on gambling, singing and dancing, taking someone else's woman and drinking alcohol.

This point really hits the mark for many who have this very ordinary motivation. The point here is that if all one is seeking is some sort of temporary mental happiness, then that is a very childish attitude. And as the commentary says, if that is all you are seeking you might as well rely on gambling, singing and dancing, taking someone else's partner and drinking alcohol because these give temporary mental happiness.

The precautions to take against this are that one should not resort to obtaining mere temporary mental happiness. Those without Dharma understanding can't be blamed for adopting these activities, as they consider them a real source of happiness. But for us as Dharma practitioners there are numerous means for gaining true mental happiness. So one needs to seek those that are produced through the practise of Dharma, which is genuine happiness. This is a very important instruction to keep in mind.

So whilst there are numerous ways to create happiness by immersing oneself in distractions and sensual pleasures, this would be the wrong approach, as these are fleeting and temporary. In contrast, in seeking happiness through the Dharma, one gains the bliss of the Dharma, which is sustained and maintained in one's mind.

¹ Only four of the five are presented in the commentary.

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.3. It is distorted to make merely this one's objective

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.3.1. Mere praise and reputation are needless

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.3.2. Disliking their degeneration means one is like a child

These are significant points as many complain they don't receive due praise. So considering that praise etc. does not actually serve a real purpose, then disliking their degeneration means one is being like a child or very childish.

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.3.1. Mere praise and reputation are needless

The verse reads:

92. *Wealth is spent for the sake of reputation
And if one is even killed
Then what use are the words?
When I am dead whom will they make happy?*

The commentary explains the meaning:

Not only are they meaningless, but in order to have renown as a generous person one gives away wealth, and to be known as courageous, one goes to war. If one then even loses one's life, what will one do with the words of praise and reputation? Consider well to whom praise and reputation will give happiness after one has died.

The commentary states that they, i.e. praise and reputation are meaningless, and makes the point that they are also needless. In order to have renown as a generous person one gives away wealth refers to people with a significant amount of wealth who engage in acts of charity just for personal renown or fame. This is, in fact, wasting one's wealth for no personal benefit.

Similarly, a courageous person may set out to go to war merely to be known as a courageous person. Instead of gaining something significant from the experience, they might even lose their life for the sake of reputation. In that case, what would one do with words of praise and reputation? The point here is to consider to whom praise and reputation will give happiness after one has died. This last point indicates that if seeking praise and reputation serves no purpose in this life, then it will also not serve any purpose for our future lives. If this is the case why be so concerned about it?

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.3.2. Disliking their degeneration means one is like a child

Disliking the degeneration of praise and reputation means one is like a child, or childish.

The verse reads:

93. *Children cry desperately when
Their house of sand collapses.
Similarly, my mind is like a child
When praise and reputation wane.*

The commentary explains:

Children cry when their house of sand collapses. Similarly, my mind becomes like a child out of dislike when praise and reputation wane.

This is clear and the illustration is quite significant. We see that when children make sand castles. If they are destroyed, they can cry as if something terrible has happened, when in fact, it was just a sculpture made out of sand. Like that my mind becomes like a child out of dislike when praise and reputation wane. This implies that if one actually dislikes obstructions to one's praise and reputation, then when it starts to decline, it would be childish to become disturbed and unhappy.

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.4 The reason for it being distorted

This fourth subdivision of the earlier category is subdivided into two:

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.4.1. Attachment to the praising of oneself is unsuitable

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.4.2 If it is desired due to being joy, then it is suitable to bring joy to all beings

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.4.1. Attachment to the praising of oneself is unsuitable

The outline makes it quite clear that being attached to praise about oneself is unsuitable.

The next two verses read:

94. *For instance, since sound does not have a mind
It is impossible that sound intends to praise me.
It is known that others like one,
This is stated as the cause for the joy.*
95. *It could be others or oneself
What benefit is the joy of others for oneself?
That joy and happiness is only theirs,
One does not attain a part of it.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning:

If one is happy because of being praised, it is, for instance, unsuitable to like the praising sound, because it does not have a mind and can therefore not have the thought thinking "I shall benefit that person". Therefore it is unsuitable to like it.

It is known that the person praising one generates joy at the time of praising. If this joy of the person praising is stated as the reason for one's happiness: What use is the joy of the person praising, regardless of whether others or oneself is praised? Since the joy in another's continuum is only their consciousness, one does not even attain a part of it.

The commentary explains that if one is happy because of being praised, using the reasoning 'Yes. I am happy when I'm praised', and in an instant likes the praising sound, then this implies that 'I'm happy being praised because I like the sound of praise'. That is why it says, for instance, it is unsuitable to like the praising sound. If you are happy being praised, just because you like the sound of praise, then that is unsuitable, because sound itself does not have a mind, and therefore cannot have the thought thinking 'I shall benefit that person'. Therefore it is unsuitable to like it.

This point demonstrates yet another reason for being happy when praised. If it is known that the person praising one generates joy at the time of praising, and this is stated as the reason for one's happiness, then our mind is finding another excuse for being happy about being praised. To counteract such a thought Shantideva asks what use is the joy of the person praising? This means that regardless of whether others or oneself is praised, the joy in another's continuum is only their consciousness, and one does not even attain a part of it.

If one states the reason for being happy when praised is because it makes the other happy, then the text reasons, how can this make your own mind happy since their happiness is something which is within their continuum, and you don't have any part of that? So why would that be a reason for you to be happy?

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.4.2. If it is desired due to being joy then it is suitable to bring joy to all beings

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.4.2.1. Actual

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.4.2.2. Liking being praised brings out the childish behaviour

Actual

The verse reads:

*96. If I am happy due to their happiness
Then one needs to treat all equally.
Then why, when they become happy through
The joy of others, one is not happy?*

The commentary explains:

If the happiness of the person praising is the happiness of others and makes me happy, then I should also be happy if all other sentient beings are happy in this way. Why then, when others become happy due to the happiness of the person praising an enemy, does one become unhappy? One should be happy.

If the happiness of the person praising is the happiness of others and makes me happy, then, following the earlier reasons, the happiness of the person doing the praising is the happiness of others. If one says 'being praised makes me happy', then with that same reasoning, one should find reason to be happy for all sentient beings. One should wish for all other sentient beings to be happy in the same way, because that is the happiness of others.

Here we need to understand the logic: if you receive praise from someone and find reason to be happy about it because it makes the other person happy, then praise offered to all sentient beings should also make you happy for the same reason. Because it makes their minds happy, one should find reason to be happy for them too. With that reasoning, the commentary says, why then, when others become happy due to the happiness of the person praising an enemy, does one become unhappy? If that is the case, then when an enemy is praised, why do you not feel happy and instead have a jealous mind? One should similarly be happy when an enemy is praised. This refers back to the earlier points about inappropriateness of feeling unhappy when the enemy is praised.

However, when it is one's relatives and friends being praised, that makes one happy, because of one's attachment to them. This shows that one needs to overcome such inappropriate ways of thinking.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcribed by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་བ་ལ་འཇུག་བ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

14 April 2015

Based on the motivation we have just generated, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

It is very important that we generate a proper motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

2.1.4.3.2.1. Anger at obstructions to worldly dharmas is unsuitable

2.1.4.3.2.1.1. Anger at obstructions to receiving praise and reputation is unsuitable

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.4. The reason for it being distorted

2.1.4.3.2.1.1.4.2. If it is suitable to be wished for because it makes others happy, then it is suitable to like all others¹ (cont.)

The main point to be understood in this part of the text is that it is encouraging one to practise patience with many different reasons.

Indeed, the practice of patience is essential for our wellbeing. The reality is that we repeatedly experience all sorts of hardships and difficulties in daily life, which can cause us so much mental agony, and without the practice of patience it would be very difficult to bear those hardships and difficulties. More specifically, the patience of bearing these difficulties lies within the category of being patient with suffering. As you will recall, the definition of patience is a mind that remains undisturbed in the face of harm or suffering. Through the practice of patience we are able to protect our minds from becoming disturbed when difficulties and hardships arise, and thus maintain a happier state of mind.

Whenever we think, 'Oh, I have difficulty', or 'I have a problem', then the primary method for dealing with hardship and problems is the practice of endurance, willingly accepting that problem or difficulty. If we are able to practise the patience of willingly accepting hardship then we will not fall victim to that hardship. Conversely, if we lack that patience of willingly accepting hardship, then we will always be controlled by hardships. Then we will always be controlled by problems rather than being in control of those problems.

This is also true with our pursuit of studies. When we are willing to accept hardships, then whatever circumstances we may face we will be able to continue our studies and complete them. Otherwise when we encounter the slightest difficulties we might find excuses not to continue, saying things like, 'Oh, I'm just too tired', or 'I feel hungry', or 'I don't feel like doing it right now' and so forth. These sorts of excuses in the face of small hardships mean that we procrastinate, and may end up not completing our studies.

It's inevitable that we encounter hardships and difficulties with our study and so forth. However, the difficulties that you may face now are nothing compared to the hardships that I have gone through to complete my studies. In spite of many hardships, it was not giving up and willingly accepting those hardships that allowed me to continue, to keep up with my studies and complete them. I'm not saying this to boast about what I've endured. Rather, from my own experience I'm sharing with you what is possible when one has the mindset of willingly accepting hardships. With such an approach one will have the endurance to continue with one's studies.

In fact, willingly accepting difficulties is the optimum means for overcoming difficulties and hardships. If we don't willingly accept difficulties, then we will not find the means to overcome them. As a result we will be perpetually dominated by difficulties and one hardship after the other, to the point where we may feel that we are not be able to cope with them any longer.

Liking being praised brings about childish behaviour²

What is being addressed here is attachment to praise and so forth. When one has strong attachment to seeking praise and so forth, then that resembles childish behaviour. So we need to practise patience to overcome our attachment to this worldly desire for praise and so forth. As will be pointed out later on, our main goal is seeking liberation, and so being attached to praise and so forth is not conducive for attaining our goal.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

97. *Therefore, if one generates joy,
By saying 'I am being praised',
Since this is again invalid,
It resembles childish behaviour.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Therefore, if it generates joy in one's continuum saying 'I am being praised', then when this is analysed it does not have the slightest essence. In this way, since mere praise is not valid as the cause for happiness, it only resembles childish behaviour.

As the commentary explains, if one actually analyses the joy in one's continuum when one is being praised, then one would find that it does not have the slightest essence. When one analyses the situation, one finds that praise is merely conventional, and thus it doesn't have any real essence. So when one actually looks for the joy that one experiences when one is praised, one will find that there is no real essence to it.

The commentary continues, In this way, since mere praise is not valid as the cause for happiness... This means that mere praise is not the actual cause for happiness, so liking praise only resembles childish behaviour. What we need to understand here is that if there is attachment to praise, then the implied converse is that one will be unhappy when one is criticised. The two go hand in hand.

If one is attached to praise then that naturally means that one is averse to criticism. When one is attached to praise and seeks it out, then the slightest criticism becomes a cause for great unhappiness. Whereas if one has trained one's mind to not be overly attached to praise, then criticism will not cause so much unhappiness and mental pain. Liking praise and not liking criticism are joined at the hip.

¹ Last week it was given as It is distorted to make merely this as one's objective
Chapter 6

² Through liking being praised one becomes a childish person

In fact criticism can even become a cause for joy; great practitioners train their minds to welcome criticism. By applying the mind training techniques it is actually possible to like criticism. This is the main point that we need to understand: attachment to praise is ultimately the cause for unhappiness, rather than a cause of happiness. When one understands this point then one will be able to see that seeking praise, and always wanting to hear nice words and so forth, does indeed resemble childish behaviour. This is what needs to be understood.

These points are very significant points in relation to our everyday encounters with others. There are so many occasions where even the slightest provocative or unpleasant word can immediately cause great anger, leading to conflicts between individuals. So these are definitely relevant points.

2.1.4.3.2.1.2. Thinking of it as beneficial

There are two subheadings under this heading:

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.1. Anger at obstruction to praise and reputation is unsuitable, as it obstructs [the path leading to] the lower realms

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.2. Anger is unsuitable as one wants to become liberated from cyclic existence

From these headings we can see that when there is some obstruction to receiving praise, then that is actually a great cause to be happy, because it obstructs the path leading to the lower realms. Also, obstructions to praise and reputation liberate one from cyclic existence, thus there is no reason to be upset and angry about that. That is what is being explained under these two headings.

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.1. Anger at obstruction to praise and reputation is unsuitable, as it obstructs [the path leading to] the lower realms

This is subdivided into two

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.1.1. Through grasping at praise and reputation all faults are generated

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.1.2. Obstructing them obstructs the lower realms

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.1.1. Through grasping at praise and reputation all faults are generated

Before the verse is presented, the commentary presents this statement:

It is unsuitable to be angry at that which destroys praise and reputation.

Then the verse is presented.

98. Praise and so forth distract one
And also destroy disillusionment,
Jealousy for those with qualities
And degeneration of excellences

Here, Gyaltsab Je explains:

Praise, reputation and gain distract one from the virtuous object and also destroy disillusionment with cyclic existence. They also cause jealousy for others with qualities and also destroy one's virtues and the excellences of others. As such, they are the source of all faults.

The line praise, reputation and gain distract one from the virtuous object, presents an extremely significant point. It indicates that attachment is the main obstacle to one's meditation practice. This is explained in great detail in Chapter 8. When one has strong attachment to worldly concerns and so forth, one will always have a distracted mind. Consequently, because of these distractions, one will not be able to maintain one's focus on the virtuous object when meditating.

Furthermore, as mentioned here, praise, reputation and gain also destroy disillusionment with cyclic existence. The basis for developing renunciation is to first generate a sense of disillusionment with cyclic existence. So being attached to the joys and pleasures of cyclic existence, and being concerned with worldly things, such as liking praise and so forth, opposes the development of disillusionment with cyclic existence. Since attachment to praise and so forth destroys disillusionment with cyclic existence it is an obstacle for developing renunciation.

Then, as further explained in the commentary, they also cause jealousy for others with qualities and also destroy one's virtues and the perfections of others. When one cannot bear hearing about the good qualities and virtues of someone else, then that is due to jealousy. That jealous mind escalates to the point where it actually generates a mind of anger. Through not being able to bear hearing about the good qualities of someone, a mind of aversion or anger can arise. That mind of anger then destroys one's own virtues and excellences, and other good qualities that we have. So it is the mind of jealousy that leads one to generate the mind of anger, which then causes one's own excellences and virtues to decline and be destroyed.

Furthermore, the excellence of others is also destroyed. Through the mind of jealousy you can disturb the minds of others in various ways, causing their excellences to also decline and be destroyed. So, while a mind of jealousy and anger destroys one's own excellences and qualities, it also serves, indirectly, as the means to destroy the excellences and qualities of others as well.

Thus, the commentary concludes, As such they are the source of all faults, which means that attachment to praise and reputation is the basis of all faults.

These are really significant points of advice that speak right to our hearts. When others are praised one should find reason to be joyful and happy about that, rather than being unhappy. The only reason for being unhappy is because of jealousy. When we are jealous, we will feel uncomfortable and unhappy the moment others are praised. As jealousy increases, that discomfort turns into being unable to bear hearing others being praised for their good qualities and excellences, and that leads to anguish and anger.

Further, one needs to change one's attitude from one of acceptance, to one of actually liking it when others are praised for their qualities and so forth, thinking, 'Oh, how wonderful they have such qualities! These people are indeed praiseworthy because of their qualities and so forth. How wonderful it is to hear that praise!' This then creates a happy mind for oneself. Just as others experience joy when others praise them, one can also experience joy and happiness when they are praised. All it takes is a change of attitude, replacing a mind that would otherwise feel unhappy out of jealousy into a mind that feels joy when others are praised. Then, hearing others being praised for their qualities and so forth will bring happiness to oneself, which is a great benefit.

This is what we can refer to as the Buddhist science of the mind, which is really very profound. Indeed, Western psychologists and scientists also recognise how profound these passages are. They comment that this is not an exclusively Buddhist approach, but one that is universal. If everybody adopted these ways of thinking and changing attitudes, then there would be so much benefit in the world. We can describe these parts of Buddhist teachings as being the psychology or science of the mind. In fact the Buddhist world is rich in the science or psychology of the mind, although perhaps somewhat lacking in the science of the external world, whereas the western developed countries and so forth are quite rich in the science of the external world, while lacking in the science of the inner world, or science of the mind.

To reemphasise the main point, as a Dharma practitioner one needs to adopt an attitude of not being attached to receiving praise while being happy when others are praised. That is because being attached to receiving praise only contributes to the decline of one's own virtues and so forth. On the other hand, being happy to hear others being praised only brings about good qualities and virtues, while at the same time preventing mental agony.

The reason why I emphasise these really significant points is because they may be not be apparent right away. But if you really pay attention you will find that a lack of appreciation of the excellences and goodness of others actually causes lot of mental pain, more specifically jealousy, to arise. Many have confided in me saying that when they notice that their siblings or relatives are doing well, they feel uncomfortable, and even experience a lot of mental pain. Indeed, the people we are most likely to be jealous of are those with whom we have a close connection. It is less likely that we will be jealous of those with whom we are not acquainted, strangers and so forth.

As mentioned previously, we might not initially notice that the pain and discomfort we feel actually comes from jealousy. But if we really take the initiative to think about these points, we will check our mind as soon as we start feeling uncomfortable. Then we will be able to notice jealousy and be able counteract that jealousy. We can then replace the agony of not feeling comfortable with their excellences with an attitude of appreciation. Training the mind to be happy about the excellences of others definitely relieves much unnecessary mental pain and agony.

To retain a sense of balance, one really needs to pay attention to these points. As the teachings mention, it is the afflictions that cause us so much mental pain. To see this, all we need to do is to consider these practical examples of the effects of jealousy and anger. We can all relate to how they disturb our state of mind. Whereas the person who is practising, finding antidotes and counteracting these afflictions, is someone who is really at ease and who maintains a sense of joy. People will be at ease with them, and they will be welcome guests wherever they go!

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.1.2. Obstructing them obstructs the lower realms

Here obstructing them refers again to obstructing the worldly concerns of grasping at praise and reputation. And obstructing them is a means of obstructing the path to the lower realms. The implication here is that there is no reason not to accept that.

What we need to understand from this presentation is that this mind training is a supreme means of engaging in Dharma practice. If we want to consider ourselves as Dharma practitioners, then we need to take these points on board, and try to incorporate them into our mindset.

The relevant verse reads:

99. Therefore, aren't those that are closely involved
In destroying one's praise and so forth,
Engaged in protecting one from falling
Into the lower realms?

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning as follows:

Therefore, aren't those taking great care in destroying one's praise, reputation and so forth, engaged in protecting one from falling into the lower realms?
How can one be angry at them?

This rhetorical question implies that they are indeed protecting one from falling into the lower realms. When others are critical and destroy one's reputation, they are also destroying attachment to praise and reputation. Those who pamper us with praise and reputation could, in fact, lead us to become more inclined to be attached to that. Whereas those who are critical and who destroy one's reputation are, in fact, destroying one of the causes, i.e. attachment to reputation and praise, for one to go to the lower realms. When someone destroys that attachment to praise and reputation, then in fact they are ultimately taking care of one. So how can one be angry at them? This implies that one should actually like them.

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.2. It is the means to become liberated from cyclic existence and thus it is unsuitable to be angry³

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.2.1. Since obstructing praise and so forth liberates one from cyclic existence it is unsuitable to be angry

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.2.2. Anger is unsuitable as it cuts the door to suffering

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.2.1. Since obstructing praise and so forth liberates one from cyclic existence it is unsuitable to be angry

100. Oneself, who aspires to liberation, Does not need the restraints of gain and veneration,
How can one be angry
At that which liberates one from bondage?

Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of this verse as follows:

Further, since one aspires to attain liberation from cyclic existence, and since gain and veneration bind one to cyclic existence, one does not need such restraints. How can one be angry at that which liberates one from bondage by obstructing gain and veneration? It would be appropriate to like it.

The commentary begins by pointing out that we aspire to liberation from cyclic existence. Following this affirmation the commentary goes on to say that gain and veneration bind one to cyclic existence. Here we need to understand that attachment to gain and veneration binds one to cyclic existence. One does not need such restraints, relates to the earlier affirmation that one is seeking to be free from cyclic existence. Since attachment to gain and veneration actually binds one to cyclic existence, hence the affirmation, 'I don't need them, because I aspire to be free from cyclic existence'.

So, how can one be angry at that which liberates one from bondage by obstructing gain and veneration? Having pointed out earlier that attachment to gain and veneration binds one to cyclic existence, how could one then be angry with someone who actually obstructs the binding factor of gain and veneration? The words how can one be angry at that implies that one shouldn't be angry with them. In fact, as mentioned here, it would be appropriate to like it. Thus, rather than becoming angry with these obstructions, it is appropriate to like them.

³ The text uses Anger is unsuitable as obstructions to praise and such liberate from cyclic existence

2.1.4.3.2.1.2.2.2: It is unsuitable to be angry since it cuts the door to suffering

Again this is referring to obstructions to praise and so forth. Obstructions to praise actually cuts the door to suffering, therefore anger is unsuitable. The verse relating to this reads:

101. *One wishes to enter suffering
But like the blessings of the buddhas
It becomes the threshold not allowing to pass.
How can one get angry at that?*

One wishes to enter the house of suffering, but like the blessings of the buddhas, it serves as a bolt to the door, not allowing one to pass into that house of suffering. How can one become angry at that? Since it is a great friend it is appropriate to like it.

Being attached to praise is like wishing to enter the house of suffering, but, like the blessings of the buddhas, the obstruction to gaining praise and veneration is like a bolt that locks the door, not allowing one to pass into that house of suffering. How can one become angry at that? In this analogy, just as you cannot enter a house when the door is bolted, obstructing attachment to gain and veneration obstructs one from entering the house of suffering. Therefore how can one become angry at that? This rhetorical question is implying that one should not be angry.

Since it is a great friend it is appropriate to like it refers to those who obstruct one from entering a situation that involves great suffering; they are the greatest of friends. That is how this line is to be understood.

ANGER AT OBSTACLES TO THE GENERATION OF MERIT IS UNSUITABLE⁴

Having just explained the unsuitability of anger at that which obstructs gains, one might now wonder whether it might be acceptable to be angry at those who obstruct one's merits. This section counteracts that thought in three subdivisions:

1. It is unsuitable to be angry due to obstructions to merit
2. It is not an obstruction to merit
3. Think of it as an object worthy of respect

1. IT IS UNSUITABLE TO BE ANGRY DUE TO OBSTRUCTIONS TO MERIT

Here there are two subdivisions:

- 1.1. Abide on the supreme austerity
- 1.2. Obstructing it becomes an obstacle to one's merits

1.1. Abide on the supreme austerity

The commentary begins by referring back to the previous section.

Argument: Though it is unsuitable to be angry at obstructions to worldly dharmas,...

The implication of this is, 'OK, I accept that it is unsuitable to become angry with obstructions to worldly dharmas, but it must surely be fine to be angry with that which obstructs one's merits. Then the next verse is presented:

102. *They are an obstruction to merits it is said;
It is also unsuitable to be angry at them.
If there is no austerity like patience
Then wouldn't one abide on it?*

The commentary then completes the opening sentence:

... enemies obstruct the merits of generosity, morality and so forth, thus one gets angry.

Answer: It is unsuitable to be angry at them, because since one aspires to accumulating merits then wouldn't one abide in patience, since there is no other austerity that equals being patient with anger? It is extremely suitable to abide on patience.

The opening line makes this hypothetical statement: enemies obstruct the merits of generosity, morality and so forth, thus one gets angry. This is indirectly saying that they are obstructing our opportunity to gain merit. When others obstruct our gain, 'they are obstructing my means for engaging in meritorious activities such as generosity and so forth, and therefore I don't get an opportunity to accumulate merit'. Therefore, one becomes angry.

To counteract the hypothetical assertion that it may be suitable to be angry at those who obstruct the means for one to accumulate merit, the commentary says, It is unsuitable to be angry at them because since one aspires towards accumulating merits then wouldn't one abide in patience, since there is no other austerity that equals being patient with anger? As presented at the very beginning of the chapter, there is no higher form of austerity than the practice of patience. So because the practice of patience is a supreme form of austerity, it is the supreme means to accumulate merit. Since you aspire to accumulate merit, then rather than becoming angry at those who obstruct your means of accumulating merits, wouldn't you rather practise patience, since that is the supreme means to accumulate merit? The conclusion here is it is extremely suitable to abide on patience since there are no other practices equal to the practice of patience for accumulating merit. Therefore it is far more appropriate to abide on patience, rather than retaliating with anger.

1.2. Obstructing it becomes an obstacle to one's merits

The verse relating to this heading reads:

103. *If, through my own fault,
I do not practise patience with them,
I obstruct myself from Abiding close to the cause of merits.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on the verse reads:

If, through one's own fault of being greatly angry, one generates anger to abiding close to the cause of merits of being patient with the enemy, then one obstructs one's merits and not the other person.

Here we are being told that it is not the enemy that is the real obstacle to one's generation of merit. Rather it is the way one's own mind relates to the enemy. If one becomes angry with the enemy, then one's merits will decline, whereas keeping the enemy close will be a means to accumulate more merit through the practice of patience. As the commentary says: through one's own fault of being greatly angry, one generates anger to abiding close to the cause of merits of being patient with the enemy. So the enemy is actually a cause for one to accumulate merit through being patient with them, while becoming angry one destroys that merit. This is really quite a subtle presentation. In saying, then one obstructs one's merits and not the other person, the commentary is stating that the other person is not responsible or obstructing one's merit. Rather, through becoming angry one obstructs one's own merit.

⁴ ed. Technically this is the second part of the earlier heading 2.1.4.3.1. It is unsuitable to be impatient with obstacles to one's own benefit and obstacles to the benefit of those belonging to one's side, which was introduced last week. Because it contains a number of nested headings the numbering system is being restarted here.

Thus, it is all related to one's own state of mind. Depending on one's mindset, an enemy can be a great cause to accumulate merit by practising patience with them. But if one becomes angry with the enemy then what would otherwise become an opportunity for one's merit to increase, actually causes merit to decline.

To emphasise the point, it is the way we relate to the enemy that actually causes our mental agony. If we become angry with the enemy then of course our mind becomes disturbed. Whereas if we accept the enemy, even if they are near by, and don't allow ourselves to become angry, then there will be no mental pain or agony. So what is clearly being shown here is how it actually depends on our own attitudes rather than on the other person. Now this might differ from western psychology, which might say, 'If the cause of distress is the other person, try to avoid them'. However in Buddhism it is not the external person who is the cause of our agony, but our own mind.

This point was presented earlier in the chapter with an analogy of how it is impossible to subdue and overcome all enemies, but subduing one's own mind and overcoming anger is equivalent to subduing all enemies. The analogy was that it is impossible to cover the whole earth with leather so that one's feet will not be punctured with thorns and so forth. But if one covers one's own feet with leather then that will protect one's feet in the same way as covering the whole world.

2. IT IS NOT AN OBSTRUCTION TO MERIT

This has two parts, which are very profound presentations about how to practice:

2.1. General

2.2. Establishing with example

2.1. General

The verse relating to this reads:

*104. When it does not exist it does not arise,
When it exists it does arise,
If it is its cause
Then how can it be called an obstruction?*

The commentary explains:

The merit of patience does not arise when there is no harmer; when there is an enemy then the merit of patience exists. If this very enemy is the definite cause of the merit, then how can it be called an obstruction? That which is conducive is not suitable as an obstruction.

The merit of patience does not arise when there is no harmer, relates to the first type of patience, which is the patience of not retaliating to harm. The second two types of patience is the patience of definitely thinking of Dharma and willingly accepting suffering, which is much more pervasive, and relates to many different circumstances in life.

That first patience of not becoming angry and retaliating to harm is only practised in relation to there being a harmer. So there has to be someone who is harming us if we want to practise this type of patience. Gaining merit through the practice of patience does not arise when there is no harmer. It is only when there is an enemy that the merit of that patience of not retaliating to harm can be gained.

Further, the commentary explains, if this very enemy is the definite cause of the merit then how can it be called an obstruction? This refers back to the earlier presentation of how to counteract the false reasoning that it is suitable to be angry with an enemy because they obstruct our merit.

Here the text is saying that far from being an obstruction to one's merit, the enemy is the very cause of one's merit, because without an enemy who harms one, one could not possibly practise the patience of not retaliating in the face of harm. It is only because there is a harmer that the need to practice the patience of not retaliating to harm arises. Therefore, there is a cause and effect sequence where the enemy who is the harmer is the cause for the generation of patience of not retaliating.

Therefore that which is conducive is not suitable as an obstruction. Because something or someone is conducive to one's practice of patience, and thus the accumulation of merit, it cannot possibly be an obstruction. This is a very profound reasoning showing us how to see an enemy as our best friend.

If we can cover at least eight verses in each session, then we should be able to move quite rapidly through the text. The discussion and test nights should then take us through to the end of May.

We will also do our recitation of the Bodhisattvacharyavatara on 24 May. Please make a note of that date, as this recitation is part of the Study Group commitments. I have scheduled the recitation to coincide with Saka Dawa, the holy month of the Buddha's birth and enlightenment. Because that is such an auspicious time, reciting the text will be a means to accumulate extensive merit.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcribed by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སློབ་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

21 April 2015

While maintaining the motivation just generated, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

It is very important that we generate a proper motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

2. IT IS NOT AN OBSTRUCTION TO MERIT (CONT.)

2.2. Establishing this with an example

The word 'this' refers to the earlier point that the enemy is not an obstruction to gaining merit or practising patience. The example is presented in the verse that reads:

105. *The beggar at the time of generosity
Is not an obstruction to generosity.
Those facilitating the renunciate
Are not an obstruction to a renunciate.*

The commentary reflects the meaning:

At the time of having the means and delight to give, the beggar is not an obstruction to generosity. Also, the abbots and preceptors facilitating the renunciate are unsuitable to be called obstructions for becoming a renunciate, of those wishing to do so.

If a beggar happens to come by when one has the material means, and delights in giving, then at that time they are not an obstruction to the practice of generosity. In fact the beggar is a condition enabling one to practise generosity and gain the merit associated with being generous.

Similarly, for someone who wishes to practise patience, the harms inflicted by an enemy are not an obstruction to the practice of patience. Rather, the harmer is actually a cause for one to engage in the practice of patience, and thus accumulate the merit associated with that practice.

The second example in the verse states that abbots and preceptors who facilitate those wishing to become renunciates, or be ordained, are not an obstruction but rather the required condition for them to actually become renunciates.

3. THINK OF IT AS AN OBJECT WORTHY OF RESPECT

This is subdivided into two:

- 3.1. One should be respectful since it generates qualities
- 3.2. One should be respectful because one has faith in the Buddha

3.1. One should be respectful since it generates qualities

This is subdivided into three:

- 3.1.1. Great benefit to oneself

- 3.1.2. Not dependent on the thought to benefit

- 3.1.3. Viewing them like the Buddha

3.1.1. Great benefit to oneself

This is subdivided into three:

- 3.1.1.1. Supreme fields are rare

- 3.1.1.2. It is suitable to like them

- 3.1.1.3. It is appropriate to have the thought of benefiting them

3.1.1.1. SUPREME FIELDS ARE RARE

The objects of generosity are plentiful whereas objects of patience, particularly the patience of not retaliating to harm, are relatively rare. A supreme field can be related to something which is rare and precious. In this sense, those who harm one can be considered to be a supreme field, as they are rare.

The verse reads:

106. *In the world there are indeed beggars,
Those harming are much rarer,
If one thus does not harm them,
Then nobody will inflict harm.*

The Tibetan word long-wa literally means those who seek, and people who seek something from others don't necessarily have to be beggars. So while the word is loosely used for a beggar, in general it means someone who is seeking something from you. For example, we would not refer to Buddha Shakyamuni as a beggar, although he would have sought alms in the community as a means for others to accumulate merit. The term beggar here has a larger context, and should not be limited to those who are viewed as destitute and poor.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on the verse reads:

Since the field of patience is rarer than the field of generosity it is suitable to like one's enemies. In the world there are indeed beggars who are the field of generosity, but those who harm, who are the field of patience, are much rarer. If asked why, that is because if one does not harm others, then one will not be harmed in return.

The first part of the explanation highlights that the field of patience is rarer than the field of generosity, and thus it is suitable to like one's enemies. The field of patience refers to others who harm one and thus give one the opportunity to practise patience. Because those who intentionally harm one are rare, it is suitable to like them. Worldly examples confirm that rare things are more highly valued than common things e.g. the rarer a jewel, the higher its value. The field of patience refers to the harm giver, and because they are rare it is suitable to like one's enemies.

The commentary explains that in the world there are indeed beggars who are the field of generosity. This fact is easy to see. In these times of the five degenerations there is so much conflict, strife and poverty prevalent in the world. Thus, those in need of material aid are very easy to find.

In comparison, the text states that those who harm, who are the fields of patience, are much rarer. If asked why, the explanation here is that is because if one does not harm others then one will not be harmed in return.

This relates to subtle points of the karmic cause and effect sequence. If one is harmed now, then this is a result of having harmed others either in this life, or in previous lifetimes. This may not be immediately obvious, but consider the possibility that those we have harmed in the early and middle part of our life might start harming us towards the end of our life. This type of cause and effect sequence is quite prevalent. The key point here is that because of the harm you have extended to others, there will be others who will harm you. What is being pointed out here is that if one does not intentionally go out to harm others, then naturally others won't harm you. So, if you don't harm others it is unlikely that you will have many enemies harming you.

Normally we would think that if someone harms us we are entitled to harm them in return because 'they hurt me first'. This indicates that if someone has initiated the harm first, then there is a justification to return harm for harm in retaliation. Even in a legal context where there is a fight, the punishment is given to the one who initiated that fight. For those who retaliate, perhaps in self-defence, the punishment seems to be less.

The worldly perspective is that if someone harms you it is quite acceptable to harm them back. In fact it is considered brave and courageous to fight back. This thought is strongly ingrained into the psyche of ordinary beings. However Shantideva is pointing out that this is not suitable, and that one should not retaliate harm with harm.

The truth of what is being explained here is evident when related to a bodhisattvas' level of practice, because a bodhisattva, whose only intention is to benefit sentient beings, would not intentionally harm any living being in the slightest. Using a Tibetan expression, they will not inflict even an atom of harm on other sentient beings.

For noble beings such as bodhisattvas, whose very practice is only to benefit and refrain from the slightest harm to sentient beings, others will naturally appreciate them. When they are highly respected and admired, there would hardly be anyone wishing to intentionally harm them. This should hold true for human sentiments. Even animals, who are considerably dumber than humans, when nurtured and cared for can recognise that kindness, show affection and do no harm in return. If an animal can recognise those who have benefitted them and give affection in return, then surely, for humans with intelligence, that would have to be the case too.

Those harming a bodhisattva are rare because of the bodhisattvas' own dedicated practice to benefit sentient beings. When bodhisattvas do encounter someone with the intention of harming them, then rather than becoming upset they would show great respect to them. They act as if they are encountering a rare and precious gem that is a cause for them to further develop their practice of patience.

To take this as a personal instruction, we need to practise as much as possible not to harbour any kind of harmful intentions. If we were to actually practise not intentionally harming others, not even in the slightest, then others around us would naturally appreciate us and like us.

When the intention of refraining from harm and wishing to benefit others is extended to one's companion, someone who one lives with, then if those two people can practise in this way, then their relationship will be healthy and harmonious. This is something I emphasise regularly, as it is the means of leading a more meaningful and happy life.

These are significant points to keep in mind as one needs to reflect upon what causes a happy relationship with someone else. It is not dependent on wealth. Clearly just because one is wealthy doesn't mean one will have harmonious relationships. Also, just because one is influential or has status doesn't necessarily mean these will become conditions for having harmonious relationships. So what is the key factor to having harmonious relationships? It is one's positive mind, and the intention of wishing to benefit the other, and not intentionally harm them. Such a mind based on love and compassion is the key factor for harmonious relationships.

3.1.1.2. IT IS SUITABLE TO LIKE THEM

Having covered that the fields of patience are supreme and rare, the next point emphasises that it is suitable to like them.

The verse reads:

107. *Hence, just like a treasure
Received effortlessly in one's house,
One should like one's enemies,
Since they become a condition for enlightenment.*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

The fields for patience are rare. Therefore one should like one's enemies with the thought of wanting to repay their kindness, since they become the condition to meditate on the bodhisattva action of patience, just like a treasure that one receives effortlessly in one's house.

The first part uses the example, just like a treasure that one receives effortlessly in one's house. For example, if a destitute person suddenly found some treasure in their house, without intentionally seeking for it, how glad they would be! It would be a cause for tremendous relief and joy in their mind.

Further, The fields for patience are rare. Therefore one should like one's enemies with the thought of wanting to repay their kindness, and the reason is since they become the condition to meditate on the bodhisattva action of patience.

Using the example of finding a treasure without effort, the enemy that harms one is also incredibly rare and precious. Far from becoming an obstruction to one's ultimate goal of achieving enlightenment, the enemy who harms one becomes the supreme cause for one to quickly achieve enlightenment.

It is appropriate that one generates a mind of wanting to repay the enemy's kindness, as it becomes the condition to meditate on the bodhisattvas' actions of patience, thus becoming the cause for one's enlightenment.

The point here is that by regarding the enemy as extremely precious and kind, rather than retaliating with harm when they harm you, you should think about repaying their kindness.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama mentions that the supreme object of practising patience is the one who harms you. It is not our kind teachers who teach us how to practise patience, as there is no need to practise patience towards one who doesn't harm you. The actual practice is integrating the opportunity that one gets to practise patience when someone harms you.

3.1.1.3. IT IS APPROPRIATE TO HAVE THE THOUGHT OF BENEFITING THEM

The verse reads:

*108. Since it is established through this and myself
It is suitable to dedicate the result of patience
First to them -
They are the cause of patience.*

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse clearly:

Since it is established through this enemy, and myself practising patience, we are both the cause for patience. Therefore it is suitable to dedicate enlightenment, which is the result of patience, first to the harmer. The enemy is a powerful cause for the patience that creates my enlightenment.

Since it is established through the enemy and myself practising patience, we are both the cause for patience. In a practical sense, one's own initiative to practise patience is the ultimate cause for one to practise patience with an enemy, but it is through a combination of both practices that one is actually able to practise patience. Therefore it is befitting to dedicate enlightenment, which is the result of patience, first to the harmer.

This indicates the great extent of the bodhisattvas' aspirations and dedications. The altruistic mind of a bodhisattva acknowledges that the one who intended to harm them is actually a rare cause for them to practise patience.

When enlightenment is attained, the cause for the resultant enlightenment is thus dedicated first and foremost to the one who caused one to attain it, which is the enemy—the one who harmed us.

In bodhisattvas' practices that are completely dedicated to the benefit of others, there is no sense of self-centredness and no ulterior motive. Their practice is solely to benefit other sentient beings and acknowledge their contributions. The conclusion is that the enemy is a powerful cause for the patience that creates my enlightenment.

The aspirations and dedications we make in our daily practice come from the bodhisattva's supreme practices and positive way of dedication. Normally, when we do a practice one of the first dedications is to benefit all sentient beings to the ultimate state of enlightenment. This encompasses everything we are able to practise, and everything we receive is due to the kindness of other sentient beings. Recognising this it is befitting that we dedicate whatever practices we engage in first and foremost to the welfare of sentient beings, which is a very noble and selfless way of dedicating one's virtues. The merit one accumulates from this becomes expansive, and it is good to keep the significance of this in mind. If you use these explanations as a personal instruction to enhance your own daily practices, and give them impetus and deeper meaning, then it becomes beneficial.

3.1.2. Not dependent on the thought to benefit

This is divided into three:

3.1.2.1. It is incorrect that they are not an object of offering due to not having an intent to benefit

3.1.2.2. It is incorrect that they are not an object of offering as they have the intent to harm

3.1.2.3. They are a suitable object for offerings since they act as objects for patience

3.1.2.1. IT IS INCORRECT THAT THEY ARE NOT AN OBJECT OF OFFERING DUE TO NOT HAVING AN INTENT TO BENEFIT

What is being countered here is the thought of how could one consider an enemy as an object of offering, or to repay their kindness when they had no intention of benefitting you? The verse aims to overcome such doubts.

The verse reads:

*109. If enemies have no intent to establish patience
And therefore are not an object of offering,
Then why make offerings to the holy Dharma
Which is a suitable cause for practice?*

The commentary begins with a hypothetical argument:

Argument: Since they do not have the thought to establish patience in my continuum, they are not to be made offerings to.

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse, which provides the answer:

Answer: Then it follows one also should not make offerings to the holy Dharma jewel that is suitable as a cause for practice, because it does not have the thought thinking, 'I shall cause the generation of virtue'.

The argument is presented as since they do not have the thought to establish patience in my continuum, they are not to be made offerings to. One may think, 'because enemies just want to harm me, why should I venerate them and consider them kind'?

The answer: If you used this logic as a reason not to honour or make offerings to the enemy, what follows is that you would also not make offerings to the holy Dharma jewel which is in fact a supreme cause for one's practice. So while the Dharma jewel is one of the most supreme causes for one to practise, because it does not have the thought 'I shall cause the generation of virtue', one may as well think that there is no need to make offerings and venerate the Dharma jewel.

If the doubt is based on the harmer not having the intention to establish virtue in one's continuum, one could say that there's no point in honouring the Dharma as well, because the Dharma, being inanimate, doesn't have the intention to establish virtue in one's continuum.

This reasoning would not apply to the two other jewels, the Sangha jewel and the Buddha jewel. But the Dharma jewel as an inanimate object definitely doesn't have any intention to benefit one. However it is one of the greatest sources for one gaining understanding and knowledge, and the causes for developing realisations. When one thinks about the words of the Buddha as the Dharma Jewel, then it is the advice and instructions the Buddha gives that become one of the supreme means for gaining understanding and realisations to progress along the path. They are indeed an object of veneration and respect.

The commentary meticulously presents this very sound logic as a way to overcome one's doubts.

Seeing that an enemy only has an intention to harm, and thus seeing no reason why one should venerate them, is due to the ordinary worldly way of thinking. These arguments and answers are presented to counteract ordinary thoughts, where we find it reasonable to retaliate or harm an enemy. These are essential points for those who intentionally want to practise patience, particularly the patience of not retaliating to harm. For someone who intends to practise this, one has to use this reasoning as a way to counteract false justifications for harming an enemy.

3.1.2.2. IT IS INCORRECT THAT THEY ARE NOT AN OBJECT OF OFFERING AS THEY HAVE THE INTENT TO HARM

The verse reads:

*110. If: this enemy has the intent to harm,
And therefore they are not the object of offering.
If they were to strive to benefit like a doctor
Then how could one practise patience?*

Again a hypothetical doubt or argument is presented:

Argument: It is not the same. The enemy is not an object of offering because they have the intent to harm me.

As a way to counteract that reasoning, the commentary explains the meaning of the verse:

Answer: If they strove to accomplish benefit and happiness, like a doctor, then they would not be the object of patience. How would one then practice the patience that does not think anything of harm? It is suitable to like the harmer.

Using the earlier example of the Dharma having no wish to benefit, yet still being an object of veneration and offering, similarly the enemy should be an object of veneration and offering. The hypothetical argument states that it's not the same, because while the Dharma has no intent to harm oneself, an enemy does have the intention to harm one, and therefore the enemy cannot be an object of offering.

The way to counteract such flawed reasoning is that it is because of the very fact that they harm you that you need to practise the patience of not retaliating to harm. If they had the intention to benefit you, like a doctor, then they would not be an object of patience, and you would not get the benefit of practising patience.

As I mentioned earlier, one does not practise patience in relation to a teacher because a teacher only has an intention to benefit one. In general, a teacher is not an object that you need to practise patience with, because they only wish to benefit you. Likewise, a doctor only intends to benefit you, so they are not an object on which you would need to practise patience.

How would one then practise the patience that does not think anything of harm? Without someone intending to harm oneself, how could one possibly practise the patience of not retaliating to harm? What is emphasised here is because they are the supreme object for practising patience, it is suitable to like the harmer.

3.1.2.3. THEY ARE A SUITABLE OBJECT FOR OFFERINGS SINCE THEY ACT AS AN OBJECT FOR PATIENCE

The verse reads:

*111. Hence, since patience is generated in dependence
On a strong mind of hatred,
It alone is the cause for patience
And suitable for offerings just like the holy Dharma.*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

Since patience is not completed in dependence on a mind intending to benefit, it is generated in dependence on the harm inflicted due to strong hatred. Hence, only the harmer is the cause of patience and is suitable to be made offerings to just like the holy Dharma, despite not having the intent to benefit.

The earlier points clearly explained that patience cannot be completed in dependence on a mind intending to benefit. Rather it is generated in dependence on the harm inflicted due to the strong hatred of the harmer. What is further explained here is that there would be no need to practise patience with someone who benefits you.

Taking an example of a so-called enemy hitting you with a stick compared to a doctor giving you an injection. The injection still hurts us and we feel pain, but we don't find reason to get angry with the doctor. In fact we are glad that the doctor is giving us an injection so that we'll be cured of our illness. We are actually grateful and thankful for that.

If an enemy or someone who intends to harm one comes around with a needle and starts pricking us with it, we would become very angry. It doesn't even take a needle to prick us, even an inappropriate look will make us very upset and angry.

What this goes to show is that it is because of the intention to harm that we get hurt. When there's an intention to harm then the slightest inappropriate gesture, or physical harm, will become a cause for one to become extremely upset and angry and want to retaliate. Whereas when there's intention to benefit, even if there is some actual pain caused, then because of the intention in the other's mind, we don't consider it harm, or the other as an enemy.

The main point is that someone who harms us allows us to actually practise patience. Hence, only the harmer is the cause of patience and is suitable to be made offerings to, just like the holy Dharma, despite not having the intent to benefit.

The thing to understand here is the distinction between someone who harms, and someone who benefits. It really comes down to the intention they have in their mind. With an intention to benefit one, even when some discomfort is caused, such as when a doctor gives us treatment, we don't label them as a harmer. Whereas when someone has the intention to harm, then even the slightest inappropriate gesture causes us a lot of distress.

So what really differentiates a harmer from someone who benefits is the intention they have in their mind.

As mentioned in an earlier teaching, Lama Tsong Khapa said that without wishing the other to gain happiness and be free from suffering one cannot possibly have the intention to benefit the other. These are profound points that Lama Tsong Khapa is sharing with us: a genuine intent to benefit others has to be preceded by a wish for them to be happy and not to experience suffering.

3.1.3. Viewing them like the Buddha

Here, Viewing them refers to sentient beings, including the harmer, as being similar to the Buddha.

3.1.3.1. Extensive explanation

3.1.3.2. Summary

3.1.3.1. EXTENSIVE EXPLANATION

This is subdivided into three:

3.1.3.1.1. It is stated in the scriptures that sentient beings and the buddhas are equal in being a field for merit

3.1.3.1.2. Establishing this with reasoning

3.1.3.1.3. Refuting objections

3.1.3.1.1. It is stated in the scriptures that sentient beings and buddhas are equal in being a field for merit

The Tibetan word translated literally as equal can also denote similarity, so the heading could read are similar in being a field of merit.

The first two lines of the verse relate to this heading:

112ab. Therefore the Able One said: "The field Of sentient beings and the field of conquerors."

The commentary explains that:

Since it is necessary to treat sentient beings with respect it is stated in the Sutra Perfectly Containing Dharma:

The field of sentient beings is the field of the buddhas. From the field of the buddhas the Buddhadharma is obtained. It would be unsuitable to mistreat them.

In this and other quotes the Able One stated that the field of sentient beings, where one can plant the extensive seeds for merits, is as much a field to accumulate merits as the field of the buddhas.

Since it is necessary to treat sentient beings with respect it is stated in the Sutra Perfectly Containing Dharma, that the field of sentient beings is the field of the buddhas.

The term field is used in the context of the fields that serve as a basis for crops to grow. Likewise sentient beings reap the realisations leading all the way to enlightenment.

The field of sentient beings is the field of buddhas, relates to the cause and effect sequence of obtaining enlightenment. It is by relying on sentient beings, and engaging in the practices of the six perfections, that one implants the seeds of enlightenment to finally reap the result of becoming a buddha.

Furthermore, from the field of the buddhas the Buddhadharma is obtained, thus it would be unsuitable to mistreat them. The quote is explained with, in this and other quotes the Able One stated that the field of sentient beings, where one can plant the extensive seeds for merits, is as much a field to accumulate merits as the field of the buddhas.

What is explained here is that while we have great respect and veneration for the buddhas as a supreme field from which to accumulate merit and gain realisations etc., it is in relation to sentient beings that one actually engages in the practices of the six perfections. With the example of generosity this is very clear—without sentient beings as objects to be generous towards, how can one possibly practise generosity?

So it is in relation to sentient beings that we are able to practise generosity, morality and so forth. It is the same with the practice of patience, as presented here, without the harmers we cannot possibly practice patience. It is only in relation to sentient beings that we are able to engage in all the forms of practice.

Without relying on sentient beings one cannot possibly practise the six perfections. Therefore sentient beings are an extremely precious field for one to accumulate merit. In that light, as a cause for one's ultimate goal of enlightenment, the buddha fields and the fields of sentient beings are equal, or similar, in providing one with the causes.

When we generate faith there is a natural inclination to make offerings and pay respect to the enlightened beings. That is because we consider the enlightened beings as a supreme field of merit. But since sentient beings are an object for one's accumulation of merit, and without them one cannot engage in practices of generosity and so forth, they are also to be seen as a similar field of merit. The point here is that one should apply one's practice of veneration, respect and offerings to the buddhas as well as sentient beings, because they are a similar field of merit. In the teachings, the source of the points which emphasise that one needs to pay respect, venerate and honour sentient beings, is none other than Shantideva's explanations.

3.1.3.1.2. Establishing this with reasoning

This is subdivided into two:

3.1.3.1.2.1. By having faith in the buddhas and sentient beings one will attain the ultimate aim

3.1.3.1.2.2. To discriminate between them, accepting one and rejecting the other, is unsuitable, since they are the same in that one will attain enlightenment by having faith in them.

3.1.3.1.2.1. By having faith in the buddhas and sentient beings one will attain the ultimate aim

The next two lines of the verse read:

*112cd. Many a one, by making them happy,
Have thus gone to the perfection beyond.*

The commentary explains:

It is suitable to respect all sentient beings, because by having faith in the buddhas and sentient beings, and by making them happy, many have gone to the perfection beyond that has completed the two purposes.

Gyaltsab Je says that it is suitable to respect all sentient beings, because by having faith in the buddhas and sentient beings, and by making them happy, many have gone to the perfection beyond that has completed the two purposes. This emphasises that it is both the buddhas as a supreme field of merit, and sentient beings as a supreme field of merit, and the combination of making offerings, paying respect, and doing practices to both fields, that one obtains one's ultimate goal of enlightenment and thus fulfils the two purposes.

As buddhas and sentient beings equally assist one to achieve one's ultimate goal of enlightenment, both are equally an object of veneration, respect and offerings.

3.1.3.1.2.2. To discriminate between them, accepting one and rejecting the other, is unsuitable, since they are the same in that one will attain enlightenment by having faith in them.

The verse reads:

*113. The dharmas of a buddha are equally attained
From sentient beings and the conquerors.
What behaviour would it be to please the conquerors
But not sentient beings?*

The commentary explains:

For these reasons one attains the resultant dharmas of a buddha, such as the powers and so forth, equally from sentient beings and the conquerors. What kind of behaviour would it therefore be to respect the conquerors but to not respect sentient beings likewise? It would be unsuitable.

As explained earlier, both the buddha and the sentient beings are equal fields of merit, and so for these reasons one obtains the dharmas or the qualities of a buddha, such as the ten powers and so forth. This encompasses all the qualities of a buddha's holy body, speech, and mind. The particular qualities specified in the teachings are all obtained as a result of the fields of merit. As sentient beings and the conquerors are equal in this respect, what kind of behaviour would it therefore be to respect the conquerors but to not respect sentient beings likewise. This implies that it is indeed suitable, and that one needs to pay equal respect to both.

