15 February 2005

I'm very happy to start the year again with the Study Group. You are all familiar with the rules of the Study Group - it is a group where one has to study. For example, if one lives in Australia one has to follow the rules that govern Australia!

It is very fortunate to have the Study Group, and being able to study the text Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life by the great Shantideva is also very fortunate.

Shantideva is a very special being who has generated bodhicitta. Just hearing or remembering his name purifies non-virtuous karmas.

If one asks which of the three baskets of teachings does the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life belong to, the answer is that it belongs to the sutra basket. Even though in general it covers all three baskets of teachings, it falls into the sutra basket, because it primarily concerns itself with the sutra basket of teachings.

We can always recognise the class to which a teaching belongs by looking at the homage. As we have said before, if the homage is to Manjushri then it falls into the abhidharma class of teachings, and if it is homage to the buddhas and bodhisattvas then it is a teaching that falls into the sutra class of teachings.

We should understand well that the teachings of the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life have to be preceded by meditations that are common to the small and medium-capable being. It falls within the framework of the graduated path to enlightenment where the teachings concerning the Mahayana practices have to be preceded by meditation on the practices common to the small and medium-capable being.

The motivation of the Mahayana practices is the motivation of bodhicitta. The practices of the Mahayana being of great capacity are the six perfections.

OUTLINE OF THE TEXT

Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life is comprised of ten chapters.

1. The first chapter shows the benefits of bodhicitta. Why? Because by becoming aware of the benefits of bodhicitta then one is motivated to generate bodhicitta.

2. Just as one would first clean one's house if one were to invite the Wheel-Turning King to one's home, one first purifies the mind of negativities through confession before generating bodhicitta in one's mind. That is why the second chapter is called the chapter of confessing negativities.

3. After having confessed negativities and accumulated merits the third chapter deals with taking the mind of bodhicitta. This chapter also deals with the auxiliary limbs of the meditations common to the small and medium-capable being

The second and third chapter go through each of the seven limbs of practice such as taking refuge, offering prostrations, making offerings, confessing with the four powers, asking the buddhas to remain and teach the Dharma, rejoicing, dedication and so forth.

One generates bodhicitta after going for refuge, offering prostrations, making offerings, confessing, rejoicing, asking the buddhas to remain and teach the Dharma, and then dedication. Then after doing each of these practices one generates bodhicitta. So one has all the practices there in the opening chapters.

4. After having generated bodhicitta one needs to look after it so that it doesn't degenerate. For that conscientiousness is needed, which is why the fourth chapter is the chapter on conscientiousness.

The next six chapters deal with the way the six perfections are practised.

5. The perfection of morality comes in the fifth chapter which shows how one practises morality with mindfulness and awareness.

6 - 9. The sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth chapters deal respectively with the perfections of patience, enthusiasm, mental stabilisation and wisdom.

10. The tenth chapter explains how to practise the perfection of generosity. It is the chapter that deals with the dedication of virtues, and it shows how one dedicates one's possessions, one's merits and one's body to others.

THE NINTH CHAPTER: WISDOM

The ninth chapter is the chapter that deals with the perfection of wisdom. It has two main divisions: explaining the etymology of the title and the actual meaning of the text.

A. EXPLAINING THE ETYMOLOGY OF THE TITLE

Explaining the title is done in two headings: the condensed explanation of the need to generate wisdom, and the elaborate explanation of the need to generate wisdom.

I. THE CONDENSED EXPLANATION OF THE NEED TO GENERATE WISDOM

The first verse explains the need for the generation of wisdom.

*The Able One explained all these different limbs [1]
For the purpose of wisdom;
Therefore those who wish to pacify suffering
Should generate wisdom.*

There are two different explanations of the meaning of the first line. According to one explanation 'these different limbs' refers to the eighth chapter alone - the explanation of mental stabilisation. The other explanation is that the other five perfections such as generosity, morality, patience, enthusiasm are included. We will concern ourselves only with the second possibility.

When it says all these different limbs were taught by the Able One for the purpose of wisdom, it means that the other five perfections of generosity, morality, patience, enthusiasm and mental stabilisation are the supporting limbs for the generation of wisdom. So the final aim of all these different practices is to generate wisdom.

What it shows is that if one wants to attain a state of complete enlightenment then one needs to practise a path that combines method and wisdom. One needs a path that unifies method and wisdom on the basis of the Two Truths, through meditating on the Four Noble Truths in a way that combines method and wisdom. Then one can attain the two bodies of a Buddha. That is what is implied here - the first initial five perfections act as supporting limbs for the generation of wisdom.

Therefore, those who wish to attain mere liberation for themselves alone also need to rely on the generation of wisdom. So wisdom is indispensable, regardless of whether one wants to attain complete enlightenment, or mere solitary liberation.

It is important to understand that to attain mere individual liberation one also needs to generate wisdom. One could get the idea that it is only necessary to generate wisdom if one wants to attain complete enlightenment, but that it is not necessary for the attainment of individual liberation. There are certain debates in regard to that, but these are based on a misunderstanding. One needs to generate wisdom for the attainment of both complete enlightenment and individual liberation.

The question could arise, 'In order to realise emptiness does one need to engage in the bodhisattva practices of all the six perfections?'. The answer here is, 'No, one does not need to do this, because, for example, followers of the hearer path realise emptiness'. But one needs wisdom. That is why the last two lines state explicitly, 'therefore those who wish to pacify suffering should generate wisdom'. This states explicitly that those who want to attain individual liberation also need to generate wisdom. This was also mentioned by Nagarjuna when he said,

For as long as there is grasping at the aggregates
There will also be 'I' grasping.
If there is a self-grasping there is karma
And from karma there is birth.
Their three paths are in mutual causation;
Without beginning, end or middle;
The wheel of cyclic existence turns;
Like the wheel of a firebrand;
Because it isn't obtained from self, other or both and nowhere in the three times;
The grasping at 'I' ceases;
And from that karma and birth.

This directly shows that even the followers of the lesser vehicle need to realise emptiness in order to attain individual liberation.

Why does one need to realise emptiness to liberate oneself from cyclic existence.

Student 1: Because ignorance is the root of cyclic existence.

Why do you need to realise emptiness to overcome the root of cyclic existence?

Student 1: Emptiness is the antidote to grasping at 'I' and 'mine'.

You have to explain how the antidote actually counteracts the root of cyclic existence.

Student 1: As long as there is grasping at the aggregates one continues to take rebirth.

No, no. How does the antidote counteract the root of cyclic existence?

Student 1: The wisdom realising emptiness eliminates grasping at the aggregates, which are the root of cyclic existence.

Why do you need to realise emptiness in order to overcome the true-grasping at the aggregates? When one says emptiness is needed there is a reason why that emptiness is needed.

Student 1: Because it is the exact opposite to grasping at cyclic existence

If they are the direct opposite then ...?

Student 2: It is able to demolish the false perception of things existing from their own side.

How does it eliminate the false perception?

Student 2: Because grasping is dependent upon the appearance of things appearing from their own side.

Geshe-la is asking how does the wisdom realising emptiness counteract true-grasping.

The wisdom that realises emptiness understands the non-existence of the apprehended object of true-grasping. So the grasped object of true-grasping is understood to be non-existence, and in such a way one stops the true-grasping. As I said to you previously, true-grasping cannot be removed from the mind in the same way as one pulls out a splinter from one's hand. It has to be counteracted by the counter-positive wisdom that realises the absence of the apprehended object.

The wisdom realising emptiness counteracts true-grasping by realising the non-existence of its apprehended object. By realising the non-existence of the apprehended object one counteracts the ignorance.

Antidotes such as love and so forth are mere temporary antidotes to delusions, because they don't realise the absence of the apprehended object of ignorance. For example, love is counter-positive to anger, but it does not realise the absence of the apprehended object of ignorance, and in such a way it cannot ultimately act as an antidote to afflictions. It can only be a temporary antidote to anger. However that doesn't take away any of its value - love is still very important to meditate on.

This first verse completes the first outline, the need to realise emptiness in short. This verse also shows very clearly that Nagarjuna and Shantideva are of one mind in their view as to the importance of realising emptiness. Both assert that it is essential to realise emptiness in order to attain complete enlightenment as well as individual liberation. It is good to keep in mind how these two are actually of one mind in their views.

II. THE ELABORATE EXPLANATION OF THE NEED TO GENERATE WISDOM

This has four sub-outlines:

1. Understanding the view
2. Practising it through meditation
3. Cutting off the mental fabrications of true grasping
4. The function of realising emptiness

1. Understanding the view

This heading has three sub-outlines:

- 1.1. An explanation of the Two Truths
- 1.2. Refuting different debates about the Two Truths
- 1.3. Establishing the Mahayana as supreme

1.1. AN EXPLANATION OF THE TWO TRUTHS

The conventional and the ultimate [2]

Are asserted as the Two Truths;

The ultimate is not an object engaged by awareness,

Awareness is stated to be conventional.

The first two lines show the two-fold division of the Two Truths.

The category 'objects of knowledge' is posited as the basis for the two-fold division of the Two Truths. This adds a very profound meaning to the term 'object of knowledge'. We don't just talk about Two Truths in general, but the Two Truths are actually a division of objects of knowledge.

The Two Truths are the objects that are to be known. Here Shantideva gives the term 'objects of knowledge' a more specific meaning; he is not just referring to objects of knowledge in general. The Two Truths are the objects that are to be known.

This deeper meaning of the term 'objects of knowledge' is directly related to the meaning of omniscient consciousness. Omniscient consciousness is not called 'omniscient' because it knows a great variety of objects, but because it can comprehend the Two Truths directly at the same time. This is not possible if one has not abandoned the grasping that holds the two Truths to be of a different entity.

The first two lines, 'The conventional and the ultimate are asserted as the Two Truths' also eliminates the existence of a third truth. This concurs with the explanation given in the sutras.

1.2. DEFINITION OF TWO TRUTHS

Lines three and four deal with the definition and the definiendum of conventional and ultimate truth. When it says 'the ultimate isn't an object engaged by awareness', 'the ultimate' shows the definiendum, ultimate truth; and 'isn't the object engaged by awareness' shows the definition of ultimate truth implicitly. In the last line 'awareness is stated to be conventional' the word 'awareness' shows the definiendum conventional truth, and 'is expressed to be conventional' explains the definition of conventional truth in an implicit manner.

In the first line the 'conventional' refers to the person and the aggregates, and the 'ultimate' refers to the lack of true existence of the person and the lack of true existence of the aggregates. Those two are asserted as the Two Truths.

So this first line shows that there are the Two Truths, which cuts off the existence of a third truth. The last two lines show the definition of the Two Truths as well as the two definiendums.

You probably have the definition of the Two Truths readily lying on your tongue now.

Definitions of conventional and ultimate truth

According to Introduction to the Middle Way

What it gives here very briefly as the definition, i.e. it isn't the engaged object of awareness, seems to be different from the definition that we learnt in Introduction to the Middle Way. There it said that the meaning found by a valid cogniser engaged in nominal analysis, as well as being a nominal cogniser with regard to the found meaning, is the definition of conventional truth.

The meaning found by a valid cogniser engaged in ultimate analysis which becomes an valid cogniser engaged in ultimate analysis with regard to that object is the definition of ultimate truth. The definition that is given here is a little bit different but in meaning they are the same.

According to Introduction to the Bodhisattva's way of Life

Out of this third line a very popular misunderstanding arises where one says, 'Oh, emptiness is an object that is beyond comprehension, because it says here, similarly to the sutras, that the ultimate is not an engaged object of awareness'. It is very easy to misinterpret that statement and think, 'Oh that means that emptiness is simply beyond any type of understanding'. But that is obviously not correct, because we have the wisdom that realises emptiness, and the wisdom that realises emptiness is a type of awareness. So obviously emptiness is an object that is engaged by a certain type of awareness.

The meaning of this third line is that the ultimate is not an object that can be directly engaged by dualistic awareness. So the ultimate is never an object that could be directly engaged by a dualistic awareness. In other words one can say it is not an object that can be directly engaged by a mistaken awareness, which comes to the same thing.

The explicit statement the ultimate is not an object that is directly engaged by a dualistic awareness implicitly gives us the definition of ultimate truth, as that which is realised in a non-dualistic manner by the direct valid cogniser that realises it directly. Thus the definition of ultimate truth that is given here is the same definition that is used by the Svatantrika-Madhyamaka - that which is realised in a non-dualistic manner by direct valid cognition that realises it directly. That is the definition of ultimate truth - whatever is realised in a non-dual manner by direct valid cognition realising it directly is ultimate truth. That is implicitly asserted here by stating the ultimate is not an object that can be directly engaged or directly realised by dualistic awareness.

Similarly that which is realised in a dualistic manner by a direct valid cogniser realising it directly is the definition of conventional truth, which is shown in the fourth line.

This definition is according to the Sutra of the Meeting of the Father and Son. In this sutra one difference between the positing of the definition in the Introduction to the Middle Way and here in the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, is that in the Introduction to the Middle Way the definition of the Two Truths is posited without making any specific distinction between conceptual and non-conceptual awareness. Here it specifically ties the definition to non-conceptual awareness, [which is also why 'intellect' is actually not a good translation].

Please generate a good motivation for listening to the teachings, thinking, 'I have to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. In order to do that, I am now going to listen to this profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'. Having some motivation to precede listening to the teachings benefits our practice.

2. THE ELABORATE EXPLANATION OF THE NEED TO GENERATE WISDOM

2.1. Understanding the view

This heading has three sub-outlines:

2.1.1.1. An explanation of the two truths

2.1.1.2. Definition of the two truths

2.1.1.3 Characteristics of the person who has understood the two truths

2.1.1.2. DEFINITION OF THE TWO TRUTHS

With regard to the definition of the two truths there is a slight difference in the way the definition is posited here, compared with the Introduction to the Middle Way. Even though the meaning is ultimately the same, it looks different, and is done so for different purpose.

2.1.1.3 CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERSON WHO HAS UNDERSTOOD THE TWO TRUTHS

Regarding this, two aspects of transitory being are seen, [3]

Yogis and ordinary beings.

The ordinary transitory being

Is harmed by the yogic transitory being,

And yogis are harmed as well through distinctions [4ab]

Of awareness by the one above.

There are two types of beings - the yogi and the ordinary being. The ordinary being is harmed by the yogi, and the yogi is also harmed by higher yogis through distinctions of awareness.

The point of reference of 'regarding this' is the person. 'Transitory being' actually conveys the definition of person. So when it says 'regarding this, two aspects of transitory beings are seen', transitory being is actually given as the definition of the point of reference, which is the person. Even 'transitory being' does not really convey the complete meaning of the Tibetan word, which is comprised of two syllables - transitory and dependent. Transitory and dependent is given as a definition of the point of reference - the person. Why? Because first of all the person changes momentarily and that's why 'transitory' is used. It is dependent because the person is the 'I' labelled in dependence on the aggregates.

After having given the definition of person, it says that there are two aspects or types of person, the yogi and the ordinary being.

A yogi is a person who possesses the special union of calm abiding and special insight focussing on emptiness in their mental continuum, which would make that yogi a Madhyamaka. Ordinary being refers to Realists and so forth, who assert true existence.

The ordinary transitory being

Is harmed by the yogic transitory being,

The next two lines basically say that the yogi harms the ordinary transitory being. What this means is that the view of the ordinary transitory being is harmed by the Madhyamaka yogi. The view of the ordinary transitory being asserts true existence and inherent existence, which is the view harmed by the Madhyamaka yogi with different reasonings. For example, the reasoning of one and many, that things are never truly existent one or many. Or they may use the reasoning of dependent arising and so forth, using such syllogisms as: take the subject sprout - it lacks true existence - because it is a dependent arising. This kind of reasoning harms the view that asserts true existence.

Here one shouldn't confuse the lack of inherent existence with a lack of existence. Just because an object does not exist inherently does not mean that it also doesn't exist at all. Lacking inherent existence does not preclude existence. The meaning that we should contemplate is that objects are dependent arisings. Objects arise in dependence on causes and conditions and therefore lack this independent nature, i.e. lack being independent from causes and conditions. Objects exist interdependently. Interdependent existence means that objects lack the independence that exists independently of causes and conditions. That is what is not there. What is there is that objects exist in dependence on the accumulation of causes and conditions.

And yogis are harmed as well through distinctions

Of awareness by the one above.

Here the word 'harm' has a more figurative meaning, while the word 'harm' in the context of the fourth line has a more literal meaning. The reasoning of the Madhyamaka yogi harms the wrong views of the Realists in the same way as a valid eye-consciousness harms the perception of a white conch shell as yellow. If one had a perception of the white conch shell as yellow, but then regained proper sight, seeing that the conch shell was actually white, then that harms the perception of the white conch shell as yellow. In this context the harm is really meant in a literal sense.

But in the sixth line the harm is more figurative. It means more to outshine. First of all, yogis harm ordinary worldly beings, the Realists, but then the lower yogis are harmed by the higher yogis. Secondly it means that the higher yogis outshine the lower yogis. Because they are higher, they outshine the lower yogis, which is the more figurative meaning of the word 'harm' used here.

According to Gyaltsab Rinpoche's commentary, if it is seen from the point view of bodhisattvas of a different continuum, it is meant figuratively. The high yogis outshine the lower yogis because of the greater power of their mind and so forth.

It can also be looked at from the point of view of just one person, who moves from being a lower yogi to being a high yogi. From that point of view it becomes more literal because the higher realisation does do away with the lower realisation, and its associated faults. For example the path of seeing is not able to harm the seeds of the innate true-grasping; for that the path of meditation is needed. If we think about what is actually harming true grasping, then it can only be the wisdom realising emptiness.

If you really think about how the wisdom realising emptiness harms true grasping, then we can relate it very nicely to our Dharma practice. Contemplating how one can counteract the different delusions, how the wisdom realising emptiness counteracts true-grasping, and thinking about the mechanics behind the whole process is very useful for one's practice. Applying that to one's mind is very useful.

The point of all that was mentioned above is to show that if the wisdom that understands ultimate truth can not even be harmed by the wisdom understanding conventional truth, then there is no need to mention that it would be harmed by the grasping at partless particles. It also shows that the wisdom understanding ultimate truth on the other hand can harm all extreme views.

The higher views always harm the lower views. For example the Sautrantika and the Vaibhashika assert the existence of partless particles, and objects that are an accumulation of partless particles. The Mind Only assert phenomena that exist truly. The Svatantrika-Madhyamaka assert inherent existence. So the reasoning of the Mind Only refutes the point of view of the Sautrantika and the Vaibhashika, i.e. the existence of partless particles. The reasoning of the Svatantrika-Madhyamaka refutes the assertion of true existence by the Mind Only. The reasoning of the Prasangika refutes the assertion of inherent existence by the Svatantrika-Madhyamaka. In such a way, the lower tenets are always refuted by the superseding tenets.

2.1.2. REFUTING OBJECTIONS

2.1.2.1. Refuting objections of the Realists in general

2.1.2.2. Refuting objections by Mind Only

2.1.2.1. REFUTING OBJECTIONS OF THE REALISTS IN GENERAL

Here the worldly beings are the beings whose view is common to the Realists. This point is comprised of six lines.

*Through examples asserted by both, [4cd]
And because of no investigation towards a result.*

*Transitory beings see objects and [5]
Believe them to exist perfectly,
Not like an illusion; therefore here
The yogi and the transitory being disagree.*

The Realists reply to the reasoning of the Madhyamaka yogi, 'My dear Madhyamaka, your reasoning doesn't harm us in the least, because you don't have any valid reasoning that could establish the lack of true existence'.

Here the Madhyamaka will say, 'Reason not established, there is a valid reasoning with which one can prove the lack of true existence'. The way the Madhyamaka does this is by way of examples that are accepted by the Realists as well as the Madhyamaka, such as the example of the illusion, the dream and so forth. With these examples the Madhyamaka can establish the lack of true existence to the Realists. The Madhyamaka reply is, 'There exists a valid concordant example for both our systems, and that's why I can prove the lack of true existence'.

As you may recall, if there is a discrepancy between appearance and existence, then that object is false. If appearance and existence are concordant, then that object is true.

What the line 'And because of no investigation towards a result' means is, 'You Realists say that objects exist truly. If so then there is no point in practising the six perfections of generosity and so forth in order to attain the result of a complete Buddha, because everything exists truly and inherently'. This line states an argument by the Madhyamaka, 'According to you there is no point in practising generosity and the six perfections because in order to attain the result of a buddha, because everything exists inherently.'

The Madhyamaka says, 'Even though there is a lack of true existence, there is no problem with practising the six perfections in order to obtain the state or the result of enlightenment. Even though the practice of the six perfections and the state of enlightenment are not found at the time of analysis, they exist nominally and are practised nominally'.

*Transitory beings see objects and
Believe them to exist perfectly,
Not like an illusion; therefore here*

The yogi and the transitory being disagree. Both kinds of transitory beings see different objects, such as a fire and so forth, but the difference is that the ordinary transitory being accepts these objects to be a perfect meaning, i.e. existing truly, existing perfectly, existing inherently. They don't accept them to be like an illusion, and that's why yogis and Realists disagree here.

Review

What is the basis of the division of the two truths?

Student: Objects of knowledge.

What is the meaning of objects of knowledge?

Student: Objects perceived by a valid cognisor.

If you give the definition, then give the actual one. An object of knowledge is an object that is suitable to be made an object of awareness.

What is purpose of saying that the object of knowledge has a two-fold division of the two truths, and not just saying that first we have objects of knowledge and then we have the two truths. What is the purpose of saying that objects of knowledge is the basis of division for the two truths?

Student: It's to point out that the Buddha's omniscient mind can see both conventional and ultimate truth at the same time.

That was more the explanation of why the Buddha's consciousness is referred to 'omniscient consciousness', which is directly linked to the two-fold division of ultimate truth and conventional truth. Here we are talking more about the object of knowledge. Objects of knowledge are the basis for the division of the two truths, because the two truths are the objects to be known. When it says objects of knowledge, it gives a meaning to the etymology of objects of knowledge. Objects of knowledge are given as the basis for the division of the two truths, because the two truths are the objects to be known.

What are the two truths?

Student: Conventional and ultimate.

If it exists, is it necessarily either of those two? Is there pervasion that if it exists that it is either of those two?

Student: Yes.

Then what about the subject 'the two truths'?

Student: The subject 'two truths' is conventional truth.

That was a very good answer. [Laughter]

If there are no more than two truths, then what happened to the Four Truths? Geshe-la explained it at the beginning of the class, but I think I forgot to translate that one. The truth of cessation falls into ultimate truth, and the other three truths fall into conventional truth. Geshe-la asks what happens to the Four Truths if two truths are supposed to be enough.

First let's posit the four noble truths.

Students: Suffering, cause, cessation and path.

Is the noble truth of suffering a conventional truth or an ultimate truth?

Students: Conventional.

The origin of suffering?

Students: Conventional.

The truth of the path?

Students: Conventional.

And cessation?

Students: Ultimate.

The Four Noble Truths are contained within the two truths, which is good to know. If somebody were to say that because of the Four Noble Truths there are more than two truths, then the answer would be that there is no pervasion. It is good to train in these types of argument to develop your understanding.

Is the conventional truth true or false?

Students: False.

Is ultimate truth false or true?

Students: True.

What is the meaning of true and false?

Student: If it is false there is a discrepancy between appearance and existence

What is the meaning of true?

Student: There is no discrepancy.

So that appearance and existence are concordant.

[Geshe-la holds up a paper serviette]

Is that paper serviette conventional truth or ultimate truth?

Students: Conventional truth.

Is there a discrepancy between appearance and existence?

Students: Yes.

What is the discrepancy between appearance and existence, because it appears as a serviette, and it is a serviette?

Student: It appears to be inherently existing white paper.

Why does it appear to exist from its own side?

Student: We haven't overcome the cognitive afflictions that make it appear from its own side. We haven't reached omniscience and therefore things appear from their own side.

First of all there is not really a pervasion to your argument, because the bodhisattva on the final uninterrupted path has not abandoned the obscuration to knowledge, and things do not have the appearance of true existence to such a bodhisattva.

The reason that the object appears intrinsically is because it doesn't really appear as if it is posited by the mind, but it appears as if it exists from its own side.

One has to know the mode in which an object appears as truly existing. Of course one can say it appears as existing truly because one hasn't abandoned this or that, but it is also good to know the mode. For example saying, 'Oh it appears as truly existing because...', and then giving the mode of how it appears, e.g. 'It appears as truly existing because it appears as if it exists from its own side and not posited by the mind'.

The serviette is false, because it appears as if it exists from its own side, even though it actually is posited by the mind. The lack of the existence of the paper from its own side is its ultimate truth. Why is that true? The serviette itself has a discrepancy between appearance and existence and that's why it is false. But the emptiness of the serviette is true, because there is no discrepancy between appearance and existence. Why is it that there is no discrepancy between appearance and the existence of the emptiness of the serviette?

Student: Because it is its true mode of existence, it doesn't exist from its own side.

Geshe-la's question is why is the emptiness of the object true? Why is there no discrepancy between appearance and existence of the emptiness of the object?

Student: Because the emptiness doesn't exist from its own side? The appearance and the existence of the object are the same.

Another student: To the wisdom of emptiness there is no discrepancy between the appearance and the existence.

Does the wisdom realising emptiness not possess true appearance? How does one define whether an object exists the way it appears or whether it doesn't exist the way it appears? That is always decided by its existence relative to its main object possessor. For example, the main object possessors of outer objects such as different forms and so forth are the five sense consciousnesses. If an object doesn't exist the way it appears to its main object possessor, then there is a discrepancy between appearance and existence, and the object doesn't exist in the way it appears to exist. Since one can say the main object possessor of emptiness is the wisdom realising emptiness directly, then one can say that emptiness is true, because emptiness appears to the wisdom realising emptiness in exactly the way it exists. But there are different types of wisdom realising emptiness that have the appearance of true existence, such as the inferential cogniser realising emptiness.

The serviette doesn't exist the way it appears. Why? Because it doesn't exist as it appears to its main object possessor, the eye-consciousness. The serviette, for example, exists in the way it appears to omniscient consciousness. Just because the serviette exists in the way it appears to omniscient consciousness, doesn't mean to say that the serviette exists in the way that it appears to exist.

Establish a virtuous motivation thinking, 'I have to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. In order to do so I am going to listen to this profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice well.

It is important to generate a virtuous motivation, and it is also important to generate the wisdom that can discriminate right actions from wrong actions. With the wisdom that distinguishes right from wrong one is able to purify wrong actions; so one needs to develop this wisdom. It is like having a discussion with oneself about what is the right thing to do and what is the wrong thing to do, and then following that wisdom. By identifying wrong actions then one can also direct the mind to right actions. That is very important.

2.1.2.1. REFUTING THE REALISTS IN GENERAL

Here we have two sub outlines:

2.1.2.1.1. Refuting that one's position is contradicted by direct perception

2.1.2.1.2. Refuting that one's position is contradicted by sutras

2.1.2.1.1. Refuting that one's position is contradicted by direct perception

Forms and so forth, those merely perceived directly [6ab]

Through renown, and not by valid cognition.

First of all it is important to understand the view of the Sautrantika school. Realists in general are called that because they assert objects to exist truly. A more literal way of translating the Tibetan word Realist is 'those who assert objects'. They are called Realists because they assert objects to exist truly.

Secondly, you probably remember from the Tenets that for the Sautrantika conventional truth, objects that lack true existence, and generally characterised phenomena are synonymous, and that truly existent phenomena, ultimate truth and self-characterised phenomena are synonymous. Also, the Sautrantika assert that all phenomena exist inherently. So according to them it is not possible to assert an object that does not exist from its own side. For them, if an object exists it has to exist from its own side. This is important to keep in mind.

The Sautrantika argue that the objects of the five senses, which are forms and so forth, could not be objects of direct perception if they were to lack inherent existence.

The idea is that if forms and so forth were to lack existence from their own side, i.e. if they were to lack inherent existence, then they could not become the objects of direct perception. Why? Because according to them direct perceptions have to be direct perceptions with regard to the intrinsic nature of the object that they perceive. Hence, if there is no intrinsic nature then the direct perception could not become a direct perception with regard to that object. That is where they are coming from.

According to the Prasangika there is no such fault that if objects such as form and so forth were to lack intrinsic existence then they could not become the object of direct perception. This is because forms and so forth are only objects established nominally, through renown, and are the objects of conventional direct perception. And conventional direct perceptions don't become valid cognitions with regard to the ultimate nature of these forms. Forms and so forth, while objects of direct perception, are only a nominal phenomenon that cannot be found at the time of analysis. So these direct perceptions don't become valid cognitions with regard to the final or ultimate nature of these objects.

Conventional direct perceptions don't become valid cognisers engaged in ultimate analysis realising the ultimate nature of forms and so forth. They are only nominal valid cognisers which realise the object that cannot be found at the time of analysis. That is why there is no fault.

As an answer to the same point there is a quote in the King of Concentration Sutra where it says, 'Likewise eyes, ears, and nose are not valid cognitions'. As we have said before this means that the valid cognition that understands them does not understand their ultimate nature, and is only a nominal valid cognition.

In answer to the same point Introduction to the Middle Way says:

*If worldly perceptions are valid cognisers, [6.30]
Since transitory beings see suchness, what need
For other arya, through the arya path?*

What this means is if the nominal cognitions of ordinary beings realised the intrinsic nature of the object then they would become ultimate valid cognisers. They would become realisers of suchness. Then there would be no need for arya beings any more because every ordinary being would see suchness directly.

The difference between an arya or superior being, and an ordinary individual is posited as realising emptiness directly. A person who realises emptiness directly is regarded as a superior being, and a person who doesn't see emptiness directly is regarded as an ordinary individual. Hence, if ordinary individuals were to see emptiness directly then there would be no need for superior beings.

The Realists make this further point. They say that if everything exists only nominally, and since objects are renowned as existing from their own side amongst ordinary transitory beings, then they should actually exist from their own side.

The answer is given in the next two lines which read:

*False, like impurity and so forth [6cd]
Are renowned as purity and so forth.*

The answer is that even though objects are renowned as existing inherently that doesn't mean that they have to exist inherently. For example, for ordinary beings the contaminated aggregates are objects that are renowned to be pure, happiness, permanent, and possessing a self, even though in reality they are objects that are impure, suffering and misery, impermanent, and lacking self.

Objects that in nature are impure, misery, impermanent and lacking a self, specifically the contaminated aggregates, are renowned by ordinary worldly beings to be pure, to be happiness, to be permanent and to possess a self. That is, the popular perception amongst sentient beings is actually the opposite of the truth. Objects are false in this way, and likewise they are also false in the other way. They are renowned for possessing an intrinsic nature but actually lack that intrinsic nature. But that is not a problem because even though phenomena are false like an illusion, they still exist nominally.

2.1.2.1. Refuting the Sautrantika

2.1.2.1.2. Refuting that one's position is contradicted by sutras

2.1.2.1.2.1. Establishing those sutras to be interpretive

2.1.2.1.2.2. Refuting that one's position is contradicted by scriptural quotation

2.1.2.1.2.1. Establishing those sutras to be interpretive

For the purpose of introducing transitory beings [7abc]

The protector showed phenomena.

They are not momentary in suchness.

The Realists say, 'Isn't your position contradicted by the sutras, which teach that functionalities are intrinsically impermanent'. This is actually a very good point, because there are sutras that teach intrinsically impermanent functionalities. It is very good for one's own understanding if one can relate the debates to the sutras, and then identify where the different sutras are coming from. This, for example, is from the third turning of the wheel.

The answer here is that the Protector Shakyamuni Buddha in his great compassion taught intrinsically existing impermanent functionalities for the purpose of introducing different transitory beings gradually to the idea of suchness and emptiness. This is because there are some sentient beings for whom it is not suitable to be immediately shown the final nature. For them it is better to be initially shown intrinsically existing impermanent functionalities. Then slowly, slowly, by meditating and thinking about the path and the views more and more, their view becomes more and more profound and subtle. For the purpose of introducing transitory beings gradually to the concept of emptiness the Buddha taught intrinsically existent impermanent functionalities at different times. In actuality, even though functionalities are momentary, they don't exist inherently or truly.

It is good to apply this concept of a gradual approach to selflessness to one's own practice; one cannot understand subtle selflessness without first understanding coarse selflessness. It doesn't make sense to say that one can immediately jump to subtle selflessness without understanding coarse selflessness.

So rather than thinking, 'Oh, having the Buddha teaching all these different views at different times is all very confusing', one should see the actual purpose behind those teachings as being a gradual path guiding one from coarser views to more subtle views. That the Buddha taught different views actually shows the greatness of the Buddha and his qualities. Being able to teach according to the disposition and ability of different disciples is really only possible when one possesses clairvoyance.

2.1.2.1.2. Refuting that one's position is contradicted by scriptural quotation

This is covered in five outlines

2.1.2.1.2.1. Refuting that objects wouldn't even exist conventionally

2.1.2.1.2.2. Refuting that the build up of the accumulations would be invalid.

2.1.2.1.2.3. Refuting that it would be invalid to go to take rebirth

2.1.2.1.2.4. Refuting that it would be invalid to have the distinction between virtue and negativity

2.1.2.1.2.5. Refuting that it would be invalid to ascertain the difference between samsara and nirvana

2.1.2.1.2.1. Refuting that objects wouldn't even exist conventionally

This has five lines:

If said to be contradictory even with the conventional;[7d]

There is no fault because of yogi's convention [8]

It is seeing suchness according to transitory beings.

Otherwise the realisation of a woman's impurity

Would be harmed by transitory beings.

Here the Realists argue, 'Well let's not even talk about whether it would be impossible to have ultimate truth. According to your point of view it would not even be possible to have conventional truth. That is because it would not be possible for functionalities to exist in a momentary manner since the popular perception is that earlier functionalities exist later. Therefore according to you it would be impossible to have momentary functionalities'.

The answer of the Madhyamaka is, 'Even though the popular perception amongst ordinary transitory beings is that earlier functionalities also exist later, that doesn't make them permanent. It does not take away their momentariness, because these very functionalities are actually realised by certain ordinary transitory beings to be momentary. Therefore your fault does not apply. A yogi's conventional valid cogniser does realise the momentary nature of functionalities'.

To that the Realists reply, 'Well, then there is really no need to realise suchness if this yogi's realisation of these four aspects of impurity, impermanence and so forth already realises the nature of the object'.

The answer is that relative to the ordinary being's view that phenomena are pure, happiness, permanent and possess a self one can say that the realisation of the impure, miserable, impermanent selfless nature of the object is the realisation of the actual nature of the object. That does not mean that one has literally realised the actual nature of the object in an ultimate sense. One says one has realised the actual nature of the object when one realises the impure, miserable, impermanent and selfless nature of the object, relative to this misconception of grasping at the object as a pure, happy, permanent and possessing a self. But that does not mean that one has not realised the final nature of the object in an ultimate sense.

When the verse says 'otherwise' that means that if a popular perception were to be valid just because of being a popular perception, then the realisation of impurity would be harmed by transitory beings. The female yogi meditates on the impurity of the man's body, and the male yogi meditates on the impurity of the female's body.

The reason for meditating on the impurity of the other person's body is because there is a popular perception of the body as pure. Through meditating on the impurity one ascertains the impurity of the other's body. That realisation would be harmed by the more popular perception of the body as being pure. If a perception were to become valid just by being a popular perception, or consensus, then that is what would happen. But a yogi can actually ascertain the impurity of the body, and as Nagarjuna says, 'If one wants to know the impure nature of the other person's body the only thing that one needs to do is to look into one's own body'.

If just being popular makes that perception a valid perception, then it would become a valid perception just because of the consensus. In that case the meditation on impurity would be contradicted by the popular perception of the body as pure.

2.1.2.1.2.2. Refuting that the build up of the accumulations would be invalid

Merits from the illusory like conqueror [9ab]
Equal the ones from a truly existent.

Here the Realists argue, 'Well if there is no intrinsic existence then it would be impossible to build up the two accumulations.'

The Madhyamaka reply, 'If one can accumulate merits by making truly existent offerings to a truly existent Conqueror, then I can also accumulate merits by making offerings to an illusory Conqueror'.

The Conqueror is like an illusion but he taught true existence, because for some it enhances their practice of virtue. By believing in a truly existent Conqueror they make offerings to that Conqueror and accumulate merits in this way. Then Shantideva says here, 'I accumulate merits likewise by making offerings to an illusory Conqueror lacking true existence'.

These two lines refer to the merits that arise from making offerings to an illusory Conqueror. These boundless merits equal the boundless merits that are made towards a Conqueror who is believed to exist truly.

In the second line 'he is truly existent' means that the merits attained from making offerings to an illusory Buddha equal the merits made to a Conqueror who is believed to exist truly.

2.1.2.1.2.3. Refuting that it would be invalid to take rebirth

If sentient beings are like an illusion [9cd]
Then how can they be reborn after death?

These two lines are the objection offered by the Realists. If sentient beings are like an illusion, then how could they be reborn? An illusion does not continue after its disintegration.

For as long as the conditions come together [10ab]
For that long even the illusion exists.

The Madhyamaka say, 'For as long as conditions come together objects arise that are like an illusion. If an illusion lasts for as long as the collection of its conditions then why shouldn't a sentient being?'

Sentient beings exist because of the accumulation of karma and afflictions, and because of the aggregation of karma and afflictions. For as long as there is this aggregation of karma and afflictions sentient beings will exist. For example, an illusion exists for as long as the conditions for it to arise exist.

At this point it is good to remind oneself of how one takes rebirth in cyclic existence.

1. Initially there is the root cause of ignorance.
2. Because of ignorance one accumulates projecting karma.
3. This projecting karma fades away and its potential is placed on the mind stream. So we have the third link of consciousness.
4. At the time of death the potential of that projecting karma that has been placed on the consciousness is ripened.

5. As one goes through the process one realises more and more that one has to give up the aggregates. As the mind starts to withdraw from the body strong craving is generated in the mind.

6. Because of the concern over losing one's body this craving intensifies into grasping and one then grasps for the particular type of future life.

7. Then comes the establishing karma, the link of becoming or existence.

8. When that happens then one takes rebirth in a rebirth that was projected by the karma.

The first link and the seventh and eighth links¹ are mental afflictions and the second and the ninth links are karma.

Just because of a long continuity [10cd]
Sentient beings are truly existent?

The Realists argue that because sentient beings have a much longer continuity than an illusion they are truly existent.

Shantideva then says, 'Well, you cannot really base true existence on the length of time that an object exists, because illusions, dreams and so forth exist for different lengths of time. You would have to say that long dreams exist truly while short dreams do not exist truly. Likewise your assertion basing whether something exists truly or not on the length of time that it exists is not really valid'.

In short one can sum up by saying that regardless of whether something exists for a brief amount of time or whether it exists for a long amount of time it still always will be a false illusory-like phenomenon.

Please generate a good motivation, thinking 'I have to attain enlightenment to achieve the welfare of all sentient beings, and in order to achieve this aim I am now going to listen to this profound teaching. Then I am going to put it into practice'.

2.1.2.1.2.2. Refuting that one's position is contradicted by scriptural quotation

Here there are five sub-outlines, and last time we completed the objection that illusory-like sentient beings cannot take rebirth.

2.1.2.1.2.2.4. Refuting that it would be invalid to have a distinction between virtue and negativity

The Realists argue that good and bad would not be possible if sentient beings are only like an illusion.

Here we have ten lines:

The killing and so forth of an illusory being [11]
Does not contain negativity because there is no mind.

Relative to those endowed with an illusory mind,
Merits and negativities arise.

Since mantras and so forth do not possess the power [12]

The illusory mind does not arise.