So what is being highlighted here is that, if on the one hand one is very pious, and shows a lot of respect, making offerings and veneration to the enlightened being, but on the other hand ignores and pays no respect to sentient beings, then this would be inappropriate and shameful behaviour as both are an equal cause for obtaining such qualities.

The personal instruction is that one really needs to incorporate this understanding and show genuine respect to all sentient beings, in whatever form they take, to always extend respect to all beings equally.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱུང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

28 April 2015

As usual we will now engage in our meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now we can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

It needs to be understood that generating a motivation prior to receiving the teachings secures the time we spend as a meaningful practice. In fact, with a proper motivation, the attention one pays to the topic being presented is actually a form of meditation. The purpose of meditation is to keep the mind in virtue. While a single-pointed meditation focuses on one particular object, listening to a teaching with a proper motivation is also a form of meditation practice. That is because it is a means for keeping one's mind in virtue. The teacher definitely has to maintain a focused mind, because they have to be focused on the teaching material. Likewise the listeners also need to take the initiative to keep their minds focused on what is being presented. When the attention that one pays listening to the teachings is complemented with the earlier positive motivation, then it definitely becomes a very meaningful meditation practice.

As I regularly mention, we need to incorporate the practices that we do here into our daily life, and then we will have integrated the Dharma into our lives. Just sitting piously for a few minutes at a time may not be really enough if we want any real transformation to take place.

3.1. One should be respectful since it generates qualities (cont.)

3.1.3.1.3. Refuting objections

This has three subdivisions:

3.1.3.1.3.1. Refuting that it is unsuitable to meditate on equal faith, because of not having equal qualities

3.1.3.1.3.2. It is suitable to equally meditate on faith, because the greatness of having faith in both is equally the cause for enlightenment

3.1.3.1.3.3. It is suitable to have faith, because the merits of making offerings to sentient beings, who possess parts of the qualities of a buddha, is infinite

3.1.3.1.3.1. Refuting that it is unsuitable to meditate on equal faith, because of not having equal qualities

This section refutes the thought that since sentient beings and enlightened beings don't possess the same qualities, it would be unsuitable to think that one could have equal faith in both.

This is a very reasonable doubt, and the following verse is a presentation of the way to overcome that doubt.

114. *Not through the qualities of thought,
But through the result, sentient beings
Also equally have qualities.
Therefore they are equal.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je begins with a statement of the doubt or argument:

Argument: Even though sentient beings are a field of merit, since they do not have equal qualities it is unsuitable to make offerings to them as to the buddhas.

Then he explains the meaning of the verse, which serves as an answer:

Answer: There is no such fault, because they are not made equal through the qualities of thought, but because they are the same in being the cause for enlightenment. Thus if one is equally respectful to sentient beings, because they also have the qualities of enlightenment, they are therefore equal fields of merit.

The main point is that sentient beings and enlightened beings are equally a field of merit. As explained previously, a field of merit is an object through which one accumulates merit. Enlightened beings are a field of merit for making offerings, and sentient beings are also a field of merit as an object of generosity. Indeed, sentient beings are a supreme field for accumulating the merit of generosity. Making offerings to the enlightened beings and holy objects is, of course, also considered to be a practice of generosity. However the real beneficiaries of an act of generosity are sentient beings. Therefore they are the supreme object of one's generosity, and since one accumulates merit in relation to them, they are considered to be fields of merit.

While accepting that both sentient beings and enlightened beings are fields of merit, the doubt being expressed here is that since they do not have equal qualities, it is unsuitable to make offerings to them as to the buddhas. The main point about this doubt is thinking, 'because buddhas and sentient beings don't have equal qualities there is no reason to have equal faith in both'.

They are not made equal through qualities but because they are the same in being the cause for enlightenment explains that even though they are not equal in having the same qualities, they are equally the cause for enlightenment. The lam rim teaching also makes this same point in stating that the cause for one's enlightenment relies equally both on the teacher, who presents the teaching, and sentient beings, on whom one relies as an object for engaging in the practices. As both are the same in being the cause for enlightenment, one needs to rely equally on the buddhas who present the teachings and sentient beings who are a condition for one's practice.

In simple terms, if one has to rely equally on both as causes for one's own enlightenment, then how can it be reasonable to only have faith in one and not the other? It would be quite unreasonable. If one is also respectful to sentient beings then one will gain the qualities of enlightenment. Therefore they are equal fields of merit. They are equal in being the causes for one's enlightenment.

3.1.3.1.3.2. It is suitable to equally meditate on faith, because the greatness of having faith in both is equally the cause for enlightenment

This further emphasises how it is suitable to meditate on faith in both enlightened beings and sentient beings, as both are equally the cause of enlightenment. The relevant lines of verse present this point very meticulously.

115. *Any offerings to those with the mind of love
Are the very greatness of sentient beings.
Any merit of having faith in the buddhas
Is again a greatness of the buddhas.*

116.ab *There is a part establishing the dharmas of a buddha
And therefore they are asserted to be equal*

Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning as follows:

The offerings to those endowed with the mind of love for all sentient beings, which is taught to be infinite merit, are the very greatness of the sentient beings that are the object of that love.

Any merit of having faith in the buddhas is again a greatness of the object of the faith, the buddhas alone. Therefore, having faith in both contains equally the causes that establish the dharmas of a buddha and therefore they are both equally asserted as suitable.

The offerings of those endowed with the mind of love refers to limitless love, focusing on limitless sentient beings. Therefore, the infinite amount of merit that is accumulated from developing a limitless mind of love for a limitless number of sentient beings is said to be the greatness, i.e. the qualities, of sentient beings. One obtains infinite merit because of the greatness of the object, which is limitless sentient beings.

Likewise, the merit of having faith in the buddhas is again a greatness of the object of that faith, which are the buddhas alone. When one generates faith in a buddha, one again accumulates an infinite amount of merit because of the greatness or the qualities of the buddhas. As one accumulates infinite amounts of merit through the greatness of the objects, they are both equally asserted as suitable objects of faith.

From this we can derive a personal instruction. When we do the tong len meditation, for example, we are attempting to generate love and compassion. The scope of the love that we are attempting to generate is, as explained here, love for an infinite or limitless number of sentient beings. When one ensures that one is focusing on the practice of giving and taking in relation to limitless sentient beings, then that becomes a means for one to accumulate an infinite amount of merit. So we can see that if we do our regular tong len meditation with a proper motivation and proper recollection, then it is not just a simple practice. Because it is very profound, it is a means to accumulate great merit. So one needs to ensure that one fully embraces the practice, on the basis of a deeper understanding of the explanations that have been presented here.

In summary, the main point is that the infinite merit that one gains by generating a limitless mind of love for a limitless number of sentient beings, is due to the greatness that are the qualities of sentient beings. Likewise the merit that one gains from generating faith in the buddhas is due to the greatness, or the qualities of the buddhas. Since both are equally a part of the Buddhadharma that one practices as a means to accumulate the causes for enlightenment, they are equally an object of faith.

3.1.3.1.3.3. It is suitable to have faith, because the merits of making offerings to sentient beings, who possess parts of the qualities of a buddha, is infinite

The next six lines of verse, which relate to this, read:

116cd. *Not at all equal to the buddhas
With an ocean of infinite qualities*

117. *Even giving the three realms for the purpose
Of making offerings to those few in whom appears
A mere part of the qualities of those That are only an accumulation of qualities, it would be too little.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

From the side of the qualities of thought they are not equal, because they are not at all equal with the qualities of the buddhas that possess an infinite ocean of extensive and difficult to fathom qualities. Although the qualities are not equal, there are some that have parts of the qualities of the buddhas who are an unequalled accumulation of supreme and great qualities. To give all objects of the three realms for the purpose of making offerings to them would still be too little. What need is there to mention others?

What is being explained here is that in relation to the qualities of thought or mind, the qualities of sentient beings do not equal the qualities of the buddhas, who possess an infinite ocean of extensive, and difficult to fathom, qualities.

Although the qualities are not equal, however there are some who have parts of the qualities of the buddhas, and to give all objects of the three realms for the purpose of making offerings to them would still be too little. This indicates that making offerings to someone who has even a part of the qualities of the buddhas is a cause for extensive merit. What need is there to mention others? This rhetorical question implies that if the merit of making offerings to someone who only has a partial quality of the buddhas is extremely extensive, then there is no need to mention the extensive merit gained by making offerings to all sentient beings.

3.1.3.2. SUMMARY

The verse relating to this reads:

118. *A part of that which generates the supreme dharmas
Of a buddha exists in sentient beings.
Merely through this they become equal
And it is suitable to make offerings to sentient beings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Though they do not have qualities equal to the buddhas, since a part of the cause that generates these supreme qualities exists in sentient beings, they become equal merely through this. Hence it is suitable to respect sentient beings and make offerings to them as to the buddhas.

As the commentary clearly explains, though they do not have qualities equal to the buddhas, a part of the cause that generates these supreme qualities exists in sentient beings. While sentient beings don't have equal qualities to the buddhas, the enlightened beings, there is a part that serves as cause for one to accumulate those great qualities of the buddhas. Through this they become equal in being a field of one's faith. Hence it is suitable to respect sentient beings and make offerings to them as to the buddhas. This is the summarising point.

3.2. One should be respectful because one has faith in the buddhas

This is subdivided into two:

3.2.1. One should be respectful because they view all sentient beings like an only child

3.2.2. Showing subsequently as a summary that one also needs to be respectful to sentient beings

3.2.1. One should be respectful because they view all sentient beings like an only child

This has three subdivisions.

3.2.1.1. Establishing the main method needed for becoming enlightened

3.2.1.2. To confess the disrespectful things engaged in earlier

3.2.1.3. Refraining from future disrespectful actions

3.2.1.1. ESTABLISHING THE MAIN METHOD NEEDED FOR BECOMING ENLIGHTENED

This is subdivided into two:

3.2.1.1.1. Identifying the main method for repaying the kindness of the buddhas

3.2.1.1.2. Achieving that very action

3.2.1.1.1. Identifying the main method for repaying the kindness of the buddhas

Having presented that, through to the buddhas' teachings and kindness in presenting those teachings, one gains the means to accumulate the merit for achieving enlightenment, the question is what is the best way to actually repay that kindness?

The relevant verse reads:

*119. Further, apart from making sentient beings happy,
How can one repay the kindness
Of those that are honest friends
And accomplish boundless benefit.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation in his commentary reads:

Further, another reason for treating sentient beings respectfully: The buddhas, induced by great compassion, are honest friends of all migrators who act without being asked and establish boundless benefit for them. Apart from making sentient beings happy, how can one repay their kindness? There is no better offering to please the buddhas than to work for the benefit of sentient beings.

The buddhas, induced by great compassion, are honest friends, means that the buddhas have no ulterior motive in benefiting others—there is no deceit and no intention of getting something in return. In other words, they benefit sentient beings selflessly, and they do so without being asked. Thus they establish boundless benefits for sentient beings. So the enlightened beings, in serving sentient beings, are honest and extend their benefits, even without being asked, and are thus friends of migrators, which establishes boundless benefits for sentient beings.

The great compassion of the buddhas was developed in the countless lives of their training on the path to enlightenment, where, as bodhisattvas, they repeatedly and unceasingly familiarised themselves with the mind of great compassion. Having attained enlightenment, the compassion with which they acquainted themselves over numberless lifetimes, transforms into unsurpassed compassion. Due to that, sentient beings regard the buddhas as great, honest and unfailing friends, who will be ready to help without any request being made. Unlike temporary small benefits, the buddhas offer boundless benefits that extend to alleviating all the sufferings and problems of sentient beings.

The second part of the commentary indicates that the way for sentient beings to repay the kindness of these unfailing, honest friends, who help without being asked, is by making other sentient beings happy. Apart from that there is no other way. This is expressed as a rhetorical question: how can one repay their kindness, apart from making sentient beings happy? This implies that there is no other way to repay the kindness of the enlightened beings, the buddhas, apart from actually making other sentient beings happy.

Furthermore, there is no better offering to please the buddhas than to work for the benefit of sentient beings. There is no other way to repay the kindness of the enlightened beings than by actually benefiting sentient beings by making offerings to them, making them happy and so forth. This is yet another reason for treating sentient beings respectfully.

3.2.1.1.2. Achieving that very action

Here there are three subdivisions:

3.2.1.1.2.1. Being patient when harmed by sentient beings

3.2.1.1.2.2. Abandoning the arrogance that focuses on sentient beings

3.2.1.1.2.3. Abandoning harm

3.2.1.1.2.1. Being patient when harmed by sentient beings

Even though this was presented earlier, it refers here to being patient when harmed by sentient beings, as a means of repaying the kindness of the buddhas.

As one doesn't want to upset sentient beings and make them unhappy, one needs to practise patience when harmed by sentient beings. The verse relating to this reads:

*120. If one repays the benefit of those
That give up their life and enter without respite,
Then even if one is harmed greatly by them,
One solely treats them with everything wholesome.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning as follows:

Benefiting sentient beings repays the kindness of the buddhas, who gave up their life for sentient beings, and who would even enter the hells without respite. Hence, even if one is harmed greatly by sentient beings one not only does not get angry, but one should strive solely to benefit them through one's three doors with everything wholesome that establishes all happiness for them.

As explained here, the act of benefiting sentient beings repays the kindness of the buddhas, who gave up their life for sentient beings, and who would even enter the hells without respite. This is explaining the unimaginable extent of the buddhas' practices to benefit sentient beings—their unceasing toil, giving up their bodies for the sake of other beings, and even going to the hells without respite. This is in accordance with the Commentary on Bodhicitta, which explains how, for the sake of sentient beings, bodhisattvas have no hesitation in engaging in any austerities in order to work for sentient beings. Their sacrifices are all for the sake of sentient beings.

If one is harmed by sentient beings now, then, as a way to remember and show faith in the buddhas, one should not only not become angry with them, but one should strive to benefit them through one's three doors with everything wholesome that establishes all happiness for them.

Engaging in the practice of being able to return harm with benefit is in fact possible when one contemplates and trains one's mind in thinking in this way. As the teachings have mentioned, there is nothing that one cannot achieve through acquaintance. Therefore acquainting oneself with this way of thinking will make it possible to actually return harm with benefit, rather than retaliating. With the practice of patience it is possible to return harm with benefit rather than harm.

At a practical level, the best way to apply this advice is with one's closest companion. As I emphasise regularly, in any kind of relationship one cannot expect to always hear pleasant words, and never hear unpleasant words. That is unrealistic. Indeed there will be times when, while a bit upset, or not in the right state of mind, the other might make some inappropriate comment or gesture. If one takes the initiative to not return that unkind word or gesture with unkindness, and tries to practise a bit of patience, and show an appealing gesture or a smile, then that will prevent a lot of difficulties that might otherwise arise. If one fails to practise patience, and decides to become upset and angry and retaliate with more inappropriate gestures and unkind words, then the problem will just escalate and worsen. Then that relationship will be harmed.

Of course this advice is not limited to sorting out the problems of couples and helping them to maintain a good relationship. The scope is much greater than that. Nevertheless ordinary life is where we really need to practice. We need to begin our practice with the individuals that we are dealing with on a regular basis. That is how to incorporate the teachings into our life in a practical way.

There have been people who have confided in me that this advice has been helpful when they have put it into practice. When someone comes home from work, don't get into the habit of querying them about their day if they come in with a worried face. Say 'Go and relax. Have a shower. I'll make you tea and a nice meal'. Speak quietly, and don't insist on asking 'Why are you upset?' which will only aggravate them even more.

3.2.1.1.2.2. Abandoning the arrogance that focuses on sentient beings

This is, yet again, very practical advice for our daily life. The verse relating to this is:

121. *One should not be ignorant and generate pride
Or be competitive with those
That even the very ones that are one's lords
Regard without concern for their own bodies.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Further, one should not be ignorant and generate arrogant pride or be competitive in any action with the sentient beings for whose purpose the very buddhas, that are one's lords, work without concern for their own bodies. One should abandon pride and be respectful.

As the commentary explains, one should not allow an ignorant mind to generate arrogance, pride or be competitive with the sentient beings, for whom the very buddhas that are one's lords work, without concern for their own bodies. This is explaining that it is inappropriate to generate pride and arrogance towards sentient beings, who are the very beings the buddhas have sought to benefit by sacrificing their lives and giving away their body, wealth and so forth.

If the enlightened beings hold these sentient beings so dearly and work endlessly for their benefit, then it would be totally inappropriate to develop a sense of arrogance and competitiveness with sentient beings. If anyone should have pride, it would be the buddhas, but in fact they only benefit and help sentient beings. So one should not develop pride and arrogance towards the very objects the buddhas help.

The really crucial advice here is that if one follows the example of the enlightened beings, the lords, who one holds in high esteem and respects, then one should refrain from harming sentient beings. Rather than arrogance and pride and so forth, they should only think of benefiting sentient beings. That is what has to be kept in mind.

3.2.1.1.2.3. Abandoning harm

This is subdivided into two:

3.2.1.1.2.3.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to harm

3.2.1.1.2.3.2. If one harms them there is no way to please the buddhas

3.2.1.1.2.3.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to harm

The text and the explanation in the commentary is quite clear. The verse reads:

122. *Those whose happiness makes the conquerors pleased,
Those then when harmed causes unhappiness to arise,
The conquerors are pleased when they are happy
And harming them will harm the conquerors.*

The explanation in the commentary reads:

The conquerors are pleased when sentient beings are happy, and are not pleased when they are harmed. Therefore the best offering to all the able ones is to make these sentient beings happy, by benefiting them. This makes the conquerors pleased, and harming these sentient beings becomes harming the conquerors.

As clearly explained here, The conquerors are pleased when sentient beings are happy, and are not pleased when they are harmed. So the best offering to all able ones is to make these sentient beings happy by benefiting them. This makes the conquerors pleased, and harming sentient beings is in fact harming the conquerors.

What is being explained here reflects a point that I regularly emphasise: the Buddha said that if you benefit sentient beings you are benefiting me, and if you harm sentient beings you are harming me. Thus, if one considers oneself to be a follower of the Buddha then the best way to please the Buddha is by pleasing sentient beings, and the best way to refrain from being disrespectful to the Buddha is by refraining from harming sentient beings. This is the point to be understood here.

We will break early, and recite the tenth chapter of the Bodhisattvacharyavatara together.

We will dedicated this first of all to Wendy Pullen's mother who passed away recently. And, as we all know, there has been that disaster in Nepal. So many people have perished there and we need to dedicate our prayers and practices to them. I haven't heard anything directly, but some acquaintances of mine might have been affected. So we also need to dedicate to them.

I have two nieces, who some of you met when we were in Nepal, and one of them has a son. The first time I met one of the nieces was when she came to the last Kalachakra in Bodhgaya, and later the boy came to Sera, which was the only time I met him. They live in Nepal in the Tibetan settlement, and I am not sure if that has been affected. I haven't heard anything specific, but I have quite a few acquaintances in that area. In any case, it is good to dedicate to all who have been affected.

Also Lama Zopa Rinpoche's brother, Sangay, lives in the next village after Boudha. His wife is the sister of Donyo, the Gyuto monk who used to live here. I was once invited to the house and had lunch there with Lama Zopa. I am not sure about the father but the mother passed away not long ago. There are some other relatives as well.

Student: There are also the men who are to be shot in Indonesia tonight. Many are holding a vigil tonight.

The nuns over the road said that they were doing some prayers for them. As spiritual people the only help that we can extend is by doing prayers and sending our good wishes and good intentions, and dedicating that to them.

What is happening in Indonesia seems to be because the Prime Minister apparently tried to say something quite forcefully, and then there was retaliation. Then he became very quiet. So if one is not careful it makes others very cross.

These are just some examples, and of course there are many who are suffering, and so we dedicate this recitation to all of them.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་ལ་འཇམ་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

5 May 2015

Let us do our regular meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now we can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

3.2.1.1. ESTABLISHING THE MAIN METHOD NEEDED FOR BECOMING ENLIGHTENED

3.2.1.1.2. Achieving that very action

3.2.1.1.2.3. Abandoning harm

3.2.1.1.2.3.2. If one harms them, there is no way to please the buddhas

The following explanations are quite easy to understand. The verse relating to this heading is:

123. *Just as one will never be mentally happy despite all sense objects
When the whole body is completely in flames,
Similarly there is no way to please the greatly compassionate ones
When one harms sentient beings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads

For that reason, just as one will never be mentally happy despite all sense objects such as food and so forth, if one's body is completely in flames, there is no way to please the greatly compassionate ones if one harms sentient beings.

The analogy here is that if one's body is consumed in flames then not even objects of the sense pleasures such as delicious food, beautiful sights and so forth, will bring mental happiness. The agony is so great that one cannot experience any joy from the sense pleasures. Similarly, there is no way to please the greatly compassionate ones if one harms sentient beings. The point of this example is if one were to harm sentient beings then, even if one were to present extensive offerings to the enlightened beings, it will not please them.

We need to understand how great compassionate ones' love and concern for sentient beings exceeds a mother's love for an only child. The love of a mother for her only child is a contemporary example that illustrates the extent of the love and compassion that a sentient being can have for another being. The buddhas' love and compassion for each and every living sentient being far exceeds that. It is hard to measure the love and compassion the buddhas have for all living beings. Thus, when one harms any living being, then that definitely displeases the buddhas. What we need to understand from this explanation, and put into personal practice, is to make every effort to avoid harming any living being.

No amount of offerings or practice can please the buddhas if one is harming sentient beings, as that is completely contrary to their wishes. So refraining from harming sentient beings is one of the optimum offerings to the enlightened beings. The real meaning of the Sanskrit word punja, which we pronounce as puja, has the connotation of pleasing the mind. Therefore since whatever pleases the mind of the enlightened beings is the real offering, avoiding harm towards any living being is the optimum offering.

It is good to understand the real connotation of offering as a way to incorporate it into our practice. With the proper understanding we can then adopt this resolution: 'To the utmost of my ability I will refrain from harming sentient beings, as this is the optimum means to gain genuine peace and happiness, as well as the supreme offering to the enlightened beings'. Of course, as mentioned earlier, it only becomes a real offering when we incorporate this understanding into our daily life and put it into practice. Nice offerings laid on the altar don't really amount to much if we neglect this essential practice.

One needs to understand that the practice of non-harmfulness is an actual antidote to harmful intentions. That is what practising non-harmfulness means. If one resolves to practise non-harmfulness, then one is applying the antidote to harmful intention. This is how the practice actually works—when it is applied as an antidote to overcome negative states of mind.

If we fail to understand this, then even though we might be able to extensively explain a topic, we will not know how to put it into practice.

3.2.1.2. TO CONFESS THE DISRESPECTFUL THINGS ONE DID EARLIER

This, of course, relates to the need to confess the negativities that one has committed, and then purify them. These negativities will have been driven by the influence of the three poisons, namely anger, attachment and ignorance. The way to please the minds of the buddhas is by accumulating virtue, and any negative actions will be a source of displeasure for them.

So one confesses all these negative actions. This involves developing strong regret for having committed those negativities, clearly recognising them as being such; understanding that it has been a great fault; feeling a strong sense of remorse; and resolving not to commit them again.

A point to keep in mind is that one will resolve to the extent of one's regret. This is where you need to refer back to the second chapter on confession, which explains how to engage in the confession practice. Otherwise, one might wonder what the practice entails.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

124. *Hence, whatever harm to migrators
That caused displeasure to the greatly compassionate ones,
That negativity I confess today individually
And request the conquerors to be patient with anything causing displeasure.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation reads:

Since harming sentient beings causes displeasure to the buddhas, I will confess the negativities that brought displeasure to the greatly compassionate ones, because of my previous harm to migrators. From today I will confess them individually, and not conceal them, and I request them to be patient with any harm to sentient beings that causes displeasure.

With the words, since harming sentient beings causes displeasure to the buddhas I will confess the negativities that brought displeasure, one recalls all the negativities one has engaged in previously, particularly those numerous ways where, under the influence of strong anger, attachment, or jealousy and so forth, one has harmed sentient beings. When one's mind is afflicted by strong negativities, then one engages in such negative actions as taking the life of other sentient beings, stealing, engaging in sexual misconduct, lying, engaging in slanderous, or divisive and harmful speech, and so forth. These negativities, along with covetousness, deluded doubt, and wrong view, are called the ten non-virtues.

As further explained, these negativities brought displeasure to the great compassionate ones because of my previous harm to migrators. Here it is specifically stating that these actions displease the great compassionate ones, i.e. enlightened beings, as well as the noble beings. So one is confessing all of the negativities that displease the minds of these holy beings.

Having identified the negativities one has engaged in previously, and with clear recognition of those negativities, one confesses them as follows, from this day on I will confess them individually and not conceal them. This refers to recalling all the negativities one has previously engaged in. Confessing them individually refers to confessing and purifying the negativities accumulated by engaging in physical actions, through speech, as well as negative thoughts. Thus one confesses and purifies the negativities created through one's body, speech and mind.

Not concealing them means that having acknowledged them, one proclaims those negativities verbally. One does this as a way of not concealing them. This is followed by requesting the compassionate ones to be patient with any harm to sentient beings that cause displeasure to the minds of the buddhas.

In summary, one identifies the negative actions that have harmed sentient beings which have caused displeasure to the buddhas' minds; one acknowledges one has committed them; one confesses them individually; one does not conceal them; and finally one requests the buddhas to be patient with the negativities that one has created.

3.2.1.3. RESTRAINING FROM FUTURE DISRESPECTFUL ACTIONS

Following the confession one makes a pledge or resolution to refrain from future negative actions.

The verse relating to this heading is:

125. *In order to make the tathagatas happy
From today I will be absolutely subdued and the world's servant
Though many beings pound my head by kicking it
Or even kill me, I won't retaliate but please the protectors of the world. Gyaltsab Je explains this verse as follows:*

In order to make the tathagatas happy, from today I will be absolutely subdued and harm nobody and become and accept myself as the servant of the world. Subdue here refers to accepting oneself as servant of the world with firmness in one's mind. Though many beings pound my head by kicking it or even kill me, I shall not retaliate but bear it and in such a way act to please the minds of the protectors of the world.

As explained here one makes the pledge: In order to make the tathagatas happy, from today I will be absolutely subdued and harm nobody. Here, subdued refers to subduing one's mind from harmful intention, and we can also relate it to delusions such as pride. And then become and accept myself as a servant of the world indicates that one will place oneself in a lowly position, where one shows great respect for all sentient beings, refrains from harming them, subdues harmful intentions and delusions such as pride, and pays respect to all sentient beings. This is what one resolves to do.

One should not misinterpret 'holding others as being supreme' as meaning that one should regard oneself as insignificant. That is not what it means. Rather, having respect for other sentient beings relates to remembering their kindness. As explained in the teachings, particularly in the Abhidharma, when one remembers the kindness of others one generates respect for them, and when one remembers the qualities of others one generates faith in them.

In relation to one's parents, for example, we develop a sense of respect when we remember their kindness. One wouldn't necessarily call that faith, but one will definitely have respect for one's parents, which comes from thinking about the kindness that they have shown. Whereas, by remembering the qualities and kindness of one's spiritual teachers, one can generate both respect and faith in the spiritual masters.

However, as explained in the text, it is appropriate that one generates respect for, and faith in, sentient beings. Earlier it was emphasised how enlightened beings and sentient beings are equal in terms of being a cause for enlightenment. Therefore one can have equal faith in, and respect for, sentient beings, as well as enlightened beings. In the example referring to respecting one's parents a distinction was made between faith and respect, but in general one develops both attitudes towards all beings.

When we relate to these explanations, we can see how Shantideva very meticulously shows how one needs to regard sentient beings, enlightened beings and one's teachers who present the teachings, in an equal light. The commentary clearly clarified that the causes for enlightenment relies fifty percent on the enlightened beings as well as the gurus who present the teachings, and fifty percent on sentient beings. Therefore, enlightened beings and sentient beings are equal in their kindness to us.

This is a presentation of the reasons why we should benefit and respect sentient beings, and not harm them. When we look into these explanations, we can see that they have a general aspect, as well as being a specific Buddhist practice. When it explains that harming sentient beings displeases the enlightened beings, and that the way to please the enlightened beings is to practise being kind to other sentient beings, then that is a specific Buddhist practice. Whereas explaining that one should respect sentient beings and not harm them, because they have been kind to oneself, is a more general approach. We can see that this is a presentation that everyone can relate to.

Next the commentary clarifies a point, explaining that, subdue here refers to accepting oneself as servant of the world with firmness in one's mind.

Finally there is a resolution or pledge:

Though many beings pound my head by kicking it, or even kill me, I shall not retaliate, but bear it, and in such a way act to please the minds of the protectors of the world.

Having confessed all these actions that have harmed sentient beings, and which displease the enlightened beings, and regretting that, one pledges, 'I will see myself as a servant of sentient beings. If they pound my head by kicking it or even kill me, I will not retaliate. I will not become angry, and I will bear it in such a way as to please the protectors of the world.

By presenting such a profound pledge, we are being encouraged to resolve to practise in this way.

3.2.2. Showing subsequently as a summary that one also needs to be respectful to sentient beings

126. *There is no doubt that all these migrators
Are regarded by those possessing compassion as self.
Those seen in the identity of sentient beings
Are in the nature of the protector, why not be respectful?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Having meditated on equalising and exchanging self with others, the compassionate buddhas have come to regard all these migrators as self. Hence without doubt, when seeing the nature of sentient beings they are to be regarded as the very protector of oneself, since respecting them gives enlightenment. Therefore why not be respectful? It is appropriate to have faith and be respectful.

When the commentary states having meditated on equalising and exchanging self with others, the compassionate buddhas have come to regard all these migrators as self, the word self is not to be taken literally. Rather it refers to cherishing them as one would normally cherish oneself. The compassionate buddhas previously engaged in practices of exchanging self with others and developed the altruistic mind of bodhicitta. They consistently engaged in the practice of giving up cherishing themselves while cherishing other sentient beings. Having engaged in that practice, and developed the altruistic mind of bodhicitta, and then becoming enlightened, they reached the perfected state where all sentient beings are dearly cherished equally.

Without doubt when seeing the nature of sentient beings can also relate to the ultimate buddha nature in all sentient beings. It is that essence of sentient beings that will transform into the state of enlightenment. On seeing that, one regards that as the very protector of oneself. Having seen the nature of sentient beings in that way, and since respecting them leads to enlightenment, Why not be respectful? This is a rhetorical question, implying that indeed it is appropriate to have faith and be respectful to all sentient beings equally.

2.2. Meditating on the benefits of patience¹

Having extensively explained how to practise patience, the text now goes on to explain the benefits of practising patience.

This section is subdivided into three:

2.2.1. In brief

2.2.2. Explaining the benefits with an example;

2.2.3. A summary of the list of benefits

2.2.1. In brief

127. *It alone pleases those gone thus,
It alone perfectly establishes the purpose of self,
It alone also clears the sufferings of the world,
Therefore I will continuously practise only this.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

To be patient and respectful when harmed by sentient beings, this alone is the supreme method for pleasing the buddhas. To work for the welfare of others, this alone is the supreme method to complete the accumulations in one's own continuum. This alone also clears the sufferings of all sentient beings. Therefore, since it perfects the two purposes, I shall continuously meditate on the three types of patience.

Earlier the text showed, with reasoning and logic, why one needs to practise patience, and be respectful when harmed by sentient beings, which is alone the supreme method for pleasing the buddhas. Also, To work for the welfare of others, this alone is the supreme method to complete the accumulations in one's own continuum. So working for the welfare of others becomes the supreme method to complete the accumulations of merit and wisdom.

Furthermore, as explained in the commentary, This alone also clears the sufferings of all sentient beings. So the supreme means to clear away the suffering of sentient beings is to practise patience, which means not retaliating, and refraining from harming other sentient beings.

Since it perfects the two purposes, i.e. the ultimate purpose for oneself and the ultimate purpose of benefiting other sentient beings, I shall continuously meditate on the three types of patience.

The three types of patience are:

- Not retaliating when others harm one
- Enduring suffering
- Definitely thinking about the Dharma

These three types of patience are the optimum means to please all the buddhas, they are the ultimate means to work for the welfare of others, and the ultimate means to refrain from harming other sentient beings. For all of these reasons one holds practising and meditating on these three types of patience as one's core practice.

Verse 127 has, in fact, been a summary of why one needs to respect sentient beings.

¹ At this point the numbering reverts to the larger structure of the chapter. The point where this started was 14 April 2015.

The sequence just completed began with the heading 2.1 Eliminating The Cause For Anger which was introduced on 30 September 2014. It is the second part of the heading 2 Applying the Mind To The Methods To Establish Patience.

2.2.2. Explaining the benefits with an example

This is subdivided into two:

2.2.2.1. Example and meaning from the point of view of benefit

2.2.2.2. Explaining it to be superior to the example

2.2.2.1. EXAMPLE AND MEANING FROM THE POINT OF VIEW OF BENEFIT

This is further subdivided into two:

2.2.2.1.1. Example

2.2.2.1.2. Meaning

2.2.2.1.1. Example

128. *For example, though some of the kings men
Inflict harm on many beings,
The farsighted people
Will not retaliate even though they can.*

129ab. *This is not because of them alone,
But due to the king's power, that is their support.*

Then the commentary explaining the meaning:

For example, though a few people belonging to the entourage of the king harm many others, the farsighted people that look at the long-term benefit or harm, will not retaliate even though they can.

That they cannot retaliate is not just because of the entourage's power alone, but due to the power of the king.

The example that is clearly explained in the commentary is when a few people belonging to the entourage of the king harm many others. In the event that some of the king's men go out and harm others, farsighted people who can see short and long-term benefit or harm, will not retaliate, even though they can.

If some of the king's men come out and harm many people, there will be some who, through their farsightedness are able to properly assess a situation to see potential benefit or harm, and thus see the long-term benefits of not retaliating, even though they could do so if they wished. They don't retaliate because the entourage of the king, or soldiers, are backed up by the power of the king. Retaliation would involve dire repercussions!

2.2.2.1.2. Meaning

Then the meaning of that example is presented.

129cd. *Likewise, one should not dismiss
An insignificant harmer.*

130ab. *The wardens of hell
And those endowed with compassion are their support.*

The commentary on these lines reads:

Likewise, as in the example, one should not dismiss any weak harmer, because they have as their support the ripening fruit of the hell guardians, and the displeasure of the compassionate conquerors and their children.

In comparison to the might and power of the king, a few of his men would be relatively weak. This refers to the fact that when the person who harms oneself is quite weak in nature, one should not think of retaliation just because they are easy to overpower. That is because it is as if they are supported by the hell guardians, and also because one would displease the compassionate conquerors and their children.

One might well be able to retaliate and easily overcome and vanquish a weak individual who harms oneself. However by contemplating and thinking about the negative karma one creates by retaliating in that way, one will realise that one would have to experience the ripening results of the hell realm and so forth.

The point is, as explained and emphasised in other teachings, that practising patience with someone who is much weaker is, in fact, a supreme practice of patience, and much more effective than practising patience with someone who is much more powerful and mightier than oneself. One is much less likely to engage in retaliation with someone who is mighty and more powerful, so practising patience then is easier. Whereas practising patience with someone who is much weaker is much harder, because it would be so easy to retaliate. But if one were to contemplate the repercussions, and the heavy negative karma that one would create, one will refrain from returning that harm.

2.2.2.2. EXPLAINING IT TO BE SUPERIOR TO THE EXAMPLE

130cd *Thus, like people and the wrath of the king,
One should please sentient beings.*

131. *Even if one gets angry at someone like a king,
Do they give the harm of the lower realms
That one will experience due to Making sentient beings unhappy?*

The commentary of these verses reads:

Because of this one should please sentient beings like the people fearing the wrath of the king. Even if one gets angry at someone like a king, do they give the harm of the lower realms, which one will experience as a result of making sentient beings unhappy? They cannot.

People fear a wrathful king because of the severe punishments that he can impose, such as imprisonment for long periods of time, or confiscation of land and wealth, and even execution. These are the repercussions of displeasing a wrathful king. Likewise one should please and not harm sentient beings out of fear of the consequence of going to the lower realms.

Can someone as powerful as a wrathful king give the harm of the lower realms, which one will experience as a result of making sentient beings unhappy? This rhetorical question implies that they cannot. What is being explained is that no matter how mighty and wrathful the king may be, the most he can do is confiscate your land, or your house, or your belongings. Even if you were condemned to death the most the king has done is to take your life. But he cannot take you to the lower realms. However, when one harms sentient beings, the negativity that one accumulates from that act is definitely a cause to be reborn in the lower realms.

132. *Even if one pleases someone like a king
That which one will attain
By pleasing sentient beings,
The very enlightenment, they cannot offer.*

The meaning of this verse is presented in contrast to the earlier point, which is that while the repercussions of getting angry at a king are quite severe, you do not receive all that much in return when you please the king.

Whereas the results of pleasing sentient beings are immense. The commentary explains:

Even if one pleases someone like a king, they cannot offer that which one will attain by pleasing sentient beings, the very result of enlightenment itself.

If one were to do something that pleased a king, the most the king can give back in return is some sort of recognition, such as the medals that generals and some soldiers wear. That is the most a king can give: some sort of status or gift, but nothing more significant than that.

The king can definitely not offer that which one will attain by pleasing sentient beings, which is, as mentioned here, the result of enlightenment itself. So the most one can receive from pleasing a king is some sort of recognition, or gift. However, by pleasing sentient beings, one can obtain the ultimate result of enlightenment. Thus what one achieves from pleasing sentient beings far exceeds anything that one could gain from a king.

This also reflects on how the meaning of the example is far greater than the example itself; that what one attains is much greater than what one would obtain from a king.

2.2.3. A summary of the list of benefits

Here there are three sub-divisions:

2.2.3.1. The main result

2.2.3.2. The seen result

2.2.3.3. The ripened result

2.2.3.1. THE MAIN RESULT

The relevant lines from the text are:

*133ab. Leaving aside the future buddha
That is attained as a result of pleasing sentient beings.*

The commentary explains the meaning as follows:

Leaving aside it being appropriate to please sentient beings and being patient with them by contemplating the benefit of obtaining buddhahood in the future a result of pleasing sentient beings, it is also appropriate to meditate on patience in relation to results ripening in this and future lives as well.

As clearly explained here, the results of pleasing sentient beings are found not only in the ultimate result of becoming a buddha oneself, but also in this and future lives as well.

Then the commentary presents a further clarification.

Although the meaning is clear, an earlier proponent says:

Since it is difficult to cognise a buddha, for the moment leave it aside.

Answer: It is not tenable to interpret the meaning in this way because although the phenomena of this life are easy to cognise, the extremely hidden future results are harder to cognise than a buddha. That a buddha can be cognised by depending on reason, without depending on quotations, but the very hidden meaning can only be cognised subsequently to this, accords with the view of all great pioneers.

What is being explained is the interpretation of the words leaving aside from the first line of the verse. An opponent says that the meaning of leaving aside reflects that it is very difficult to cognise a buddha. The commentary refutes this interpretation by stating that although the phenomena of this life are easy to cognise, the extremely hidden future results are harder to cognise than a buddha. That is because, a buddha can be cognised by depending on reason, without depending on quotations, but the very hidden meaning can only be cognised subsequently to this. This means that understanding very hidden phenomena, like the subtleties of karma, are dependent on valid quotations which are pure of the three-fold analysis.² Thus cognising a buddha is easier than understanding subtleties of karmic results.

The ripening results of specific karmas created in a previous life can only be understood by relying on quotations that are pure of the three-fold analysis. They thus fall into the category of extremely hidden or subtle phenomena, in contrast to the qualities of the Buddha, which can be understood through logical reasoning.

In particular, the subtleties of karma, such as a particular time, the place a karma was created and so forth are said to be only seen directly by a Buddha's mind, and thus can't be seen by ordinary sentient beings.

2.2.3.2. THE SEEN RESULT

The seen or obvious results are explained in these two lines:

133cd. In this very life one will attain great glory, Fame and happiness. Why does one not see this?

Here, Gyaltsab Je explains:

Also in this life there are seen results that arise from patience, such as glory of increased excellences, being well regarded and happiness. Why does one not see this? Therefore, one should strive in making sentient beings happy.

As explained clearly, even in this life there are seen or obvious results that arise from patience, such as glory of increased excellences. As one's excellences increase and one is well regarded by others, one has a happier mind. Why can't one see these obvious positive results? This question implies that it is obvious, and that one should be able to see them. Therefore the conclusion is that one should strive in making sentient beings happy.

2.2.3.3. THE RIPENED RESULT

The next verse is:

*134. While circling, one will attain from patience Beauty and so forth, absence of sickness, and fame,
Due to which one will live very long,
And one will attain the extensive happiness of a wheel-turning king.*

Here the commentary reads:

Also, while circling in cyclic existence one attains a beautiful form, the samsaric excellences, good health and great reputation. Through that one will have a long life. One will also have the extensive and vast happiness of a wheel-turning king.

² The three criteria for validating a phenomena are:

1. Obvious things are not contradicted by valid bare perception.
2. Slightly obscure things are not contradicted by valid inference based on the force of evidence.
3. Extremely obscure things are not contradicted by valid inference based on scriptural authority.

See the teaching of 15 November 2011 for more details.

The ultimate result of practising patience is that it becomes the cause of enlightenment. It can take a long time to achieve the state of enlightenment, but while one is circling in cyclic existence the ripened results of practising patience include, as explained here, obtaining a beautiful form and so forth. This is something that we can all relate to, because everyone longs to have a good, sound body and good features, as these contribute to one's good conditions. Then there are the samsaric excellences such as wealth, and having good health and a good reputation, which are also favourable conditions for our wellbeing. Added to those conditions, we will also have a long life.

One will have the extensive and vast happiness of a wheel turning king indicates that while in cyclic existence one can even reach the highest status of a wheel turning king.

The author of the commentary Gyalsab Rinpoche, concludes with:

In short, having recognised opposing factors such as having intense anger, intimidation from virtuous dharmas, a lack of aspiration for virtuous dharmas and so forth, one then relies on their antidotes, which are the patience that does not think anything from harm, the mind that is not harmed by suffering and abides in its natural state, and the patience strongly abiding on the wish for the Dharma due to discriminating awareness.

Thus by meditating on patience one strives to use the basis of having the freedoms and endowments.

SUMMARISING VERSE

Next, Gyalsab Rinpoche presents the summarising verse, which reads:

*Although one meditates on the virtue of generosity and the like for eons,
They are destroyed by the fire tongue of anger.
Therefore one needs to generate the force of patience again and again
And not give anger any chance.*

Here, Gyalsab Rinpoche very succinctly presents the need to practise patience, not just once or twice, but again and again. Only by applying the practice again and again will it become the means to actually overcome anger, and not give anger any chance to arise. Otherwise the practice of virtue and so forth will be destroyed by anger. Therefore one needs to protect oneself from that.

2. THE NAME OF THE CHAPTER

This is the sixth chapter called 'Explaining Patience' from the Introduction to the Actions of the Bodhisattvas.

The commentary concludes:

This is the commentary on the sixth chapter called 'Explaining Patience' from the commentary on the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

As mentioned last week, we will continue our sessions until His Holiness' teachings. There are three more weeks until the end of this month, so there will be one teaching followed by the discussion week, and the exam. An important thing to remember is to come to the recitation of Shantideva's text on May 24.

If you forget me it is no big deal, but forgetting Shantideva and the buddhas means forgetting the profound advice they have presented. The chapter on patience that we have just completed is such profound advice and instruction that we need to keep it in mind, and not forget it.

Indeed when we relate to the Buddha's teachings, we can see for ourselves that of all the various teachers that have come into the world, this is a unique presentation. It presents the teachings in a very unbiased way in order to benefit all beings equally. The profound instructions on how to do that, and how to practise, are very clearly explained in the Buddha's teachings. All the explanations are there, and all the ways and methods are presented clearly, so it is up to us as to whether we put it into practice or not.

Others, who are not Buddhists, have commented that the Buddha's teachings are not exclusive; rather, they are teachings that can be related to and applied by all.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱུང་རྒྱུ་མེམས་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བརྒྱལ་མོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

12 May 2015

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings as usual:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the Mahayana teachings, and put them into practice well.

As mentioned previously the way the chapters unfold can be related to this verse:

May the precious bodhi mind
Not yet born arise and grow.
May that born have no decline,
But increase forever more.

The ten chapters of the text can be divided along the meaning of this verse in the following manner: Chapters 1-3 are to generate the bodhicitta which is not yet born or developed. Chapters 4-6 explain how to maintain the bodhicitta so it doesn't degenerate, and chapters 7-9 explain how to increase the bodhicitta which has already been developed. The tenth chapter is dedication.

To explain how the next three chapters (7-9) serve to further increase bodhicitta, the seventh chapter commences with enthusiasm or joyous effort, which is the means one actually applies to develop bodhicitta.

Bodhicitta has two main divisions: conventional bodhicitta and ultimate bodhicitta. The way to generate conventional bodhicitta is explained in chapter eight, and then chapter nine specifically explains how to generate ultimate bodhicitta. That is the chapter on wisdom.

Once both conventional and ultimate bodhicitta have been developed, the way to secure the merit from these is presented in the tenth chapter on dedication.

CHAPTER 7 THE WAY OF TRAINING AND ENTHUSIASM

There are two parts to the chapter

- I. Explaining the text of the chapter
- II. The name of the chapter

I. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

This is subdivided into two:

1. Exhortation in the need to strive in enthusiasm
2. The way of striving in enthusiasm

1. EXHORTATION IN THE NEED TO STRIVE IN ENTHUSIASM

This is further divided into two:

- 1.1. Actual
- 1.2. Identifying enthusiasm

1.1. Actual

The first verse reads:

1. Being thus patient commence with enthusiasm. Enlightenment abides in those striving in this way. Just as there is no movement without wind, Merit will not arise without enthusiasm.

The commentary explains the meaning:

If one wishes to attain enlightenment quickly by being patient with austerities and harm by others, as explained before, then one needs to commence the practice of enthusiasm. Enlightenment abides in those striving in this way in the actions of the perfections. Just as without wind there is no movement of the flame of the candle and so forth, the accumulations of merit and transcendental wisdom will not arise without enthusiasm. Since the highest enlightenment depends on enthusiasm one should make an effort.

The line If one wishes to attain enlightenment quickly by being patient with austerities and harm by others, identifies the three specific types of patience explained extensively in the sixth chapter. Firstly, how to be patient with hardships when engaging in austere practices; secondly how to be patient when others harm one, and not retaliate; and thirdly, the patience of definitely thinking of the Dharma. Having explained the three types of patience, those who wish to achieve enlightenment quickly need an aid to practise patience, and this is the practice of enthusiasm.

This chapter presents how enthusiasm is practised, and why one needs to implement it in one's practice.

The commentary continues that enlightenment abides in those striving in this way in the actions of the perfections. This means that for someone who seeks enlightenment, it is brought forward only for those striving in the actions of the perfections.

The analogy presented next says that just as without wind the flame of the candle does not move, which highlights that it is wind that makes a candle flame waver. Without wind the flame would remain still without any movement at all. The meaning of the analogy is brought out as the sentence continues with the accumulations of merit and transcendental wisdom will not arise without enthusiasm. Enthusiasm is like the wind. Without it one cannot possibly accumulate the necessary amount of merit and transcendental wisdom, which are the actual causes for enlightenment.

The commentary concludes the paragraph saying that since the highest enlightenment depends on enthusiasm one should make an effort. The resultant state of enlightenment is obtained only through the accumulation of merit and wisdom, and without applying enthusiasm there is no way one will be able to accumulate the level of merit and wisdom needed. This is the reason to apply enthusiasm.

The commentary then quotes from the Introduction to the Middle Way to support this view:

All qualities follow enthusiasm, the cause of Both accumulations of merit and wisdom.

The quotation states that all qualities are obtained only through enthusiasm, which is also the cause for the accumulations of both merit and wisdom.

1.2. Identifying enthusiasm

Having explained the need for enthusiasm, the first line of the next verse identifies it:

2a What is enthusiasm? It is joy in virtue.

The commentary starts with the following:

Joy for the afflictions is laziness, thus if asked what is enthusiasm? It is the joy for virtuous objects.

It first presents the opposite, which is that joy for afflictions is laziness. Having defined what laziness is, it asks 'what is enthusiasm?' which, as presented, is the opposite—the joy for virtuous objects.

Enthusiasm is explained here in terms of its object and aspect. Its object is virtuous objects, and its aspect is joy. Hence the combination of joy focussing on virtuous objects is defined as enthusiasm or joyous effort. As joy for the afflictions is laziness, this would of course be non-virtuous. Focus on neutral objects would be a neutral state of mind, and not joyous effort.

Relating this to ourselves we would probably find we are inclined mostly toward having joy in the afflictions followed by having joy in neutral states. Of these, we might notice that joy in virtue is the weakest.

So the definition of enthusiasm also meticulously excludes what it is not. It is definitely not joy for the afflictions, and not joy for neutral objects. Thus, enthusiasm is defined purely as joy for virtuous objects.

When reflecting upon ourselves, we need to understand that if one has an inclination to readily feel joy in the afflictions, one must recognise this as a form of laziness, and non-virtuous. If we are serious about practice then we need to clearly identify the distinction between laziness and joyous effort.

The more one associates with the objects of the afflictions the more likely one is to engage in them further. This is how we create more and more negativity and get further away from developing ourselves on the Dharma path.

What one needs to strive for is developing joy in virtue. The more one applies oneself in virtue, the more one sees reason to apply oneself and actually adopt virtue. We slowly increase our virtues as we increase our engagement in virtuous objects, and apply our mind to abide in virtue. Acquainting our minds in this way enriches our Dharma practice by leaving very strong positive imprints, and virtue will gradually increase more and more.

The commentary categorises the types of enthusiasm:

It has the divisions of:

- Armour-like enthusiasm
- Enthusiasm of application
- Enthusiasm of non-disheartenment and non-disturbance
- Enthusiasm of non-satisfaction

Different texts have slightly different presentations of the divisions of enthusiasm. The extensive Lam Rim presents three divisions as: armour-like enthusiasm, the enthusiasm of gathering virtuous Dharma and the enthusiasm of acting for the welfare of living beings. The Abhidharma presents a division of five, however they all come to the same point.

Armour-like enthusiasm is described as an enthusiasm which is needed as a prerequisite to engaging in virtue. Having already contemplated the advantages and great benefits of applying virtue, this type of enthusiasm is required to make a strong commitment in one's mind not to give up on virtue no matter how long it takes, and no matter what difficulties may befall oneself. In the Guru Puja it says 'even if I were to remain in the fiery hells of Avici for eons, may I never give up applying bodhicitta'. So keeping the value of virtue in one's mind, and making a strong commitment not to give it up at any cost, is applying armour-like enthusiasm. Just as armour is used to protect a physical body, here the word is used as an analogy to protect the mind in being strong and firm when applying virtue.

To understand the analogy further, in the past, before going into combat, a prerequisite would be for the soldiers to put on armour to protect themselves. That is done before actually setting out to the battle in order to protect themselves from weapons (arrows, swords) in the battle. These days, we still have the equivalent of applying protective measures before engaging in combat. The analogy illustrates that prior to engaging in practices, one needs to develop a firm determination and joy in one's mind to engage in those practices and virtues. This then becomes armour-like protection for one's mind.

Enthusiasm of application refers to the time of actually engaging in the practice, and then maintaining that sense of joy in one's mind.

Next is the enthusiasm of non-disheartenment and non-disturbance. This particularly relates to maintaining a sense of joy while overcoming the sense of inadequacy which may think 'I'm not able to do this' or 'I'm not able to do that practice'. As a way for the mind to remain firm and protect itself from the disheartenment of feeling inadequate, a sense of joy is developed to create the enthusiasm of non-disheartenment and non-disturbance.