The illusion arises from various conditions
And is likewise manifold

That one condition can do it all Is totally non-existent anywhere. [13a]

All these debates turn around the inherent or non-inherent existence of phenomena. All the objections are based on the assumption that if something does not exist inherently, then it has to be completely non-existent. The Sautrantika say that if phenomena don't exist inherently and are merely like an illusion, then killing another sentient being would not create any non-virtuous karma. The objection here is that if sentient beings are like an illusion, then one would not accumulate any negativity if one were to kill, or do other non-virtuous activities to another sentient being. They say one does not create any negativity if one kills an illusion, and therefore one does not create any negativity if one kill an illusory sentient being.

Here Shantideva's reply is that if a magician creates the illusion of a human being and if one imagines that illusion to be another human being, then killing that imaginary sentient being would not be the complete action of killing. Although there would not be a complete action of killing, one would, for example, create the negativity of engaging in the action. But there would be not be the full karma of killing, because for that there needs to be the object of an actual sentient being - something that possesses mind. Because an illusion does not possess any mind, confusing an illusion with an actual sentient being and then engaging in the action of killing that imaginary sentient being would create some non-virtuous karma, such as the karma of engaging in the action of killing. But one would not get the complete karma of killing.

Relative to those endowed with an illusory mind,
Merits and negativity arise.

If one engages in a positive action with regard to something that possesses mind, then that will create virtue; if one engages in harmful action with regard to something that possesses mind, then one creates negativity.

How does this difference arise? Even though the illusion as well as the sentient being are the same in lacking true existence, the difference lies in one possessing mind, and the other not possessing mind. Relative to the one possessing mind complete merits and negativities arise.

Since mantras and so forth do not possess the power
the illusory mind does not arise.

What this means is that the mantras and the different substances of the magician do not possess the power to create something that possesses mind. Therefore the illusory mind does not arise within an illusion.

The illusion arises from various conditions
And is likewise manifold.

That one condition that can do it all
Is totally non-existent anywhere.

This shows how the illusion is generated in dependence upon a multitude of causes and conditions and not one single condition. It shows the dependent arising of the illusion. Even though phenomena are like illusions they still fall within the realm of cause and effect, so cause and effect still apply to them. If the causes and conditions arise then the illusory horse and elephant will come into existence. But if the conditions are incomplete, then the illusory horse and elephant won't come into existence.

2.1.2.1.2.2.5. Refuting that it would be invalid to ascertain the difference between samsara and nirvana

Here the Sautrantika say that the division into samsara and nirvana would be invalid if everything lacks inherent existence.

Should nirvana be the ultimate, [13bcd]
And samsara be the relative,

Then also the Buddha would circle. [14]
What would be the point of the bodhisattvas practice?

If the continuum of the conditions is not cut off,
Then the illusion will also not be reversed.

If the continuity of the conditions is cut-off, [15ab]
Then it won't arise even conventionally.

This debate is aimed at the Madhyamaka view of natural nirvana. First of all, there is the assertion that nominally samsara is generated from causes and conditions, which are ignorance, karma, consciousness and so forth. The lack of inherent existence of the samsara thus generated is asserted to be natural nirvana.

¹ Described last week as Refuting that one's position is contradicted by the sutras

Here the opponent confuses natural nirvana with actual nirvana that is attained through overcoming adventitious obscurations. That's important to know. The Sautrantika say, 'On the one hand you accept the conventional samsara that is generated through causes and conditions. Then at the same time you assert that the lack of inherent existence of that samsara is ultimate nirvana. In that case everybody would have attained nirvana, since everybody has natural nirvana'.

Here the opponent confuses natural abiding nirvana with actual nirvana. The same thing applies to the natural abiding perfection of wisdom. By confusing natural abiding nirvana with nirvana, the opponent says, 'Should nirvana be the ultimate nirvana?'

Ultimate nirvana is the natural abiding nirvana, the lack of true existence of samsara. At the same time, the samsara that the relatively existing contaminating aggregates experiences - birth, ageing, sickness and death - comes about through ignorance, the other delusions and karma.

In that case everybody would have attained nirvana, since everybody has natural nirvana. It would follow that even a person like the Buddha who is actually accepted by both schools to be beyond samsara would then circle in cyclic existence.

Is there a problem if one were to posit the natural abiding nirvana as nirvana? Is the natural abiding nirvana, nirvana or not?

Student: No.

What's the reason for it not being nirvana?

Student: Because it hasn't overcome the causes for samsara.

But what is the reason for it not having abandoned the causes for samsara? In general we say that nirvana is the non-affirming negation that is the absence of suffering and its causes and so forth. So why is the natural abiding nirvana not nirvana?

Student: Because the causal chain, cyclic existence, has not been cut.

Why is the cause of samsara not abandoned?

Student: Because the natural abiding nirvana is just a mere lack of an inherently existent suffering, not of a dependent arising suffering.

To give a word commentary to the first verse, it says that if the Buddha circled in cyclic existence there will be no point to a bodhisattva's practice because if there is an existence that is already there, there would be no need to attain it, because it is already there. Actual nirvana needs to be attained through meditating on the path and through engaging in different practices. If the natural abiding nirvana were the actual nirvana then the need to practice the path would fall away.

One should know the difference between natural abiding nirvana and actual nirvana, what the cause of cyclic existence is, and how the causes actually generate cyclic existence and so forth. Then, it is asserted there is no fault - the fault that is pointed out by the Sautrantika is not there.

If the natural abiding nirvana is actual nirvana then ordinary sentient beings would already abide within nirvana. Then one could also say that a buddha actually abides within cyclic existence. This fault does not exist here.

If the continuity of conditions is uninterrupted, then the illusion does not cease to exist. So therefore as long as the causes and conditions of samsara are not interrupted, then samsara will continue to exist and the experience of birth, ageing, sickness and death will continue to exist.

If the continuity of the conditions is cut, then samsara will not exist even conventionally or nominally. There is no need for samsara to exist in a buddha's mind, because a buddha has cut off the conditions for samsara to arise. Because a buddha has cut the conditions for samsara, then samsara does not exist in that buddha's mind. Apart from not arising ultimately, samsara does not arise in a buddha's mind even conventionally. Because ordinary sentient beings have not cut off the conditions for samsara, then their mind is a samsaric mind and they experience samsara.

2.1.2.2. REFUTING THE MIND ONLY POSITION

2.1.2.2.1. Presentation of the position of the Mind Only

2.1.2.2.2. Refutation of the position of the Mind Only

2.1.2.2.1. Presentation of the position of the Mind Only

These two lines present the position of the Mind Only:

*When even the mistaken is non-existent [15cd]
What takes the illusion as its object*

The 'When' in the first line refers to all objects lacking true existence and in that way being like an illusion. The Mind Only assert that mind exists truly and ultimately. They assert that all compounded phenomena are truly existent.

Therefore, when all impermanent phenomena exist non-truly, then even the mistaken mind is non-existent. If everything is like an illusion in that it lacks true existence then everything becomes non-existent. In that case the mistaken awareness that ordinarily perceives the illusion would also have to be non-existent.

This would mean that there would be nothing that could perceive the illusion, and one would arrive at this fault. Therefore impermanent phenomena have to have true existence.

The problem for the Mind Only arises because the Madhyamaka completely refute true existence, but in the Mind Only system compounded phenomena and thoroughly established phenomena have to exist truly. They don't assert that all phenomena exist truly; they don't say that mental fabrications exist truly; but they do say that compounded phenomena and thoroughly established phenomena exist truly. Therefore according to them, when one refutes true existence then it is not possible for consciousness to exist. Then there would be no object possessor that could perceive the object.

2.1.2.2.2. Refutation of the position of the Mind Only

The answer uses the same reasoning, but in reverse. It comes in two parts:

2.1.2.2.2.1. Offering a similar debate

2.1.2.2.2.2. Refuting the answer to that debate

2.1.2.2.1. Offering a similar debate

This is covered in these two lines:

*When for you the illusion is non-existent, [16ab]
Then at that time, what becomes the focus or the object.*

The Mind Only say the object appears as an outer object, but it doesn't exist as an outer object.

So Shantideva says to them, 'If the object actually existed in the way it appears to exist, then it would have to be an outer object. In that case, there would be no illusion and there would be no object possessor. If the object does not exist the way it appears, then it has to lack true existence, because that is the actual meaning of not existing in the way it appears to exist. If there is a discrepancy between appearance and existence then the object does not exist truly. 'If you say that the object does not exist in the way it appears to exist, then it has to lack true existence. If it lacks true existence, then again according to you, the object such as the illusion becomes non-existent, and in that case there would be nothing that could make an illusion its object'.

Gyaltsab Rinpoche says something similar in his explanation of these two lines.

When the object exists in the way it appears to exist, as an outer object, then the object would have to be an outer object. In that case, in your system, illusions and its object possessors would be non-existent. If the object does not exist in the way it appears to exist, then it would lack inherent existence, and according to you, it would have to be completely non-existent. In that case, then it would be impossible to have, for example, an illusion that appears as an outer object. Also there would be no other objects such as a form, sounds or so forth that could become the objects of awareness, and also there would be no mind that could focus on that object.

We can stop here. For now, if you can understand the fundamental position of each side then that's a good foundation. After this more debates between the Mind Only and the Madhyamaka will come.

This is the fourth class, so you will have discussion group next week. It's important to have a fruitful discussion where one just doesn't refute the other person with verbal cleverness. When one actually debates on the basis of understanding, one debates on the basis of having thought about the topic.

Student: What is a compounded phenomena? Is it like an illusory object?

The 'compounded' actually refers to the coming together of the causes and conditions that cause the phenomenon in question. The phenomenon is compounded. Why? Because it arose from this composition of causes and conditions.

Geshe-la holds a glass

The glass is impermanent, it is momentary, it is compounded, it is a cause, it is a result. The Mind Only say that it is an other-powered phenomenon, a functionality. The glass is an effect, because it arose from causes and conditions. At the same time, of course, it has its own effect, for example if the glass breaks. Also the succession of moments of glass cause each other. The first moment of glass causes the second moment of glass, which causes the third moment of glass and so forth.

Student: So it follows from that it's not an illusory object?

The 'illusory' part refers to its lack of inherent or true existence. The 'illusory' refers to the discrepancy between the appearance of inherent existence and the lack of inherent existence. The glass is said to be like an illusion because, while on the one hand it appears as inherently existent or as truly existent, on the other hand it does not actually exist in the way it appears, because it lacks inherent existence or true existence. So that's why the glass is referred to as 'illusory'. It doesn't mean that the glass is completely non-existent.

As usual please generate a virtuous motivation thinking, 'I have to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings, and in order to do so I am now going to listen to this profound teaching. Then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

We have finished the outline called The Concordant Debate¹.

2.1.2.2.2.2. Refuting the answer to that debate

This is in two outlines:

2.1.2.2.2.2.1. Expressing the position

2.1.2.2.2.2.2. The refutation

2.1.2.2.2.2.1. Expressing the position

*Even though it exists differently from this very nature [16cd]
Then this aspect is that very mind.*

The Mind Only opponent states, 'Even though the object that appears to the mind does not exist in that very nature as it appears to the mind, it exists differently in another way, because the aspect of form and so forth is the substance of that very mind'.

The Mind Only position is that both the mind, and the object that it perceives, arise simultaneously from an imprint on the mental consciousness, and that both the mind and the object exist truly. They don't accept the position that the consciousness arises in dependence on the object, and that if the object and mind don't exist truly then they cannot exist at all.

The Mind Only don't posit external forms. Instead they say that the mind is of one nature with the aspect of the object. There is no object that is of a different nature from the mind that perceives it. And both the mind and its impermanent object exist truly.

2.1.2.2.2.2.2. The refutation

There are two outlines:

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.1. It is not perceived by any type of non-dual awareness

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2. The refutation of self-knowers

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.1. It is not perceived by any type of non-dual awareness

*When the mere mind is like an illusion, [17ab]
At that time what is seen by which?*

When the mere mind appears like an illusion but does not exist externally, then at that time what consciousness lacking external meaning is seen by which valid cognition?

The question is how is mind itself established? If there are no external objects, what type of mind could establish mind itself, since there is no object that is of a different substance from mind itself. If there is no external object then the object possessor itself also will not be perceived.

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2. The refutation of self-knower

This is done in four outlines:

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2.1. Refuting the self-knower with a scriptural quotation

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2.2. Refuting the self-knower with logic

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2.3. Refuting other different types of proof for a self-knower

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2.4. Refuting that imputed objects exist truly

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2.1. Refuting the self-knower with a scriptural quotation

*The protector of the worlds also said [17cd]
That mind does not see mind.*

*The cutting edge of a knife does not cut itself [18ab]
It is the same for mind.*

As a reply to the previous argument by the Madhyamaka, the Mind Only say that mind is not perceived by a mind different from it, but that it is perceived by a truly existent self-knower in a non-dual manner. The self-knower is really a part of the mind itself and that perceives the mind in a non-dual manner.

The Mind Only say that each mind has two parts. It has a part that is directed outwards and knows the object, and a part that is directed solely inwards and knows the mind itself. The part of the mind that knows mind itself is the self-knower. This self-knower perceives the rest of the mind in a non-dual manner. It is this self-knower that is being refuted.

The Buddha refuted the self-knower in a sutra. He said that mind can not see itself in the same way as the blade of a knife cannot cut itself. If one were to assert that mind could know itself, then that would be like saying that the blade of a knife could cut itself. There is also a quote from the Journey to Lanka Sutra, which states exactly what we have said, 'The blade of a knife cannot cut itself and it is likewise for the mind'.

In the Mind Only system, as we have said before, there is no external object in dependence on which the consciousness is generated. They don't assert that there is an object that is experienced by a different experiencer. They assert this self-knower, where one part of the mind knows the rest of the mind. So one has the situation where there is no object that is of different substance from the experiencer.

But for the Prasangika there is this dependence of the mind on the object, in that the mind arises in dependence upon the external object. You first have the external object and then, from the causal condition of that external object, the consciousness that perceives it arises. This causality is not accepted by the Mind Only.

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2. Refuting the self-knower with logic

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2.1. Refutation of the example

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2.2. Refutation of the meaning

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2.1. Refutation of the examples

The first example:

A candle light can perfectly illuminate its object, [18cd]

But can not illuminate itself likewise, [19ab]
Because darkness does not obscure itself.

The Mind Only use the example of candle-light, saying that similarly to the candle-light illuminating both itself as well as objects, the mind can know both objects and itself.

This is refuted by Shantideva with the reasoning of darkness not being able to obscure itself. If one were to say that light can illuminate itself then darkness should also be able to obscure itself. Because darkness does not obscure itself it follows that light does not illuminate itself. If darkness were to obscure itself then one should not be able to see the darkness. Since that it not the case then light does not illuminate itself.

If light were to illuminate itself then there would not be any doubt with regard to darkness obscuring itself. Therefore the reasoning by the Mind Only that used the example of light illuminating itself is not valid.

Light does of course have luminosity, but it does not illuminate itself. That is the distinction that is being made here. While it has luminosity it does not illuminate itself. If light were to illuminate itself, then the logical consequence would be that darkness would also obscure itself.

Refutation of the second example:

Unlike a crystal, blue does not depend [19cd]
On something else to be blue;

Likewise, some are seen to depend on others, [20]
And yet some are also not.
That which is not blue cannot produce itself
As blue out of its own nature.

The Mind Only say, 'When one places a white crystal on a blue surface, then the crystal becomes blue through the power of the blue surface it is standing on. It is not blue through its own nature, but in dependence on something else. On the other hand, the blue of a sapphire is generated out of its own nature, and not dependent on something else. Similarly, the knowing of forms and so forth depends on a consciousness different from them, while consciousness knows itself without depending on a knower different from itself'.

This is refuted by the Madhyamaka, who say that the blue of the sapphire is generated in dependence on causes and conditions, because the sapphire itself is generated in dependence on causes and conditions. Since the sapphire itself is generated in dependence on causes and conditions, the blue of the sapphire is likewise generated in dependence on causes and conditions. It doesn't just arise out of itself. If the blue of the sapphire were to arise just out of itself, then the sapphire should also exist independently of causes and conditions.

That which is not generated as blue from a cause does not have the power to generate itself as blue out of its own nature.

Review

The Mind Only say there are no external objects and the Prasangika say that there are external objects. Can you tell me the reasons for these two different positions.

Student: The Mind Only say that we experience things because the karmic imprint ripens into both the object and the mind perceiving the object.

So in the Prasangika system the imprints don't have to ripen for the consciousness to see something?

Student: They say that the object and the mind perceiving it arise simultaneously, and that is why they are both of the same nature.

If form did not exist in such a way then why would it have to be an external object?

Student: Because it wouldn't be in the nature of the mind. It would be external to the mind.

If the mind and object are of different substance then why does the object have to be established as an external object?

Student: Because it is not of the nature of consciousness.

The Sautrantika, for example, say that the form is established as an external form, because it is based on an accumulation of partless particles. The Mind Only refute the position of the Sautrantika, so the refutation of external form by the Mind Only has to refute the point of the Sautrantika.

If the object exists, and if it is not of one substance with the mind, then it has to become an accumulation of partless particles. Then it has to become an external object. If the object and the mind are of different substance, then the mind is generated in dependence on the object and then the object has to re-establish externally. Then one would arrive at the accumulation of partless particles. That is the Sautrantika point of view. Why do the Prasangika say that there is an external object? Form is an external form because it is not contained within the continuum of the person. We went through the eight difficult points of the Prasangika previously².

Then the text starts to talk about consciousness and self-knowers. What is the meaning of consciousness, and what is the meaning of self-knower?

One has to make good use of one's time and not just argue pointlessly back and forth. One has to get to the meaning, and thus progress from one discussion group to the next. But if one just pointlessly argues back and forth just to say something, then it is not very fruitful.

This type of arguing that arises from giving forth very personal opinions without having actually having studied the topic is not very fruitful. One has to study the topic very well, study what the topic is about, what the points are about, and then one has something available to say on that basis. If one doesn't have that basis and just voices off one's own opinion then it is not very fruitful. There is a particular name for such a person in the monastery. It is said that such a person has no system to their argument. They will say this and they say that without any substance to their argument.

What is the meaning of consciousness? We have already mentioned this at least one hundred times?

Student: Consciousness is the clear faculty of knowing to which an object can appear to be apprehended.

What is the meaning of clear and knowing? One question that always arises is that if it is clear and knowing does it necessarily cognise the object? If it clear and knowing does it always realise?

If somebody was to assert that then you could posit true-grasping. 'It is a consciousness but it is not a cogniser, as it doesn't realise the object'. Or you could say, 'Then is there not a two-fold division of consciousness into valid cognition and non cognition?'. You have to go back to the text on awareness and knowers.

Student: Is conscious awareness based on the aggregates?

Yes. If you don't have the form aggregate then you don't have coarse consciousness. For example, in our case our consciousnesses are all primarily coarse consciousnesses, and they all depend on the form aggregate for their generation. When the form aggregate ceases then that consciousness also ceases - it goes into a non-manifest state. For example if one doesn't take care of one's body as one gets older (and sometimes even if one does take care of one's body) the consciousnesses lose power because the physical faculties lose power. If one's physical faculties remain strong then the consciousnesses also remain strong, even in old age. That is why it is important to look after one's physical health.

First of all clear and knowing doesn't mean that it is necessarily a cogniser. For example, self-grasping is clear and knowing, but it is not a cogniser. One explanation of the 'clear' is that it refers to the absence of shape, colour and so forth, and the 'knowing' part refers to the ability to reflect objects by arising in the aspect of objects. It doesn't really refer to realising or ascertaining something. Knowing refers to being able to arise in the aspect of the object. If it is consciousness there is no pervasion that it is a cognition. For example self-grasping is a consciousness but it is not a cogniser.

In the Prasangika system every consciousness does cognise itself, because every consciousness cognises the appearance that appears to it. It is a tenet of the Prasangika system that if it is consciousness then it cognises itself, because it cognises the appearance that appears to it.

But that doesn't make it a cogniser. True-grasping cognises itself but that doesn't make it a cogniser, because to be a cogniser it has to be incontrovertible with regard to the main object. There are different types of object, and to be a cogniser it has to be incontrovertible with regard to the main object.

Your debate topic for the next discussion is the difference between true-grasping and the wisdom that realises selflessness.

- For example the wisdom realising selflessness is consciousness and it is incontrovertible and it is not a wrong consciousness - it is a valid cognition.
- True-grasping is also a consciousness, but it is a distorted, it is not a valid cognition, and it is a wrong consciousness.
- Then you should ascertain how the wisdom that realises selflessness harms true-grasping actually opposing or counteracting true-grasping.

If you can properly establish that then I will fold my hands and make prostrations to you

As usual generate a good motivation thinking, 'I have to attain enlightenment to achieve the welfare of all sentient beings, and in order to achieve this aim I am now going to listen to this profound teaching. Then I am going to put it into practice'.

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2. Refuting the self-knower with logic

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2.2. Refuting the actual meaning

*If the statement the candle flame illuminates [21]
Is made after it is known by consciousness,
Then the statement awareness is luminous
Is made after being known by what.*

*To state it is illuminating¹ or not illuminating, [22]
When it is not seen by anything
Is pointless even though expressed,
Like the airs of a barren woman's daughter.*

This obviously relates back to the example of the candle-flame that was posited by the Mind Only. In the first line of verse 22 there is a reference to the analysis of whether mind is illuminated by self, or by another mind. One has to relate this to the essence of the refutation of the self-knower, which is the refutation of inherent existence.

The Mind Only base their position of the self-knower on the assertion of inherent existence. The Prasangikas refutation of the self-knower is based on the refutation of inherent existence.

The assertion of inherent existence by the lower tenets is always based on the assumption that something is findable at the time of analysis. But for the Prasangika, the imputed meaning is not findable at the time of analysis, even though existing nominally. So for the Prasangika it is not really important whether or not the mind or the candle-flame are illuminating at the time of analysis.

For the Mind Only this becomes very relevant. It is good to relate the line, 'To state it is illuminating or not illuminating' to whether or not the imputed meaning is findable at the time of analysis, and not just relate it to the superficial analysis of whether the mind illuminates itself, or whether it is illuminated by another mind.

The point of verse 22 is that after the Prasangika have refuted the example of the candle-flame illuminating itself with the reasoning of darkness not obscuring itself, the Mind Only concede that point. But they still say that the statement 'the candle-flame illuminates' is only made after consciousness becomes aware that the candle-flame is illuminating. Again, they are trying to make their point that there has to be some kind of knower that observes the object possessor. However, once they make this statement, they actually contradict themselves, and have moved away from their own position. When they say that another consciousness knows that the candle-flame illuminates (the candle-flame here being the example for a consciousness), then they contradict their own assertion that consciousness is not known by an other-knower different from itself.

Even though the Mind Only try here to rescue their position, what actually happens is they have already completely stepped out of their own position. They have already left behind the self-knower and since they actually don't accept consciousness being known by an other-knower, then there is really no consciousness that knows consciousness. That's how one arrives at these two lines:

*Then the statement awareness is luminous
Is made after being known by what.*

There is nothing left: there is no self-knower and there is no other-knower. Therefore then, to state that the mind is illuminating or not illuminating, when it is not actually observed by any consciousness, is completely pointless. These positions can be expressed, but that becomes meaningless, because the position cannot be verified by a valid cognition that can actually verify whether the consciousness is luminous or not. These positions become like the airs put on by a barren woman's daughter. The daughter is non-existent and her airs are also non-existent.

The Mind Only start out from the position that the consciousness has to be known, and it can only be known by either a self-knower or an other-knower.

The Mind Only say 'we don't accept consciousness being known by an other-knower' because then one would arrive at the absurdity of needing limitless other-knowers. In order to remember one instance of consciousness, that consciousness needs to be observed by a simultaneous instance of consciousness different from itself. But then logically, in order to remember the second consciousness you would need another instance of a consciousness that is again of different. So you would need a limitless number of different instances of consciousness just to have a memory of one instance of consciousness.

The only other possibility for consciousness to be known, in order to generate a memory of it, is that it is known by the self-knower. Here then, when they make this statement 'the candle-flame illuminates' which is known by a different consciousness, they have already gone away from the position of the self-knower and have actually gone to the position of an other-knower, which is actually not possible according to themselves. According to the Mind Only point of view, they have actually arrived at a position where their consciousness is not known by any knower - be it a self-knower or another knower.

That's why verse 22 says that since there is really no knower that knows consciousness, then to make a statement as to whether the consciousness is luminous or not is completely pointless. This is because it cannot be verified by a self-knower or an other-knower. 'Now', say the Prasangika, 'you have given up both positions, and for you there are only those two possibilities'.

According to the Mind Only position are form and the valid cognition that apprehends form of one substance or not?

Students: They are of one substance.

Why are they of one substance?

Student: Because they both share generation from the same karmic seed.

That's why the Mind Only assert that all consciousnesses and their objects are of one substance. It is because both are generated from one karmic imprint on the mind-stream.

According to the Madhyamaka there is form, and the valid cognition perceiving form. Are they of one substance or not?

Students: No.

Why? Are they of a different substance?

Student: Form is external.

Student: The one that perceives the object is triggered by the object. The perception comes from seeing the object, not sharing the same karmic seed.

One can basically say that in the Madhyamaka system form and the valid cognition apprehending form are cause and effect, while for the Mind Only, they are not a cause and effect but simultaneous. Cause and effect always have to be of a different substance, while if two things are generated simultaneously from one primary cause, then they have to be of one substance.

In the Prasangika system, would one have to say that first form is established, and then the eye-consciousness apprehending form is established?

Students: Yes.

Then there is a blue that is not established by a eye-consciousness apprehending blue. That's an obvious debate that you arrive at. If there is a blue that is not established by the eye-consciousness apprehending blue then it is not an object of eye-consciousness, which is the definition of form.

Since there is a blue that is not the object of the eye-consciousness apprehending blue, then it is not that which is held by the eye-consciousness, which is the definition of visual stimuli. So the definition of form-source goes out of the window! There is lots of debate about that.

The Mind Only's need for a self-knower arises from their need to posit consciousness as something that is findable at the time of analysis. For the Mind Only everything, including the imputed meaning, has to be findable at the time of analysis.

For the Prasangika, the imputed meaning being findable at the time of analysis is the object of negation. The Prasangika assert that the imputed meaning is never findable at the time of analysis. That's why the Prasangika reject the self-knower and the Mind Only assert the self-knower.

The Mind Only feel very strongly that the definition of mind – clear and knowing – should be findable at the time of analysis. According to them, mind needs to be verified. Another mind needs to verify that the mind is clear, and for them, that's the self-knower. Through the self-knower they establish that the imputed meaning of mind is findable at the time of analysis, and they establish the inherent existence of mind.

The Prasangika reject this, and therefore the Prasangika also reject the self-knower. For the Prasangika there is no need for the self-knower, because for the Prasangika, the imputed meaning is not findable at the time of analysis. This rejection of the self-knower by the Prasangika should be related to the rejection of the object of negation. The eight profound points of the Prasangika are always related to the unfindability of the imputed meaning at the time of analysis.

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.3. Refuting reasons that show the existence of the self-knower²

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.3.1. The example

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.3.2. Refuting other reasons for the self-knower

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.3.3. Refuting that if there is no self-knower, there couldn't be an other-knower

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.3.1. The example

Actually, we already explained this point in lots of detail last year³, so it should be very easy.

*If there is no self-knower, [23]
How can one remember consciousness.
One remembers in relation
To the experience of something else,
Like the poison of a rat.*

The Mind Only position is that if there is no self-knower then it would not be possible to remember the object possessor. When something is perceived there are always two elements – there is the object and there is the object possessor. For example, when one thinks, 'I am seeing blue', there is the object blue and then there is oneself, or the object possessor. The Mind Only's position is that if there is no self-knower that is aware of the object possessor mind, like the eye-consciousness apprehending blue, then one could not remember that one has seen blue. This is because there would be no experience of the experience of blue.

For the Mind Only, that one actually can remember that one saw blue indicates that there is a self-knower. It would not be possible for one to remember that one saw blue if, at the time of seeing blue, there was not some experience of the experience of blue. That's why they say there has to be the self-knower. Logically for them it can only be a self-knower that is aware of the awareness of blue, because they don't accept (for the previously mentioned reasons), that the awareness of blue is experienced by an other-knower. For them there are two types of experience, the self experience, and the experience by the other.

² Listed on 29 March 2005 as Refuting other different types of proof for a self-knower.

³ On 10 February 2004.

The awareness of blue has to be experienced by a self-knower. Blue is experienced by the awareness apprehending blue, and the awareness apprehending blue is experienced by the self-knower. This explains the first two lines.

Then the Prasangika reply that one remembers in relation to the experience of something else. They say that even though there is no self-knower at the time of the experience, one can still remember the experience in relation to the experience of something else. The Prasangika say that in order to remember the eye-consciousness apprehending blue, it is not necessary to have a self-knower that experiences the eye-consciousness apprehending blue. This is because merely by remembering blue, one automatically also remembers the object possessor that apprehends blue. They are linked, so merely by remembering blue, one also remembers, 'I saw blue'. One remembers the object possessor in dependence on the relationship between the object possessor and the object.

The Mind Only position is that one can remember the object possessor. For example, one can remember the eye-consciousness through which one saw blue. One doesn't only remember blue, but one can remember that oneself saw blue. This comes about because of the relationship between the object and the object possessor, which is not a proof for a self-knower. Then they go on to state an example.

One remembers the object possessor in relation to the experience of something else. That something else is the object. There is no need to have a self-knower that experiences the object possessor in order to be able to remember the object. So it is not necessary to have a self-knower in order to remember the apprehension of blue, because, for example, by the virtue of remembering blue, one also remembers that one saw blue. The apprehension of blue is remembered through the force of remembering blue. So you have to think about the fact that one cannot remember the apprehension of blue without remembering blue.

The example is that of a hibernating animal, which is bitten by a rat while it is hibernating in winter. Although the animal does experience the pain of being bitten at that time, there is no experience of actually being poisoned by the bite.

When the animal is wakened out of its hibernation by the sound of thunder in spring or in summer, the poison, which is obviously a long-term poison, is activated. Once awake the animal becomes very sick because of the poison. Even though not really having the experience of being poisoned, it still has the experience of being bitten by the rat, and in such a way, it then remembers having been poisoned at the time when it was bitten, even though not having the actual experience of being poisoned when bitten.

Becoming aware in spring of being poisoned in winter is the example. The meaning of this is that one remembers the object possessor of blue. In the example we have the time the actual poison entered the body of the animal without having the actual experience of being poisoned. The meaning of this is the presence of the object possessor at the time when the object is perceived, without that object possessor being experienced by a self-knower.

So in spring, the animal remembers being poisoned through the force of remembering being bitten. At the time when it was bitten, there was an experience of the pain. The experience of the pain signifies the experience of the object.

Being poisoned signifies the presence of the object possessor. When, in spring, the animal remembers being poisoned through remembering the pain of being bitten, that signifies the remembrance of the object possessor through the force of the remembrance of the object.

Without there being an actual experience of the object possessor, at the time of the object possessor one can still remember subsequently that one saw blue, merely through the fact of remembering blue. Through the force of remembering blue one remembers that one saw blue. Through the force of remembering blue the memory of having seen blue is induced. At the time of seeing blue, there is an experience of the object blue by the eye-consciousness apprehending blue. But there is no experience of the eye-consciousness apprehending blue itself.

Even though there is no experience of the eye-consciousness apprehending blue at the time when the eye-consciousness apprehends blue, one can subsequently still remember the apprehension of blue by remembering the object. So through the force of remembering the object blue, one then also remembers the apprehension of blue. For example, one can remember, 'I saw blue'.

Similarly, in the example there was an experience of the pain of being bitten, but there was no experience of the poison entering the body. But subsequently when the animal experiences the sickness that is induced through the poison, it thinks back and it remembers the pain of being bitten. It then also remembers that it was poisoned at that time, even though there was nothing that experienced the poisoning. Similarly with the eye-consciousness - there was nothing that experiences the eye-consciousness at that time.

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.2.3.2. Refuting other reasons for the self-knower

*If, the Mind Only say, since the mind [24]
Sees the condition of others,
It illuminates itself by applying the formulated eye balm,
The vase is seen, but does not become the eye balm.*

Here in the first two lines the Mind Only make the argument that through the development of calm abiding the mind can illuminate the mind of others, meaning it can perceive the mind of others, i.e. it can develop the clairvoyance that perceives the mind of others. It can perceive the state of other people's minds which are further away. Therefore it also, of course, illuminates or perceives itself. If one can see something that is far away, then there is no question that one can see that which is close by.

Here it is talking about the clairvoyant who knows the mind of others. There are different levels of that type of clairvoyance, but here it talks about the common one that is shared with non-Buddhist practitioners. So then you might argue, 'Well one's consciousness is able to perceive the minds of others who are further away'. Actually this is also literal. One can actually perceive the minds of others who are many hundreds of kilometres away.

If that is possible, then there is no question that the mind also perceives itself. The refutation of this is that just because one can see the treasure vase that is buried in the ground through the condition of applying eye-balm that has been made with mantras and other secret mantra practices, that does not mean that the vase actually becomes the eye-balm. Just because through some conditions one can see something else, it does not mean that something else becomes the eye-balm.

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.3.3. Refuting that if there is self-knower, that there couldn't be an other-knower

Just like the consciousness of seeing and listening,[25]

Should not be refuted here.

That which becomes the cause of suffering,

The formulation of true existence, is to be refuted.

We have the self-knower and the other-knower. The self-knower is called thus because it is directed only inwards. Its focus is solely inwards, directed to the consciousness, and that's why it's called a self-knower.

Other-knowers who are directed outwards, knowing other objects such as forms and so forth.

The self-knower has this characteristic as being solitary, because it is not concomitant with mental factors and so forth. It is solitary, it doesn't have any friends or acquaintances. Other-knowers always exist in relation to mental factors and so forth - they are more social.

The Prasangika say, 'There is no need to eliminate the nominal experience of having seen or listened to something. Seeing or listening to something is a conventional experience that does not cause any suffering. Therefore they should not be abandoned here. First of all, they don't generate any suffering. Not refuting nominal conventional existence is not the cause for any suffering. Secondly, even arhats, who have gone completely beyond suffering, have these experiences of seeing and listening. To refute or negate them completely would be a mistake and unnecessary.

'However, what should be negated is the mental creation of true existence, because that is the cause of all suffering. If you negate conventional nominal existence, then you will fall into the extreme of nihilism. What really should be negated is the formulation of true existence, which is the cause of suffering'.

Generate a virtuous motivation for listening to the teachings thinking, 'I have to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings, and in order to achieve this aim I am now going to listen to this profound teaching. Then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

Last time we talked about the refutation of the self-knower, and the Mind Only view that if there is no self-knower then nominal existence is non-existent. The Prasangikas reply is that such is not the case. They say that even though objects lack true existence they can still exist nominally, and that what should be refuted is true-grasping of objects and object possessors, which constitutes the root of cyclic existence.

*Just as illusions, though non-true, are
The perceived object, the perceivers are alike.* [27ab]

The Mind Only say there are no illusions, i.e. forms and so forth, that are of different substance from mind. 'And that they are not different is also not true' can have two meanings. It can mean 'the object is also not mind itself', or it can mean 'and they are not truly of one substance'.

To this the Madhyamaka reply that if the illusions of form and so forth, i.e. the objects and their object possessors, are truly existent phenomena, then how can these objects not be of different substance from their object possessors?

How one arrives at this conclusion is that if the object exists truly then it has to be of different substance. Why? Because if the object exists truly then it has to be true, and if it is true then it has to exist the way it appears.

Here one needs an understanding of false and true. Being false means not existing in the way it appears. That makes objects false. An object is true if it exists in the way it appears. So if the object exists truly then it has to be true. It follows that it has to exist in the way it appears. As the object appears as an external object it has to also exist in that manner. That is the consequence that the Prasangika see for the Mind Only.

Here the Mind Only reply that objects and objectpossessors are not of different substance. To this the Madhyamaka say, 'Then, in that case, they cannot exist truly, because in that case all appearances of outer objects are false. Objects do not exist the way they appear, and as such cannot exist truly. Just as illusory-like form and so forth are nominally that which is perceived, though not existing truly, the six types of mind can nominally be the perceivers, while not existing truly.'

This connects up with what was said two verses ago, where the Prasangika were telling the Mind Only not to worry about refuting nominal existence, and saying that objects could exist still nominally even though they lack true existence.

2.1.2.2.2.2.2.4. Refuting that imputed existence is dependent on truly existent phenomena¹

If, 'Cyclic existence is based on phenomena, Otherwise it would become like space?' [27cd]

*If non-phenomena are based on phenomena [28]
How can they perform an action?
Your mind becomes completely isolated,
Without any support.*

*When the mind is devoid of that perceived [29]
Everyone will have gone thus.
In that case, what is the benefit
Of that imputed as mere mind?*

Three characteristics

This outline pertains to the very basic reason for which the Mind Only assert true existence. They feel that mental constructs need truly existent phenomenon for their basis. This is why they have the view of the three characteristics: dividing phenomena into other-powered phenomena, conceptual creations and thoroughly-established phenomena.

- The definition of other-powered phenomenon is a phenomenon that arises in dependence on causes and conditions.
- The definition of conceptual fabrications is a phenomenon which is merely imputed by conceptual thought.
- The definition of thoroughly-established phenomena is the final object of a pure path.

They say that of these three categories, other-powered, and thoroughly-established phenomena exist truly, while mental fabrications lack true existence. They do say, however, that all three exist from their own side.

You can see that this is not the uncommon view of the Prasangika, which equates intrinsic existence with true existence. Here the meaning of true existence is to be established out of its uncommon mode of abiding, which applies to thoroughly established phenomena as well as other-powered phenomena. Mental fabrications, however, don't exist out of their own uncommon mode of abiding, but exist out of a common mode of abiding. That is why they don't exist truly. The meaning of existing out of a common mode of abiding is that the object's mode of abiding is the mode of appearance to, and apprehension by, conceptual thought. Mental fabrications share their existence with the mode of apprehension by, and appearance to, the conceptual thought.

That is why they are mental fabrications - they don't really have anything from their own side, but they exist only within the apprehension by, and the appearance to, the conceptual thought.

Other-powered and thoroughly-established phenomena are said to not have this shared existence with conceptual thought. They exist out of their own uncommon mode of abiding.

The basis of imputation

The idea is that truly existent other-powered phenomena act as the basis for mental fabrications. There is a nominal distinction made between the basis of imputation and the final basis of imputation. Other-powered phenomena in general are the basis of imputation for mental fabrications. The final basis of imputation refers to the valid cognition apprehending the object. So, for example, the valid cognition apprehending form would be the final basis of imputation for form, but it would not be the actual basis of imputation. You have to make a distinction between being the figurative basis of imputation and being the actual basis of imputation. The final basis of imputation is only referred to as the basis of imputation, but it is not the actual basis of imputation. For example, even though the valid cognition apprehending space is regarded as the final basis of imputation of space, it is not the actual basis of imputation of space.

For the Mind Only conventional existence does not make sense if it does not possess true existence as its basis. They say, for example, that liberation from cyclic existence, or bondage to cyclic existence would be impossible without true existence. They also feel that one couldn't posit the different paths such as the path of preparation and so forth without the basis of true existence. This highlights the uncommon feature of the Prasangika, where no true existence is needed at all.

The Mind Only say that false imputed phenomena such as cyclic existence and so forth need to have as their basis truly existent phenomena, just as the false phenomenon of the snake is imputed on the truly existent rope.