The enthusiasm of non-satisfaction may seem ambiguous but it refers to the enthusiasm of not being satisfied with only acquiring a few virtues. This is an important aspect of one's practice in order to further develop oneself. If one feels satisfied with just accumulating a few virtues or practices, that would obstruct one from gaining an understanding of the entire path. Developing satisfaction with just part of the path then becomes a form of laziness, which will obstruct further understanding of the entire path, particularly the higher levels of path. Therefore, enthusiasm means developing a joy that is not satisfied by merely acquiring moderate virtues, or understandings of the path, but rather to have joy in acquiring higher levels of virtues, and developing oneself toward gaining an understanding of the entire path. This will then leave very strong imprints on one's mind.

2. THE WAY OF STRIVING IN ENTHUSIASM

By following the sequence of the outline you can see that the first heading explains the need to develop enthusiasm, the next identifies it, and this part explains the way to actually practise enthusiasm.

It is subdivided into two:

2.1. Abandoning the conditions that obstruct enthusiasm

2.2. Increasing the antidote, the power of enthusiasm

2.1. Abandoning the conditions that obstruct enthusiasm

This explains that without having an understanding of what obstructs enthusiasm, and abandoning it, one cannot possibly develop enthusiasm.

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.1. Identifying the obstructing conditions

2.1.2. The way of abandoning them

2.1.1. Identifying the obstructing conditions

It is good to take notice of how the commentary presents the material sequentially and logically, which is also a means to remove doubts that may arise about why enthusiasm is explained following patience. Having identified enthusiasm, one needs to abandon what obstructs it, and then actually develop enthusiasm. The commentary presents this in a sequential manner.

The next three lines of the verse read:

*2bcd. I shall explain its antithesis:
Laziness, grasping at the negative,
And discouragement putting oneself down.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

I shall explain the antithesis of enthusiasm. There is:

- The laziness that grasps at the pleasure of lazing around, where body and mind are non-pliant.
- The laziness that grasps at the negative activities.
- The laziness that puts oneself down, thinking 'I cannot do this', after having become discouraged from practising virtue.

I shall explain the antithesis of enthusiasm shows that the antithesis or opposite of enthusiasm is laziness, which is presented as three types.

The first is the laziness that grasps at the pleasure of lazing around, where body and mind are non-pliant. This refers to the feeling of ease we feel when we're not engaging in practice, when we feel like just laying back and being relaxed and comfortable. At this time when our mind is not engaged in practice we think it is relaxing, but just laying around and grasping at pleasure is the first form of laziness.

The next is the laziness that grasps at the negative activities. This is the laziness that actually consumes most of our time. Examples are activities where we try to protect what is favourable to oneself, try to overcome what is not favourable. This is why we try to acquire as many favourable conditions as possible for oneself (such as friends etc.), and try to overcome those opposing us, such as enemies and anything which obstructs our pleasures.

According to the worldly view, if you are really busy, completely involved in working just for the sake of wealth, then this would not be considered laziness. It would likely be considered as working very hard. But according to the Dharma it would be a form of laziness because one is engaged in activities that not inclined toward virtue.

The third type of laziness is putting oneself down, thinking 'I cannot do this' after having become discouraged, where one feels despondent purely because one feels something is difficult. Having this sort of thought is the laziness of feeling despondent, which is putting oneself down.

2.1.2. The way of abandoning them

Next is the way of abandoning the three forms of laziness which is sub-divided into three:

2.1.2.1. Abandoning the laziness that has a taste for lazing around

2.1.2.2. Abandoning the laziness that grasps at negative actions

2.1.2.3. Abandoning the laziness of discouragement

Having already studied the mind and mental factors, it is good to note that laziness is one of the twenty-one secondary mental afflictions.

2.1.2.1. ABANDONING THE LAZINESS THAT HAS A TASTE FOR LAZING AROUND

This is divided into two:

2.1.2.1.1. Abandoning laziness upon investigating its cause

2.1.2.1.2. The way of abandoning

In presenting how to abandon the laziness that has a taste for lazing around, the outline starts with abandoning laziness upon investigating its cause. This means that in order to overcome laziness one must first identify its cause. Then, like any other cause and effect sequence, overcoming the cause allows you to stop the consequence or effect. Having identified the cause of laziness, it becomes more likely that one will be able to overcome it.

2.1.2.1.1. Abandoning laziness upon investigating its cause

The verse is preceded by the statement:

If asked what the causes for laziness are:

The text then presents the verse:

3. *Experiencing the taste of lazing around
And through craving based on sleep
One does not tire of the sufferings of cyclic existence
And generates an affinity for laziness.*

Gyaltsab's commentary expands upon the meaning:

If one views lazing around without engaging in virtue to be happiness, one develops a taste for this pleasure and grasps at it. This, and the craving based on sleep generates laziness, which causes one to be not the least afraid of cyclic existence and to not become disheartened with its sufferings. Through this in turn one develops an affinity for laziness.

Therefore strive in abandoning laziness upon having identified its causes!

The commentary says if one views lazing around without engaging in virtue to be happiness, one develops a taste for this pleasure and grasps at it. Viewing just lazing around e.g. kicking back on a comfortable couch, as pleasure, one gets a taste of this as pleasure and becomes attached to it. This then becomes a cause for actual laziness, because of the grasping at that pleasure of lazing around.

The next line in the verse says and the craving based on sleep generates laziness which is one of the main forms of laziness. If one has a very comfortable bed and looks forward to that bed thinking, 'hmm, I have a comfortable bed and I'm really looking forward to sleeping in it', then that becomes a cause for one to engage in excessive sleeping. If one indulges in this thought over and over, then that form of indulgence—the pleasure and attachment to the comfortable bed, and not having to do anything, but just go to sleep—becomes another cause for being lazy.

The commentary states this causes one to be not the least afraid of cyclic existence, and to not become disheartened with its sufferings. Not being afraid of cyclic existence because of one's attachment to it, not being afraid to enjoy its pleasures, not tiring of the suffering, and not even doubting oneself about the sufferings, are amongst the worst causes of laziness. This presentation states that everything that binds us to cyclic existence is considered a form of laziness. Therefore afflictions such as anger, attachment etc. can also be forms of laziness because they bind us to cyclic existence.

The commentary explains through this in turn, i.e. through the cause of the three types of laziness one develops an affinity for laziness. The commentary then concludes that one should strive in abandoning laziness upon having identified its causes!

2.1.2.1.2. The way of abandoning

This is divided into two:

2.1.2.1.2.1. Abandoning laziness by contemplating the disadvantages of this life

2.1.2.1.2.2. Abandoning laziness by contemplating the sufferings of the next life

2.1.2.1.2.1. Abandoning laziness by contemplating the disadvantages of this life

This is divided into three:

2.1.2.1.2.1.1. Explaining with example how death quickly destroys one

2.1.2.1.2.1.2. Since one is under the control of death, acting leisurely is unsuitable

2.1.2.1.2.1.3. If one does not strive in virtue, one shall be overwhelmed by suffering

2.1.2.1.2.1.1. Explaining with example how death quickly destroys one

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.2.1.2.1.1.1. One sees directly how one is destroyed by death

2.1.2.1.2.1.1.2. Explaining this with an example

The following verses explain the ways of abandoning laziness. One of the most supreme ways of abandoning laziness is to recollect death and impermanence. As explained in the teachings, when we don't recollect the fragility of our lives, death and impermanence, this causes us not to even think about practising the Dharma. Even if we did, if one does not recall death and impermanence periodically and strongly in one's mind, one will not actually practise it well.

These faults of either not thinking about practicing Dharma at all, or thinking about it but not actually practising it, or not practising it well, all come as a result of the fault of not recollecting death and impermanence periodically.

2.1.2.1.2.1.1.1. One sees directly how one is destroyed by death

The way to abandon laziness is presented as recollecting death and impermanence. The heading says one sees directly how one is destroyed by death, which implies that there is no way one could laze around and not engage in virtue and practise Dharma if one recognised how death quickly destroys one. Therefore it is presented under this heading.

The verse which relates to this reads:

4. *Having fallen into the trap of the afflictions
One is snared by the trap of birth
And finds oneself in the mouth of the lord of death.
How can you still not know this?*

The commentary explains:

Similar to animals that cannot escape death because they are ensnared in a trap, one has fallen into the trap laid by the hunter that is the affliction of laziness and so forth. Being thus controlled one is snared by the trap of birth that connects one with the next life, and hence one finds oneself in the mouth of the lord of death. As many beings have already gone and still many will go, how can you still not know this? Strive in virtue!

The illustration used here is a trap laid down by hunters to capture and kill an animal, so similar to animals that cannot escape death because they are ensnared in a trap, one has fallen into the trap laid by the hunter that is the affliction of laziness.

With this analogy of a hunter setting down a trap for an animal, once the animal is caught in the trap it cannot be spared from death. Death is imminent once the animal has fallen into the trap. Applying the analogy, oneself is like the animal being held in a trap, and the hunter is like the afflictions of laziness, attachment, jealousy etc. As such, one is caught in the trap and cannot escape the consequence of death.

As further explained being thus controlled one is snared by the trap of birth that connects one with the next life, and hence one finds oneself in the mouth of the lord of death. Being controlled by the afflictions is what connects this life to the next one, and so one is not spared from the mouth of the lord of death. This refers to the actual death itself. So that which connects one from this life to the next is having to experience death.

Using the analogy of the animal trapped in a cage, the hunter will not spare the animal. Likewise with the afflictions in one's mind, one will not be spared as these are the connecting factors between this life and the next life. Furthermore, as many beings have already gone and still many will go into the mouth of the lord of death, how can you still not know this? This implies that when we look back we can recall so many who have already died and many about to face death. So with this so obvious to oneself, how can one then sit idly and not engage in virtue. The clear message is that one needs to strive in virtue.

If we apply this explanation in relation to the presentation of the Lam Rim, it says that death is certain, and it is just the time of death that is uncertain. Also at the time of death, nothing but the Dharma will help, specifically having engaged in virtue or the Dharma practice.

What is being presented here as a personal instruction is that in the past you have seen many die already, and you may see some actually facing death. And having seen this, isn't it an obvious conclusion that one has to experience this fate as well? Therefore don't engage only in frivolous worldly activities which will not benefit you at the time of death. Rather, take time to apply yourself in virtue which will be your sole saviour and protector at the time of death.

An example of what has just been presented follows:

2.1.2.1.2.1.1.2. Explaining this with example

The verse reads:

5. *He is killing our kind gradually,
Do you not see it?
Those relying on sleep
Are like the butcher and the buffalo.*

The commentary explains this:

Do you not see directly that the lord of death is killing the old, young and middle-aged of your kind? Even while you see it, yet you develop craving based on sleep. This is unsuitable, for example, like the buffalo that is seeing directly that the butcher is killing sequentially the other buffalos, and yet he is unworried and abides leisurely.

The commentary elaborates with do you not see directly the lord of death is killing the old, young and middle-aged of your kind? 'Your kind' relates to one's peers, those you associate with, e.g. in a monastery it would be the other monks; in a lay community others within the community; within a family your family members etc. Amongst those you associate with regularly, there will be the old, the young and the middle-aged; all will have to experience death.

A rhetorical question is asked, Do you not see it? This implies that even when you do see it you still develop the various types of cravings based on sleep. That is what you do, and this is unsuitable.

The example presented earlier in the verse says, for example, it is like the buffalo that is seeing directly that the butcher is killing sequentially the other buffalos, and yet he is unworried and abides leisurely. In the east, when animals are butchered, the other animals are nearby. So a buffalo may well see the other buffalos being butchered, but it seems to be undaunted by that and continues to eat grass and drink water, until it is time for their turn to come.

This example illustrates that if one sees others of one's kind being taken by the lord of death—regardless of being old, young or middle aged—and one just sits around idly, and does not develop any initiative to engage in Dharma and accumulate virtues, then this is like a buffalo who is about to be slaughtered, but is lazing around as if it was unaware of what was happening.

On a personal level what we need to understand from this explanation is that we will all know someone who has passed away, and we might even have seen occasions where people have passed away. So when one sees or hears about death, this needs to become an impetus to remind us that one also has the same fate. There is no exception, one will also have to face that consequence of having to experience death. So, before that time comes, now is the time to prepare by accumulating virtues and engaging in Dharma practices.

If seeing others who face death does not stir up any kind of feeling in you, and remind you of your own fragility of life and impending death, then it would have not served much purpose. Seeing others face the fate of experiencing death should become impetus to remind one of one's own impending death, and serve as a way to encourage oneself to practise Dharma. This is precisely presented under the next heading.

2.1.2.1.2.1.2. Since one is under the control of death, acting leisurely is unsuitable

This relates to the point mentioned earlier that when one sees how those older than oneself have died, but think that death only relates to those who are older than oneself, then one may still feel quite relaxed and think one still has more time.

The fact is that even those of the same age or younger than oneself have also perished. This is an indication that there's no certainty about when death will approach. The examples we see need to become the impetus for one to reflect on the uncertainty of one's own death, and the fragility of one's own life.

This heading is subdivided into four:

2.1.2.1.2.1.2.1. One should not be lazy as one is under the control of the lord of death (which is the same point)

2.1.2.1.2.1.2.2. Strive in virtue since you will die soon

2.1.2.1.2.1.2.3. The time of death is the wrong time to abandon laziness.

What is implied here is that the time to abandon laziness is now, not at the time of death. The actual time death occurs is the wrong time because it won't have served the purpose of abandoning laziness at the right time. Rather one should abandon laziness now.

2.1.2.1.2.1.2.4. One should not be lazy since one can die suddenly, without finishing one's work

We have now just gone over the subheadings under since one is under the control of death, acting leisurely is unsuitable, so we can continue with the explanations in our next teaching session.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་མེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

16 June 2015

Based on the motivation we have just generated during the recitation of our prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

2.1.2.1.2.1. Abandoning laziness by contemplating the disadvantages of this life

2.1.2.1.2.1.2. Since one is under the control of death, acting leisurely is unsuitable (cont.)

2.1.2.1.2.1.2.1. One should not be lazy as one is under the control of the lord of death

The verse relating to this heading reads:

6. *Having closed off all roads,
The lord of death has cast his eye on us.
How can you enjoy food?
How can you enjoy sleep?*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

The butcher that is the lord of death has closed off all roads leading to the deathless city and has already cast his eye on us. How can you be like a careless buffalo and enjoy eating food or crave for sleep. This carelessness is unsuitable.

Here, deathless city refers to the state of liberation. The presentation here is that the road to liberation is blocked by the lord of death. Just as the butcher's task is to slaughter animals, the task of the lord of death is to take one's life. Our life can be taken by the lord of death at any time. Gyalsab Je uses the analogy of a buffalo who continues to enjoy eating grass and drinking water, despite the fact that other buffalos are being slaughtered around it. Even though such careless buffalos are on the verge of being slaughtered themselves, they behave as if there is no immediate danger to their life.

The Tibetan word, bak-mepa, translated here as careless, carries the meaning of lacking conscientiousness. The buffalo lacks conscientiousness about the fact that it is about to be killed, and we will be like that buffalo if we also lack conscientiousness and fall into a state of enjoying food during the day and craving sleep at night. As we are in the constant grip of the lord of death, death is imminent, yet we act like the buffalo who continues to enjoy food and drink, even as it is about to be slaughtered.

Taking this as a personal instruction, we need to reflect upon the fact that we are very fortunate in that we have obtained a human life with the eight freedoms and ten endowments. Furthermore, we have come in contact with the Dharma. So it would be a great pity if we were to focus only on the worldly affairs of this life, such as eating, drinking and sleeping, and not utilise this life to engage in some form of virtue to secure our wellbeing in our future life. Engaging in virtue and practising the Dharma becomes meaningful when the focus is at the very least for the betterment of our future life. This is really the point to consider here. The imminence of death exhorts one to engage in some practice of virtue. So, as the commentary explains, this carelessness is unsuitable.

To really take this instruction on board, we need to reflect upon how our remaining lifespan is constantly decreasing, and how the end of this life is definitely approaching. Now if our life were to completely cease to exist at the time of death, and if we didn't have to take rebirth again, then one might say that it is acceptable to devote ourselves entirely to worldly affairs, and enjoy ourselves as much as we like in this life, which, of course, involves accumulating non-virtues. If this approach were to actually bring some genuine sense of happiness, then we might again consider that approach as being worthwhile. But from our own experience we have found that when we are completely engaged in worldly affairs, our life isn't all that happy anyway. The main point here is that if we reflect on the fact that there is some continuity of life after death, and that we have to prepare for that future life, then we will understand why it is worthwhile to engage in virtue.

When we take a farsighted approach, and engage in activities that benefit our future life, then the natural by-product is benefit in this life as well. Whereas if one focuses only on the worldly affairs of this life, there will be no benefit in our future life, and only minimal benefit in this life. This is the significant point that we need to reflect upon.

There is a continuity of life that has no beginning, and at the end of this life we will not cease to exist. In fact this was the point of young Tenzin's question to His Holiness Dalai Lama in the recent teaching in Brisbane: if sentient beings need to rely upon the Buddhas to become enlightened then how did the first Buddha become enlightened? His Holiness definitely paid great attention to that question, and looked directly down at Tenzin as he answered it at length. I also have to say that many people have this same question.

His Holiness explained how there is a continuity of our mindstream, and that there is no beginning to samsaric existence, and that there are two interpretations about the end of samsaric existence. On a general level there cannot be an end to the cyclic existence of all sentient beings at once. In fact it is almost an irrelevant question, because some say 'yes', and others say 'no'. We could never be certain when that end has actually occurred.

However there will be an end to one's personal samsaric existence. Gyalsab Rinpoche elucidated the fact that because one can overcome all one's defilements, there is definitely an end to cyclic existence for an individual being. From the moment they gain the direct realisation of emptiness, cyclic existence ceases for that person, and they will not be involuntarily reborn into cyclic existence again. So there is definitely an end to an individual's cyclic existence.

The assertion that there is no beginning to cyclic existence relates to not being able to find a beginning to one's consciousness. When you trace back your consciousness you cannot find a particular point in time where you can say, 'This is when the consciousness first started'. So because there is no beginning to an individual's consciousness, it is asserted that there is no beginning to cyclic existence. Here of course the term consciousness particularly relates to the subtle awareness of an individual's mind.

Tenzin is to be congratulated for his very good question—he is a young person with a sharp mind! He also helped to clarify an earlier question asked by another person, to which His Holiness also gave a lengthy answer.

To summarise the point: an individual's cyclic existence ends at the moment the ignorance of grasping at a self is overcome by the realisation of emptiness. When the very cause of individual cyclic existence is severed, then the consequences of having to be reborn again in cyclic existence naturally ceases as well. When the cause of cyclic existence, the ignorance of grasping at an inherently existent self, is overcome, then the result, which is cyclic existence, ceases. This is the law of cause and effect—when there is no cause there cannot be an effect.

2.1.2.1.2.1.2.2. Strive in virtue since you will die soon

Again, the outline by itself explains the meaning of the following verse. Gyaltsab Je uses the outline as an exhortation to engage in the practice of Dharma: because one will die soon, one must strive in virtue.

The lines of verse are preceded by this hypothetical statement:

Argument: I still have some time

Then two lines of verse are presented as an answer to that statement:

*7ab. Since one is certainly going to die soon
One should build up the two accumulations until then*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on these lines explains:

Answer: One is certainly going to die soon and hence one should build up the two accumulations as long as one is not captured by the lord of death

The meaning of the verse is quite clear. One is certainly going to die soon, and hence one should build up two accumulations for as long as one is not captured by the lord of death. We can relate this point to the Lam Rim teachings on the certainty of death, which explain that our lifespan is constantly decreasing, and that it is never extended. The reality of our life is that with each moment that passes, our lifespan is decreasing. It is not as if it decreases, and then stops for a while. Our lifespan is constantly decreasing, and there is no way to add more time on to it. So we need to seize the opportunity to engage in virtue right now.

One should build up the two accumulations refers to accumulating virtues and abandoning negativities or non-virtues. Death is inevitable, and we can't do anything about the fact that we will have to face it. However, what we do have in our hands is the capacity to ensure that we will, at the very least, not experience any fear at the time of death, and that, by accumulating virtue, we can even take a better rebirth than our present one. That will then enable us to continuously engage in the practice of Dharma. That is something we can do now. We can't prevent death, but by accumulating the merit for a good rebirth next life we can definitely prevent fear at the time of death, as well as prevent an unfortunate rebirth.

We've all seen people who are completely obsessed with happiness in this life, and who end up being quite miserable. Things never seem to go well for them. They seem to be constantly facing difficulties and problems, because they are constantly trying to make things comfortable for this life. When things don't work out in that way, they experience despair and agony, and end up being quite miserable. Whereas those who focus on their future life engage in activities that will help them in the next life, while being more relaxed and contented, and thus happier in this life too. So you can see that there is a different outcome from these two different attitudes, one of which focuses only on this life, and the other which focuses on the future life.

What we can take as a personal instruction here is that it is really worthwhile to pay heed to preparing for our future life, by engaging, as much as we can, in accumulating merit with the intention that it will benefit us in the future. We are very fortunate that not only have we met and come into contact with the Buddhadharma, but we have come in contact with perfect teachers who explain the Buddhadharma, and we have the intelligence and means to understand it. It would be a great pity if we let all these good conditions go to waste, and pay no attention to accumulating virtue and merit for our future life. We have the ability to not only make this life happy, but also to prepare for our future life. So why not seize the opportunity to achieve both?

2.1.2.1.2.1.2.3. The time of death is the wrong time to abandon laziness

At the time when one is about to die, one might think, 'Oh, I need to practise Dharma and abandon laziness now'. But it is already too late, as death will occur at any moment. As there is no time left, abandoning laziness at that point will not really enable one to accumulate virtue. The implicit meaning here is that right now is the best time to abandon laziness, and engage in accumulating virtue.

The next two lines of verse are:

*7cd. Though one abandons laziness then,
What shall one do when it is the wrong time*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains that:

Though one may abandon laziness when one is held by death, what is striving at the wrong time supposed to accomplish? One will not achieve the slightest purpose.

We have just covered the meaning of this.

2.1.2.1.2.1.2.4. One should not be lazy since one can die suddenly without finishing one's work

The verse relating to this subdivision is:

8. *This started without completing it,
This one left half done,
With the lord of death coming all at once
One thinks, 'oh no, I am doomed.'*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Since one will die soon, at the time when this work is undone, just started, or half done, the lord of death comes suddenly. Then, regretfully, one thinks, 'Oh no, I am doomed.' When one is regretful from fear what shall one do? Strive in virtue, starting from right now onwards.

Here we can recall the story of the teacher who regularly used to tell his student, 'when we finish our work we will go on a picnic'. One day, the teacher saw a procession in the distance, and he asked the student what was happening, and what were they carrying? The student replied, 'Oh that is someone who has finished all their work, and who is going on a picnic'. In fact it was a corpse being carried in a funeral procession!

Since one will die soon indicates that death will not wait. At the time this work is undone means that a task has not yet been started, or a task may have just started, and half-done means that the task has yet to be completed. At any one of these stages the lord of death may come suddenly. Then one will regretfully think, 'Oh, no, I am doomed'. The implication is that if one has not engaged in accumulating virtues then one will feel regret and fear at the time of death. There is nothing that one can resort to if one has not accumulated virtue. The conclusion is that one should strive in virtue starting from right now onwards.

It is good to really contemplate these points and take them as a personal instruction, thinking that by engaging in virtues, there will, at the very least, be no regret at the time of death. That would be a good way to die. A peaceful death is one where one has no regrets, and with that lack of regret comes the consolation that one has done one's best to accumulate virtues and merit. When one has accumulated some virtue there definitely seems to be an ease at the time of death. This is a really significant point.

2.1.2.1.2.1.3. If one does not strive in virtue, one shall be overwhelmed by suffering

Here there are two subheadings.

2.1.2.1.2.1.3.1. At the time of death one shall be overwhelmed with misery

2.1.2.1.2.1.3.2. If one does not strive in virtue starting right now, one will not achieve one's aims

2.1.2.1.2.1.3.1. At the time of death one shall be overwhelmed with misery

The relevant verse reads:

9. *With swollen red eyes due to misery
And tears running down their faces,
Near and dear ones lose hope
And I look into the faces of the lord of death's messengers.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary of this verse reads:

At the time of one's untimely death, near and dear ones, with swollen red eyes due to misery and tears running down their faces, lose hope, and one, though being afraid, will have to look into the faces of the lord of death's messengers.

First of all, untimely death refers to the situation where someone might have a lifespan of, for example, one hundred years. However due to misadventure or accident, they can die prematurely. There used to be a student called Norman Henderson who asked questions, very respectfully, with his palms together. One of his questions I remember, concerned the meaning of untimely death. He wondered how, if there is a fixed time for everyone to die, one could die before that fixed time. He was quite baffled as to how someone could die when it was not their time.

It is quite clearly explained here in the commentary that it would be unfortunate if one were to be completely consumed by fear at the time of death. And if one has not prepared for one's death, then the prospect of death can definitely be a cause for fear and so forth. The exhortation here is to prepare for death by engaging in virtue and so forth. By accepting death and being prepared for it, there will be no place for fear.

As we contemplate these passages talking about death, we need to remind ourselves that the main point is that they are not intended to cause irrational fear about death. Rather, their purpose is to exhort one to engage in virtue, or in more simple terms, to lead a more meaningful life. So it is good to understand these passages in their proper context. Generating irrational fear or paranoia about death doesn't really serve much purpose.

2..2.1.2.1.3.2. If one does not strive in virtue starting right now, one will not achieve one's aims

Again, the meaning of the outline is be quite clear.

10. *When overwhelmed by the memory of one's negativities,
And covering one's body with excrement
As one becomes mad with fright because one Hears the sounds of the hells, what shall one do then?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

When being overwhelmed by the memory of the negativities that one created before, and one covers one's body with excrement as one becomes mad with fright, thinking 'I too have to go there', because one hears the sounds of the great sufferings of hell that one will definitely experience, such as being burned and so forth—at this time, when it is unsuitable to practise enthusiasm, what shall one do? One needs to strive in virtue straight away.

As explained quite clearly in the commentary, if, at the time of death one's mind is disturbed by the memory of the negativities that one has created in the past, it causes fear and so forth to arise. On a physical level one has no real control over one's bodily functions, and one's body can, uncontrollably, be covered by one's own excrement. It seems that at this time such people do have fearful visions and so forth in relation to the prospect of their future existence, which causes even more fear. But it is too late to practise enthusiasm, because the end of one's life is already in sight. The point here is that one needs to apply enthusiasm and engage in virtue, right now.

2.1.2.1.2.2. Abandoning laziness by contemplating the sufferings of the next life

This is has four subdivisions:

2.1.2.1.2.2.1. Sufferings will definitely arise

2.1.2.1.2.2.2. They are difficult to bear

2.1.2.1.2.2.3. It is contradictory to wish for happiness and not to strive in virtue

2.1.2.1.2.2.4. Exhorting to strive in the method for becoming liberated from suffering

These four points are an exhortation to strive in the method for becoming liberated from suffering.

2.1.2.1.2.2.1. Sufferings will definitely arise

The verse relating to this heading reads:

11. *Since one will have dangers in this life,
Like a flapping live fish,
What need is there to mention the unbearable
sufferings
Of hell, created by negativity.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

When you die you will have sufferings like a live fish flapping on hot sand. If one has such fears even in this life then what need is there to talk about what happens when you experience directly the unbearable sufferings of hell due to the results of the negativity you created?

This is an explanation of the suffering that can be experienced just before the moment of death, if one has spent one's life in negativities and not taken the initiative to accumulate virtue. Their suffering will be just like a live fish flapping on hot sand. If you put a fish on hot sand, its suffering will be unbearable as it flaps about in constant motion.

As the commentary further explains, such fears or sufferings, even in this life are just a prelude to the sufferings that will be experienced after death. So what need is there to talk about what happens when you experience directly the unbearable sufferings of hell you will experience as a result of the negativity you created? The main point here is that if the sufferings just prior to death are so unbearable, then one can just imagine the great unbearable suffering that will have to be experienced in the lower realms like the hell realms.

In order to prevent such suffering one needs to engage in virtue, as a mind that is imbued with virtue assists a peaceful death. Normally we consider that a good death is when the body is relaxed, and there is no experience of agony or pain. So we are being exhorted to prepare for our own comfortable death now, by engaging in virtue.

The point of the main heading, Abandoning Laziness by Contemplating the Sufferings of the Next Life is that we can prevent the prospect of suffering at the time of death, and most importantly the sufferings in the future lifetime. Thinking about that with a calm, logical and factual understanding will encourage one not to waste time now. Rather than engage in laziness, one needs to apply enthusiasm in order to accumulate virtues and avoid negativities. This is the main way to avoid these fears and sufferings.

We will conclude here and recite the tenth chapter of Shantideva's text as a dedication for Tenzin—Ingrid's oldest son—who passed away recently. I don't have to go into a detailed explanation about the dedication, as the text itself is quite clear. When I received the message about his passing I did my best to do prayers from my side, with the hope that they will benefit him. The message could be passed on to Ingrid that this practice is the best thing we can do for him now. Feeling remorse and regret will not help him in any way, but doing this practice together will definitely benefit him.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་སྐྱེས་མཉམ་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བརྒྱལ་མོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

23 June 2015

While maintaining the motivation we have just generated during the recitation of our prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

Having just engaged in the tong len (giving and taking) meditation practice, we need to recognise how to incorporate its real essence, which is to generate and strengthen love and compassion in our heart. We need to do this to the extent that when we see suffering sentient beings deprived of happiness, we will be naturally inclined to help free them from sufferings and establish their happiness. The essence of Dharma practice is when we develop these attitudes and incorporate them in our practice.

Engaging the practice of tong len should not be a matter of just visualising it while sitting in a formal meditation posture. It needs to actually move one's mind, to transform it so that there is a more genuine sense of love and compassion extending towards other sentient beings. We need to ensure this.

I regularly emphasise that to actually embrace the practice of love and compassion extending to all beings in general, one needs to first establish love and compassion towards those who are close to oneself. If one cannot really generate a genuine sense of love and compassion towards those who are close to one, then it is quite unlikely that one will be able to develop it to the greater degree of focusing on all beings. Indeed, one needs to take the initiative to cultivate a true sense of love and compassion, beginning with those closest to oneself. One can then definitely experience the practical benefits to the extent that it will reduce problems and conflicts one may have with those who are close. In fact all our problems will naturally begin to subside. We can see that any problems that arise due to conflict, or that arise with those we are close to or deal with regularly, really arise from a lack of genuine love and compassion towards them.

When a genuine sense of love and compassion starts to take root, it is a fact that it overcomes a lot of unwanted problems and conflicts. Thus one can have a more joyous and happy relationship with one's companion and others in general.

We all already have the seeds of love and compassion within us, and it's a matter of further developing and strengthening them. This occurs gradually when we take the initiative to contemplate on the great advantage and the essential need to develop love and compassion, and put the methods into practice. Gradually we will see that a true sense of love and compassion starts to develop in one's heart.

We can definitely see the positive outcomes of someone who has developed love and compassion as they contribute to the wellbeing of the community or society they may live in. A true sense of love and compassion means a true sense of concern for others, so such people will strive to bring about the wellbeing and betterment of that community or society. They will not engage in any destructive activities that harm their community or society's wellbeing. The positive outcome is that they will be appreciated and welcomed by others everywhere. They themselves will always have a sense of ease and natural calmness about them, and because they're not causing trouble for anyone, they won't have any enemies confronting them. This is how we need to relate to developing love and compassion on a practical basis—that real benefit does occur.

I definitely see the practice of cultivating love and compassion as essential and the most beneficial practice. In my regular practice I try to associate my mind with love and compassion, to recall it and remind myself of its essential qualities. Wherever I go, whatever the occasion might be I try to make my mind become close to the feelings and attitudes of love and compassion.

In my own personal experience, the positive consequences I experience are because I have imbued my mind with that positive attitude. Wherever I go I'm personally joyful and feel happy in whatever circumstances I find myself in. Ordinary everyday people I don't regularly associate with, or know well personally, befriend me and are happy to help me in whatever circumstance I may be in. Even though I don't ask for their help they seem naturally drawn towards trying to help me. I definitely attribute this to my efforts to try to cultivate positive attitudes. So from my own personal experience I can say that a practical benefit of befriending others and seeing everyone as close, is that it brings companionship and friendship. This is a real and positive outcome of the practice.

Most importantly, the more we familiarise ourselves with the tong len practice of giving and taking to strengthen our love and compassion, the more it will particularly assist us at the time of death when we may experience difficulties. Being familiar with tong len then allows us to take on the sufferings of all sentient beings while experiencing suffering oneself. If at that time we immediately resort to tong len and take on the sufferings of other sentient beings, this will purify extensive negative karmas and assist us to have a good rebirth. When very heavy negative karmas are purified, the consequences can only be that one experiences the positive results of one's karma, which will assist one for a future good rebirth.

Familiarity with the practice of exhibiting love and compassion and cultivating a positive attitude creates positive imprints, which are carried on to the future life. We can see the result in young children where some are naturally considerate and compassionate towards others.

Without being influenced they exhibit genuine concern, love and compassion towards others from their own side. This is a clear sign that they have been familiar with positive attitudes in their previous lifetimes.

I'm trying to exhort you to really take this practice to heart. The practice of Dharma really is the means of accumulating virtue and abandoning negativity. In summary that is really what Dharma practice encompasses, because any practice we relate to will be either the specific means to accumulate merit and virtues, or the means to purify one's negative karma as a way to abandon negativities.

In simple terms, if one were asked what one needs to accumulate in one's practice, it is virtue. And what one needs to abandon is negativity. When we can ensure in our heart that we are engaging in practices that encompass the means to accumulate virtues and abandon negativities, then we can be assured we are doing Dharma practice. This is, in essence, what we need to keep in mind.

That is the basis that forms a strong foundation from which we can then establish further practices. In fact we can find this base of accumulating virtues and abandoning negativities in all major religions.

This has been a summary of how to engage in the practices presented in the following verses.

2.1.2.1.2.2.2. They are difficult to bear

The commentary commences with the statement:

It is unsuitable to be lazy because of the many negativities created previously, and also if one analyses the various causes for the lower realms one is still creating them every day.

The verse reads:

12. *Having created the karma for the hells
Where one's delicate flesh is burned
When scalded with hot water,
Why does one abide happily?*

The main emphasis under this heading is that the sufferings are difficult to bear. When intense sufferings actually befall oneself at the time of death it will be extremely difficult to bear them. This highlights that we might fall short if we think, 'oh well, if sufferings occur later that's fine, I'll be able to bear them then'. But this highlights that if even small sufferings are difficult to bear now, then when extreme sufferings occur later on then it will certainly be extremely difficult to bear them at that time.

The commentary continues:

Why does one abide happily now, having created the karma to be reborn in the lower realms, where one's body of delicate flesh will have to experience the sufferings of being burned intensely when scalded by the hot water that boils angrily in the hell realms.

One should strive in virtue just like one's head is on fire.

The commentary explains that when one has created many negativities, non-virtuous actions, these become the cause to experience intense sufferings in the hell realms. It vividly explains that when it comes to one's awareness that one has created such negativities, and our delicate body's flesh will be exposed to the extreme sufferings in the hell realms, then how can one just remain idle and do nothing about it now?

One should engage in immediate practices of purification and the accumulation of virtues. The gravity of the situation is presented with an analogy that one should strive in virtue just like one's head is on fire. If this were literally the case, then one would immediately react and put out the fire before one's head was scalded and burned. Just as one would have an immediate response of putting out a fire on one's head, likewise in relation to negativities one should immediately apply antidotes to purify negativities when one has created negative karmas. This is the practice that true practitioners engage in. As soon as they realise that they might have created a fault of any kind, they take the measures to immediately confess and purify it.

The essence of this presentation will also be explained in further verses, but I mention it now as a way to exhort you to engage in the means to purify negative karmas and prevent an unfortunate rebirth in a lower realm such as a hell realm. We need to bring to our awareness that one has all the conditions intact right now to actually purify negativities one has created in the past.

The commentary brings a vivid image to one's mind describing the intense sufferings of the hell realms such as being burned intensely when scalded by the hot water that boils angrily in the hell realms. Personally when I see volcanic eruptions spewing molten rock I imagine the extreme heat. I then bring forward the unbearable imagination of how much suffering one would experience if one were actually consumed by that lava. Apparently the fires of the hell realms are said to be even more intense, but we can only relate to something equivalent to that on this earth, like lava. The point is that these analogies are ways to exhort one to actually engage in the practice of virtue. We have favourable conditions, and so it is as if we have our fate in our hands, and whether we will experience intense sufferings or a good rebirth in the future is our responsibility. We have the choice, so we need to make that choice.

2.1.2.1.2.2.3. It is contradictory to wish for happiness and not to strive in virtue

The points being presented in the explanation of the verse here are very relevant for one's practice. Take it as personal instruction.

If one were asked whether one wishes for happiness, without any hesitation we would say 'yes'. But if we asked ourselves whether we were creating the causes for happiness (accumulating virtue), and found that we were not creating many of those causes, then these two thoughts would be completely contradictory. That is, while we wish for happiness, we are not taking any initiative to create the causes for happiness, which is virtue. That is definitely a contradiction.

The meaning of the verse and the explanation from the commentary are not difficult to understand, the main point is to actually try and put it into practice as this is how it will benefit you.

The verse reads:

13. *Those wishing for results without effort
And who are sensitive receive much harm
And, like the gods gripped by death,
Wail, 'Alas, I am overwhelmed by suffering'.*

The commentary explains:

Those wishing for the result of happiness without striving in its cause, virtue, and who are sensitive even towards the smallest of sufferings, will receive much harm. Like the gods gripped by death whose wish for a long life will not be fulfilled, and who will receive what they do not wish for, one will wail, 'Alas, I am overwhelmed by suffering'.

The first line in the commentary, that those wishing for the result of happiness without striving in its cause, virtue, is a statement we can definitely relate to. Again, it encourages us to think about the fact that we do definitely wish for happiness, but seldom find ourselves seriously engaging in creating its cause, which is virtue.

As the commentary further explains, while wishing for the results of happiness and not striving in its causes, virtue, then those in the condition of being very sensitive even towards the smallest of sufferings, will receive much harm.

Reflecting on the truth of the statements here we can definitely see that for someone who is sensitive, or lacks tolerance for even the smallest of problems and difficulties, would naturally be someone who always complains and who always seems to have many problems, because things are bound to go wrong and not always work the way they want. Those unable to tolerate even the smallest things going wrong will evidently experience much harm. We can see now such individuals who always complain that something is not right, and they seem to lack a true moment of relaxed and peaceful joy.

The statement that they will receive much harm means that difficulties and problems will always be present for those intolerant to small sufferings. In such a situation these individuals will be like the gods gripped by death whose wish for a long life will not be fulfilled. The gods referred to here are the long-lived gods who, due to their karma, have a very long lifespan. Then, with a long life full of luxuries and pleasures they become very complacent and don't think about the suffering they'll experience in the future.

If we become complacent, then, while in the grip of death (which can occur at any time), we would have the same mentality as a long-lived god. Like them we too become complacent with a lot of time on our hands, so when the actual time of death comes, we, like them, will realise that our time is over, and we have not had time to fulfil all our wishes and hopes. This is a time when great suffering is experienced.

The main point here is that if one doesn't prepare for the greatest time of suffering, then when it occurs one won't be able to cope with it. As mentioned previously, the best way to cope with difficulties is to endure hardships, willingly accept them now, then one will not experience a continuous sense of dissatisfaction and unhappiness.

The point of the long-lived god analogy is that one should not spend one's life as if one has all the time in the world to enjoy pleasures. If one has this attitude one becomes a victim to complacency and laziness. The actual time of death is inevitable and approaching by the moment, with the moments in our life getting shorter rather than longer. So, if we engage in frivolous activities and completely ignore the fact that death is imminent, then when death occurs, because we have failed to prepare for it, and instead become consumed with distracting activities, we will experience great suffering, as we will be unprepared to deal with the sufferings. That is the main point.

2.1.2.1.2.2.4. Exhorting to strive in the method for becoming liberated from suffering

As one does not want to experience suffering, this part of the outline exhorts one to actually become liberated from suffering.

The commentary starts with a hypothetical question:

If asked, 'How then should one act?'

The verse presents the response:

14. *In dependence on the human boat
One will be liberated from the great river of suffering.
Since this boat will be difficult to find later on,
Deluded one, do not fall asleep at this time.*

The commentary explains:

Since one can attain liberation if one strives in dependence on the basis that one has attained freedoms and endowments. In saying liberate yourself from the great stream of suffering in dependence on the boat of the human body, it shows that the freedoms and endowments have great purpose.

In essence the presentation here explains that, first of all, we definitely wish to be liberated and free from suffering. Then, in order to be free from suffering one has to depend on a basis which will enable one to be free from it. The basis presented here is none other than one's precious human rebirth, intact with the eight freedoms and the ten endowments. The value of a rebirth is presented in three points: our basis has great meaning as one can achieve great purpose; it is difficult to find such a good basis; and having found this basis of a precious human rebirth it can disintegrate very easily.

The commentary explains that since one can attain liberation if one strives in dependence on the basis that one has attained freedoms and endowments, and says you should liberate yourself from the great stream of suffering in dependence on the boat of the human body. Here our human rebirth is presented as analogous to a ferry boat that carries people across from one shore to the other.

To extend the analogy to ourselves, our body is like the boat and our individual being is like the passenger being ferried across to the other side. Just as a boat carries the passengers from one shore to the other, so our precious human body can assist us to move from samsaric existence to liberation. This shows that the freedoms and endowments have great purpose.

The commentary continues:

Since the achievement of the freedoms and endowments is extremely rare, it is very difficult to find this boat again later on. Hence, deluded one, at this time of having found this boat do not fall asleep, but liberate yourself from the great stream of cyclic existence by way of practising the paths of the small, medium and great capable beings.

This shows that one needs to strive while having found the difficult-to-find freedoms and endowments.

Having first explained that this body has a great purpose, this next point shows that it is very rare and we could easily lose it since the achievement of the freedoms and endowments is extremely rare, it is very difficult to find this boat again later on. Therefore, the text says, deluded one, having found this boat do not fall asleep, but use it for the purpose of liberating yourself.

The commentary concludes with, this shows that one needs to strive while having found the difficult-to-find freedoms and endowments.

2.1.2.2. ABANDONING THE LAZINESS THAT GRASPS AT NEGATIVE ACTIONS

This part of the outline explains the laziness we may have in allowing ourselves to engage in negative actions.

The verse reads:

15. *Having abandoned the supreme happiness of the infinite
And holy Dharma, which is the cause for happiness,
Why do you like the distraction, mental excitement
And so forth, that are causes of suffering?*

The commentary expands upon this:

Having abandoned the supreme joy in practicing the infinite methods of the holy Dharma, which are the causes for all the happiness of this and future lives, why do you like unsuitable actions resulting in suffering, such as negativities, the distractions of many different thrills, mental excitement and so forth? It is unsuitable to like them because they are the causes of suffering.

In stating that having abandoned the holy Dharma which are the causes for happiness of this and future lives, the commentary answers to a hypothetical question with the exhortation, why do you like unsuitable actions resulting in suffering, such as negativities, the distractions of many different thrills, mental excitement and so forth? The conclusion is it is unsuitable to like them because they are the causes of suffering. So this is quite clear.

The thing we need to rejoice about is the practice of virtue. When one practises any Dharma practice which involves accumulating virtues, then we can feel glad about, and rejoice in that. Then the more we feel glad and rejoice in these practices, the more this helps us increase the positive results of those positive actions.

These explanations are relevant to one's personal status. As I've mentioned previously, there are times when we would have been glad of the opportunity to accumulate some negativity, and feel sad when we've missed the opportunity. This is the point being presented here, one which brings to the heart the real issue of the attitude we lack if we are to accumulate more virtues and engage in Dharma.

The hypothetical question in the commentary is a good one to ask yourself, 'why do I like unsuitable actions resulting in suffering, such as negativities, the distractions of many different thrills. The Tibetan word drud-tsi used here has the connotation of allowing oneself to be surrounded by many things which influence one into negative ways. It includes people and negative friends etc. who cause one to engage in bad behaviour. The word drud-tsi is translated here as many different thrills, followed by mental excitement and so forth.

This is a significant question to ask oneself. Why do we like things that are unsuitable to like, as they are the causes of suffering? If one can recognise certain activities as a cause for one's own suffering, then why would one intentionally want to engage in them? This is an exhortation to start contemplating our normal activities as a way of slowly transforming our three doors of body, speech and mind (which are otherwise inclined to creating negativity), to actually engage in more and more virtuous activities. For that transformation to take place we need to seriously contemplate these points.

The point to reflect upon is the fact that if we allow ourselves to be influenced by negativities and engage in distractions and assorted thrills and mental excitement, these then become the causes for problems in our life. When we consider the various difficulties that arise in our life, it is because we've followed these negativities or distractions that then cause the problems in our life. As such one should exhort oneself to engage in the practice of Dharma.

Leaving aside the sufferings which will have a result in the future, even in our current day-to-day life, if we want to have a more meaningful life with less problems and less conflict with others etc., then leading a life that practises virtue and conducting ourselves with positive behaviour is what ensures a more meaningful life.

Contemplating on these points takes time and we need to think it through well, but it becomes quite clear that it is quite absurd for one to willingly engage in negativities if we don't wish to experience difficulties and problems in our life. It is absurd that we engage in the very things that bring us difficult problems. These are significant points to transform.

To summarise earlier points, if we lead a life where we dislike the very causes for happiness, while on the other hand willingly like and engage in the causes for our suffering, the negativities, then the consequences are bound to be more suffering for ourselves.

We need to ensure that we practise the opposite of that, and that we begin to willingly accept and like the causes for happiness and engage in virtues, and willingly engage in abandoning the causes for suffering, which is to abandon negativities. That would be the proper way to go about our practice.

The following verses also present very significant points which we will cover in the following sessions. Just to summarise again the significant points which were presented this evening: a personal instruction is to really contemplate the fact that all the sufferings that one has experienced thus far are none other than having engaged in the causes of suffering, the negativities. If we feel we have been deprived of happiness, then that is because we have failed to actually accumulate the causes for happiness which is virtue.

Even recognising this point takes time because it involves the subtleties of karma—the cause and effect sequence of how virtue is the cause of happiness, and negativity is actually the cause of all our sufferings. One needs to reflect upon the points of the cause and effect sequence as a way to exhort oneself to reflect upon how one needs to reverse one's inclination of liking to engage in negativities, and start putting more time and thought into the value of what we call virtues.

Contemplating these points is the way transformation will take place. We need not go too far back into the past to contemplate the negative consequences of negativity. If we could reflect on our own life so far, even within the past fifteen years, we can see the kinds of activities we have engaged in, which have clearly resulted in more problems and difficulties for ourselves. It becomes very clear when we know certain activities were clearly negative, and have definitely contributed to the unwanted circumstances and difficult problems in our life.

Conversely, if on reflection one has willingly taken upon oneself certain virtuous activities, see how these have resulted in a more peaceful and happier sort of mind, and how that has contributed to one's wellbeing. When we really reflect on how our own activities and deeds have brought about certain kinds of consequences, then that clarity is like looking in a mirror and seeing everything clearly.

The negativities here refer to the obvious ones such as killing or stealing or sexual misconduct. When we reflect upon the ten non-virtues, these are the obvious negativities. One would have engaged in these and they would have brought about negative consequences for oneself. Reversing this means to willingly abandon the taking of others' lives, to willingly make a commitment to abandon taking others' possessions and to willingly make a commitment to refrain from sexual misconduct etc. The willingness to actually take up the practice of avoiding non-virtue means we are practising the opposite, virtue.

Starting in this simple way is a means to understand how one can actually adopt these practices to avoid negativities and engage in virtues. Again, we can reflect that even in a short span of one's life one can definitely notice the negative consequences of engaging in negativity. Whilst the positive results are also experienced in this life, the positive results in the future life are also definite. Even in this life we can see that our life becomes much more meaningful, much less hectic, less problematic, and more purposeful. To that extent we can see the benefits of the practice.

2.1.2.3. ABANDONING THE LAZINESS OF DISCOURAGEMENT

This is subdivided into three, which we will cover next week.

2.1.2.3.1. Advice to strive in the antidotes to discouragement

2.1.2.3.2. How it is taught in the scriptures to practice the antidotes

2.1.2.3.3. One can attain enlightenment if one strives, by stopping laziness

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

© Tara Institute

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

30 June 2015

Based on the motivation generated whilst reciting the refuge prayer, we can engage in our usual meditation practice. (meditation)

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for this purpose I will listen to the teachings well, and put them into practice.

I regularly emphasise the importance of cultivating a joyous and happy mind within oneself. Once cultivated this becomes our true, unailing companion, able to assist us at all times. We don't regularly pay attention to this factor; rather we seem to become more obsessed with trying to look for external conditions for our happiness, like finding friends or objects. We think these are going to be our companion and make us happy, but when something fails with these external conditions, it brings us great distress. That is because we have not paid attention to developing our true inner friend, and thus we feel distraught and lonely.

Taking the initiative to develop our unailing inner companion, which is a joyous and happy mind, is of course dependent on the practice of Dharma. This is actually what the practice of Dharma is meant to be for. Practising Dharma doesn't mean listening to the teachings just to acquire an intellectual understanding. It means actually putting whatever understanding we gain from the Dharma into practice, because that is how we develop our mind to become more positive and, consequently, happier.

The reason we need to take this initiative is the fact that there will never be an occasion where we will be separated from our mind, so developing it becomes essential. Wherever we go, whatever we do during the day in our everyday life and even during the night when we go to sleep, it is not as if we leave our mind somewhere else. It is with us all of the time, up until the last moment of this life, when we experience death and are separated from our physical and material conditions. Then, what goes on is the continuity of the mind and also the individual self. Up until the time of death the combination of our body, our mind and our individual self are together at all times. Therefore the wellbeing of our self as an individual is relative to the wellbeing on all three levels: the body, mind and individual self. They all contribute to the wellbeing of others. Recognising this is how we take the initiative to establish our own wellbeing.

Basically the state of our mind is what determines what kind of individual self or characteristics we have. To explain further, when the mind is harsh that makes the individual person harsh. When the mind is gentle, kind and positive it makes the person with that mind a kind and gentle person. In other words, what determines whether a person is harsh and unruly or kind and gentle is the state of their mind. At any given time it is the state of mind that influences an individual to behave in a certain way. This, then, shows that the person is not innately good or bad right from the beginning. Bad characteristics are not in their nature, it is dependent on their state of mind (or attitude). As these can change from negative into a more positive state, we cannot say that an individual is an innately harsh and unruly person from the beginning.

Further on, at the point of the end of our life, when we separate from our physical body, the individual self and the mind continue on. From this we can begin to understand how our individual self and mind are a continuum that comes from past lifetimes. There is a very clear sign that the individual self and mind we possess now is actually a continuity from past lives. We can say that there are two levels to our individual self: a self which is related to our individual name associated with this life, and a deeper and more subtle level of self which is not associated with our name. We all have a very strong, deep sense of 'me', and when we hold onto this we are not particularly relating to the self that our name or personality represents in this lifetime. This sense of 'me' or self beyond the self related to our current individual personality or name is an indication that such a sense is coming from a previous lifetime. If we actually pay attention we might be able to detect the deeper sense of self within ourselves. This is how the consciousness can be proven to come from a previous existence.

The main point here is to understand why the teachings explain that along with the self comes an individual's consciousness or mind, which is inseparable from it. The actual reasoning presented in the teachings on past lives is that there is a continuity of our consciousness that comes from the past. This is established through reasoning, which then follows on to prove that the individual consciousness goes on to future lives. This is how one proves logically that there are past and future lives.

The point of analysing this is so we can say an individual is not something that is fixed. Thus if we term someone mean or bad we should understand the person is just influenced by a state of mind (at a given time) and when this state of mind changes, the person consequently becomes a more positive person. So a person who is considered mean at one time can become a gentle and positive person at a later time. This understanding can be very helpful in not being fixated on a particular characteristic that one may identify with now—there is a possibility of change for self and others. It can be very helpful to not identify with others solely on the basis of their immediate behaviours, gestures and habits. There is something beyond this; it is not their true nature, and this is helpful as way to have more acceptance of others.

In relation to oneself not taking things too personally and not being too negative and judgemental about others, it really helps to think about this, then any hostile feelings about them can immediately subside. We can definitely learn from others; when they do positive things we can be inspired and learn from that, but even when they do negative things, we can take the initiative and learn from that too. We can learn that this is not their true nature and how change is possible. From that understanding we can develop a more positive mind and attitude towards them. That is something that will benefit oneself.

So it is by beginning to incorporate this understanding into one's practice that it is possible for some practitioners to state without hesitation that being with an angry person helps them to practise patience. Because of their positive attitude, others being unruly and angry only becomes a cause to find more reason to develop patience, rather than retaliate and create negativity for oneself.

2.1.2.3. ABANDONING THE LAZINESS OF DISCOURAGEMENT

This is divided into three subsections:

2.1.2.3.1. Advice to strive in the antidotes to discouragement

2.1.2.3.2. How it is taught in the scriptures to practice the antidote

2.1.2.3.3. One can attain enlightenment if one strives, by stopping laziness

2.1.2.3.1. Advice to strive in the antidotes to discouragement

The verse reads:

16. *Without discouragement, with armies,
Sincerity and self-empowerment,
Equalise self and others,
Exchange self and others.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with:

Kings conquer their enemies with the four types of armies.

Under the heading Gyaltsab Je presents advice on how to apply antidotes for overcoming discouragement, or the laziness of despondency.

The commentary states that a king conquers the enemies with four types of armies, which is an analogy for a person applying the four types of enthusiasm to overcome discouragement. Earlier in the text 'overcoming' referred to the king overcoming external enemies like enemies of a country. Here overcoming relates to the inner enemies, the delusions within oneself. That is how the analogy is to be understood.

As the commentary further explains:

Similarly, bodhisattvas initially lift up their minds and generate the armour-like enthusiasm free from despondency that intends to train in the path.

The essential point here is bodhisattvas initially lift up their minds. To lift up one's mind means to have a strong, courageous mind right from the beginning, which is a significant way to overcome despondency. This is important for any kind of task one wishes to undertake, but here the advice relates to bodhisattvas engaging in practices to benefit other sentient beings in great ways. In relation to our own practices, whatever level we may be at or whatever task we might undertake, we too need to have a courageous mind initially. If we don't have this from the beginning, our mind would be wary and uncertain, and it would be very hard to take on the task at all. And even if one did, it would be easy to lose one's enthusiasm. So having a courageous and uplifted mind right from the start is what is being recommended.

Bodhisattvas who initially uplift their minds generate armour-like enthusiasm (which was explained in earlier sessions). And having generated armour-like enthusiasm, which is being free from despondency, they intend to train in the path.

The commentary continues:

Then they generate the enthusiasm of application that builds up the army of the two accumulations as preparation.

At the time of the main part they sincerely practice introspection and mindfulness, and thus gain control over themselves as their body and mind become serviceable.

Having done that, one should equalise and exchange self and others as explained below.

Next, bodhisattvas generate the enthusiasm of application and that enthusiasm builds up the army of the two accumulations as preparation. Then, at the time of the main part of their practice, they sincerely practise introspection and mindfulness and thus gain control over themselves. I have emphasised regularly that mindfulness and introspection are the two most essential tools for securing one's practice, for it not to decline, and to ensure it has unceasing continuity. Mindfulness is a state of mind that constantly remembers the points of the practice, and introspection is the state of mind that helps detect whether one's mind is wavering away from the practice and brings it back again. Therefore mindfulness and introspection are the most essential tools for ensuring one has a steady practice.

When one has incorporated introspection and mindfulness into one's practice, then one gains control. The bodhisattvas practise this way and thus gain control over themselves as their body and mind become serviceable. Here we need to understand the meditation on calm abiding, the state of mental quiescence, in a very detailed way. When one uses the tools of mindfulness and introspection, and continuously focuses single-pointedly on the meditation object, through discipline and practice one reaches a state where one overcomes the defects of one's body and mind. The physical defects are the faults of the body that make the body feel very heavy and sluggish. When trying to meditate, aches and pains are all defects of our physical body. Defects of the mind make the mind feel weighed down, sluggish and heavy.

Gaining control over themselves relates to gaining complete control over their body, speech and mind and all the activities related to the body, speech and mind. In gaining this serviceability one then gains full capacity to apply them in virtue at all times.

The commentary continues that having gained complete control over one's body and mind one should equalise and exchange self and others. What the bodhisattvas do next is develop and further enhance bodhicitta by applying the method of exchanging self and others, right from the beginning, and it becomes a powerful method. This is the optimum method for generating bodhicitta, and is explained in detail in the eighth chapter. Here Gyaltsab Je strongly suggests that to generate bodhicitta one first needs to achieve calm abiding, as it is difficult to generate bodhicitta without having steady concentration. He clearly states this in another text as well, although there are different interpretations as to whether this is the case or not.

2.1.2.3.2. How it is taught in the scriptures to practice the antidotes

The next section of the commentary explains how the antidotes are presented in the scriptures, the sutras themselves.

The commentary first presents this statement:

The Buddha alone, being of very sharp faculty, achieved his aim by practising for many countless great eons the extremely difficult trainings and accumulated infinite merits by making an effort in enthusiasm. Do not become discouraged and despondent, saying, 'Since I am not like this, how could I attain enlightenment?'

When one contemplates how the Buddha attained the state of omniscience by accumulating virtue and merit over countless great eons, it can bring about a sense of despondency, where one thinks 'How can I possibly achieve that myself?' Understand that this despondency is not a passing despondency, where one feels 'I cannot do that' but rather a specific type of despondency that arises after analysing and contemplating what it takes to become an enlightened being.

One accepts that to benefit other beings one has to achieve enlightenment. One then contemplates on what the Buddha must have done to develop his qualities. One then realises that no virtues or qualities can arise without depending on causes. In recognising the countless qualities and virtues in the Buddha's mind, one realises they are all dependent on numerous causes that had to be created in the past, and each of these involved overcoming each and every non-virtuous deed. Overcoming one non-virtuous deed yields one virtue, and in that way over countless eons the Buddha, as a bodhisattva, created all the causes required to obtain all those results. After contemplating this, a sense of despondency can arise. This is also clearly explained in the Lam Rim teachings.

The verse reads:

17. *Do not be despondent,
Saying 'How could I become enlightened?',
Since the Tathagata speaks the truth,
He taught also this truth thus.*

The commentary continues:

Question: In what manner did he teach?

Answer: From the Sutra requested by Subahu.

Further, bodhisattvas should practice correctly and with emphasis like this: They should think, 'If those that turned into lions, tigers, dogs and jackals, vultures, cranes, crows and owls, worms, bees, flies and mosquitoes become awakened in highest enlightenment, then now, while I am a human, I need to practice the enthusiasm that achieves enlightenment, even at the cost of my life.'

The same is also taught in the Clouds of Jewels Sutra.

As the commentary explains, one should not become discouraged or despondent by saying or thinking Since I am not like this, how could I attain enlightenment?' This sentiment is expressed in one's present state of being, which is riddled with delusions and faults. Having a deluded state of mind in this life one may think one could never change, could never attempt to accumulate all those causes to achieve enlightenment. This is the laziness of discouragement or despondency.

In explaining the meaning of the second two lines the commentary says:

Since the Tathagata speaks the truth, he thus also taught this truth, which is suitable to accept since he has no cause to speak deceptively.

The main point here is that the Buddha abandoned all causes of deception, and that as there are no causes of deception there is no way the Buddha would speak deceptively. We can relate this to our ordinary lives, when we sometimes feel we can't trust somebody because they might be deceptive. So even though they might appear to be telling the truth, it can seem like they have cause for speaking deceptively, and we may be a bit unsure about what they say.

Contrast this with the Buddha's words. The Buddha has overcome all causes of deception, so there is no possibility for the Buddha to speak deceptively. Thus that which was taught by the Buddha can be taken as the truth as presented in the sutra below.

The commentary explains if asked: In what manner did he teach? Then the answer, which is presented here is From the Sutra requested by Subahu.

The Sutra presents:

Further, bodhisattvas should practice correctly and with emphasis like this: They should think, 'If those that turned into lions, tigers, dogs and jackals, vultures, cranes, crows and owls, worms, bees, flies and mosquitoes become awakened in highest enlightenment, then now, while I am a human, I need to practise the enthusiasm that achieves enlightenment, even at the cost of my life.'

Rebirth as one of the animals listed here would be considered as being inferior to a human rebirth. Yet what is being presented here is that even these animals and insects have a buddha-nature, and with it they have the possibility of becoming enlightened. The commentary emphasises that animals like flies and mosquitoes become awakened in highest enlightenment, then now, while I am a human, I need to practise the enthusiasm that achieves enlightenment, even at the cost of my life and exhorts us to embrace our human existence with all its conditions intact. The Buddha said that even beings in an inferior state, with less intellect, have the potential to become enlightened, so surely this means that as a human with all the reasons to create the causes for enlightenment, we should definitely not be despondent. In this way we are being exhorted to overcome the laziness of despondency and discouragement. The main point is that each and every living creature has the buddha-nature and the ability to achieve buddhahood. With our human rebirth we should make the most of this opportunity.

2.1.2.3.3. One can attain enlightenment if one strives, by stopping laziness

This has four subdivisions:

2.1.2.3.3.1. Considering that one can attain enlightenment if one generates the power of enthusiasm

2.1.2.3.3.2. The austerities that accomplish enlightenment are suitable to bear since they do not possess even partially the sufferings of the lower realms

2.1.2.3.3.3. They are suitable to bear since the king of physicians heals great diseases with gentle methods

2.1.2.3.3.4. It is suitable to like the austerities since they lack suffering and are strengthened by happiness

2.1.2.3.3.1. Considering that one can attain enlightenment if one generates the power of enthusiasm

This is a significant point relating to how the power of generating enthusiasm within oneself can assist one to attain enlightenment.

18. *Those that became flies, mosquitoes
Bees and likewise worms,
Even they, if they generated the force of enthusiasm,
Attain the difficult to attain highest enlightenment.*

19. *One like oneself, who has been born into the human race,
And knows what is beneficial and what is harmful,
If one does not give up the practice of enlightenment,
Then why should one not attain enlightenment?*

The commentary explains the meaning:

As it was taught earlier, even those that became flies, mosquitoes, bees and likewise worms, will attain the difficult to attain highest enlightenment if they generate the force of enthusiasm and build up the accumulations.

Since it is taught like this, then someone like oneself, having been born into the special human race, knowing what is beneficial and has to be adapted, what harms and has to be abandoned to attain the aim of the wish for enlightenment, if one takes up the practices of enlightenment and does not give them up, then why should one not attain enlightenment? Determine that you can definitely attain it.

It is clearly explained here that the way to develop enthusiasm and overcome the laziness of despondency is to recognise that even the animals mentioned here can become enlightened. So compared to the animals' inferior physical condition, we should not be despondent as we have been born as a human with a supreme body.

Coupled with this state of mind, this discriminative wisdom of knowing what is beneficial and has to be adapted, what harms and has to be abandoned to attain the aim of the wish for enlightenment is the intelligence we possess as humans to attain enlightenment. Therefore, if the Buddha stated that even animals in their inferior state can generate the force of enthusiasm and build up accumulations able to attain enlightenment, then someone like oneself, who is born with all the conditions intact, with a sound physical body and sound mind, with the wisdom understanding the causes of enlightenment, then why should one not attain enlightenment, if one were to formally take up the practices of enlightenment and not give up? One would definitely achieve it. As I often emphasise, in our condition right now, it is not as though we lack understanding. What we lack is putting it into practice. In terms of understanding the Dharma. We definitely have sufficient understanding, but if we don't put it into practice then this is when we fall short in accumulating the causes of merits etc. One should determine that one can definitely attain enlightenment, and ask oneself, 'Why shouldn't I attain enlightenment given that I have all the reasons and all the conditions necessary to attain it.'

2.1.2.3.3.2. The austerities that accomplish enlightenment are suitable to bear since they do not possess even partially the sufferings of the lower realms

This has three subdivisions:

2.1.2.3.3.2.1. Fear of the austerities of giving up legs, arms, and so forth is unsuitable

2.1.2.3.3.2.2. One does not need to experience the sufferings of the lower migrations even partially

2.1.2.3.3.2.3. The example of how it is suitable to bear small sufferings to destroy a big sickness

We will cover this next week.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བརྟུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

7 July 2015

While maintaining the motivation that we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate a positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to fully benefit all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practise well, so that they become the means to subdue my own mind.

This is an essential motivation.

The tong-len meditation that we did earlier is an optimum method for developing bodhicitta. In particular, it serves as the method for developing the superior intention that is part of the equalising and exchanging self with other technique of developing bodhicitta. Superior intention is not specifically listed as a separate cause with this technique, as it is integrated in the giving and taking practice.

When we do this practice wholeheartedly and sincerely, it involves the intention of taking on the responsibility for freeing all beings from suffering, and thus taking upon oneself all the sufferings of other beings. It also involves taking responsibility for establishing all sentient beings in happiness by giving them one's own happiness. In the taking part of the practice we imagine taking upon ourselves every type of suffering experienced by sentient beings, and in the giving part, we give all joy and happiness to all sentient beings. When we do this meditation sincerely it becomes a very powerful practice.

As indicated in the teachings, this is a core Mahayana practice because it involves generating the highest altruistic intention. By training our mind in taking upon the sufferings of others, and giving them all happiness, we are actually engaging in a Mahayana practice.

Doing this practice sincerely means bringing to mind the actual meaning of the words as we recite them. As explained in the teachings, we familiarise ourselves with any practice first by reciting the words, then we reflect and meditate on the meaning. If we just recite the words and don't really think about their meaning, then of course it remains at the level of being just words. Acquainting one's mind with the words means not just reciting the words, but actually bringing their meaning to mind. With the tong-len practice, as we recite the words from the verses we also envision that the giving and taking is actually taking place.

2.1.2.3. ABANDONING THE LAZINESS OF DISCOURAGEMENT

2.1.2.3.3. One can attain enlightenment if one strives, by stopping laziness (cont.)

2.1.2.3.3.2. The austerities that accomplish enlightenment are suitable to bear since they do not possess even partially the sufferings of the lower realms

2.1.2.3.3.2.1. Fear of the austerities of giving up legs, arms, and so forth is unsuitable

These explanations relate to actual states of mind that occur during a practice. When bodhisattvas practise developing great love and compassion, they reach the point of taking upon themselves the responsibility for helping all other sentient beings. One reaches the point of feeling determined that one definitely has to obtain enlightenment in order to fully benefit sentient beings. There's no other way to fully utilise one's potential to benefit sentient beings other than actually attaining enlightenment.

Having developed that intention, one considers the practices that one needs to engage in if one is to achieve enlightenment. These include the practice of generosity. Here one may be daunted by the thought of practising generosity of giving away one's legs, arms and limbs and so forth. Doubt about one's capacity to actually engage in the practices that are required to achieve enlightenment may then arise. This is not just a theoretical thought; these are states of mind that actually do occur.

These two verses present the point:

20. *If: 'Well, because one has to give up
Legs and arms I am afraid.'
Not discerning between heavy and light
One becomes afraid due to ignorance.*
21. *For innumerable tens of millions of eons
One has been cut many times,
Stabbed, burned and slashed,
But one has not attained enlightenment.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins by expressing the doubt:

If one were to say, 'Well, though one can achieve it through enthusiasm, I am afraid, because one needs to practise the generosity of giving away one's legs, arms, head, and so forth, and I am not able to engage in these difficult practices'.

The response to this is:

Answer: Though one needs to practise generosity with these, without having distinguished well between heavy and light suffering, one is ignorant with regard to what has to be abandoned, and what has to be adopted, and one is afraid, although it is unnecessary to be afraid.

That is because, while circling in cyclic existence since beginningless time one has experienced the sufferings of one's body being cut, stabbed, burned by fire and slashed by weapons not only once, but many times for innumerable tens of millions of eons in the hells. But, however much one has experienced this, it has only exhausted purposelessly the vitality of one's body, and one has not achieved highest enlightenment.

As presented here, when a bodhisattva initially considers the possibility of achieving enlightenment, they see that when the appropriate causes are accumulated, then the result of enlightenment is definitely possible, and that if one applies enthusiasm then one can definitely achieve enlightenment.

When further considering the types of causes that have to be accumulated, one thinks about, for example, the practice of generosity, where one might have to give away one's legs, arms and so forth. That may cause a sense of fear such as, 'Oh, I might not be able to engage in these practices to that extent'.

One definitely needs to practise generosity in such ways, and fear of practising like that would arise when one is not able to distinguish between heavy and light sufferings. As explained here, heavy sufferings are the sufferings experienced in the hell realms, where one involuntarily experiences great extremes of suffering. If one neglects to recall that, one fails to see that the relatively minor sufferings, such as giving away one's limbs and so forth, which brings about great purpose, lead to great achievement. Feeling daunted and fearful of engaging in some practices will arise if one does not recall this.

When one is able to distinguish clearly between heavy and light suffering, one will understand that practising generosity by giving away limbs and so forth is really quite a minor suffering when compared to the great sufferings to be experienced in the hell realms. Furthermore, it has a great purpose, as it is a cause for actually achieving enlightenment. Thinking like this one develops a courageous mind of willingly taking these sufferings upon oneself, and is then able to endure them.

On a contemporary level, we can see in our normal day-to-day activities that those who wish to achieve some significant result in their work or studies definitely need to put up with some hardships and difficulties for one, two or three years. If one believes that one could achieve something quickly, and is daunted by small hardships, then one would never be able to achieve any significant result, in either study or work. So even in mundane activities we can see that in order to achieve a significant result, one also needs to endure some hardships and difficulties.

The text refers to being ignorant with regard to what has to be abandoned and what has to be adopted. Even though not explicitly mentioned here, one can derive from this explanation the understanding that it is reasonable to develop the fear of having to experience the sufferings of the lower realms, which will prevent one from creating the causes of those sufferings, which is negativity. Whereas being fearful of austere practices will prevent one from engaging in virtue and accumulating merit from practising generosity and so forth, which is the cause for achieving enlightenment. The first type of fear is a reasonable fear that we actually need to cultivate, as it will prevent us from creating the numerous types of negativities that are all causes for the sufferings of the lower realms. The unreasonable fear that we do need to abandon is the fear of engaging in austere practices of generosity and so forth, when in fact they are supreme causes for accumulating virtues and merits, and thus the cause for enlightenment. When we think about it in these practical ways, we can see that Shantideva is giving us very personal and profound advice.

The qualm that was raised earlier is well, though one can achieve it through enthusiasm, I am afraid. Now while this may be explicitly related to practicing bodhisattvas, it is also a significant personal instruction. The reason why one should not be afraid of such austerities is that while circling in cyclic existence since beginningless time one has experienced the sufferings of one's body being cut, stabbed, burned by fire and slashed by weapons not only once, but many times for innumerable tens of millions of eons in the hells.

What is being presented here is that it is not as if one is afraid of something that one has not previously experienced. In fact, one has already experienced the sufferings of being cut and so forth, many times over. In other words, we might feel fearful about being generous with our limbs, arms and legs and so forth, but, in fact, we've already experienced the sufferings of having our legs and limbs cut off numerous times in the past.

Despite having experienced all these sufferings in the past, it has not until now become a cause for our enlightenment. However this time around it is actually worthwhile to engage in the practice, as it will become a cause for enlightenment. That is the point being made here.

2.1.2.3.3.2. One does not need to experience the sufferings of the lower migrations even partially

While one may experience some kind of suffering from these practices, it is nowhere near the extent of sufferings that one would otherwise have to experience in the hell realms. At this point it is good to bring to mind the importance of the practice of patience, as a way of enduring the sufferings one may experience from practising generosity and so forth.

We can recall here that Lama Tsong Khapa's advice that we need to really acquaint our mind particularly with the patience of definitely thinking about the Dharma, and the patience of willingly accepting sufferings. There are many more opportunities to experience the natural sufferings that fall upon us than there are occasions when we need to practise patience when others harm us. Being intentionally harmed is much rarer than the suffering that one perpetually experiences at any given time.

We have all experienced the different types of suffering that occur continuously—it is one problem after another. We always seem to be faced with some sort of problem, either from our immediate surroundings or mentally, and they never seem to end. Therefore the patience of willingly accepting suffering is an extremely important practice, as a way of not becoming overwhelmed and daunted by these problems. As explained in the teachings, the best way to be able to deal with a problem is to willingly accept that problem. Then, whatever the problem may be, one will have the capacity to actually deal with it, and solve the problem. If we don't engage in the practice of willingly accepting suffering, then we become overwhelmed and anxious about not being able to cope, and this creates even more suffering for us. That is why this essential advice is so relevant.

If we fail to engage in the practice of willingly accepting suffering, especially psychological or mental suffering, then we can become completely overwhelmed, and reach a point where we are seemingly not able to cope. Whereas when we are able to practise patience by accepting mental suffering and problems, then when we experience some physical suffering we will not be daunted it, due to the strength derived from willingly accepting that suffering. That is because when the mind is in a strong position it will be able to handle the physical suffering, and cope much better with it. Conversely, if one is not able to deal with mental suffering, then even the slightest physical suffering can also cause great distress.

If we can maintain the practice of patience where our mind does not become overwhelmed and daunted, then we will be able to maintain our mental strength and tranquillity. Regardless of the difficulties and problems that may be occurring, they will not disturb the mind. Otherwise the mind becomes disturbed and chaotic, and really distressed, and everything appears to be very grim. Then one may lose hope and so forth. Whereas when one has mastered that practice to the level of withstanding those difficulties and problems, then even when there are difficulties they will not disturb the mind, which will be able to maintain its integrity and practise continuously.

Patience is particularly important when dealing with the hardships and sufferings that occur during our practice. We can all relate to this. If we were not to have the mind of endurance and patience, then we might feel that a practice is too difficult and just give up even with the slightest of difficulties. If we had the choice, would we willingly accept some hardships and engage in practice, or not engage in practice so that we don't have to experience any hardship? If we choose the second then there's a great danger that we might choose not to practise at all, and as presented earlier in the text, just enjoy ourselves during the day and sleep through the night. So we need to have a really courageous mind to choose wisely.

We need to relate any given points in the text to earlier explanations, which in this instance is to also apply the practice of patience.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

22. *There is a measure to One's sufferings in attaining enlightenment,
Similar to the sufferings of a bodily procedure
To clear the harm of tormenting diseases.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

If one considers the sufferings of the lower migrations, then the sufferings of the austerities of attaining enlightenment are of small measure and last a short time by comparison. They are also easy to bear, similar to being able to bear the sufferings of a bodily procedure to clear the harm of a tormenting disease.

As the commentary explains, if one considers the sufferings of the lower migrations, then the sufferings of the austerities of attaining enlightenment are of small measure and last a short time by comparison. According to the Mahayana Perfection Vehicle, we have to practise for three countless eons to achieve enlightenment, but one can spend many more countless eons in the lower realms. While that is the general presentation in the Mahayana Perfection Vehicle, it is explained in more advanced teachings that one can actually achieve enlightenment even in just one lifetime. Lama Tsong Khapa is said to have obtained enlightenment in one lifetime, and there are many other examples of great masters who also obtained enlightenment in one lifetime. So one actually can achieve the state of enlightenment in a very short time if one engages in, and applies the practices. In comparison to the sufferings that have to be experienced in the lower realms, it's really of very short duration.

The example that is presented here is that they are also easy to bear, similar to being able to bear the sufferings of a bodily procedure to clear the harm of tormenting diseases. A tormenting disease is a disease that can cause great suffering if it is not cured. The cure might also cause some suffering, especially if the body is cut open as part of that cure, yet that is willingly accepted. It is considered to be a small suffering to be endured for the sake of removing the cause of a much greater suffering caused by a disease.

2.1.2.3.3.2.3 The example of how it is suitable to bear small sufferings to destroy a great sickness

The verse relating to this outline reads:

23. *All physicians make unpleasant sickness
Go away with cures.
Hence, one is able to bear small unpleasantness
To destroy many sufferings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains that:

All physicians will employ slightly unpleasant cures to make an unpleasant sickness go away. Likewise, since the austerities to achieve enlightenment are very small sufferings, one should bear the small suffering of the austerity to destroy the many sufferings of cyclic existence. In this way one pacifies boundless sufferings of self and other.

As clearly explained here, all physicians will employ similar methods of applying unpleasant cures to make an unpleasant sickness go away. The sufferings of the austerities needed to achieve enlightenment are, in comparison, very small. One needs to be able to bear these sufferings, as they are a cause to remove the many sufferings of cyclic existence. This pacifies the suffering of oneself and others.

2.1.2.3.3.3. They are suitable to bear since the king of physicians heals great diseases with gentle methods

This is subdivided into three:

2.1.2.3.3.3.1. The Buddha shows methods to cure great diseases without having to experience the slightest suffering

2.1.2.3.3.3.2. It is forbidden to give one's body for as long as one has difficulty

2.1.2.3.3.3.3. It is not difficult since the time taught for giving one's body is when one is habituated to give it like a vegetable

These three outlines systematically remove all of the doubts that may occur relating to engaging in the practices.

2.1.2.3.3.3.1. The Buddha shows methods to cure great diseases without having to experience the slightest suffering

The relevant verse reads:

24. *The supreme physician does not act
In accordance with common cures;*

*He cures boundless great diseases
With extremely gentle methods.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

While one is working to achieve enlightenment, the supreme of physicians, the Able One, does not employ austerities like the common cures to cure sicknesses. He heals the boundless heavy sickness of having to wander in cyclic existence due to the afflictions with the method of an easy path leading to a happy result, without the extremes of being disheartened and exhausted or sensual decadence. Therefore, how is it suitable to be afraid of the austerities?

As the commentary explains, while one is working to achieve enlightenment, the supreme of physicians, which refers to the Able One, or the Buddha, does not employ austerities like the common cures to cure sicknesses. The methods that normal physicians use to treat disease can involve harsh and invasive treatments like cutting or even burning flesh, piercing it with needles and so forth. Even the tools they use are quite frightening—I recall seeing a young child crying when he saw the needle, before the treatment had even begun. This is how normal diseases are treated. The Buddha, who is likened to a supreme physician, does not use the harsh methods employed by normal physicians. In fact his methods are not invasive, are all very gentle, and do not harm in any way.

The method that the supreme physician, the Buddha, employs is that he heals the boundless heavy sickness of having to wander in cyclic existence due to the afflictions with the method of an easy path leading to a happy result. The easy, or suitable path refers to the practices leading to enlightenment, such as the six perfections. Practising generosity is a relatively easy practice, while practising moral ethics is a very gentle practice of refraining from harming others. When it comes to concentration, very suitable methods are presented. One develops concentration by sitting in the seven-point posture of the Buddha Vairochana, and developing a clear mind. These precise and gentle methods, which gradually lead to the development of higher realisations, are very meticulously presented.

Following this easy and suitable path leads to the happy result of enlightenment. Thus, the path itself is a happy and gentle path, which leads to the ultimate happy result of achieving enlightenment. Such a path is free from the extremes of sensual decadence, and being disheartened and exhausted. Therefore, how is it suitable to be afraid of the austerities? This implies that one should not be afraid of austere practices, when, in fact, they are gentle and suitable to practise, and moreover lead to the great result of enlightenment. That is definitely something that one should not be afraid of. Indeed one should willingly engage in them.

2.1.2.3.3.3.2. It is forbidden to give one's body for as long as one has the thought that holds it difficult

This relates to the earlier point of being daunted by the thought of giving one's body parts. As presented here, one should not be engaging in such practices for as long as one has the thought that considers it difficult to give one's body.

The verse relating to this outline is:

*25. The guide induces one to initially train
Even in the generosity of vegetables and such.
Having become habituated, then subsequently
One gradually also offers one's flesh.*

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Initially, when one is not even acquainted with offering vegetables and the like, the guide, the Buddha, induces one to train in the generosity of food, drink, vegetables and so forth. When one has become acquainted with this without difficulty, then subsequently one also gradually offers one's flesh.

It is not being suggested that one should start the training in generosity by giving away one's body parts or flesh, blood and so forth. As explained in the commentary, the Buddha presented the methods for practising generosity in a very skilful way. He advised familiarising oneself with the practice of generosity with things that are plentiful, such as food and drink, vegetables and so forth, which one can offer without much difficulty. As one becomes acquainted with that, one can further develop one's practice of generosity by giving more valuable things.

When one has become habituated to, or acquainted with this without difficulty, refers to having become acquainted with being generous with the material possessions such as food, drink, clothing and so forth. Through that acquaintance one reaches the point where one has no hesitation in giving away more valuable possessions. Through acquaintance and familiarity with that level of generosity, then subsequently one also gradually offers one's flesh. Through familiarity with easier acts of generosity one can reach the point where there is no hesitation in offering one's flesh, limbs and so forth when necessary.

2.1.2.3.3.3.3. It is not difficult since the time taught for giving one's body is when one is habituated to give it like a vegetable

Following on from the previous point, this section covers when it is suitable to offer one's body, flesh and so forth.

The verse relating to this reads:

*26. Once one has generated the awareness
Of one's body as a vegetable or the like,
Then one offers one's flesh and the like.
Where lies the difficulty in that?*

As the commentary explains:

Once one has, through familiarity, generated the awareness of the generosity of one's body as the generosity of a vegetable or the like, then one can offer one's flesh and such.

Where lies the difficulty in that? Since there is not the slightest difficulty, it is unsuitable to be afraid.

As explained in the commentary, through familiarity with being generous with material possessions, one increases the mind of generosity to the point where there is no hesitation in offering these material possessions. Through that familiarity one reaches the point where offering one's body parts is no different to being generous with material possessions. In other words, it is suitable to offer one's body parts, as giving a vegetable and giving one's body parts amount to the same thing.

2.1.2.3.3.4. It is suitable to like the austerities since they lack suffering and are strengthened by happiness

This section is to remove any doubt about whether bodhisattvas suffer. When bodhisattvas reach the higher paths and grounds, then engaging in practices of generosity is a cause for great joy and happiness, rather than unhappiness and suffering. Therefore it is suitable for them to practise austerities.

This section is subdivided into four:

2.1.2.3.3.4.1. Though a person who is unskilled in the sequence of training in the path has physical and mental unhappiness, those who are skilled do not have the suffering of austerities

2.1.2.3.3.4.2. There is no cause then for a great bodhisattva to be disheartened with cyclic existence

2.1.2.3.3.4.3. For these reasons they are said to be more skilled in achieving the path than a Hinayana

2.1.2.3.3.4.4. Hence, it is unsuitable to be discouraged from the actions of a bodhisattva

2.1.2.3.3.4.1. Though a person who is unskilled in the sequence of training in the path has physical and mental unhappiness, those who are skilled do not have the suffering of austerities

The verse relating to this is:

*27. No suffering because of having abandoned negativity,
No dislike because of being skilful.
Therefore, wrong conceptions
And negativities harm mind and body.*

The commentary reads:

Bodhisattvas with the pure thought of compassion do not have physical suffering when they offer their body, because they have abandoned all the negativities of the three doors, and they also do not experience mental dislike because they are skilful regarding the time for offering the body.

Therefore, the wrong conceptions of grasping at the self of person and grasping at mine, and the negativities of killing and so forth, harm mind and body, and the great bodhisattvas have abandoned these causes for harm.

As the commentary explains, bodhisattvas with the pure thought of compassion, do not have physical suffering when they offer their body, because they have abandoned all the negativities of the three doors, and they also do not experience mental dislike because they are skilful or have the knowledge regarding the time for offering the body. As presented here, great bodhisattvas, who have attained high levels on the paths and grounds have no physical suffering, because they have abandoned all the negativities of the three doors.

This indicates that any mental or physical suffering that we experience on any of the three levels, is due to the negativities we create because we still have the negativities of the three doors. When negativities have been abandoned, then any suffering in relation to the three doors ceases.

Furthermore, they also do not experience mental dislike because they are skilful regarding the time for offering the body. Thus, because they have the skill of knowing the suitable time to give their body they do not hesitate to give their body parts whenever necessary.

Wrong conceptions of grasping at the self of person and grasping at mine, and the negativities of killing and so forth, harm mind and body, yet the great bodhisattvas have abandoned these causes for harm. More specifically, abandoning the wrong conceptions of grasping at a self of persons, and grasping at 'mine' refers to bodhisattvas who have gained a direct realisation of emptiness.

Bodhisattvas at the lower levels don't have any wrong conceptions of grasping at the self of person, and grasping at 'mine', but they don't yet have the direct realisation of emptiness.

Because the bodhisattvas who have obtained the direct realisation of emptiness have removed all the negativities of killing and so forth, they've removed the causes of harm to the mind and the body.

What is specifically explained here is that the negativity that one accumulates from engaging in the ten non-virtues such as killing and so forth, is a cause for physical and mental pain and suffering. Since the great bodhisattvas have abandoned such causes, they do not experience any physical and mental pain or suffering. What this implicitly points out is that if we wish to avoid suffering, then we need to avoid its causes, which are the ten non-virtues.

2.1.2.3.3.4.2. There is no cause then for a great bodhisattva to be disheartened with cyclic existence

The doubt which may arise is whether bodhisattvas who, with their commitment to benefitting sentient beings, remain in cyclic existence for a long time, will be daunted by having to remain in cyclic existence?

The presentation under this heading explains that bodhisattvas will not be disheartened about remaining in cyclic existence.

We can conclude here, and finish this in our next session.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱུང་རྒྱུ་མེས་མ་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

14 July 2015

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

Now we can generate a positive motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

In order to fully benefit all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings, and put them into practice well.

The more we familiarise ourselves with a positive motivation like this (as we do in our meditation sessions and in listening to teachings etc.) the more we can readily generate it, and apply it to whatever practice we engage in. This is very meaningful. In meditation it is questionable which renders a better chance of accumulating merit: generating a positive motivation, or the meditation practice itself. In spending even a few moments generating a very positive motivation, one definitely accumulates extensive merit.

Our motivation involves generating an intention to achieve enlightenment for the sake of limitless mother sentient beings, so to that extent, even for a few moments when we generate it, we definitely get a sky full of merit. If we cannot generate such a motivation before our practice, it is questionable whether it will arise spontaneously during the actual practice. The most essential attitude one needs to try and adopt at all times is a positive and kind attitude. If we ensure we have that, then whatever we do, whatever the situation we find ourselves in, we can make it most beneficial. If we lose that, it is a great loss. That is why I emphasise the importance of developing loving kindness again and again.

2.1.2.3.3.4. It is suitable to like the austerities since they lack suffering and are strengthened by happiness (cont.)

2.1.2.3.3.4.2. There is no cause then for a great bodhisattva to be disheartened with cyclic existence

The outline here reflects the meaning of the verse and relates to bodhisattvas who have control over their rebirths. These bodhisattvas are not reborn in cyclic existence due to uncontrolled delusions and karma, but are actually born out of their aspiration to benefit sentient beings. For as long as they remain in samsara they do not become disheartened or daunted, because their purpose is solely to benefit sentient beings.

The verse reads:

28. *If the body is happy through merits
And the mind is happy through skill, Though remaining in cyclic existence for the purpose of others
Why should those with compassion be disheartened?*

The commentary reads:

Bodhisattvas have physical happiness through the merits of generosity and so forth, and they have mental happiness, like the bodhisattva ever-crying, through being skilful regarding what has to be adopted and what has to be rejected, and the meaning of emptiness. So, since there is no cause for suffering, why should those with compassion become disheartened, even though they remain in cyclic existence for the purpose of others?

The commentary explains that the bodhisattvas have physical happiness which is gained through the merits of generosity and so forth—which includes the merits gained from observing morality, practising patience, joyous effort and concentration. What is being presented here is the aspects of merit and wisdom incorporated in the practice of the six perfections. The merits accumulated from such practices as generosity, contribute to having a physically sound body up to the point of not having any physical discomfort. Therefore a bodhisattva's body, which is the result of these practices, is one which experiences happiness rather than suffering. Furthermore, they have mental happiness, like the bodhisattva ever-crying, by being skilful in what has to be adopted and what has to be rejected, and the meaning of emptiness. Wisdom here also includes a precise understanding of karma, how to apply and abide by the law of cause and effect, as well as the realisation of emptiness. The accumulation of wisdom becomes a cause for mental happiness. Thus, through the combination of merit and wisdom, bodhisattvas obtain a body endowed with physical happiness, and a mind which experiences mental happiness. As explained further in the commentary, since there is no cause for suffering, within their physical aggregates or the mental continuum, why should those with compassion become disheartened even though they may remain in cyclic existence, for the purpose of others? This rhetorical question implies that since there is no physical or mental suffering and only happiness, a bodhisattva in fact does not become disheartened by remaining in samsara for the sake of benefiting other sentient beings.

A relevant point made in the earlier part of the chapter was that bodhisattvas reach a level where they are able to be generous with their body parts, and they regard giving them away as no different to giving away food or vegetables. At that point, when they have no hesitation at the prospect of giving away their bodies (when necessary) to others, it is a suitable time for them to actually give their body, because they don't become disheartened by that act of generosity. On our own level we can relate to the fact that when we have a strong physical illness, or mental distress, we are more vulnerable to becoming disheartened. It is very easy for one to lose enthusiasm and become disheartened and daunted by the tasks one has to perform, because of the physical and mental suffering entailed in them. Conversely, when we are feeling quite well physically and mentally, we are more capable of engaging in any activity we intend to accomplish. While the direct advice here is for bodhisattvas, we can definitely relate the importance of using our own physical and mental wellbeing as a way of continuing with virtuous activities in our own practice.

We need to understand that bodhisattvas not being disheartened with cyclic existence means they are not disheartened by the prospect of being in samsara for the sole purpose of benefiting other sentient beings. If, on our ordinary level, we don't utilise our wellbeing properly when we are feeling good physically and mentally, we can lose our disheartenment with samsara, and actually lose the purpose for practising Dharma. You probably find it true that when everything is going quite well, there is a danger of forgetting about the practice of Dharma. This means we are actually enjoying samsaric pleasures at that time and don't feel disheartened with samsara. To develop renunciation at an ordinary level we first need to become disheartened with samsara as a way to be free from samsara itself. This doesn't imply that bodhisattvas don't have renunciation! Of course they do, but it is a renunciation based on having great compassion and love for other sentient beings whereby they don't become disheartened by the prospect of being in samsara. You need to understand this in its proper context.

2.1.2.3.3.4.3. For these reasons they are said to be more skilled in achieving the path than a Hinayana

The outline here indicates that because of being undaunted by the prospect of being in samsara for the benefit of mother sentient beings, bodhisattvas are much more skilled in achieving the path than those who follow the Hinayana path. The presentation here provides immaculately profound instructions on how to really engage in the practice. Even contemplating on the meaning of these verses and pausing for a few moments to think about their meaning can, in itself, become a powerful meditation practice that greatly benefits our mind.

The verse reads:

*29. They exhaust previous negativities
Through the power of the mind of enlightenment,
And they contain an ocean of merits.
Therefore they are said to be superior than the hearers.*

The commentary reads as follows:

Since those with compassion exhaust previous negativities with the power of the mind of enlightenment and because they contain an ocean of accumulations of merits and wisdom they are said to be superior in progressing along the path than the hearers.

The commentary explains this quite clearly, but I'll just extract some of the main points. Those with compassion relates to the great bodhisattvas who are endowed with compassion who exhaust previous negativities with the power of the mind of enlightenment. At this point, recall how the benefits of bodhicitta were explained in the previous chapters. Generating bodhicitta for even a moment is a means to accumulate extensive merit and purify great amounts of negative karma. Hence, when someone is endowed with a perpetual state of bodhicitta in their mind, there is no question about the great extent of negativities that have been purified through the power of that mind, along with the accumulation of merit. Thus because they contain an ocean of accumulations of merits and wisdom they are said to be superior.

The accumulation of merit and wisdom are known as the two accumulations, so we need to understand what the accumulations refer to and what results they bring about. I have mentioned these numerous times in the past but it is good to reflect upon these points again. The whole doctrine is presented on the basis of the two truths, the path which consists of the two accumulations, and the result which consists of the two bodies of a buddha – the rupakaya and dharmakaya.

The accumulation of merit is the particular cause for obtaining the rupakaya which is a buddha's form body, and the accumulation of wisdom is a substantial cause to obtain the dharmakaya which is a buddha's wisdom truth body. Hence the two resultant enlightened bodies are the rupakaya and the dharmakaya.

The two accumulations include the practices of the six perfections, the first five of which are the particular means for accumulating merit, and the practising the perfection of wisdom is the means to accumulate wisdom. In particular, the wisdom realising emptiness forms the means to perfect the accumulation of wisdom. It is presented here that bodhisattvas are said to be superior in progressing along the path than hearers; this is particularly due to the fact that they have generated bodhicitta.

The main factor that differentiates bodhisattvas from hearers is the mind of bodhicitta. Hearer aryas (noble beings) have also gained the realisation of emptiness, so if it was just the realisation of emptiness that is required to obtain the ultimate goal of enlightenment, then when hearers on the paths of seeing and meditation obtain the hearer's path of no-more-learning, and become an arhat (foe-destroyer), they would have then obtained enlightenment. The factor which prevents them from obtaining enlightenment - that which obstructs them from achieving an omniscient mind - is that they have not yet developed bodhicitta. Furthermore, when a hearer or solitary realiser obtains the path of seeing, although they gain the realisation of emptiness, it is said that their body still remains a contaminated body.

However, when a bodhisattva obtains the path of seeing, their body transforms into an uncontaminated body. This has been clearly explained by Lama Tsong Khapa, and His Holiness also explained this point in his recent teachings. Therefore the key factor that makes bodhisattvas far superior to hearers is the mind generation of bodhicitta. This is the main factor to understand in order to derive the essential understanding of this verse. Obtaining the ultimate state where one has completely actualised, surpassed and perfected the two purposes comes only through following the Great Vehicle path, which focuses on the development of bodhicitta. This is why it is not sufficient to just rely on the hearers' path, as it lacks the sufficient causes for one to obtain the ultimate and perfected state of fulfilling the two purposes.

2.1.2.3.3.4.4. Hence, it is unsuitable to be discouraged from the actions of a bodhisattva

Following on from the earlier points, this part of the outline is saying hence, it is unsuitable to be discouraged from the actions of a bodhisattva.

The verse reads:

*30. Therefore, mounting the horse of bodhicitta
That dispels all tiredness and weariness,
Who, that knows the mind that goes
From happiness to happiness, will be discouraged?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains as follows:

Therefore, having mounted the powerful horse of the mind of enlightenment that dispels all mental tiredness and physical weariness, who of those proficient that know the mind that goes from the path of mental and physical happiness to the result of happiness, will be discouraged? It is unsuitable to be discouraged from practising the bodhisattva actions.

For the reasons presented previously, bodhisattvas have mounted the powerful horse of the mind of enlightenment. The mind of enlightenment or bodhicitta is analogous to a powerful horse, and when one has mounted that mind of enlightenment that dispels all mental tiredness and physical weariness, the powerful mind of bodhicitta enables one to dispel all mental tiredness and physical weariness. The passage ...who of those proficient that know the mind that goes from the path of mental and physical happiness to the result of happiness relates to having a clear understanding of how following an easy path of mental and physical happiness will result in obtaining ultimate happiness. Knowing that, who will be discouraged? This implies that with this understanding, no-one would be discouraged. So it concludes that, having understood the great benefits, it is unsuitable to be discouraged from practising the bodhisattva actions.

2.1. Increasing the antidote, the power of enthusiasm

The antidote here relates to the antidote for overcoming laziness hence increasing the antidote to laziness is the power of enthusiasm. The particular type of laziness here relates to the laziness of despondency.

The power of enthusiasm is subdivided into three:

2.1.1. Increasing the powers that are the conducive conditions for enthusiasm

2.1.2. Being diligent about practising the actions with mindfulness and introspection

2.1.3. Empowering oneself to achieve the actions

2.1.1. Increasing the powers that are the conducive conditions for enthusiasm

This is subdivided into two:

2.1.1.1. A short presentation by way of identifying the four powers

2.1.1.2. An extensive explanation

2.1.1.1. A SHORT PRESENTATION BY WAY OF IDENTIFYING THE FOUR POWERS

The first verse that relates to this reads:

31. *The armies for accomplishing the purpose of sentient beings
Are belief, stability, joy and relinquishment.
Belief is generated by reflecting on its benefits
And the fears of suffering.*

The commentary explains the meaning:

Regarding the generation of the armies that destroy the opposing factors of enthusiasm so as to achieve the purpose of sentient beings: Similar to the king's four armies destroying his opponents, the four powers are the conducive conditions for enthusiasm.

The analogy here explains that the four powers are similar to the four types of a king's army. This relates to ancient warfare and refers to an army mounted on horses, an army mounted on elephants, an army that goes forth on chariots and an army that goes on foot (as explained in Precious Garland). Of the four powers analogous to the four types of army, the first is belief.

The commentary continues:

a) Belief that is aspiration regarding the practice of adopting and abandoning, generated through contemplating karmic cause and effect.

Belief here, and as also presented in the Lam Rim teachings, particularly relates to aspiration, particularly the aspiration regarding the practice of adopting and abandoning.

Next the power of stability is explained:

b) Stability that does not start something without investigation, and which finishes what was started.

Again, this is also explained in the Lam Rim teachings. The power of stability is continuously applied enthusiasm. Once one engages in a particular virtue, continuously applying enthusiasm in engaging in that virtue, it is the power of stability.

Next the commentary explains the power of joy.

c) Joy that engages in effort without satisfaction, but with uninterrupted joy, like a child engaged in play.

Joy is explained here with the analogy of children playing naturally, and not wanting their joy and happiness in that play to be interrupted.

Next is the power of relinquishment, which relates to taking a rest. When engaging in an activity, putting in too much effort can often become an obstacle to accomplishing it, so there are times when one needs to take a rest and find the right balance. As will be explained later on, in meditation this means for one's focus not to be too tight or too loose, but to find the right measure. Thus, in whatever practice, when one is pushing too hard one needs to apply the power of "relinquishment" or rest.

d) Relinquishment that takes a break when body and mind are tired through the practice of enthusiastic effort, only to start straightaway again once refreshed.

If one doesn't take a break one may get stressed.

The commentary explains the four powers with belief as an example:

Explaining them by taking the power of belief as an example, they are generated by contemplating the fears of the suffering of cyclic existence and the benefits of the respective power, i.e., here belief.

The powers are generated by contemplating the fears of the suffering of cyclic existence, refers to generating the fear of the suffering, and then the benefits of the respective power. With 'belief', one contemplates on the benefits of the belief that will be generated.

The next verse reads:

32. *Giving up the opposite in this way
Strive in increasing enthusiasm through Belief, pride, joy and relinquishment
And the power of diligence and control.*

The powers are presented briefly in the verse, and the commentary further explains:

Giving up the opposing factors of not engaging in virtuous dharmas though seeing that one is able to, or the discouragement of thinking, 'I am not able to do this', one generates the conducive conditions of the four powers of belief, the pride of stability, joy and relinquishment.

Then, during the actual practice one diligently practises enthusiasm with mindfulness and introspection, and through the power of subsequently gaining control over body and mind one increases enthusiasm further and further. Strive in such a way.

Giving up the opposing factors such as not engaging in virtuous dharmas though seeing that one is able to, relates to the fact that one may see the benefits of the virtuous Dharma, but, despite that, one does not engage in the virtuous Dharma, which is caused by laziness. This type of laziness, where one thinks 'I'm not able to do this' is despondency, so at that point one generates the conducive conditions. By giving up the opposing factors, one generates the conducive conditions of the four powers of belief, the pride of stability, joy and relinquishment. Stability is referred to as a virtuous pride. The commentary further explains applying these conducive conditions of the four powers:

Then, during the actual practice, one diligently practises enthusiasm with mindfulness and introspection ...

It is not sufficient to apply the conducive conditions of the four powers initially. In the actual practice, one needs to also diligently practise enthusiasm with mindfulness and introspection. The point presented here is that mindfulness and introspection are an essential aid for maintaining enthusiasm during the actual practice.

... and through the power of subsequently gaining control over body and mind one increases enthusiasm further and further. Strive in such a way.

This is the way one actually adopts the practice of the four powers, and the two powers of diligence and control as well.

2.1.1.2. AN EXTENSIVE EXPLANATION

This is subdivided into four:

2.1.1.2.1. The power of belief

2.1.1.2.2. The power of stability

2.1.1.2.3. The power of joy

2.1.1.2.4. The power of relinquishment

2.1.1.2.1. The power of belief

This is subdivided into four:

2.1.1.2.1.1. The object of belief

2.1.1.2.1.2. The result of belief

2.1.1.2.1.3. The cause for belief

2.1.1.2.1.4. Concluding summary

Each power is presented very meticulously by defining the object of belief, the result of belief, and the actual cause of belief etc.

2.1.1.2.1.1. The object of belief

This is further subdivided into three:

2.1.1.2.1.1.1. Abandoning faults

2.1.1.2.1.1.2. Taking qualities

2.1.1.2.1.1.3. Analysing what one has done and what one has not

Again, in order to gain a clearer understanding of each power, the text sequentially and meticulously presents the ways to remove doubts in our minds. This will help the wisdom in our mind to really grow.

2.1.1.2.1.1.1. Abandoning faults

The next two verses read:

33. *One should destroy the boundless
Faults of self and others.
Even if for each individual fault
It will take an ocean of eons,*

34. *If it is not observable that one has Started to exhaust faults even partially,
One becomes an abode for boundless suffering.
Why does one's heart not burst?*

The commentary explains the meaning:

One should destroy the boundless faults of self and others, because one has made that promise at the time of generating the mind. When one destroys these faults one familiarises oneself with the antidote for an ocean of eons even for each individual fault. Since it will come like this, if one does not observe the beginning of having started to abandon faults even partially on oneself, then one will have to experience the sufferings of the lower realms, since one cannot bear to become familiar with the antidote even that much. Since one will become an abode for boundless suffering, why does one's heart not explode? One's heart is completely made of stone, I say.

The commentary explains here that one definitely needs to strive to destroy the boundless faults of self and others. Why? Because one has already made a promise when generating the mind of enlightenment. One then reflects on that when destroying these faults and familiarises oneself with the antidote for an ocean of eons even for each individual fault. When applying the antidotes for overcoming these faults one needs to familiarise oneself with the antidotes for many eons. Even for one fault one has to repeatedly apply the antidote and familiarise oneself with it again and again. This is the way to completely overcome that particular fault.

Having realised this then if one does not observe the beginning of having started to abandon faults even partially on oneself, one will have to experience the sufferings of the lower realms. If one feels daunted that one cannot familiarise oneself with the antidote for that amount of time, one will see that by not doing so one will have to experience the sufferings of the lower realms. Then since one will become an abode for boundless suffering, why does one's heart not explode? This is a way of exhorting us to take heed; if one does not apply the antidote to overcome the faults then the consequence is to experience the boundless suffering of the lower realms. So if one contemplates that, one's heart should feel moved to expend real effort, and strive to overcome these faults.

The extensive Lam Rim explains these points by quoting Shantideva's verses. It gives detailed explanations of how one has to apply the antidotes to overcome the faults for many eons. So if, right now, one doesn't even consider applying an antidote for even one of the faults, even partially, then how can one possibly believe one will not have to experience the sufferings of the lower realms. This is explained in the Lam Rim more elaborately, and referring to a Lam Rim text on the point of enthusiasm will complement the explanation presented here.

Another point made in the Lam Rim text is that contemplating like this is a way not to become discouraged. Rather it encourages you to realise that you have spent a lot of time in meaningless thought and activity and not much time on applying the antidotes for overcoming the faults. Thus by reflecting upon how much time one has already wasted, to take heed and apply enthusiasm to overcome the faults. That is the main point.