The Mind Only say that if there is not another truly existent phenomenon on which the mistaken appearance of cyclic existence is based, then there would be no phenomenon at all. The line 'otherwise it would become like space' refers to the deceptive appearance of cyclic existence being based on another truly existent phenomenon. If there were no other truly existent phenomena on which the mistaken appearance of cyclic existence is based, then the mistaken appearance of cyclic existence would be like space in that it would be a non-functionality. It would not be able to perform any function, and it would be completely meaningless to say that one could become liberated from, or take rebirth in, cyclic existence. Then comes the Prasangika response, which is a consequence that highlights the fault in the Mind Only position. If non-truly existent phenomena are based on truly existent phenomena then how can they perform actions? If non-truly existent false phenomena such as cyclic existence and so forth, are based on truly existent phenomena that act as the basis for the deception, then how could effects such as bondage to cyclic existence and liberation from cyclic existence and so forth occur, since there would be no truly existent basis.

This is actually a reasoning that is mentioned in the Compendium of Deeds. Because cyclic existence is a false phenomenon it needs as its basis a truly existent. Only in that way can liberation from cyclic existence, the practice of the six perfections and so forth, happen. However since we have already said that it is a false phenomena, how could there be any true existence within the false phenomena? Since there is no true existence there within the false phenomena, true existence is not established by valid cognition. That is why there is no true existence. Can you see how the Prasangika use the fault that is present in the Mind Only view as the reason to refute that view?

The Prasangika say, 'Your viewpoint is a contradiction, asserting that true phenomena can act as the basis for false phenomena. That notion is an oxymoron. It doesn't work!' That is why they ask how the non-phenomena could perform any function.

In 'Your mind becomes completely isolated without any support' the Prasangika are speaking to the Mind Only. First of all you don't accept an outer object that is of different substance from consciousness, so there cannot be a consciousness that is not tainted by an object of different substance. If the object exists truly of one substance with the consciousness then a whole series of faults arise. For example, if you have a truly existent object then the object becomes completely unrelated to the consciousness. But since the Mind Only say that the object and the consciousness are of one substance it becomes like having an unrelated one. Then you have this situation of a completely unrelated one, where the object cannot taint the object possessor. In both cases there is no situation where the object possessor can actually be tainted - the grasping at subject and object being of different substance. That is why it says, 'Your mind becomes completely isolated'.

'According to your own point of view the mind becomes completely isolated. If you say that the object is of a truly existent one substance, then in that case the mind becomes completely isolated, because a truly existent object is actually completely unrelated to the mind. Even though you say it is one, it actually becomes a truly completely unrelated one. In that case the mind becomes completely isolated, without any support. Here 'support' is the negative support of self-grasping, referring to the confusion regarding object and object possessor being of different substance and so forth.

'In either case it is impossible for the mind to be tainted. Since the mind is completely devoid of any kind of appearance or perception that the object and object possessor are of different substance, then naturally all sentient beings would effortlessly being liberated and go to the state of enlightenment.

'If that is the case then what is the benefit of having the mental construct of mere mind? What would be the actual benefit of the view of mere mind or mind-only, if that view actually leads to the conclusion that the mind cannot be tainted by anything? What you actually arrive at is the conclusion that the mind would naturally be pure. The mind would be devoid of the perception that the object possessor is of different substance, so naturally the mind would be pure, and so naturally and effortlessly everyone would go to liberation and enlightenment.

'This effort of forming the Mind Only view in order to attain liberation and enlightenment and practice the path becomes completely pointless if it just leads to the conclusion that actually the mind cannot be tainted by anything i.e. if it just leads to the conclusion that everybody would go naturally to enlightenment.'

2.1.2.3. REFUTING THE CONSEQUENCE THAT THE MIDDLE WAY HAS NO POWER²

2.1.2.3.1. The debate

2.1.2.3.2. Rebutting the debate

2.1.2.3.1. The debate

*Although knowing it to be like an illusion [30]
How can the afflictions be opposed
Even the creator himself
Generates attachment for the illusory-like woman.*

The Mind Only say that realising that all existence lacks true existence and is illusory-like serves no purpose, and does not have the power to overcome mental afflictions.

The Mind Only ask, 'Does realising that all phenomena are like an illusion lacking true existence have any purpose? If it does not have any purpose then what point is there in mentioning it? If one says the main purpose is to overcome mental afflictions, then that is also incorrect, because the realisation of things being illusory does not have the power to overcome the mental afflictions. One can know that something is an illusion and still have mental afflictions about that illusion. For example, the creator of the illusion can himself generate attachment for the illusion of the woman that he has created thinking, 'Oh, I wish it was a real woman!'. Even though he knows that he himself created the illusion of the woman, it is still possible for him to generate attachment to that illusion. For that reason realising that everything lacks true existence like an illusion does not really overcome mental afflictions. Because your emptiness is only emptiness that arises through listening and contemplation it does not really have any power to overcome the afflictions.

Here the Mind Only are obviously criticising the Prasangika view of emptiness.

Review

Why does one need to realise emptiness in order to overcome true grasping?

Student: inaudible

That is right. You cannot abandon true grasping without realising that the apprehended object of true grasping is not existent.

What kind of awareness is true grasping?

Student: Mistaken.

What makes it a mistaken awareness?

Student: It misapprehends its focal object.

Isn't there a common basis between mistaken consciousness and a valid cognition?

Student: There is in the case of a conventional cogniser.

Ah, and in the case of an ultimate valid cognition?

Student: I'd have to say no.

What about the inferential cogniser realising emptiness? If it is a conceptual thought then it is always a mistaken consciousness. So true-grasping is a wrong awareness, a distorted awareness. The wisdom realising emptiness is a valid cognition. So their mode of apprehension is directly opposed to each other.

The true-grasping holding the vase to be truly existent is a distorted consciousness. In order to understand that it is actually a distorted consciousness, and in order to oppose that, one needs to generate the wisdom that understands that the object is non-existent. Then the mode of apprehension of that wisdom is directly opposed to the mode of apprehension of true-grasping. It becomes the contradictory equivalent.

So we still have the problem of Wayne not understanding what blue is. Don't you have to say that when your eyes see blue then you see blue? If it realises an object such as blue or emptiness it doesn't have to be consciousness. It can be also the person. For example we say that arya beings realise emptiness directly. Why do we say this? Because they possess the wisdom that realises emptiness directly. Do you accept that?

Student: Yes.

² Ed: Geshe-la is using a text by Lama Tsong Khapa, where the heading outline is slightly different from that initially adopted. On February 22, there was a list of three sub-headings under 2.1.2. Refuting objections: 2.1.2.1. Refuting objections of worldly beings; 2.1.2.2. Refuting objections of hearers and 2.1.2.3. Refuting objections by Mind Only.

It would appear that in Lama Tsong Kapa's text Refuting objections of the Mind Only was a subset of 2.1.2.1. Refuting the objections of worldly beings, and that this heading is the second part of Refuting objections. However to keep the numbering consistent, we have utilised the number 2.1.2.3. for this heading.

19 April 2005

As usual please generate a virtuous motivation thinking, 'I have to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. In order to achieve this aim I am now going to listen to this profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice'.

2.1.2.3.1. The debate

We were at the outline where the Mind Only argue that (1) the realisation of emptiness does not have any purpose; or (2) if the purpose is to abandon the afflictions, then the realisation of emptiness does not have that power. Their reason for the second argument is that even though the magician is aware that the illusory woman he created is only a mere illusion, he still generates attachment for that illusion. Therefore, they say, realising that all phenomena are illusory-like in that they lack true existence does not have the power to overcome mental afflictions.

2.1.2.3.2. Rebutting the debate

2.1.2.3.2.1. The reason why the magician still generates attachment

2.1.2.3.2.2. Showing that the wisdom realising emptiness can abandon the afflictions is valid

2.1.2.3.2.3. Showing that perfect abandonment will arise

2.1.2.3.2.1. The reason why the magician still generates attachment

The creator has not abandoned the afflictive imprints [31]

Regarding this object of knowledge.

When seeing it

The imprints of emptiness are weak.

The creator refers to the magician, the creator of the illusion. He has not abandoned the afflictive imprints of true-grasping regarding this object of knowledge, the illusion, and when he sees the illusion, the imprints of emptiness are weak, so he can not counteract the true appearance of the object, and that is why he still generates attachment for the object.

In a literal sense afflictive imprint includes the seeds of the afflictions as well as the mere imprints, and in a figurative sense it can also include the afflictions themselves. The afflictions and their seeds are afflictive obscurations and the mere imprints are obscurations to knowledge. Here it is referring to the affliction of true-grasping and the seeds of true-grasping.

The imprints of emptiness refer to the wisdom realising emptiness, and the last line is saying that the magician's realisation of emptiness is weak. Shantideva is saying that just realising emptiness in itself will not overcome the mental afflictions, but that one needs to meditate on it and reach a certain level on the path to abandon the afflictions.

For example, on the path of accumulation and preparation bodhisattvas do have the realisation of emptiness, and on the path of preparation they have the union of calm abiding and special insight realising emptiness. But they still have not overcome the mental afflictions. Even on the path of seeing, when bodhisattvas realise emptiness directly, they only overcome the intellectually-acquired mental afflictions. The innate mental afflictions are abandoned sequentially on the succeeding levels of the path of meditation, and are abandoned completely on the eighth ground.

There are many distorted perceptions that are very easy to overcome, such as the distorted eye-consciousness to which falling hairs appear. Here all one needs is a valid eye-consciousness that sees that there are no falling hairs.

But to overcome true-grasping, which has been in one's mental continuum since beginningless times, one needs to meditate on the object of emptiness for a long time. It is not enough to just realise the non-existence of the apprehended object, but one needs to actually meditate on the absence of the apprehended object for a very long time. As we have just said, not even the direct realisation of emptiness will overcome the mental afflictions. One needs to have progressed along the path of meditation. Here in the Prasangika system it is only when one has reached the eighth ground that mental afflictions have been overcome. That is the point that is being made here. Overcoming true-grasping is not like overcoming some other everyday misconception; it takes considerable amount of meditation.

2.1.2.3.2.2. Showing that it is valid to say that the wisdom realising emptiness can abandon the afflictions

2.1.2.3.2.2.1. In general

2.1.2.3.2.2.2. In particular

2.1.2.3.2.1.1. In general

Meditating on the imprints of emptiness [32]

Abandons the imprints of phenomena;

The statement that they are totally non-existent

Means that subsequently even that is abandoned through meditation.

By meditating on the wisdom that realises the emptiness of all phenomena one can abandon the imprints of true-grasping.

'Meditating on the imprints of emptiness abandons the imprints of phenomena' means that by meditating on the wisdom that realises the emptiness of all phenomena one abandons the true-grasping that holds all phenomena to be truly existent. These two lines refer to realising the emptiness of conventional phenomena.

Subsequently, even the true-grasping at emptiness itself is abandoned. One realises that even the emptiness of all phenomena lacks true existence, and in such a way one can counteract the true-grasping that holds the suchness of conventional phenomena to exist truly.

If one takes a vase as example, we have the object of vase, and the true-grasping that grasps at vase as truly existent. Then we have the emptiness of the vase and the true-grasping that holds the emptiness of the vase to be truly existent. By meditating on the absence of the truly existent vase one can counteract the true-grasping that grasps at the vase as truly existent. Meditating on the emptiness of the vase overcomes the grasping at the truly existent vase. Then, by meditating on the lack of true existence of the emptiness of the vase, one overcomes the grasping at the vase's emptiness as truly existent.

2.1.2.3.2.2. In particular

When it is said that nothing exists [33]
The investigated object is not observed
At that time the non-object lacks a basis.
How can it linger before one's awareness?

'When it says that nothing exists' indicates the point in time when there is the realisation that neither the object, i.e. the conventional basis, nor the non-object, i.e. its emptiness, are truly existent. When there is no truly existent object at all the investigated object is not observed. At that time no true existence appears to the mind at all, and one has arrived at a lack of true existence. The non-object is the emptiness of the object. When one realises that the conventional object as well as its suchness, the non-object, lack true existence, then the investigated object is not observed.

Both the conventional basis as well as its suchness lack true existence. Since the suchness is of one nature with its conventional basis then it has to lack true existence, as the basis lacks true existence. If one of them lacks true existence then the other one naturally has to lack true existence. Therefore how could it continue to linger as truly existent before one's awareness?

When objects and non-objects [34]
Do not linger before one's awareness
And since there is no other possibility
The focus is totally pacified in non-existence.

When both conventional objects as well as their ultimate nature, the non-object of suchness, do not linger as truly existent before one's awareness, then, since there is no other possibility for the appearance of true existence, or for the actual existence of true existence, the focus of true existence is totally pacified within the non-existence of true existence.

The third line, 'since there is no other possibility', is based on the logical conclusion that if there are only two modes in which something could exist truly, and if one has refuted both those modes, then logically true existence has been totally refuted. This is because one has refuted the two existing possibilities, and there is no third possibility. Therefore the conceptual thought holding the object of true-grasping to be real is totally pacified within non-true existence.

One can relate this to the resultant stage of the Dharmakaya, which is the stage where one has totally pacified the dualistic appearances within emptiness. Once one has reached this state, where not only the mental afflictions and their seeds, but all dualistic appearances, have been totally pacified, then one has reached the Dharmakaya. Before that, on the level of sentient beings, the non-dual transcendental wisdom has also totally pacified dualistic appearances.

2.1.2.3.2.3. Showing that perfect abandonment will arise

This leads to the following argument, 'How could someone who has pacified all motivational thought benefit others?'

Placing one's hopes in [35]
The wish-fulfilling golden jewel Likewise, to the disciples through the power of prayer
The body of the conqueror appears
After having made offerings to the garuda [36]
Then even if it takes a long time
The poisons and so forth will be pacified
If one makes offerings to the conquerors in accordance with the practices of enlightenment
Bodhisattvas will go beyond sorrow [37]
And will achieve all purposes.
How can one achieve a result by making offerings to something that lacks a mind?
It is explained that it is similar with Nirvana.

The answer is that the wish-fulfilling tree, for example, also does not possess any motivational thought, yet sentient beings are still able to achieve their worldly wishes by praying to that wish-fulfilling tree.

Similarly, buddhas benefit sentient beings despite having no motivational thought. This comes about because of the conditions from the sides of the buddhas, and because of the conditions from the side of the disciples. With the motivation of wanting to benefit sentient beings they engaged in accumulating merits for three countless great eons. Throughout their whole bodhisattva practice, which they did solely for the benefit of sentient beings, they prayed for many aeons to benefit sentient beings, and dedicated their merits to that purpose. Their many different prayers included, 'May sentient beings be purified even just by hearing my name and so forth'. Therefore, once they reach the resultant stage they don't need any further prompting to help sentient beings. It comes naturally, without having to think about it.

From the disciples' side, merits are needed to benefit from the buddhas. Through the coming together of these causes and conditions then the disciples benefit from the buddhas, despite there not being any conceptual effort from the buddhas' side.

The buddhas benefit the sentient beings in a great variety of ways, such as through the supreme emanation body, which is perceived by all disciples. Whether or not they perceive the supreme emanation body does not depend on the purity of the karma of the disciples.

Then there is also the enjoyment body, which has completed all the activities of the Mahayana path, that primarily benefits superior bodhisattvas. The enjoyment body enjoys the completion of the Mahayana path benefiting superior bodhisattvas. The benefit comes about through the conditions from the buddhas' side as well as from one's own side. That is why one needs to make prayers that in the future one will meet with spiritual teachers who are manifestations of the Buddha. If one has a teacher who is not a perfect emanation body, if that teacher is in the aspect of an ordinary monk, then one should still think of one's teacher as being an actual emanation body of the Buddha.

Through the kindness of the Buddha one knows about all the different practices, such as how to progress along the path, how to accumulate merits, how to meditate and so forth. Through that the different mahasiddhas, realised masters and so forth, came about.

The example of the garuda we can discuss next time. In brief the objection is made that actually the prayers that a buddha did while practising the bodhisattva path should not be really all that effective, because they were made quite a long time ago. One point to consider here is the importance of bodhisattvas. Where do buddhas come from? Buddhas arise from bodhisattvas: they followed the bodhisattva path and then arose as buddhas.

Next week is discussion group. It is important to understand the process of the questions, and the answers, such as from which point of view the questions are posed, and then how the answers are given.

Review

With regard to the Mind Only if it exists is there the pervasion that it exists truly?

Student: No, conceptual creations don't exist truly.

For what reason?

Student: They are dependent on the mind positing things, on imputation.

Last time we talked about the common and the uncommon mode of abiding. Since they don't exist out of the uncommon mode of abiding, but exist in a mode common to the apprehension by, and appearance to, conceptual thought, then they don't exist truly.

In the Mind Only system is the vase conventional truth or ultimate truth?

Student: Conventional truth.

Why? What is the mode of it being conventional or illusory truth? One can say because it is a phenomenon that is false since it doesn't exist the way it appears.

What is the definition of illusory conventional truth and ultimate truth in the Mind Only system?

The meaning of ultimate truth is the ultimate object of a pure path that has meditated on it. Conventional truth is that which is not the object of ultimate path having meditated on it. What are the three characteristics that are posited in the Mind Only system?

Student: Other-powered phenomena and conceptual creations.

There is one object left, about which we talked about for quite a long time.

Student: Thoroughly established phenomena.

What is the definition of consciousness?

Student: Clear and knowing.

Are you sure?

Student: Yes.

Take the subject 'superior buddha' - it follows that he is clear knowing?

Student: Why?

It follows that the superior buddha is not clear knowing?

Student: Yes.

The Buddha knows everything but he is not a knower, and the Buddha is conscious of everything but is not consciousness.

What is the meaning of consciousness?

Student: It arises in the aspect of the object.

How many consciousnesses are there?

Student: Six.

Show.

Student: Eye, ear nose, tongue, body and mind.

The question was what types of consciousnesses are there, not the types of primary consciousness, of which there are six. You could posit divisions like valid cognition and consciousnesses that are not valid cognitions, and minds and mental factors. Then mind has the division into six primary consciousnesses and 51 mental factors.

Student: I want to ask a question about the realisation of the emptiness of the emptiness that we discussed tonight - the specifics of the meditation on that topic. If at that time there exists a direct cognition of emptiness, the moment of realisation would be subsequent. I'm just wondering how one goes back to meditate on the emptiness of emptiness? How does one generate that realisation?

If you have realised emptiness directly then you have already realised the emptiness of emptiness. The subsequent doesn't apply to subsequent direct realisations. There are many different inferential cognisers of emptiness, which we have already talked about. The inferential cogniser realises the emptiness of one, and then of the other and so forth. We have explained before how inferential cognisers first realise the emptiness of one, and then transfer that realisation to others.

As usual generate the virtuous motivation of bodhicitta thinking, 'I have to attain enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings, and in order to accomplish that aim I am now going to listen to this profound teaching. Then I am going to put it into practice'.

2.1.2.3.2.2. Showing that it is valid to say that the wisdom realising emptiness can abandon the afflictions

2.1.2.3.2.2.2. In particular (cont.)

Objection

The Buddha cannot benefit sentient beings because he lacks conceptual motivational thought.

Refutation

*Through the power of prayer, [35cd]
The body of the conqueror appears to the disciples*

Objection: 'But how could the prayers that a buddha made on the bodhisattva path benefit sentient beings since those prayers were made a long time ago before that person became enlightened?

This objection is refuted with an example:

*Even if having died after [36]
Having made offerings to Garuda
And a long time after that,
It will still pacify the poison*

Even if a long time has passed since the death of a Brahmin who had established an offering tree to Garuda for the purpose of pacifying all poisons, the practice of Garuda will still pacify poisons.

The meaning of the example:

*Likewise offerings to the conqueror, [37]
In accordance with the Bodhisattva practices
Will achieve all purposes, though the Bodhisattva
Has gone already beyond misery.*

Similarly, if bodhisattvas establish an 'offering tree' to the conquerors by building up the two accumulations of merit and wisdom in an extensive manner, the final result of that will be the two buddha bodies, i.e. the body for the purpose of self and the body for the purpose of others.

These will continue to benefit sentient beings even though the bodhisattva on becoming enlightened, has gone beyond misery into non-abiding nirvana. When the bodhisattvas pass away (in a figurative sense), and become enlightened, they are no longer bodhisattvas but buddhas. The power of the prayers that the bodhisattva made, such as, 'May I be able to benefit all sentient beings effortlessly' still carry on through the two bodies - the form body and the truth body - of a buddha. In such a way they continue to benefit all sentient beings.

One should also relate this to one's own practice, likewise making prayers to be able to effortlessly benefit sentient beings in the future. However, we don't have to be in any hurry to attain enlightenment. We can take our time - there is no need to become too uptight about it!

2.1.2.3.2.3. Showing that perfect abandonment will arise

Objection

*How can a result be achieved [38]
By offering to one lacking mind?
Because it is taught that it does
For both remaining and gone beyond misery.*

Hearer practitioner: 'How can a result be achieved by offering to one lacking mind?' The thought is that since a buddha doesn't have the conceptual thought, 'now I have received the offerings', how could the making of offerings to the Buddha be of any benefit.

Madhyamaka: Because it is taught by the Buddha himself in the sutras, such as the Lion's Roar Sutra, that merits are accumulated with regard to both the one remaining and the one gone beyond sorrow. This means that both accumulate merits, regardless of whether one makes offerings to the Buddha remaining directly in front of oneself, or to representations of the Buddha after his parinirvana.

The Sutra Explaining the Benefits of Circumambulation of a Stupa says the same: 'Regardless of whether it is an actual buddha or whether it is a representation of a buddha that has already gone beyond sorrow, there will no difference in the merits accumulated to a mind of equal faith in both.'

If one recognises the representation of a buddha who has already gone beyond sorrow as the actual buddha, and then makes offerings, circumambulations and so forth, the merit will be exactly the same as if the buddha were actually there.

*That it is possible to have a result nominally [39]
And also ultimately, is taught in scripture.
For example, like have a result
Relative to a true buddha.*

This is saying that it is taught in the scriptures that the result of making offerings to a buddha does not depend on whether one recognises that buddha as being illusory, or whether one thinks of that buddha as existing ultimately. For example, it is taught that even if one believes that the Buddha exists truly, such as what the lower tenets do, and makes offerings to the Buddha on the basis of that belief, one will still accumulate vast merits because of the law of cause and effect will still apply.

2.1.3. Establishing the Mahayana as supreme

2.1.3.1. Establishing that all sutras are the advice of the Buddha

2.1.3.2. Establishing emptiness as the antidote

2.1.3.1. ESTABLISHING THAT ALL SUTRAS ARE THE ADVICE OF THE BUDDHA

There are twelve verses that relate to these outlines, which we will go through slowly, one by one.

Objection

*One becomes liberated by seeing truth, [40ab]
Why should one see emptiness?*

Followers of the hearer vehicle (Primary opponent): 'One can become liberated merely by realising directly, and meditating on, the sixteen aspects of the Four Noble Truths, such as impermanence and so forth. Therefore, what need is there to see the emptiness that is the lack of true existence of all phenomena.' Not only do they not accept that one needs to realise emptiness to become enlightened, they completely refute the Mahayana teachings as being teachings of the Buddha, and do not accept the term selflessness of phenomena even on a figurative level. The selflessness that they associate with the Four Noble Truths is either the lack of a permanent, isolated (partless), independent self, or the lack of a person that is a self-sufficient substantial existent¹, which in the Prasangika system are only the coarse selflessness of person.

Mind Only (Secondary opponent): 'Though there is selflessness of phenomena, it is not necessary to realise it in order to go beyond misery (liberation).'

Response

*Because it is taught in scripture that [40cd]
Without it one will not attain enlightenment.*

The task for the Madhyamaka here is to establish to the opponent that there is a purpose for realising the lack of inherent existence of phenomena. First they do so with the reason of scripture.

Madhyamaka: Because it is taught in the scripture of the Perfection of Wisdom sutras that without the realisation of the selflessness of phenomena one will not attain the enlightenment of a hearer, or a self-liberator or of a buddha.'

In the Great Commentary on the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life it gives quotes from the Perfection of Wisdom sutras such as 'those that have recognition of phenomena cannot attain liberation', and 'All the three-time buddhas, and all the other realisations from the attainment of a stream enterer up to the attainment of a self-liberator, are attained in dependence on the perfection of wisdom alone.'

Hinayana: 'This does not prove anything to me because I don't accept the perfection of wisdom scriptures as valid sutras'.

*If the Mahayana is not established [41]
The how are your texts established?
Since they are established for both.
Initially it is not established for you.
The conditions through which you generate faith [42ab]
Are the same for the Mahayana.*

Madhyamaka: 'If you don't accept the Mahayana sutras to be authentic, then how do you establish the Hinayana sutras as valid scriptures?'

Hinayana: 'They are authentic because they are established as valid by both of us.'

Madhyamaka: 'But they were not valid for you initially, because at the time of your birth, or before you had investigated their meaning through listening and contemplation, they were not authentic scriptures for you.'

First you established with logic the Great Treatise, which identifies the three baskets of teachings, as valid scriptural reference. And then, in dependence on the Great Treatise, you identify the Hinayana sutras as valid scriptures. The Great Treatise shows how the teachings on the higher training of morality form the Vinaya basket; how the teachings on the higher training of concentration form the Sutra basket; and how the teachings on the higher training of wisdom form the Abhidharma basket.

This style of establishing faith is the same for us with the Mahayana sutras.'

*If true because two others assert it [42cd]
The Vedas and so forth also become true.*

If you do not use this system to identify whether a scripture is a sutra or not, and base your assertion of the validity of a sutra on whether it is accepted by two parties, then one would also have to say that the Vedas would be valid teachings, because they are accepted by two parties as valid'.

*If you say, 'The Mahayana is in question', [43]
Non-buddhists also question the texts,
And other texts are also questioned by Self and other, therefore they should be abandoned.*

Hinayana: 'Since the Hinayana scriptures we accept as authentic teachings by the Buddha are also accepted by you as such there is not argument between us about them. But there is debate regarding the Mahayana scriptures you accept as authentic teaching, because we do not accept them.'

Mahayana: 'If you deny the Mahayana sutras for the reason that they are being questioned, then you should also deny the Hinayana sutras. Firstly, the Hinayana sutras are questioned by non-Buddhists and Hinayanists alike. Secondly, while the authenticity of the Hinayana sutras is accepted by the eighteen Hinayana schools, there are certain teachings such as the Sutra Explaining the Intermediate State that are not accepted by all.'

It is not possible to even attain nirvana without realising emptiness

*If the root of the teachings is the essential bikkhu,[44]
Even the essential bikkhu has a problem.
The mind endowed with an object,
Has difficulty even to abide beyond sorrow.*

The term 'essential bikkhu' refers to arhats. Arhats preserved in their perfect memory the Buddhas teachings, and that is why they are referred to as the root of the teachings. If the root of the teachings is the essential bikkhu, then even the essential bikkhu has a problem, because the mind that is endowed with an object has difficulty even to abide beyond sorrow.

This shows that even the attainment of liberation is impossible without the realisation of emptiness, and that those who do not accept the lack of inherent existence of all phenomena can not become arhats. The mind endowed with a truly existent object can not counteract true-grasping because it can not negate the apprehended object of true-grasping. It is true-grasping. Therefore, the realisation of mere coarse selflessness can not counteract true-grasping, because it does not realise the absence of the apprehended object of true-grasping.

Even because not only can one not become enlightened without the wisdom realising emptiness, one can not even attain liberation.

As usual, generate the motivation of wanting to attain enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings thinking, 'Towards that end I am then going to listen to this profound teaching and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

2.1.3.2. ESTABLISHING EMPTINESS AS THE ANTIDOTE (CONT.)¹

2.1.3.2.1. It is not even possible to attain nirvana without realising emptiness

If the root of the teachings is the essential bikkhu,
[44]

Even the essential bikkhu has a problem.

The mind endowed with an object,

Has difficulty even to abide beyond sorrow.

There are two reasons why essential bikkhus are referred to 'the root of the teachings'.

First of all, the term essential bikkhu refers to arhats. In general, it is said that the root of the teachings are the vows of individual liberation. The ultimate practitioners of those vows are arhats, and therefore arhats are referred to as roots of the teachings.

Secondly, arhats such as Mahakashyapa, Ananda and Upali kept the teachings preserved in their perfect memory and were able to recite it to others. Therefore they are regarded as roots of the teachings. At the first Buddhist council of five hundred arhats, Mahakashyapa recited the sutras belonging to the Abhidharma basket, Ananda recited the sutras belonging to the sutra basket, and Upali recited the teachings belonging to the Vinaya basket of teachings.

2.1.3.2.2. The consequence of becoming an arhat merely by abandoning the manifest afflictions

If 'liberated through abandonment of the afflictions'
[45a]

Here, the followers of the Hearer vehicle say that one can eliminate mental afflictions and be liberated from cyclic existence by meditating on the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths, such as impermanence and so forth. Therefore, they say, it is not necessary to realise emptiness in order to abandon mental afflictions.

Madhyamaka: It is, of course, possible to realise the lack of a person as a self-sufficient substantial existent, and by meditating on that selflessness abandon a certain level of manifest afflictions. However, according to the Prasangika system, one will not be able to abandon the manifest afflictions as asserted by the lower tenets. This is because according to the Prasangika system, the lack of a person that is a self-sufficient substantial existent is not, strictly speaking, even the selflessness of person.

Immediately afterwards one becomes that [45b]

The Madhyamaka posit this consequence: if one can be liberated by meditating on the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths then it follows that by merely abandoning the manifest afflictions as taught in the two texts on knowledge, The Compendium of Knowledge, and *The Treasury of Knowledge*², one would immediately afterwards become an arhat. This means that non-Buddhist practitioners who abandon the manifest afflictions would also be arhats.

Though not having afflictions, [45cd]
One can see that their karma is still potent.

Madhyamaka: Though such a person does not have any manifest afflictions in their mental continuum, one can observe that the karma to project a future life is still potent in their continuum.

2.1.3.2.3. Refuting the answer to the consequence

If, 'Occasional craving taking forcefully, [46ab]
It is certain I say it does not exist.'

Hearer follower: 'It is not a mere occasional abandonment but certain liberation because, even though the karma in the person who has abandoned the manifest afflictions might still be potent, the conducive condition of craving that induces the next existence does not exist in that person's continuum. At the time of death the potent karma has to be ripened through the conducive conditions of craving and grasping, and though the karma might still be potent, it will not ripen as the conducive conditions of craving and grasping are lacking.'

One can say that at the time of death, craving relates to appearances of this life, while grasping relates to appearances of the next existence.

Though this craving is not afflicted, [46cd]
Why should it not be like ignorance?

Madhyamaka: 'Though the craving arising from the transitory view grasping at the person as a self-sufficient substantial existent might be a non-manifest affliction at that time, but why should it not be the same for craving as it is for ignorance? We have common ignorance as explained in the Two Knowledges, and uncommon ignorance according to the Prasangika.'

There is the common ignorance that is taught in the Two Knowledges, which is the ignorance grasping at the person as a self-sufficient substantial existent. Then there is the uncommon ignorance as taught in the Prasangika system, which is the ignorance grasping at an inherently existent self. The line 'Why should it not be like ignorance?' means that since that are two levels of ignorance, why should it not also be the same for craving? There is the coarser craving that is induced by the transitory view grasping at the person as a self-sufficient substantial existent, and the more subtle craving that is induced by the transitory view grasping at an inherently existent self.

In the first system the root is the grasping at the person as a self-sufficient substantial existent, from which arises attachment to pleasure and anger to suffering. This then gives rise to the other root and affiliated afflictions. There is a whole set of root and affiliated delusions which have the grasping at the person as a self-sufficient substantial existent as their root.

Then there is the more subtle level of root and affiliated afflictions, which have as their root the grasping at inherent existence. Through meditating only on the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths as taught in the Two Knowledges, a person may have abandoned the manifest craving that is induced by the grasping at the person as a self-sufficient substantial existent, but that will not even dent the manifest craving that arises from grasping at the self as inherently existent. The craving that arises from the grasping at the self as inherently existent will not be harmed in the slightest by the meditation on the sixteen aspects alone. Although it can abandon the manifest coarse afflictions to a degree, it will not abandon the seed of the afflictions at all.

*Craving arises from feeling,
And those with feeling have it;
It abides for some, whose Mind is endowed with an object.* [47]

These lines establish that the person who has abandoned the manifest afflictions according to the Two Knowledges still has craving, and therefore can still take rebirth.

Madhyamaka: By grasping at the feeling of happiness as truly existent one generates craving to make contact with happiness. By grasping at suffering as truly existent one generates the craving to be separate from the feeling of suffering. Practitioners with feeling who have not abandoned the grasping at true existence will always have craving.

Therefore, to counteract craving it is not enough to just to realise the lack of true existence of something in general. One needs to realise the lack of true existence of happiness and suffering. Otherwise, by grasping at the feelings of happiness and suffering as truly existent, one will generate the craving to meet with the feeling of happiness, and to be separated from the feeling of suffering.

The mind endowed with a truly existent object is true grasping. We previously said that true grasping is the grasping at the basis, path and result as truly existent. As long as one is endowed with that grasping, one is endowed with true grasping. As long as the mind is endowed with true grasping, and has not realised that the absence of the apprehended object of true grasping, then that mind will also have craving.

2.1.3.2.4. Showing the need to meditate on emptiness to even achieve just liberation

*The mind lacking emptiness
Will arise again despite ceasing,
Like the absorption without recognition.
Then, meditate on emptiness.* [48]

Even though the manifest afflictions might have ceased momentarily through meditating on the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths, these afflictions will arise again, for as long as the mind lacks the realisation of emptiness - the realisation of the lack of true existence of person and aggregates. It is similar to absorption without recognition, where the manifest afflictions have ceased temporarily, but then rise again. That's why one needs to meditate on emptiness in order to attain liberation and enlightenment. That's the instruction.

Then come three verses that establish the Mahayana sutras as authentic Buddhist teachings. However there is some doubt amongst some scholars as to whether or not these three verses were part of the original text, because they repeat a point that was made earlier.

*If the words regarded as sutras
Are regarded as teachings of the Buddha
Why do you not regard the sutras
Of the Mahayana likewise?* [49]

This asks the question, 'If the words that teach the superior training of the mind are regarded as Sutra basket, and those dealing with the morality are regarded as Vinaya basket, and those dealing with wisdom are regarded as Abhidharma basket, and since the Mahayana sutras also mostly deal with the three higher trainings, then why don't you also regard the Mahayana sutras as authentic sutras?'

*If, because of only one
All become faulty,
Then why, through one concordant sutra,
Are not all teachings of the conqueror?* [50]

'If you feel that the Mahayana sutras are not authentic scriptures because there is one Mahayana sutra that doesn't fit your definition of an authentic sutra, then one could likewise say, "Why wouldn't you accept all of the Mahayana sutras" as valid sutras, if there is even just one valid sutra according to your definition.

'If all the Mahayana sutras become faulty because there is one sutra that doesn't fit your description of a valid sutra, then by the same reasoning, one could say that they are all valid as long as there is one sutra that fits your description of a valid sutra.' The sutras that they have a particular problem with are the Extensive, Medium and Condensed Perfection of Wisdom Sutras.

*The words are not comprehended
By the great Mahakashyapa and so forth.
Who would disregard them,
Just because you do not realise them?* [51]

Here the Hinayana say that the Perfection of Wisdom Sutras are not comprehended even by such great beings as the Mahakashyapa and so forth, and therefore they are not authentic sutras.

Madhyamaka: 'Who would disregard the Perfection of Wisdom Sutras, which have actually been pronounced as being very profound by the great Mahakashyapa, just because you do not realise their have profound meaning? Nobody in their right mind would disregard the Perfection of Wisdom Sutras as authentic sutras just because you don't realise them.'

2.1.3.2.4.1. Showing why emptiness is the path to nirvana while avoiding the two extremes

Ordinary individuals are bound by true-grasping and attachment and abide in the extreme of existence, because they have to take rebirth through karma and afflictions. Hearer and self-liberated arhats who have attained individual liberation while not abiding in the extreme of existence, abide in the extreme of peace. Arya Bodhisattvas don't abide in the two extremes of existence and peace: on the one hand they are not bound by cyclic existence, and on the other hand they have not gone to the extreme of peace. They take rebirth in cyclic existence out of compassion for sentient beings. This is a result of their realisation of emptiness, and that is why the attainment of non-abiding nirvana is the fruit of the realisation of emptiness. The attainment of the non-abiding nirvana is the fruit of the wisdom of realising emptiness, and therefore it is inappropriate to refute the view of emptiness. That is why one must meditate repeatedly on emptiness.

Review

What is the meaning of afflictions?

Student: Any thought that may upset the peace of mind.

Are you sure? How many root afflictions are there?

Students: Six.

Name them.

Student: Attachment, ignorance, hatred, pride, deluded doubt and wrong view.

What is attachment?

Student: The mind that doesn't want to be separated from an object.

That could also be virtue, such as the mind that doesn't want to be separated from bodhicitta, or the Buddha.

What is the meaning of liberation?

Student: Being free from cyclic existence.

Is this vase liberated?

As usual we should begin with a virtuous motivation thinking, 'I have to attain enlightenment for the benefit of all sentient beings. In order to do so I am going to listen to this profound teaching and put it into practice as much as possible'.

2.1.3.2.4.2. For those wishing for liberation it is suitable to meditate on emptiness

*Emptiness is the antidote against the darkness [54]
Of afflictive and omniscience obscurations.
How can those wishing for quick omniscience
Not meditate on it?*

Afflictive obscurations are the afflictions such as ignorance, attachment and anger, and their seeds.

Obscurations to omniscience have a two-fold division into seed and manifest obscurations. The seed part is the imprints of the affliction that have the power to produce dualistic appearances in the mind, while manifest obscurations to omniscience are the actual dualistic appearance to the mind. Until one has abandoned true grasping, one's mind will be obscured by dualistic appearances.

The wisdom realising emptiness is the antidote to the darkness of the afflictive and omniscience obscurations. Therefore how could those wishing to attain quick liberation and omniscience not meditate on it?

The hearer follower replies, 'Well I don't really feel like meditating on emptiness because it makes me afraid'. They can be forgiven for that argument, because if one does not know how to meditate on emptiness properly then one falls into the extreme of nihilism, where everything becomes non-existent.

The Madhyamaka reply,

*If one generates fear [55]
Of the phenomena generating suffering
Then why generate fear of emptiness,

This is a slight rebuke saying, 'Well actually the real danger is generated by truly existent phenomena'. By this they mean that by grasping at phenomena as truly existent one generates all the different sufferings that one is right to fear, but that there is really no reason to be afraid of emptiness, which in fact pacifies suffering.

Emptiness is not really a phenomenon to be afraid of, because it pacifies all fears and dangers, while true-grasping, which is the root of cyclic existence, should be the actual object of one's fear.

*If one becomes afraid of anything [56]
Should some selves exist,
Since there is no nature at all
Who is the one afraid?*

One generates fear if, at the time of analysis, one finds that some selves do exist from their own side. No-one is afraid if at the time of analysis no self nature is found at all. But if there is a strong perception of the person existing independently from its own side, one experiences fear at the time of analysis.

2.2. Practising it through meditation

2.2.1. Establishing the selflessness of person through reason

2.2.2. Establishing the selflessness of phenomena through reason

Different in basis

The self that is being negated in the term 'selflessness' is the self that exists out of its own nature, independently, from its own side. This is the self that is referred to in Introduction to the Middle Way where it says, 'Since all our faults of delusions and so forth arise from the view of the transitory collections, yogis abandon the self'. This is the self to be negated. Grasping at that self constitutes self-grasping. Without realising the absence of such a self it is impossible to counteract self-grasping.

If this type of self existence is negated on the person it is the selflessness of person, and if it is negated on phenomena it is the selflessness of phenomena. That is why there is no difference in the subtlety of the two selflessness. They only differ from the point of view of the basis of negation, and not from the point of view of the object of negation.

In Introduction to the Middle Way the selflessness of phenomena was explained before the selflessness of person, which is in accordance with the sequence of generation of the two types of self-grasping. Here the selflessness of person is explained before the selflessness of phenomena in accordance with the sequence in which the two selflessness are realised.

Innate and intellectually acquired

There is also the two fold division of self-grasping into innate self-grasping and intellectually acquired self-grasping. Innate self-grasping is the self-grasping that arises naturally in one's mind. Intellectually acquired self-grasping is the true grasping that is generated through thinking about reasons. On investigating the nature of phenomena some individuals arrive at the conclusion that phenomena exist truly, which is an intellectually acquired true grasping. Others, of higher intelligence, arrive at the conclusion that phenomena lack true existence.

Intellectually acquired true grasping is a true grasping that is generated in dependence on reason, i.e. having some reason for thinking that phenomena exist truly. It only exists in the continuum of tenet holders, and therefore is not regarded as the root of cyclic existence. Innate true grasping is true grasping that arises naturally in the mind. Only innate true grasping is the root of cyclic existence.

2.2.1. Establishing the selflessness of person through reason

2.2.1.1. The way of refuting the object of innate true grasping

2.2.1.2. The way of refuting the object of the intellectually acquired true grasping

2.2.1.1. THE WAY OF REFUTING THE OBJECT OF INNATE TRUE GRASPING

If the self is found in the basis of imputation then it has to exist either in the body or the mind. The body as a whole or some part of it, or the mind as a whole or some part of it, has to be the self, and that is what is being refuted through this analysis.

The significance is that not only does the object that is imputed not exist inherently, but the basis of imputation also does not exist inherently. This second point is usually more difficult to understand. How one has to approach this is that the basis of imputation does not exist inherently, because it is not found at the time of analysis. If one approaches it in this way, thinking that the basis of imputation does not exist inherently because it is not found at the time of analysis, then it will become clearer. If one says straight away that the basis of imputation simply does not exist truly, then it is more difficult, because one would still feel that the object is existing from its own side.

The self is merely labelled in dependence on the aggregates. If the object of the thought thinking, 'I', which is present most of the time, is really existent within the basis of imputation then it has to exist either in the body or in the mind. Either the body as a whole, or some part of the body has to be the 'I', or the mind as a whole, or some part of the mind, has to be the 'I'. Sequentially refuting that they are not establishes that the 'I' is not findable at the time of analysis. This means that the 'I' does not exist intrinsically within the body or mind. That leaves only the possibility that the 'I' is merely labelled in dependence on the body and mind, which is the 'I' that actually exists. The focal object of the mere 'I'-grasping is the mere 'I' that exists as merely labelled in dependence on the body and the mind.

*The teeth, hair and nail are not the self; [57]
The self is not the bones or blood,
Not the nasal mucus or phlegm,
And also not lymph or pus.*

*The self is not the fat or sweat, [58]
And neither the lungs nor liver are the self.
The other inner organs are also not the self,
The self was not urinated to the outside.*

The teeth, hair and nails are not the self. That we know. Neither are the bones and blood an example for the self. Nasal mucus and phlegm are not the self, and neither is lymphatic liquid or pus. None of these parts of the body are the self, which is merely labelled in dependence on those parts.

Neither fat nor sweat are examples of the self, because the self is merely labelled in dependence on those. Neither the lungs nor the liver are the self, nor are other inner organs, such as the intestines and so forth, the self, because the self is merely imputed in dependence on these body parts. The emphasis here is that the self is merely imputed in dependence on those body parts. Likewise, neither the urine nor the faeces are the self. Also the flesh and the skin are not the self, because the self is merely imputed on them.

*The flesh and skin are not the self, [59]
The heat and air are not the self,
The holes are not the self, and certainly the Six primary consciousnesses are not the self.*

The heat and the air and so forth, are not the self. Here the four elements of fire, air, space and consciousnesses are refuted as examples of the self. Neither the fire element nor the wind element, nor the holes like the nostrils and so forth, which are the space element, are the self. And certainly the six primary consciousnesses are also not the self.

None of the six elements are the self because the self is merely imputed in dependence on them. This refutation of approaching the analysis from the point of view of the six elements is accordance with Nagarjuna's Precious Garland, where the same reasoning is used. None of the six elements individually are the self, and the self is also not contained in the mere collection of the six aggregates, because the self is merely labelled in dependence on the six aggregates.

Review

At the beginning of Introduction to the Middle Way it says, 'In order to liberate sentient beings from cyclic existence, he taught selflessness of person and the selflessness of phenomena'. What is the difference between the two selflessnesses?

Student: The base is different.

What is the difference between self-grasping at person and the view of the transitory collections?

Student: The view of the transitory collection is self-grasping at the person of one's own continuum, while self-grasping at person is self-grasping at person in general.

If it is self-grasping at person, is it necessarily the view of the transitory collection?

Student: No. Grasping at the self of person in another person's continuum is not the transitory view.

What is the meaning of cyclic existence?

Student: Being bound to the contaminated aggregates by karma and afflictions.

Then that means the person is cyclic existence, because the person is bound to the contaminated aggregates.

Take the example of a person who is bound to a tree: the tree is cyclic existence, the rope is karma and afflictions, and the person is the self. We are bound to cyclic existence by karma and contaminated aggregates. Sometimes the meaning of cyclic existence is defined as that which takes repeated rebirth through karma and afflictions.

What is the object of the negation of the self of person?

Student: The person not found under direct analysis.

I was looking for the inherent or intrinsically existing person. This leads on to the next question. What is the meaning of inherent existence? If one doesn't refute the inherently existing person, one doesn't arrive at the lack of inherent existence.

Student question: Is a person existing independently, by way of its own nature, including being independent from the designating thought, the object of negation?

That is correct.

The Svatantrika-Madhyamaka say that a person, while not existing independently of the imputed mind, still has something from its own side. The Mind Only say that it exists out of its own uncommon mode of abiding. The Svatantrika-Madhyamaka say that everything is merely labelled, while the Prasangika say that everything is merely labelled 'on', emphasising that there is nothing from the side of object.

Is the person to be found somewhere as part of the elements?

Students: No.

The absence of person among the elements is the subtle emptiness. Sometimes, when one analyses too hard one falls into nihilism.

Student: Can you say a few more words about why consciousness is not the self. We keep coming back to this time and again. What is the most compelling way of dismissing that idea?

We say, 'my mind'. There is a feeling that the mind belongs to one. This is the indication that the consciousness is not the self. Because the thought of 'I' it is not generated with regard to the body, or aggregates. There is another basis with regards to which one thinks 'I'.

As usual, please sit yourself comfortably and relax. Place your mind inwards, not engaging with external objects. Then generate a virtuous motivation, thinking, 'I have to attain enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. In order to do so I am now going to listen to this profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

2.2. Practising selflessness through meditation

2.2.1. Establishing the selflessness of person through reason

Last time we completed talking about the way of meditating on the lack of the object of innate self-grasping of person.

2.2.1.2. MEDITATING ON THE SELFLESSNESS THAT IS THE LACK OF THE OBJECT OF THE INTELLECTUALLY ACQUIRED TRUE-GRASPING AT PERSON¹

What is being refuted here are the different types of self that are posited by non-Buddhists. Even though there are a great variety of positions taken by different non-Buddhist tenets, Shantideva concentrates on the two main positions of the Samkya and Vaisheshika. By refuting these two positions, all the other various non-Buddhists views regarding the self will also be implicitly refuted.

2.2.1.2.1. Refuting the self to be consciousness (as posited by the Enumerators or Samkya)

2.2.1.2.2. Refuting the self to be matter (as posited by the Particularists)

2.2.1.2.3. Refuting objections regarding selflessness

2.2.1.2.1. Refuting the self to be consciousness

The view of the Samkya

The Samkya assert a permanent, isolated, independent self, which is consciousness. They refer to the self as sentient being, knower, consciousness or experience. They attribute to this self five qualities:

1. Engaging - engaging happiness, suffering, and so forth.
2. Permanence - being a permanent functionality
3. Not being the creator, i.e. not being the creator of the different manifestations of the primary principle
4. Lacking qualities - lacking qualities of particles, darkness and courage
5. Lacking action - being pervading

Here the question arises, is the grasping at the person possessing these five previously mentioned characteristics intellectually acquired self-grasping not?

This question arises because if it is intellectually acquired self-grasping, then one realises selflessness by realising the absence of its apprehended object. What do you think?

Here one can draw a fine distinction between intellectually acquired self-grasping and self-grasping generated through tenets. Even though this is self-grasping that is generated through tenets, by realising the absence of its object, one does not realise selflessness. Therefore it might be mistaken to classify it as intellectually acquired self-grasping per se. One has to make a fine distinction here.

The Enumerators classify objects of knowledge into twenty-five categories.

- The primary principle. It exists truly and ultimately, and is only a cause and not an effect. The qualities of courage (happiness), particles (equanimity), and darkness (suffering) are perfectly balanced within it.
- The person, also exists truly and ultimately, but is neither cause nor effect.
- The five sense objects of form, sound, smell, taste and tactile sensations, plus awareness and pride, are both cause and effect.
- The eleven faculties, which are effects but not causes
- The five elements (4 + space), which are effects but not causes

The faculties and elements are only effects because they are only expressions of the primary principle. The Enumerators, or Samkya, say that the expressions of the primary principle are all of one partless nature with the primary principle.

They have their own view of how sentient beings circle in cyclic existence, and how they then attain liberation. When the person generates the desire to engage objects such as sounds, the nature of the primary principle is aware of that, and emanates these sounds. From the nature of the primary principle arises awareness, from which arises pride. From pride arise the eleven faculties and five sense objects. From the five sense objects arise the five elements.

They say that awareness is like a double mirror, externally reflecting the expressions of the primary principles such as forms and so forth, and internally reflecting the self. Through that the self is able to engage the different objects. They say that the reason why the self circles in cyclic existence is because it grasps at the action and at the agent as being one.

In order to attain liberation one has to apprehend the solitary self. This is done by initially reflecting on the disadvantages of the sensory objects, and so attaining calm abiding. Then, through the union of calm abiding and special insight, one generates meditative absorption. In dependence on the meditative absorption one generates the clairvoyance of the divine eye, with which one is able to see the primary principle. When one looks at the primary principle it will withdraw just like a modest girl, who has been surprised in the nude. The primary principle will withdraw from the self, and all its expressions will absorb in reverse sequence into it. The only thing that is left is the solitary self, at which point one has attained liberation. You can read up more about this in the Precious Garland of Tenets.

THE ACTUAL REFUTATION BY THE MADHYAMAKA

*If the consciousness of sound were permanent [60]
One would apprehend sound all the time.
If there are no objects of knowledge how can
One say what is known by what?*

The Samkya say that consciousness of sound is a permanent functionality. Sound is that which is being engaged, and consciousness is that which engages sound. In this context, when it refers to consciousness it refers to the self.

Madhyamaka: 'If the knower of sound is permanent, then regardless of whether or not external sound is present, that knower would apprehend sound constantly, because of being a permanent functionality. But that is invalid because if there is not object of knowledge then how can one say this consciousness is the object-possessor of such and such an object.'

The Samkya reply, 'That is not established because even though there might be no sound, the consciousness apprehending sound is permanently established'.

*If it is consciousness without that known [61]
Then it follows that also wood is conscious.
Therefore one has to say that without proximity of The object of knowledge consciousness does not exist.*

Madhyamaka: 'It follows that even wood is conscious, because it is possible to be consciousness without having an object. Considering all of this one has to say if you do not accept that it is ascertained that without the proximity of sound the consciousness of sound does not exist, then there is no time when sound is not apprehended.'

*If, 'they know form', [62]
Why do they not hear anything at that time?
If, 'because there is no proximity to sound,'
Then there is also no consciousness of it.*

The Samkya reply, 'The fault of an objectless consciousness does not exist, because at the time of no sound the consciousness that is the permanent person engages form'.

Madhyamaka: 'Why should the person that is engaging form not hear sound even though there is no sound? After all, that person is a permanent functionality engaging the five objects without distinction.'

The Samkya reply, 'When there is no proximity to sound there is no consciousness of sound'.

Madhyamaka: 'If there is no knower of the object when there is no object then there is no permanent person.'

What you have to keep in mind is that the Samkya start out with the root proposition that the person is this permanent consciousness of sound. When asked, 'Why would one not hear everything all the time?' they say, 'Because there is no immediate proximity to sound'.

The Madhyamaka recognise that this is an opening where the Samkya have contradicted themselves. They say, 'Well, that actually contradicts your assertion of a permanent person. Because if you say that if there is no object there is no object-possessor, then there is no consciousness of the object, which contradicts your assertion that the person is a permanent knower of sound'.

*How could that which is in the nature of the apprehension [63]
Of sound become the apprehension of form?
One is labelled as father and son
But is not perfect.*

Madhyamaka: That which is in the nature of the apprehension of sound does not become the apprehension of form. because they are two mutually exclusive aspects.

The Samkya reply, 'Well, one person can be simultaneously labelled as father and son. Similarly, one consciousness can be labelled simultaneously as the apprehension of sound and the apprehension of form. Even though the manifestation of sound might not be present, since sound and form are of one nature, when form is present the nature of sound is also present. And therefore at that time the apprehension of form is also the object-possessor of sound.'

They have this notion that the person is this solitary partless entity of consciousness. They don't have the possibility of positing a consciousness that is made up out of parts, where one part is the apprehension of form and one part is the apprehension of sound. Instead, what they say is that it depends on how you look at it. If you look at it from one perspective, it is the apprehension of sound; if you look at it from another perspective, it is the apprehension of form. That is as valid as saying that one person is simultaneously father and son. That is how they posit the person as being the object possessor of form and sound simultaneously.

Madhyamaka: 'But it is not perfect'. What this means is that one person can be both father and son simultaneously, but not as a perfectly established phenomenon. This means that it is only a merely imputed phenomenon, and not ultimately established on the one person. That person is not ultimately both father and son, but only nominally on an imputed level. Being perfectly established is a synonym for being inherently established.

The Madhyamaka say, 'Your example does not really fit here because you assert that one consciousness is ultimately both the apprehension of sound and the apprehension of form. In the example it is possible for one person to be both father and son, because that person does not exist ultimately as father and son, but is only merely labelled as father and son'.

*Thus, courage and particles [64]
As well as darkness are neither father nor son.
It is not seen as possessing
The nature of apprehending sound.*

This explains to the Samkya why something that ultimately exists cannot be labelled both as father and son at the same time.

Madhyamaka: 'Within the primary principle, where the three qualities of courage, particles and darkness are in a state of balance, the natures of father and son do not exist, since you yourself say, 'the supreme nature of qualities is not something that can be seen; Whatever can be seen is an accumulation, like an illusion.'

Courage refers to happiness; particles refer to equanimity; darkness refers to suffering. The natures of father and son can not exist within the primary principle, or ultimate truth, because the primary principle cannot be observed. It is not possible for the primary principle to be both son and father on different occasions, because it is the primordial substance. The reasoning is that since it is the primordial substance, it cannot be present within the expressions of that substance.

Madhyamaka: 'Further, if the apprehension of form were to possess the apprehension of sound, then that would be something observable, which it is not.'

If, 'like an actor, it is seen [65]
In a different guise,' - it is impermanent.
In case, 'the different guise is one
With it,' that is without precedent.

Samkya: 'The different apprehensions are different expressions of the one consciousness, like an actor who is seen in different guises at different times.'

Madhyamaka: 'It follows that the person is not a permanent functionality because at one time is in the mode of the apprehension of sound, and then later it is in the mode of the apprehension of form. It is not a permanent functionality, because it is later something that it wasn't earlier, and it is earlier something that it won't be later, which makes it an impermanent object.'

The Samkya reply, 'There is no fault because the earlier and later apprehension of form and sound are of one nature'.

Madhyamaka: 'If you say that the subsequent apprehension of form is of one nature with the earlier apprehension of sound, then that is without precedent because they exist at completely different instances.'

In case, 'the different guise is not true,' [66]
That is how you assert your nature.
If you say, 'only consciousness', according
To that it follows that all beings are one.
Also the animate and inanimate [67ab]
Become one because of their shared existence.

Samkya: 'There is no fault, because the different appearances are not true. The appearance of a different guise is misleading.'

Madhyamaka: 'If consciousness does not appear the way it exists, then when you refer to consciousness as being truly existent, what consciousness are you talking about? If it is not true it can not be truly existent'.

Samkya: 'The very person that is knowing consciousness is truly existent.'

Madhyamaka: 'Then it follows that all beings that are actually of different continuum would be one, because they are truly existent, permanent, pervasive, partless consciousnesses. Further, not only would all beings be one, but all animate and inanimate objects would be one, because of being permanent, partless, and pervasive.'

When the particulars are distorted [67cd]
Then what could be their shared basis?

Out of the twenty-five categories of objects, the Samkya say that twenty-three are false, while the person and the primary principle are true and are truly existent. How could these various distorted false expressions of the primary principle have the truly existent primary principle as their shared basis? That is not possible because the expressions are false.

Next time is discussion group and then exam. Have a good discussion. Also, everybody should come to the exam, do their best and write a good exam!

Please sit yourself comfortably in the meditation posture and generate a virtuous motivation. Initially turn the mind inwards, and then generate the virtuous motivation of wanting to attain enlightenment for the benefit of all sentient beings thinking, 'In order to achieve this purpose I am now going to listen to this profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

2.2.1.2.2. Refuting the position of the Particularists (Vaishesika) that the self is matter

*The inanimate is also not the self [68]
For the very reason that it is inanimate, like a vase.
Then if, 'because it is endowed with consciousness
It is conscious,' it follows not knowing becomes redundant.*

*If there is nothing that becomes the self [69]
How does the mind affect it?
Thus, devoid of consciousness and action,
It is as if space has been made the self.*

Madhyamaka: Not only is consciousness not the self, but neither is matter the self. The assertion that the self is matter, as posited by the Particularists, is invalid. The inanimate is not the self for the very reason that it is inanimate, for example, like the vase. The self has to be something that possesses mind, and form does not possess mind. Therefore it cannot be the self.

If something that is inanimate were to be the self, then it would follow that, since it does not possess mind, it would not know anything.

Particularists: Even though the self is matter, because it is established through dependent arising it can possess mind.

Madhyamaka: That the person later comes to know the five sense objects through outer conditions, refutes the assertion of a truly existent person who initially does not know the five sense objects.

Also, if there is nothing that becomes the self, then how does the mind affect it? Since the self is permanent then how could it know something through conditions? As the Particularists assert that the self is devoid of impermanence, and assert that the self is permanent, it follows that the self is also devoid of action and activity. It also implies that the self cannot actually be affected by causes and conditions, which means that it cannot know through causes and conditions.

'To sum up, if you assert such a self you might as well say that space is the self.'

The Particularists assert a self that they say is form, but at the same time they say that it is permanent and truly existent. The Madhyamika initially presented the argument that that which does not have mind, the inanimate, is also not the self for the very reason that, like a vase, it doesn't have mind. To this the Particularists replied that the self does have mind, because it is established through different causes and conditions. Then the Madhyamaka say, 'Well if you say that the self knows through different causes and conditions, then that negates your assertion that the self exists truly. Further, if the self is permanent and is devoid of any action or activity, then it also cannot be affected by anything. To sum up, if you assert a self that does not know and is devoid of action, you might as well assert that space is the self'.

2.2.1.2.3. Refuting objections regarding the Buddhist position on the self

This deals with the argument by the non-Buddhists saying that the self has to be permanent, because the self has to pervade all past and future lives. They say this would not be possible if the self were impermanent. The Buddhist view is that the self is impermanent; it changes on a basis that it is momentary. The non-Buddhists say that since the self comes from past lives to future lives, it therefore has to exist in all past and future lives, and therefore the self has to be permanent.

Here there are three objections:

1. If the self were impermanent then the karmic cause and effect could not exist.
2. If the self were impermanent then it would be invalid to meditate on compassion.
3. (The non-Buddhists say that the permanent self has not been refuted.¹)

If the self were impermanent then the karmic cause and effect could not exist

*In case it is said, 'Should the self not exist, [70]
Karmic cause and effect relationships
Become invalid because if one disintegrates upon Creating the karma, whose karma does it become?'*

This is an important point since the self is that which is bound to cyclic existence, and that which is liberated from cyclic existence. The self creates karmic causes and has to experience the effects. The non-Buddhists say that if the self is not eternal then the karmic cause and effect relationship would be invalid, because, for example, the person who creates the karma would not exist at that time when the karmic fruits are experienced. For the same person to experience the karma that he or she created earlier, that person has to be permanent. They say that only on the basis of a permanent self does the law of karmic cause and effect make sense, and that it does not make sense on the basis of an impermanent person.

The non-Buddhists assert an eternal self, because they say that if the self were impermanent, the person who experiences the karmic result would be different from the person who created the cause. But at the same time they do say that the self changes. The person who creates the karma is not the person experiencing the karmic result. But the person is permanent.

Answer by parallel reason

The basis of action and result is different, [71]

*And though the creator self does not exist then,
Since this is the same for both of us,
Isn't this debate here pointless?*

The Madhyamaka make use of this view saying, 'Well, both of us accept that the person who experiences the karmic results is not the same person who created the karmic causes. This means that according to your reason both our systems would be erroneous. According to you the person experiencing the karmic results is different to the karmic causes were created. The self who created the karmic causes in one life does not exist in the life when the karmic effects are experienced. Even though you assert that the self is permanent in both instances, are we not both basically saying the same thing? Therefore isn't this debate here pointless?'

The Madhyamaka are saying that if the fault ascribed to them really existed then the non-Buddhists would have the same fault in their own system.

*Or do you say that with a cause is also [72]
Endowed with the result? This is not observed.
In dependence on one continuum
We refer to agent and engaged.*

Madhyamaka: Further, the persons of the earlier life and the later life are two different people. If the person experiencing the effect is permanent then that person should exist at the time of the cause. This means that the person creating the cause would also experience the result at the same time. That is something which is not observed.

How cause and effect is valid despite the person being impermanent

Madhyamaka: It is invalid to say that because the person is impermanent the karmic relationship is invalid, because the person who experiences the result is of the same continuum as the person who created the cause, labelled in dependence on one continuum. Here the person who experiences the result is of one continuum with the person that created the cause, because they have the same root consciousness.

In general one says that sentient beings are of one continuum with the superior Buddha because everyone becomes enlightened, but this is a different reason. Here, one says that the early and later persons are of one continuum, because they share the same fundamental consciousness. Because the earlier and later persons have the same fundamental consciousness they are of one continuum. That is why the person can create actions and causes and later experience the results, and why karmic relationships are valid. Of course, here one is not talking about a truly existent person, but a person who is labelled in dependence on the mental consciousness.

*The past and future minds [73]
Are not the self because they do not exist.
Then, should the generated mind be self,
There is no self because it disintegrates.*

At the time of the present consciousness the past consciousness has disintegrated, and the future consciousness has not yet arisen. Neither the mind that has generated and disintegrated, nor the mind that will arise through causes and conditions is the self. That is why one says that both the past and future consciousnesses are not the self.

One could think that the present mind that has been generated and not yet disintegrated is the self. But the present mind is not the self, because in the next moment it disintegrates. When its nature disintegrates the self does not exist, so the present mind is also not the self. This argument is designed for the non-Buddhist view of self.

*For example, like the banana tree, [74]
When taken apart nothing is there.
Similarly, when looking with analysis
The self also is not perfect.*

On analysis the self is not found to exist inherently. The non-Buddhists assert that at the time of analysis there is a self to be found. This is refuted by the Madhyamaka, who say that when one analyses the different parts of the basis of imputation, such as the mind and so forth, then the self is not to be found. It is like the banana tree which is made up of an accumulation of leaves. One can pull off one leaf after the other to see what is inside, but after the last leaf there is nothing left. Similarly, when analysing whether or not the self exists truly, at the end of the analysis one will arrive at the lack of a truly existent self.

If the self were not to exist inherently then there would be no object of compassion

*If, 'If there is no sentient being, [75]
Then to whom does one practice compassion?'
That accepted to achieve the result,
Labeled by ignorance.*

Non-Buddhist: If a person does not exist inherently then it is meaningless to generate compassion for that person, because that person does not exist.

Madhyamaka: Just because the sentient being does not exist inherently, that does not mean that there is no sentient being. The sentient being labelled by ignorance, accepted to achieve the result of buddhahood, is the object of compassion. The term ignorance here is not used literally for the ignorance that grasps at true existence, but figuratively, because sentient beings are merely labelled without differentiating them as truly existent or non-truly existent. That is, the absence of investigation and analysis becomes ignorance in a figurative sense.

(The permanent self has not been refuted)

*Without sentient being whose effect is it? [76]
True, but even though, it is posited by ignorance.
For the purpose of pacifying suffering
Ignorance of the result should not be opposed.*

Non-Buddhists: If the person does not exist inherently, then there would be no person who could experience the effect of enlightenment.

Madhyamaka: That is true; if there were no sentient beings then there would nobody to experience the effect of enlightenment. But even though sentient beings lack true existence, they still exist nominally. So the sentient being can experience an effect. There is no ultimately existing person who creates causes and experiences effects, but there is a labelled person who creates causes and experiences effects.

Here ignorance again is only figurative. When meditating on compassion to pacify the sufferings of sentient beings, one should not oppose the ignorance which merely labels sentient beings without investigation and analysis. This means that one should not negate the nominal world while meditating on compassion.

This compassion is meditated upon without investigation and analyses into the person pertains to the view of the Madhyamaka that the mere person is the person for whom one experiences compassion. That person is not posited through investigation and analysis. In order to pacify the sufferings of sentient beings one should not refute the mere person, who exists independently of investigation and analysis, and for whom one can practise love and compassion.

*Pride, the cause of suffering, [77]
Increases because of ignorance regarding the self.
If, 'This can not be reversed.'
The meditation on selflessness is supreme.*

Non-Buddhists: Well, what is the ignorance that has to be refuted in order to attain liberation?

Madhyamaka: The ignorance that has to be refuted is the ignorance of self-grasping, which creates and increases the causes for suffering in cyclic existence.

Non-Buddhists: Well, this type of ignorance has been present in minds since beginningless time, and therefore it is not possible to oppose it.

Madhyamaka: Ignorance is an invalid mind that has no foundation in reality. It is a distorted consciousness and therefore it is weaker than the wisdom realising selflessness, which is rooted in reality and is valid. That is why wisdom can overcome ignorance.

This completes the outline of the selflessness of person. Next comes the selflessness of phenomena, which we can do next time. This meditation on the selflessness of phenomena is explained in the context of meditating on the four close placements by mindfulness.

As usual, please generate the virtuous motivation of bodhicitta.

Last time we reached the point saying that the ignorance that has to be abandoned is the ignorance that grasps at the self of person and phenomena, which is the root of all suffering. The more figurative ignorance is not an obscuration and is not to be abandoned.

Then the non-Buddhists reply that it is impossible to abandon this ignorance grasping at the self of person and phenomena, because it has been in the mental continuum since beginningless time. To this the Madhyamaka replied that this ignorance can in fact be abandoned through meditating on selflessness, which is the method to abandon ignorance. It is possible for the wisdom realising selflessness to counteract ignorance, because the wisdom realising selflessness is rooted in reality. The ignorance grasping at the self of person and phenomena is a distorted consciousness and not rooted in reality, and therefore it is weaker.

2.2.2. An elaborate explanation of the selflessness of phenomena

Grasping at the aggregates as inherently existent is self grasping at phenomena. The non-existence of the apprehended object of that grasping is the selflessness of phenomena.

The definition of close placement by mindfulness is an exalted knower on the path that is contained either in mindfulness or in wisdom.

In the lower tenets the close placements by mindfulness meditate on the conventional general and specific characteristics of the body, feelings, mind or phenomena with the goal of liberation from the contaminated aggregates, while in the higher tenets the close placements by mindfulness meditate on the ultimate characteristic that is the emptiness of body, feelings, mind or phenomena in order to attain non-abiding nirvana. In both cases the focus is body, feeling, mind and phenomena.

Meditating on the four close placements by mindfulness according to the lower schools is for the purpose of being introduced to and realising the four noble truths.

- Meditating on the close placement by mindfulness on the body is done to realise that the body is in the nature of misery and suffering.
- Meditating on the close placement by mindfulness on feelings is to realise that the feelings of happiness and suffering are the cause for craving. Through the experience of happiness and suffering, craving for happiness and craving for the absence of suffering are generated. This makes one realise that the craving needs to be abandoned.

- Meditating on the close placement of mindfulness of the mind is to realise that the mind is impermanent, not the self, and so forth, and to eliminate the fear of becoming non-existent when entering nirvana without remainder.
- Meditating on the close placement by mindfulness on dharmas of phenomena is to realise all afflicted phenomena as the cause of suffering, and therefore something to be abandoned, and to realise all pure phenomena as the cause for happiness, and therefore something to be adopted. In this way one becomes induced into the four noble truths.

The way of meditating on the four close placements by mindfulness is by way of the general characteristic of the object, as well by way of the individual characteristic of the object.

Meditating on the four close placements by way of the general characteristic of the object, for example, in relation to the body, would be to meditate the body as impermanent, being in the nature of misery, being empty and being selfless.

To meditate on the body by way of its specific characteristics is to meditate on the body as being in the nature of the elements and the derivatives of the elements.

- In the context of this meditation the meditator comes to realise that the body is impermanent, suffering, empty and selfless, and in the nature of the elements and the derivatives of the elements. In this context the meditator also comes to realise the impurity of the body, which would be one aspect of this meditation.
- When one meditates on the close placement by mindfulness on feeling, one can do it from the point of view of the general characteristics of impermanence, misery, empty and selfless, or one does it from the point of view of the specific characteristic of the nature of experience.
- The specific characteristic of mind is the nature focusing.
- The specific nature of phenomena is mental factors, which refers to the different virtuous and non-virtuous mental factors.

For example, in the context of the body, the mindfulness keeps the mind focussed on the object of the body, while the wisdom investigates the different general characteristics of the body such as its impermanence, being in the nature of misery, being empty and selfless, or the specific characteristics of being in the nature of the elements and the derivatives of the elements. Meditating on the impure nature of the different parts of the body or the body as a whole and so forth, all fall into this category. This is a very useful meditation that you should try to do.

This heading is discussed under four points.

2.2.2.1.1. Meditating on the close placement by the mindfulness of body

2.2.2.1.2. Meditating on the close placement by the mindfulness of feeling

2.2.2.1.3. Meditating on the close placement by the mindfulness of mind

2.2.2.1.4. Meditating on the close placement by the mindfulness of phenomena

2.2.2.1.1. Meditating on the close placement by the mindfulness of the body

Here in the context of the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, the close placement by mindfulness on the body is meditation on the emptiness of the body.

Meditation of the mindfulness of the body comes in three outlines:

2.2.2.1.1.1. Establishing the lack of inherent existence of that possessing parts, the body

2.2.2.1.1.2. Establishing the lack of inherent existence of the parts

2.2.2.1.1.3. Showing that it is unreasonable to be attached to the illusory-like body

2.2.2.1.1.1. Establishing the lack of inherent existence of that possessing parts, the body

The body is not the feet or calves, [78]
The thighs and buttocks are also not the body,
The stomach and back are also not the body,
The chest and upper arms are also not the body,
The rib cage and hands are also not the body, [79]
The armpits and shoulders are also not the body,
The internal organs are also not it.
If the head and neck are also not the body,
Then what of this is the body?

If the body were to exist inherently, then it would have to exist completely from its own side, completely independently from anything else. It would have to exist independently from its parts, such as the different limbs and so forth. It would have to be findable at the time of analysis and investigation. If a person's body were to exist inherently, then it should be findable when looked for. Here one goes through the different parts of the body: the feet are not the body; the calves are not the body; the thighs and buttocks are also not the body; the stomach and back are also not the body. Why? Because the body is merely labelled in dependence on these parts. The inherently existent body is not to be found in any of these parts of the body.

The chest is also not the body, the upper arms are also not the body, the rib cage is not the body and the hands are also not the body because the body is labelled in dependence on these. The armpits and the shoulders are not the body, also the internal organs are not the body and also the head and the neck are not the body because the body is labelled in dependence on these. None of the individual parts of the body are the body, because the body is labelled in dependence on them.

In case this body abides [80]
In all parts separately
Then of course the parts abide in parts.
How can it abide in itself?

Here the opponent asserts the coarse body exists separately from its parts. This is then analysed.

If the coarse body is a phenomenon separate from its parts, does this body abide in all parts by dividing itself up, or does this body abide as a whole in each part individually?

In case the coarse body abides in all parts by dividing itself up then also the parts themselves abide in parts. The idea here is that each part of this coarse body abides within the parts of the body. If this coarse body abides in all parts by dividing itself out throughout all the parts, then the parts themselves would have to abide in a similar manner in their own parts. But this would become endless.

For example, if the coarse body abides within its parts, then one of those parts is the hand. The hand would also have to abide within its own parts, for example, within the different fingers. These too would then abide in their own parts and so forth. Thus it would become limitless. Thus, how can it abide in itself?

In case the entire entity of the body [81]
Abides in the hands and so forth,
How ever many, such as hands etc.,
Are found, they become bodies.

In the other case, if the entire entity of the body abides in individual parts, such as the hands and so forth, then the logical conclusion arises that however many parts there are, one would end up with that many bodies.

If there is no body inside or out [82bcd]
Then how is there a body in the hands etc.
If it does not exist apart from the hands etc.,
Then how can it exist?

If there is no body inside or out, then how is there a body in the hands and so forth? This inherently existent body that is of a different entity (as asserted by the non-Buddhists), or the inherently existent body that is of one entity with its parts inside, (as asserted by Buddhists) does not exist, because such a body is not found inside or out. If this intrinsically existent body were to exist, then it would have to exist either as the entirety of the collection of the body parts, or it would have to be findable in the individual body parts, or it would have to be findable separately from the body parts. Since the intrinsically existing body is not findable in any of these ways, then it does not exist.

Then, there is no body, body awareness is generate [83]
Through ignorance regarding the hands etc.,
Similarly to awareness of a person generated for A heap of stones through the specific shape they are placed in.
As long as the conditions are there [84]
The body will appear the being.
Likewise, as long as they are there regarding
The hands etc., they will appear as the body.

If such a body does not exist apart from the hands and so forth, then how can it exist ? There is no independently existing inherent body, however there is awareness of a truly existent body that is generated through the condition of ignorance grasping at the true existence of the body parts, such as the hands and so forth.

This is similar to the awareness of a person generated for a heap of stones, coming about through the specific shape of that heap of stones, and the ambiguity of dusk. Because of the presence of these conditions the mind mistaking that heap of stones for a person is generated. Similarly, because of the ignorance grasping at the true existence of the body parts, and the presence of the accumulation of body parts, the mistaken awareness of a truly existent body is generated.

For as long as the conditions are there, the body of stones will appear as the person. Likewise, for as long as the conditions of ignorance and so forth are there, body parts will appear as the truly existent body. This explains how the appearance of true existence is a mistaken appearance, or an illusion, which comes about because of the delusion of true grasping.

2.2.2.1.1.2. Establishing the lack of inherent existence of the parts

In the previous outline, the truly existing body was refuted, and now the basis of imputation of the body, the body parts, are refuted as being inherently existent.

Likewise, because of being the collection of fingers, [85]

The hand also becomes that.

They in turn are a collection of digits.

The digits are also divided by their parts,

And the parts are divided into particles, [86]

Should the particles be divided into directions,

Since the partitioned directions lack parts,

They are like space. Hence, there are also no atoms.

Just as the body is not inherently existent, as it is labelled in dependence on its parts, the hand also is merely imputed on the collection of fingers, and does not exist inherently from its own side. In turn the parts of the hand such as the fingers also don't exist inherently from their own side, because they are imputed on the collection of their parts. When one says that the hand is merely labelled in dependence on the collection of its parts, this also shows the lack of inherent existence of their basis of imputation.

If one checks, none of the individual parts of the arm such as the upper arm, the lower arm, the elbow or the hand and so forth are the arm. The reasoning for the parts of the arm is the same. They are divided by their parts, and are merely labelled in dependence on their parts. Those parts are again divided further into particles, and the particles are divided into their directions. The partitioned directions also lack inherently existent parts, so they are like space. No matter how much further one goes, one will never find truly existent parts. Rather, one will arrive at the lack of truly existent parts. That's why they are like space, and therefore there are non-truly existent atoms.

Similarly to space being the mere absence of obstruction and contact, here one also has the mere absence of truly existent parts. If there were truly existent particles, then there will have to be partless particles, because truly existent particles would have to be particles that exist independently of their own parts. As such there would have to be partless particles, and since there are no truly existent particles, then there are also no partless particles.

2.2.2.1.1.3. Showing that it is unreasonable to be attached to an illusory-like body

Thus, who with discerning faculty, [87ab]
Is attached to an illusory-like form?

What person that has discerned that the body is merely labelled in dependence on its parts, and as such is illusory-like, would generate attachment for the illusory-like form?

Here, the idea is that attachment generated for the body is generated on the basis of the distortion of the body into a truly existent body existing from its own side. We have previously introduced the idea that attachment to the body is generated in dependence on a mistaken conception of the body as attractive and truly existent. The perception of a truly existent body comes about because of true grasping at the body, and on the basis of that one generates attachment for the body, which appears to exist completely independent of any conditions.

By contemplating the four noble truths one's experience of cyclic existence will be lessened. With an understanding of selflessness one correspondingly lessens the experience of cyclic existence. The reason for this is that when one understands selflessness, one also understands that the apprehended object of attachment is non-existent.

Here in the Prasangika system attachment can be regarded as true grasping. Attachment is generated in dependence on the mistaken conception elaborating the body as attractive, but also elaborating the body as truly existent. One then generates attachment for that truly existent attractive body.

It would be really good for you to sit down and do this meditation, analysing how attachment is generated in one's mind. By realising the lack of a truly existent body one has realised the absence of the object of attachment; one has removed the basis on which attachment is generated. Attachment disappears when one realises that there is actually no object there.

Did you understand that if there were an intrinsically existing body then it would have to be the one entity with its parts, or a different entity. If it is of one entity with its parts, then either the collection of the parts would have to be the body, or the individual parts would have to be the body.

Review

What is the focal object of the self-grasping at the body, and what is the apprehended object?

Student: The focal object of self grasping is the parts of the body, and the apprehended object is the appearance of the body as truly existent.

Aren't the parts of the body different from the body? Isn't there a different true-grasping for each of those? Also, the appearance of a truly existent body does exist. There's a danger that you might mistake that.

Student: The focal object would be the body and the apprehended object is the inherently existent body.

What is the focal object of the wisdom that realises the lack of a truly existent body?

Student: The lack of a truly existent body.

If the focal object is the lack of truly existent body, then what is the apprehended object?

Student: The lack of a truly existent body.

Didn't we talk about these two types of mind: they are of a different, mutually exclusive mode of apprehension, while have the same focus? They both focus on the body, but one grasps the body as truly existent, while the other one realises the lack of the truly existent body.

Student: Isn't it the case that to overcome attachment you have to accept that there's an object there? Yet you just said that there's no object and that is what makes attachment go away.

It is the apprehended object of the true grasping that is non-existent.

2.2.2. ESTABLISHING THE SELFLESSNESS OF PHENOMENA THROUGH REASON

2.2.2.1.1.3. It is unreasonable to be attached to an illusory-like body

Last time we talked about how to meditate on the selflessness of the body with close placement by mindfulness on the body, and we reached the verse which says that once one has understood the body as lacking inherent existence, then one is not attached to the illusory-like body. And because there is no truly existent body then there is no truly existent man or women.