These presentations are all very meaningful and we can definitely relate them to our personal practice.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

21 July 2015

Based on the motivation we have just generated during our prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice.

[meditation]

As usual we now generate a motivation that is based on the altruistic motivation of bodhicitta, such as:

May all sentient beings be free from all suffering and endowed with happiness. By taking personal responsibility for making that happen, may I be able to free all sentient beings from all suffering and lead them to ultimate happiness. It is for that purpose that I will engage in listening to the teaching and put it into practice well.

We can also use this as a motivation for engaging in the meditation practice that we have just done. When one genuinely generates an altruistic motivation such as 'How wonderful it would be if all sentient beings were free from all suffering and led to the ultimate state of happiness, then that needs to be followed with the commitment 'I myself will do that for them, and for that purpose I will engage in this meditation practice'. The practice then becomes very powerful and meaningful. By generating this motivation again and again we become more and more familiar with this positive state of mind. So spending even just a few moments generating this motivation is a highly meaningful practice.

As mentioned previously, while we might not have generated bodhicitta yet, by cultivating this altruistic mind to the extent that we actually feel that sentiment, we are going beyond the mere aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, and actually generating the wish to take that responsibility upon oneself. Generating the direct intention, 'for that purpose I will engage in this practice' brings in the element of personal responsibility; thus it is called the superior intention. A superior intention is the active intention to take full responsibility for freeing all beings from suffering, and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness.

By familiarising ourselves with this motivation we will definitely reach a stage where, at the very least, no-one will appear as an enemy. Rather, all beings will start to appear appealing and worthy of love and compassion, and an object of practice that leads to enlightenment. As also mentioned previously, when one develops the intention to do everything possible to benefit sentient beings, and to not harm any living being, then all sentient beings will appear as appealing and not hostile. This pure appearance contributes to a real sense of personal joy and happiness.

This is also a significant practice for our own personal development. As we familiarise ourselves with this attitude more and more, we can see its benefit, and thus be encouraged to continue with the practice; then our wish to benefit others will also increase. By understanding how familiarising ourselves with this motivation further strengthens it, we can understand how, when bodhisattvas become enlightened, they actively engage in going out and helping sentient beings on a constant basis. They certainly don't sit back, relax and enjoy themselves. Because they are enlightened, there is nothing to hold them back anymore, and they can benefit sentient beings constantly. It is through familiarity with this training that one reaches that perfected state of enlightenment.

This has been an abbreviated explanation of how to generate the bodhicitta mind as the basis of one's motivation. As you would know, in the seven-point cause-and-effect sequence one works through earlier states of mind until one reaches the stage where one spontaneously takes on the responsibility for benefitting sentient beings, and for that purpose engages in practising the six perfections. Based on feelings of love and compassion, one develops great love and compassion, which forms the basis for the development of that superior intention. Having developed superior intention, one can then easily generate bodhicitta. Initially however, generating bodhicitta still requires some effort, and so it is called contrived bodhicitta. Whereas when one reaches the stage where the altruistic mind of aspiring to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings is generated spontaneously, effortlessly and continuously, one has generated actual, uncontrived bodhicitta.

2.2.1.2.1. The power of belief

2.2.1.2.1.1. The object of belief (cont.)

Earlier the text explained how aspiring to achieve enlightenment involves abandoning faults, and next it goes on to explain how to acquire the qualities necessary to achieve the ultimate state of enlightenment. Again these very significant points are being presented in a very precise, sequential manner. The Lam Rim teachings mention that the attainment of enlightenment is based on abandoning each and every negativity, and acquiring each and every quality from the very outset of one's practice. More specifically, what is being mentioned is that every attempt to abandon even one negativity, and acquire even one quality, is the basis for proceeding on the path leading to the ultimate state of enlightenment.

This is a really significant point for us to consider. The state of enlightenment attained by the buddhas, who we revere, did not arise spontaneously or miraculously from nothing. Rather, that state of enlightenment is attained as a result of having abandoned each and every negativity, and acquired each and every quality at the time of being a trainee on the path, which eventually and gradually led to that state of enlightenment. This very significant point is very encouraging, because it shows us that we have the same potential. Each negativity that we abandon now, and each quality that we acquire now, is an essential part of the cause to achieve the ultimate state of enlightenment. This is the way to relate to this point.

It is, of course, not sufficient to attempt to acquire qualities if one maintains faults. Indeed, the very process of acquiring qualities entails overcoming certain faults. When each and every fault is abandoned, the quality of abandoning negativities is also acquired. So we need to understand that abandoning faults and acquiring qualities are mutually dependent upon each other. We need to understand that inter-relationship, and thus realise that we cannot hope to acquire qualities while not thinking too much about the necessity of abandoning faults. It is essential that we see that our progress is dependent upon abandoning faults. If we attempt to acquire qualities while holding fast onto our faults, then we will fall short of making any progress in the Dharma. So from the very outset we need to make a strong attempt to abandon and overcome the faults of attachment, anger and ignorance, from which all other faults stem.

As the Lam Rim teachings clearly explain, the signs that one's practice is coming to fruition is when one sees that the delusions have started to reduce, that one's mind has become more subdued, that one has stronger faith in the teachings and the teacher, and that one has more inclination to engage in the practice. When we notice that our mind has become more and more acquainted with the Dharma in these ways, then that is a clear sign that one has made progress in the practice.

The more we become familiar with the qualities, and the greater the effort we put into overcoming faults, the more rapidly we will obtain qualities and overcome faults. The strong imprint that comes from becoming familiar with the Dharma now will ensure that our Dharma practice will be much easier in our future life.

To abandon delusions we need to first identify them clearly. Then we need to meditate and contemplate their disadvantages. When we clearly see those disadvantages, the strong wish to abandon them will arise, and then whatever attempts one makes to overcome the delusions will be fruitful. If we miss that point, then, although we might be exerting ourselves in the practice of Dharma, our mind will feel weighed down, and we may even feel depressed. That is a sign that the practice has not really taken root yet. Even though it may seem impossible to abandon all negativities and subdue all delusions in this life, the attempts we make now will not be in vain. In the next life, we will be much more able to spontaneously and rapidly apply the antidote to overcome the delusions and acquire qualities. So we definitely benefit from this practice. Conversely, if we resort into thinking, 'Oh, well, since I am not able to abandon the delusions now, I might as well just give up, and not do anything about it', then any progress is definitely limited.

The purpose of sharing this with you is to remind you that the real purpose of your efforts to study and practice is to overcome the delusions. If we make a genuine attempt we will definitely reap a significant result. While I cannot claim that I have abandoned negativities to any great degree, I can safely say that I have made some progress. In my teenage years I was influenced by strong emotions such as anger. However, by seeing the great disadvantages of anger, and making genuine attempts to overcome it, I can safely say that I have progressed to the point where the mind of anger hardly ever occurs now. I am not claiming that I have abandoned the delusions, but in comparison to the state of my mind when I was young, I feel that my mind is genuinely calmer now, and not really affected by strong delusions. So to that extent I have benefitted from my attempts to apply the antidotes earlier in my life.

We really need to think again and again about the disadvantages of negative states of mind such as anger, attachment and so forth. Also think again and again about the advantages of overcoming those delusions. When our mind is not dominated and controlled by anger, it is calmer and much more peaceful. Then, not only will we have achieved some personal transformation, but it will bring benefit to others, because of the contribution that our happy mind makes to our immediate surroundings.

We can clearly see that when anyone is affected by delusions such as anger or attachment, they do not have a happy or peaceful mind. For however long the influence of the delusion lasts, their mind is in turmoil and unhappy. This is true for every one. No-one is exempted from mental turmoil when they experience anger. Delusions can arise in anyone, regardless of their status, whether they are well-known or respected, whether they are rich and famous, or impoverished. For as long as delusions are present they affect the mind negatively, bringing about unrest and turmoil, and there will be no mental peace.

When the mind is not affected by strong delusions, then for however long that state lasts, one will have a peaceful, joyful, contented and happy state of mind. This is true for everyone, regardless of their status. Even those without many worldly possessions will feel contented, happy and satisfied when their mind is not affected by strong delusions. Conversely, those with fame, possessions, wealth and so forth will not have a happy life if their mind is affected by strong delusions. For as long as their mind is affected by strong delusions, they will not be happy. These are the points we really need consider again and again, as a way of reaffirming our commitment to our practice, where the main focus is on subduing our mind and overcoming the delusions.

Of course all of this relates directly to the text that we are studying, where Shantideva presents the delusions and their antidotes in great detail. The fifth chapter identifies many of the delusions, and the sixth chapter specifically deals with one of the strongest delusions, anger, explaining how to apply the antidote by cultivating patience. In this seventh chapter he is again presenting delusions as faults, and showing how to overcome them by applying enthusiasm or joyful effort.

I personally find studying this text incredibly beneficial. I recall how much I benefitted when I received teachings on the entire text from His Holiness Dalai Lama. Now I have to read it again as preparation for presenting it to you. Familiarising myself with it again, reading it and studying it has, once again, brought me tremendous benefit. So it is quite appropriate to thank you for giving me the opportunity to further familiarise myself with the text. It gives me that opportunity to once more relate to this incredibly powerful practice and teaching, which I find really beneficial.

2.2.1.2.1.2. Taking qualities

Now we come to acquiring the qualities for the achievement of the ultimate state of enlightenment. The two verses relating to this read:

35. *One should establish many qualities
Of self and others.
If one meditates for an ocean of eons
For each individual quality,*
36. *One has not generated meditation
On even a part of one's qualities.
This birth that one has somehow found now,
It is strange that I make it meaningless.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on these verses reads:

One should establish the many qualities of one's own and others' liberation and enlightenment because one has promised to do so.

Not to mention all the qualities, if it is necessary to familiarise oneself for an ocean of eons even for one individual quality of the marks and signs, then one has not started to even partially meditate on those qualities. It is strange that I make meaningless this birth, with its freedoms and endowments, for this and future rebirths, now when somehow I have found it after such a long time. This is an expression of despair.

As the commentary explains, One should establish the many qualities of one's own and others' liberation and enlightenment because one has promised to do so. The third chapter of the text explains the benefits of bodhicitta, and shows how to make that promise to develop bodhicitta. Having made that promise to work for the welfare of other sentient beings, one definitely needs to strive to obtain all the qualities that are the cause for obtaining liberation and enlightenment both for one's own sake, and for the sake of other sentient beings.

In order to establish others in the state of liberation and enlightenment one first needs to have obtained liberation and enlightenment oneself. Without that, one could not possibly establish other sentient beings in that state. Here again we need to reflect upon what liberation means. What does a state of liberation mean, and what does a state of enlightenment mean? At this point, we need to recall all of the explanations on liberation and enlightenment that we have studied. As soon as we hear the word liberation we need to immediately recall what that actually entails, and when we hear about enlightenment we need to recall what that actually means. We need to go beyond just hearing the words, and contemplate what they actually mean. This understanding, in itself, is said to be a means to purify a lot of negative karma and accumulate a lot of merit. We are aiming at an incredible goal, so whenever these words are mentioned, we need to recall our understanding of them.

As further presented in the commentary, Not to mention all the qualities, if it is necessary to familiarise oneself for an ocean of eons even for one individual quality of the marks and signs. The text Precious Garland, which we studied in the past, gave an extensive explanation of the marks and signs of the Buddha, obtaining each of which takes many eons of accumulation of merit. So each of the signs and marks of the Buddha has taken tremendous effort, and the accumulation of enormous merit over eons of time.

Yet one has not started to even partially familiarise oneself with those qualities. Despite the fact that obtaining just one mark of a buddha requires familiarising oneself with its causes and accumulating merit over many eons, the reality is that one has not yet even started to familiarise oneself, let alone exert oneself, even partially, to accumulate the merits needed to obtain these qualities.

Based on the promise that one has made, and the need to establish those qualities then it is strange that I make meaningless my rebirth now with these freedoms and endowments for this and future lives. Not only are we making this life meaningless, but we are also making our future life meaningless by wasting the precious human rebirth we have somehow found after such a long time. This is implying that it is like a miracle that we have obtained the condition of having the freedoms and endowments, and that wasting this very rare opportunity that we have found now is quite absurd.

This is an expression of despair implies that when the enlightened being, the Buddha, who we revere now as a supreme being, was a trainee, he used the opportunity provided by the freedoms and endowments to engage in practices to acquire qualities and abandon faults. Over many previous lifetimes, the Buddha as a trainee, and then as a bodhisattva, engaged in acquiring the causes and conditions leading to enlightenment, thus making his life highly meaningful. As we have the same freedoms and endowments now, it would be a great pity and a loss if we were to waste it. So this statement is one of words of encouragement to exhort us to actually make the precious human rebirth we have now, with its freedoms and endowments, purposeful and meaningful, by putting it into use in acquiring the causes for obtaining those enlightened qualities.

2.2.1.2.1.3. Analysing what one has done and what one has not done

In this section we think about and analyse what virtues we have engaged in, and what we have not done. This is explained in these two verses:

37. *I did not make offerings to the tathagatas
Nor did I offer the happiness of great celebrations.
I did not do anything for the teachings
And I did not meet the needs of the destitute.*
38. *I did not offer fearlessness to those in danger.
Nor did I give happiness to the wretched.
Hence, I have only given pain and suffering
While in the mother's womb.*

Here, Gyalsab Je explains:

Previously I did not make offerings to the Three Jewels, such as the Bhagavan, Lord Buddha, nor did I offer the happiness of great celebrations that serve sentient beings and the Tathagata. I did nothing for the teachings since I did not practise accordingly to the presentation of the objects of abandonment that have to be abandoned, and antidotes that have to be adopted. I also did not accomplish the wishes of the sentient beings who are destitute. I did not offer protection to those in danger from enemies or sicknesses. I also did not offer satisfaction to those that are wretched due to suffering, and hence I have not practised the holy Dharma at all and have only caused pain and suffering while being in the mother's womb.

As the commentary explains, previously I did not make offerings to the Three Jewels, such as the Bhagavan Lord Buddha. Here, making offerings to the Buddha includes direct offerings and indirect offerings. Direct offerings are those actually made by oneself, rather than having someone else do it. It is said that one gains more merit by presenting the offering oneself, rather than asking someone else to present it. In the monastery, sponsors making offerings to the Sangha, such as money, attempt to physically make the offering themselves. I recall one ex-abbot of Sera Monastery, who, even though he was very old, would go and make his offering to each monk personally, despite his feeble state.

Then the commentary explains that, nor did I offer the happiness of great celebrations that serve sentient beings and the Tathagata. Here, not offering the happiness of celebrations refers to not making offerings to others, not just Sangha but also enlightened beings and other sentient beings. This implies, of course, that making offerings to the buddhas and sentient beings is a very meritorious practice. For example, on the recent occasion of His Holiness' birthday, I suggested offering lunch to everyone because I thought that it would be a great way for you to accumulate merit.

Furthermore I did nothing for the teachings means that I have done nothing to propagate or practise the Dharma. Here we need to understand that the teachings are the Buddha's doctrine. Doing a service for the teachings means engaging in propagating the oral teachings such as the three baskets, and propagating the realisations. The Buddha's doctrine is subsumed into these two categories: the transmission of oral teachings and the transmission of insights.

Doing service in relation to the oral teachings means that, having studied the three baskets, and gained an understanding of them, one then explains it to others. If one were to engage in that, then that would be doing service to the Buddha's oral teachings.

Doing service for the transmission of insights of the Buddha's teachings means engaging in the practice according to the presentation of the objects of abandonment that have to be abandoned, and the antidotes that have to be adopted. In order to gain the realisations of the Buddha's doctrine one needs to apply the practice of abandoning the faults to be abandoned, and adopting qualities that one has to adopt. If one has failed to either propagate the Buddha's oral teachings, or made no effort to gain the realisations of the Buddha's doctrine, then one has not done service to the Buddha's doctrine.

One also needs to understand that this presentation is meant to encourage one to actually engage in the practice, and, if one has not engaged in these practices extensively, to more actively adopt them. Next the commentary states, I also did not accomplish the wishes of the sentient beings who are destitute. This relates to beings who are really impoverished being very poor and lacking the basic necessities. Offering such beings any kind of assistance such as food or clothing would make them feel a bit more comfortable, and so it is a really beneficial and virtuous practice. So this part of the commentary is referring to the practices that involve providing immediate care for those in need, to whatever extent one can. When we come across people who are destitute, it is extremely good to offer them help.

Furthermore, I did not offer protection to those in danger from enemies or sicknesses, this refers to the practice of helping those who are in danger. You will recall that one of the practices of generosity is giving fearlessness to those who are in fear of losing their life. One engages in this practice when one extends help to those whose life is in immediate danger.

This also applies to animals. For example, there are those who engage in the practice of buying animals that are about to be slaughtered—liberating an animal from the fear of death is an incredibly meaningful practice. As I have mentioned previously, when you are walking around the park for example, and you see an insect struggling in the water and about to drown, it is very easy to lift it out and put it onto dry land. That is said to be an incredible act of generosity, which is of great benefit to that particular insect. The commentary reminds us, if one has not engaged in these practices then one should reprimand oneself saying, 'I have not engaged in this practice of offering protection'.

With respect to, I did not offer satisfaction to those who are wretched due to suffering, some commentaries explain that this point also refers to the generosity of giving the Dharma. Here, wretched indicates experiencing suffering as a result of lacking the knowledge of how the Dharma prevents one from creating the causes of suffering. If one has not engaged in sharing one's understanding of the Dharma with such people, then one has not engaged in this practice. Conversely, practising giving the Dharma is very meaningful and beneficial. I also did not offer satisfaction to those that are wretched due to suffering, also means not showing that which has to be adopted and how to discard or abandon that which has to be abandoned. The implication is that when one engages in doing that then it is a very meritorious way of creating the causes for the achievement of enlightenment.

Hence I have not practised the holy Dharma at all. The Tibetan word dampa, which is translated here as holy Dharma can also refer to the actions of holy beings who are perpetually engaged in virtue and abandoning negativities. Thus practising the holy Dharma refers to engaging in the practices of adopting virtue and shunning all non-virtues.

Of course what is being presented here is that one may have engaged in the practices to a certain extent, but if one has not utilised one's full capacity to engage in these practices then it is as if the only purpose in taking rebirth is to cause pain and suffering while being in the mother's womb. This is a reference to the suffering experienced by the mother (and the child) as she gives birth. If one has not engaged in any purposeful way to make one's life meaningful, then it is as if one has been reborn just to cause suffering to the mother. So this is another way of exhorting us to actually engage in meaningful and purposeful practices.

Then the commentary concludes with, not having done anything for others one feels regret.

We can finish here for the evening.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བརྟུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

28 July 2015

While maintaining the motivation generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

As usual, let us generate a positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

As mentioned last week, the tong-len practice we meditate on is the very core of Mahayana practice, so the more we familiarise ourselves with it the more it reveals to us the whole purpose of listening to the teachings and practising them.

As mentioned previously, in the seven-step cause and effect sequence of developing bodhicitta, the immediate state of mind preceding bodhicitta is called superior intention. This is the mind where one personally takes complete responsibility to free all beings from all suffering, and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness. Having developed this strong personal commitment, one looks deeper into whether one has the ability to do so right now, and realises one does not, but the Buddha does. So one sees that achieving enlightenment is paramount to fulfilling this key purpose. This becomes the immediate cause for developing bodhicitta, which is an essential point to recognise. Once one has developed bodhicitta, the actions that follow are the practises of a bodhisattva.

In relation to the technique of equalising and exchanging oneself with others, while superior intention is not explicitly mentioned, it is implicitly included in the practice. In understanding how the tong-len practice works, where one voluntarily takes upon the suffering of all sentient beings and gives one's happiness to them, one sees that it involves taking personal responsibility. Thus the superior intention is definitely included in the technique. Prior to developing superior intention one needs to first develop great love and great compassion, where one has the spontaneous strong wish that all beings be endowed in happiness, and be free from all suffering.

When one develops superior intention it is no longer a mere wish, rather it is an actual commitment to take on that as a personal responsibility. With that understanding, engaging in the tong-len practice provides a supreme method for one to free beings from suffering by taking their suffering upon oneself, and place them in happiness by giving one's own happiness to them. Hence the tong-len practice is putting the superior intention into practice.

Engaging in regular tong-len meditation and incorporating it into our daily lives is a highly meaningful core practice, and it is of paramount importance in the development of love and compassion in our hearts.

As much as we can, we should familiarise our mind with love and compassion as these are the most essential qualities one can develop. The reason we need to take it more seriously and use our time now to regularly acquaint ourselves with love and compassion, is because day by day we are getting closer and closer to the end of our life. If we ensure that we familiarise ourselves with love and compassion then, at the same time as we get closer to the end of this life, we'll also be getting closer to having a good rebirth.

It is essential to act now, while one has the opportunity, because if one doesn't seize this opportunity it is like losing a precious jewel. If we had a precious jewel and we were to lose it before we got a chance to use it, we'd consider that a great loss. The cultivation of love and compassion is like a precious jewel: we have it as a potential within us right now and it is up to us to actually use it by further developing it.

In the refuge teachings, we can understand why the actual refuge within the three jewels is the Dharma jewel. That is because the Dharma jewel is the actual means to protect one from an unfortunate rebirth in the next life, as well as all other fears and sufferings. The very essence of Dharma is none other than the cultivation of love and compassion. Therefore, the more we develop love and compassion, the closer we get to a higher rebirth in our next life, and thus closer to attaining enlightenment.

If one wonders whether one is getting closer to enlightenment or not, observe whether love and compassion is developing in one's heart. When one finds that love and compassion is developing more and more strongly in one's heart, then there's no doubt that one is getting closer and closer to enlightenment. Love and compassion are the basis for developing bodhicitta, and as we develop bodhicitta we are getting closer to enlightenment.

I'm sharing this advice as an essential practice. Just knowing about Dharma topics is not sufficient; one needs to engage in practise. A mere intellectual understanding of the Dharma doesn't seem to move one's mind. But by putting it into practise, meditating and familiarising ourselves with the feeling of love and compassion in our hearts again and again, one will actually begin to have the real taste of Dharma. As it moves our mind we will begin to see a real transformation taking place within ourselves.

If one gains more knowledge of the Dharma, if one doesn't put it into practise, then there is a danger that one generates more pride. We need to protect ourselves from this pitfall. The more we integrate the Dharma within our minds, the more it will overcome the delusions rather than strengthening them. When we put the Dharma into practise then it becomes the means to actually overcome pride, jealousy, anger, attachment and so forth. Every piece of advice the Buddha gave in all his teachings serves as antidotes for overcoming the delusions. When we integrate the Dharma within our minds, and put it into practise, we will find that transformation does take place. While I don't claim to have any realisations myself, it is with a genuine belief in the Dharma that I present these points for consideration. I spend a lot of time thinking about these points myself and strongly feel that putting the Dharma into practise is a definite way to achieve positive effects. So with this intention in mind I share these points with you again and again.

2.2.1.2.1.1. The object of belief

2.2.1.2.1.1.3. Analysing what one has done and what one has not (cont.)

As mentioned in verse 38, which we covered in our last session, we need to ensure that our purpose is not merely to have caused suffering while in the mother's womb.

Again, the verses read:

37. *I did not make offerings to the tathagatas
Nor did I offer the happiness of great
celebrations.
I did not do anything for the teachings
And I did not meet the needs of the destitute.*
38. *I did not offer fearlessness to those in danger.
Nor did I give happiness to the wretched.
Hence, I have only given pain and suffering
While in the mother's womb.*

The verses indicate that if one has not put any effort into the practice of Dharma, then it is as if the only thing we've really done in our lives is bring suffering to our mother. They contain profound advice if we pay attention.

2.2.1.2.1.2. The result of belief

This section of the outline is divided into two:

2.2.1.2.1.2.1. It is unsuitable to give up the belief in the Dharma

2.2.1.2.1.2.2. The reason for this

Here we can reflect on how meticulously Gyalsab Rinpoche presents outlines to explain the meaning of the verses.

He presents that it is unsuitable to give up belief in the Dharma. Naturally, when it explains that one shouldn't give up the belief in the Dharma, one may wonder what the reason may be. So, the next verses provide the reason for not giving up belief in the Dharma.

If belief is important then what are its causes? That is presented next and the sequence itself is very profound.

2.2.1.2.1.2.1. It is unsuitable to give up the belief in the Dharma

The verse reads:

39. *Through being separated from belief in Dharma,
Previously and in the present,
I have received this destitution.
Who would give up the wish for the Dharma?*

The commentary explains:

Through having been separated from belief in the holy Dharma, both by way of ascertaining and faith¹, in the present and in the past, I am experiencing the destitution of being held by the degenerations of cyclic existence. Who that is proficient would give up the belief for the Dharma? Those that wish to be liberated from degeneration should generate belief for the Dharma.

The commentary first presents the shortcomings of not believing in the Dharma, Through having been separated from belief in the holy Dharma, both by way of ascertaining and faith, i.e. by lacking ascertainment and faith in the Dharma, in the present and in the past, as the result of that what one is experiencing now is the destitution - the state of being held by the degenerations or the sufferings of cyclic existence. This essentially points out that the various types of suffering and turmoil one is now experiencing physically and mentally are due to a lack of belief in the Dharma. When one lacks belief in the Dharma, the aspiration to practise Dharma will not arise, therefore aspiration is very much related to belief or faith in the Dharma. So when one has faith then the aspiration to incorporate it and practise it will arise. What is being presented here is that one's present destitute situation in cyclic existence is the result of a lack of faith in the Dharma in the past.

The commentary continues, who that is proficient would give up the belief for the Dharma? Those who are proficient refers to those with a profound understanding of the law of cause and effect i.e. karma. The rhetorical question implies that when one has a deep understanding of karma, and an analytical wisdom knowing the cause and effect sequence of karma, then such a skilled, proficient person would not give up a belief in Dharma, as they would value it.

The commentary continues with, those that wish to be liberated from degeneration, and here degeneration refers to a state of perpetual suffering in cyclic existence. The conclusion is that those wishing to be liberated from that state should generate belief for the Dharma.

Gyalsab Rinpoche himself presents a concluding remark on the meaning of the verse: those that wish to be liberated from degeneration, should definitely generate belief in the Dharma, because no-one wants to experience these sufferings of cyclic existence. Understanding what causes the sufferings of cyclic existence helps to free one from them. That is the Dharma. Understanding this, one would definitely generate belief in the Dharma.

2.2.1.2.1.2.2. The reason for this

The outline next provides the reason for not giving up the belief in the Dharma.

The first two lines of the verse read:

40ab. *The Able One taught that the root
Of every class of virtue is belief.*

The commentary then explains:

The Able One taught that the root of every class of virtue is the belief that has trust in the virtuous objects the way they have been ascertained. It is taught like this in the Sutra of the Moon Lamp.

As presented here, the Able One, being Shakyamuni, has taught that the root of every class of virtue is the belief that has trust in the virtuous objects. Every class of virtue here refers to the virtues which serve as a cause to obtain high status and definite goodness. High status refers to a rebirth in the higher realms in the next life, as well as the causes for definite goodness, which is liberation and enlightenment.

¹ Belief of those of sharp-faculty and belief of those of dull-faculty. Although in Buddhism there is faith based on reason, here faith refers to faith without analysis.

Every class of virtue subsumes all of the virtues, and the root of acquiring all virtues is the belief that has trust in the virtuous objects. Here, the root, means that without belief one cannot possibly ascertain virtuous objects, and so one would not aspire to engage in the virtues that are the cause for all the positive results. This also implies that the way virtuous objects have been ascertained brings about virtuous results, while negative causes bring about negative results. Ascertaining this understanding helps one engage in the virtues and actually accomplish those goals.

It explicitly says that the root (or basis) of every class of virtue is belief, which means that it is not the case that for some virtues you need to have belief as a basis while for others you don't. This means that all virtues, from the most basic up to the ultimate, are based on belief. The commentary mentions the Sutra of the Moon Lamp in which the Buddha states this.

2.2.1.2.1.3. The cause for belief

This is subdivided into two:

2.2.1.2.1.3.1. Showing the cause for belief

2.2.1.2.1.3.2. Explaining the cause of belief

2.2.1.2.1.3.1. Showing the cause for belief

What I explained earlier is presented in the next two lines of the verse.

The verse reads:

*40cd. Its root is continual meditation
On the ripening results.*

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse as follows:

The root of belief in turn is to meditate on belief in the virtuous and non-virtuous karmas and their ripening results. If one has not ascertained karmic cause and effect well, then one has not found a realisation of the Dharma that will please the buddhas. Therefore one should strive in it.

The fact that some who say they have ascertained emptiness, but disregard karmic cause and effect, invalidates their understanding of emptiness.

Here the commentary specifically presents that the root of belief in turn is to meditate or to familiarise oneself with belief in the virtuous and non-virtuous karmas and their ripening results. The way to develop belief or faith is to meditate, and to familiarise oneself again and again with the virtuous and non-virtuous karmas and their ripening results. This means that the more one contemplates it, the more one develops a conviction in the cause and effect sequence of how non-virtuous actions (non-virtuous karma) definitely bring about unwanted results such as suffering, and that virtuous karmas definitely bring about happiness as their result.

The deeper one's conviction in this, the more inclined one would be to avoid non-virtuous actions (non-virtuous karma) as a way to prevent experiencing the effect of suffering, and the more inclined one will be to engage in virtues as a way to gain the results of happiness for oneself. If one has a weak conviction about this fact, then one would not hesitate to create non-virtues and may not be keen on developing virtuous actions. Therefore the very root of belief is developing that conviction.

Gyaltsab Rinpoche further emphasises this point when stating that if one has not ascertained karmic cause and effect well, then one has not found a realisation of the Dharma, one has not actualised the Dharma that will please the buddhas. Therefore one should strive in it. Here, the commentary specifically gives the advice that for as long as one has not developed a strong conviction on the karmic cause and effect sequence, then, no matter what understanding one may have gained, one has actually not actualised the Dharma in a way that would please the buddhas.

The core advice of the Buddha's teachings, its very basis, is to avoid harming other sentient beings, and on top of that, to engage in ways to benefit and help other beings. On that basis one then goes for refuge in the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha. So the core of the Buddha's teachings is non-harmfulness or non-violence towards other beings.

Without a conviction in the cause and effect of karma, there is nothing to stop one from engaging in harmful actions that actually harm sentient beings. Then, if one harms sentient beings, there is no way one can please the buddhas because the sentient beings are the very object which the buddhas hold most dear. So when we harm sentient beings we will naturally be displeasing the buddhas by going against their advice. Therefore the more one abides by the law of karma and refrains from engaging in non-virtuous deeds that harm other beings, the more we engage in practices that please the buddhas. Hence, the commentary emphasises, one should strive in it.

To be considered a Buddhist practitioner, the basic practice is observing morality. In this sense morality refers to specific practices which refrain from harming other sentient beings. Then, based on practising morality, one engages in further practices that are presented in the teachings. As such, the morality of refraining from harming other beings is the very basis of Buddhism, so if one is practising that one can safely assume that one is a practising Buddhist. We need to understand that the essence of the Buddha's teaching is based on morality, and that all of the other practices ensue from that.

Gyaltsab Je further mentions, the fact that some who say they have ascertained emptiness, but disregard karmic cause and effect, invalidates their understanding of emptiness, which is a point we touched on earlier. The danger here is that without a correct understanding of emptiness one may easily misinterpret emptiness to mean that nothing exists, and therefore karmic cause and effect also doesn't exist. One could easily come to this wrong conclusion and then think one could do anything one wishes, as cause and effect doesn't apply to oneself. However, when one gains the correct understanding of emptiness it should in fact validate and strengthen one's understanding of the cause and effect of karma. This should be the case, as understanding emptiness involves understanding that things are empty of inherent existence i.e. that things are empty of existing independently, and thus of not relying on any causes and conditions. When that is ascertained, one understands that everything arises in dependence on its causes and conditions i.e. dependent arising.

When things are presented as being empty, if one does not understand that this means being empty of inherent existence, one falls short of the real meaning of emptiness and faces the danger of negating actual existence, and thus holding a wrong view of karma by thinking that cause and effect does not apply. When one understands that emptiness means things are empty of independent existence, then that actually establishes that they exist interdependently. I've explained this point before with the passage from the Heart Sutra that says, form is empty, emptiness is form, which is exactly the point made here. When one understands how form is empty of inherent existence then that understanding validates what emptiness is. This phrase explains how all existence, forms, and all other phenomena, are actually manifestations of emptiness. Because form is empty of inherent existence it is possible to establish form conventionally; if form were to exist inherently then it would not be possible for form to function on a conventional level. To restate the point, because form is empty of inherent existence it is possible for form to function and exist as form. Thus, form and all other phenomena arise as manifestations of emptiness.

I've explained these points in detail in previous teachings. So whenever there's mention of emptiness you need to incorporate those explanations to reinforce the proper understanding. In this way you will be able to periodically bring the correct understating of emptiness to mind, and familiarising yourselves with it again and again. Every moment we think about the meaning of emptiness, and apply that understanding in our practice, it becomes a powerful means to gain an incredible amount of merit as it is a highly virtuous activity. At the same time it also becomes the most powerful means to purify extensive negative karmas, by removing subtle imprints of misconceptions. And at the same time it also implants very positive imprints in our mind.

So, when thinking simply about how form is empty, and incorporating that understanding right away, you will come to see that it doesn't mean that form does not exist, rather that it doesn't exist inherently and independently. While it does not exist inherently and independently, it does exist, but there is no other way for it to exist either than by depending on causes and conditions. When that understanding develops in our mind we are moving in the right direction towards gaining the unmistakable and correct understanding of emptiness.

2.2.1.2.1.3.2. Explaining the cause of belief

This is subdivided into three:

2.2.1.2.1.3.2.1. Contemplating mixed karmic cause and effect

2.2.1.2.1.3.2.2. Contemplating singular white karmic cause and effect

2.2.1.2.1.3.2.3. Contemplating black karmic cause and effect

This heading presents the various types of karmas as the cause for belief. The first, mixed karmic cause and effect, implies there are certain karmas that we create which are not entirely virtuous or not entirely non-virtuous, but a mixture of both. Then there is singular white karmic cause and effect, meaning that certain karmas are completely virtuous and thus their effect is also completely virtuous. Then contemplating the black karma is where the karma in its entirety is negative.

2.2.1.2.1.3.2.1. Contemplating mixed karmic cause and effect

Contemplating and understanding this is a very practical way for one to get a good understanding of the basis of the Dharma. So it is very relevant to us.

The verse reads:

41. *Sufferings and mental unhappiness,
The many different horrors,
And being separated from one's wishes
Arise from negative behaviour.*

The commentary reads as follows:

Because the physical sufferings of migrators, their mental feelings of unhappiness, the different horrors of human and non-human existences and separation from the objects of one's wishes such as friends, relatives, wealth and so forth all arise from the cause of negative behaviour, one should strive in abandoning negativity.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the sufferings of certain migrators, even in the human realms. The physical sufferings of migrators as well as their mental feelings of unhappiness, plus the different horrors of human and non-human existences, refers to the harms we may experience from other human or non-human existences. Furthermore, there's suffering arising from separation from the objects of one's wishes such as friends, relatives, wealth and so forth. All of the experiences we have, even with good conditions as a human, arise from negative behaviour and negative actions. Understanding this one should resolve to strive in abandoning negativity.

To understand this on a personal level, recognise that whenever we experience a mishap, it is not others who have caused us this mishap. We are experiencing the results of our own negative karma. Practising the opposite of this creates the opposite effect, which is presented in the next two verses where the singular karmic cause and effect is explained.

The next two verses read:

42. *By creating the virtue intended in one's mind,
Wherever one migrates to
There one will, through these merits,
Be honoured by the resulting qualities.*
43. *Although those creating negativity wish for happiness
Wherever they migrate to,
There they will, through this negativity,
Be destroyed by the weapons of suffering.*

The commentary explains the meaning of these verses whose essence I have explained already:

Having created the virtue one intended to do in one's mind, motivated by the mind of abandoning, whichever birthplace one then migrates to, there one will, through these merits, be honoured by the resulting qualities of the ripening result.

The effects however do not follow merely the wish for happiness or suffering. Although the person acting non-virtuously wishes for happiness, by nature, wherever they migrate to, there they will, through that negativity, be destroyed by the weapons of suffering. Therefore one should strive in abandoning negativity. The qualities of the result are the mode of the nature of the result.

It says that, having created the virtue one intended to do in one's mind, motivated by the mind of abandoning as a result, whichever birthplace one then migrates to, there one will, through these merits, be honoured by the resulting qualities of the ripening result. This explains that when one's mind is motivated with the intention of abandoning negativity, it creates virtue, which then becomes the ripened result experienced in whatever place to which one migrates. Wherever one may happen to be reborn, the merits will ripen in that place.

On the point that, whichever birthplace one then migrates to, there one will, through these merits, be honoured by the resulting qualities of the ripening result, the commentary specifically explains the infallibility of karma. In other words, if one has created virtues, then that virtuous result will definitely be experienced wherever one may take rebirth.

This also holds true for the non-virtuous karmas one has created. For example, while being reborn in an unfortunate realm such as an animal, which is a result of a previous negative karma, some good conditions can be experienced. We know some pets are very well fed and well groomed with a seemingly nice, free life and fully taken care of. These good conditions are the result of positive karma, created previously by that being. So even if one is reborn in an unfortunate rebirth, one still carries the positive imprints of previously-created good karma.

In contrast, a being might have a higher rebirth such as in the human realm, but the conditions are very poor. The means for basic survival are scarce, and many hardships, difficulties and sufferings are experienced. This is an example of how, while a previous good karma brings them into a good rebirth, what they then experience as bad conditions are the results of previously created negative karma. This again shows the infallibility of karma; even when one is born in a good migration, in a higher rebirth, the ripening results of previously-created negative karma catch up with oneself.

Many examples are presented in the Lam Rim, specifically where the causal karma can be virtuous, but the completing karma can be negative. The main point is that the results of karma will definitely be experienced. When one creates a positive karma, positive effects will definitely be experienced wherever one takes rebirth. And if one has created negative karmas, those will definitely ripen in whatever rebirth one may take.

The second verse says that the effects however do not follow merely the wish for happiness or suffering. I regularly emphasise this point. If one wishes to be happy, one cannot just sit around and think that happiness will somehow come by some day. One actually has to create the causes to be happy. Even when wanting to achieve certain worldly goals, we need to actually exert ourselves to create the conditions to achieve that goal. Likewise if one doesn't wish to experience problems, just sitting around and wishing for them to go away won't work, we actually have to engage in specific causes to remove those conditions.

The commentary further explains, although the person acting non-virtuously wishes for happiness, by nature, wherever they migrate to, there they will, through that negativity, be destroyed by the weapons of suffering.

The text went into quite a bit of detail about that previously. There's no-one who wouldn't wish to be happy, and there's no-one who would wish to experience suffering. But while wishing for happiness, many destroy the causes for their happiness. And while not wishing for suffering, they actually unintentionally create the causes for suffering. The problem is ignorance—not knowing how to apply the causes for happiness and how to avoid the causes that lead one to experience the unwanted suffering results. An earlier verse mentions that whilst wishing to not experience any kind of suffering, migrators run to the very cause of suffering. And whilst wishing to experience happiness they destroy their own causes for happiness. The point is that there's no-one who doesn't wish for happiness, but if one destroys the very causes of one's happiness one cannot achieve that state of happiness. Similarly, while one does not wish any kind of suffering, if one actually creates the causes for it, even if one does not wish for it, sufferings will fall on oneself.

2.2.1.2.1.3.2.2. Contemplating singular white karmic cause and effect

This explains actions that are entirely white or virtuous karma. The verse is preceded by the statement:

Through having meditated on virtuous dharmas the children of the conquerors take rebirth in the Land of Great Bliss and the like.

This means that having familiarised oneself with virtuous dharmas, the children of the conquerors (the bodhisattvas), actually take rebirth in the Land of Great Bliss and the like.

The verse reads:

44. *In the centre of an expansive fragrant fresh lotus flower
Splendour is born from the nourishing melodious teachings of the conqueror
Possessing a supreme body born from a lotus unfolded by the Able One's luminosity, Abiding before the conquerors, they become the Tathagata's children by virtue.*

The commentary explains:

They abide in the centre of a lotus that is the characteristic of birthplace, a beautiful, fresh, vast and expansive fragrant lotus that generates bliss just by touching it.

Instead of living off worldly foods they listen to the more distinguished melodious teachings of the Buddha that possess the sixty qualities of enlightened speech and generate splendour and complexion through the food of the realisation of its subject, emptiness.

To arise from a lotus opened and unfolded by the luminosity of the Able One, the Tathagata, is the characteristic of birth. They possess the characteristic of body, a supreme body with the marks and signs. As the characteristic of teacher, they abide in front of Amitabha Buddha and the like and are carried by their dharmas.

By way of these characteristics the children of the tathagatas come about solely through white virtuous karma.

The first part of the commentary examines the characteristic of their birthplace which is, they abide in the centre of a lotus that is the characteristic of birthplace, a beautiful, fresh, vast and expansive fragrant lotus that generates bliss just by touching it. This is a description of the miraculous birth of a bodhisattva in the pure lands, born from a lotus with very pleasant conditions.

Next it presents the characteristics that nourish bodhisattvas in the pure lands, instead of living off worldly foods, like the gross kinds of foods that we consume, they listen to the more distinguished melodious teachings of the Buddha that possess the sixty qualities of enlightened speech. Their time is spent listening to the teachings of the Buddhas and then they generate splendour and complexion through the food of the realisation of its subject, emptiness. What nourishes the bodhisattvas' bodies in the pure lands is the splendour they generate, and their complexion is nourished with the food of the realisation of emptiness, which is the subject of those teachings.

The characteristic of the birth itself is, to arise from a lotus opened and unfolded by the luminosity of the Able One, the luminosity or the light rays of the Able One (Buddha) the Tathagata, is the characteristic of birth. Initially the lotus bud is closed, then the light rays that come forth from the buddhas serve as a condition for it to open, and it is within that lotus that a bodhisattva takes birth. The characteristic of the body is that, they possess the characteristic of body, a supreme body with the marks and signs.

As the characteristic of teacher, they abide in front of Amitabha Buddha and are carried (meaning transformed or further developed by) the dharmas of the buddhas such as Amitabha Buddha and other buddhas. What is being explained here is that they have actual buddhas such as Amitabha Buddha and others, giving direct teachings to them in their actual forms. They have the merit to be able to see the buddhas and receive teachings directly, so their mind develops rapidly.

The commentary concludes that, by way of these characteristics, which are the five characteristics just mentioned:

1. the characteristic of the birthplace;
2. the characteristic of the nourishment or food;
3. the characteristic of the actual birth;
4. the characteristic of the physical body; and
5. the characteristic of teacher

... the children of the tathagatas, (the bodhisattvas), come about solely through white virtuous karma. So these characteristics with which the bodhisattvas are endowed in the pure lands, come about solely through white virtuous karma, meaning they are completely the results of white virtuous karma.

We can reflect upon how wondrous and pleasant that sounds: the very birth is pleasant, no suffering is involved, just being born miraculously from a lotus, with the lotus opened by the light of the buddhas. The body is not a gross body, but a very pure body, which is not nourished by gross food, but rather by the realisations of the teachings themselves. Then they have the marks and signs on their bodies, and receive teachings directly from the buddhas. This is a wondrous thing we can aspire to, which is why it is appropriate to make aspirations to be born in the blissful pure lands. There are many who take Amitabha as their main practice, and make strong prayers to be born in the pure lands. This is a significant point.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

4 August 2015

The prayers that we have just recited encompass both the Mahayana refuge and bodhicitta, which suffices for the altruistic Mahayana motivation. With this motivation intact we can now engage in our meditation practice.

In accordance with the sequence of the practice, we first take refuge and then generate bodhicitta. When taking refuge is combined with the bodhicitta motivation, such as 'I go for refuge for the sake of all mother sentient beings in order to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness', or 'I take refuge in the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha, and engage in practices so that I obtain Buddhahood', then this is called generating exceptional refuge.

Now we can begin our meditation practice. [meditation]

It is good to generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, in order to liberate them from all suffering, and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings, and put them into practise well.

2.2.1.2.1. The power of belief

2.2.1.2.1.3. The cause for belief

2.2.1.2.1.3.2. Explaining the cause of belief (cont.)

2.2.1.2.1.3.2.3. Contemplating black karmic cause and effect

This is presented in the following verse:

45. *Extremely tormented as one is fully skinned by the minions of Yama
Copper molten by extreme heat is poured onto one's body,
Pierced by flaming swords and daggers the flesh is carved up in hundreds of pieces,
Fallen on the blazing iron ground, comes about due to the many non-virtuous karmas.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Due to the karma of killing and so forth, one will be extremely tormented by suffering as all one's skin is being pulled off by the minions of the lord of death. The characteristic of engagement, which is that copper, molten by extreme heat is poured over one's body, is difficult to bear. Not only this, but one will be pierced by flaming swords and daggers and one's flesh will be carved up into many hundreds of pieces.

The experience of being tormented by the characteristic of place, which means that one falls onto the blazing iron grounds, comes about through the many non-virtuous karmas such as the karmas of immediate retribution, the karma of abandoning Dharma and the like.

We have already covered some of the types of sufferings that are explained here. The main point is that these sufferings are experienced in the realms into which one is reborn, and that they are the result of the negative karma that one has previously created. As presented here, we need to pay attention to the karmas of immediate retribution, also known as heinous crimes, the karma of abandoning the Dharma and so forth. It is really worthwhile to pay attention to abandoning the ten non-virtuous actions, for one will then naturally avoid engaging in many misdeeds. For example, three of the five karmas of immediate retribution i.e. killing one's mother, killing one's father and killing an arhat, are all included in the misdeed of killing. So when one makes the commitment to refrain from killing, one is naturally protected from creating these extremely heavy negative karmas.

Indeed, contemplating abandoning the ten non-virtuous karmas is a high level of practice. In order to abandon the ten non-virtuous karmas you need to practise the ten white karmas, or the ten virtuous actions. Just as there are negative consequences from committing the non-virtuous karmas, as has just been explained, one will experience positive effects from observing the ten virtuous karmas. This is explained in great detail in the teachings.

When we make the commitment to avoid the ten non-virtuous karmas then that forms the basis for practicing morality. It is explained in the teachings that when one makes an active commitment to avoid the ten non-virtuous actions, then that serves as the basis for one to take the self-liberation, bodhisattva and tantric vows. It also serves as the basis for keeping the commitments of these vows. So practising the ten non-virtuous actions is the basis for observing all of the commitments that one may have.

As explained earlier, if one doesn't observe the karmic law of cause and effect, and abide in its practice, then one is not able to please the buddhas. This emphasises the essentiality of abandoning the ten non-virtues, and adopting the ten virtues.

2.2.1.2.1.4. Concluding summary

*46ab. Therefore one should practise belief in virtue
And meditate on it with great respect.*

The commentary reads:

Therefore, having contemplated the way of karmic cause and effect, one should practise belief in virtue and meditate on it with great respect by way of having conviction.

Having extensively identified the virtues and the non-virtues, and the effects of their white karma and negative karma respectively, one then puts that understanding into practice. By meditating on and familiarising oneself with virtue one understands that the positive effect of virtue is something that one wishes for, and so one engages in virtue. Likewise, by realising that one does not wish to experience the effects of negative karma, or non-virtue, one takes the initiative and makes a strong determination to avoid non-virtue.

We find that whenever we put some effort and energy into accumulating virtues we develop a strong sense of joy. So we rejoice in having accumulated virtue, and compliment ourselves: 'It is incredibly fortunate that I have had opportunity to engage in this virtue today'. Rejoicing in the virtue that one has accumulated actually increases the positive effects of that virtue. Thus, rejoicing in virtue is the optimum means to increase the positive effects of one's virtue.

Of course, we may try our best to avoid creating negative karma. However, due to strong habituation with the delusions in our mind we might find that we still engage in some non-virtuous actions. But by contemplating and acknowledging the consequences of those negative deeds, we can develop regret, thinking, 'It has been unfortunate that I have engaged in such negativities'.

It is essential to acknowledge the effects of positive karma and negative karma. When one experiences pleasant situations and good things happening in one's life, then one can immediately rejoice and think, 'These are the positive effects of my previous karma'. When one experiences difficulties and unwanted suffering in life, one can immediately reflect, 'These are none other than the effects of my own doing, the negative karma that I have created in the past'. One understands that whatever one experiences, whether it is positive or negative, is the result of one's own karma. There is no other cause of suffering and misery than one's own negative karma. In this way, one takes the initiative to immediately relate whatever one experiences as effects of karma that one had created in the past.

That then generates the initiative to avoid creating more negativity, and to develop strong regret (which is said to be the most powerful of the four opponent powers) and engage in purification practices for negativity that one has already created. With this awareness in mind, one will then be able to lead a life abiding in karma. When one takes the initiative to develop this keen awareness of karma, one will take every opportunity to accumulate virtue, and to avoid engaging in negativity. If, and when, one finds oneself engaging in negativity, one will immediately be able to develop regret and purify it.

When one puts this into practice on a daily basis, then at the end of each day, as one reflects on the actions created during the day, when one finds that one has accumulated more virtue, that then becomes a great source of joy and one rejoices in one's good deeds. If one finds that one has created more negativity, then one develops strong regret, engages in some form of purification practice, and finally makes a commitment to avoid engaging in that negativity again.

When we take the initiative to integrate the Dharma into our mind, then eventually that becomes a positive habit, and we become inclined to engage in virtue. We will find that our mind spontaneously and joyfully wishes to engage in virtue. When that takes place, then that is the positive outcome of contemplating karma. While it is important for us to know the categories and divisions of karma, that in itself will not benefit one. We will only benefit from that understanding and knowledge when we actually put it into practice.

When we engage in a daily practice like this, contemplating the karmic cause and effect in detail, engaging in virtue, and avoiding or purifying negative karmas, then we become more and more acquainted with engaging in virtuous deeds, and less and less inclined to engage in negativity. When that transformation takes place, one naturally and spontaneously wants to engage in virtuous deeds, and naturally wants to avoid negative deeds. That is the hallmark that our practice of karma has taken effect. You might already have a belief in karma, but it is only by abiding in karma, which means putting it into practice, that we reap positive results from that belief.

When the commentary states one should practise belief in faith and virtue, and meditate on it with great respect by way of having conviction it is explaining that when one has developed a conviction in karma based on a profound understanding of it, then one will be able to engage in developing familiarity with virtue. By developing a strong conviction in the importance of virtue, one will naturally be inclined to adopt virtue as one's practice, while at the same time abandoning negativities.

That will enable us to confidently face the next life. When we reach the time when we have to discard this body and go on to the next life, there will be no hesitation. That is because we will have the conviction that having engaged in virtue, we have created the causes to obtain all the good conditions necessary to continue to practise Dharma in the next life. In fact, when one reaches a significant age, or if one's body is really weakened due to some disease, then one will be quite glad to leave this old and weak body behind, and get a fresh new body, with all the good conditions intact. With that conviction there will be no hesitation about the prospect of death and going onto the next life, instead there will be joy. These are the practical and positive effects of having belief in, and abiding in karma.

If there is strong regret at the time of death, then the mind will be quite disturbed and it won't be a very pleasant death. Apparently, all the negativities and non-virtuous actions that one has committed in one's life come vividly to mind, bringing real remorse and regret at that time. That brings a mind of fear, sadness and anxiety at the prospect of facing death. In contrast, if one has a virtuous mind, and thus a joyful state of mind, then the death will be a positive experience which will then establish the immediate conditions for a good existence in the future life. This, in fact, seems to be one practical benefit of practising the Dharma. It is this immediately practical, personal goal that gives us the impetus to practise Dharma.