The reason for this is that attachment to the body is based on true grasping at the body, because it is based on the perception of a truly existent attractive body. By realising that the body lacks true existence one takes away the basis for which one would otherwise generate attachment. By meditating on the body as being like space lacking inherent existence, one meditates on the close mindfulness on the body.

2.2.2.1.2. Meditating on the placement by mindfulness of feeling

Here one meditates on the lack of inherent existence of feeling. There is also the more common way of meditating on the close placement by mindfulness of feeling by meditating on the conventional aspects of the different feelings and the cravings that they generate.

There are four outlines:

2.2.2.1.2.1. Analysing the identity of feeling and refuting that it exists inherently

2.2.2.1.2.2. Analysing the cause of the feeling and refuting that it exists inherently

2.2.2.1.2.3. Analysing the effect of feeling and refuting that it exists inherently

2.2.2.1.2.4. Analysing the person who is experiencing the feeling and refuting that it exists inherently

2.2.2.1.2.1. Analysing the identity of feeling and refuting that it exists inherently

The reason why one generates attachment for that which gives happiness, and generates anger at that which gives suffering is because one grasps at the true existence of the feelings of happiness and suffering. On the basis of grasping at happiness as truly existent one generates a craving for happiness, which then makes one generate attachment for that which gives the happiness. On the basis of the grasping of truly existent suffering one generates a craving for the absence of suffering, and one generates anger towards that which causes suffering.

Enlightened beings experience uncontaminated happiness, but their mind is not disturbed by craving for that happiness, because of their realisation of the lack of inherent existence of that happiness. While arhats don't experience any mental suffering it is possible for them to experience physical suffering. However, the arhats will not generate anger or aversion to that physical suffering, because of having realised its lack of inherent existence.

Superior beings only very occasionally experience mental unhappiness. Generally one can say that from the level of a returner onward the superior being will not experience any mental unhappiness. Their mind does not become disturbed by unhappiness, because they realise the lack of inherent existence of all feelings. They realise the lack of inherent existence of suffering and the lack of inherent existence of happiness, and therefore don't generate anger or aversion.

2.2.2.1.2.1.1. The feeling of suffering is not inherently established

*If suffering exists in such a way [88ab]
Then why does it not impede extreme joy.*

First of all, because the body does not exist inherently then feelings do not exist inherently. If feelings were to exist inherently, then once generated they would have to abide immutably forever. If suffering were to exist intrinsically then suffering would have to remain in one's continuum immutably forever, and it would not be possible to generate extreme joy.

However this is not the case as the existence of suffering in one's continuum does not impede the generation of physical happiness related to the body. Nor does it impede the generation of mental happiness. If suffering were to exist inherently, then there would never be any opportunity for that suffering person to ever experience happiness again.

2.2.2.1.2.1.2. The feeling of happiness is not inherently established

*If happy, then why does fine food and so forth [88cd]
Not provide joy when miserable?*

If the feeling of happiness existed inherently from its own side then the same thing would apply. The person would have to be eternally happy, and the feeling of happiness would completely cancel out any experience of suffering for ever.

Therefore, why does fine food and so forth not provide joy when miserable? If the experience of happiness is intrinsic, then why does the experience of eating fine food not provide any joy for the person who feels mentally miserable because of their child having died and so forth?

*Maybe because of being powerful it suppresses, [89ab]
And one does not experience happiness.*

Opponent: 'The feeling of happiness is present at that time, but it is suppressed by a powerful feeling of suffering, and therefore the person does not experience that happiness. That does not mean that the feeling of happiness is not present in that person's mental continuum - it only means that it is suppressed.'

How can that not in the nature of Simultaneous experience be a feeling? [89cd]

Madhyamaka: 'How can that not in the nature of simultaneous experience be a feeling? The definition of feeling is experience; feeling is by definition experience. How could one posit a feeling that is not experienced? That is contrary to the very nature of feelings. This is also the answer to the assertion that strong happiness suppresses intrinsic suffering.'

*Merely subtle suffering exists,
Isn't the coarse one cleared away?
If you say, 'It is a mere subtle joy,
Different from it', the subtle belongs to it as well.* [90]

Opponent, 'At the time of strong happiness it is not as if suffering could not exist at all, because although coarse suffering has been cleared away, subtle suffering still exists.'

Madhyamaka: 'How could one assert that strong happiness exists at the same time as subtle suffering? Surely happiness is not strong happiness if it cannot counteract subtle suffering?'

Opponent: 'This is possible because in fact this subtle suffering is a subtle joy!'

Madhyamaka: 'If it is subtle joy, then since joy is by definition happiness, subtle or not it falls within the category of happiness.'

If, 'since the adverse condition is generated Sufferings are not generated.' [91ab]

Opponent (thinking they had refuted the fault of not experiencing happiness from food while mourning a dead child): 'When one is generating happiness from eating fine food and so forth, one is generating the adverse condition to experiencing suffering and does not experience suffering at that time.'

*Isn't the saying
'Feelings are conceptual fabrications' established?* [91cd]

Madhyamaka, 'Sometimes you say that the feeling generated by eating food is suffering, and sometimes you say it is happiness. Doesn't that show that the feelings of happiness and suffering are merely imputed by the conceptual mind?'

2.2.2.1.2.1.3. Advice to abide within the yoga of meditating on the lack of inherent feelings

*Because of that very fact this analysis
Should be meditated upon as the antidote of this.
The mental stabilisation derived from the field of Analysis is the food of a yogi.* [92]

Because of the very fact that feeling lacks inherent existence the emptiness of feeling should be meditated upon as the antidote of true grasping at feeling. This realisation will nourish the mental stabilisation and internal realisation of the yogi, and also actually nourish the physical body of the yogi.

Food is something that nourishes one's continuum. The union of calm abiding and special insight of the yogi firstly nourishes the realisation of the yogi - it nourishes the mind of the yogi. Secondly, it also actually nourishes the physical body of the yogi. That is why one talks about the food of concentration.

2.2.2.1.2.2. Analysing the cause of the feeling and refuting that it exists inherently

This has two sub-outlines:

2.2.2.1.2.2.1. Refuting that the meeting of sense power and the object is inherently established

2.2.2.1.2.2.2. Refuting that the meeting of the primary consciousness and the object is inherently established

2.2.2.1.2.2.1. Refuting that the meeting of sense power and object is inherently established

The cause of the feeling is contact, so feeling is derived from contact. But that contact is of course the contact that becomes the cause of that feeling. In general, feeling and contact are simultaneous, because the five ever present mental factors of feeling, recognition, intention, contact and attention always simultaneously accompany one's primary consciousness.

Without the mental factor of feeling one would not experience the object. Feeling comprises happiness, suffering and neutrality, without which there would be no experience of the object. Without recognition one would not be able to recognise the specific characteristics of the object. Intention is the mental factor that involuntarily draws the mind to the generality of the object. Attention is the mental factor that draws the mind to the particulars of the object. The mental factor of contact is generated through the meeting of the object, the consciousness and sense power and acts as the basis of feeling.

The five ever present mental factors accompany one's primary consciousness. One refers to them as the entourage of the five ever present mental factors, because they accompany the primary consciousness involuntarily. They are generated simultaneously from the same sense power with regard to the same object, but it is really the primary consciousness that possesses the object and sense power. One might possess a house divided into flats, which are rented by different tenants, but there is only the one owner.

*If, 'There is room between faculty and object',
How can the two meet?
If there is no room they are one,
What is meeting with what?* [93]

Feeling is generated through the contact between the object and the sense power. If the feeling were to exist inherently then the contact between the object and the sense power should also exist inherently. Contact between the object and the sense power does not exist inherently and therefore the feeling they produce also does not exist inherently.

Madhyamaka: 'If the particles of the sense power and object meet, do they meet with space in-between them or not?'

Opponent: 'They meet with space in-between them.'

Madhyamaka: 'This is not possible because if that object and sense power meet with space between them, then that space would be filled with particles of light or darkness. Between them there would also be space, which would again have to be filled with particles of light or darkness. It becomes limitless.

‘If you say that there is no intermediate space between the subtle particles of the object and sense power, then they would have to completely fuse into one because, since they are partless, there could not be one part where they meet and one part where they do not meet. The two particles would become one, and therefore there would not be one particle that meets the other particle. For a meeting to occur there have to be at least two particles.’

The assertion of the opponent is that subtle particles are partless particles. If these particles meet without any space between them, then that negates the assertion of partless particles, because once they meet they obviously have direction, which negates the idea of a partless particle. If there is room between the subtle particles of the object and the sense power, then in that space between them are particles of light or darkness, and one can not really say that the particles of the object and the sense power meet, because there are these particles of light and darkness between them.

If the contact between the subtle particles of the object and the sense power occur without space between them, then the notion of partless particles goes out the window, because there is the part of the particles where the two parties meet. If contact between the subtle particles of the object and the sense power occurs without space between them then there are two possibilities: either you have the situation where there is a part of each particle where they meet, which negates the idea of the partless particles, or if there is no part of the two particles where they meet. Then as is says in the root text then they become one.

*Subtle particles can not enter subtle particles, [94]
They do not have opportunity and are equal.
Without entering there is no merging,
Without mixing there is no meeting.*

Partless particles cannot absorb into other partless particles, because there is no space between them and they are of equal size. Therefore they can not meet in any way. The reason is that if partless particles were to meet then they should merge, and if they merge they should penetrate or absorb into each other. But since they cannot penetrate each other they cannot merge, and since they cannot merge they cannot meet.

So the notion of there being direct contact between two partless particles is actually an oxymoron.

As it says here,

*How could it possibly be valid to say [95]
That the partless can meet.
In case meeting and the partless

Madhyamaka: ‘Therefore it is impossible to have two partless particles meeting. If you have observed such particles then please show us, but that you can not do.’

good to train one's mind in these different ways of eating and drinking, such as meditating on the emptiness of the food and drink, and avoiding eating out of craving. One should try to eat on a basis of love and compassion, on the basis of bodhicitta - either generated bodhicitta or spontaneously arising bodhicitta.

One needs to start one's practice somewhere, and through continued training of one's mind, repeating the experience again and again. Then was in the beginning a state of mind generated with effort, will become spontaneous. Initially one trains in effortful bodhicitta but, with continued training, there will come a time when bodhicitta will be generated spontaneously in one's mind.

2.2.2.1.2.3. Refuting that the object possessor of feeling is inherently established

*Whether seen or felt, [99ab]
Through the dreamlike illusory nature*

Since objects seen or felt are dreamlike and illusory in the sense that they lack true existence, then also the feelings that they produce do not exist inherently due to their dreamlike illusory nature.

*Because it is generated simultaneously with mind [99cd]
Feeling is not seen by it.*

*Though generating earlier and later [100]
It is remembered but not experienced.
It does not experience its own nature,
And is also not experienced by others.*

*Since there is absolutely no one with feeling, [101]
Then feeling is not that very nature.
In this way, how can this selfless collection
Be harmed by this?*

If it is a truly existent feeling, then if it exists it has to exist all the time, and if it does not exist, it has to be non-existent all the time. The feeling generated from the dream-like illusory object is generated simultaneously with the mind. Because it is generated simultaneously with the mind, feeling is not seen by the mind. That experienced and that which experiences are of mutually different unrelated substance.

In addition neither the feeling that was generated earlier, nor the feeling that will be generated later is experienced. For a feeling to be experienced, it has to be in the present. But the inherently existent feeling is not seen by a mind that is simultaneous with it, and the earlier and later instances of truly existent feeling are not experienced at all. Feeling does not experience its own nature, and it is also not experienced by something else.

For those reasons feeling is not established within suchness. In this way how can this selfless collection of aggregates be harmed by non-truly existent feeling?

This way of meditating on the close placement by mindfulness on feeling is the uncommon Mahayana way. According to the lower tenets the common way of meditating on the placement by mindfulness on feeling is by meditating on feeling as being in the nature of impurity, misery and so forth.

The difference between mind and mental factors is that the mind primarily apprehends the general identity of the object, while mental factors primarily apprehend different characteristics of the object. One can view the primary consciousness that is synonymous with mind, and its accompanying entourage of the five ever present mental factors, as being like a king and his ministers.

2.2.2.1.3. Meditating on the close placement by mindfulness on mind

2.2.2.1.3.1. Showing that mental consciousness does not exist inherently

*Mind does not abide on the faculties, [102]
Not on form etc., and also not in the middle,
There is also no mind in or outside,
And it is also not found apart.*

*It is not the body; it does not exist apart, [103]
It does not merge, there is also nothing elsewhere.
Because it is absolutely not. Therefore Sentient beings are naturally gone beyond misery.*

Mind and primary consciousness are synonymous. In Tibetan there is a third word, yid, for which, unfortunately, we don't have an English equivalent. Sometimes it is translated as mentality, but that is mistaken, as yid is synonymous with mind. Mind does not abide on, or in, the faculties, which are the sense powers. The faculties are referred to as sense powers because they empower the apprehension of the object. For example, the eye-sense-power empowers the apprehension of form and so forth.

If mind were to exist inherently then it would have to be findable at the time of analysis. Mind is not findable on the faculties, or on external form, and is not to be found in the middle. The words 'not in the middle' mean it is also not found on the combination of faculties or form. There is also no mind inside or outside; it is not found apart; it is not the body; it does not exist apart from the body; it does not merge with the body; it is also not found anywhere else. Therefore at the time of analysis the inherently existent mind is not found.

There is no inherently existent mind found in relation to the faculties. There is no inherently existent mind that exists in dependence on the faculties, or that is endowed with the faculties. The inherently existent mind is also not found in the outer objects. It is not found in relation to the outer objects; it is not found in between the outer objects and the faculties; and it is not found on the collection of the faculties and the outer object. It is also not on the inside the body; for example, it is not found on the intestines and inner organs and so forth. It is also not found on the outside of the body such as the arms and legs. Because the mind does not exist in any other way, there is no inherently existent mind to be found in or outside.

There is no inherently existent mind to be found on the faculties. There is no inherently existent mind to be found on external objects. There is no inherently existent mind to be found in between the faculties and the external objects. There is no inherently existent mind to be found on the combination of the external object and the faculties. There is no inherently existent mind to be found in the internal organs of the body. There is no inherently existent mind to be found in the external limbs and external parts of the body. There is no inherently existent mind to be found in any of the other aggregates such as feeling, recognition and so forth. There is no inherently existent mind to be found in the combination of all of the aggregates. There is also no inherently existent mind to be found as a succinct entity separate from the five aggregates. There is no merging between the mind and body that could be an inherently existing consciousness. Therefore the body is naturally liberated. Being 'naturally beyond misery' refers to the emptiness called natural nirvana, or natural liberation.

2.2.2.1.3.2. Showing that the five primary consciousnesses do not exist inherently

Should consciousness exist before the object of knowledge [104]

In reference to which object is it generated?

If consciousness and the object of knowledge are simultaneous

In reference to which object is it generated?

*Well then, if it exists subsequent to the object, [105ab]
At that time what is consciousness generated from?*

If the consciousness and its object were to exist inherently, then they would have to exist simultaneously all the time. Should the five consciousnesses exist before the five objects of knowledge, then in reference to which objects are these five primary consciousnesses generated? So the question is, are the five primary consciousnesses, such as the visual primary consciousness, auditory primary consciousness and so forth, generated before the five objects of forms, sounds and so forth?

If the five primary consciousnesses were to be generated before the five sense objects, then in reference to which object are these consciousnesses generated? For example, in the case of the eye-primary-consciousness, does the eye-primary-consciousness exist before the visual form? In reference to which object is it generated? What is its focal object? The normal sequence is that first one has a focal condition, which acts as the cause for the consciousness to arise.

Opponent: 'If it doesn't exist before, then it exists simultaneously with the object of knowledge.'

If the consciousness and the object of knowledge are simultaneous, in reference to which object is the consciousness generated? The eye-consciousness is not really generated in reference to the form, because they are both generated simultaneously. The form cannot act as the cause for that eye-consciousness.

If it exists subsequent to the object, then what is consciousness generated from? There is no inherently existent primary consciousness generated from the object, because there is no such thing as inherent generation.

2.2.2.1.4. Meditating on the close placement by mindfulness on phenomena

2.2.2.1.4.1. The actual

2.2.2.1.4.2. The refutation of objections

2.2.2.1.4.1. The actual

*In such a way the generation of all phenomena [105cd]
Is not realised.*

The words 'in such a way' refer to all the reasons given in the previous outlines. Neither the generation of all compounded phenomena, nor the inherent existence of all non-compounded phenomena, is realised. In such a way the inherent generation of all phenomena is not realised.

Because compounded phenomena don't exist inherently, then neither do non-compounded phenomena exist inherently. The inherent existence of non-compounded phenomena is not explicitly mentioned, but once the inherent existence of compounded phenomena is refuted, one also understands the non-inherent existence of non-compounded phenomena. It is explained in this way in Root Wisdom: once one has refuted the inherently existent characteristics of compounded phenomena, then one will also see that there are no inherently existent characteristics of non-compounded phenomena.

Please generate the virtuous motivation thinking, 'I have to attain complete enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings. In order to achieve this aim I am now going to listen to this profound Dharma, and put it into practice as quick as I can'.

2.2.2.1.4. Close placement by mindfulness on phenomena

Last time we dealt very briefly with the close placement by mindfulness on phenomena.

*In such a way the generation of all phenomena [105cd]
Is not realised.*

These two lines explicitly show the selflessness of compounded phenomena. They say that the inherent generation of compounded phenomena is not realised, because compounded phenomena disintegrate moment by moment. The reason non-compounded phenomena are not explicitly included is because by realising the selflessness of compounded phenomena, one can easily understand the selflessness of non-compounded phenomena as well.

Compounded phenomena lack inherent generation. One reason for this is that compounded phenomena follow the three steps of generation, abiding and disintegration. They have no choice: initially they are generated, then they abide, and finally they disintegrate. If one is trying to take some meaning from inherent existence: if compounded phenomena were generated inherently they should be empowered to abide according to choice, and there would be no need for involuntary disintegration.

2.2.2.2. REFUTING OBJECTIONS TO THE TWO TRUTHS

The Realists say that the presentation of the two truths becomes invalid if compounded and non-compounded phenomena do not exist inherently. This objection is refuted in three steps.

2.2.2.2.1. Refuting the improbability of the two truths

2.2.2.2.2. Refuting the improbability of valid reason

2.2.2.2.3. Refuting the consequence of infiniteness

2.2.2.2.1. Refuting the improbability of the two truths

*In case, 'in such a way the illusory does not exist; [106ab]
How could both truths exist on it?*

The Realists ask, 'How can the two truths possibly exist if the conventional illusory does not exist? How can the conventional illusory exist if compounded and non-compounded phenomena do not exist inherently? It cannot as there is no basis. If there is no basis for conventional illusory existence then there is no basis for ultimate truth, which is the selflessness of conventional illusory existence'.

If phenomena do not exist inherently then the conventional illusory phenomena, such as vases and so forth, do not exist, and if they do not exist then also their suchness cannot exist. Therefore there would be no two truths. The consequence is that there are no two truths if phenomena do not exist inherently.

*If it is illusory because of another, [106cd]
How can sentient being go beyond misery?*

The Realists say to the Prasangika, 'You accept that forms, sounds and so forth are illusory because, while appearing as true to the illusion grasping at inherent existence, they lack true existence from their side'.

The Realists continue by saying, 'You accept that forms, sounds and so forth exist only conventionally because, while appearing as true to the illusion grasping at inherent existence, they lack true existence from their side. If we look at this then your conventional existence is no different from the existence of the snake for the mind that grasps at the rope as snake - it is a mere elaboration by another awareness. In that case it follows that sentient beings cannot conventionally go beyond misery, because all conventional existence is a mere elaboration by a distorted awareness'.

Is not our illusion.*

What the Realists assume is that the mind through which nominal truth is posited is true grasping, because that is the mind relative to which one talks about truth. This is refuted here by the Madhyamaka who say, 'The object that appears to the superstitious conceptual mind of true grasping is not our conventional truth. That is not what we assert as nominal truth'.

Then the Realists ask, 'What then is your way of positing a nominal truth?'

*If this is ascertained subsequently it exists, [107cd]
If it is not it is not even an illusion.*

This shows the presentation of subtle nominal truth as asserted by the Prasangika. It says that subtle conventional truth is only realised after having realised emptiness. When it says it is 'ascertained subsequently it exists' this means that if, after having realised emptiness, the illusory object is ascertained as being able to perform functions and actions, then that illusory object is subtle conventional truth. If, after having realised emptiness, the illusory object is not ascertained as possessing a function and activity, then it is not even an illusion, it is not even a conventional truth, and does not even exist nominally.

We have been over this before but we can repeat it once more. One should not think of the lack of inherent existence as non-existence. When we think of an object lacking inherent existence we should think of the object as existing interdependently and relative to other objects. In such a way one is able to combine appearance and emptiness. That is how one can understand the Prasangika presentation of subtle conventional truth. Initially one has to understand emptiness. Subsequently to realising emptiness one analyses illusory phenomena, and if these illusory phenomena possesses characteristics such as being able to perform functions, and the activities of coming and going and so forth, then they are conventional truths.

If a phenomenon does not possess those characteristics then it is not even a conventional illusory truth. It is completely non-existent. To understand this presentation of the subtle conventional truth one needs to be able to unify appearance and emptiness. As was said before, when one thinks of a phenomenon as lacking inherent existence, one should not think of the phenomenon as being completely non-existent. Rather one should think of it as being a dependently arisen phenomenon, a phenomenon that exists in dependence on, or relative to, other phenomena.

In such a way one has understood that being empty is not contradicted by appearance. When one reflects on the phenomenon as existing interdependently, then one can understand that the phenomenon lacks inherent existence, and in such a way one can understand that its appearance is not contradicted by the emptiness of the object. In such a way one is able to unify appearance and emptiness.

When you say that form lacks inherent existence you have to think about what is implicit in the lack of inherent existence of form. You should reflect upon this. [pause for reflection]

When we say that a phenomenon is a dependent arising then what can we understand that is implicit in that. You should reflect on this for a minute. [pause for reflection]

By reflecting on dependent arising one understands the lack of total independence, and by understanding the lack of total independence one understands the lack of inherent existence. [pause for reflection]

It is very important to be able to unify appearance and emptiness, and to understand that the appearance of the object does not contradict its lack of inherent existence, or its emptiness, and that the emptiness of the object does not contradict its appearance.

Lama Tsong Khapa says that if one does not understand this unification of emptiness and appearance one will not understand the thought of the Buddha.

2.2.2.2.2. Refuting the improbability of valid reason

Conceptual thought and that imputed [108ab]
Are both mutually reliant.

The imputing thought and the object that is being imputed exist relative to each other. They are mutually interdependent and therefore they do not exist from their own side in the slightest degree.

Just as in dependence on renown [108cd]
All investigations are called

The imputing thought and that which is imputed are both mutually reliant, and therefore do not exist from their own side. They do not exist inherently and therefore they exist through renown as merely imputed phenomena to nominal valid cognition. Similarly, the all phenomena exist only nominally, in mere name.

The worldly way is to accept without question the reality with which one is presented. For example, one accepts without questioning that this object on the table is a clock, because it is renowned as a clock, and labelled as a clock. The worldly way is to just accept what one is presented with without investigation and analysis. The Prasangika say that the way nominal truth exists in mere name is that it is posited without investigation and analysis.

2.2.2.2.3. Refuting the consequence of infiniteness

At the time when the investigating [109]
Intelligence analyses,
If the analytical intelligence is Subsequent to intelligence then it is infinite.

'At the time' refers to the time of investigating the lack of true existence. This verse is asking whether, when an investigating intelligence analyses and ascertains the lack of true existence of all phenomena, another investigating intelligence is needed to understand the lack of true existence of the first investigative intelligence? Or is no other investigative intelligence needed? If another investigative intelligence is needed subsequent to the investigative intelligence that understands the lack of true existence of all phenomena, then one arrives at the consequence that one would need an infinite number of investigative intelligences, each one realising the lack of true existence of the previous one and so forth.

To express it more simply, if we have the wisdom that realises the emptiness of the aggregates then is another wisdom needed to realise the emptiness of that wisdom or not? If it is the case that one needs a subsequent wisdom that realises the emptiness of the initial wisdom, then logically one needs a limitless amount of wisdoms in order to be able to realise the emptiness of all phenomena.

Having investigated the analysed object [110ab]
There is no basis for investigation.

If a separate wisdom is not needed to realise the emptiness of the initial wisdom, then one can also say that there is no wisdom needed to realise the emptiness of that which is initially investigated, such as the aggregates. If nothing is needed to investigate the investigator, then also there is nothing needed to investigate that which initially investigated. If no second wisdom is needed to investigate the initial wisdom, then the investigation by the initial wisdom of the initial object of investigation is also not needed since all phenomena would be the same in not lacking inherent existence.

Since there is no basis it is not born [110cd]
This is also called going beyond misery.

The answer is that no second wisdom is needed to investigate the true nature of the initial wisdom, because when the initial wisdom realises the lack of inherent existence of its analysed object, such as the aggregates, there is no appearance of true existence to that wisdom. Therefore at that time there is no basis for further investigation into the lack of true existence at that time.

Also, as long as the realisation of the lack of true existence of all phenomena is active there is no object that is characterised by the analysis of whether or not the object exists truly or not, because as soon as one's consciousness starts to think that way, one immediately remembers that all phenomena lack true existence.

Also, the realisation of the lack of true existence of all phenomena overcomes any type of intellectually acquired true-grasping. Further, if the object lacks true existence, then both the object possessor and the object lack true existence and are not generated inherently. This lack of inherent existence of the object and the object possessor is also called 'going beyond misery', which is their natural nirvana. By meditating on the natural nirvana one will attain the nirvana that is the abandonment of the adventitious obscurations.

It is good to think that by meditating on natural nirvana, one will attain the actual nirvana that is the abandonment of the adventitious obscurations. Let's say the meditator meditates on the emptiness of form. After having refuted the object of negation, truly existent form, and realising its emptiness, then by meditating on the emptiness that is realised, the meditator will attain the nirvana that is the abandonment of the adventitious afflictions.

At that time one does not go on to investigate the emptiness of the mind that realises the emptiness, which would be an unnecessary investigative activity. When one has arrived at the realisation of the emptiness of one object then does not go on and investigate the emptiness of the mind realising emptiness. At that time it is sufficient to stop with the emptiness of the present object. Later, of course, the emptiness of the object possessor will also be investigated. This is how one attains the actual liberation.

existence of the object of knowledge through the inherent existence of the consciousness, which is generated from that object of knowledge? Like before, the inherently existent object of knowledge generates the inherently existent consciousness, so therefore why should one not be able to realise the inherent existence of the object of knowledge from the inherent existence of the consciousness, which was generated from it?

In actuality, one can infer the existence of the cause through the effect. For example, we can infer the presence of fire because of the presence of smoke and so forth. But one can not infer the existence of the effect from the existence of the cause.

*If the existence of the seed is realised [115]
Through a consciousness apart from the sprout,
From what does one realise the existence
Of the consciousness realising that object of knowledge?*

The Madhyamaka reply that there is a problem with having a truly existent consciousness as that which establishes a truly existent form. What establishes the truly existent consciousness? If the true existence of the seed is realised through a consciousness that is intrinsically other, then from what does one realise the existence of that intrinsic consciousness realising the intrinsic object? One possibility is that the self-knower does the realising, but that, of course, was refuted earlier, and there is nothing else that establishes that consciousness exists truly.

Summary

The Realists have tried in different ways to establish true existence: with quotation, valid reason, and through the consciousness itself. The Mind Only say that the both object and consciousness, for example form and the eye-consciousness, exist truly. They say that the true existence of the object of form can be established through the true existence of the eye-consciousness.

To this the Madhyamaka said first of all, that the reasoning is not valid. You can't posit a truly existent consciousness to establish the premise of truly existent form. There are many counter arguments refuting this premise.

Initially the Realists said that the true existence of the six types of objects is established through the true existence of the six types object possessors - the six types of consciousness. Upon being asked what basis, valid reason, or supporting valid cognition, they have for the true existence of the six types of consciousness, they say the six types of consciousness exist truly, because the six types of objects exist truly. So they have gone full circle.

Generate a virtuous motivation thinking, 'I have to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. In order to achieve this aim, I am going to listen to this profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

2.2.3. STATING THE REASONS ESTABLISHING SELFLESSNESS

After refuting the arguments of those asserting that things exist inherently comes the assertion of the arguments of those positing the lack of inherent existence.

2.2.3.1. Analysis of the cause - the vajra sliver reasoning

2.2.3.2. Analysis of the nature - the reasoning of dependent arising

2.2.3.3. Analysis of the result - the reasoning of the generation and ending of existence and non-existence

2.2.3.1. THE DIAMOND, OR VAJRA, SLIVER REASONING

The vajra in vajra sliver reasoning refers to a particular kind of vajra called the space vajra, which can destroy anything. Nothing can stand in its way, it even has the power to destroy Mount Meru and so forth.

The vajra sliver reasoning is an analysis of the cause. We went through this reasoning, which eliminates generation from the four extremes, in the *Introduction to the Middle Way*¹. It is referred to as the vajra sliver reasoning because it destroys the four views of extreme generation:

2.2.3.1.1. The object is generated without any cause

2.2.3.1.2. The object is generated from other

2.2.3.1.3. The object is generated from self

2.2.3.1.4. The object is generated from both

2.2.3.1.1. Refuting Generation from No-Cause [Carvaka]

If it is asked, 'by which different causes?' [117]

Of course by the preceding different causes.

Why can a cause generate an effect?

From the preceding cause's mere force.

The Carvakas assert that objects such as the sun, the moon, sharp thorns, the colours on a butterfly's wings and so forth are generated from no cause, and exist out of their own nature. They say, 'I have not seen anybody creating these objects, so therefore they must have risen out of themselves'.

Right now, the direct perception of worldly beings [116ab]

Sees all causes.

Shantideva says, 'Right now, to refute this view of yours I am not going to use any type of ultimate analysis. I am only going to refute you with a worldly nominal reasoning. For the time being, I am not going to use any ultimate reasoning, I am just going to use nominal reasoning.'

Worldly beings see most of the different causes that produce the different worldly effects such as a harvest. If they did not see the causes that produce the harvest then they would not engage in the manifold activities that produce a crop. But, because they can see that planting seed produces a crop, they engage in the effort of planting seed to get a harvest. The different categories of effects are generated by different categories of causes.'

The different petals of the lotus

[116cd]

Are generated by different causes.

Carvakas: 'From which diverse causes are the different results generated?'

Shantideva: 'The different categories of results such as the different petals of the lotus, the different colours on the butterfly's wings and so forth, are all generated by different preceding causes.'

Carvakas: 'Why can diverse causes generate diverse effects?'

The response is because of the force of the preceding causes. Secondly, one can say that all compounded phenomena are generated from a cause, because they are only generated occasionally. Because compounded phenomena are only generated when all the causes and conditions come together, this shows that they are generated from a cause. If they were actually generated from no cause at all, then there would be no reason for their occasional nature. They would always be there.

2.2.3.1.2. Refuting generation from a permanent cause apart

2.2.3.1.2.1. Refuting a creator god (Ishvara) [Particularists, Logicians and Enumerators, or Vaisheshika, Naiyayika, Samkya]

Here Ishvara is asserted as a creator god that precedes all of existence. This is asserted by the Particularists or Vaisheshikas, the Logicians or Naiyayikas, and the Samkya Enumerators. Not all enumerators assert Ishvara as the creator god, though. One section asserts Ishvara as the creator god, and another section doesn't.

The idea is that initially one has Ishvara, the creator god who is naturally generated out of himself. Then he creates all the different categories of awareness and objects of knowledge, the different worlds and the beings therein and so forth, through movement of his consciousness. They assert that Ishvara is both permanent, omniscient, and that movement of his consciousness precedes the different categories of objects of knowledge, the different worlds, and the beings in those worlds.

If Ishvara is the cause of migrators

[118ab]

What is posited as the entity of Ishvara?

Initially the basic question, 'What is the meaning of Ishvara?' is asked. One can learn a lot from this approach. Shantideva does not immediately enter into an argument designed to refute Ishvara as the creator of all of existence, but asks 'Exactly what do you mean when you refer to Ishvara?' This is a very useful approach. Instead of immediately contradicting the other person's view, one first asks, 'Exactly what is your thesis?'

¹ Chapter 6, Introduction to the Middle Way, verses 6.8c to 6.113, 15 April 2003 to 20 April 2004.

*If you say, 'the elements,' it might be like that. [118cd]
Why get strung out over a name?*

Because the elements can be seen as a source from which everything arises, the possibility that Ishvara is the elements is examined. The Madhyamaka say, 'We agree that the increase and decrease in the elements produces the increase and decrease of the effects. Therefore, from this point of view, if you refer to the elements as Ishvara the creator god, then there is really not much to debate, as it's just a discussion about how to label the same thing.

*However, since earth and so forth are many, [119]
And impermanent, they are not immutable, not god.
Since they are stepped upon and impure
They are not Ishvara.*

Madhyamaka: You assert Ishvara as partless and immutable, having consciousness that establishes the worlds merely by thinking about them, being pure, being god, and also being outstanding. Therefore the elements of earth and so forth cannot be Ishvara, because Ishvara is partless, and they are diverse. The elements are impermanent, therefore they are not immutable, nor are the elements a god. Also, the elements are stepped upon and impure, and therefore they are not Ishvara.

*Space is not Ishvara because it is immutable. [120]
That the self is not Ishvara has been proven earlier.
Even a creator beyond thought,
What good is it to describe that beyond thought*

Space is not Ishvara because space is immutable, while Ishvara has to have a movement of consciousness that precedes all of existence. And it has been proven earlier that the self is not permanent or partless.'

To this the Carvaka reply, 'All of that does not really matter to us, because Ishvara is beyond comprehension anyway'.

To this Shantideva replies, 'If Ishvara is beyond comprehension, then essentially you are talking about something that you don't comprehend. So what are you doing expressing a creator beyond thought? If Ishvara the creator god is incomprehensible, then it is not known by you, it is not known by us, it is not known by anybody. Stop talking about something you do not comprehend.'

2.2.3.1.2.2. If it is permanent it is unsuitable to have conditions and to be the cause of all

*What does he want to create? [121abc]
Isn't the nature of the self,
Earth and so forth, and Ishvara permanent?*

As was also explained earlier the Vaisheshika, Naiyayika and Samkya assert a permanent self. Here, the 'earth and so forth' does not refer to the coarse elements, but to the particles that form these elements. While the elements are impermanent, the particles of the elements are permanent. They also, of course, assert that Ishvara itself is permanent. Hence, what does Ishvara create? Ishvara is permanent, the self is permanent and also the particles that make up the elements are permanent. All of these are unsuitable to generate a result because of being permanent.

*Consciousness is generated from the object of knowledge [121d]
And the beginningless happiness and sufferings from karma. [122ab]
Tell, what is generated by him?*

These tenet holders are not nihilists, because they do assert karmic cause and effect. Rather they are eternalists. Shantideva asks, 'What is generated by Ishvara? Can you come up with anything?' The objects arise from the elements, and the consciousness of the objects arises from the objects. For example, eye-consciousness arises from visual form. The beginningless happiness and sufferings that one experiences in cyclic existence arise from karma. Hence Shantideva asks the Carvaka, 'Please tell me, what is left that is generated by Ishvara? It is not possible to posit an effect that is generated by Ishvara!'

These reasonings are very good to keep in mind, because it seems that there are many followers of Ishvara in the West, who follow the Hindu Tantric sex system. It is quite good to understand this reasoning so as to be able to refute Ishvara.

*If there is no first cause, [122cd]
How could there be a first result.*

This refers to the feelings of happiness and suffering that one experiences at the present time. If one asserts Ishvara as the direct cause for those feelings of happiness and suffering, then logically, since Ishvara has existed since beginningless time, those feelings of happiness and suffering should have existed since beginningless time.

*Why should he not always produce, [123]
He does not rely on other conditions.
If there is nothing not produced by him
How could he rely on these?*

'Why should Ishvara not continuously produce the present causes and conditions? He produces all effects and does not rely on any other conditions. This follows because if there is no effect not created by Ishvara then what conditions would Ishvara need to produce his effects. If there were simultaneously acting conditions then they would also have to be created by Ishvara.'

Ordinarily a cause needs concurrently acting conditions to produce a result. Consider, for example, the generation of the sprout. Ordinarily a whole group of causes and conditions, including a seed, is needed for the generation of the sprout. But what concurrently acting conditions would Ishvara have, since those concurrently acting conditions would also have to be generated by him. Therefore it follows that he would generate all the effects all the time.

*If he relies then the aggregation [124ab]
Is the cause and not him.*

Actually it is the completion of the causes and conditions that is the cause for the generation of the sprout. If the completion of all the conditions is not the cause for the sprout to be generated, and it depends solely on the wish of Ishvara, then the sprout should be generated at any time that Ishvara wants, even when the causes and conditions are not complete. If the generation depends on all the causes or conditions being complete, then the aggregation of causes and conditions is the cause and not Ishvara.

If there is aggregation he is powerless to prevent generation. [124cd]

If there is no aggregation he has no power to generate.

One can observe that the sprout will definitely be generated whenever all the causes and conditions are complete. If the causes and conditions are not complete, then without any independence on their part, the sprout will not be generated. It does not depend on Ishvara's wishes.

If he creates despite not wishing to do so [125]
The he is under the power of other.
Even though wishing he depends on the wish.
Though acting, how can he be Ishvara?

Carvaka: 'The suffering of the lower realms is generated through the force of karma, without his intention.'

Shantideva: 'In that case he is not omnipotent. If he creates, even though not wishing it, then he is under the power of other and not omnipotent. If Ishvara's creation of existence depends on his wish, then he is under the control of his wish and therefore also not independent. In fact his wish would become Ishvara, but wishes are impermanent. In any case, how can he be the creator of everything? If he creates the sufferings of sentient beings, then how could Ishvara be regarded as superior? How could anybody who creates suffering for sentient beings be regarded as superior?

If one's happiness and suffering was determined by the wish of Ishvara, then one would be without freedom, and be completely under the control of Ishvara. We refuted the assertion of particles as being permanent earlier, when we refuted the assertion of partless particles.

You need to generate a virtuous motivation of wanting to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings, thinking, 'In order to attain that state I am going to listen to the profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

We have refuted generation from no cause and generation from other.

2.2.3.1.3. Refuting generation from self

2.2.3.1.3.1. Refutation of generation from a permanent primary principle

2.2.3.1.3.2. Actual refutation of generation of self

2.2.3.1.3.1. Refutation of generation from a permanent primary principle

That a permanent principle is the cause [126cd]
Of migrators is asserted by the Samkya.

In English, Samkya is translated as Enumerators. They are called that because they classify phenomena into twenty-five categories of objects of knowledge. One of these is the primary principle, which has the six qualities of permanence and so forth. This permanent primary principle is the cause of twenty-three categories of phenomena, but it is not the cause of the self. These twenty-three categories are expressions, or effects, of the primary principle.

The Tibetan term dro-wa in the second line is usually translated as migrators. Here however it refers to that which comes from the primary principle. The primary principle is the cause of its expressions.

Then the question is asked, 'If this permanent principle with six characteristics is the cause of all its different expressions, then what is exactly this primary permanent principle?'

The equilibrium of the qualities of [127]
Courage, particle, and darkness
Is strongly asserted as principle
And their imbalances are its expressions.

The Samkya assert that this primary principle is the equilibrium of the qualities of courage, particles and darkness. The imbalances of these three qualities are the results or expressions of the primary principle. For the Samkya the three terms root nature, primary nature, and primary principle are synonymous.