As the Lam Rim teachings explain, the state of mind at the time of death will be the one with which one is most familiar. If one has strong familiarity with virtue, then it will be a virtuous state of mind that will naturally arise. If one has a strong familiarity with non-virtue, then the state of mind at the time of death will most likely be a non-virtuous mind. As the Lam Rim further explains, if one has virtue and non-virtue in equal strength, then whatever one is engaged in first will arise as the prominent state of mind. So Lama Tsong Khapa is presenting us with some very significant and crucial points as a means to encourage us to actually engage in the practice of Dharma by abiding in the law of karma and so forth.

2.2.1.2.2. The power of stability

This has two subdivisions:

2.2.1.2.2.1. Striving steadfastly

2.2.1.2.2.2. Abiding steadfastly after having started

2.2.1.2.2.1. Striving steadfastly

This has two further subdivisions:

2.2.1.2.2.1.1. Starting upon having investigated well

2.2.1.2.2.1.2. The fault of giving up after having started

Here we can see how the outlines themselves present the material of the text in a very systematic, logical way. Not only that, but they are also, in themselves, instructions on how to engage properly in the practices and so forth. As presented here, one needs to have a strong commitment to do what one wants to do, and then develop a strong commitment to complete what one has started.

Starting upon having investigated well is a really crucial instruction. Before one engages in an activity one needs to first investigate what the benefits are and so forth. Then, having completed that thorough investigation, one will not create the fault of giving up after having started.

2.2.1.2.2.1.1. Starting upon having investigated well

The first two lines of verse related to this heading read:

*46cd. Having started through the ritual of Vajradhvaja
One should meditate on pride.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

The sixth dedication of the Arya Vajradhvaja Sutra says:

Lha'ibu, just as the rising sun, without being stopped by blindness or uneven mountains, illuminates the objects that are suitable, bodhisattvas who arise for the purpose of others, ripen and liberate those suitable to be subdued, without being stopped by the various faults of sentient beings.

The citation from this ritual explains that having started a virtuous action, one should meditate on the pride of bringing it to completion.

First there is the citation from the sixth chapter of the Arya Vajradhvaja Sutra, which is the dedication: Lha'ibu, (son of the gods) just as the rising sun, without being stopped by blindness or uneven mountains, illuminates the objects that are suitable...

The analogy presented here is that when the sun rises there is nothing that stops the sun's rays from illuminating earth—it illuminates the whole surface. Uneven mountains and so forth are not obstacles for the sun's rays to reach earth, likewise blindness doesn't prevent the light of the sun from illuminating the ground.

Similarly, bodhisattvas who arise for the purpose of others, ripen and liberate those suitable to be subdued, without being stopped by the various faults of sentient beings. As explained here, when bodhisattvas resolve to help sentient beings, those who are suitable to be subdued will naturally be subdued, and the faults and negativities of other sentient beings will not be an obstacle for bodhisattvas to continuously benefit them.

We can relate this to ourselves. We might be helping someone for a while but then start complaining, 'Oh, they get upset very easily', or 'They don't really appreciate what I do for them', and in this manner we find many reasons not to continue helping them. So the faults of the person we are helping become an obstacle for us to actually benefit them. The main point being explained with this citation is that once a bodhisattva resolves to benefit sentient beings, they will not give up that commitment, even the faults and negativities of sentient beings are not an obstacle to their commitment to benefit sentient beings.

Having cited the sutra, the commentary goes on to explain, The citation from this ritual explains that having started a virtuous action, one should meditate on the pride of bringing it to completion. If one starts a virtuous action, one continues with that action until it comes to completion, and does not give up part way through.

Both the root verse and the commentary state that one should meditate on pride. In this context pride should be understood as a mind of great strength, courage and self-confidence. This form of pride is not deluded pride.

The next verse under this heading is:

*47. One should first investigate the action
And then start or not start.
To not start is supreme
But having started one should not stop.*

The commentary on this verse explains:

Before engaging in an action one needs to analyse with one's mind whether or not one has the capacity for this action. If one is able, then one starts the action; if one is not able, then one does not. To not start the action is supreme, but once one has started then one should not stop until it is completed.

As the commentary clearly explains, Before engaging in an action one needs to analyse with one's mind whether or not one has the capacity for this action. Here, capacity can refer to internal capacity as well as external capacity. Internal capacity means investigating whether one has the inner strength or commitment to be able to see the action through and so forth, and as well as seeing the benefits of that action. External capacity relates to external means and conditions.

Although this advice is explicitly related to virtuous actions and engaging in bodhisattva's deeds, it is, as I regularly emphasise, also crucial advice for everyday life. Whatever the situation, whether it be study or work, and whatever the activity, we need to first investigate to see whether we have the ability to complete that task.

Sometimes we might understate our abilities, and sometimes we might be over-zealous, so we need to really look into our own situation. This is really profound advice. We need to use our wisdom and intelligence lest we fall victim to being wrongly influenced or manipulated by others. If we are too gullible, we can be deceived or misled by others, even if they have the best intentions. If someone says, 'You should do it like this' and we don't really think much about it and say, 'OK, I will do as you say', then we might find later that we have taken on much more than we can manage.

Also, before making a promise to others we should really check and make sure that it is something we are able to do. Once we find that it is within our capacity, then we can safely make the commitment. These are really safety measures that we need to put in place before we engage in any activity.

As further mentioned in the commentary, if one is able then one starts the action, but if one is not able then one does not. Again, this is very practical advice. Having done a thorough analysis as to whether one has the capacity to complete an activity, one can then make proper assessment as to whether to engage in it or not.

The next part of the explanation, to not start the action is supreme, relates to investigating an action and realising that one doesn't have the full capacity to complete it, or that the necessary conditions are not intact. If one finds that the conditions are not intact, then it is best not to start that action.

But once one has started an action or activity then one should not stop until it is completed. If one has found that there is some benefit in completing the action and has already started the action, then one needs to complete it. The conditions may not be quite right, but because one has understood the benefit, one should complete the action. People often say things like, 'Oh, I'll give it a try, and if I can't manage then I can just leave it'. However as explained here, this can be a fault.

2.2.1.2.2.1.2. The fault of giving up after having started

The next part of the text explains the faults of giving up after having started an action. Many consider these few verses as very sound advice, and it is often cited.

The commentary begins with a query:

Query: What is the fault of stopping something one has started?

48. *One will be habituated to it in other lives
And negativity and suffering will increase.
One is diminished at other times and at
The time of the result; one will not achieve.*

Then Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of the verse:

Answer: Through the concordant cause of having acted like this before one will in other lives also be habituated to giving up. The action similar to the cause of a person that breaks a promise is that their negativity increases, and the ripening result is that their suffering increases.

Further, one will be diminished later at different times, when starting other actions or at the time of the result of this action, which has become greatly prolonged. The other actions one will also not achieve as well.

The commentary states very clearly, through the concordant cause of having acted like this before, one will in other lives also be habituated to giving up. Here we can see that even in contemporary activities there are certain individuals who are quite keen about starting something, but after a while they put it aside. Then they start something else, and after a while they put that aside too. That becomes a pattern, where they keep starting something new, but never really see it through to completion.

If one is habituated to doing that now, then that is a concordant result of having previously engaged in actions and not seeing them through to completion. As explained here, the consequence of not completing an action that one has started will be a concordant cause for acting in the same way in future lives, where one will be habituated to giving up easily. We have all seen people who never really see anything through, and that is due to habituation.

The concordant cause and effect is also understood in relation to non-virtuous actions such as killing. The concordant effect of the cause of killing in a past life would be very readily and gladly taking the life of others, animals and the like, in this life. Similarly with positive actions: if one engages in positive actions in this life, then the concordant effect will be that one will be naturally inclined to engage in positive actions and virtuous deeds in the next life.

As the commentary further explains, the action similar to the cause of a person that breaks a promise is that their negativity increases. The negativity of breaking a promise increases, and the ripening result is that the suffering increases. This particularly relates to the pledges and vows that are part of a bodhisattva's practice. If one breaks those virtuous promises, then naturally the negativities increase, and thus future suffering increases.

Further, one will be diminished later at different times, when starting other actions or at the time of the result of this action, means that a further negative consequence of starting an action, and not seeing it through to completion is that due to that earlier habituation, when one starts a similar action again one will again not see that through. In this way it becomes greatly prolonged, meaning that whatever action one does will take a long time to reach any kind of completion, because one keeps having to restart that action again and again.

The other actions one will also not achieve as well, means that the result will not be achieved.

2.2.1.2.2.2. Abiding steadfastly after having started

This is a presentation of the ways and means of abiding steadfastly, or abiding by the commitments one makes.

There are two subdivisions:

2.2.1.2.2.2.1. Explaining it condensed

2.2.1.2.2.2.2. Explaining it individually

2.2.1.2.2.2.1. Explaining it condensed

The relevant lines of the root text are:

*49ab. Action, affliction and ability,
Practise pride regarding those three.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Practise pride in the three, which counteracts discouragement and increases strength: pride in action after having commenced the action, pride in afflictions being an object of abandonment, and pride in the ability to engage and abandon.

As explained here in the commentary, one practises pride in the three, which counteracts discouragement and strength. As mentioned previously, in this context pride refers to a mind of great strength, courage and self-confidence. There are three types of this form of pride: pride in action after having commenced an action, pride in afflictions being an object of abandonment, and pride in the ability to engage and abandon.

2.2.1.2.2.2.2. Explaining it individually

Here there are three subdivisions:

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.1. Pride in taking action

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.1.2. Pride in ability

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.3. Pride against the afflictions, or applying the antidote to the afflictions

Here again, we need to understand that the term pride in this context implies a mind of courage, strength, and self-confidence. As the Lam Rim teaching also mentions, pride is a term that can be used to describe a positive state of mind.

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.1. Pride in taking action

Pride of action is subdivided into three:

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.1.1. Identifying the pride of taking action

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.1.2. The reason for doing this

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.1.3. Practising pride that also carries the burden of the inferior actions of others

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.1.1. Identifying the pride of taking action

Again, the pride of action is not the normal deluded pride. It is explained in these two lines of verse:

*49cd. Saying 'I will do the action alone',
Is the very pride of action.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

If one sees that others could do the action as well, one thinks, 'I shall do this alone'. The strength of mind generated here is the pride in action.

If one sees the benefit of an action, one takes the initiative to take on a responsibility, even when there are others capable of doing it. As the Lam Rim teaching explains clearly, one resolves, 'I will do that action. I will not rely upon others to do it, but I will personally take responsibility for that action'. Therefore it is a personal resolution. This is particularly the case with activities that fulfil the purposes of oneself and others, as one cannot rely upon others to fulfil purposes that benefit oneself and others. One has to do it oneself. This is the point of resolving 'I will do this alone'.

When identifying pride of action, the Lam Rim teachings explain clearly that having identified the positive results of fulfilling the purpose of oneself others, one then resolves, 'I, myself, will take on responsibility for achieving that'. That is pride in action.

The Lam Rim then quotes from Nagarjuna's Letter to the King, where the Buddha says, 'I have shown you the path to liberation, now obtaining liberation is entirely in your own hands'. It also quotes from another text along similar lines. Once one has been shown the way and the methods to achieve liberation, then it is up to oneself to engage in acquiring the causes and conditions to actually obtain liberation. As mentioned previously, the Dharma is the actual refuge, which is the same point being made here. Achieving the results that are explained in the teachings has to be initiated and implemented by none other than oneself.

As explained in the teachings, the Dharma is the actual refuge. That would have to be the case because if the actual refuge or protector were to be the Buddha jewel or the Sangha jewel, then we would have already been liberated by now. They wouldn't be idly sitting around, they would have already liberated us! So the fact that the Buddha Jewel and the Sangha Jewel are not the actual refuge, and that the Dharma Jewel is the actual refuge is clear indication that we are not yet liberated because we have not fully relied on actualizing the Dharma refuge. These are the main points.

As I have mentioned previously, the explanations of the six perfections in the Lam Rim teachings are very clear. I have read the text myself again, but I don't know if any one of you have taken heed of that suggestion and actually checked the Lam Rim for yourselves. The actual presentation of the six perfections is found just prior to the presentation of special insight. These points are the very core of the Mahayana practice. If we don't have a good understanding of that, and if we don't try to apply it to our practice, then claiming to be a Mahayana practitioner would be just words, as we won't actually have the necessary qualification.

Reading the Lam Rim text is paramount for establishing a good basis for one's practice. Moreover, without the basis of a good understanding of the Lam Rim, there is really no way that one can adequately practice tantra. As we know, the sadhana practices begin with OM SVABHAVA SHUDDAH SARVA DHARMA SVABHAVA SHUDDHO HANG meaning all existence transforms into emptiness. It is presented on the assumption that we know what emptiness means. There are no details about renunciation, bodhicitta and so forth. The manner of presentation clearly indicates that it is a practice given to those whose minds are already ripened with the understanding of the earlier practices of renunciation and bodhicitta and so forth.

The teachings explain that in terms of the view there is no difference between the view of emptiness presented in the prajnaparamita teachings, and the view that is presented in the tantric teachings. Of course, in terms of profundity, the highest yoga tantra is more profound, but in terms of actual view there is no difference. In the prajnaparamita teachings, the foundations of renunciation, bodhicitta and so forth are explained in great detail as a way of developing a strong familiarity with them so that they serve as a good foundation. Then, when the tantric teachings are presented, one's mind is already ripened, and ready to receive those teachings.

I mentioned earlier that the tantric teachings are presented to trainees whose mind is already ripened with a sound understanding of the teachings on sutra. If you were to initially go straight into tantric sadhanas and so forth, then when you hear everything becomes empty you might have this vague notion that everything is just empty like space and that there is nothing around us. In fact, there are some who claim, 'Oh, it is very nice to meditate on emptiness, because there is nothing there'.

Lama Tsong Khapa states in his Foundation of All Good Qualities, which you would all be familiar with, that 'having developed a profound understanding on the common path may I be able to engage in the practice of the uncommon path'¹. What he is saying is that without a good understanding of the common path, which includes renunciation, bodhicitta and an understanding of emptiness - i.e. the three principles of the path - there is no way that one can obtain liberation. Likewise, without understanding and practising bodhicitta, there is no way that one can obtain full enlightenment. According to the common path, one cannot overcome the delusions without the understanding of emptiness. When it comes to the practice of tantra, the very basis on which one generates oneself as a deity and develops that divine pride is the understanding of emptiness. Without a good understanding of emptiness, it is not even possible to establish the divine pride of the deity. These are crucial points that one needs to understand.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

¹ Having become a pure vessel by training in the general path
Please bless me to enter
The holy gateway of the fortunate ones
The supreme vajra vehicle.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

11 August 2015

Based on the motivation that we have just generated we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

Let us now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the profound teachings and put them into practice.

If we generate such a positive motivation prior to engaging in the practice of listening to the teachings, and then dedicate it at the end, then we have engaged in a positive practice. Any practice that begins with a positive motivation, a positive engagement in the middle and a positive dedication at the end, is a most meaningful practice.

2.2.1.2.2.2.1. Pride in taking action

2.2.1.2.2.2.1.1. Identifying the pride of taking action (cont.)

In our last session we left off at the point of identifying the pride of taking action. The pride referred to here is, as mentioned previously, not a deluded pride but a mind of great courage and strength. When the commentary explains, if one sees that others could do the action as well, one thinks 'I shall do this alone', the action referred to here is a virtuous action; one shouldn't, of course, engage in non-virtuous actions. Virtuous actions can also be described as virtuous karmas, and this will be presented more elaborately later on.

The pride that is being presented here is a way to encourage the development of great strength of mind. Without that strength of mind, it is very easy to give up whenever there are difficulties or challenges. If we are to maintain our stamina in order to follow a practice through, we need to develop that strength of mind. That is what is being encouraged here.

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.2. The reason for practising it now¹

Having identified the pride of action, the next verse presents the reason for thinking, 'I shall do this alone'. Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary with this statement:

One needs to achieve the works of sentient beings by oneself, independently from others

The relevant verse is:

50. *These worldly beings with no control due to afflictions
Cannot achieve their own purpose.
Hence migrators cannot act like oneself
And therefore one needs to do this.*

Then Gyaltsab Je explains:

That is because these worldly beings, which have no control due to their afflictions, cannot achieve even their own purpose.

Hence migrators cannot strive in virtue for the purpose of others like one can, and even if one were to rely on them it would be useless. Therefore think, 'I have to do the actions for the benefit of others all by myself'.

When the commentary states That is because these worldly beings, which have no control due to their afflictions, cannot achieve even their own purpose, it is referring to the condition of worldly beings. As presented in an earlier verse, although wishing to overcome suffering, they run towards suffering itself, and though wishing for happiness, out of ignorance they destroy their own happiness like an enemy.² This is the situation of samsaric beings: while not wanting to experience any kind of suffering, they uncontrollably engage in the very causes of suffering due to the delusions, and whilst wishing to experience happiness, they destroy the very causes of that happiness, again due to ignorance. For as long as one is under the influence of delusions then, let alone the ultimate source of happiness, such as liberation and enlightenment, even temporary happiness is very difficult to obtain.

In order to feel the full impact of these words we need to relate them to ourselves, as they reflect our own situation. As I have mentioned previously, if one relates these lines only to other poor suffering sentient beings, then these passages will not really help to move one's mind and bring about a personal transformation. Thus, one needs to relate it to oneself by thinking, 'For as long as I am under the influence of the three poisons I will have no control over what I am doing. Even though I wish for happiness, I destroy the causes of my own happiness. Even though I don't wish to experience suffering, I have already created the cause of so much suffering'. Relating these lines directly to ourselves can really encourage us to find the means to overcome such a situation.

Worldly or samsaric beings who have no control over the afflictions cannot achieve even their own purpose. Let alone being able to achieve their ultimate purpose of liberation and enlightenment, it is very difficult for them to create even the causes for obtaining the conditions for a good rebirth in the next lifetime. For as long as living beings are under the control of the afflictions, this is their reality. As the commentary further explains, Hence migrators cannot strive in virtue for the purpose of others like one can. We need to understand that the one here refers to a bodhisattva, i.e. one who has all the right conditions to be able to strive for the purpose of others.

The commentary further explains that, even if one were to rely on them it will be meaningless. Therefore think, 'I have to do the actions for the benefit of others all by myself'. While this is a bodhisattva's resolve, we can relate this to our own personal practice. As mentioned previously, even generating a positive motivation for whatever one does, such as listening to the teachings, and engaging in and

¹ Last week it was listed as The Reason for Doing This Chapter 7

² See the teaching of 28 May 2013

practising them, becomes a means to resolve to engage in positive actions for the benefit of others.

2.2.1.2.2.2.1.3. Practise the pride that also carries the burden of the inferior actions of others

It is good to note that in a worldly context many would say, 'Oh, you need to have pride in order to achieve things'. Yet even though there may be no distinction between deluded pride and virtuous pride in that worldly context, some forms of pride are considered as not being suitable, while pride in a courageous mind that can accomplish things is talked about in a positive way. So we can see that, even conventionally, there is a reason why the pride that is mentioned here refers to a noble pride, and is not a deluded pride, which is an abandonment. The two types of pride have a similar strength of mind, but one is based on ignorance and the other on wisdom.

The verse under this heading reads:

51. When others engage in inferior actions
How can one remain?
Acting without pride,
Not to have pride one is supreme.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning as follows:

When others engage in inferior actions such as fieldwork, how can one, who has accepted to carry the great burden of sentient beings on one's head, remain with leisure? One should work.

When others engage in inferior work one may think, 'I should act with pride and engage in purer actions'. Do not engage in these actions with such pride, as it is supreme not to have afflicted pride. It should be abandoned because through it one will go to the lower realms.

When the commentary says that when others engage in inferior actions such as fieldwork, how can one, who has accepted to carry the great burden of sentient beings on one's head, remain with leisure? There are two different ways to interpret this.

One way to understand this is that worldly beings engage in inferior actions, which are worldly actions that are associated merely with obtaining food, clothing and fame. In other words, their actions are focussed only on worldly concerns; day and night, samsaric beings are constantly striving to achieve worldly gains. Seeing that, and having taken on one's head, the pledge to benefit sentient beings, meaning having made that pledge oneself, how can one remain with leisure without engaging in work? Here one should work refers to engaging in the actions of a bodhisattva—engaging in virtuous actions, such as the six perfections and so forth.

Another way of interpreting remain with leisure is not to remain idle when others are engaging in inferior work, thinking, 'That doesn't really concern me'. To understand this fully, one needs to make a distinction between general worldly actions and actions that, by their very nature, create negative karma. One should avoid engaging in negative actions and if others engage in them, one should not help them to do so. Other worldly actions, such as carrying a load, are not, by their very nature, negative. So when one notices that someone is struggling to carry a load and helps them to carry it, that then becomes a virtuous action. Thus, considering such actions as being lowly and inferior, and not engaging in them would be a fault. One should help others to engage in such actions if one can do so. This is how we need to make the distinction.

The next part of the explanation identifies deluded pride. The commentary states, When others engage in inferior work one may think, 'I should act with pride and engage in purer actions'. If one thinks, 'Oh, this kind of inferior work doesn't apply to me. I need to be engaging in purer actions' then, as explained here, that is a deluded pride. As the commentary explains, do not engage in these actions with such pride as it is supreme not to have afflicted pride. If one engages in any kind of action with an attitude of feeling superior, looking down on menial work and thinking, 'I only engage in pure activities', then that is deluded pride.

Even in a worldly context, people who are proud are scorned. No-one appreciates people who act as if they are superior, and who look down upon others, considering that certain jobs do not apply to them and are only for the lowly. That kind of attitude is definitely recognised as being unsuitable, even in a worldly context. As explained in the commentary, one should avoid this deluded pride, as it only creates negativity for oneself. Indeed, anyone who feels superior and who looks down upon others, is definitely not appreciated and is not a welcome guest anywhere. Such pride makes others feel uncomfortable around you. We often hear comments like, 'Oh, so and so looks down on me and treats me like dirt'. Such an experience makes people feel as if they are inferior.

Harbouring this sort of deluded pride is also a cause for disharmony. Others don't appreciate such pride, and it leads to disunity within groups of people. The virtuous pride that expresses the strength of mind that resolves, 'I will take on the responsibility of benefitting others' is completely different to deluded pride. Instead of looking down upon others it makes one cherish others and wish to benefit them.

Previously I shared a story as an example of how, when one is free from such deluded pride, one can benefit others. I was once in a bank and saw a new teller having difficulty in opening a drawer. One of the senior staff came over and said, 'Oh, I used to struggle with that', and then he showed her how to open it. In this case, the senior staff member acknowledged the difficulty of the new teller and helped her, rather than looking down on her. Someone with a lot of pride might have ridiculed her saying, 'Oh, don't you even know how to open a drawer?', but here the senior staff member helped her by saying that he used to have the same problem himself.

We need to keep in mind that, when we see others struggling, extending a helping hand is of real benefit to them. Whatever the environment, in the workplace or wherever, whenever someone else is struggling with something about which one has knowledge, then the greatest benefit one can offer is to give them a helping hand. When we resolve to practise Dharma, we need to keep that in mind that, when we free ourselves from pride, there are many practical ways to benefit others.

Here at Tara Institute, many have said that when they first came here there were some who were really helpful, taking the time to explain things well, and made them feel very comfortable and welcome. They were really touched and moved to receive such help, when they were new and a bit nervous. That also might imply that there might have been others who were a bit pompous, or who didn't really pay attention or offer a helping hand, even when they saw someone who was new to Tara Institute. So here we need to apply Shantideva's advice.

The Buddha's teachings are said to be all means to overcome pride. Those of us who are following the Buddha's teachings need to ensure that we don't allow whatever study and practice we do to become a cause to further increase pride. Although we might not be able to completely overcome pride just yet, at the very least we need to ensure that, whatever we do, we are not increasing our pride. Pride is of no use whatsoever in Dharma practice.

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.2. Pride in ability

Here again we are talking about virtuous pride. Having explained that there is pride in action, next comes taking pride in one's own ability. This has five subdivisions:

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.2.1. The fault of not having pride in one's abilities

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2. The benefits of being proud

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.2.3. Abiding in the pride that is the antidote

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.2.4. It is unsuitable to generate afflicted pride

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.2.5. The benefits of the pride that is the antidote

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.2.1. The fault of not having pride in one's abilities

This again refers to strength of mind. Pride in this context is the fault of not having belief in one's ability to overcome the despondent mind that feels, 'Oh, I am not able to do this'. In order to overcome that feeling of being discouraged by the task at hand, or other challenges that have to be faced, we need to have a courageous mind of great strength.

The verses under this heading indicate that if one doesn't have pride in one's ability, then one will be discouraged in the face of even the slightest of difficulties or challenges.

52. *When they meet a dead snake
Even crows act like garudas.
If one is humble
Even small downfalls will harm.*

53ab. *The discouraged who have given up striving
How can they be liberated from destitution?*

The commentary explains:

One should generate the force of the antidote to destroy the afflictions, because even crows act like garudas when they meet with a dead snake. Similarly, if one's antidotes are weak, then even small downfalls will harm the path with obstruction. When one is destitute due to having given up the striving for the purpose of self and others due to discouragement, then how can one be liberated? Being destroyed by laziness, one's actions of body and mind degenerate.

As the commentary explains, one should generate the force of the antidote to destroy the afflictions. In order to destroy the afflictions, one needs to generate the strong force of the antidote, one can then combat and overcome the afflictions. This is explained with the analogy of crows that act like garudas when they meet with a dead snake. A garuda has the courage to face a live snake with a great majesty, while crows do the same thing when they come upon a dead snake, behaving as if it was a live snake. Crows act like that with a dead snake, because there is no threat. They act as if they are mighty, when in fact they are afraid of live snakes.

The point of the analogy is to illustrate that if the antidotes are weak, then even a small downfall will harm the path with obstruction. If one's antidote is weak, one will immediately feel daunted and discouraged by even small afflictions, which will become an obstruction on the path.

The commentary asks, When one is destitute due to having given up the striving for the purpose of self and others, due to discouragement, then how can one be liberated? If one were to easily fall victim to even small afflictions and thus become discouraged, then, as explained in the commentary, how can one fulfil the purpose of self and others, and how can one be liberated? Being destroyed by laziness, one's actions of body and mind degenerate. We can relate this to our own experience where we feel a bit daunted by some task. That's when we are most likely to think, 'Oh, I don't think I can manage that' and then start to become despondent. The laziness of despondency actually arises when one feels a bit discouraged. Therefore, as explained here, one needs to develop that courageous mind.

From this presentation we can see how we need to refrain from even small negative karmas, and not neglect to recall their severity by thinking, 'Oh, it is not all that grave, so it is OK if I engage in that action', because as explained by the Buddha, a spark can cause a great raging fire. Conversely one should not neglect even the smallest of virtues, thinking, 'Oh, I need not bother with small virtues', because, as the Buddha explained with another analogy, even small drops of water can fill a large container. So one accumulates great virtue by combining many small virtues. We need to pay heed to this advice and adopt it. By reflecting on these analogies, one needs to resolve on abandoning even small negativities, and adopt even small virtues as a way to further develop and progress along the path to enlightenment.

Otherwise, if one resorts to thinking, 'Oh, that's too hard and too difficult, and I had better not engage in it', then one is actually resorting to laziness. As explained in the commentary, one will be destroyed by laziness and one's actions of body and mind will degenerate. This means that when one becomes lazy one feels weighed down mentally, and is physically lethargic, not wanting to engage in any kind of activity. That is how both mental and physical degeneration occur.

The conclusion is that one needs to abandon this kind of laziness, and engage in positive actions.

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2. The benefits of being proud

This relates to the benefits of applying one's strength of mind. The lines of verse relating to this are:

53cd. *Through generating the effort of pride
It will be difficult to be overcome even by something great.*

54cd. Therefore, with a steadfast mind

*One should destroy all downfalls.
If one is conquered by a downfall
The wish to conquer the three realms is laughable.*

Here, the commentary reads:

Through the pride that generates a forceful antidote and the generation of striving through application it will be difficult to overcome even the great objects of abandonment. Therefore, with a steadfast mind one should destroy the downfalls, because if one is overcome by the downfalls then the wish to conquer the three realms will make one a laughing stock.

As explained in the commentary, the pride that one needs to develop is the pride that generates a forceful antidote, and the generation of striving through application. Generating and applying a forceful antidote is the means to overcome the delusions, and it will be difficult to be overcome, even by great objects of abandonment. When one applies this forceful antidote and generates striving through application, one will not be overpowered by strong and powerful delusions.

Therefore with a steadfast mind one should destroy the downfalls, because if one is overcome by the downfalls then the wish to conquer the three realms will make one a laughing stock, clearly explains that one needs to generate a strong antidote and overcome the downfalls from one's own side. If one allows downfalls to overpower oneself, and says that one has pledged, 'I will overcome the downfalls, and I will conquer the three realms', one will become a laughing stock, and an object of ridicule.

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.3. Abiding on the pride that is the antidote

The relevant verse reads:

55. *I should conquer everything
And nothing should conquer me.
I, the child of the lion king,
Shall abide in this pride.*

Here, the commentary states:

Thus, one should abide in the supreme pride that thinks, 'I should conquer all my faults but I should not be conquered even by one of the objects of abandonment of the three realms.'

If it is asked: Who is doing this? It is oneself, the child of the lion king, who frightens the animals that are demons³ and forders⁴.

The commentary clearly explains that having shown the disadvantages of not having virtuous pride, one needs to resolve to abide in the supreme pride that thinks, 'I should conquer all my faults, but I should not be conquered even by one of the objects of abandonment of the three realms'. As previously explained, one generates the strength of mind and courage that resolves, 'I will be the one who conquers faults, and the faults of the three realms will not conquer me'. That is the kind of pride that needs to be generated here. Such a resolve comes from understanding the response to the rhetorical question, Who is doing this? which is that it is oneself, the child of the lion king. Here lion king is actually a reference to the Buddha, the Conqueror. A lion king is feared by all other creatures, who, on merely seeing the lion king, are afraid and then slink away. Likewise the Conqueror, the Buddha, frightens the demons and all forders.

As a child of the Conqueror, the Buddha, one resolves to abide in the supreme pride that conquers all faults of the three realms. Rather than allowing the faults to conquer oneself, one resolves, 'I, a child of the Buddha, will develop this supreme pride'.

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.4. It is unsuitable to generate afflicted pride

We will continue with this in our next session.

As you are aware next Tuesday is the discussion night. As I have mentioned previously, it is good to come with a positive mind of wanting to share and learn from each other. The following week will, as usual be the exam, and it is also good to complete that in a good manner.

As I reminded you last week, the seminar is on Sunday week. It is good for you to develop a virtuous mind of wanting to share whatever understanding you have with others. Likewise, you can benefit from the understanding of others. With that attitude, the time spent together will be really meaningful. Having an attitude of, 'Oh, I might be able to impress others with my knowledge', is the wrong sort of attitude.

As we have seen, Shantideva gives profound advice and many instructions on how to practise. So it is good to really pay attention to them, and try to think about these points, familiarising yourself with them and becoming really acquainted with them. It would be really meaningful to resolve that that this is a good way to practise, and dedicate oneself towards that end. While we may not be able to see the immediate benefit now, through familiarity with these teachings, and by following as much as possible the personal advice they offer, the time will definitely come where we will find that we can apply what we have learnt and put it into practice. But if we don't pay much attention now and just skim over these presentations, then when the time comes where we need to resort to these practices, we will not have any material with which to practise. Therefore it is important to really pay attention to Shantideva's advice now, and put it into practice as much as possible.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

³ Maras

⁴ Non-Buddhists holding extremist views

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱུང་རྒྱུ་མེས་མ་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

1 September 2015

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice.
[meditation]

Let us re-generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the purpose of all mother sentient beings, in order to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

As mentioned many times previously, generating such an altruistic state of mind even for a second becomes a condition for one to accumulate extensive merit.

Also, when one generates such a noble intention and altruistic state of mind as a motivation, one is bound to ensure that one engages in an appropriate virtuous activity to go with that good motivation.

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.4. It is unsuitable to generate afflicted pride

As opposed to generating the positive pride mentioned earlier, it is unsuitable to generate an afflicted pride.

This is subdivided into three:

- Disparaging afflicted pride
- The faults of pride
- It is suitable to abandon it

a. Disparaging afflicted pride

The verse reads:

56. *Any migrator that is destroyed by pride
Is afflicted, and does not possess pride.
Those that possess pride are not controlled by the enemy,
They are controlled by the enemy of pride.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains:

Any migrator that is destroyed and overcome by the pride that is a puffed up mind, is controlled by the afflictions and not a person possessing great pride. Those possessing pride are suitable not to fall under the control of the enemy. But the migrators with a puffed up mind fall under the control of the enemy of the affliction of pride.

Any migrator, referring to any ordinary being in samsara, that is destroyed and overcome by the pride that is a puffed up mind is thus controlled by the afflictions and not a person possessing great pride. Here, a puffed up mind refers to the pride of those who possess only minimal knowledge but who assume they have superior knowledge to others, and are more skilled and so forth. Such beings affected by inflated pride are controlled by the afflictions. As explained in other teachings, afflicted pride destroys oneself, one's virtues, morality and so forth.

The pride of beings who possess the great pride which serves as an antidote, is actually a self-confident and courageous state of mind. This self-confident state of mind is an antidote for overcoming afflicted pride. Thus, such beings with an afflicted pride do not possess the pride of an antidote. The reason presented as to why they don't possess the great pride is that those possessing great pride are suitable not to fall under the control of an enemy. But the migrators with a puffed up mind, or inflated pride, do fall under the control of the enemy of the afflictions.

Those who possess the great pride have the pride which serves as an antidote. While called pride, it is actually the self-confident and courageous state of mind, whereby one resolves to combat the afflictions and not allow them to destroy oneself. Those who are affected with afflicted pride are actually controlled by the delusions, and thus their mind is under the control of the afflictions, rather than being in control of the afflictions and overcoming them. This is how it is presented here.

b. The faults of pride

If one wonders 'What is the fault of being under the control of afflicted pride?' this is precisely what is being presented under this heading.

The commentary provides a way to really derive personal instructions from Shantideva's text. If we relate these passages to ourselves it will benefit our mind. But if we relate to it just as the general fault of pride that may concern others but doesn't really concern oneself, then we will not have benefited from this profound advice. While the presentation is very profound and very meaningful it will not really help one's own mind if we view it that way.

Some who confide in me say that they have a real problem with pride. They confess that they're having a problem with pride and want everything to go well and that they desire all the excellences, but this in fact brings more distress to their mind. These individuals are being very truthful in expressing these states of mind that affect them negatively.

If one does not acknowledge the afflictions in one's own mind there is no way to transform it. What one needs to understand is that the puffed up or inflated pride is where one feels one has great knowledge and understanding, when in fact it might be minimal. Along with that, one of the other elements of pride is that of looking down upon others. This is the pride we need to protect ourselves from. We need to reflect upon the faults of this pride as a way of avoiding its ill effects.

What is being presented here very clearly and succinctly are means to overcome afflictions in one's mind, such as pride. When we relate to the passages and then the instructions, we can clearly see that if one were to actually practise what is presented here, it can definitely help to subdue the mind.

We can see that if anyone were to actually put into practise the advice and instructions given here in The Bodhisattva's Way of Life, the consequence would be a naturally more subdued and calmer person. Therefore we need to take it as a personal instruction to relate to the faults of pride, as well as the other disadvantages which are mentioned in other teachings.

If someone is affected by strong pride:

- it will prevent them from gaining further knowledge;
- whatever knowledge they have will be tainted;
- one will not be able to relate to others well. As one perceives oneself to have a 'superior' mind, with a tendency to look down upon others, it is hard to have good rapport with others (the obvious fault of pride).

If we overcome pride it naturally brings about the opposite: it makes one much more at ease; allows one to gain more knowledge; one's knowledge and wisdom will increase; one will be naturally modest and humble, and so will be able to relate to others in a genuine way. All of these positive results will come about.

Thus we need to really relate to these teachings as a way to subdue our own mind. We do have faith in the Dharma, and we want to transform our mind, so if we have this approach then it's just a matter of actually putting it into practise. If we leave these instructions here as 'Yeah OK, something quite profound has been mentioned here' but don't actually relate it to changing one's own state of mind, then the actual positive effect will never come about. So this is how we need to relate to the teachings.

All of the faults presented here are clearly the faults that come from befriending afflicted pride. We need to be aware of that.

The verse reads:

57. *Being filled up with the affliction of pride
One will be led by pride to the lower realms,
It destroys the joys of being human;
A slave eating others' leftovers*
- 58ab. *Dumb, ugly and weak
One will be derided by all.*

The commentary reads:

The following faults will occur if one is filled with afflicted pride:

- One will be led by pride to the lower realms;
- Even if one is reborn a human, it destroys the joys of being human, such as mental happiness;
- One will live as a beggar without food;
- One will be a slave controlled by others and have to eat their others' leftovers;
- One will be mentally stupid; ugly and weak; and
- Even though one is not directly harming others, one will always be derided by all others verbally and physically.

Therefore one should abandon the pride of the puffed up mind.

The commentary explains that the following faults will occur if one is filled with the afflicted pride. This is the specific pride of the inflated or puffed up mind, where the effect is that one would be led by pride to the lower realms. What is being explained is that if one harbours pride and does not apply antidotes to overcome it, but rather fosters it in one's mind, then the consequence in future lives is that one will be led by pride to the lower realms, which is the ripening result of pride.

With respect to Even if one is reborn a human, one should note that this doesn't mean that pride is a cause to be reborn human, as that cause can only be virtuous karma one created in the past. What is being explained is that even if one were to be reborn as a human due to past virtues, the ill effects of being proud in previous lives would still be carried forth. Faults would occur whereby it destroys the joys of being human, such as mental happiness. So here the joys of being human refers to both good Dharma conditions as well as good material conditions. The joy of being human would also refer to having good relationships with others, and enjoying festivities and enjoying being honoured by others etc. So the joys of the natural good human conditions will be destroyed, and not be experienced.

The commentary explains that a further fault is that one will live as a beggar without food, which is something we obviously see. While having a human rebirth, there are many who have to live as beggars deprived of adequate food, clothing and shelter.

One will be a slave controlled by others and have to eat their leftovers, is, again, something which is quite prevalent. We can definitely see many in this situation.

One will be mentally stupid, indicates that even if born as a human with a usual human intelligence, some are born without the ability to utilise their human intelligence.

Even physically, one will be ugly and weak means that one's appearance may not be good and one's body is weak.

Furthermore, even though one is not directly harming others, which means even though one is not intentionally going out of one's way to hurt others, one will be derided by all others verbally and physically, ridiculed and so forth; so all these are the faults of holding on to pride.

As the commentary concludes, therefore one should abandon the pride of the puffed up mind. The instruction here is that by contemplating the ill effects of pride, one needs to resolve to abandon it. It is at this point that we need to take the instruction personally: 'this advice is referring to me, to my own mind'. So if one really were to pay attention to all of these ill effects, and clearly did not wish to experience them, then one would naturally strive to reduce creating their causes, which is holding on to pride.

What we can also reflect upon, is how those of us present here are free from these ill effects right now, and enjoy good conditions, which are the positive results one has created in the past. When we refer to each of these ill effects we can all safely assume that we are free from them, and that we are definitely enjoying the festivities of humans—materially and spiritually. In the Dharma we have the conditions to experience both the joy of being a human and utilising all these appropriate conditions. And we have a certain level of mental happiness and joy. It is quite clear that none of us has to live as a beggar without food. We are definitely not slaves controlled by others, having to eat their leftovers. Rather than having to eat others' leftovers we have an abundance of food, and might even find that we are wasting food. One definitely has a sound mind and our appearance is quite acceptable. Of course, if one did not practise contentment then one would want to look better and better. This is something we can all relate to.

When one contemplates how we possess the opposite of these faults and ill-effects right now, it encourages one to further engage in accumulating virtues. One can strongly rejoice in the good conditions one has now, which is definitely a result of having practised virtue previously. Then one resolves to put every effort into further engaging in the practice of accumulating virtues and overcoming negativities and afflictions such as pride.

In this way, when one makes strong resolve in one's mind, one can begin to utilise whatever activity one engages in as the means to accumulate virtue. Even drinking a cup of tea can become a means to accumulate virtue. In the case of my normal everyday activities, even when it comes to drinking just one cup of tea, I don't just gulp it down mindlessly. Rather, I spend significant time just rejoicing in the fact that I have the opportunity to have this cup of tea, and the great fortune or the great conditions I have. 'Having this cup of tea has come about through many good conditions from the past. May I use it as a way to further nourish my body so I can continuously engage in the practice of Dharma, as the means to benefit many sentient beings’.

By using this motivation, even for showering or having a meal, again and again, it becomes possible to use normal activities as a way to accumulate virtue. Of course this might not have come easily in my youth, but at this stage I can confidently say that I definitely have the means to use my normal activities as a way to further create some merit and virtue. This is really something worthwhile to consider.

It is because I consider you all as my Dharma friends, and because we have an intimate relationship, that I share some of my daily practice with you. It is not about boasting, but rather to remind you of simple ways to create virtue. If one thinks about these points again and again, then, through familiarity one can definitely reach a point where one makes one’s life more meaningful and uses daily activities as a way to accumulate more virtues and merit. This is something which is definitely possible, so it would be good to reflect upon these points.

Previous lamas have instructed that we need to familiarise ourselves with bodhicitta to the point that whatever activity we engage in, we do it with a bodhicitta attitude: sitting with bodhicitta; standing with bodhicitta; walking with bodhicitta; sleeping with bodhicitta and so forth. Constantly remember this as you engage in any activity. That is the best way to lead one’s daily life.

At best, try to cultivate bodhicitta, but if we have not reached that point yet, then even in simple tasks, always try to bring to mind ‘May this become a benefit for other beings’. As I just mentioned, if, before drinking a cup of tea, one can remember to offer it, this is a way for you to try to remember how you can make your daily activities more meaningful. Some new students here might have not heard it, but I’ve mentioned it many times how you first offer the tea with a mantra (the simplest way to offer and bless the tea is by reciting the mantra OM AH HUNG three times), and then before consuming it, generate the thought ‘May I be nourished with this tea so that I can benefit all sentient beings’.

In sharing this with you, I have no other intention or ulterior motive than to benefit you in your everyday life. If you pay attention to the instructions, then you can get some benefit.

I mentioned a year or so ago that when preparing to listen to His Holiness teach Vast as the Heavens, Deep as the Sea: Verses in Praise of Bodhicitta by Khunu Lama Rinpoche, I read the text, and it really moved my mind. It gives so much practical advice about ways of making your every-day activities meaningful, as a way to create great amounts of merit. It was inspiring just to read that text. It is available in English, so you have access to it—many of you might already have it. When reading it one naturally becomes very inspired, which is the power of the author Khunu Lama Rinpoche himself. There is no doubt he was a great, great practitioner, particularly in cultivating bodhicitta. This is why his words have such moving power, and such great effect on our minds.

As we familiarise ourselves with these practices, it starts to become part of our daily routine to think in this way, then we can enjoy what we do in a meaningful way. If we try to enjoy ourselves by engaging in activities with a worldly mind that is influenced by the delusions, then, rather than bringing more happiness, it only becomes the means to further fuel the afflictions and destroy one’s happiness. When one’s mind is affected by the delusions it does not help to bring success or external good conditions, it only creates the cause to destroy one’s own happiness from within. When the delusions are fuelled, the ultimate result is no true satisfaction, and no true contentment within oneself.

These are the points we need to reflect upon and understand: we need to minimise that which destroys our happiness, and cultivate and develop that which brings about a genuine sense of contentment and satisfaction.

Even when one has an opportunity to relax physically, one needs to understand that if one harbours afflictions and delusions in one’s mind, one is still disturbed internally. So be cautious and conscientious. (This is something that will be presented in the text further on; I’m just giving a prelude to how we need to refer to the profound advice given in this text).

c. It is suitable to abandon it

The verse reads:

*58cd. If even the ascetics¹ filled with pride
Belong to the proud,
Then what is there to say about the inferiors?*

The commentary reads:

If even the ascetics who overcome difficulties with a mind filled with and controlled by afflicted pride belong to the very proud, then what is there to say about the inferiors that are objects of compassion? Since they are controlled by the enemy, it is unsuitable to be proud.

The commentary clearly presents that, if even the ascetics who overcome difficulties with a mind filled with and controlled by afflicted pride belong to the very proud, meaning that if those who put in great effort are afflicted by pride, then they too are in the class of those who are proud. If that is the case then for those who are inferiors who are objects of compassion, there’s no need to mention that they have been affected by pride from the very beginning, and are classified as proud.

Since they are controlled by the enemy, it is unsuitable to be proud refers to afflicted pride, not the great pride that is an antidote to afflicted pride. Thus it is unsuitable to harbour such afflicted pride.

2.2.1.2.2.2.2.5. The benefits of the pride that is the antidote

Having earlier explained the faults of afflicted pride the text now explains the benefits of the pride that is an antidote—that which is also given the name pride but which is suitable to be developed.

The verse reads:

*59. Those who hold pride to conquer the enemy of pride,
They possess pride. The victorious heroes themselves
Definitely destroy the rampage of the enemy of pride
And complete the result of a conqueror, as migrators wish.*

The commentary explains by posing a question and an answer:

If asked: Who is someone with pride?

Answer: Since those that hold the pride that is the antidote, in order to conquer the enemy of the afflictions possess a strong counter-positive force, they are called proud.

They are also the very heroes who are victorious over the enemy. If asked why. That is because upon having definitely destroyed from the root the rampage of the enemy of pride, they complete the temporary and ultimate results of the conqueror, including the enlightened activities, in accordance with the wishes of migrators, and also those that are divine. That is why they are called victorious against the enemy.

As the commentary explains, since those that hold a pride that is the antidote, in order to conquer the enemy of the afflictions possess a strong counter-positive force which is a strong antidote, they are then called proud. What is called pride here is actually a strong antidote for overcoming afflicted pride, and refers to the true sense of pride.

The commentary continues, they are also the very heroes who are victorious over the enemy where 'They' refer to those who cultivate the pride which serves as an antidote for overcoming afflicted pride. They are referred to here as victorious, very brave, like heroes who overcome the enemy.

If asked why, that is because upon having definitely destroyed from the root the rampage of the enemy of pride, they complete the temporary and ultimate result of a conqueror, including the enlightened activities, in accordance with the wishes of migrators, and also those that are divine (divine referring to the worldly gods). As clearly explained here, when the pride which serves as a great powerful antidote to overcome the afflicted pride is cultivated, that then becomes the only means to destroy the enemy of the afflictions. Therefore, that is why they are called the victorious against the enemy.

In reflecting on the meaning that they complete the temporary and ultimate result of a conqueror, one needs to be able to relate to earlier explanations of what the temporary and ultimate results are. Temporary refers to the good conditions in the higher rebirths, such as a human or in one of the divine god realms. Ultimate refers to liberation and ultimately the enlightenment of the conqueror.

In examining, including the enlightened activities, it is good to note the difference between the qualities of the conquerors (or buddhas) and their enlightened activities. Qualities refer to the ability of an enlightened being to effortlessly and spontaneously benefit all sentient beings, whereas enlightened activities refers to actually applying that ability and engaging in benefitting sentient beings with the effects to be experienced by sentient beings. In relation to (and included within) the enlightened activities, the commentary also says, in accordance with the wishes of migrators, which means that when the ability to benefit sentient beings effortlessly and spontaneously is established in that enlightened mind, it is then imparted in accordance to the wishes of sentient beings to benefit them in infinite ways. The actual benefit sentient beings receive is due to enlightened activities.

Referring back to the temporary and ultimate results of the conqueror, one needs to understand that having good temporary benefits, such as a precious human rebirth, becomes the very basis for one to accomplish the ultimate aims of achieving enlightenment. Without relying on the high status of a precious human rebirth or other conditions in higher rebirths, even as a temporary goal, we cannot possibly achieve the ultimate goals. Therefore temporary results are the direct causes for the qualities of enlightenment and the enlightened activities.

I've mentioned this previously but it is good to reflect upon these meanings which helps to enhance the overview of the path to enlightenment.

2.2.1.2.2.2.3. Pride against the afflictions

Here, the specifics about the great pride which serves as an antidote are presented.

Take note as to why the term pride is used. Normal pride has a sense of 'I can do it', 'I have the means', 'I'm better...' etc. This sort of puffed up feeling is an afflicted pride. But it is a similar state of mind to feeling confident, 'I will not succumb to the delusions or the afflictions', 'I will combat and overcome the afflictions'. So the sense of one having the ability to do something is still there, but in a positive way to combat the afflictions. It is because there is the similarity in the state of mind that feels 'I can do it', that the term 'pride' is used.

To consolidate this understanding: with an afflicted (normal) pride a worldly person feels 'I'm better than the other. I'm more skilled, I have more knowledge etc. so I'm not going to be undermined by that person, I'm not going to allow them to bully me, I'm not going to allow them to ridicule me because I'm better than them. I'm going to control them rather than allow them to control me'. This afflicted pride is based on feeling that one's (minimal) knowledge has made one superior to the other, and so one resolves not to allow the other to control them.

A bodhisattva does not harbour this kind of pride towards other sentient beings. In contrast, they use a similar state of mind to develop a sentiment that combats the afflictions resolving, 'I'm not going to be controlled by the afflictions', 'I'm not going to be undermined and influenced by the afflictions', 'I will combat and overcome the afflictions'. When this sentiment is developed, along with self-confidence, that is what is referred to as the pride which is an antidote. Because of the similarity in the resolve that one makes, or the sentiment that one develops within one's mind, the term 'pride' is used.

This is subdivided into three:

2.2.1.2.2.2.3.1. One should generate the force of the antidote against the afflictions

2.2.1.2.2.2.3.2. One should not fall under their control at all

2.2.1.2.2.2.3.3. One should generate the special thought to generate a stable antidote

2.2.1.2.2.2.3.1. One should generate the force of the antidote against the afflictions

What we need to understand from this and the following verse and explanation, is the extent to which the afflictions are strong in one's mind, and that one needs to try and develop an even stronger antidote. Rather than giving in and succumbing to the afflictions when they are strong, and saying, 'I can't manage, this is overwhelming me', rather than being submissive to the afflictions, one should develop an even stronger antidote in one's mind as a way of combating the afflictions so that they don't overpower oneself. This is the point being presented here.

It is explained in the verse which reads:

60. *When in the midst of affliction's types,
I shall stand up to them in a thousand ways,
And not let myself be touched by the host of afflictions,
Like the lion and the foxes and such.*

The commentary explains:

When abiding in the midst of the various types of afflictions such as anger I shall stand up to them in a thousand ways through the power of the antidote. For example, like the foxes that do not touch the lion, one should act not to be touched by the host of afflictions.

When the commentary mentions, when abiding in the midst of the various types of afflictions such as anger, most of us can reflect on our own situation where we are abiding in the midst of various afflictions. As we are afflicted by anger, pride, desire, jealousy etc. it is really no wonder that we get so easily influenced, because if it is not one affliction, it's another one. We're constantly surrounded by the various types of afflictions that we foster in our mind.

When one is abiding amidst various types of afflictions such as anger and so forth, what one needs to resolve is that I shall stand up to them in a thousand ways through the power of the antidote. The mightier the antidote, the weaker the afflictions will become. If one does not apply powerful antidotes, then it is more likely that one will succumb to the afflictions because then they will overpower oneself. The example presented here is like the foxes that do not touch the lion. (The Tibetan word wa is translated as fox, but a fox smaller than a wa, which is a larger animal with more fur; maybe wolf is a closer example.)

A wolf is powerful amongst other animals, but when compared to a lion it is much weaker, so it would never approach a lion because the lion is more powerful. Applying this analogy to understand the verse, the antidote needs to be like the lion, whereas the afflictions are like the weaker fox and start to shy away when confronted by a lion. This is how we need to resolve to combat the afflictions in our mind.

In relating the advice, one should act not to be touched by the host of afflictions, to ourselves as a personal instruction, we must try as much as possible to apply it and put it into practise. We all have experience of anger and the shortcomings of anger; if we foster anger and allow it to prevail, then it only becomes mightier and stronger in our mind. When an affliction like anger arises, at best we need to apply an antidote immediately to completely conquer the anger. But if that is not possible right away then the next best is not to allow the anger to intensify, at least not to completely follow anger and be completely submissive to it. The next best thing is to at least prevent oneself from engaging in the actions of anger. As with any other afflictions, it is said that at beginners' level if one is unable to apply the antidote, unable to reduce the intensity in one's mind, then the next best thing is to remove yourself from the situation completely; try not to come into contact with the objects that cause you anger, desire and so forth.