The primary principle has six qualities:

- The quality of creation because it creates existence.
- It is permanent because it does not change.

- It is a solitary unit that is partless.
- It is all pervading.
- It lacks the quality of clarity. For this tenet the quality of clarity is associated with awareness. The primary principle is an object and not awareness.
- The quality of the equilibrium of courage, particles and darkness. These three qualities of courage, particle and darkness can refer respectively to happiness, suffering and equanimity. They can also be related to the afflictions whereby then darkness is ignorance, particle is anger and courage is attachment.

The twenty-five categories of objects

- Of the twenty-five categories of objects the primary principle is the only object that is a cause but not an effect.
- The next seven categories are the five mere forms of visual form, sound, smell, taste and tactile sensations plus awareness and pride. These are both cause and expression so they are both cause and effect.
- Then we have the eleven faculties and the elements which are solely expressions. They are solely effects and not causes. They are:
 - The five faculties of awareness, which refers to the five sense-consciousnesses. For the Enumerators the five faculties of awareness are not the physical faculties, but are the five sense awarenesses.
 - The five physical faculties: the mouth, or sometimes the speech (1), the hands (2), feet (3) and the two lower body openings (4 & 5).
 - The five elements: earth, water, fire and wind and space.
 - The mental faculty.

That makes eleven faculties and five elements. Of the twenty-five categories of objects of knowledge these sixteen are only expressions or effects, but not causes.

- The person, who is neither a cause nor an effect, neither a cause nor an expression. The Samkya assert that the person, or the self, has the five qualities of engaging, permanence, not being created, lacking qualities, and lacking action. This was explained previously in *Introduction to the Middle Way*¹.

Initially the negation of the primary principle focuses on the refutation of a partless principle.

For one to have three natures [128]
Is invalid. Hence it does not exist.
Likewise, qualities do not exist
Because they each have three aspects.

Shantideva: One quality of the primary principle is that it is the equilibrium of the qualities of courage, particles and darkness. At the same time it is said that the primary principle is partless, and that it pervades all of its expressions. But to say one partless object has three natures is invalid. Therefore the principle cannot be a truly existent, single, partless entity.

Further, since everything possess the three natures in this partless way, because of being pervaded by the principle there is nothing that can be 'one'. And if there is no 'one' then there is no 'many', because one and many are mutually interdependent. 'One' exists only relative to 'many', and vice versa.

Further, the individual three qualities themselves cannot exist as truly existent single objects, because each also possesses the three qualities in the same way.

*If there are no qualities then also the existence
Of sound becomes very far fetched.* [129ab]

If the three qualities don't exist then the primary principle cannot exist, and if the primary principle does not exist then the expressions of the primary principle, such as the five mere forms of visual forms, sounds and so forth, also cannot exist.

*It also becomes impossible for non-sentient
Clothes and so forth to have happiness etc.* [129cd]

Clothes and so forth is a reference to the five objects of tactile sensations, and so forth. The Samkya say that the five mere objects of visual form, sound and so forth are both expressions of the primary principle as well as causes themselves. Therefore, if the primary principle does not exist then none of these five mere objects can exist, because they are all expressions of the primary principle.

Another reason why they cannot be expressions of the primary principle is because they are non-sentient, and do not possess mind, which makes it impossible for them to possess the three qualities of happiness and so forth. Non-sentient objects such as clothes and so forth cannot be a single unit that possess three qualities of happiness and so forth for the very reason that they are non-sentient. They don't have awareness, and therefore cannot possess the qualities of happiness and so forth.

*If functionalities have a causal nature -
Haven't we already analysed functionalities?* [130ab]

If functionalities are in the nature of truly existent causes haven't we already refuted truly-existent functionalities?

The five types of objects are asserted to be both cause as well as expression. If happiness and so forth is generated from cloth and so forth, then since subsequently cloth and so forth do not exist, the primary principle (which is the equilibrium of happiness and so forth) would also not exist.

*Your cause is happiness and so forth -
From that cloth and so forth does not arise.* [130cd]

*Happiness and so forth arise from cloth etc. -
Because it does not exist happiness etc. does not exist.* [131ab]

If happiness were to be generated from cloth and so forth, then as the cloth and so forth would be non-existent, there would be no primary principle possessing the equilibrium of happiness and so forth. It is impossible to have an effect without cause. The text goes on to say to the Samkya, 'However, you cannot actually accept this because you accept the primary principle to be a permanent functionality'.

*Happiness and so forth as permanent
Is absolutely not an object.* [131cd]

It follows that the nature of happiness and so forth is not permanent, because it is not the object of valid cognition perceiving it as permanent.

Samkya: Happiness is a permanent functionality.

*If happiness exists only when clear,
Why is it not apprehended at the time of experience?* [132ab]

Shantideva: The quality of clarity is only associated with awareness. If the clarity of happiness exists as a permanent functionality, then it should follow that the experience of happiness is apprehended at the time when suffering is generated.

Samkya: When suffering is generated the experience of happiness becomes a subtle one. The coarse experience of happiness ceases, and what is left is a subtle experience of happiness.

*If it becomes subtle then
How can it be coarse or subtle?* [132cd]

*Since it becomes subtle upon discarding the coarse
The coarse and subtle are impermanent.* [133ab]

Shantideva: It is not possible for happiness to cease being coarse and go to a subtle state, because you say happiness is permanent. If you say that at the time of suffering the coarse state of happiness is abandoned and becomes a subtle one, that is too difficult to apprehend, then that indicates that happiness is impermanent. Its nature changes from A to B.

*Similarly, why do you not assert
All functionalities to be impermanent?* [133cd]

*If the coarse is not distinct from happiness
Then happiness is clearly impermanent.* [134ab]

Similarly, why do you not assert all functionalities to be impermanent for the very same reason, because their nature changes from A to B?

Further, do you assert that the coarse is a separate, distinct, substantial entity from happiness, or do you assert that it is not a distinct, substantial entity from happiness?

In the first case, even though coarse happiness ceases one still experiences happiness, which therefore negates that the experience of happiness is coarse.

In the second case, if the coarse is not a distinct, substantial entity from happiness, then happiness becomes very clearly impermanent, because when coarse happiness ceases then also the happiness ceases. If you accept this, then the permanent nature of happiness and so forth has been refuted.

2.2.3.1.3.2. Actual refutation of generation from self

*In case you say whatever is non-existent
Can not generate because of not existing,* [134cd]

*You are firm on generation of the unclear,
Though not accepting it.* [135ab]

Samkya: If something does not exist within the cause from the start, then it cannot subsequently generate, because it is not possible for something to generate newly.

Shantideva: What do you assert as the meaning of the generation of the sprout?

Samkya: The meaning of the generation of the sprout is the manifestation of the non-manifest sprout that is present in the seed. At the time of the seed the sprout is present in the seed in a non-manifest unclarified form. When the sprout clarifies, or manifests, then that is the generation of the sprout. But for that to happen the sprout has to be already present in an unclear or a non-manifest form within the seed.

Shantideva: If you say that then you affirm the generation of the new, because you are saying that something that did not exist earlier does exist later. So your understanding of the meaning of generation is the same as ours, even though you do not label it as such. You assert as generation that that which does not exist earlier, the manifest clear sprout, does exist later. Although you don't accept our terminology for that process, we both accept the same thing from the point of view of meaning.

You can see how the Samkya actually open themselves to the Madhyamaka argument. Initially they say they do not accept the generation of something new. They say that that which does not exist earlier cannot be subsequently newly generated. But then, when they actually give the meaning of generation, they contradict themselves. They say that the meaning of generation is that the unclear, non-manifest sprout that is present in the seed subsequently becomes manifest, or clear. What they are saying is that the manifest sprout, which did not exist earlier at the time of the seed, does exist subsequently. That is when the Prasangikas say, 'Well, if that is the case, then you assert exactly the same as us. Basically, you have contradicted yourself'.

*If the effect abides in the cause then [135cd]
One would eat faeces while eating cooked food.*

*One would have to pay the price of cloth [136a]
For the seeds.*

Samkya: Excrement is the result of cooked food, so it has to be present in the cause. The result is of a partless, single nature with the cause, and therefore excrement becomes of a partless single nature with the causal food.

Shantideva: In a similar vein, one could just go to the market, sell one's clothes, and then for the money buy cotton seeds and wear those cotton seeds. The cotton grows from the cotton seeds, so the cotton seeds are the causes of the cloth. So the cloth has to be present within the cotton seeds. Therefore one could wear the cotton seeds in the same way as one would wear the cloth itself.

Samkya (being a little stung by the argument): Worldly beings because of their ignorance do not see that the cloth is already present in the seeds, and therefore nobody would do such a thing.

You should generate the virtuous motivation of bodhicitta thinking, 'I have to attain enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. For that purpose I am going to listen to the following teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

Refuting that it is impossible for an effect to not exist earlier and to be newly generated

*If the effect abides in the cause then [135cd]
One would eat faeces while eating cooked food.*

*One would have to pay the price of cloth [136ab]
For the seeds.*

The Samkya view of generation from self is that the result exists on the cause in an intrinsic partless manner, and these lines are the refutation of that view.

Shantideva: Since one can say that faeces are the result of the food that one eats, and that the clothes that one wears are the result of the cotton seed, then the faeces should be present in the food and the clothes that one wears should be present in the cotton seed. If the effect is present in the cause you might as well go to the market, sell your clothes, buy cotton seeds with that money and wear the cotton seeds!

Samkya: People normally don't do that, because due to their ignorance they cannot see that effect resides within the cause. Worldly beings don't know that the effect resides within the cause due to their ignorance.

Then Shantideva replies, 'You know that the effect resides within the cause due to your teacher, who you regard as omniscient. Since you know that the result abides in the cause you are certainly eating faeces when you eat food. Secondly, since you are able to understand it from your teacher, then other people should also be able to understand it. Why should worldly beings not see that the result abides within the cause?'

Trying to understand the view of the generation from self and the reasoning that is used for its refutation is very helpful for generating new insights.

Samkya: Worldly beings don't see it, because their consciousness is not a valid consciousness.

Shantideva: If it is the case that the consciousness of worldly beings is not valid, then what they see clearly (directly) also has to be untrue. For example the perception by worldly beings of the seed and so forth would also be flawed. One couldn't trust even what they see with their direct perception.

Showing that these faults do not apply to the Madhyamaka

*In case valid cognition is not valid [138ab]
Doesn't what it comprehends become not false?*

The Madhyamaka assert that every existing thing exists in a false manner.

Because the Samkya assert that everything exists truly they argue, 'Well, if valid cognition is not valid then whatever it comprehends would not be accurately comprehended as existing in a false manner. Doesn't what it comprehends become not false?'

*For that very reason your [138cd]
Meditation on emptiness is invalid.*

According to the Samkya, who assert that everything exists truly, a false valid cognition cannot comprehend a false object and for that reason they say that the Madhyamaka meditation on emptiness is invalid.

From the Madhyamaka point of view a false valid cognition can comprehend a false object.

Even though the words 'false' and 'true' are adjectives, here they refer to the adverbial meaning of 'falsely' or 'truly'. From the point of view of the adjectival meaning emptiness is true, because it exists the way it appears. But from the point of view of the adverbial meaning it exists falsely and not truly, because it lacks inherent existence.

Therefore the Madhyamaka say a false valid cognition can have a false object. Here 'false' refers to the way the object exists; i.e. as lacking true existence, inherent existence, intrinsic existence and so forth. In the adjectival meaning the object is true if it exists the way it appears, and the object is false as it does not exist the way it appears; i.e. there is a discrepancy between appearance and existence. That is the adjectival meaning. Here it refers to the adverbial meaning of whether it exists truly or falsely; i.e. lacking inherent existence.

Both the object possessor and the object are false, because they both lack true existence - they are empty of inherent existence. It becomes clearer in the next lines, which actually establishes the way the object and the object possessor are false.

*Without contact with the imputed object [139]
One won't apprehend its non-existence
Therefore the non-existence of any False object is clearly false.*

This is another very crucial point to consider. Without the initial identification of the object of negation one will not be able to work towards the lack of the object of negation. 'The imputed object' refers to the true existence that is imputed by true grasping, and 'contact' means the identification of the appearance of that imputed true existence in the mind.

It is crucial that one initially identifies the object of negation that is imputed by true grasping. For example, the truly existent vase is imputed by true grasping, and likewise with the truly existent aggregates and so forth. Initially one needs to identify the appearance of the object of negation within one's mind, and only after one has done this can one start to establish the non-existence of that object of negation. It is very important that one spends time identifying the object of negation, contemplating how objects appear to one's mind, and identifying the appearance of true existence that is imputed by true grasping.

The non-existence of the false object is clearly false because the false object of negation is impossible.

How the false object possessor can apprehend a false object

*Therefore, the thought thinking,
'The dream child has passed away'
Is the opposite of thinking that it
Exists, and is false.* [140]

The dream thought that the dream child has died is the opposite of the dream thought that the dream child is alive. They are counter-positives and they are both false. The thought thinking, 'Oh now the child has died!' cancels out the thought that the child exists, and both thoughts are false. Hence, one false object possessor can counteract another false object possessor. The Samkya assert a truly existent object possessor, but in the Madhyamika system it is possible for a false object possessor to apprehend the false object. The King of Concentration sutras give a variety of examples, saying that existence is like a dream, like an illusion, like a mirage and so forth. Even though it lacks true existence it appears as truly existent in nature, just like the horse or elephant of a dream appearing to be a horse or an elephant, when actually they are not and so forth.

If one realises the illusory nature of phenomena then worldly likes and dislikes will subside. On realising the dream-like nature of life and death of the dream woman or dream man, any like or dislike for them will cease. Similarly when one realises the lack of the illusory nature of the existence, then worldly like and dislike will cease.

2.2.3.1.4 Summary

*Therefore by analysing in such a way
There is nothing without a cause* [141ab]

By analysing in such a way there is no effect that is generated from other, such as Ishvara, there is no effect that is generated without cause, there is no effect that is generated from self and so forth.

2.2.3.1.5. Refutation of Generation from Self and Other

*It also does not abide on the individual
Conditions or the collection;* [141cd]

*It does not come from other,
It does not abide or go.* [142ab]

The result also does not abide on the individual conditions or the collections. The seed is the substantial cause of the sprout and it needs conducive conditions such as the elements of earth, fire, water, wind - the earth providing the basis, water loosening up the earth, fire provides warmth, etc. If any of those are missing then the seed won't ripen into a sprout. The sprout does not abide on any of these individual conducive conditions, nor does it abide in any of the collection of the conducive conditions.

The Samkya say that the sprout abides in the cause in a non-manifest form and then becomes manifest or clarified, which is according to them the generation of the sprout. That the sprout does not abide within the conditions is something that can be very clearly observed. One can see that the sprout does not abide in any of the conducive conditions individually, or in the collection of the conducive conditions.

Also, it does not come from other; it does not abide or go. The sprout is not generated from an inherently existent seed, or from inherently existent conditions. It also does not abide inherently after generation or go inherently. It is merely generated from the aggregation of causes and conditions.

Therefore, for all those reasons there is no generation from self, other, both or no cause.

2.2.3.2. AN ANALYSIS OF NATURE, THE REASONING OF DEPENDENT ARISING

*How is that made true by ignorance
Different from an illusion?* [142cd]

*That magically generated by a magician
And that magically generated by a cause
Whence do they come from where do they go
You should analyse this* [143]

Is there any difference between the aggregates and the self, which are made true by ignorance, and the illusions that are generated by the magician and reflections?

Student: No, because they perform a function.

So are they similar?

Student: They are similar.

How are they similar?

Student: Because they don't exist in the way they appear to exist.

Are you sure?

Student: I think that is true, but I think maybe the answer should be that they are similar in that they are both products of ignorance.

They are the same in that similarly to the illusory horse actually not being a horse while appearing like one, the self and aggregates do not exist truly while appearing as if they do.

It is good to meditate on how phenomena are similar to illusions, and how they appear as truly existent but don't actually appear in such a way. Similarly to illusions appearing different from the way they actually exist, all phenomena appear to be intrinsically existent while actually lacking intrinsic existence.

For example, one can meditate on emptiness while one is watching a movie, because that is a very good example for the illusory nature of phenomena. One has right in front of one's eyes something that appears differently from the way it actually exists. Then one can transfer this meditation to other phenomena and their appearance of true existence. If one can grasp that, then one has understood a very important point. If one really thinks about the discrepancy between what appears and what is actually there, one will not generate attachment or anger for what appears on the screen, or in real life.

That magically created by a magician, and that magically created by a cause: where do they come from, where do they go? You should analyse this. The illusions that are generated by the magician come about through causes and conditions, and likewise functioning phenomena also come about through an aggregation of causes and conditions. If they were generated in an intrinsic manner then at the time they were generated they would have to come from somewhere else, and then when they go, they would have to go somewhere else. So, analyse where these magical emanations that are generated from causes and conditions come from, and where they go to.

Generally, coming and going lack true existence, so if the sprout were to intrinsically come and go, it would intrinsically come from somewhere else, and go to somewhere else. One needs to analyse this absence of an intrinsic sprout that is coming and going.

Here one can use the syllogism: Take the self and the aggregates - they lack true existence - because they are dependant arising; like the reflection of form in the mirror.

As usual generate a good motivation for listening to the teaching

Take the subject self and aggregates: it follows they lack true existence - because they are dependent arising; e.g. like the reflection of form in the mirror.

Illusion arises from the cause of ignorance, and the sprout arises from the cause of the seed. The sprout is generated through the aggregation of the substantial cause of the seed, and the conducive conditions of the earth, water, heat and the air. When these causes come together the sprout is generated. Hence the sprout is seen through its closeness to its causal seed. Elsewhere, illusion is seen through its the closeness to its causal ignorance. If the cause does not exist the illusion or the sprout will not be seen.

One can relate the example of the sprout, its substantial cause and all its conducive conditions, to the twelve interdependent links of dependent arising. Initially one has ignorance and from ignorance one generates karma. Without ignorance karma would not be generated and if karma is not generated there is no dependent link of consciousness. The dependent link of consciousness causes the dependent links of birth and name and form. From these the sources arise, and from these contact and then feeling. One can say that the sprout, the resultant illusion and so forth, lack true existence, because they exist in dependence on other phenomena - they are created. The meaning of being created is to exist in dependence on other phenomena, and that is the reason why they lack true existence.

Lama Tsong Khapa and his two sons labelled this reasoning of dependent arising the king of reasoning, because it is the supreme way to understand the lack of true existence. It contains all the salient points of all the other types of reasoning, and therefore it reigns over all the other types of reasonings just as a king reigns over his subjects.

Analysis using dependent arising overcomes all wrong views and conceptions. In the Commentary to Bodhicitta it is said that the reasoning of dependent arising is a supreme reasoning, because through it one establishes the karmic law of cause and effect. When some people investigate inherent existence they arrive at a nihilistic point of view, and this reasoning of dependent arising counteracts that misconception.

2.2.3.3. ANALYSIS OF THE RESULT, THE REASONING OF THE GENERATION AND CESSATION OF EXISTENCE AND NON EXISTENCE

We started with an analysis of the cause, followed by an analysis of the nature of the object, and now we have an analysis of the effect. If something exists from its own side, then why is it not feasible for it to generate an effect?

Student: Because it would have to be permanent.

Why should it be permanent if it exists from its own side? Actually, in that case it should not be permanent.

Student: Because it is would have to be unchanging.

It is acceptable to think that if it were intrinsic then it would have to be devoid of change and therefore it could not produce a result.

*What need is there for a cause [145]
For a functionality to come into existence?
Even in case it does not exist,
What need is there for a cause?*

If it is a functionality that comes into existence from its own side, then what need is there for a cause for that functionality? It does not need to be generated since it exists naturally. If this resultant functionality does not exist then what need is there for a cause, since it can not be generated.

*Even through one billion causes [146ab]
A non-functionality cannot be changed.*

Realists: I can understand why we do not need a cause if the functionality already exists, but one does need a cause if it does not yet exist.

Answer: Even with one billion causes an intrinsic non-functionality can never be changed into a functionality.

This is not negating that there is an effect that arises from the cause. Neither does this negation concern itself with negating that the effect exists at the time of the cause. What is being negated is that an intrinsic effect arises from the cause. In other words, an effect does not arise without a cause. So this is negating that an effect does not arise in dependence on causes and conditions.

*How can it be a functionality occasionally? [146cd]
How can a functionality be anything else?*

*If it can not be a functionality when it is not [147ab]
How can it become a functionality?
If it does not become a functionality*

It has just been argued that even with one billion causes a non-functionality can never be changed into a functionality. But if it were able to change, then does it change without abandoning its status of non-functionality, or does it change after abandoning its status of non-functionality.

In the case of the former, how can something that is a non-functionality also be a functionality, because being able to perform a function and not being able to perform a function are mutually exclusive.

In the second case the non-functionality becomes a functionality upon abandoning its status of being a non-functionality. This means one would need a third object, which is not possible. The reasoning is that if the nonfunctionality becomes a functionality upon abandoning its status of non-functionality, then between abandoning its status of non-functionality and becoming a functionality it would have to be a third object, which is not possible.

How can it become a functionality? [147ab]
If it does not become a functionality

Further, if you assert that the non-functionality turns into a functionality without abandoning its status of non-functionality, then when does it become a functionality? At the time when it is a non-functionality it cannot be a functionality, because these two are a dichotomy. And when it ceases to exist it doesn't become a functionality, so both in existence and non-existence it does not become a functionality.

How can it become devoid of non-functionality? [147cd]

If it is not devoid of non-functionality [148]
It is impossible to be a functionality.
Also the functionality does not become non-existent
Because it would follow that it has two natures.

Further, if the non-functionality becomes a functionality upon abandoning its status of non-functionality, it cannot be devoid of non-functionality before being generated as functionality. As long as something is not devoid of non-functionality it is impossible to become a functionality, because both are mutually exclusive. This highlights the point that an object can only be one or the other. It can only be functionality or a non-functionality, and it cannot be something that has abandoned its status of non-functionality before turning into a functionality. In order for something to turn into a functionality it has to become devoid of non-functionality. For as long as something is not devoid of non-functionality it cannot become a functionality.

By showing that functionality and non-functionality are mutually exclusive, one can transfer this reasoning to inherent existence and non-inherent existence. Because it exists inherently a functionality cannot turn into a non-functionality. Here one has to relate it all to the object of negation. Non-functionality does not turn into functionality, because it exists intrinsically. Therefore all functionalities lack inherent existence.

2.3 Cutting off the mental fabrications of true grasping

Since it is not negated in such a way [149]
And functionalities do not exist
All migrators
Are never generated and never cease.

Take the subject 'the sprout': it is not generated from its own side - because it is not inherently generated as an existent, and neither is it inherently generated as a non-existent, for example, like a mule's foal.

Just as generation does not exist inherently, the cessation of the object also does not exist inherently. The sprout is not generated inherently and neither does it cease from its own side. The sprout is pacified from beginningless times and is refuted as being generated eternally. Basically this means that the sprout lacks inherent existence.

Migrators are like a dream [150]
When investigated they are like banana trees
Having gone beyond misery and having not gone -
They do not have any distinction.

Therefore all migrators always lack inherent generation and cessation. They are pacified from the beginning, and naturally liberated. Migrators are like a dream in that they seem to exist from their own side, findable at the time of analysis. However, they lack any type of inherent existence. Their actions and activities abide free and unmixed with inherent existence, despite appearing as though they possess inherent existence. When they are investigated with ultimate reasoning, then just like pulling the banana tree apart leaf by leaf, one will not find anything essential inside. Therefore there is no distinction between having gone beyond misery and not gone beyond misery - their nature is the same.

The person is the mere 'I' that is labelled in dependence on the aggregates. If one investigates how this 'I' exists one investigates the nature of the 'I'. An investigation of the nominal nature of the 'I' includes investigating the nominal nature of the person being the 'I' that is merely labelled in dependence on the aggregates, and investigating which of the three categories of functionalities it falls under - whether it is form, consciousness or non-associated compounded phenomenon, and so forth. This is the nominal analysis of the self. If one is then not satisfied with the self not existing in such a way and goes further, trying to find some intrinsic self that exists within the basis of imputation, then one is unsatisfied with the mere nominal existence of the self, and has gone into ultimate analysis.

Migrators of samsara are like a dream. They are not born, they don't die, and so they are like a water bubble and so forth.

2.4. The function of realising emptiness

The functions of emptiness are two-fold: to fulfil one's own potential, and for the purpose of others. Fulfilling one's own potential means meditating on the absorption of cessation in this life, while achieving the purpose of others means to meditate on love and compassion for them. This part of the text is very useful for one's practice.

Review

What is the definition for dependent arising?

Student: Produced by causes.

That which is established in dependence on its causes is the definition according to the Mind Only view, but that leaves out all non-compounded phenomena. If you say the definition is that which is established in dependence upon its parts, then that also includes non-compounded phenomena. In the Madhyamaka system all phenomena are dependent arising.

What reasoning do you have to use to oppose generation from no cause?

Student: If there is generation from no cause then anything can be generated from anything.

Doesn't Chandrakirti give the reasoning that being generated from no cause is actually contradicted by worldly direct perception?

What is posited as generation from other?

Student: An intrinsically existent effect arises from an intrinsically existing cause.

The generation of an inherently existent result from an inherently existent cause is the meaning of generation from other. Generation from self means that the effect is of a partless nature with the cause. Regardless of the text the same definition is always used.

Give me the syllogism that establishes the lack of inherent existence with dependent arising.

Student: Take the subject 'self and the aggregates': they lack inherent existence - because they are dependent arising; e.g. like the reflection of form in the mirror.

This reasoning would be posited to a person who has first realised that the subject self and the aggregates are dependent arising, and understood that if something is dependent arising it lacks intrinsic existence, and who is now investigating whether or not that makes the aggregates and the self also lack intrinsic existence.

To arrive at this thesis one has to all realise all three parts of the syllogism. One has to understand:

- the subjects of person, self and aggregates
- the predicate, lack of inherent existence
- the reasoning of dependent arising

To understand the pervasion one has to understand the reason of dependent arising on the subject, self and aggregates, and also the pervasion that if something is dependent arising it lacks inherent existence.

The person wants to understand the thesis that the self and aggregates lack inherent existence, which is a hidden phenomenon for that person. This is done by the reasoning of dependent arising. One firstly needs to understand that the self and aggregates are dependent arising, and then one needs to understand that if it is dependent arising then it will always lack inherent existence. That is how one arrives at the thesis that the person and the aggregates lack inherent existence. One can also use this model for other subjects and predicates, for example, 'take "sound": it is impermanent - because it is a product'. The system is the same. One has to contemplate how sound is impermanent because of being a product. If something is a product it is necessarily impermanent, and then one can arrive at the thesis that sound is impermanent.

If a person has understood that sound is a product and has understood that if something is a product then it is necessarily impermanent, then by combining these two understandings one can arrive very nicely at an understanding that sound has to be impermanent.

Hidden phenomena such as emptiness and so forth need to be understood in dependence on valid reason. One doesn't need any reasoning to understand obvious phenomena, such as the colour blue and so forth, because one can see them directly.

Emptiness has to be understood with reasonings such as the reasoning of dependant arising. One has to understand that the subject is dependent arising, and therefore it necessarily lacks inherent existence. By combining these two understandings one can arrive at the thesis or subject, for example 'the vase lacks inherent existence'. Then whenever one remembers the dependent arising of the vase one will also remember its lack of inherent existence. When one realises the emptiness of one subject then one realises the emptiness of all phenomena, because one can just simply just transfer the initial understanding.

First one investigates with reasoning and by following the path of reasoning one arrives at a valid cognition of the subject. Then one meditates on it repeatedly, thus deepening the understanding.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Tenzin Dongak

27 September 2005

As usual please generate a virtuous motivation thinking, 'I have to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. In order to do so, I am now going to listen to this profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

2.4. The function of realising emptiness

We have started with the outline of what one should do with the realisation of emptiness, which comes in two parts.

2.4.1. To achieve the purpose of self

2.4.2. Meditating on great compassion to achieve the purpose of others.

2.4.1. TO ACHIEVE THE PURPOSE OF SELF

This refers to subduing the eight worldly dharmas.

*How can functionalities thus empty
Be attained or lost?* [151]

*How could one be praised?
How could one be criticised?*

*Where do happiness and suffering come from?
Why does one like and dislike?
Having investigated this very nature
Who craves, and for what?* [152]

*When analysed, this life's worldly being,
How can it pass away here?
What will arise, what arose?
What is a relative or friend?* [153]

The eight worldly dharmas are the eight attitudes of worldly beings:

- ❖ a liking for gain and a dislike for loss;
- ❖ a liking for praise and dislike for criticism;
- ❖ a liking for being spoken to pleasantly and a dislike for being spoken to unpleasantly;
- ❖ a liking for happiness and a dislike for unhappiness.

It is important to know that the actual worldly dharma is that one generates happiness on receiving gain. Just receiving gain by itself is not a worldly dharma, as there are many superior bodhisattvas who possess great riches. The worldly dharma is that one is happy with gain and dislikes loss. Here dislike is anger. In Letter to a King, Nagarjuna told the king that he had to abandon the likes and dislikes of a worldly being.

As was the case in earlier investigations the eight worldly dharmas are empty of inherent existence. After meditating on the emptiness of the eight worldly dharmas, how could one have a liking for gain and a dislike for loss? How could one have liking for praise and a dislike of criticism? How could one have a like or dislike for the gain or loss of functionalities that are empty? Where could happiness and suffering come from when functionalities are empty? If, as was explained before, functionalities are empty then why should one generate any likes or dislikes?

These lines of the text obviously deal with subduing the eight worldly dharmas. Getting a grip on the eight worldly dharmas is similar to meditating on immeasurable equanimity. One generates a state of equanimity that is free from like and dislike for gain and loss, and one also realises the lack of inherent existence of the subject and object. By comprehending the actual nature of their existence one can apprehend all of existence as being like a dream, and therefore not generate any of the eight worldly dharmas.

If one has an understanding of emptiness, then it is very helpful for lessening one's attachment and anger. Ordinarily, what happens is that when one encounters something that one likes such as gain, one generates happiness and attachment for that. If one encounters something that one dislikes such as loss, then one generates anger. At those times, there is a perception of the object as being truly existent, and also of oneself as truly existent.

For example, when one is criticised, there is a strong perception of oneself as existing independently from one's own side. There is also the perception of the words as existing from their own side, and the person criticising as existing from their own side and so forth. If one meditates on emptiness, seeing that the words, oneself and the other person are merely imputed by conception, then that is of enormous help in lessening and avoiding anger.

Similarly when one meditates on the emptiness of the pleasant appearance of the object, remembering that it is merely imputed by mind, then that helps to lessen one's attachment. Attachment is based on the appearance of intrinsic reality of the object and oneself. If one can overcome this perception, then one can greatly lessen one's attachment.

The generation of attachment and anger is based on the true appearance of the object. By perceiving an object as existing from its own side one generates attachment or anger for the object. Training one's mind in the meditation on emptiness - that the object lacks true existence, existence from its own side, inherent existence and so forth, and is therefore dream-like - will greatly help to lessen one's attachment and anger. The more the mind is consumed by the eight worldly dharmas, the less the person will be able to practice the Dharma.

As explained in the Lam Rim, one needs to subdue the eight worldly concerns in order to be able to practice the Dharma purely. Otherwise, one will not be able to free the mind from the likes and the dislikes of this life. The more the mind is consumed by the likes and dislikes for this life, the less the person is able to practice the Dharma, and the more difficulty the person encounters in this life. The more the eight worldly dharmas rule a person's mind, the more difficulty that person has in this life.

Emptiness is the antidote to all the afflictions. By meditating on emptiness one can counteract all afflictions. One should arrive at the awareness that it is essential to realise emptiness in order to be able to overcome the mental afflictions. Overcoming the mental afflictions will only happen relative to realising emptiness. So make a concerted effort to realise emptiness. Meditate on how the generation of the afflictions depends on the perception of true existence: then you can understand how overcoming the mental afflictions depends on an understanding of emptiness.

*Where do happiness and suffering come from? [152]
Why has one likes and dislikes?
Having investigated this very nature
Who craves, and for what?*

When one investigates the very nature of emptiness with ultimate analysis and reasoning, then one comes to an understanding that there is no ultimate person who craves, and neither is there an ultimately existing object of the craving.

*When analysed, this life worldly being, [153abc]
How can it pass away here?
What will arise, what arose?*

How can this worldly sentient being pass away in this life? What will arise in the next life? What arose in the past life? With such an analysis of the nature of the person, one realises that there is no intrinsic person. There is no inherently existent person who took rebirth in the past, who took rebirth in this life, or who will take rebirth in the next life.

*What is a relative or friend? [153d]
Everything is like space - [154ab]
That is how the likes of me should think of everything!*

When investigated, there is no intrinsic relative or friend and everything is in the space-like nature of emptiness. As Shantideva says of himself, 'The likes of me should think of everything in this way'. Here, he is referring to himself from the point of view of an ordinary being. One should understand that the awareness of emptiness is the primary cause for the attainment of the qualities of liberation and enlightenment.

*Those, who desire happiness, [154cd]
Through the causes of fighting and likening,
Are agitated or joyful; [155]
Are miserable, striving and arguing,
Cutting, stabbing, and creating negativity
With each other; It is a very difficult life!*

These lines explain the faults of cyclic existence as the focal object of compassion.

'Those, who desire happiness' refers to those who desire and crave happiness in this life. Despite desiring happiness, they are not beyond suffering. Why is that so?

Through attachment to the happiness of this life one regards the person who obstructs one's happiness and joy as an enemy. Then one starts fighting and arguing with them. One engages in all kinds of activities with one's friends, which are supposed to bring joy, but they have the effect of agitating the mind and making the mind unhappy. In such a way, one is left in a situation where, regardless of what one does, one does not attain happiness, and becomes very miserable. This leads one to strive even further for happiness in those mistaken ways, and to start arguing with others out of frustration, and also to engage in physical fights, which can end up with stabbing.

One creates negativity by being negative verbally, and from one's mental non-virtuous attitudes towards each other. All of this causes lots of suffering and misery, therefore, looking at the situation of sentient beings, the sages don't generate any attachment for the happiness of this life. By reflecting on the situation of sentient beings in such a way, one can generate compassion for them.

Recognising this situation, those who are skilled don't generate any attachment for the four worldly perfections. Ordinarily, one spends a great amount of time accumulating and achieving worldly perfections. That is why one goes to work, earns money and so forth. But if one is proficient, one can recognise the fruitlessness of being attached to the worldly perfections and therefore give up attachment to them.

These points are very pertinent to one's life. How can one avoid generating happiness and suffering? With regards to the eight worldly dharmas, one can avoid generating attachment and aversion towards different objects. Reflecting on the sufferings of this life, and in this way trying to lessen the attachment to the perfections of this life is very relevant.

Everybody desires happiness, but ignorance always prevents the attainment of that happiness.

As usual please generate a virtuous motivation.

2.4.2. MEDITATING ON GREAT COMPASSION TO ACHIEVE THE PURPOSE OF OTHERS (CONT)

2.4.2.2. THE FAULTS RELATING TO FUTURE LIVES

Last week we talked about the outline that dealt with contemplating the faults of samsara relating to this life¹. Now we come to the point of contemplating the faults of samsara relating to subsequent lifetimes.

Taking a higher rebirth from time to time, [156a]

This line relates to the fact that occasionally, through the conducive conditions of having met a virtuous teacher and having accumulated merits, one takes a higher rebirth. Through the ripening of one's merits, one experiences contaminated happiness in this higher rebirth.

*And having experienced plenty of happiness there [156bc]
One falls after death into the lower realms,*

Here, one should contemplate that the times where one experiences happiness in cyclic existence are very rare, as one only takes a higher rebirth occasionally. Also, the happiness that one experiences in that higher rebirth is very brief. Once the merits to experience such a rebirth have been exhausted, one falls into the lower realms. So one should contemplate that the present happiness, which is being experienced by using up one's merits, is very brief. After that, one is going to fall into the lower realms. Therefore one needs to contemplate what happens after this brief human life that one is presently experiencing. These lines are trying to direct one's attention to the future.

Contemplating these points - the briefness of the present human life, and the certainty of falling into the lower realms in the next life - should induce one to practise the path in order to counteract such a rebirth. By practising the path one can counteract the likelihood of rebirth in the lower realms in the next life.

Experiencing long and unceasing sufferings. [156d]

There are a multitude of precipices in samsaric existence, [157a]

There are a multitude of precipices in samsaric existence, because the accumulation of non-virtue abounds in cyclic existence. Therefore rebirths in the abysses of the hell realms are predominant in cyclic existence. That's the reason why we find that in cyclic existence the beings in the lower realms far outnumber beings in the higher realms. The reason for this is that the karma one accumulates is primarily non-virtuous karma, which is the cause for the lower realms.

*Where it does not exist and is contradictory [157cd]
With the likes like this,*

What Shantideva is talking about is the wisdom realising selflessness, which does not exist in cyclic existence. Indeed it is contrary to a state in cyclic existence. Why has one taken rebirth in cyclic existence? It is because one has not realised selflessness. The realisation of selflessness is contrary to being in cyclic existence. Samsaric beings grasp at the true existence of a basis, path and result. For as long as there is grasping at the true existence of basis, path and result, then one will not realise selflessness. For as long as one has not realised selflessness, one will not be liberated. So, one has to realise the non-true existence of basis, path and result.

*Hence nothing like it exists in the world [157cd]
Additionally, [in Samsara] there is the inexhaustible limitless*

Ocean of suffering without example. [158a]

Nothing like the wisdom realising selflessness exists in the world because samsaric beings grasp at true existence. In samsara, there is such a great ocean of suffering that it is impossible to find a single example to illustrate that suffering.

2.4.2.3. EVEN THOUGH ONE IS REBORN IN A HAPPY REALM THERE IS NO OPPORTUNITY FOR DHARMA PRACTICE

*Where thus it is weak [158bcd]
And one's life is short.
There are actions to live*

*And stay healthy; thirst and fatigue, [159]
Sleep and harm; likewise life passes by Meaninglessly due to purposeless childish friends and acquaintances -
The opportunity to think is extremely rare.*

This refers to the practice of virtue. Even if one is reborn in a higher state within this limitless ocean of suffering, it is very difficult to create any virtue, because as a samsaric being one's practise of virtue is weak. One's life is also short. That's easy to understand. Because one's life is so short, there is no opportunity for the practice of virtue.

In addition to having limited time in which to practise the Dharma, one needs to engage in actions to prolong one's life. But even if one lives a little bit longer, it is just a further opportunity to accumulate non-virtue.

All the activities that one engages in to prolong one's life, and live in good health without obstacles and so forth, take up a great amount of time. For example, the amount of time that is spent on cleaning and grooming one's body is vast. Some people stay in the bathroom for hours on a daily basis! I might for stay a half an hour having a shower and so forth. If one adds it all up, and looks at how much time in one's whole lifetime one spends in the bathroom, one realises what a great amount of time for the practice of Dharma and virtue is lost. For myself, while washing, having a shower and so forth, I recite mantras and meditate on bodhicitta and so forth, so that the time is not lost.

¹ Last week heading, 2.4.2.1. The faults relating to one's present life, was accidentally omitted.

Then there are also many other actions that one does to serve the body, such as clothing it, nourishing it and so forth. If one looks at all the time that is spent in supporting the body, it takes up a major part of one's life. Then there is also the time spent preventing the body from becoming sick; taking medicine and so forth. All of that adds up to virtually no opportunity to practise the Dharma, even though one is in the human realm.

Then the verses list thirst and fatigue, sleep and harm. In between looking after one's body, one becomes thirsty and hungry, which again makes it difficult to practise the Dharma. One finds it nearly impossible to practise the Dharma when one is thirsty or hungry, because the first thing on one's mind is to get something to eat or to drink.