As mentioned in The Thirty Seven Practices of a Bodhisattva:

Giving up inhospitable places, mental afflictions gradually decrease.

With no distractions, virtuous activities naturally increase.

When the mind becomes clear, conviction in the Dharma is born.

Therefore, seeking solitude is the practice of a Bodhisattva.

As indicated in this verse, when you remove yourself from the conditions of the afflictions, then the afflictions will start to gradually subside. Thus, avoiding contact with disturbing objects is also a method. That is, if you are not able to apply the antidotes right away, then it is best to remove yourself to a place where you are not likely to interact with objects of afflictions. At an initial stage this can help one's mind not to be affected too much.

This passage relates to the benefits of remaining in solitude. It is saying that by removing oneself from conditions of afflictions, and staying in solitude, is the practice of a bodhisattva.

When one removes oneself from immediate conditions where afflictions arise, and whilst in solitude, apply the practices of accumulating virtue, then the conditions become conducive for one's mind to be in a more virtuous state. As one increases the practice of accumulating virtue, the afflictions will naturally start to reduce. It is in this context that the benefits of going into solitude are explained.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke.

Transcript prepared by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱུང་རྒྱུ་མེས་མ་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

8 September 2015

Based on the motivation that we have just generated, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

Now we can generate the positive motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment in order to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to ultimate happiness.

That is my goal, and in order to achieve that, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. Therefore I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teaching and put it into practise well.

Put simply, imagine someone asking, "What is your goal?" With the bodhicitta motivation the response needs to be, "My goal is to liberate all beings from suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness. In order to do that, I need to first achieve that goal, which is buddhahood, myself. So my purpose is to achieve that goal".

It is good to periodically assess oneself by asking questions such as: What is it that I really want to do? What is my main purpose in life? What is it that I wish to achieve? If one can competently respond that one's purpose is to accumulate virtue and merit, then asking those questions will be a check on whether one is actually engaging in the ways and means to accumulate that virtue. If one is doing so, then one rejoices and further strengthens that activity. If one is inclined to engage in negativities, then asking these questions acts as a reminder to be cautious. Then one can think "OK, I need to stop or reduce this activity so as to minimise the accumulation of negativity". This is how we make progress, and then a transformation can slowly start to take place.

We customarily ask others what they are doing, and then we wait for their response. Here, we need to be asking ourselves, "What am I doing?", which puts the focus on our own activities and manners. When one's partner or companion does something that is a bit inappropriate, we immediately jump on them and say, "What are you doing?" , accusing them of being ridiculous or stupid. But if we apply that approach to ourselves, "How about me, what am I doing?", then that initiative of looking into our own conduct will help us to behave more appropriately.

To re-emphasise the point: we quite readily notice someone else's mistakes and are quick to pounce on them. Periodically taking the initiative to look at our own thoughts and activities, and asking this question of ourselves, is a way of assessing our own thoughts, manners and so forth. Then we can reprimand or encourage ourselves as need be.

The instruction being presented in the following verses is to prevent the accumulation of negativities by applying mindfulness and awareness the moment one is about to engage in some negative action.

2.2.1.2.2.2.3. Pride against the afflictions (cont.) 2.2.1.2.2.2.3.2. One should not fall under their control at all

This is in reference to the afflictions.

The relevant verse reads:

61. *Just as one protects one's eyes
When great danger occurs,
One should take care not to be controlled by the afflictions
When danger occurs.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning as follows:

When great danger. i.e. the danger of afflictions, occurs, then, just as humans protect their eyes with great concern, similarly, when there is the danger of falling under the control of the afflictions, one should take care not to be controlled by the afflictions.

As clearly explained in the commentary, humans naturally protect their eyes with great concern, which is especially true when there is a great danger. Their most precious organ is their eyes, and in the event of some great danger they instinctively protect their eyes, in spite of losing their limbs. That is quite obvious, as losing one's eyesight is one of the greatest concerns of any human being. Just as humans have this natural inclination to value their eyes as being most precious and thus protect them, similarly, when there is the danger of falling under the control of the afflictions, one should take care not to be controlled by the afflictions.

As I have indicated in the past, when there is a danger that one is going to be influenced by strong afflictions, then that is the time to apply mindfulness and awareness so as to not be completely overpowered and controlled by those afflictions. This instruction is exactly what is being explained here. Protecting one's mind from the afflictions is even more important than protecting one's eyes, or any other body part. The real destruction occurs in one's life when one is completely overpowered and influenced by the afflictions. There are those who are ultimately destroyed when they are completely controlled by attachment. Their wealth starts to decline, and their friends and companions and so forth will all fade away. It's the same with anger. So the more one contemplates the ill-effects of the afflictions and the damage that they do, the more one will be aware of that, and the more one will be primed to be really cautious about being controlled by the afflictions. As mentioned here in the commentary, whenever there is the danger that one's mind is controlled by the afflictions, then that is the time one should apply the means not to be controlled by them.

Simply put, one should not allow one's mind to be controlled by the delusions. The real culprit that destroys our happiness, and causes us so much distress, comes down to the afflictions. When the mind is controlled by the afflictions, then it is we who ultimately suffer. We are the ones who need to be in control of our own mind, so we should apply every measure not to give in to the afflictions, and not to allow them to control our mind. If we are feeling unhappy and we really look into the main cause, we will see that it comes down to the afflictions. In particular, the main affliction that causes the most distress and unhappiness is that our desires are not being fulfilled. We are not deprived of adequate wealth, food, clothing or shelter and companions, but we seem to be obsessed with unfulfilled desires, and so we constantly feel unhappy. It is this attachment to unfulfilled desires that causes inner turmoil, stress and unhappiness. This is the point that we really need to understand.

When we are in mental turmoil, or even just unhappy, we are not capable of fulfilling our own purpose, let alone trying to fulfil the purpose of others. If we are not capable of fulfilling our own needs and purpose, then how can we even consider fulfilling the needs of others, and striving for their purpose? If one falls victim to the afflictions, then one will be defeated by them, and one's own purpose will not be fulfilled, let alone fulfilling the purposes of others. Therefore, we really need to focus on the disadvantages and faults of the afflictions, scrutinise them, and understand that what is really harming us is the afflictions that are in our own mind. We are quick to accuse others of harming us, but in comparison to the harm rendered by our own afflictions, that harm is actually quite minor. While physical wounds caused by others throwing a stone, for example, can heal after some time, the harm caused by the afflictions is continuous.

We need to recognise the afflictions for what they are. If one can recognise them when they arise, they will subside and we will not be completely overcome by them. At our level it is a significant achievement to even recognise the afflictions as they arise. As I regularly remind you, don't always try to find fault outside, and blame external situations for your problems. Rather, look within, and recognise that the real problem lies there.

If we do this on a regular basis, we will slowly begin to notice that the real cause of the problem is our negative attitude, or state of mind. When we start to notice this, and begin to manage our own attitudes and ways of thinking, the afflictions will start to subside. Then, regardless of external situations, we will feel a little bit more at ease, a little more comfortable, and we will notice an inner transformation taking place. Settling one's mind in this way is a very significant achievement.

When there is a dispute over wealth and someone gets killed, then others will remark, "What destroyed him was desire for the wealth that was the cause of the dispute". Delusions mislead us, just like others can mislead us. If, for example a non-drinker goes out with friends, and becomes more and more influenced by them, and then begins drinking a bit with those friends, they can end up becoming quite a drinker themselves. Then others make comments like, "Oh, he used to be a good person when he didn't drink. He was misled and destroyed through the negative influence of his friends".

When liberation is presented we are inspired to achieve liberation—we don't have much hesitation in wanting that! But then when the faults of the afflictions are presented, we might be hesitant in chasing them down, and applying their antidotes.

The point here is to recognise afflictions such as anger and attachment for what they are. When we recognise their ill-effects and disadvantages, then it becomes easier to understand others. When others, influenced by afflictions such as strong attachment or anger, are unhappy, showing inappropriate gestures and so forth, then instead of becoming upset and angry with them, by remembering one's own state of mind when one was affected by strong delusions, one can empathise with them. That becomes a means to develop compassion for others, rather than feeling angry and upset.

First, we need to recognise and acknowledge the ill-effects of the afflictions within ourselves, then we can relate that knowledge to others. Rather than seeing the other person as being at fault, one realises that it's the fault of the afflictions which are causing them to say inappropriate things and so forth. Of course, I have mentioned this many, many times in the past because it is such a significant point. There are many who have commented on how beneficial they have found this approach; they find they can really relate to it and find it very helpful.

When one can understand and acknowledge the real trouble maker and destroyer of happiness as being the afflictions, then they become the target. When we begin to combat the afflictions, we start to take the upper hand because we have more control over our minds. Then we will naturally become happier and more settled.

When one is not affected by the afflictions, then one feels a genuine sense of relaxation and ease. It is a break from the turmoil that can be created by manifest afflictions. The arhats, or foe destroyers, are in a perpetual state of peace, with a calm and peaceful state of mind, because they have uprooted the afflictions. We may not have reached that state yet, but nevertheless we benefit when we are temporarily free from manifest afflictions. Then we can actually experience a state of feeling calm and quiet and be at peace. From that we can gain a sense of how wonderful it would be if the afflictions were completely uprooted from our mind. Meanwhile, making an attempt to temporarily not be affected by the afflictions is a significant achievement for oneself at this stage.

2.2.1.2.2.2.3.3. One should generate the special thought to generate a stable antidote

The advice here is for bodhisattvas to obtain a stable antidote to overcome the afflictions.

The lines relating to this are:

*62. It is easy for one to die by being burnt
And even to be beheaded,
But one should not at all bow to
The enemy of the afflictions.
Likewise, at all occasions,
One should only act appropriately.*

Then the commentary presents the meaning as follows:

The measure of having a stable antidote: It is easy for one to die through being burnt by fire or having one's head chopped off, but one should not at all bow to the enemy of the afflictions.

Likewise, one should on all occasions destroy the objects of abandonment and make the antidote stable. Thus one should not act in any way other than appropriately.

Here measure means the mark or the gauge of having a stable antidote. It is easy to die through being burnt by fire or having one's head chopped off, but one should not at all bow to the enemy of the afflictions, means that, in comparison to the harm caused by the enemy of the afflictions, it is easier, or in other words, more suitable, to be burnt by fire or have one's head chopped off, because at worst it only destroys this life. Whereas if one were to bow to the enemy, meaning to be under the control and the influence of the afflictions, and not apply the antidotes to overcome them, then there will be perpetual harm throughout future lives. The harm that one endures over a long period of time will have come from the afflictions within ourselves.

As the harm one receives from the afflictions is so much greater and more destructive than the harm that one may receive in this life, one needs to apply the appropriate antidote. As the commentary states, likewise, one should on all occasions destroy the objects of abandonment and make the antidote stable. Making the antidote stable, refers ultimately to the antidote that serves as the means to overcome self-grasping. When that antidote is stabilised, then one can act appropriately on all occasions. Therefore the main focus is to stabilise that antidote.

Thus one should not act in any way other than appropriately. Having thoroughly reflected on the shortcomings of the afflictions, and their deeply rooted destructive nature, one needs to resolve to apply the antidote. Even in this life we can see the ill-effects of the afflictions, not to mention the ill-effects over many lifetimes. So we need to resolve to apply the antidote and make it stable.

2.2.1.2.3. The power of joy¹

This is subdivided into three:

2.2.1.2.3.1. One should strive in virtue regardless of the ripening result

2.2.1.2.3.2. Accomplishing virtue by keeping the result in mind

2.2.1.2.3.3. The way of relating it to the power of joy

2.2.1.2.3.1. One should strive in virtue regardless of the ripening result

This heading indicates that one should strive in virtue, without any concern for the ripening positive result that one will experience.

The instruction here is that bodhisattvas should engage in virtuous activities with the sole intention of benefitting other beings. They should not think, "If I engage in this virtue, I will personally benefit from the good result". If one engages in virtue with that intention, then that action would be done out of self interest. While there might be some virtue in that, it will be a limited virtue, as the intention to engage in the virtue will be tainted by self interest.

Whereas if one engages in virtue with the sole intention that it will be a cause to benefit others, then, regardless of any thoughts about the ripening result for oneself, one will actually experience the positive result anyway. In other words, there is no need to focus on benefit for oneself, as one will benefit as a natural by-product of the original intention. There is the famous quote in Lama Tsong Khapa's lam rim which says that by benefitting others, one's own benefit will be naturally accomplished on the side. His Holiness the Dalai Lama also emphasises the same point.

In our ordinary mind we might feel, "If I dedicate everything to others, what is there left for me? How will that benefit me?" Here we are being told that one need not worry about benefits for oneself, because personal benefit is a natural by-product of working solely to benefit others. When you dedicate yourself fully to the benefit of other sentient beings, then you will naturally be benefited as well.

In contrast to that, if one focuses only on one's own interests, then one will not even fulfil one's own purpose fully, let alone being able to fulfil the purpose of others. This is the point that was made earlier: one's own purpose and the purpose of others will be basically destroyed by self interest.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

*63. Just like desiring the resultant happiness of play, Whatever the engaged activity is,
Hold onto these actions,
Like them without satisfaction.*

Then as the commentary explains:

Just as some children desire the resultant happiness of play so should bodhisattvas have joy and grasp at their actions for the purpose of others, such as listening, contemplating and meditating on bodhicitta. One should be so joyful that one desires the actions continually without being satisfied by them.

Just as some children desire the resultant happiness of play uses the example of children who want to keep on playing. When the parents try to call them back, or tell them to stop, they don't want to stop, because there is such joy in playing. They do not see it as a task, because they enjoy it so much. The advice here is that bodhisattvas should also have joy and grasp at their actions, meaning that they should hold onto their actions for the purpose of others with joy.

As presented here, engaging in deeds or actions of benefitting others, includes actions such as listening to the teachings and contemplating their meaning, and meditating, specifically meditating on bodhicitta. Of course, further practices of bodhisattvas include engaging in the three trainings of morality, concentration and wisdom, along with the practice of the six perfections of morality, generosity, patience, joyous effort, meditation and wisdom. Bodhisattvas engage in these activities with a sense of joy, and are never satisfied with engaging in them intermittently. Rather, they continuously engage in these actions for the purpose of others with joy.

One should be so joyful that one desires the actions continuously, without being satisfied by them, means not feeling satisfied in thinking "That's enough, I've done enough". Rather, one should continuously engage in these actions.

The main theme of the outline is that when bodhisattvas engage in these actions for the sole purpose of others, they have no ulterior motive of wanting to receive the benefit of the ripening results. There is no stain of self interest in their actions. Rather they feel joy in continuously engaging in actions for the sole purpose of benefitting others. Of course this advice is for bodhisattvas. However, we can take this explanation as a personal instruction to do as much as possible to develop an attitude of engaging in virtues in a continuous way, with a sense of joy. We should not be satisfied with engaging in one virtuous act now, thinking 'Oh, I've done my good deed for the day, so that's done!' Rather we should develop a mind of continuously engaging in virtuous actions, along with a sense of joy in doing so. With such a sense of joy, one will naturally be inspired to engage in these practices continuously. That is how we need to take this explicit advice to bodhisattvas as a personal instruction for ourselves.

2.2.1.2.3.2. Accomplishing virtue by keeping the result in mind

Lest one doubts that good results follow from virtuous actions, the advice here is that one needs to be mindful of the infallibility of karma;— one will definitely experience a positive result from positive actions, and when one engages in negative actions, a negative result will definitely occur.

¹ This heading was introduced on 14 July 2015.

Therefore one needs to accomplish virtue by keeping in mind the infallibility of karma.

The first verse under this heading reads:

64. *Although working for the purpose of happiness
It is uncertain whether it will become happiness or not.
The very action that becomes happiness
How can one be happy not doing it?*

The commentary explaining this verse reads:

Though worldly beings engage in actions such as fieldwork in order to attain mental and physical happiness, it is uncertain whether the result will be happiness or not. Only the actions of bodhisattvas are certain to bring about temporary and ultimate happiness, and if one does not engage in these actions then how could one attain the resultant happiness?

As explained here in the commentary, though worldly beings engage in actions such as fieldwork in order to attain mental and physical happiness, it is uncertain whether the result will be happiness or not. This refers to uncertainty about immediate results. A farmer may toil in the fields but it is uncertain whether he will reap a good harvest. Even if he were to have a good harvest, then the next uncertainty is whether that success will bring about the desired result of physical and mental happiness. Likewise with those who trade with the intention of making a profit from their business ventures; it is uncertain whether they will actually make a profit, or if their business will prosper. But even if they were to make a profit, it is uncertain whether or not they would obtain the ultimate result of physical and mental happiness. That is the point being presented here.

As explained further in the commentary, only the actions of bodhisattvas are certain to bring about temporary and ultimate happiness. The actions of bodhisattvas, such as practising the perfection of morality, practising the perfection of generosity and so forth with the sole purpose of benefitting others, bring the certainty of physical and mental happiness.

Therefore, if one does not engage in these actions then how could one attain the resultant happiness? This indicates that if one does not engage in these causes, then of course one cannot experience the resultant mental and physical happiness. The main point emphasised here is that the action of benefitting others is what brings joy to a bodhisattva's mind. They find no joy in worldly activities; only actions that benefit others bring them great joy.

The next verse in this section is:

65. *If one is not satisfied by sense pleasures,
Which are like honey on a razor's edge,
Then how can one be satisfied by the merit
Of the ripening result of peaceful happiness?*

Then the commentary explains:

Sensory happiness of forms, sounds and so forth are like honey on a razor's edge: when tasted with one's tongue then, although experiencing some taste, one experiences the suffering of being cut on the tongue. If one is not satisfied by cyclic existence, no matter how much one is engaging in it, then how can one be satisfied by the merit of generosity and so forth, which is the cause to attain the temporary happiness of higher rebirth of gods and humans and the ultimate happiness where all suffering has been pacified. One should meditate on them insatiably.

The analogy used here could not be more graphic! It presents a very vivid image of what samsaric pleasures are like: the sensory happiness of forms, sounds and so forth are like honey on a razor's edge. Although the Tibetan word used here refers to a very sharp knife, the English translation uses razor. If you smear honey on a very sharp blade, and lick it off the blade then, although you experience some temporary pleasure from the sweet taste of the honey, you will immediately feel the suffering of having cut your tongue. Shantideva, being a great master, always finds the most vivid examples in his explanations.

When the commentary refers to the sensory happiness of forms, sounds and so forth, the words so forth includes the rest of the sense pleasures—taste, smell, tactile feelings and mental pleasures. There is no other way to experience sensory pleasures other than by contact between the sensory objects and our senses. When the commentary states if one is not satisfied by these pleasures in cyclic existence then no matter how much one engages in it the implication is that in this life we have experienced many sensory pleasures, not to mention the pleasures we have experienced in previous lives as well.

Yet the very moment after one experiences coming into contact with an object that brings pleasure to the senses, a sense of dissatisfaction because one is not satiated arises. There has been a fleeting experience of pleasure but in the next moment, it has turned into dissatisfaction. That in itself indicates that we are not experiencing true happiness—we have not been satisfied by any of the sensory pleasures that we have experienced so far.

For as long as we are controlled by the afflictions, and experience these sensory pleasures, there will be no satisfaction while we remain in cyclic existence. That being the case, then how can one be satisfied by the merit of generosity and so forth, indicates that if one is inclined to be dissatisfied even with momentary pleasures, then why would one be satisfied with engaging in causes for both the temporary as well as the ultimate results?

As mentioned previously, engaging in the practices of generosity, morality, patience and so forth is the cause to obtain the temporary happiness of a higher rebirth of gods and humans. Not only that, but they are also the cause to obtain ultimate happiness, where all suffering has been pacified i.e. liberation and ultimately, enlightenment. Understanding and recognising that, one should, as the commentary concludes, resolve to meditate on them insatiably, and thus not be satisfied with practising the six perfections once or twice. Rather one should engage in them continuously.

Understanding this section of the text is not difficult. However we need to read it, and contemplate the meaning, then we will experience the benefit of more stability in our minds.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Bernii Wright
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་རྒྱུད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

15 September 2015

While maintaining the motivation we have just generated, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, in order to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

2.2.1.2.3.3. The way of relating it to the power of joy

The verse reads:

66. *Therefore, to complete one's actions,
One should engage in the action
Like an elephant tormented at noon
That, when coming upon a lake, immerses itself in it.*

The commentary explains the meaning:

Because it is an action suitable to engage in, therefore, in order to complete the intended action one should engage in it like an elephant tormented at noon by heat and thirst that comes upon a lake and immerses itself joyfully in it.

This explanation follows the presentation of the previous verse in the commentary about the merit of generosity and so forth, which states:

the cause to attain the temporary happiness and higher rebirth of gods and humans, and the ultimate happiness where all suffering is pacified.

In relation to the practices of the six perfections - generosity and so forth - the commentary explains that a way to actually engage in such actions is by relating them to the power of joy. The commentary states, because it is an action suitable to engage in, and here suitable indicates that it brings about the practices of the six perfections, such as generosity, ethics and morality, patience etc., which in turn bring about a temporary and ultimate goal for oneself and other sentient beings. Thus these actions are suitable to engage in, and the way to engage in these practices is with a sense of joy, achieved by contemplating the positive results that they will bring. Doing this encourages one to engage in positive actions as a cause for positive results, willingly and joyfully.

If we were given the choice to experience positive results we would not hesitate to accept them. For example, the positive results of generosity and morality are abundant wealth and a good physique, so we'd willingly accept those. But if we honestly ask ourselves whether we are engaging in the causes to obtain these good results, we'd find that we are not. In short, we wish for positive results but we don't pay much attention to creating the causes for them. While we'd rather not experience the negative consequences of practising the opposite of the six perfections, that is actually what we do, i.e. we practise the opposite of generosity by being miserly and so forth. We find ourselves engaging in negativities willingly and without hesitation.

We need to understand that for as long as we engage in this disparity between the cause and the effect, while we wish for positive results but don't create the causes, then we cannot possibly experience them.

In order to relate to this explanation we need to bring to mind the understanding of karma. When one has a strong belief in karma one is naturally willing to engage in positive deeds, and thus accumulates virtues. Whenever there is an opportunity to accumulate virtue it brings about a sense of great joy, where we feel very fortunate to have the opportunity to do so. Being happy about the opportunity to accumulate good deeds and virtues, rejoicing in accumulating them, and dedicating them to a positive end, is the means to secure and increase the positive merit of those virtues.

With a strong belief in karma one naturally hesitates to engage in negativities, and when one finds oneself engaged in them, one immediately develops strong regret about how unfortunate it is to have succumbed again to the delusions. Such regret enables one to confess the negativities, which is a means to purify them. While at our level now, we may not be able to completely avoid engaging in negativities, the benefit of a strong belief in karma means that one will not idly let one's negativities sit; one actually resolves to purify them with confession.

When one acquaints oneself with karma to the point where towards evening one takes the initiative to purify any negativities created during the day, one can go to sleep with a clear and virtuous mind. This is the way to conduct oneself in daily life to make it more meaningful. And if one has accumulated virtues, one can rejoice and go to sleep in a virtuous state of mind. If the sleep itself can also become virtuous then that is great, and the next morning one can rejoice in having a good sleep. If we find ourselves creating negativities with thought or action during the night, then in the morning we should again take the opportunity to purify them.

It is very difficult at our level to completely avoid engaging in negativities because of the strong delusions in our mind. Habituation with negativities finds us periodically engaging in them, but we have the great advantage of using our understanding of the Dharma to counteract them by developing regret, confessing them, and then purifying the negativities. So even though we might still engage in negativities, knowing the Dharma provides us with the means to practise and purify them.

Also, when we create virtues, understanding Dharma allows us to seize the opportunity to secure them through dedication, and further increase them through rejoicing. If we actually practise the Dharma then this is the great advantage we have. There are those who create negativities but do not know how to purify them, and there are those who create great amounts of virtue and may not be aware of it, as is the case with many non-religious people.

On this point, I want to relate an incident I saw recently on TV where there was a lady who was incredibly kind in making attempts to save an injured kangaroo that had been shot with an arrow. She was holding it as if it was her own child, and nurturing it and caring for the wound. I don't know what eventually happened to the kangaroo but the great extent to which this lady was caring for it really touched me. The perpetrators would have just mindlessly shot the arrow, maybe as a game, not really valuing the life of another living being. So while some exhibit cruelty and mean to destroy life, this lady took it upon herself to try to save the kangaroo's life, and put a lot of time and love into it. Seeing it actually brought tears to my eyes. It's unlikely that she is a religious person, but I thought the extent to which she showed such great concern for another living being was a very compassionate act.

If we consider ourselves 'religious' we might consider doing even better than that! Of course there are different ways and means of putting this into practice, particularly in relation to avoiding negativities, rejoicing in virtue, and increasing our virtues. This is something we have the understanding and the knowledge to do. If we don't use the tools we have then there's no advantage in us gaining this understanding from the Dharma. The main thing is to resolve to take every opportunity to accumulate virtue, and when one finds one is creating negativities, apply methods to purify them. When we think about it, it's not that complicated. Most of it is done through our mental attitude, and our way of thinking; acknowledging negativities for what they are and regretting and confessing them. Whenever we have the opportunity to accumulate virtue we should recognise it and willingly engage in it. When we take these measures it actually starts to become a habit. Acquainting ourselves with accumulating virtue and purifying negativities can definitely lead to a much lighter and more joyous mind.

For those who intentionally engage in negative deeds we can obviously see that their lives are not really happy, and that they are constantly living in fear and worry and complications. The consequences they experience are not farfetched. Temporarily it may seem they are in control and enjoying life, but actually they end up leading very unhappy lives. In contrast, we can definitely see that those who are engaged in kind and compassionate deeds have much more joyful and happy lives. Whether they are aware of it or not, they are actually experiencing the positive consequences of abiding by karma, committing virtues and shunning negativity. On these obvious levels it is good for us to consider the significances of these practices.

As explained in the commentary, having understood the practice as being actions which are suitable to engage in, therefore in order to complete the intended action one should engage in it, which indicates that for bodhisattvas engaged in the practices of generosity and so forth, once they engage in them, completing the action should be done with a sense of great joy.

The analogy presented here is that, it is like an elephant tormented at noon by heat and thirst that comes upon a lake and immerses itself joyfully in it. This is a vivid example. When an animal like an elephant comes upon a water hole after walking for a long time on a very hot day, and becomes thirsty, it will rush towards the water and very joyfully drink it and immerse itself in the water. It will take great joy in that activity.

Like this analogy of an elephant taking great joy in coming upon a lake, when a bodhisattva engages in the practices of generosity and so forth, they need to engage in them with a similar great sense of joy because these are actions that benefit other sentient beings.

2.2.1.2.4. The power of relinquishment

This is divided into two:

2.2.1.2.4.1. Temporary relinquishment

2.2.1.2.4.2. Certain relinquishment

2.2.1.2.4.1. Temporary relinquishment

Temporary relinquishment relates to taking a break, or rest.

The two lines of verse read:

*67ab. If one is affected by weakening strength
One should relinquish to start again.*

Gyaltshab Je's commentary explains the meaning:

If one is affected by one's weakening strength, physically and mentally exhausted by one's practice of virtue, then one should relinquish temporarily in order to start again when one is rested.

While the explanation is clear, it is good to take note of the main point which is very good advice for us at our level. When engaging in virtues, when one's strength is weakened physically with physical ailments like sickness, or mentally exhausted when one is a bit overwhelmed or stressed, then at that time one should relinquish the practice temporarily. This is not suggesting that we completely put the practice aside and don't do it anymore. Rather, it means taking a short rest so that one can feel rejuvenated to further engage in the practice of that virtue. So it is with the intention to continue afresh in the practice of virtue that one takes a rest, rather than having a complete break and not doing the practice at all.

2.2.1.2.4.2. Certain relinquishment

The next two lines of the verse read:

*67cd. If it is well completed one relinquishes,
Because one wishes to do it later again and again.*

The commentary explains:

If an action is completed well, then one relinquishes it because one wants to repeat that action again and again in the future.

Relinquishing an action that is completed well, needs to be understood as relinquishing the satisfaction of having done that action well, and to further develop it by striving to engage in the action again and again.

Having completed an action well, if one feels satisfied that it has already been done, then one will not feel the need to do it again. It is this satisfaction, and not seeing the need to do the action again and again that has to be relinquished. If one feels satisfied with the completion, it prevents one from engaging in it again and again. When engaging in the practice of virtue, one needs to make even more effort to increase the means of accumulating virtue. It is in this way that one progresses from one practice to the next.

Using the example of studies at school, when one finishes the first grade, if one did not relinquish the thought of being satisfied just with that, one would not go on to the next grade, and the following grades after that. When completing first grade one has finished one part of one's schooling, but one needs to relinquish the thought, 'I'm done with my studies now', and continue on to the next grade and so forth.

2.2.2. Being earnest about practising the actions with mindfulness and introspection

This is subdivided into five:

2.2.2.1. One should earnestly be conscientious

2.2.2.2. Being earnest about mindfulness and introspection

2.2.2.3. Not giving an opportunity for faults to arise with mindfulness and introspection

2.2.2.4. If a fault arises one needs to stop it immediately

2.2.2.5. One should strive in suitable actions

All the practices presented here have already been mentioned, but now they are presented in the context of putting them into practice.

2.2.2.1. ONE SHOULD EARNESTLY BE CONSCIENTIOUS

The verse reads:

*68. Like the seasoned warrior that is engaged
In a fencing duel with the enemy
One should avoid the weapon of the afflictions
And look to attack the enemy of the afflictions.*

The commentary explains:

The seasoned warrior that is engaged in combat with an enemy and who is skilled in weapons and the art of war, will evade the enemy's weapons and attack the enemy. Similarly, upon evading the weapons that are one's own afflictions, one should stop them and not be destroyed by them. Instead one attacks the enemy of the affliction with the weapons of the antidotes and cuts them off at the root.

When the commentary explains, when an experienced warrior that is engaged in combat with the enemy and who is skilled in the weapons and the art of war, it means that they have all the necessary skills involved in engaging in combat. In combat they will conduct themselves with a twofold method to overcome the enemy: protecting themselves from harm by being able to evade the weapon targeted at them, and at the same time, find the ways and means to actually attack the enemy by using one's own weapons.

Just as this is done in physical combat with an enemy, when this analogy is applied to fighting afflictions, one first needs to protect oneself (make sure the afflictions don't harm oneself), while applying the means (using antidotes) to overcome them.

The significant point here is that if one is just focussed on overcoming the afflictions, there might be occasions where they actually harm oneself, and one is not aware of it. What is being highlighted here is that one needs to apply one's wisdom in both ways: while combating the afflictions in order to overcome them, at the same time ensuring that one is not harmed by them.

Instead one attacks the enemy of the affliction with the weapons of the antidotes and cuts them off at the very root means that in one's attempt to overcome the afflictions one is not satisfied with just overcoming one or two afflictions, or the manifest levels of the afflictions, but effectively attempts to abandon them from their very root. The main practice here is to abide with conscientiousness while applying enthusiasm in virtue to protect one's mind from afflictions. So we apply this twofold approach to conscientiousness: on one hand enthusiastically engaging in virtue, and on the other being constantly mindful of protecting one's mind from the harm of the afflictions.

2.2.2.2. BEING EARNEST ABOUT MINDFULNESS AND INTROSPECTION

The presentation of these practices makes us mindful of them being ways to protect our commitments, particularly one's vows. It is essential to have these tools to protect commitments.

The verse reads:

*69. If one's sword falls down in battle
Then, out of fear, one will pick it up quickly.
Similarly, if one loses the weapon of mindfulness
Then, out of fear of the hell realms, one should quickly pick it up.*

The commentary explains:

If one's sword falls out of one's hand in the midst of battle, one quickly picks it up out of fear of being killed by the enemy. Similarly, if one loses the weapon of mindfulness, which does not forget the virtuous object, then out of fear of the hell realms, by remembering how one will be born there if one is destroyed by the afflictions, one quickly picks up the antidote of mindfulness and introspection.

Here Shantideva shows what an insightful master he is in presenting this clear and vivid analogy; If one's sword falls out of one's hand in the midst of battle, one quickly picks it up out of fear of being killed by the enemy. This shows an automatic response in battle, where, if the very weapon one is using to protect oneself - e.g. a sword - falls out of the hand, one immediately reacts and picks it up again, in order to protect oneself.

What the analogy explains is that, similarly, if one loses the weapon of mindfulness, which does not forget the virtuous object, where mindfulness is the weapon, the state of mind that constantly remembers the virtuous object. One remembers the virtuous object constantly through mindfulness, as encouraged here, out of fear of the hell realms. By remembering that if one loses that mindfulness then the afflictions will destroy one, with the consequence of experiencing the hell realms as a result, one quickly picks up the antidote of mindfulness and introspection. As just mentioned, this particular type of mindfulness is constantly remembering the virtuous object, while introspection investigates whether one's three doors of body, speech, and mind are in tune with keeping the virtuous object in mind.

When one forgets the virtuous object then that is when it is most likely for the actions of the three doors to engage in negativity. Therefore, having both mindfulness and introspection to constantly keep our mind in virtue is at the very core of our practice. This is why, when introducing meditation sessions, I constantly emphasise the point about keeping the virtuous object in mind and trying to remember it, and not allowing negativities to completely control oneself, so that one lapses from engaging in virtue.

There might be many virtuous objects, so to simplify one's practice into something one can do, focus on love and compassion as the main virtuous objects. Constantly try and bring to mind the value of love and compassion, the need to develop it, and try to tune one's mind into love and compassion. This protects one's mind from a lapse of love and compassion, and so one's life can become really meaningful.

2.2.2.3. NOT GIVING AN OPPORTUNITY FOR FAULTS TO ARISE WITH MINDFULNESS AND INTROSPECTION

The opportunity for faults to arise occurs during times when one lapses from mindfulness and introspection. So applying mindfulness and introspection prevents opportunities for faults to arise.

The verse reads:

70. *Just as poison will spread
In dependence on the blood,
So faults will pervade the mind
If they find an opportunity.*

The commentary explains:

If one is hit by a poisoned arrow, then just as the poison will spread through one's body in dependence on the blood that is coursing through one's veins, so will the faults of anger and so forth pervade the mind, if they find an opportunity of lapsed mindfulness and such due to afflictions. Therefore one should stop even the smallest affliction.

When the commentary explains that, if one is hit by a poisoned arrow, take note that it's not just a normal arrow, but the tip of the arrow is dipped into poison so that when someone is hit by it and it pierces their skin, the poison starts to spread rapidly through the bloodstream. When this happens there's really not much chance for survival, because as the poison spreads it can take one's life.

Using this vivid analogy, if the faults of anger and so forth pervade the mind, and find an opportunity of lapsed mindfulness and such due to afflictions, i.e. if one lapses from mindfulness and introspection, then afflictions such as anger and so forth will permeate the mind, and thus destroy one's wellbeing. The commentary concludes, therefore one should stop even the smallest affliction.

The next verse is presented with a query:

Query: If asked, how should one be attentive?

We'll leave the following verse and explanation for our next session. Briefly, it presents another vivid analogy for applying mindfulness. It is of someone carrying a container, like a basket with different kinds of fruits, by balancing it on the head. As difficult as this is in itself, the threat here is that if one of those fruits falls out of the basket then someone will chop off your head with a sword. With that threat one would be very, very mindful.

The analogy, as presented, consists of a person carrying a container of fruit, or in this case mustard oil, and if one drop spills then their head would be chopped off. When the road itself is uneven, with a lot of slippery gravel, it's difficult to walk on, so under such conditions we can imagine how difficult and fearsome it would be. The person would have to exert the most incredible attentiveness in order not to spill any of that oil. In the same way, mindfulness must be applied to protect one's mind from the afflictions.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version
© Tara Institute*

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱུང་རྒྱུ་མེས་མ་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

22 September 2015

Based on the motivation generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

Now we can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well. That will be a means to subdue my mind.

This would be a good way to generate the motivation for listening to the teachings.

2.2.2. Being sincere about practising actions with mindfulness and introspection

2.2.2.3. NOT GIVING AN OPPORTUNITY FOR FAULTS TO ARISE WITH MINDFULNESS AND INTROSPECTION (CONT.)

We covered the first verse under this heading last week. The next verse is preceded by this query:

If asked: How should one be attentive?

In response to this the verse reads:

71. *Just as a person that is carrying a jar filled with mustard oil
In front of someone wielding a sword
Will be careful not to spill anything out of fear of death,
In the same way should an ascetic be attentive.*

Then the commentary explains the meaning of the verse.

Answer: A person that is carrying a jar filled with mustard oil along a slippery road in front of someone carrying a sword, under the threat of being killed if they spill even just one drop, will be very attentive. A practicing bodhisattva should be similarly attentive in holding the antidote of bodhicitta and so forth with mindfulness and introspection.

This is a vivid analogy. It relates to a person who is carrying a jar filled with mustard oil (which is produced from white mustard seed, as opposed to black mustard seed). We need to visualise the container as being more like a bowl with a wide top, rather than a jar with a narrow neck. If a bowl-like container is filled to the brim with oil then it would be extremely difficult to avoid spilling the oil. In the analogy, the person carrying this container has to walk on a rough, slippery road that could easily cause them to slip or trip. The threat in the analogy is that if this person so much as spills one drop of oil, he will be beheaded. With such a threat the person would be extremely careful not to spill even just one tiny drop of oil out of fear for his own life. Far from being careless and mindless, their level of attentiveness and mindfulness in such a situation would be extremely high.

Then the commentary explains the meaning of the analogy. A practicing bodhisattva should be similarly attentive in holding the antidote of bodhicitta and so forth with mindfulness and introspection. As explained here very precisely, a practicing bodhisattva who has bodhicitta vows, and possibly ordination vows as well, needs to be similarly attentive in holding the antidote to breaching those vows. In particular, the bodhicitta vows need to be applied with great mindfulness and introspection.

While this advice is directed at practicing bodhisattvas, we can also take this advice as an instruction for ourselves with respect to the commitments we have taken. We should not take this analogy lightly thinking, 'Oh this is a very unlikely situation' or 'This analogy seems a bit far-fetched'. In fact, the analogy indicates that we should see that breaching one's vows and commitments would be as grave as losing our own life. So the degree of attentiveness, mindfulness and introspection that we need to adopt should reflect that gravity. We need to understand that this is the level of mindfulness that needs to be applied in protecting our vows.

We also need to relate this passage to other practices as well. When the commentary refers to holding the antidote of bodhicitta and so forth, it is implying that we need to apply mindfulness and introspection so that we do not engage in the opposite of bodhisattva practices like the six perfections. This means using mindfulness and introspection to protect our minds from miserliness as a way of not hindering our practice of generosity, practising patience in order to protect our mind from anger, and practising morality as a way of refraining from harming others.

In this way, practices with a bodhicitta motivation become the ultimate antidote to the self-cherishing mind. By protecting all levels of our practice of generosity, morality, patience, joyous effort and so forth, we ensure that our actions are not tainted with the self-interest of a self-cherishing mind, which is a means to actually benefit others. That is how bodhicitta serves as an antidote to the opposite of the practices of a bodhisattva. This is also related to the cause and effect sequence of karma. So in order to fully embrace it, we need to relate this analogy to a broader perspective.

I have previously emphasised how we need to protect our mind from negativities. As emphasised here, we need to protect our mind from negativities such as miserliness, harmfulness, a lack of joyous effort and so forth. This need for mindfulness and introspection also applies to combatting strong attachment and anger. We need to apply mindfulness and introspection constantly in order to be ready to apply the appropriate antidote whenever there is a chance that negativities might arise.

As I have also mentioned previously, we also need to be mindful of the virtuous object. The real implication of the practice of meditation is to always be mindful of the virtuous object, because remembering virtuous objects lessens the opportunity for negativities to arise. So being mindful of the virtuous object in general actually serves as an antidote that overcomes negativities. This is how we need to apply this practice at our level.

2.2.2.4. IF A FAULT ARISES ONE NEEDS TO STOP IT IMMEDIATELY

I have reflected on these points previously. The first verse under this heading reads:

72. *Therefore, just as one leaps up quickly
If a snake comes into one's lap,
If sleep and sloth come
One should stop them quickly.*

Then the commentary explains the meaning of the verse:

Since one will go to the hell realms if one's virtue is destroyed by afflictions, one should, out of fear of the hell realms, quickly stop sleep and sloth, which cause one to withdraw involuntarily if they come, just as one would leap up quickly if a poisonous snake would come into one's lap.

Since one will go to the hell realms if one's virtue is destroyed by the afflictions refers to the root virtues. The virtue of non-attachment is destroyed by attachment, the virtue of non-anger is destroyed by the affliction of anger, and the root virtue of non-ignorance is destroyed by the mind of ignorance. Likewise, the root virtue of generosity is destroyed by miserliness, the root virtue of morality is destroyed by the lack of morality, and so forth. When one reflects on the explanation of karma, one sees that if one adopts miserliness, then there is no way that one can obtain good resources in future lives. We cannot hope to be reborn with good resources and good conditions in our next rebirth if we are affected by the negativity of miserliness now. Likewise with other non-virtues. If root virtues are destroyed by their opposing afflictions then that will destroy our prospects of enjoying good results in our future life.

As I have explained in previous sessions, if we find ourselves engaging in negativity during the day, then we should take the initiative to confess them and purify those negativities that night. We also need to purify whatever negativities we have created during the night the next morning, so that our root virtues are not completely destroyed by these negativities.

As explained in the commentary, one should, out of fear of the hell realms, quickly stop sleep and sloth. Sleep can be neutral or even virtuous, depending on one's state of mind. However the sleep that is initiated with an ignorant state of mind destroys a lot of opportunities for accumulating virtues. If sleep is established with a virtuous state of mind, then it is virtuous sleep, but if sleep is affected by ignorance it can become non-virtuous.

Although the act of sleeping seems harmless, it can rob us of a great opportunity for accumulating virtues. Sleep takes up a lot of our time. We can spend up to half of our lives sleeping, so if we do not use sleep in a virtuous way then we rob ourselves of a great opportunity for accumulating virtues.

Sloth is a state of worldly idleness when we are not engaged in accumulating virtues, and the consequence of being robbed of the opportunity for accumulating virtues is having to go to unfortunate rebirths such as the hell realms.

Here, involuntarily withdrawn refers to the state of our consciousness being withdrawn during sleep, and thus not able to focus on virtue.

The manner of how one should actually overcome such obstacles to accumulating virtue is explained with another vivid analogy, just as one would leap up quickly if a poisonous snake dropped into one's lap. If a poisonous snake were to drop onto our lap we would not just sit there doing nothing. Out of the fear that at any given moment the snake could bite us, and its venom kill us, we would immediately get rid of that poisonous snake from our lap. In the same way one needs to overcome obstacles, such as sleep and sloth, which destroy one's virtues.

The next verse under this heading is preceded by a query.

Query: How then should one stop them?

73. *With each fault that arises
One should reprimand oneself
And motivate strongly:
'I shall act so that this never happens again'.*

Then the commentary explains:

Answer: With each fault that arises one should reprimand oneself, saying 'When I acted like this in the past, many unwished-for things happened, and I did not achieve what I wanted. Do I still want to act like this?' Then one confesses with the four powers and motivates for a long time: 'I shall make an effort so that this fault never arises again.'

The explanation is quite clear. Actually, Shantideva is supporting what I regularly emphasise. As the commentary states, with each fault that arises one should reprimand oneself. As presented here, one investigates one's actions, and for every fault that arises one should engage in an inner dialogue, and reprimand oneself.

If what one wishes for has not materialised, and one has experienced what one does not wish for—problems, difficulties, and various types of turmoil and suffering—then that is the result of engaging in negativities in the past. Recognising that, the measure one takes is that, as soon as some sort of negativity arises to immediately remember, 'Allowing my mind to be controlled by this negativity is the cause of all the problems that I experience now, that I have experienced in the past, and that I will continue to experience for as long as I don't take control of it'. Do I still want to act like this is a rhetorical question which implies, 'If I don't want to experience unwanted consequences of problems and difficulties then I can't remain idle and not do anything about the faults and negativities that are the cause of those unwanted consequences'.

As I have shared with you in the past, the way that I apply this to myself is that as soon as a negative or tainted mind starts to manifest, I take the initiative and say to myself, 'Geshe Doga be careful! I have to be cautious here, because a negative state of mind is about to arise, and if I am not careful I will fall victim to this negativity'. Many people have found this advice very useful in their day-to-day lives.

The way to overcome the faults and negativities one has created in the past is by applying the practice mentioned in the commentary. One confesses with the four powers and motivates for a long time: 'I should make an effort that this fault never arises again'. As I have emphasised previously, for every fault that arises one needs to immediately apply the purification practice. If we don't like the negative consequences that we are experiencing now, which are the results of previous faults, then as soon as we find ourselves engaging in faults it is in our own best interests to apply the purification practice. That will stop the negativity from increasing, and from being experienced as a negative consequence in the future.

We know how to engage in the purification practice. We have knowledge of the Dharma, so the advantage of knowing the Dharma comes from putting it into practise. If we don't apply the Dharma that we know - such as applying the purification practices - then our knowledge of the Dharma would not have served any purpose for ourselves. As mentioned here, the first part of purification is confessing the faults that one has created, then comes generating the mind of strong regret and taking whatever purification measure is needed and, at the end, resolving not to engage in these negativities again.

As I have mentioned previously, the stronger the regret is, the stronger the resolve to not commit those negative actions again will be. This is the way to implement this advice into one's practice.

2.2.2.5. ONE SHOULD STRIVE IN SUITABLE ACTIONS

The verse relating to this outline is:

74. *Say: Thus I shall meditate on mindfulness
On these occasions.
Through this cause, when meeting or otherwise,
I shall desire suitable action.*

Then the commentary explains the meaning of the verse:

'Thus, in order for faults not to arise, and to eliminate those already arisen, I shall meditate on mindfulness on these occasions that call for earnest conscientiousness and introspection.' By thinking in this way, through the cause of this motivation, when I meet with the Mahayana guru, or even if I do not meet a guru immediately, I shall desire to engage in suitable actions in accord with the teachings.

This is actually quite clear. As mentioned in the commentary, for faults to not arise and to eliminate those already arisen I shall meditate on mindfulness on these occasions that call for earnest conscientiousness and introspection. As I have presented previously, one combats the faults that have arisen now, and to eliminate those that have arisen in the past, one meditates on mindfulness, and then applies conscientiousness and introspection.

By thinking in this way, through the causes of this motivation, i.e. with this motivation in one's mind, if one has met with a Mahayana guru, or even if one has temporarily not met with a guru, one resolves, I shall desire to engage in suitable actions that are according to the teachings, just as explained in the teachings.

2.2.3. Empowering oneself to achieve the actions

This is subdivided into two:

2.2.3.1. Being light in taking up virtue due to mental and physical pliancy

2.2.3.2. Relating the example to the meaning

2.2.3.1. BEING LIGHT IN TAKING UP VIRTUE DUE TO MENTAL AND PHYSICAL PLIANCY

First one obtains physical pliancy which then induces mental pliancy. When one obtains both physical and mental pliancy that will remove the natural defects of body and mind that cause fatigue and tiredness. It then becomes very easy to engage in virtue very joyously. That is the great benefit of attaining this pliancy.

The verse under this heading is:

75. *In order to have strength for anything
Before engaging in an action
By remembering the advice regarding conscientiousness
I shall arise lightly.*

The commentary reads:

In order to have the power of strong enthusiasm for any virtuous action beforehand, I shall remember the advice regarding conscientiousness and arise lightly in the virtuous action free from being hesitant about performing that action due to the defects.

In order to have the power of strong enthusiasm for any virtuous action beforehand, means that first of all one needs strong enthusiasm for any virtuous action. So the main driving force behind engaging in any virtue is enthusiasm, or joyful effort. Without this joyful effort, one's interest in engaging in virtue would be lacking.

I shall remember the advice regarding conscientiousness and arise lightly in the virtuous action free from being hesitant about performing that action due to the defects, means that one needs to always be conscientiousness about engaging in virtuous actions, free from hesitation due to physical and mental defects. Arising lightly can be understood from the analogy in the next verse. So this verse indicates how to engage in virtuous actions joyfully, and without any hesitation or resistance.

2.2.3.2. RELATING THE EXAMPLE TO THE MEANING

76. *Just like the coming and going
Of the wind controls the cotton,
Letting oneself be controlled by joy,
One will achieve.*

Query: How should one act then?

Answer: Just like the coming and going of the wind controls the cotton, letting one's actions of body and speech be controlled by joy in virtue one will achieve one's virtuous actions of the three doors quickly.

The analogy in the commentary, just like the coming and going of the wind controls the cotton, is another vivid analogy. A piece of cotton moves effortlessly when the wind blows back and forth from one direction to the other. So, moved by the wind without any effort, the cotton drifts back and forth.

This analogy is used to explain how, when one's actions of body, speech and mind are controlled by the joy of virtue, one will achieve one's virtuous actions of the three doors quickly. When there is a joy in applying effort to accumulate virtue through one's body, speech and mind, then one's speech and one's actions will naturally be followed by a virtuous and joyful state of mind. That is why, as emphasised here, joyous effort is essential if one is to engage in virtue.

Then the commentary continues with:

In short, as it says in the Sutra of Close Placement by Mindfulness,

The one basis for the afflictions
Is laziness; who has it?
Wherever one laziness exists
There all dharmas become non-existent.

The commentary then explains the meaning of this verse:

One should strive in the enthusiasm that stops laziness.

As quoted in the earlier verse, no Dharma can exist for the lazy. Therefore one needs to overcome laziness with enthusiasm.

To this end one needs to make an effort to clear the opposing factors of enthusiasm and to generate the conducive conditions of the four powers, [which have been explained previously].

As a summary, the commentary is reiterating what has been previously explained. Having mentioned that one needs to make an effort to remove the opposing factors to enthusiasm, the commentary continues:

The opposing factors are that, though seeing that one is able to engage in a virtuous action one does not do so, or one thinks, 'How could I be able to do this?'

Not engaging in virtue when one is able to do so is one of the types of laziness explained previously. It takes two forms.

The first again has two: procrastinating by thinking, 'I still have time', and being overwhelmed by attachment to negative actions.

These are the two reasons for laziness.

1. The antidote to the first is:

The first one should abandon with the antidote of contemplating that one's body will soon disintegrate, that after death one will fall into the lower realms and that the freedoms and endowments are difficult to find.

2. The antidote to the second, which is being overwhelmed by attachment to negative actions, is:

... to reflect on how the holy Dharma is the cause for infinite joys in this and future lives, and that the distractions of meaningless talk and so forth harm the great purpose of this life, and are the source of many sufferings in the future.

As this is a summary of what has been extensively explained in the chapter, it is easy to relate to these explanations.

With respect to discouragement, the commentary states:

With regard to discouragement there are again three:

1. Thinking, 'I cannot attain the infinite qualities of a buddha';
2. Thinking, 'I cannot accomplish the infinite difficult actions such as offering arms, legs and so forth';
3. Thinking, 'I cannot bear the sufferings of the infinite births in cyclic existence that I would have to take.'

1. Having presented these three types of discouragement, the antidote to the first is explained.

The antidote against the first is to think, 'Also the buddhas had not completed the path from the start but in the beginning were just as myself. Then they evolved and became buddhas ...

As I have regularly explained, the resultant state of becoming a buddha is the result of having overcome each and every negativity, one at a time, along the path, and acquired each and every virtue along the path. Initially buddhas are ordinary beings just like ourselves. Having engaged in the practices of overcoming each and every fault, and acquiring each and every virtue, one at a time, they gradually, and step by step, overcome all adversities and negativities and acquire all the qualities, and attain the state of buddhahood. When it is presented in this way it gives us great hope: 'Yes, there is a real possibility that I can also become a buddha'.