People become tired and fatigued, which also makes it difficult or impossible to practise the Dharma. Rather than practise the Dharma the first thing one wants to do is to rest. Then there is sleep: while one sleeps, one doesn't practise the Dharma, and sleep takes up a major part of one's life.

Inner and outer harms also prevent one from practising the Dharma. Inner harm includes sicknesses and outer harm refers to being harmed by other human and non-human beings, which of course interferes with one's Dharma practice.

Not only does one not have time to practise the Dharma because of hunger, thirst, fatigue, sleep and harm, but what life time is left passes by meaninglessly, due to the influence of purposeless, non-virtuous, childish friends and acquaintances, who induce one to engage in all kinds of non-virtuous and meaningless activities. Thus time is wasted in accumulating non-virtue.

The opportunity to actually contemplate emptiness is extremely rare. Therefore, since emptiness is the method to become liberated from cyclic existence, one should endeavour to engage in listening, thinking and contemplation on the topic of emptiness.

2.4.2.4. CONTEMPLATING THE RARITY OF THE PRECIOUS HUMAN REBIRTH

*How can the method to overcome
Habituation with distraction possibly exist there?* [160ab]

Objection: I can meditate on emptiness while I have rebirth in a happy realm.

Response: One has been habituated to true-grasping and has engaged in limitless, different distractions since beginningless time. How could any method to overcome these different predispositions possibly exist? Essentially it's not possible. Even though it might be a happy rebirth, adverse conditions to meditating on emptiness still predominate. Conducive conditions to meditating on emptiness are exceedingly rare, even in a higher rebirth.

*Demons work there to throw one
Into the vast hells;* [160cd]

*There are many wrong paths,
And it is difficult to contradict doubt.* [161ab]

There are many obstacles even in a high rebirth. One is confronted by many inner and outer demons that work at throwing one down into the vast hells. There are many misleading teachers who proclaim many different wrong paths. It is extremely difficult to contradict and clarify doubt. It is exceedingly difficult to find the inner and outer conditions in cyclic existence to generate wisdom, accumulate merit and find virtuous friends. One is now in this extremely fortunate situation, where one has found these conditions, and is free from many of these obstacles. If one does not practise the Dharma now, then it is extremely unlikely that one will be able to practise the Dharma later, when these conditions are not present. This is a reference to the precious human rebirth as the basis for the practice of the Dharma.

Next week is discussion night and after that you have the exam. On the first Tuesday after the exam, we will finish this chapter. Then we will continue with the tenth chapter on dedication. It is very useful to know how to dedicate one's merits. That will probably take us through to December. There are many verses, but we can just go through it as a word commentary.

I've heard good things: students who don't usually come to the Tuesday class attended the Seminar and they were very impressed not only with the depth of knowledge, but also the demeanour of the students - the way the questions were posed and the answers given in a very calm and nice manner. I am very happy with that.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

25 October 2005

As usual please generate a virtuous motivation thinking, 'I have to attain enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. In order to achieve that aim I am now going to listen to this profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

THE ACTUAL MEANING OF THE TEXT

2. THE ELABORATE EXPLANATION OF THE NEED TO GENERATE WISDOM

2.4. The function of realising emptiness

2.4.2. MEDITATING ON GREAT COMPASSION TO ACHIEVE THE PURPOSE OF OTHERS.

2.4.2.4. CONTEMPLATING THE RARITY OF THE PRECIOUS HUMAN REBIRTH

We have reached the part in the text that explains the rarity of one's precious human rebirth. It says that even though one has now taken a human rebirth, there are many obstructing conditions that can lead one astray and prevent progress and so forth. For example, the presence of many misleading teachers and many misleading tenets can easily generate distorted and afflicted wisdom, and even though one has a human rebirth there are many conditions that make Dharma practice extremely difficult and sometimes virtually impossible.

Therefore one should not allow oneself to be lulled into a false sense of comfort thinking, 'Oh, now I have a precious human rebirth and everything is going well, and even if it doesn't go well now I will just do better in the next life'. In fact it will be extremely difficult to find another precious human rebirth with all the good conducive conditions, such as qualified virtuous friend and so forth, in the future.

Searching for and gathering all the conducive conditions such as finding a pure virtuous teacher and finding the Dharma is extremely difficult, but one is actually in the presence of both of those conducive conditions now. They are extremely difficult to find. So making the mental excuse, 'Oh, even if I don't practise the Dharma purely this life, I can always do better in my next life' is an extremely misleading notion. In fact one can say that gathering these conditions again will probably not happen.

Finding freedom again is difficult [161cd]
And the coming of a buddha is extremely rare to find.

It is difficult to abandon the river of afflictions [162ab]
And weighted down by these one continually suffers.

'Finding freedom again is difficult' refers to the precious human rebirth that is endowed with the eight freedoms. It is extremely difficult to find this rebirth again. It is extremely rare to be reborn when a buddha has come. Even if one manages to do that, being reborn with a body that has the freedoms necessary to practice the Dharma is even rarer.

The coming of a buddha is extremely rare and therefore to be reborn at a time when a buddha has come is even rarer. On top of that, to be reborn with the freedoms to practice the Dharma is rare, and to have to other conducive conditions to practice the Dharma is even harder to find. So it is an extremely rare occurrence to have a precious human rebirth.

If one does not rely properly on the virtuous friend that one has found now, and, following the instructions of that virtuous teacher, enter the path realising emptiness, then will be extremely difficult to extract oneself from the continuity the river of afflictions.

Without realising emptiness it is not possible to abandon the afflictions, because emptiness is the sole antidote. If one does not abandon the stream of afflictions then just as a river continues to flow one will be continuously weighed down by the different waves of suffering.

2.4.2.5. IT IS APPROPRIATE TO MOURN THE SUFFERING OF ONESELF AND OTHERS IS SAMBARA

Those that do not see their suffering [162cd]
Despite suffering to the extreme,

These, submerged in the river of suffering [163ab]
It is appropriate to mourn.

Compassion focuses on those who mistake suffering for happiness and who, despite extreme suffering do not see that they are suffering.

It is appropriate to mourn sentient beings who are in this situation. While meditating on sentient beings and their situation, one generates a feeling of grief for those suffering sentient beings, and that is an appropriate reaction. The Tibetan word conveys the unhappiness and grief that arises in the mind from this contemplation on the suffering of these sentient beings.

Who could not feel grief after watching sentient beings repeatedly go into a fire again and again, and who, even though they abide in extreme suffering, believe that they are happy, continually acting as if there is no old age and death for them?

*For example, some, after having washed repeatedly, [163cd]
Go into fire again and again.*

These two lines relate to sentient beings being lead astray by misleading teachers and misleading tenets. The words 'some after having washed repeatedly go into a fire again and again' relates to practitioners who believe that they can purify their negativity by washing in certain springs and rivers. Then they do other things such as sitting in rings of fire, believing it will lead to liberation, or they engage in other acts of self-mutilation and so forth, such as lying on a bed of nails, in the belief that these practices will lead to liberation. In actuality all that happens here is that further causes for suffering are generated. Even though there is the perception of happiness, all they have done is to generate further causes for samsara. Therefore these sentient beings become the object of one's compassion.

*Thus, even though abiding in extreme suffering, [164]
They make-believe that they are happy.
Thus those continually acting
As if without old age and death
Are first killed, [165ab]
And then the lower realms come without respite.*

There are those who, even though they abide in extreme suffering, mistake that suffering for samsaric happiness – they delude themselves into thinking that they lead a happy life, and behave as if they are already arhats who do not need to worry about experiencing the sufferings of old age, sickness and death; they believe that old age, sickness and death do not apply to them. Continually acting like an arhat who does not experience the sufferings of birth, aging, old age and death, first they experience death and then the lower realms.

An arhat is liberated from the sufferings of birth, aging, sickness and death and does not need to worry about them anymore, but sentient beings behave recklessly as if, like arhats, they have already abandoned these sufferings, and need not fear these sufferings anymore. They act as if they will live forever, believing that death will never come. But, through different adventitious conditions, death always comes. Then they experience the lower realms without respite.

That completes the explanation of the focal object of one's compassion.

The aspect of compassion

The aspect or the mode of apprehension of compassion is the wish for sentient beings to be free from those sufferings. The aspect of compassion is that one has an inability to be able to bear that sentient beings should experience these sufferings, and the wish that sentient beings be free from these sufferings. The aspect of love is a wish for sentient beings to experience happiness.

*Thus may I become someone from whose [165cd]
Clouds of merits a rain well borne*

*Accumulation of happiness pacifies those [166ab]
Tortured by the sufferings of fire.*

'Thus may I refers to a person who has reflected on sentient beings in the previously prescribed way, seeing them as being tortured by the sufferings of the fires of the lower realms and so forth. From one's clouds of merits may a rain of happiness flow down and pacify the sufferings of sentient beings.

This explains the aspect of compassion after having first focused on sentient beings who are tortured by the fire of the different sufferings. Then one generates the wish that from one's clouds of merits may a rain of well-borne accumulation of happiness (which refers to the different things that make sentient beings happy) fall and pacify their sufferings. May a rain of these accumulations of happiness (the different things that are necessary for a livelihood and so forth) be born from one's clouds of merits, and pacify the fires of the sufferings of sentient beings and establish them in happiness.

*May I, by respectfully building up the accumulation [166cd] of merits
In the way without focus,*

May I, by respectfully building up the accumulation of merits, and by viewing the accumulation of merits as lacking focus, because of one's accumulation of wisdom... This is a reference to the accumulation of wisdom which does not apprehend the object of true grasping in any way.

By building respectfully and joyfully the accumulation of merits through the practices of generosity, morality and so forth in a vast and extensive manner, and by building up the accumulation of wisdom that lacks the object of true focus, may I be able to show emptiness to those who are destitute because of having the focus of true grasping.

*Be able to show emptiness to those [167]
Who are destitute because of having focus.*

May I be able to show emptiness to all sentient beings liberating them in such a way from cyclic existence.

In such a way may I be able to show emptiness to all those sentient beings who are destitute of the wisdom realising emptiness, because of having the focus of true grasping, and liberate sentient beings.

In such a way may I attain the state of omniscience to bring emptiness to all sentient beings.

A bodhisattva's practice of bodhicitta is the unification of the wisdom realising emptiness and great compassion. This is a reference to bodhicitta that unifies method and wisdom. Therefore one should likewise train in the bodhicitta that unifies compassion and emptiness and train in the path of the middle way.

Lama Tsong Khapa says that regardless of how much one meditates on renunciation and bodhicitta, for as long as one has not realised emptiness, one will not even attain liberation. Therefore one should train in the method of dependent arising. This is just another way of saying that one should train in the method of emptiness.

Gyaltsab Rinpoche says likewise that, without realising the view of the middle way, one will not even attain the state of liberation, and the state of an arhat. Therefore one should train in the path of dependent arising.

Therefore, seeing that samsaric perfections are empty of any essence just like the banana tree, one should give up samsaric perfections and rely on a Mahayana virtuous friend correctly in both in thought as well as in action. By training in the different methods for generating bodhicitta, which is the entrance to the Mahayana path, and by practising the supreme perfection of wisdom, one should accomplish one's own potential and the purpose of others.

The name of the ninth chapter is the chapter of the Perfection of Wisdom of the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life.

Next week we will continue with the tenth chapter, just by going through the verses. There will be no exam unless you have a specific wish to have one. The tenth chapter doesn't deal with very complicated philosophical themes so it is very accessible to everybody. It should be advertised that it is also suitable for people who usually come only on the Wednesday and Monday night classes.

༄༅། རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་སྐྱེས་པ་དཔེ་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga
Translated by the Venerable Tenzin Dongak

1 November 2005

As usual please sit yourself comfortably in a good posture, and generate the motivation of wanting to attain enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. Then think, 'For that purpose, I am now going to listen to this profound teaching and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

We have previously completed the ninth chapter of the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life and now we go onto the tenth chapter. Of the six perfections, the tenth chapter explains the perfection of generosity, in the form of dedication. This chapter comes in two outlines:

1. An explanation of the dedication in brief
2. A more elaborate explanation

1. An explanation of the dedication in brief

*By the virtues of me writing the Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life
May all migrators
Enter the Bodhisattva's Way of Life.*

[1]

This is quite clear. 'By the virtues of me' refers, of course, to Shantideva the author, explaining in Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life all the bodhisattva practices and their path to enlightenment.

By the virtue of me Shantideva writing Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life and also students listening to Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life may all migrators enter the bodhisattva's way of life.

Shantideva dedicates all the virtues created from the composition and explanation of Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, so that all migrators may be able to enter the bodhisattva's way of life. The purpose of dedication is to save one's merits for complete enlightenment, and also to increase one's merits. By dedicating merits to a great aim, such as complete enlightenment, even small merits can be greatly increased and produce a big result. In such a way, once the merits are dedicated to complete enlightenment, they are also protected from being destroyed by anger.

In order to make a dedication, one needs to have some merits that can be dedicated, which is what differentiates a prayer from a dedication. A mere prayer is merely wishing and aspirational, and one does not necessarily have to have anything to dedicate towards that aim. But a dedication is a prayer where one actually has something to dedicate. One can say that if it is a dedication then it is necessarily a prayer, but if is a prayer it is not necessarily a dedication.

When one dedicates merits to the welfare of others and combines that with the wisdom realising the lack of inherent existence of the substance given and so forth, one can see how dedication is the perfection of generosity. By practicing dedication in such a way one places imprints on one's mind to attain both the form-body as well as the wisdom-truth body of a buddha.

The dedication of merits to the attainment of complete enlightenment is the practice relative to conventional truth. Meditating on the emptiness of the three circles is the practice relative to ultimate truth. On the one side are the motivation, the actual action and the dedication of the merits, which is all relative to conventional truth. On the other side, there is the meditation on the emptiness of the practice of giving, the substance that is given etc., which is relative to ultimate truth. So one has both method and wisdom complete there.

2. The extensive explanation

This comes in three parts:

- 2.1. Dedication for the welfare of others
- 2.2. Dedication for the achievement of one's own potential
- 2.3. Dedication both for the purpose of others and self

2.1. Dedication for the welfare of others

This comes in two parts:

- 2.1.1. Dedicating that the unfortunate ones are relieved of their suffering
- 2.1.2. Dedicating for the completion of realisations of those who have already advanced

2.1.1. Dedicating that the unfortunate ones are relieved of their suffering

This comes in two outlines:

- 2.1.1.1. Dedicating that the beings of the three realms are free from suffering in general
- 2.1.1.2. Dedicating by relating it to the individual sufferings of the three lower realms

2.1.1.1. Dedicating that the beings of the three realms are free from suffering in general

*Those in all directions
Suffering in body and mind
May they through my merits
Attain an ocean of bliss and happiness.* [2]

In a way the verse is quite self-explanatory. Those in all directions refers all the beings residing in all directions, who are experiencing different mental and physical sufferings. May they, through my merits, attain an ocean of bliss and happiness. Compassion should also be generated in one's mind when meditating on this dedication.

*For as long as they are in cyclic existence
May they never fall from happiness;
May migrators attain the highest Happiness for ever.* [3]

For as long they are in cyclic existence, may all sentient beings, when migrators, never fall from happiness, and may they attain the highest happiness forever.

2.1.1.2. Dedicating by relating it to the individual sufferings of the three lower realms

This outline concerns dedication to the alleviation of specific sufferings relating to the lower realms - the animal realms and so forth. We will go through the verses without mentioning the individual outlines, because there are quite a lot of them.

Even the wish for another sentient being to be relieved of a mere headache is an incredibly powerful virtuous thought. Therefore, there is no question that the thought of wishing all sentient beings to be free from all sufferings has limitless power and potential. One might ask, 'How is one's own purpose achieved by dedication?'. Well, the answer is right here. By generating this strong compassion and wishing sentient beings to be free from all their sufferings and so forth, one accumulates a vast amount of merits because of the incredibly powerful virtue of these thoughts. By dedicating to complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings, one creates the cause for enlightenment, and as the practice of method, places an imprint to achieve the form body of a buddha. By meditating on the emptiness of the three circles, one practises wisdom and places an imprint to attain the wisdom-truth body of a buddha. In such a way all the aspects of the path are present. Compassion has great purifying power. We know this from the life story of Asanga. Therefore one purifies vast amounts of non-virtuous karma by generating all this love and compassion while dedicating.

There are forty-four verses in this outline. We are not going to read them all at once - they will come in instalments [laughter].

*May all beings existing
In the all the hell realms found
In the transitory worlds
Become happy and attain bliss through happiness.* [4]

May all beings that exist in all the hell realms that are found in all the transitory worlds be alleviated from their sufferings of heat and cold, and attain happiness and bliss through happiness.

*May those burdened by cold become warm. [5]
May water from
The great clouds of bodhisattvas,
Refresh the limitless beings burdened by heat.*

May those suffering the cold in the eight cold hells become warm and happy sentient beings. May the water from the great clouds of the two accumulations of the bodhisattvas alleviate the suffering of heat of the limitless beings burdened by heat.

*May also the forest of blade leaves, [6ab]
Become a beautiful pleasure tent.*

This relates to the sufferings of the neighbouring hells. After having prayed for relief from the hot and cold hells, one then prays for the alleviation of the sufferings of the neighbouring hells. May the forests where all the leaves are sword and knife-like blades become a beautiful pleasure tent.

This refers to a neighbouring hell where beings experience being cut and stabbed, because of having to go through a forest where all the trees have double-edged blades. Sometimes when you go into the bush, there are some types of big leaves that are quite sharp on both sides. If one goes through them without protection one could be quite badly cut. This neighbouring hell is similar. One dedicates that may these become a pleasure tent for those in this hell.

*May the trees of knife fruits [6cd]
Become wish-fulfilling trees.*

*May they be beautified by the melodious sounds of [7ab]
Wild ducks, red ducks and geese.*

This refers to a similar type of hell where one is walking through a forest and hears the screams and voices of those who were near and dear to oneself coming from the top of the trees. So one climbs up the tree but as one climbs up, the leaves and the fruits of the tree are knives that are turned downward. As one climbs up through them one is cut by them. Then, when one has reached the top, one's near and dear ones cannot be found. But there are many wild birds that will pick at one's head. [laughter] This contemplation is very good because it instils the fear of non-virtue.

In ancient times there were wish-fulfilling trees, and if one prayed to these then one's worldly wishes would be fulfilled. So here one prays that these trees of knife fruits become wish-fulfilling trees. As to the knives and birds that are picking at one's head in this terrifying place, one prays, May they be beautified by melodious sounds of, and then the verse lists all kinds of birds that could be melodious such as wild ducks, a specific kind of red wild duck and geese and so forth.

After having gone through all the suffering of climbing up the tree and being cut in the process, and having one's head being pecked and one's brains being picked at by the birds, one hears the voices from the root foot of the tree and one starts to climb down and this time, the knives all point upwards [laughter]. So one goes through the same process again.

*May through lakes with greatly scented lotus flowers [7cd]
The realms of hell become happy places.*

*May the heaps of burning coals become heaps of [8]
jewels;*

May the burning ground become like a crystal ground.

May the grinding mountains become the crystal palace

Of offerings; May it become the abode of the Ones Gone to Bliss.

In another hell one experiences being ground up between these mountains. May they become like a crystal palace of offerings and may it all become the abode of the Ones Gone to Bliss.

*May the rain of burning coals, embers and weapons [9ab]
Become forthwith a rain of flowers.*

In China, it happens from time to time that it rains stones. Similarly, in these kinds of hells all kinds of hurtful things rain down. May all of that become a rain of flowers. For example even the human realm there are hail storms where the hail is the size of tennis balls. In the animal realm there are many experiences like that.

*May those cutting each other with knives, [9cd]

This relates to a particular type of hell rebirth where one is constantly engaged in knife fights to the death with an opponent. Then after both have died and fallen to the ground, a voice comes from the sky saying, 'rise up again' and one has to go through the whole cycle again and again. This verse asks that instead of fighting each other with knives, may these beings throw flowers at each other for fun.

*May all these beings [10]
Through the power of my virtue,*

Obtain the divine body of a god

And then enjoy themselves with goddesses.

This relates to the suffering where beings are boiled in hot water and so forth, until the flesh falls from the bones, which then turn white.

May the beings that are being boiled in hot water until all flesh falls from their bones obtain, through the force of my virtue, a divine body of a god and then enjoy themselves with goddesses.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

8 November 2005

Generate a virtuous motivation thinking, 'I need to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. For that purpose I am going to listen to this profound teaching and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

2.1. Dedication for the welfare of others

2.1.1.2. Dedicating by relating it to the individual sufferings of the three lower realms

The following three verses dedicate that the beings in the hell realms be liberated by the trinity of Vajrapani, Chenrezig and Manjushri, through the power of prayer and mental stabilisation.

The first of these three verses dedicates in relation to Vajrapani, who is the emanation of all the Buddha's power. The second verse dedicates in relation to Chenrezig, who is the embodiment of all the Buddha's compassion, and the third verse dedicates in relation to Manjushri, who is the embodiment of all the Buddha's wisdom.

Why am I afraid here of the men, crows and vultures of the lord of death? [11]

Whose power created this pure bliss and happiness that dispels darkness completely?

Having thought this, may they look up, and see Vajrapani blazing in the sky.

May they be separated from their negativities through their joy of seeing him and become his companion.

Previously one dedicated that the sufferings of the hell realms cease. Here it says that after the terrifying noises made by the vultures, the crows and the different minions of the lord of death in the hell realms (who instil very great fear in the beings that live there) cease, may the hell realms be transformed into places of pure bliss and happiness. Then the beings there wonder how this has come about and look up into the sky.

After all the different fears, the terrifying noises and beings, and the darkness of the hell realms have been pacified, and the hell realms have become beautiful blissful and happy places (as one has prayed for in the previous verses) may all the beings look up and behold the powerful form of Vajrapani blazing in the sky. May great joy be generated in their minds through seeing him and through that joy may they become free from all their negativities and join Vajrapani as his companion.

*Having seen the fires of hell extinguished
By a rain of flowers and scented water* [12]
*May the hell beings think about where this adventitious satisfaction of happiness
Came from, and see the lotus in Vajrapani's hand.*

This verse prays for the sufferings of hell realms to be relieved through the compassion of Chenrezig. It is somewhat similar to the previous one in that initially the sufferings of the hell realms are extinguished, and the sentient beings wonder about the cause of this. Then they see the deity, which in this case is Chenrezig. Having seen the fires of hell extinguished by a rain of flowers and scented water, may all the hell beings, for whom one has previously prayed, think about where this adventitious satisfaction of happiness has come from, and may they see the lotus, which is Chenrezig, in Vajrapani's hand.

Friend, come hither, far away from the dangerous one within. You [13]

Will become free from all sufferings and be gone in the power of joy.

*The one who generates bodhicitta and love to rescue
all migrators,*

Who will come to Manjushri with the radiant top knot eliminating all fears?

A hundred gods make offerings to his lotus feet, he has eyes moistened with compassion [14]

And a rain of various flowers falls on his crown.

He has a pleasant house, hundreds of thousands of goddesses Melodiously singing his praises; behold him!

Having seen Manjushri may the hellish minds emerge.

Here the scenario is that one of the hell beings is Manjushri, who invites all the other hell beings to join with him to get away from the dangerous one - the lord of death. He tells them that if they go with him then they will be free from suffering, and be gone in the power of joy, and will join Manjushri who has the radiant top knot illuminating all fears, the one who generates bodhicitta and love to rescue all migratory beings. A hundred gods make offerings to his lotus feet, and his eyes are moistened with compassion. A rain of various flowers fall on his crown and he has a pleasant house where hundreds of thousands of goddesses melodiously sing his praises. Behold him!

May all beings in the hell realms, after having seen Manjushri in such a way, break out in praises from joy and happiness.

There are two ways of viewing Vajrapani, Manjushri and Chenrezig. One, as the trinity explained above, and two, as three of the eight close disciples. The remaining five close disciples are Samanta-bhadra (Always Pure), Namka'i Nyingpo (Essence of Space), Sa'i Nying-po (Essence of the Earth), Jampa (Love) and Dripa Namsel (Pure from Obscurations)

The next verse relates to the remaining five close disciples.

Thus, by the roots of my merits, [15]
May the hell sentient beings be delighted
By seeing fresh and nice smelling blissful rain falling from clouds
Unobscured; like the bodhisattvas completely pure and so forth.

Shantideva prays that by the roots of my merit, by the power and ability of the remaining five close disciples may a rain of fresh and nice smelling rain, which is blissful to the touch and unobscured by obscurations, fall from the clouds. When the hell beings see this rain may they be delighted and happy.

That completes the dedication relating to the merits. In this context the eight close disciples are viewed as bodhisattvas who always accompany the Buddha.

May animals be free from the [16ab]
Fear of one being eaten by the other.

Animals have the particular suffering of living in a realm of constantly being eaten by other bigger animals. May the animals be free from the suffering of being eaten by others.

May all hungry ghosts be happy [16cd]
Like the people in Draminyen.

May the hungry ghosts be purified and satisfied [17]
By a stream of milk flowing down
From the hand of the powerful transcendent
Chenrezig
And be satisfied forever

The continent of Draminyen is endowed with many fortunes - steady wealth, food, life span and so forth. May all hungry ghosts have this happiness, like the people who took rebirth in Draminyen. May the hungry ghosts be purified and satisfied by a stream of milk flowing down from the hand of the powerful transcendent Chenrezig and be satisfied forever.

This relates to a visualization of the milk flowing down from the hand of Chenrezig into the mouth of the hungry ghost, purifying them from their negativities. By doing this meditation you are satisfying their hunger and thirst, and placing them in a state of everlasting happiness.

The previous prayers were for beings reborn in the lower realms; one has dedicated for beings that were reborn in the hell realms, the beings that were reborn in the preta realm, and one dedicated for those that were reborn in the animal realm.

2.1.2. Dedicating for the completion of realisations of those who have already advanced

Now one dedicates for beings that have been reborn in the higher realms so that they become free from suffering. Initially one dedicates so that those with incomplete faculties have complete faculties.

May all that are blind behold form [18]
And all that are deaf always hear sounds.
Like the magical goddesses
May pregnant women be protected and without harm.

One dedicates for those who have incomplete faculties to have complete faculties: for the blind to be able to see and for the deaf to be able to hear and so forth. One also dedicates for pregnant women to be protected from difficulty and harm like the Magical Goddess (which is the name of the Buddha's mother), who had a very problem-free pregnancy.

The subsequent prayers are dedicating to all the different individual physical and mental sufferings of the beings in the happy realms.

May the naked ones get clothes [19]
Those hungry get food
Those thirsty get water
And sweet drinks.

May those destitute attain wealth [20]
May those miserable and downtrodden attain happiness.
Those depressed by uplifted
And attain perfect stability.

May those who lack clothes get nice, beautiful clothes, may those who are hungry get very good and delicious food, may those who are thirsty get water and other kinds of nice drinks such as good tea and so forth. May those who are destitute attain perfect, stable wealth.

May those who are miserable and downtrodden be uplifted and attain happiness. May those who are depressed and discouraged, because of not achieving their aims, be uplifted and cheered up though achieving their aims. May they attain inner strength and a life of perfect stability and harmony, where suffering and mental unhappiness can harm them.

May those who are low and miserable attain happiness. May those who are burdened by many sufferings, and who are low and miserable attain happiness, and may they attain the objects that make them happy and so forth. May the minds of those who are depressed and miserable be uplifted and may they also attain happiness. Sometimes there are things that can uplift the mind of somebody who is miserable and depressed. May they all experience or receive those things and may their minds be uplifted and happy.

May all sick sentient beings quickly [21]
Be liberated from their sickness
May all the sicknesses of all migratory beings
Be eternally banished forever.

May those with anxieties, paranoias and fears become fearless, may those in bondage be liberated, may the powerless ones become powerful and empowered. May all sentient beings who are sick be cured of their sickness. May all the mental and physical ailments and sicknesses of migratory beings be banished forever. May they never arise ever again.

Praying that may those who are fearful, with anxieties, paranoia and so forth become fearless, is a very good prayer for these times where many people are very afraid.

May those who are in bondage and in serfdom and [22]
Under the power of others become liberated.
May those who are powerless
Become empowered.

May sentient beings who are powerless become empowered and may their minds become mutually friendly, One can often observe that people don't interact in a very friendly manner with each other. May all this harmful intent and spite and so forth be pacified in their minds, and may they live together harmoniously.

A note on variations in translations

Different translations come about because some translators do a word commentary, and others concentrate on the actual words that are there in the root text. It could be that some don't stick to the words of the root text, but give more of an explanation of the words.

As usual generate the virtuous motivation of bodhicitta thinking, 'I have to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. In order to achieve that aim I am going to listen to this profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

Dedications for the success of those who set out on journeys

May all the travellers in all directions [23]
Have happiness;
May the purpose for which they set out on the journey
Be accomplished effortlessly.

May all travellers who journey in all kinds of different directions in order to attain wealth, success and other aims, achieve those aims and have happiness. May whatever aims they have be achieved effortlessly.

May those who sail on small and big ships, [24]
Achieve their aims according to their wishes.
May they safely and happily reach the shore of their destination
And be happily reunited with their family.

May those who set out on small boats and big ships achieve the wealth and so forth, for which they set out.

In the past people set out on boat journeys primarily to seek wealth, precious jewels etc. So here one prays that they find all the wealth that they are looking for. May they safely return to their home and be happily reunited with their family. Also, may they not experience any sickness or accidents and so forth.

This is a very nice and useful prayer to do. For example, sometimes it happens that, when one returns home from a long journey, for some reason one cannot be happily reunited with one's family.

May those who wander about, lost on dry plains, mistaken paths and so forth, [25]
Meet with travellers
May they be free from dangers such as bandits, thieves, tigers and so forth
May they be able to walk their paths untiringly and happily.

May those who wander about lost on remote plains and mistaken paths meet up with other travellers. May they be protected from all dangers such as bandits, thieves, tigers and so forth. May they be able to proceed along the journey happily, untiringly in body and mind.

Repeatedly people who go hiking in remote places get lost, and have to live off what they can find in the forest, until they meet up with others or find their way and so forth.

May those who are lost in isolated places, [26]
Who have experienced suffering, who are elderly, without protector
Whose minds are deluded, crazy or sleepy and so forth
May all of these be looked after by the gods.

May those who are lost in isolated places, regardless of whether they are young or old, or who are of unstable and disturbed mind and without protection, be looked after by the gods.

Prayers for the good fortune of fortunate beings to continue

To this point the prayers have been for the alleviation of the different sufferings of human beings. Now one prays for different happinesses - for the increase of fortune and wealth, freedoms and endowments and so forth - to increase.

May they be liberated from inopportune states; and may they in all their lifetimes, [27]
Be endowed with faith, wisdom and love and compassion;
May they always have food; and May they always be aware of good actions and behaviours;

Here inopportune states relates to the inopportune states to practice the Dharma. May beings be free from the eight inopportune states for the practice of the Dharma. May their lives be endowed with faith, wisdom, love and compassion. May they have good and tasty food. May they, through their actions, always have the mindfulness that remembers all past lives. This refers to the clairvoyance that remembers past lives.

May they receive unceasing wealth [28ab]
Equalling the space-like treasure.

There is a specific type of concentration that is referred to as the space concentration. When one has achieved this specific type of concentration, then one will effortlessly achieve great wealth.

May they live together without quarrels and arguments; [28cd]
May they without harmfulness, attain independence;

Usually when sentient beings achieve wealth, they very quickly they start to quarrel amongst themselves and start to harm each other in various ways. May they be able to live without quarrels and disputes, live independently, enjoying their wealth without harming each other.

May sentient beings who have little splendour and charisma [29ab]
Achieve splendour and charisma.

May those sentient beings who have a bad complexion, little charisma and splendour and so forth, achieve a good complexion and lots of charisma and splendour and so forth.

For those who are sick and diseased with physical defects, [29cd]
May their forms become completely perfect and whole.

May all the bodies of those who have physical problems, difficulties and any kind of physical defect and so forth, become perfect, whole, beautiful, healthy and so forth.

May all women become men; [30]
May all who are low
Achieve a high status; and
May all those who are proud become humble.

The first line has to be read carefully. In Shantideva's time women had a very, very hard time. He was praying from that point of view. Observing the suffering of women, and seeing that they were suffering much more than the men, because of being suppressed, having to work harder and so forth, he prayed that they be reborn as men.

Some people use this line to criticise Shantideva, but I think it is important to understand that Shantideva does not have a low view of women, and that this dedication is not from the point of view of seeing women as inferior. Therefore one should not use these two lines to say that Shantideva discriminates against women. One should not listen to people who say such a thing, because that places a very harmful imprint on one's mind to be separated from bodhicitta for many lifetimes.

May those of low family lineage achieve a higher status, and may they not become very proud, but remain humble.

Quite often there is increasing pride when somebody rises from a lower social status to a higher social status. That's why Shantideva prays that they remain humble.

By my merits, [31]
May all sentient beings
Having abandoned all negativity,
Continuously practise virtue.

Shantideva prays, 'By my merits may all sentient beings abandon all negativity and continuously practise virtue'. Shantideva prays that by the merits he has accumulated through engaging into the bodhisattva practices, all sentient beings will abandon the negativity of the ten non-virtuous actions, and through that, continuously practice virtue.

Dedication for sentient beings to progress along their path to liberation

May sentient beings never be separated from bodhicitta, [32ab]
And engage in the bodhisattva practices.

May sentient beings never be separated from the wishing bodhicitta, the engaging bodhicitta and so forth, and practise the different bodhisattva practices such as the six perfections and so forth.

First there is the motivation of bodhicitta, in dependence on which one engages into the practice of the six perfections. May sentient beings to be able to engage in these practices.

May they always be looked after by the buddhas [32cd]
May they always abandon the actions induced by different demons.

This refers to abandoning actions that are harmful towards one's progress along the path. May sentient beings looked after by the buddhas and virtuous teachers, the conducive condition for the path. Here 'virtuous teacher' refers to the buddhas themselves. May they always abandon the actions that are counter-productive to progress along the path.

As we did last week, we can recite the chapter from the beginning. Here one can pray for everything. People repeatedly ask for prayers to be done for those who have exams, or for people who are sick and so forth. Here you can pray for all of that.

༄༅། །བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བརྒྱུགས་སོ།།
Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Tenzin Dongak

22 November 2005

In dependence on the root of great compassion generate a good motivation, the motivation of bodhicitta.

Dedicating for sentient beings to be reborn in the pure realms and to have a long life

May all sentient beings have [33]
A limitless life span;
May they always enjoy a happy life,
May the sound of death not ring.

May all the sentient beings (the limitless sentient beings of all directions) have limitless life span, and in that life span may their life be always happy. May they also be free from untimely death, before their natural lifespan runs out.

May all places become [34]
Gardens where wish-fulfilling trees grow,
Where everywhere buddhas and bodhisattvas
Listen to the profound sound of Dharma.

Then Shantideva says, by all my merits may all the impure worldly realms become a pleasure garden full of wish-fulfilling trees, filled with buddhas and bodhisattvas proclaiming and listening to the melodious sound of Dharma.

May the ground everywhere be free from unevenness [35]
Caused by pebbles, thorns and so forth, and Become as smooth as the palm of one's hand
And the smooth nature of lapis lazuli.

May the ground everywhere be without unevenness, without thorns, pebbles, stones that stand out and so forth, and be smooth, like the palm of one's hand or lapis lazuli.

In the pure lands there is no unevenness, and beings who live there just lightly touch the surface of the ground when they walk, rather than leaving behind an impression. So this prayer is the accumulation of merit that causes one to be reborn in the pure lands.

Initially you pray for a long life of sentient beings, but having a long life is not enough. You also need to have a happy life, and you also have to have the Dharma, because having a life without Dharma is pointless.

You pray here for everything to be like a pure land, a pleasure grove of wish-fulfilling trees, where everything is pervaded by the sound of Dharma taught by buddhas and bodhisattvas, and for sentient beings to have all of these qualities. This prayer is the accumulation that causes one to be reborn in the pure lands, which is where one wants to be reborn.

May there where the circles of retinues are [36]
Many bodhisattvas abide
By adorning the ground

With their qualities.

May bodhisattvas abide in the places where the buddhas turned the wheel of Dharma and adorn them with their wonderful qualities.

May all sentient beings [37]
Hear the sound of Dharma continuously
From birds in the trees and from the sunlight.
May they always meet buddhas and bodhisattvas.

May all sentient beings continuously hear the sound of Dharma from space, from the sunlight, from the trees, birds and so forth. At present one hears more non-Dharma sounds than Dharma sounds. So here one prays that all sentient beings continuously hear the sound of Dharma, which is a good thing, because the Dharma is essential.

May all sentient beings always meet perfectly enlightened buddhas [38]
And their children the Bodhisattvas.
May they make limitless offerings with infinite offering clouds
To the guru of migrators.

The guru of migrators sometimes refers to a teacher, but in this case it refers to Shakyamuni Buddha.

Praying for conducive conditions not to degenerate

May the rain always be timely, [39]
May a perfect crop ripen
May the king act in accordance with the Dharma
May the Dharma spread in the worldly realms.

May the gods (of the white side) always let the rain fall on time, and may the crops also ripen well and plentifully, which is a very important worldly purpose.

May the king act in accordance with the Dharma. This is also important, as it is not enough to have a good crop and plenty of food if that is misused by the people who rule the country. It is important that the people who rule the country also act in accordance with the Dharma.

May medicine be powerful, [40]
May the recitations of secret mantra be successful,
May sky dwellers, yakshas and so forth
Be endowed with the mind of compassion

May the life force and merits of worldly beings increase, and may medicines be powerful and effective.

May all the recitations of secret mantras be that are done with a good motivation, and which belong to the white side, be accomplished and fulfil the needs of all sentient beings.

May the space dwellers and (literally) the blood drinkers be free from harmful intent, anger, viciousness and so forth, and be endowed with a mind of compassion. There are different kinds of demon-like beings who harm human beings by drinking their blood and eating their flesh. There are other kinds of beings who dwell in space who also harm human beings. May all the anger, viciousness and harmful intent of those different types of non-human beings who harm to other sentient beings be pacified, and may they become endowed with the mind of compassion with love and compassion.

May sentient beings not experience the slightest suffering [41abc]
And be free from dangers and criticism and May they not experience the slightest mental unhappiness.

May no sentient being experience any physical suffering. When one offers this prayer then it should be pervaded by love and compassion.

May no sentient being experience any fear, or be bullied, or harmed by others, because if one is mentally anxious and fearful or otherwise mentally unhappy then physical wellness alone is not sufficient for a happy life experience. You can see Shantideva's thoroughness here; he has put a lot of thought into his dedication. The dedication chapter is complete: it prays for sentient beings in the hell realms, in the hungry ghost realm, in the animal realm, then for human beings and so forth.

Dedications for the ordained community in general and for different types of ordained practitioners

May the monasteries abide and expand and prosper [41d]

Through reading and reciting; [42abc]
May the Sangha always be harmonious and May the Sangha always accomplish their purpose.

May the monasteries prosper, abide and increase through the writing, reading and reciting Dharma by the ordained practitioners who live there.

May ordained practitioners who live in the monasteries always have pure morality, free from any kind of unbroken morality and always interact harmoniously

May the studying and propagating of the scriptural and realised Dharma of the ordained community be successful, and may the three types of activities - study, debate, practice of meditative concentration - and the different types of karma yoga in the monastery be successful and be accomplished.

May the bhikkhus who aspire towards the trainings [42d]

Attain isolation and, [43abc]
Upon having abandoned all distraction,
Attain a mind of pliant meditation.

May the bhikkhus¹ who aspire to practise the trainings attain a state of isolation free from physical distraction. Then, having abandoned mental wandering, may their mind become pliable, and may they meditate on virtue. This refers to the practice of single-pointed concentration where the single-pointed mind becomes pliable and virtuous.

May the bhikkshunis² always be successful and [43d]

May they abandon harm or strife. [44a]

May bhikkshunis always have all the necessary conditions for Dharma practice, and may they abandon criticism and harm. This refers to the situation where, on being able to keep pure morality, the practitioner starts to think of themselves as being superior, and begins to criticise others, or even tries to harm them in some way.

May that not come about because the progress of the practitioner is harmed when their mind is distracted by such harmful attitudes.

Praying for the practice of morality to be successful

Initially there was a dedication for the ordained community in general, then one for monks, and one the nuns. Now the dedication is for the practice of morality in general to be successful.

Similarly may all those who are ordained [44bc]
Never degenerate their morality.

The literal meaning of the Tibetan word for being ordained describes those who have definitely left the householder's life, meaning that having left, one does not fall back into that lifestyle. It does not refer to a state of not having a home or a place to live.

The literal translation of the actual words is somebody who has definitely left behind. But the meaning here is that the ordained practitioner does not fall back into the state of a householder. For example, Geshe-la says that in his case he left home to go to the monastery and never returned, so this literally applies in his case. May all of those ordained practitioners never degenerate their samayas.

If they have committed a breach of their morality [44d]

May they always immediately purify their negativity, [45abc]

On having attained a higher rebirth
May their ethics never degenerate.

May they never degenerate their morality, and when their mind has become burdened, or when there is a breach of morality in their mind, or some unethical thought has arisen, may they always completely purify their negativity.

When unethical thoughts have arisen in the mind may the ordained practitioners always exhaust their negativity, and engage in purification (which is like an exhaustion of the negativity), to purify the negative karma.

Upon having attained a happy rebirth through the practice of morality may their practice of morality and discipline in that future happy rebirth never degenerate.

May the sages always be praised [45d]

And always receive enough alms, [46abc]

May their continuum always be pure and
May they always be renowned in all directions.

May those of pure morality and pure learning be praised by all. May they also receive offerings. May their continuum not be affected by that reverence and respect. May they be humble without pride and without any other afflictions and be renowned in all the directions.

As usual please generate the motivation of bodhicitta thinking, 'I have to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings. In order to achieve that aim, I am going to listen to this profound teaching and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

We have completed praying that all those who are suffering be liberated from their sufferings.

Dedicating for the experience of happiness

May they not experience the sufferings of the lower realms and [47]

*May they without any difficulties
Attain the state of enlightenment
Through the superior (divine) body;*

Dedicating for the purpose of sentient beings

May all sentient beings repeatedly [48]
*Make offerings to the buddhas and Through the infinite happiness of the buddhas,
May they always be endowed with happiness.*

Praying for the accomplishment of the prayers of the buddhas and bodhisattvas

May bodhisattvas always establish the purpose [49ab]
Of sentient beings in their heart.

The two-fold purpose is the temporary purpose of a higher rebirth, and the ultimate purpose of liberation and enlightenment. May bodhisattvas always hold the two purposes of sentient beings at their heart, and may they also accomplish those two purposes.

May whatever the protectors think, [49cd]
Also be established for sentient beings.

Here one dedicates that the aims of the buddhas be accomplished. The word 'protector' refers to the Buddha. Of course generally protector has different meanings, but the Protector of the three realms is the Buddha. May the aims and thoughts of the Buddha always be achieved, i.e. the Buddha wishes all sentient beings to have happiness. May whatever the Buddha wishes immediately be accomplished for sentient beings, such as the wish for all of them to have happiness.

Likewise, may self-liberated buddhas [50ab]
And hearers also attain happiness.

Here one dedicates that self-liberators and hearers achieve their aims. Similarly, as said before, may the self-liberators and the hearers achieve the happiness of liberation that they aim for.

2.2. Dedicating for the fulfilment of one's own potential - the achievement of one's own enlightenment¹

Dedicating for the achievement of the temporary purpose

May I also, through the kindness of Manjushri, [50cd]
Until I attain the ground of supreme joy,

In all my lifetimes I always attain [51ab]
Mindfulness and ordination.

May I in all my lifetimes always be endowed with mindfulness and always attain the state of having gone forth. We talked about this state of having gone forth the other day; it refers to the state of having left a household to become an ordained person. These verses show that Shantideva had direct access to Manjushri. That's why it says here, 'May I also through the kindness of Manjushri...' and so forth.

May I be splendours and [51cd]
Live, regardless of my food.

After having prayed to be able to be ordained, one prays that one will always have a healthy and strong body, regardless of whether the food one receives is good or poor. May the body always be strong, healthy and well balanced. Regardless of the kind of food I have, may my body be always look, full with a very healthy glow.

May I in all my lifetimes, [52ab]
Abide in solitude and attain perfection;

'May I in all my lifetimes' refers to all of one's lives, which are like a rosary. There are not just one or two lives, but a vast succession of lives coming one after the other like the beads of a rosary. May I in all these lifetimes always abide in solitude.

Then follows the prayer to be endowed with perfection, which does not relate to external perfections such as a perfect body or perfect wealth, but to perfect realisations. Since the first line is the dedication to be able to abide in solitude, the perfection that Shantideva is praying for here is the perfection of inner realisation.

Dedication to be looked after by Manjushri

Whenever I wish to study, [52cd]
Or have even small questions,

May I always be able to behold without obstructions [53ab]

The protector, Manjushri.

This is a prayer to be always looked after by Manjushri.

May I always, when I aspire to the teachings of the Buddha, or have questions regarding difficult points of the Buddha's teachings, be able to directly behold Manjushri.

Dedication to abide in the bodhisattva practices

May my actions, in order to accomplish [53cd]
The purpose of all sentient beings

That pervade all ten directions, [54ab]
Equal the actions of Manjushri.

¹ The headings of the previous weeks have been part of 2.1. Dedicating for the purpose of others.

May my actions always equal the actions of Manjushri, so as to accomplish the purpose of all sentient beings who pervade the space of all ten directions.

Here, it literally refers to all sentient beings who are so vast that they touch the edge of space of the ten directions. That of course is not literally possible, because space is limitless and there is not really an edge of space that can be touched by sentient beings. What he means here is that sentient beings are so vast that they pervade the space of all ten directions. May one's actions equal the enlightened actions of Manjushri, in order to accomplish the purpose of sentient beings.

This is a very nice prayer. Manjushri practiced the bodhisattva actions in order to free all sentient beings, equalling the expanse of space in the ten directions. May I be able to practice the bodhisattva actions likewise.

The prayer for the perfection of the purpose of others

*For as long as space abides, [54cd]
And for as long as sentient beings remain,*

*For that long may I also remain and [55ab]
Eliminate the sufferings of sentient beings.*

For as long as space abides means for as long as samsara abides. For as long as migrators abide, for that long may I also abide and free migrators from their suffering.

Here one generates very strong mental courage of wanting to abide until the end of cyclic existence in order to liberate sentient beings.

*May any suffering of migrators [55cd]
Ripen upon myself.*

This doesn't discriminate between migrators or suffering, and Shantideva meditates on taking on all the suffering of all sentient beings.

*Through the power of the transcendent bodhisattva Sangha, [56ab]
May all sentient beings enjoy happiness.*

Dedication for the increase and spread of the Buddhadharmā, the source of all happiness

May the only medicine for the suffering of migrators, [56cd]

*The source of all happiness - the Dharma,
Abide long [57ab]
With praise and high regard*

The Dharma is truly the source for the both the ultimate and temporary happiness of sentient beings. Here then, Shantideva prays for the Dharma of sentient beings to abide for a long while. Not only should it abide for a long while, but may it also always be held in high regard and may it always be praised. There is the scriptural as well as the realised Dharma.

As it says in the prayer: May I be able to perfectly subdue my mind by not engaging in any negativity and by perfecting virtue. This is the teaching of the Buddha.

When one prays, 'May the teachings of the Buddha abide for a long time', it is good to relate it to this verse and to one's own practice. It is not necessary to think about some Dharma over there, but rather to relate it to one's own practice. In this context it is the realised Dharma when one, for example, generates refuge with a prayer.

May that never degenerate, but abide for a long time.

The Dharma is really the source of both temporary and ultimate happiness for all sentient beings. For that reason it is very precious, and so it is very important that it abides. The higher trainings of morality, concentration and wisdom, or whatever practice one has in one's continuum, is the teaching of the Buddha. So one prays, 'May that abide for a long time'.

Prostrating to Manjushri by recalling his kindness

*I prostrate to Manjushri, [57cd]
Through whose kindness the virtuous mind arises*

The words here are quite clear - I prostrate to Manjushri through whose kindness the virtuous mind arises.

*And I also prostrate to the virtuous teacher, [58ab]
Through whom oneself develops.*

Here of course, the second half is general: it includes all teachers. But in the first half Shantideva specifically prostrates to Manjushri, which shows that he is a direct student of Manjushri.

I prostrate to the virtuous friends through whose kindness I develop.

Identifying the title of the chapter

*This is at the tenth chapter of dedication [58cd]
Of 'Introduction to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life'.*

That completes the tenth chapter.

Study Group – Manjushri Prayer Commentary

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Tenzin Dongak

6 December 2005

As usual you should generate the motivation of wanting to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings thinking, 'In order to achieve that state I am going to listen to this profound teaching, and then I am going to put it into practice as much as possible'.

We are going to do a word commentary by Trijang Rinpoche on the Manjushri prayer. Trijang Rinpoche is said to be an actual emanation of Manjushri as well as the incarnation of Chandrakirti, and by receiving the commentary you also receive their blessings.

The prayer came about because at one point many pandits decided that there was a need for a Manjushri prayer, so each of them composed one. Then the salient points of them all were combined into this prayer.

The prayer consists of a threefold praise to the mind, speech and body of Manjushri. Here the qualities of Manjushri's mind are praised first, although it is usually the other way around, with praise being offered to the body first, and then to the speech and mind of the respective buddha.

But here, because Manjushri is the embodiment of the wisdom of the buddhas, his mind is praised first. Also, during the outer offerings in the Yamantaka sadhana the offering of scent to Yamantaka's mind comes before the offerings of flowers and incense. This is because the offering of scent is done to the mind of the deity and as Yamantaka is the wrathful embodiment of Manjushri, he is the embodiment of all the buddhas' wisdom.

Usually when one performs the outer offerings in other sadhanas the offering of perfume comes after the light offering. There are other more elaborate praises to Manjushri that follow the usual sequence of praising body, speech and mind.

1. Praise to Manjushri's enlightened mind

1.1. Praise to his wisdom

1.2. Praise to his love and compassion

1.1. Praise to his wisdom

*He, whose discriminating awareness, by shining brilliantly like the sun free
From the clouds of the two obscurations, sees all objects of multiplicity like they Are, holds therefore a wholesome text.*

Whose refers to Manjushri and discriminating awareness refers to his exalted wisdom knowledge. The two obscurations are the obscurations to liberation and the obscurations to omniscience. With his exalted wisdom knowledge Manjushri has abandoned the six root delusions and the secondary afflictions together with their seeds and imprints, i.e. the two obscurations.

The obscurations to liberation are the six root afflictions and their seeds, and the twenty secondary or proximate afflictions plus their seeds. The six root afflictions are anger, attachment, ignorance, afflicted doubt, pride and wrong view, and they act as the root for the twenty proximate or secondary afflictions. The twenty secondary or proximate afflictions are wrath, resentment (or the wish for vengeance), concealment, spite, jealousy (or envy), greed, pretension, dishonesty, conceit, cruelty, shamelessness, inconsideration, uncleanness (or dullness), excitement, faithlessness, laziness, recklessness, forgetfulness, non-introspection and distraction.

The root afflictions and the secondary afflictions are all contained within the fifty one mental factors. From one point of view the six root afflictions are the root of all unwanted suffering and problems, and from another perspective they are root afflictions because they are the roots of the twenty secondary afflictions. The literal translation of 'secondary' is more like proximate or close afflictions, and they are called that because they are close to their respective root afflictions.

Anger is the root of the proximate afflictions of wrath, spite, jealousy and so forth. Wrath, for example, belongs to the family of anger, because it arises from the root of anger. The difference between anger and wrath is twofold.

Wrath is a very specific accelerated and stronger form of anger that focuses on only sentient beings, whilst anger focuses on anything that is perceived as a cause of suffering, which includes both sentient and non-sentient objects. When one is merely angry one cannot bear the cause of suffering and one wants to harm or destroy the cause of that suffering, regardless of whether it is sentient or not sentient. However one is not really quite at the stage where one would actually inflict harm on another sentient being. Wrath is the accelerated form of anger that more directly precedes the actual harm that one inflicts on another person - it focuses only on sentient beings.

Similarly, attachment is the root affliction for greed. Greed is a proximate or secondary affliction that has attachment as its root, so it belongs to the family of the root affliction of attachment. That is also a good thing to know. All the other secondary afflictions also have one of the root afflictions as their root.

The transcendental wisdom of Manjushri is like the unclouded sun. When the sun is obscured by clouds one does not receive the sun's benefit, and for the sun to be able to shine clearly it needs to be unobscured by clouds. Similarly the transcendental wisdom of Manjushri is not obscured by the clouds of the two obscurations and therefore he can see the truth body clearly.

How does the transcendental wisdom of Manjushri see the truth body clearly? He sees in an omniscient way the unobscured truth body, by simultaneously beholding directly all objects of multiplicity and suchness without any obscuration. The objects of multiplicity are all the different categories of nominal objects from form up to omniscient consciousness. So the transcendental wisdom of Manjushri beholds all objects of multiplicity and suchness without obscurations directly and clearly.

The reason he holds a scriptural text at his heart is because the scriptural text symbolises that his transcendental wisdom perceives all objects of multiplicity and suchness clearly and directly without obscurations. Unlike the particular aspect of Manjushri relating to this prayer, the normal Manjushri does not hold a text at his heart. The aspect of Manjushri relating to this prayer is a red Manjushri that is referred to as the Manjushri Gang-Lo-Ma.

¹ The Tibetan word nye literally means close or proximate

1.2. Praise to his compassion

He loves those who exist in the prison of existence dazed by the darkness of ignorance, all the groups of migrators that are afflicted by suffering, like an only son.

Those refers to all sentient beings who are devoid of true happiness. True happiness is the happiness of liberation. Samsaric happiness is always transitory, finite and unstable.

All sentient beings that lack true happiness and are caught in the prison of the five realms of existence are dazed by the darkness of their ignorance. Their actions of body, speech and mind have been afflicted by the ignorance of grasping at 'I' and mine since beginningless time. They are overwhelmed by the three sufferings: the suffering of suffering, the suffering of change and pervasive compounded suffering. In the lower realms of cyclic existence they experience the sufferings of extreme heat and cold, and even in the higher realms they experience the sufferings of change and pervasive compounded suffering.

All these migrators, who are pained, burdened and squeezed by these sufferings, are loved by Manjushri like a mother loves her only son. This shows that the compassion that is generated by Manjushri is the non-discriminatory kind of compassion, because it is an equal compassion for all migrators.

The example of the love for an only son refers to the love of a mother for her only son. If a mother has no other children apart from one son then she will have a very special type of love in her heart for that son. This very strong love is used as an example for the great compassion and great love, that buddhas and bodhisattvas feel for each and every sentient being, and is the type of love and compassion that one needs to generate in one's own practice. It comes about gradually, first generating it for one person, then two, three and so forth, if you are interested in that type of practice.

2. Praise to the speech of Manjushri

His melodious speech, endowed with sixty features, reverberates dragon-like, Awakening from the stupor of the afflictions, liberating from the iron chains of karma.

Motivated by this great love and compassion Manjushri teaches migrators the different points of the path - what has to be adopted and practised and what has to be abandoned. Even just one word of the enlightened speech of Manjushri is endowed with the sixty features of enlightened speech. That his speech is motivated by great love and compassion does not mean that there is a preceding motivational thought, because that does not happen with an enlightened being.

Then comes the example of the sound of a dragon. This is a poetic description that is used as a synonym for thunder. Even though one is sleeping deeply, thunder can be so strong that it cuts through one's sleep and wakes one up.

Out of great compassion the thunder of Manjushri's speech explains all the points of the path of what has to be practised and adopted and what has to be rejected, which is really the only explanation that will help sentient beings to be free from suffering. This thunder will cause them to arise from the stupor of the sleep of their afflictions and free them from the iron chains of their karma. Here karma refers to projecting karma, establishing karma, completing karma and so forth. In short, his speech frees migrators from the bonds of cyclic existence, which are karma and afflictions.

He holds the sword that cuts any sprout of suffering and clears the darkness of ignorance.

The sword symbolises the power to be able to cut any sprout of suffering such as the suffering of birth, aging, sickness and death, and to clear away the darkness of ignorance.

Manjushri has the power to clear away any sprout of the sufferings of aging, sickness and death and so forth, and to clear away the darkness of ignorance of grasping at 'I' and 'mine', by teaching sentient beings the different points of the path with his enlightened speech that is endowed with the sixty features, and which is based on his love and compassion. If one practises what one is taught then one will be rid of the grasping at 'I' and 'mine', and through that one will also be rid of all the different sufferings. The sword symbolises that Manjushri has this power to clear away sufferings in this way.

3. Praise to the enlightened body of Manjushri

The body of a foremost child of the Conqueror, pure from the beginning and Naturally complete with the qualities of having perfected the ten grounds, Beautified with one hundred and twelve ornaments, I prostrate to Manjushri Who clears away the darkness of my mind.

Child of the Conqueror means a bodhisattva. From an interpretive point of view Manjushri manifests as the senior bodhisattva disciple of the Buddha, but from a definite point of view he is perfectly enlightened. Pure from the beginning means having being pure for many eons. Naturally complete with the qualities of having perfected the ten grounds means having a body that is naturally complete with the qualities of abandonment and realisation of the ten grounds: the qualities of the abandonment and realisation of the first ground, the qualities of abandonment and realisation of the second ground up to the qualities of abandonment and realisation of the tenth ground. Beautified with one hundred and twelve ornaments refers to eighty minor marks and thirty-two major signs of the body of a buddha.

I prostrate to Manjushri, who has perfected in such a way all qualities, and clears away the darkness of my mind.

Regarding the marks and signs of an enlightened body and the sixty features of enlightened speech there is a commentary on Manjushri by Lama Tsong Khapa that has been translated into English, so you can look them up there.

There are also other translated commentaries explaining the major and the minor marks and signs.

Study Group - Refuge and Bodhicitta

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Tenzin Dongak

13 December 2005

The meaning of taking refuge and generating bodhicitta

The first prayer that we recite is the Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer. The refuge and bodhicitta motivations are the motivations that we generate at the beginning of each teaching.

Refuge is the door to the Buddhist path and bodhicitta is the door to the Mahayana path. Refuge protects one from following a wrong path, while bodhicitta protects one from falling into a lesser path.

To the Buddha, the Dharma and the Supreme Assembly

The first line identifies the three objects of Refuge. When we recite the word Buddha we should meditate that in addition to Shakyamuni Buddha the word Buddha contains one's teacher; the deities; the eight medicine buddhas; the thirty-five buddhas and so forth. That is something that one should definitely contemplate when one is going for refuge.

One should contemplate that the word Dharma contains both the scriptural Dharma and the actual Dharma. The scriptural Dharma was taught by the Buddha through his kindness and is comprised of the different categories of the scriptural Dharma. The actual Dharma is the truth of cessation and the truth of the path.

The Supreme Assembly includes the different beings who are actual Sangha, such as the Mahayana Sangha, as well as the hearer and self-liberator practitioners.

The Buddha refuge is that which shows one the Dharma. One goes for refuge to the Buddha as the person who shows one the Dharma. The Dharma refuge is the actual refuge. The Supreme Assembly (the Sangha), are those who one takes as one's example. While one is going for refuge, one also visualises that one is surrounded by all sentient beings who, together with oneself, go for refuge to the Triple Gem on the basis of the two-fold motivation.

I go for refuge until the attainment of enlightenment

The second line identifies the time for which one is going to take refuge, and the basis that is going for refuge. The words 'I' or 'I myself' identify the basis that is going for refuge.

'Until the attainment of enlightenment' identifies the time period for which one goes for refuge. This is the uncommon Mahayana refuge.

General refuge is taken for the time period of this life, as in the prayer that is done during the formal refuge ceremony, and also when one is taking lay vows, where one says, 'until the end of my life'.

The specific Mahayana refuge is until the attainment of enlightenment. Here the meaning of enlightenment is two-fold. It can either mean the place of Bodhgaya, meaning that one will take refuge until attaining the state of the complete supreme emanation body in Bodhgaya. Or it means dharmakaya, meaning one takes refuge until one attains the dharmakaya or truth body.

So in these two lines, we have the two causes for refuge; we have the objects of refuge; we have the time period for which one is going for refuge and the basis that is going for refuge. That completes all elements.

May I, by the merits of practising generosity and so forth

Here again, the word 'I' identifies the person who is generating the motivation. 'The merits of practising generosity and so forth' identifies the merits through which one wants to attain the aim of enlightenment:

- the merits of generosity;
- the merits of morality;
- the merits of patience;
- the merits of enthusiasm;
- the merits of concentration; and
- the merits of wisdom.

Become a buddha for the benefit of migrators

The fourth line identifies the purpose of generating bodhicitta. Migrators refers, of course, to sentient beings, so sentient beings are the objective, while 'benefit' is the purpose of others, and 'Buddha' refers to enlightenment.

This line identifies the nature of bodhicitta as existing in the nature of prayer, as explained in both Ornament of Mahayana sutras and Explanation Illuminating the Meaning.

By the merits that one accumulates with one's three doors, through the practice of generosity, morality, patience and so forth, may one attain the state of a buddha, so as to be able to place all sentient beings in the state of liberation and complete enlightenment.

Mind, not mental factor!

The mind of enlightenment is exactly that - it is a mind and not a mental factor. If something is awareness then it is either a mind or a mental factor. The mind of enlightenment is a primary mind and not a mental factor, even though it is sometimes labelled as aspiration or wish. As it says in Ornament of Clear Realisation, Mind generation is the wish to attain of complete enlightenment for the purpose of others.

The label of aspiration or wish is merely nominal, because the mind of enlightenment is a mind and not a mental factor. The reason the mind of enlightenment is labelled as an aspiration even though it is not is because it has to be endowed with the two-fold aspiration:

- the aspirations of wanting to achieve the welfare of others
- the aspiration of wanting to attain complete enlightenment

The aspiration of wanting to achieve the welfare of others is the causal aspiration. The mind of enlightenment is labelled as wish or aspiration is because of applying the name of the cause to the effect.

The mind of enlightenment has within its entourage of mental factors the aspiration of wanting to achieve complete enlightenment. The mind of enlightenment is labelled as wish or aspiration to show that it has the aspiration of wanting to attain complete enlightenment within its entourage of mental factors.

So the mind of enlightenment is labelled as an aspiration or wish both from the point of view of one of its accompanying mental factors, as well as from the point of view of applying the name of the cause to the effect.

Seven-point meditation

The aspiration of wanting to achieve the welfare of sentient beings is the causal aspiration that precedes the aspiration wanting to achieve complete enlightenment. If you look at the sequence of meditation in which one generates bodhicitta, then this becomes clearer.

1. On the basis of having meditated on equanimity one meditates on recognising that all sentient beings were one's mother.
2. One meditates on the kindness of the mother.
3. One meditates on the necessity of repaying the kindness of one's mother.

These three meditations establish the basis for the welfare of sentient beings.

4. Then one meditates on near and dear love and great compassion, which trains the mind in the motivation that is concerned with the welfare of sentient beings.

5. Here the wish to achieve the welfare of sentient beings increases and becomes more refined.

6. This is then further refined with superior intention, where one takes upon oneself the responsibility for the welfare of all sentient beings.

7. Only after all these meditations does one generate the actual aspiration of wanting to attain complete enlightenment.

The actual aspiration of wanting to attain complete enlightenment is a result of the preceding meditations where one meditates on the welfare of sentient beings, and generates a concern for the welfare of sentient beings in different stages.

Both bodhicitta and its accompanying aspiration of wanting to attain complete enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings have superior intention as their basis. Superior intention has as its basis great compassion, which has as its basis near and dear love, which has as its basis making the determination to repay one's mother's kindness, which has as its basis recognising the kindness of the mother. This in turn has as its basis recognising that all sentient beings were one's mother. Here one can clearly see that first one meditates on generating a concern for the welfare of sentient beings. So the aspiration of wanting to achieve the welfare of sentient beings is generated first and acts as the basis for the aspiration of wanting to attain complete enlightenment.

One has to relate these words to the enlightenment that one is going to personally attain in the future and not to some kind of general enlightenment, because that would not be actual bodhicitta. To be actual bodhicitta, one has to relate it to the enlightenment that oneself is going to attain in the future.

Relating this to the lam rim

You can see that to generate bodhicitta one needs to engage in these step-by-step meditations. One cannot generate bodhicitta merely through reciting a prayer. Rather, one has to engage in these sequential meditations to initially generate an effortful experience of bodhicitta, and then increase that so that it becomes an effortless experience of bodhicitta.

The meditation on bodhicitta needs to be preceded by the generation of pure renunciation, which is attained through the meditations common to the being of medium capacity. This in turn has to be preceded by meditation on the law of cause and effect, which then in turn has to be preceded by meditation on refuge, which in turn is preceded by meditation on the lower realms, which in turn is preceded by meditation on death and impermanence, which in turn is preceded by meditation on the precious human rebirth, which is preceded by meditation on proper reliance on the spiritual friend. By meditating in this way, one places an incredibly valuable imprint of the whole path on one's mind.

If you meditate on those points, that would be really good.

The divisions of bodhicitta

1. There is of course a division by nature which is the division into wishing bodhicitta and engaging bodhicitta. Wishing bodhicitta is the bodhicitta that is not directly held by the practices of the perfections of generosity and so forth. Engaging bodhicitta is the bodhicitta that is directly held by the practice of the perfections of generosity and so forth. For example the bodhicitta in the continuum of a person in meditative equipoise is wishing bodhicitta and not engaging bodhicitta.

2. There is the division from the point of view of example. Here we have the twenty-two bodhicittas that are related to twenty-two examples, like ground-like bodhicitta, gold-like bodhicitta and so forth.

3. Then we have the division from the point of view of their mode of generation. Here we have king-like bodhicitta, ferryman-like bodhicitta, and shepherd-like bodhicitta. This is very meaningful.

King-like bodhicitta is the bodhicitta that has the motivation of wanting to first attain enlightenment oneself and then to subsequently lead all other sentient beings to enlightenment. It is called king-like bodhicitta because the king is always the foremost person in the realm and everybody follows him.

Shepherd-like bodhicitta is the bodhicitta where the person has the motivation of first wanting to place all other sentient beings in the state of enlightenment, with oneself attaining enlightenment last. Here the analogy of a shepherd is used because a shepherd always has all the sheep and goats in front of him with the shepherd bringing up the rear. That is why this bodhicitta is called the shepherd-like bodhicitta. The practitioner wants to first bring all other sentient beings to enlightenment, and then, and only then, attain enlightenment for themselves.

With ferryman-like bodhicitta the practitioner has the motivation of wanting to attain enlightenment together with all other sentient beings. When the ferryman ferries his passengers over the river, they all go together on the same boat.

4. The divisions from the point of view of boundary are:

The bodhicitta of wish and practice, which is the bodhicitta on the level of the path of accumulation and preparation;

The bodhicitta of superior thought, which is the bodhicitta from the first ground to the seventh ground (you are familiar with the grounds by now);

The ripening bodhicitta, which is the bodhicitta on the eighth, ninth and tenth ground;

And the bodhicitta abandoning obscurations, which is the bodhicitta in the continuum of a buddha.

You have participated very well this year, and now you need to put it into practice. You have a good opportunity for that. I also want to thank the organisers of the study group very much. It was very well organised - please do it like that again next year.

Next year we will do the Four Hundred Verses of the Middle Way and it would be good if everybody could have the text.

You all know when the Lama Tsong Khapa puja will be held. I strongly encourage you to come. Wherever Lama Zopa goes, he prays for the spread of Lama Tsong Khapa's and Atisha's teachings. So there is a purpose for that. Also, I feel that we have a very good relationship - I benefit you and you benefit me. We can say that we are actual Dharma friends. It is good to pray that we will meet from lifetime to lifetime.

We should always practice pure refuge and bodhicitta and base our activities on refuge and bodhicitta.

As is the usual practice for the study group, we will do the tong len (giving and taking) meditation. The motivation for that is encompassed by the refuge and bodhicitta prayer that we have just recited. [meditation]

First of all, I would like to express my appreciation for this opportunity to be able to gather together again, as we are old friends like brothers and sisters. Having such a gathering of like-minded people, is an incredibly fortunate opportunity.

You would, no doubt, have had a good break and a good time over Christmas and New Year. However when we think about it, there is nothing remaining from the festivities but the memory of them. Regardless of whether you had a good time or an uncomfortable time, by now it has gone, there is nothing left, and it makes no difference to the here and now.

Thus, it is far more appropriate for us to look forward to what is yet to come. Then we find that our objectives will fall into two main categories. Just as in the practice of giving and taking that we did earlier, where we take unwanted suffering from others and we imagine giving them our happiness; similarly for our own well-being, there are certain things that we need to acquire and certain things that we need to discard.

The tong len meditation has two essential elements, love and compassion. Taking upon the suffering of others encompasses compassion, whereas giving our happiness to others encompasses love. Thus the meditation is a training to increase love and compassion in our hearts. When we see others who are deprived of happiness, and we generate a genuine wish for them to be happy, we are expressing our love for them; and when we see others experiencing suffering, and we generate the wish to eliminate their suffering, we are expressing our compassion for them.

Aside from our attempts to engage in and meditate on the practice of giving and taking, even just feeling some sort of inclination to develop more love and compassion towards other beings is already a great start. The tong len practice of giving and taking is a higher form of practice, and not an easy one to perform.

Someone who is genuinely determined to practise this technique would be happy when they experience personal suffering, and very wary when they experience happiness or a pleasant situation. In order to willingly take upon the suffering of others, one should not be daunted or overwhelmed by suffering, and thus be willing to endure hardships and difficulties, and then use that as a practice. Conversely, the reason why such a practitioner would wary and uneasy with happiness is because when one experiences something pleasant, there is a great danger that attachment to those good conditions and pleasant sensations will arise. Therefore a true practitioner would be wary about good conditions and pleasant sensations.

We really need to try to understand what this practice entails, and why it is such a necessary practice. From a conventional or worldly perspective, it sounds very strange that someone would be willing and happy to experience hardships and suffering while being wary and unhappy when pleasant things occur. However when we understand why a practitioner adopts such an outlook, then we begin to see that this is not all weird or strange, but in fact a great point of practice.

If we carefully consider our normal situation, we will come to see that it is our obsession with wanting to experience pleasantness and to avoid suffering that actually causes us the most trouble in our life. If we think about it we will see that this is really true.

Maintaining a normal, worldly view means being constantly obsessed with wanting to experience pleasant sensations and conditions, and constantly trying to avoid any unpleasant conditions and situations, and it is this worldly view that causes us so much turmoil and difficulty when our expectation are not met. When we understood this, we see how it is this worldly attitude that gives rise to delusions such as strong attachment and anger. To go into further detail, when we experience a pleasant sensation and become obsessed with it, then strong attachment to that sensation or pleasant condition arises.

We come so fixated on not wanting to experience any unpleasantness, that the moment the slightest unpleasantness arises, we immediately become upset and angry about that. So we can see how maintaining such a worldly view or outlook causes attachment and anger to repeatedly arise in one's mind. Conversely, one can adopt an attitude where, by willingly accepting and enduring all hardships, one does not become daunted when unpleasantness and difficulties arise. One of the categories of patience is to willingly endure any suffering and hardship. So applying this patience means we will not be daunted by hardships and difficulties, and so our mind will not be disturbed.

The very definition of patience entails not allowing the mind to become disturbed or upset in the face of difficulties or any unwanted experiences. Thus, patience protects the mind from anger. Conversely, if we allow our mind to be completely obsessed with external situations, believing that external good conditions and so forth bring us happiness, then, for as long as we have those external conditions, while we may experience temporary fleeting pleasures, but the moment those conditions cease, we will be left with a feeling of being empty of any sense of happiness. So working on our internal conditions, will help us not to be overly attached to external conditions and situations and solely dependent on them for our happiness.

When we engage in the tong len practice, we recite the verses as a reminder of how to practise giving and taking. Even if we are not able to develop the strong determination to apply their real meaning in our heart, just familiarising our mind with those words and trying to adopt that sort of attitude is still worthwhile for us beginners.

The technique of giving and taking works toward developing a genuine sense of love and compassion within oneself, thereby becoming a means to oppose such strong delusions as attachment and anger. When we understand that, we can gain an overall appreciation of the meditation technique as being the means to acquire a true sense of well-being and happiness.

Our ultimate goal is to experience a true sense of well-being and happiness and to discard any unwanted suffering. In order to reach that goal, we need to apply the proper method and techniques. When we apply this meditation technique in the appropriate way, it will help us to genuinely begin to develop that sense of well-being. In particular, it will help us to increase a genuine, sound wisdom that will help us to clearly identify the conducive factors, and discard the opposing factors to our well-being. When we develop such sound wisdom, then we will begin to really establish a true sense of a relaxed, calm and clear mind, which becomes the basis for our endeavours to progress in our spiritual lives.

It is really worthwhile to contemplate what we are setting out to achieve. When we look around, we can see that everyone is busy trying to achieve something. So when we actually stop and genuinely think about what it is we are trying to achieve, it really comes down to a sense of well-being and happiness, and the lack any factors and conditions that bring about unpleasantness and suffering. Regardless of whether people consciously think about it or not, that is really what it comes down to — whatever we do arises from wanting to achieve some sort of pleasantness, and to discard any unpleasant situations.

The point then is to really consider whether the attempts we are making in our very busy lives are working for us or not? Are they bringing about those good results? That is something that we need to contemplate.

Now of course we have definitely achieved quite a lot. When we were born, we came naked without any possessions. We weren't born with a sum of money in our hands! We can readily appreciate the comparison with what we have now. When we were first born we couldn't walk or even crawl. At that time we were completely at the mercy of our caretakers, particularly our parents. We were completely dependent on their love and kindness our parents and caretakers to feed and cloth us. Then, at a certain point we became educated and were able to think for ourselves. It was our parents or caretakers who nourished and cared for us up to the point where we considered ourselves to be independent, when we could work and earn for ourselves. But up until then, we were loved, cared for and nourished by others.

At this point we are able expend a lot of energy in acquiring the means to eliminate a lot of external adverse conditions. But even though we have achieved sufficient external conditions for our well-being, when we look within ourselves, we can all acknowledge that there is a constant nagging wish for something more, which is really uncomfortable. Somehow we are not fully satisfied; there is something that is not quite right, something that is missing. So internally, within our own minds, we still haven't really achieved that satisfactory sense of contentment and happiness.

We have spent quite a lot of time and energy in achieving a significant number of favourable worldly circumstances, and we have also endured a lot of difficulties and hardships along the way. If we expend the same amount of energy and time and willingly undergoing difficulties and hardships to acquire favourable internal conditions, we will also be able to achieve adequate internal conditions for our well-being and happiness. That is something that we can definitely achieve. Then we will definitely be able to overcome and eradicate the troublesome attitudes that compromise our well-being and happiness.

Another question that can be posed is, 'How do I actually overcome these problems that trouble my mind? What are the methods that can I use?' These are significant questions. Of course, many may feel that their internal problems are related to external causes and conditions. We are all too familiar with that way of thinking! This attitude stems from a deeper notion that we are not at fault, 'I'm OK, I'm completely innocent'; 'There is nothing wrong with me'; 'The problem was caused by someone else'.

Whilst we may be well acquainted with the notion that our problems are caused by external sources, if we look within ourselves and honestly scrutinise and analyse our internal conditions, we will slowly come to realise that our mind is influenced by delusions such as strong desire and anger. And as long as one is under the control of the mind, which in turn is dominated by the delusions, then to that extent one's mind will always be prone to problems. If we genuinely look within, we will find that the real causes for our unhappiness are our own delusions.

Once we begin to detect where the problem really lies, we will be willing to adopt a technique that does not allow our minds to be influenced by the delusions. For example, we can focus on a particular type of object that does not cause any delusions to arise. If we are able to focus on that object for some time, whether it is one, two, or three minutes, then for that period of time we will not experience a troubled mind. That is because during that time our mind is protected from the delusions, and so we experience a genuine sense of calmness and well-being.

Having been presented with a technique that allows our mind to become focussed and not influenced by the delusions, the next question we might ask ourselves is, 'Will it be possible for me to train in such a technique? Would it be suitable for me?' The answer to these questions is a definite yes! Even though, at present we may be influenced by the delusions and have certain negative tendencies within ourselves, we all possess a positive state of mind. So what we need to do is develop more familiarity with that positive state of mind. If we sincerely adopt this technique there is no question that it will work.

It is natural that when the mind is familiarising itself with an object, then that is the predominant thought. In this way our familiarity and acquaintance with that object, whether it be an attitude or a particular way of thinking, that becomes the predominant thought. So when we familiarise ourselves with a positive object that does not cause any delusions to arise within the mind, then the more we acquaint ourselves with that object, the more natural it becomes for us to experience a state of mind that is not influenced by the delusions, not being completely dominated by them. As we become more and familiar with this technique and the object of meditation, then gradually the mind becomes clearer and brighter and our intelligence or wisdom will naturally increase. As a consequence of all of that, our mind will naturally become calmer, less troubled and less chaotic. That is definitely the positive result we can experience, but that, of course, requires constant familiarity and acquaintance with the practice.

As explained earlier, we call this technique meditation. The Tibetan term for 'meditation' is gom, which literally translates 'to familiarise'. The connotation is that we are familiarising our mind with something that is positive, rather than on negativity.

In order to see the great value and advantage of the practice of meditation, we need to see the faults of negativities such as anger. For as long as we don't see the faults of anger, we won't take the initiative to overcome anger. Thus we need to begin by contemplating again and again the faults of anger.

We need to see how when anger arises, it is followed by an intention of wanting to harm the object of our anger by whatever means. Driven by anger we think, 'I will wait until just the right moment, and then I will say or do something to hurt them'. That is how anger begins to lead us to engage in unwholesome deeds.

The very feeling of anger is accompanied by an intention of wishing to harm the object, and the moment anger arises it makes us feel uncomfortable. So even though anger comes with an intention to hurt others, it is we who experience a more immediate hurt. Thus, anger has no redeeming value — it hurts oneself as well as others. When we contemplate and think about the great disadvantage and faults of anger in this way we begin to develop a strong intention to overcome anger.

This is where the technique of focussing on an object that does not cause any delusions (such as anger and attachment) to arise is important. For the duration of our focus on an object, which by its very nature does not cause delusions to arise, we will not experience anger. If we begin to engage in this practice when we feel anger arising then, then for whatever time (one, two or three minutes) we adequately focus on this object, the anger will subside and we will experience a real sense of relief within our mind. The effect will be soothing and calming.

Another disadvantage of anger, is that when we become upset and angry, the person we are angry with and who we intend to hurt, is usually someone close to us. We won't go out of our way to find a stranger to become angry with! The very person that we either live with or associate with, the one we consider as a loved or dear one is normally the object with whom we become angry! So we can see here the futility of anger in that it influences us to hurt or do hurtful things to the very person we consider to be closest to us. This is how we need to reflect upon the disadvantages of anger