Further:

... Since the Buddha taught that even beings much lower than me can attain enlightenment, then why should I not attain enlightenment as long as I do not stop practising?'

Again, these are points that were mentioned in the root text, explaining why beings from the lower realms, such as animals and insects, also have the potential to become a buddha because of their buddha nature. By reflecting on that fact, we understand that we too have that possibility.

2. The antidote to being daunted with the prospect of having to give up one's limbs and so forth is then explained.

The antidote against the second is to think, 'As long as it appears difficult for me to give up arms, legs and so forth, it is not the right time to do so.

When there is a hesitation about giving one's limbs, then that is an indication that that is not the right time. So one is advised to not engage in the practice of giving one's limbs and so forth at that time. The suitable time is then presented:

Only when I can give them up as easily as a vegetable, then it is the right time to do so.'

When bodhisattvas reach the higher grounds, they have perfected their practice of generosity to the point where they are able to give anything without hesitation.

3. As mentioned previously, there could be the thought that one could bear the suffering entailed in being born in cyclic existence again and again. This relates to the courage of the bodhisattva in coming back again and again to benefit sentient beings. If one feels daunted by that prospect, then:

The antidote against the third is to think, 'Bodhisattvas do not experience suffering because they have abandoned its cause, negativity ...

This was explained in detail previously as well.

... They also do not have mental suffering because they realise that the sufferings of cyclic existence are like an illusion, lacking inherent existence. Since one is strengthened by mental and physical happiness there is no reason to be tired despite remaining in cyclic existence'.

A bodhisattva at that level does not experience physical and mental unhappiness, so they are not affected by the sufferings of samsara, and are therefore not daunted by having to be reborn in cyclic existence again and again.

Summarising verse

The author of the commentary, Gyaltsab Rinpoche, then presents a verse that summarises the chapter.

To sincerely achieve the aspiration for liberation
Depends on the practice of enthusiasm to Complete what one initially started and is engaged in.
Hence one should generate enthusiasm complete with the four powers.

This is an encouragement to actually develop enthusiasm or joyous effort with the aid of the four powers.

II. THE NAME OF THE CHAPTER

This is the seventh chapter from Introduction to the Actions of the Bodhisattvas, called Explaining Enthusiasm.

Then commentary concludes:

This is the commentary on the seventh chapter called 'Explaining Enthusiasm' from the commentary on the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

This completes the seventh chapter. In our next session we will start the eighth chapter, which is on Mental Stabilisation.

*Transcript prepared by Judy Mayne
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe*

© Tara Institute

Based on the positive motivation we have generated we can now engage in meditation practice. Whenever one generates a positive motivation a positive action will follow. We need to keep in mind that actions are initiated by motivations. Of course, this implies that if we have a negative motivation then a negative action will follow. So just the necessity of developing the correct motivation is also a way to show us what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded—in itself a Dharma practice. We can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

Generate a bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will engage in listening to the Mahayana teachings and put them into practice well.

CHAPTER 8: THE WAY OF TRAINING IN MENTAL STABILISATIONS CONTAINED IN THE COMMON AND UNCOMMON TYPES OF CALM ABIDING

This chapter is on Mental Stabilisation. In relation to the Six Perfections, the first, second and third chapters were based on the perfection of generosity, the fourth and fifth chapter covers morality, followed by chapter six on patience. Chapter seven is on joyous effort and now chapter eight is on concentration or mental stabilisation. This chapter outlines the way to increase and strengthen bodhicitta, particularly with the method of giving and taking.

There are two main subdivisions of the chapter.

- I. Explaining the text of the chapter
- II. The name of the chapter

Obtaining mental stabilisation is contained in the common and uncommon means of developing calm abiding. What this implies is that calm abiding is a practice which is found both in the treatises of non-Buddhist traditions, as well as in Buddhist traditions. What makes calm abiding an uncommon Buddhist practice is when it is accompanied with refuge, bodhicitta, the realisation of emptiness and so forth.

I. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

This section has three parts:

1. Advice to meditate on mental stabilisation
2. Abandoning the opposing factors to calm abiding
3. The way of meditating on calm abiding

As clearly presented in the outline itself, the chapter provides advice on meditating on mental stabilisation, i.e. how to develop concentration; how to identify and abandon factors opposing calm abiding, then the way to actually meditate on calm abiding.

1. ADVICE TO MEDITATE ON MENTAL STABILISATION

This has two subdivisions:

- 1.1. The reason for the need to achieve calm abiding
- 1.2. The advice to abandon the opposing factors to calm abiding.

We can see that the outline is very logically and systematically presented.

1.1. The reason for the need to achieve calm abiding

Before listening to advice on the need to meditate on mental stabilisation, it is good to define exactly what is meant by mental stabilisation. Mental stabilisation is a mental factor that focuses on its object from its own side. Presenting the definition in this way shows exactly what mental stabilisation is. For example, when one engages in single-pointed focus on an object, the mind focuses single-pointedly but this mind is not mental stabilisation. There is also a mind which maintains the memory of the object held single-pointedly, but that is not mental stabilisation. There is however a separate mental factor with the specific function of holding the object single-pointedly, that is from its own side, not depending on anything else. From its own side means its own function is to focus on the object single-pointedly. This is mental stabilisation.

Prior to the need to achieve calm abiding, the text outlines the faults of the mind not being focused in this way. In seeing these faults one begins to see the reason why it is necessary to be focused on an object single-pointedly. The seventh chapter on joyous effort highlighted that, when one engages with a virtuous action or object, it should be with a joyous mind, but that in itself is not sufficient. This chapter explains that joyous effort needs to be accompanied with single-pointed focus on the virtuous object. This is the combination we need to achieve.

The first verse reads:

1. *Having thus generated enthusiasm,
Place the mind in concentration;
A person with a wandering mind
Lives in a cave of the affliction's fangs.*
- 2ab. *Through physical and mental isolation
Mental wandering does not arise.*

Commentary explains:

Having generated enthusiasm that delights in virtue as explained before, one should place the mind in concentration, because a person whose mind is distracted by mental sinking and excitement abides in a cave of the fangs of a malevolent animal, and will be quickly destroyed by them.

If it is asked, "How does one abandon mental wandering?" Through isolating body and mind from distraction and desirous thoughts, one will not develop mental wandering, the opposing factor to concentration.

Having generated enthusiasm (that delights in virtue) then one needs to put it into practice by placing the mind in concentration. Again this emphasises that it is not enough to engage in a virtuous object randomly, once in a while, even if it is accompanied with joyous effort. Rather one needs to continuously place one's mind on the virtuous object. The commentary explains that, one should place the mind in concentration because a person whose mind is distracted with mental sinking and excitement abides in the cave of the fangs of a malevolent animal and will be quickly destroyed by them.

An individual whose mind is completely distracted and engaged in worldly activities will not be able to develop single-pointed concentration for as long as they follow distractions. One may be able to sit rigidly for a while and assume the meditative posture, but, for as long as one does not lessen one's worldly desires, the mind will be distracted. We can see that Shantideva supports what I too regularly emphasise, which is that following our desires is one of the main forms of distraction. I feel that what I have been teaching is well supported here. Even after one applies one's mind on virtue and maintains a few moments of stability, immediately we find the mind wanders off. We are not able to maintain a continuous focus on the virtuous object, so developing concentration is indispensable.

The two main obstacles to concentration are sinking (or laxity) and excitement. Initially in developing one's meditation laxity is more subtle and is not recognised right away. Excitement is one of the most prominent obstacles and occurs immediately, hindering our ability to focus on the object.

The analogy suggests that someone distracted by mental sinking (or laxity) and excitement is like someone held in the fangs of a malevolent animal, like in a crocodile's jaws, with the danger that they can snap shut any minute. This is similar to how our mind can be distracted at any time with sinking and excitement, which throws us back under the influence of the afflictions.

Without being able to precisely identify mental sinking (or laxity) and excitement, there is no way one can develop calm abiding. At a subtle level laxity and excitement are hard to identify, and if one fails to identify them it hinders one's ability to develop calm abiding. The main causes for excitement are worldly desires, therefore the faults of desire or attachment are explained extensively in the following passages.

In stating that mental wandering is a fault, the commentary poses the question:

If it is asked "How does one abandon mental wandering?"

The answer follows:

Through isolating body and mind from distraction and desirous thoughts, one will not develop mental wandering, the opposing factor to concentration.

On a physical level, the commentary emphasises one should isolate oneself from the negative influences of companions who distract one by causing excitement and encouraging worldly activities. Good companions who support our practice are fine, but misleading or distracting companions are one of the faults.

If one can distance oneself from distracting companions, the next main class of obstacle to avoid is mental distractions in the form of desire and discursive thoughts etc. This is most essential because while we might have successfully isolated ourselves from the cause of external distractions, and be in an isolated and quiet place like a meditation cave, the mind can still be distracted and wandering about in town. This occurs when one has not applied measures to protect the mind from distraction. The desirous mind is still attached to pleasant forms and sounds etc. so when it is not protected from engaging in these objects of desire, the mind of desire becomes the main obstacle which impedes concentration. On the other hand, when one has developed stable concentration, then even if one were in a busy, worldly environment, one will not be swayed by distractions. The two main points here are that in order to develop concentration and protect one's mind from mental wandering, initially one needs to apply physical isolation as well as mental isolation. When you relate these explanations to your own experience of how easily you can be influenced by internal distractions in the form of discursive thoughts, then it makes more sense and you can see how this is, in fact, is very true.

Take the simple example of trying to fall asleep when your mind is still racing with discursive thoughts. When we go to bed we are on our own with no immediate external distractions, we turn off the light so it is dark, and we have no external stimuli. However a hyperactive mind can prevent us from falling asleep when it is still very busy with a lot of discursive thoughts. When the mind is hyperactive in this way, one cannot fall asleep even though there are no external causes of distractions. Internal conceptualisations and discursive thoughts are affecting our ability to sleep. Take this as an example of the truth that the main obstacle for maintaining a virtuous, clear and focused mind is really the various forms of internal distractions - mainly desirous thoughts.

Using the sleep example again, the mind being hyperactive means one has not been able to withdraw from the gross mind, so there is no way for one to actually go to sleep. This is also the case with meditation, so it is good to actually recognise within ourselves the main obstacles, and to acknowledge them. Back to the example, if eluding sleep was our only problem, there would be just one problem to deal with, but often one cannot fall asleep because the mind is disturbed with an uncomfortable state of anxiety. Some have confided in me that sometimes when they are alone they cannot go to sleep as memories of the past creep into their mind and cause angst to the point of bringing tears. People have confided in me that their pillow gets wet with tears. Thus from the very onset, if we can apply these practices and focus our mind in virtue, that will definitely help to reduce the angst and pain in the mind. So we need to apply practical means that will help us maintain some level of sanity or calmness on a regular basis. This is how we can derive practical benefits from the practice of mind training.

The reason I remind you that meditation and mind training are useful and something we need to maintain, is because some older students might now feel like this is true, but not really pay much attention to it. I feel they may have initially had good experiences from meditation but since then may have started to lapse in their enthusiasm for meditation.

I'll give a recent account of how an explanation of meditation was experienced as something incredibly valuable. When I recently taught at Drol Kar Centre, Geshe Sonam informed me after the teaching session that there were three ladies who had come there for their first time. They had actually thought of coming to the centre for the last three years, but had never actually made it. But that day when they actually came, happened to coincide with my teaching on explaining the benefits of meditation. Later they commented how the session really helped to solve a lot of problems. Apparently they were really moved and their minds were affected in a very positive way. These are people who are completely fresh and new to Buddhism, but they felt a strong, positive impact from the presentation on meditation.

I presented the meditation technique years and years ago, and you would have seen the benefit at that time. But I have a feeling that since then it has, perhaps, lapsed a bit and has not really been taken much further, and that some have sort of lost interest or become lazy. Of course, if one does not maintain the practice of meditation, then one will not experience the long-lasting effect.

I have many such stories of people who have been affected in a positive way. There is also another lady with three children who comes to Drol Kor. Apparently after a session she said, "Now I have no more questions left, everything has been answered. I have found the means for my development". I have many other stories to tell about people who have been affected positively. I am not saying that my advice is profound, but that by giving my teachings with the utmost best motivation, some positive effects have definitely occurred. I honestly don't have any ulterior and selfish motives when I present the Dharma and my advice to you. It's solely with the intention that it may be of some benefit to you.

This might be a prompt for you to also be mindful of generating a positive motivation before presenting teachings or advice to others. If one is not mindful of a positive motivation, it could create lot of difficulties for yourself later on. For example, after presenting you might feel that it was not appreciated, or when someone challenges you it can throw you off course. In that way it could actually affect your mind negatively. Rather than being joyful with your service and benefit to others, it might actually cause unnecessary problems for oneself.

That reminds me of another incident where someone from Adelaide had called the office, and said they wanted to come and see me. My initial response was that they don't need to come from so far away to see me just to ask some questions, as there are also geshe in Adelaide. But that person was apparently quite insistent, so I said, 'Fine'. They apparently came with the intention of spending one night here and arrived on a Wednesday night when there was a teaching. Next morning I got a message that they didn't need to see me any longer, as all their questions were answered in the teaching. These kind of astonishing things do occur.

The reason I share this with you is not to claim that I am doing any great service, but to point out again that where there is good motivation, it certainly seems to bring about benefit for others. It seems to help release the pain and agony in the listeners' minds. Again, the reason I share this with you is so that whenever an occasion arises that you also share the Dharma knowledge with others or help in any way, when done with a good motivation it can definitely benefit them. The purpose of the Dharma is to benefit others as much as it is to subdue one's own mind. When that is done truthfully and honestly and with good intention to share with others, then that encompasses the whole practice of abiding by the law of karma as well. Basically it comes down to being honest and truthful, with a mind of wishing to benefit others.

I have another positive story to share from a Monday evening presenter. One Monday evening when Ven. Kaye Miner was conducting the session, a person had apparently asked a lot questions in a very challenging and hostile way. But her response was very calm, and with a gentle demeanour she responded to all the questions. Another person who happened to be in that session later confided to me that they were really moved by that, and from then on began to really appreciate Buddhism. They felt that when challenged with hostility, to remain calm and quiet and not overreact was a really good sign of what Buddhism has to offer. This is how adopting a good nature and setting a good example can really inspire others. This is the whole point when we talk about inspiring others; it is not only with words but most importantly with one's gentle mannerisms as well. So if we are concerned in wanting to give Buddhism a good reputation, then the best way is by conducting ourselves properly, in a gentle manner.

1.2. The advice to abandon the opposing factors to calm abiding

The next two lines of the verse read:

*2cd. Through this, one should abandon the transitory world
And perfectly destroy the conceptualising mind.*

The point I was making earlier is actually presented right here. The commentary explains:

Hence, through the method of physical isolation one abandons distractions such as meeting with worldly friends, relatives and so forth. Through the method of isolating the mind, one perfectly destroys thoughts for desire objects.

As I have already explained the main points of this earlier, we don't need to go over it again. The commentary then quotes from a sutra, which reads:

From a sutra:

If it is rare for a distracted mind to even attain a worldly mental stabilisation, then what need is there to mention complete enlightenment. Therefore, one should not let one's mind be distracted until the attainment of complete enlightenment.

The quote from the sutra highlights the Buddha's profound advice about the need to develop mental stabilisation, indicating that it is unlikely that a distracted mind can even attain worldly mental stabilisation, like mundane attainments. So if that is the case, what need is there to mention complete enlightenment. It further explains, Therefore one should not let one's mind be distracted until the attainment of complete enlightenment, which is the extent of the commitment one needs to make to develop mental stabilisation.

2. ABANDONING THE OPPOSING FACTORS TO CALM ABIDING

This is subdivided into two:

- 2.1. Abandoning distractions
- 2.2. Abandoning incorrect conceptualisation

2.1. Abandoning distractions

This is further subdivided into two:

- 2.1.1. Identifying the cause for attachment to the world
- 2.1.2. The way of abandoning it

2.1.1. Identifying the cause for attachment to the world

The first two lines of the verse read:

*3ab. Due to attachment and craving for gain
And the like, one does not give up the fleeting world.*

The commentary explains:

In dependence on the grasping for 'I' and mine, one is attached to the inner object of sentient beings. Due to that, and due to craving for the outer objects of gain, praise, compliments and so forth, one does not give up the grasping for the fleeting world. Hence, one should abandon the causes for these attachments.

While these explanations have been presented many times previously, the point here is that, in dependence on the grasping for 'I' and mine, one is attached to the inner object of sentient beings. Firstly, as presented, inner object refers to sentient beings, i.e. oneself. So all our cravings begin with the grasping at one's own 'I', followed by grasping at what is regarded as 'mine'.

It first starts with the grasping at the 'I', followed by 'mine'. Without attachment to an individual 'me' the attachment to 'mine' cannot follow. So in the sequence it is definitely the attachment to the 'I' or to the individual 'me' that comes first, then comes grasping at what is 'mine' and all the distracting five sense objects of the external world. One is attached to the inner object of sentient beings refers to oneself as the inner being, and then, due to that and due to craving for the outer objects of gain, compliments ... and so forth, one does not give up the grasping for the fleeting world. It is through this combination of grasping at the individual 'I' and 'mine' that one craves the sense objects that create the craving for the fleeting or transient world. The commentary concludes with, Hence one should abandon the causes for the attachments, meaning that in order to overcome attachment to the fleeting world and so forth, one must abandon the very causes of these attachments. Having presented that one should abandon the causes for these, naturally what would follow is the question 'How should one abandon causes of these attachments?' So the text then presents the way to abandon them.

2.1.2. The way of abandoning it

Here there are four subdivisions:

- 2.1.2.1. Identifying the antidote
- 2.1.2.2. The method for generating the antidote
- 2.1.2.3. The faults of distractions
- 2.1.2.4. The benefits of relying on isolation

Just by relating to the sequence of the outline, we can see that it is very logically and systematically presented. Firstly, identifying the antidote refers to how to abandon the causes of attachment. One must first identify the antidote; without doing this there is no way to apply it. Then, having identified the antidote, one would naturally wonder how one can cultivate it. So next the text presents the method for generating the antidote, followed by the faults of the distraction and the benefits of relying on isolation. These are all presented in such a methodical way that one is able to adopt them.

2.1.2.1. IDENTIFYING THE ANTIDOTE

This is subdivided into two:

- 2.1.2.1.1. Advice to abandon attachment
- 2.1.2.1.2. Identifying the antidote that abandons attachment

2.1.2.1.1. Advice to abandon attachment

The first two lines of the verse read:

*3cd. Therefore, to abandon these perfectly,
The skilful will act thus.*

The commentary explains:

Therefore, to abandon these cravings for outer and inner objects, they who are skilled should investigate and contemplate as it is explained below.

The advice to abandon attachment relates to the faults of craving and so forth. To abandon these cravings to outer and inner objects refers, as mentioned previously, to the craving or grasping which begins with the inner being, oneself, followed by the grasping at the external objects. In order to abandon both of these those who are skilled, referring to those who are intelligent and who wish to apply these methods, should investigate and contemplate as it is explained below. This is like a prelude, saying in simple terms that those who are interested and who have intelligence, must investigate and contemplate the methods presented.

2.1.2.1.2. Identifying the antidote that abandons attachment.

The verse reads:

*4. Having understood that superior insight endowed
With calm abiding destroys the afflictions,
One should strive first in calm abiding, which in turn
Is attained joyfully by lacking attachment for the world.*

We'll cover this verse now which is actually quite important, but the rest we'll do in our next session.

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse:

Superior insight into emptiness endowed with the horse of calm abiding that induces the bliss of physical and mental pliancy, which is free from mental sinking and excitement by having meditated single-pointedly on any virtuous object, destroys the afflictions of the three realms including the seeds. Understanding this, one should work towards superior insight, which can induce pliancy by investigating the meaning of the mode of abiding. Therefore one strives initially in calm abiding, as it is impossible to generate superior insight without firstly achieving calm abiding.

Calm abiding is achieved joyfully through a lack of attachment to outer and inner worldly objects such as the body, enjoyments and so forth. If one is attached to them, one will fall under the control of sinking and mental excitement.

What frees one from mental sinking and excitement is having meditated single-pointedly on any virtuous object. What is being explained here is that, having first focused on any chosen virtuous object, the outcome is to be able to single-pointedly focus on it, by removing the faults of mental sinking or laxity and excitement.

A simple way to understand what is being presented here is this analogy: if an individual wants to cut down a large tree, they first need to have a strong body and be in good physical shape; furthermore they need to have a steady hand with a good aim; along with that they need to have a good and sharp axe. This analogy illustrates the need for morality, concentration and wisdom to overcome the afflictions, and obtain one's ultimate goal of enlightenment.

This analogy demonstrates the manner of overcoming the afflictions. Whoever wishes to overcome the afflictions needs first of all to have the basis of sound morality. On the basis of observing faultless morality, which is like having a strong body, one needs to have very good concentration, which is like having a steady hand. If a person who wishes to fell a tree does not have a steady hand, they would constantly miss the mark, and would never be able to cut down the tree. This is like a mind which is constantly distracted, and thus never able to actually combat and overcome the afflictions.

Having a good and sharp axe is analogous to having the wisdom realising emptiness. This passage, superior insight into emptiness endowed with the horse of calm abiding that induces the bliss of physical and mental pliancy, is specifically explaining that the wisdom to be developed is special insight, and the concentration to be developed is calm abiding. One develops calm abiding induced by mental and physical pliancy, by developing one's concentration gradually through the nine stages.

Having applied one's mind on a virtuous object and single-pointedly focused on that, ensuring that it is free from mental sinking and excitement, then through that familiarity one develops a strong, and very sound concentration. When the mind obtains the serviceability of focusing single-pointedly on the virtuous object that then induces mental pliancy.

Due to obtaining mental pliancy the body becomes serviceable, which induces physical pliancy. The combination of mental and physical pliancy causes the wind energy to flow well throughout the body. As the wind pervades throughout the body it induces physical bliss, which in turn induces mental bliss.

So, the sequence is this: one first obtains mental pliancy which induces physical pliancy. Then due to the winds flowing well in the body one experiences physical bliss which in turn induces mental bliss.

When one obtains both physical and mental bliss, and one is able to focus on the chosen object without any distractions or wandering, then the more one focuses on the object, the greater the level of mental and physical bliss that is experienced. When one obtains the combination of single-pointed focus combined with perpetual physical and mental bliss, then at that point one has obtained calm abiding.

The definition of calm abiding is a concentration accompanied with the bliss of pliancy, that is obtained through the method of adopting the nine stages of concentration, and which enables one's mind to focus single-pointedly on its object for as long one wishes.

Special insight, described later on, refers to using the base of single-pointed focus to analyse the object, and thus experience the physical and mental bliss which is induced by physical and mental pliancy. At this point one has obtained special insight.

Special insight is the wisdom that analyses the object, based on having developed single-pointed concentration. The individual who experiences that physical and mental bliss induced by physical and mental pliancy, and is able to investigate the object while maintaining a single-pointed focus, has obtained what is called 'special insight'. The difference here is that calm abiding is obtained through unwavering and single-pointed focus on the object so that one obtains the mental and physical pliancy which induces the physical and mental bliss. Whereas special insight is based on the single-pointed focus achieved through calm abiding, wherein one is able to analyse the object through one's analytical wisdom, whereby one experiences the physical and mental bliss induced by the physical and mental pliancy.

The commentary is explaining that what destroys the afflictions of the three realms, including the seeds, is superior insight into emptiness. The commentary explains that superior insight into emptiness is endowed with the horse of calm abiding that induces the bliss of physical and mental pliancy, which is free from mental sinking and excitement by having meditated single-pointedly on any virtuous object. The first part of the sequence is to develop a single-pointed focus on a virtuous object, free from mental sinking and excitement, which then induces the calm abiding, and then based on that one develops superior insight. It is the superior insight into emptiness that destroys the afflictions of the three realms, including the seeds. Understanding this, one should work towards superior insight, which can induce pliancy by investigating the meaning of mode of abiding, defines special insight as a superior insight which induces pliancy, by investigating the meaning of ultimate reality or emptiness. So by investigating the actual object which is emptiness, that which induces bliss caused by mental and physical pliancy, is special insight. If one strives, then with that understanding one would actually destroy the seed of afflictions. Therefore one strives initially to obtain calm abiding, as it is impossible to generate superior insight without first achieving calm abiding. This is a very crucial point. In the sequence, first one needs to develop calm abiding, which is then followed by developing special insight.

Calm abiding is achieved joyfully through a lack of attachment to outer and inner worldly objects such as the body, enjoyments and so forth. If one is attached to them, one will fall under the control of sinking and mental excitement.

So, in order to develop calm abiding, one needs to be free from obstacles such as attachment to one's outer and inner attachments.

To again summarise the order: first one develops calm abiding, followed by developing special insight which is the main antidote for overcoming the afflictions. The very seeds of the afflictions are removed by the union of calm abiding and special insight. So that is the main point here. In the next session we'll cover the method for actually developing the antidote.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Su Lan Foo
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnnett or Jill Lancashire
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱུང་རྒྱུ་མེམས་དཔའི་སྤོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

6 October 2015

While maintaining the motivation we generated during the prayers, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

Now we can re-generate the bodhicitta motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the purpose of all mother sentient beings, in order to liberate them from all suffering, and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the profound Mahayana teachings, and put them into practice well.

2.1.2.1. IDENTIFYING THE ANTIDOTE

2.1.2.1.2. Identifying the antidote that abandons attachment (cont.)

We covered this topic last week. It explained that the two main antidotes for overcoming attachment are calm abiding and special insight. The sequence in which one first needs to obtain calm abiding followed by special insight was also explained, as well as their definitions. So it's good to keep all of that in mind.

2.1.2.2. THE METHOD FOR GENERATING THE ANTIDOTE

Having identified the antidote that abandons attachment, the text goes on to explain the methods for generating that antidote under two main headings:

2.1.2.2.1. Abandoning attachment to the inner object—sentient beings

2.1.2.2.2. Abandoning attachment to the external

2.1.2.2.1. Abandoning attachment to the inner object—sentient beings

Again, this has two subdivisions:

2.1.2.2.1.1. The faults of attachment

2.1.2.2.2.2. Abandoning upon having understood the faults

2.1.2.2.1.1. The faults of attachment

The faults of attachment are further subdivided into five:

2.1.2.2.1.1.1. One will not meet with the desired object

2.1.2.2.1.1.2. Being abused by the sense objects

2.1.2.2.1.1.3. Although attaining it there is no contentment

2.1.2.2.1.1.4. Obstructing liberation

2.1.2.2.1.1.5. Squandering the freedoms and endowments

The essential points presented in the following verses are very poignant, and we really need to contemplate them.

2.1.2.2.1.1.1. One will not meet with the desired object

It is essential that we understand the faults of attachment. As presented, some of the faults of attachment are that the object of attachment is difficult to obtain and even when one obtains it, one is not content and happy. This is indeed very true, and verified by one's own experience. Of course if we don't pay attention, then these faults may not be apparent. But when we do an honest internal investigation it is very clear that attachment is the main cause for many of our problems.

As I've said in the past, talking about the faults of attachment may not be a particularly interesting topic for you. But if I were to start talking about the benefits of attachment, you might start paying very good attention and think: 'Now this is what I need to hear'. It is strange how the mind works and reacts when the faults of attachment are mentioned.

This goes to show how the mind is strongly habituated with desire and attachment, to the point that it appears to be an integral part of ourselves. We have such a deeply-rooted association with attachment that it's hard for us to even acknowledge the faults, let alone overcome them. Thus, we don't find listening to the faults of attachment very appealing.

We need to think about these points very carefully, examine them, and investigate them thoroughly as a way to fully acknowledge them, for as long as we befriend attachment it will be extremely difficult to practise true Dharma. Therefore, to help us acknowledge these faults Shantideva takes great care to explain them in detail. The more we begin to acknowledge, contemplate, and make a genuine attempt to overcome attachment, the greater our extent of practising the true Dharma will be.

The presentations of these faults are not all that difficult to understand—they are presented in a straightforward and clear manner. The main thing is to actually adopt this understanding and incorporate it into in one's practice.

The verse relating to this outline reads:

5. *An impermanent person strongly attached
To an impermanent person
Will not see anything beautiful
For thousands of lifetimes.*

The commentary explains the meaning of the verse as follows:

The faults of attachment: Who that is impermanent and dying soon can be strongly attached to family and friends that are also impermanent? They, who are thus attached to the beautiful, will not see anything beautiful in the thousands of lifetimes that are karmic ripening results.

The initial rhetorical question, Who that is impermanent and dying soon can be strongly attached to family and friends that are also impermanent?, basically implies that both the person experiencing attachment and the object of that attachment are equally impermanent, as by their very nature, both will naturally decay and die.

If it were the case that one's object of attachment is firm and stable and never changes, then one might feel that perhaps it's acceptable to have attachment, because it's never going to change and will remain stable. However the fact is that the nature of the object that one is attached to is impermanent, and thus naturally disintegrates and decays. The point being made here is the absurdity of being strongly attached to an object that will naturally decay and disintegrate.

Furthermore, due to strong attachment to what is attractive and beautiful, the ripening result is that one will not see attractive objects for a long period of time in future lifetimes. That is the karmic result of being attached to beautiful objects.

In contrast to that, a buddha's mind is said to remain perpetually in a state of bliss where everything—the surrounding environment and the beings within—all appear to be appealing and pleasant. That is because a buddha's mind is completely free from attachment. That is the result of completely abandoning attachment.

From our limited experience we might have noticed that once we start letting go of things, then they seem to become more abundant. Some have confided to me that when they reduce attachment to certain things, whether it is other people or objects, then the object of that attachment starts to (respectively) come closer, and be more abundant. When you are attached to money, for example, it seems to be difficult to obtain it, but when you start letting go of that attachment and not care too much about it, then money appears to come more easily. Many people seem to have actually experienced this. So even in the short term we can see that letting go of our attachment to things, situations and so forth, can actually make them even more appealing, more abundant and more enjoyable. This is one point we need to understand.

Another significant point we need to recall here is that the fault does not lie in seeing things as being appealing; rather, the fault lies in being attached to them. This is very clearly illustrated by the way sentient beings appear to bodhisattvas: because of their great endearing love, all beings appear to be very appealing and dear to them, yet they are not attached to them. In our situation the reverse seems to operate: other sentient beings appear appealing to us, and we immediately become attached to them.

A bodhisattva's lack of attachment is due to the wisdom realising emptiness that they have developed. This is a very significant point. It is that wisdom realising emptiness which protects their mind from feelings of strong attachment. As explained in the presentations on emptiness, for the person who has a deep understanding of emptiness, there's a discrepancy between the appearance and the actual mode of existence. While things appear to be truly existent, they do not actually exist in the way they appear to exist.

So when an object appears to be very attractive to us, we need to immediately apply the understanding that it does not exist in the way it appears to us, and that will immediately reduce strong interest in the beautiful features of the object. Applying the understanding of emptiness in this way immediately helps to overcome strong attachment. As explained in the teachings, having even a doubt about emptiness begins to shatter the core of cyclic existence.

Understanding emptiness means understanding that things do not exist in the way that they appear, and that there's a discrepancy between appearance and the actual mode of existence. Although things appear to our eye consciousness in a certain way, the actual mode of existence is contrary to the way it appears. Applying this understanding to objects of attachment will have an immediate impact and reduce that attachment to beautiful and appealing objects. Then, whatever understanding of emptiness one has will have served its purpose.

One might assume that one has meditated on emptiness and understood it. But as soon as one sees an attractive object, one's mind becomes attached and one's heart starts pumping with excitement, or, on the other hand, strong aversion arises when one sees an unappealing object. That indicates that one has not derived even a drop of essence of practice from the meditation. Any understanding of emptiness would have been superficial and not deep-rooted, and hence unable to overcome afflictions. This will be an instance of where one has not even begun to taste the real Dharma. This is an important point that you really need to keep in mind.

The main point from the instructions presented here is that if we don't see the faults of attachment, and apply antidotes to overcome that attachment when it arises, then we will experience negative consequences. Conversely, if we start to recognise and accept the faults of attachment and slowly overcome its influence over our mind, then gradually our wellbeing will improve.

In simple terms, if we ask ourselves whether we want a more relaxed and happy mind, or a more troubled state of mind, then our response will naturally be that we want a genuinely calm and happier state of mind. Thus, the advice being presented here is that for a happy state of mind we should not allow our mind to be completely obsessed with attachment and desire, and this is done by recognising and acknowledging the faults of attachment. This is really the main point.

2.1.2.2.1.1.2. Being abused by the sense objects

The first two lines of the next verse are:

*6ab. Not seeing it, one will not have joy,
And the mind will not enter equipoise.*

In a sense, Shantideva is pointing the finger right at our hearts.

The commentary reads:

If asked: 'What will happen when one does not see anything attractive?'

Answer: If one does not see anything beautiful, one will not have joy. Since one's mind will be unhappy, it will be distracted, it will not enter equipoise of concentration and one will not attain happiness.

The hypothetical question posed in the commentary is, what will happen if one does not see anything attractive? What would be the consequences if one doesn't see anything attractive?

As the commentary explains very clearly, if one does not see beautiful or pleasant things, then that will deprive one of a sense of joy. If we just constantly see unpleasant things then that will weigh our minds down, and we will not be joyful.

If the mind is unhappy then it will be easily distracted. What follows from this is that the mind will not be able to enter into the equipoise of concentration, i.e. one will not be able to concentrate on an object because it is unhappy, or depressed. If the mind is depressed or unhappy, then it will be impossible for the mind to maintain complete focus on an object. And if one is not able to enter into the equipoise of concentration, then there will be no way of gaining a genuine sense of happiness.

The presentation of this fault of attachment follows directly from the previous verse, which indicated that attachment will prevent one from seeing pleasant things in the long-term future. The explanation in these two lines shows the negative effects of not seeing pleasant things. Although the words attractive or beautiful are used, their meaning in this context is that people or environmental objects are suitable objects for interaction, which can be when they are pleasant, as opposed to unpleasant.

If one has a strong attachment to objects then the consequence will be not seeing pleasant things in the future. Not seeing things as being pleasant and attractive and so forth can cause unhappiness and a lack of joy, and the result of that is that the mind will not be able to develop the equipoise of concentration.

2.1.2.2.1.1.3. Although attaining it there is no contentment

However when things do start appearing as nice and beautiful, then there is the danger for attachment to these beautiful objects to arise, which will then cause discontentment.

The next two lines of the verse are:

*6cd. Although seeing it, one is not satisfied
And will be miserable due to craving as before.*

The commentary explains:

Even if one sees the desired objects, one is not satisfied due to craving. Due to craving one will be as miserable as before, when one did not see the desired object.

As explained clearly in the commentary, if one sees the desired objects, one is not satisfied due to craving. Due to attachment one desires to possess an object, or if it is a person, then you want to be close to them. However, even when one is in close proximity to the object, or one possesses it, there's a lack of contentment, and because of that lack of contentment one will again be miserable.

When one did not meet with the object there was a certain level of mental suffering, and now, having met with the object, one would assume that one is released from the suffering of not being with the object. However one experiences further suffering from not being satisfied, even though one owns the object, or is in close proximity to the other person.

If we were to take a contemporary example, when two people are initially attracted to each other then there's attachment, and because of that fascination they want to be close to each other. So they agree to live together, and perhaps even get married. But after they have lived together for some time, then a similar suffering to what they experienced before they met will arise. It is as if they are still lacking something; that is because they are still not content.

Therefore, one will be as miserable as before, when one did not see the desired object. The suffering that occurs in the mind will be similar to the suffering one experienced when one did not possess the object.

As the teachings explain in detail, attachment is one of the worst of the afflictions, because it is one of the main causes of being perpetually reborn in samsara again and again.

More precisely, in reference to the twelve links of interdependent origination, at the time of death it is the links of craving and grasping that lead to the link of existence, which is how one is reborn again into cyclic existence. Both craving and grasping are aspects of attachment. So we can see how, as the teachings explain, attachment is the primary cause for one to be reborn in samsara.

2.1.2.2.1.1.4. Obstructing liberation

This fault is presented in the following verse:

*7. If one is attached to sentient beings
The mere perfect meaning is obscured.
It will also destroy the mind of disenchantment
And lastly, one will be overwhelmed by misery.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

For those reasons, if one is attached to sentient beings, one will be completely obscured with regard to the perfect meaning itself, and thus it will obstruct the direct perception of ultimate truth. In addition, by craving contaminated phenomena, the mind of disenchantment with cyclic existence will be destroyed and one will not attain liberation. As one will finally be separated from everything that is pleasant, one will be overwhelmed by misery.

If one is attached to sentient beings, one will be completely obscured with regard to the perfect meaning itself, and thus it will obstruct the direct perception of ultimate truth, indicates that attachment to the internal object of sentient beings obstructs the perception of ultimate reality, or emptiness.

We have all seen how strong attachment can affect normal judgements, and how it leads to mistakes and poor decisions. For example, strong attachment can obscure the faults of the other person, so that only qualities are seen. There's no question that attachment obscures faults; it impairs the wisdom or intelligence needed to be able to make sound decisions.

This verse specifically relates to attachment to sentient beings. It is explained in the teachings that attachment to animate objects is much more difficult to overcome than attachment to inanimate objects. That's why attachment to sentient beings is specifically explained here.

Furthermore, as explained here, by craving contaminated phenomena, the mind of disenchantment with cyclic existence will be destroyed and one will not attain liberation. Renunciation cannot be developed when one's mind is obsessed with desire and attachment. For as long as one is attached to the pleasures of samsara it is impossible to develop renunciation, and it is only when one develops a mind of disenchantment with the pleasures of samsara that one can actually start to develop renunciation.

Disenchantment with the objects of desire comes from the development of a full understanding of the sufferings of samsara. Without acknowledging and recognising the three sufferings of samsara, it is impossible to develop disenchantment with samsara and renunciation of it.

a. The first of these sufferings, the suffering of suffering is not too difficult to recognise. It is something we have all experienced—even animals can recognise the suffering of suffering.

b. The second suffering is the suffering of change. Attachment to the sensual pleasures leads to disenchantment with change. Even non-Buddhists can develop that level of disenchantment.

c. The true suffering that one needs to recognise, and seek to overcome, is all-pervasive compounded suffering, which is said to be much more subtle and thus much harder to recognise and overcome. It is only by fully acknowledging and recognising all-pervasive compounded suffering that one is able to develop disenchantment with samsara.

As one will finally be separated from everything that is pleasant, one will be overwhelmed by misery indicates the extent to which suffering is an obstruction to liberation.

When the commentary refers to craving contaminated phenomena, we need to understand that this refers specifically to craving for the appropriated contaminated aggregates. By craving for contaminated phenomena the mind of disenchantment with cyclic existence will be destroyed, means that being strongly attached to the appropriated contaminated aggregates destroys disenchantment with samsara, and one will not be able to develop renunciation.

Thus liberation is obstructed by craving contaminated phenomena.

2.1.2.2.1.1.5. Squandering the freedoms and endowments

This fault is presented in these two lines:

*8ab. Because of being obsessed with it
This life will pass meaninglessly.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

By thinking exclusively about the objects of desire, this life will pass meaninglessly and the power of the freedoms and endowments will be squandered.

This explanation is, of course, quite clear, and we need to really take it to heart, and apply it to our own practice. As explained here, by thinking exclusively about the objects of desire, this life will pass meaninglessly and the power of the freedoms and endowments will be squandered. We currently possess a precious human life with its freedoms and endowments. However, if we become completely obsessed with the objects of desire, then that will prevent us from obtaining any significant personal spiritual goal.

To see this as a personal instruction we need to recall how a mind that is obsessed with an object of desire experiences perpetual problems and difficulties. When we look back, we can see how, in one form or another, all the problems that we have been experiencing are mainly due to not having fulfilled our desires. We keep going from one point to the next trying to pursue an object of desire that keeps eluding us. If one continues in this way then one's life will be empty, and one will not have extracted the essence from one's life. If we behave like that, then we have definitely squandered our freedoms and endowments.

At a personal level, one should think: 'What prevents me from fully utilising my precious human rebirth to achieve goals such as a good status (which is a good rebirth in the next lifetime), and liberation and enlightenment, is none other than my own mind, which is obsessed with desires. If I continue to be obsessed like this, my mind of desire will prevent me from using my potential to obtain these great goals. All my problems, from external ones to psychological problems, come down to the feeling of not obtaining the objects of my desire'. That is how we destroy our own temporary and ultimate happiness. So this is what we need to keep in mind.

2.1.2.2.2. Abandoning upon having understood the faults

That is subdivided into two:

2.1.2.2.2.1. Contemplating the faults

2.1.2.2.2.2. The way of abandoning

2.1.2.2.2.1. Contemplating the faults

Here there are two subdivisions.

2.1.2.2.2.1.1. Extensive explanation

2.1.2.2.2.1.2. Summary

2.1.2.2.2.1.1. Extensive explanation

The extensive explanation is subdivided into three:

2.1.2.2.2.1.1.1. The great purpose will be destroyed and one will be led to the lower realms

2.1.2.2.2.1.1.2. Childish friends are unreliable and they are difficult to count upon

2.1.2.2.2.1.1.3. One will not receive benefit from them and they will harm one

2.1.2.2.2.1.1.1. The great purpose will be destroyed and one will be led to the lower realms

Again, some very significant points are being presented under these headings. They relate to what we need to be wary of in our life. First of all the great purpose will be destroyed and one will be led to the lower realms. The next point is that childish friends are unreliable and they are difficult to count upon. Thirdly, childish friends are friends who have a bad influence over oneself. Thus, if one were to completely rely on such 'friends', one's own purpose will be destroyed and one will not even be able to help them.

We can go over the explanations in our next session.

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

*Transcript prepared by Mark Emerson
Edit 1 by Adair Bunnett
Edit 2 by Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe
Edited Version*

© Tara Institute

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

༄༅། །བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤོང་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

13 October 2015

Based on the motivation we have just generated, let us engage in the regular meditation practice. (Meditation)

We can now generate the motivation for receiving teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the profound Mahayana teachings and then put them into practice well.

If we can put into practice whatever understanding we gain from listening to the teachings, then it serves its purpose and makes it most meaningful. The advice in the next couple of verses is in fact very profound and should be integrated in this way.

2.1.2.2.1.2. Abandoning upon having understood the faults

2.1.2.2.1.2.1. Contemplating the faults

2.1.2.2.1.2.1.1. Extensive explanation (cont.)

2.1.2.2.1.2.1.1.1. The great purpose will be destroyed and one will be led to the lower realms

The last two lines of the earlier verse and the next verse read:

8cd. *Friends and relatives lacking permanence
Destroy even the eternal Dharma.*

9. *If one acts on the same level as the childish
One will definitely go to the lower realms.
If they lead one to unequal fortune
What is reliance on the childish supposed to accomplish?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Friends and relatives, who are without permanence in that one will quickly be separated from them, destroy and degenerate even eternal liberation and the method for achieving it, i.e. the holy Dharma. If one acts on the same level as the childish then one will definitely go to the lower realms.

If one is led by the childish to a place unequal to the fortune of superior beings and deprived of the presently obtained human body that we have now, then what is supposed to be accomplished by relying on ordinary individuals? One will not achieve one's wishes, and that which one does not wish for will increase.

While the explanation is quite clear, what we should reflect upon as the essential point - friends and relations who are without permanence in that one will quickly be separated from them - is that whatever relationships we have with others are in the nature of impermanence. If we have this understanding from the very outset then, when separation does take place, it will help to release one from great agony. With a lack of this understanding at the beginning, and if one has very strong attachment, then one will grasp and strongly hold onto the object of attachment. The stronger the attachment one has to the object, the more it taints one's perception and thus one sees it as permanent and long lasting. Thus when the situation changes from either side, it can cause great mental agony. Inevitably change will occur and if one is not able to accept it then it causes great pain in one's mind.

Of course we rely on relationships, especially when we live with others, but the main point is to be mindful of impermanence, which will help to reduce strong attachment and clinging to relationships. In fact, we need to integrate an understanding of impermanence in to everything we engage in. To the extent that we lack the understanding of impermanence, the stronger the attachment and grasping to that object will be.

An understanding of subtle impermanence definitely helps to overcome attachment, but even recognising the grosser levels of impermanence, such as the obvious changes that lead up to death, will definitely reduce strong attachment. The more we reflect on this reality, the less we cling and grasp to the meaningless affairs of this life. Our strong preoccupation with worldly affairs will naturally reduce to the extent that we overcome our grasping to them. Then happiness will naturally occur in one's mind. Even if one says, 'I don't wish for happiness', happiness will naturally occur. The shortcomings being presented here are the faults of attachment, and if one does not overcome attachment, there is no way one can develop renunciation.

It is important to develop renunciation as it is the first of the three principles of the path. The reason it is presented as one of the principles of the path is that without developing renunciation one cannot possibly develop disenchantment to samsaric pleasures. Bodhicitta is the second principle of the path because without developing it one cannot possibly obtain enlightenment. Whatever virtues we accumulate, without bodhicitta they cannot become causes for enlightenment, so virtuous actions need to be held with bodhicitta. The wisdom realising emptiness is the third principle of the path, because without it one cannot possibly overcome the grasping to the self. This is how we need to understand overcoming attachment and developing renunciation in the context of the principles of the path.

The commentary explains that if one holds onto attachment to friends and relatives it will destroy and degenerate even eternal liberation and the method for achieving it, i.e. the holy Dharma. Here 'eternal' refers to the unceasing state of happiness experienced when one obtains liberation. This is destroyed if one acts on the same level as the childish, and if one does that, then one will definitely go to lower realms.

I have conveyed the significant points presented here in previous teachings over and over again, specifically how we must be careful not to be misled by negative friends and act like them. What is called 'childish' here refers to those who have no qualms about engaging in negativities, and so if we follow their example we'll destroy our own potential to obtain liberation, and bring ourselves to the lower realms. An example of childish would be if others engage in a negativity such as killing and we think that is fine, and engage in the same behaviour. That is how the negativity of killing is transferred to us. Likewise if others engage in sexual misconduct and we follow that example it destroys our own virtues and we create negativity. These are significant points that Shantideva points out, and of course we can relate it to the other negativities as well.

While we may destroy and degenerate even eternal liberation, ultimately failing to gain the wisdom realising emptiness can also be explained in relation to renunciation. If we do not develop renunciation, and are attached to engaging in the activities of the childish, we become influenced by those negative friends. So we need to be mindful of not associating with negative friends, while maintaining compassion for them. Shantideva clearly explains later on that not associating with negative friends is about protecting oneself so that one is not influenced by negativities. That doesn't mean one does not hold them in compassion, of course one does, but at the same time being mindful not to be influenced by their example.

The commentary states, If one is led by the childish to a place unequal to the fortune of superior beings and presently obtained a human body, which means that when one is influenced by one's association with those who engage in childish activities (negative friends), then this destroys one's own virtues, and leads one to a place that does not have the fortune of superior beings. Superior beings can refer to actual arya beings, but it can also refer to holy beings. The Tibetan term kyiwo-dampa (which can be translated as 'holy being' or 'noble being') is defined in the Abhidharma as beings who are engaged in pure and virtuous conduct and shun negativities.

As explained in the Abhidharma there are four types of aryas or holy beings: 1) one who is content with poor clothing 2) one who is content with meagre alms 3) one who is content with a poor dwelling and 4) one who takes joy in ascetic practices. Being led to a place which is unequal to the fortune of superior beings means that following the childish and engaging in non-virtues deprives one of opportunity to engage in virtue; perpetually engaging in non-virtue is exactly the opposite to having the fortune of a superior being.

Likewise, presently obtained a human body that we have now, means one will be led to a place where one does not have the opportunity that we have with our presently obtained body. Again, one cannot completely avoid associating with others, and in certain circumstances one may have to be with relatives, friends etc., but if any of these people engage in childish or negative behaviours we need to be mindful not to be influenced by them. We need to use our own intelligence and wisdom to distinguish between what is proper behaviour and what is improper behaviour. So when one is associating with others, even if one has to be with those who are engaging in immoral behaviours, one immediately needs to be able to hold the dignity of virtue in one's mind and be composed, and not allow oneself to follow their example. This is the main point to derive from the instruction.

The commentary further explains then what is supposed to be accomplished by relying on ordinary individuals, which implies that one cannot accomplish anything by relying on ordinary individuals, and so one will not ultimately achieve one's wishes. Conversely, what one does not wish for will increase. These are the negative consequences.

If one were to take these lines literally in a worldly sense, one might think, 'so, it is good to achieve whatever one wishes for'. However the wishes referred to here are not worldly wishes but rather virtuous wishes, those that relate to the Dharma, such as liberation, enlightenment, opportunity to engage in accumulating virtues and merit. Those are the wishes being presented here. One has to understand these meanings to relate to virtues etc. because of the type of advice being presented here. The advice presented here is related to Dharma practice, and in many cases exclusively to a monk's practice. So it is important to understand and relate the advice and instructions given in the text to its proper context. However a lot of the explanations are also very practical and useful to apply by anyone in their daily life. I have presented many of these points previously, so here I am being backed up by Shantideva.

2.1.2.2.1.2.1.2. Childish friends are unreliable and they are difficult to count upon

This topic is something you can relate to your own experiences in life. There are many who might say 'Oh I cannot relate with that person, it is very difficult to rely on them' but in saying that, one is already in a committed relationship with them. Prior to engaging in the relationship one may not have taken this attribute into consideration, so once one is in a relationship with them, it is almost too late to complain that they are difficult to rely upon.

The verses read:

10. *In one instant they become friends
But in a mere moment they also turn into enemies.
As they become angry at that which is likeable
Ordinary individuals are difficult to please.*
11. *If one says something beneficial, they become angry
They will even reverse one from the beneficial,
If one does not listen to their words
They will go to the lower realms due to anger.*

The commentary explains:

As their mental continuum is unstable, they become friends in an instant but in the mere moment it takes to say some bad words they become enemies again.

As they become angry if one brings them into contact with virtue, which is likeable, ordinary individuals are difficult to please. Not only do they become angry if one says something beneficial, in many ways, they will also turn oneself away from the beneficial cause that is virtue. If one does not listen to their words, they become angry and go to the lower realms.

The commentary states that, their mental continuum is unstable, highlighting the need to understand the importance of having a stable mind. When one's mind is unstable it is vulnerable to all the faults presented here. There are so many stories I could also share about this. What is being presented here is that people become friends, but in the instant it takes to say some bad words they become enemies. This is really very true. We can see there are many examples where someone who is supposed to be a very close friend can in an instant turn around and take a person's life. Instances like this have occurred.

These points are actually quite clear, but one should reflect on their significance. For example, the first point reflects upon how just a few words can change the sentiments within oneself or others, even strangers. But sometimes even with strangers, just a few unpleasant words can create a very hostile situation. There are many instances like that which we can reflect upon. The attribute of being childish refers to those who, if you try to connect them with virtue, and things which are actually useful and meaningful for them, become angry and do not appreciate your actions. In this way we see that ordinary beings are very difficult to please. We can also see that by befriending childish, ordinary beings one can easily be misled. There are many instances of someone who is known to be a good Dharma practitioner but because of the influence of their associates they later start to go astray and not practise the Dharma. It is in this way that we can see the disadvantages of befriending the childish.

Furthermore, not only do they become angry if one says something beneficial, in many ways, they will also turn oneself away from the beneficial cause that is virtue. This refers to the fact that it is one thing not being able to benefit them, but in fact associating with childish or negative friends can lead you into engaging in non-virtuous deeds and so turn you away from what has been beneficial. We can see in normal relationships that, if one does not listen to their words, they become angry and go to the lower realms, which occurs all too often. When you try to explain something using nice words, sometimes they don't listen, and at other times they get angry. If they get angry they are creating the causes to go to the lower realms themselves, but it is in the interaction with oneself that this happens. It is in this way that one should contemplate on the faults.

As one of the great Tibetan Masters Padampa Sangye said:

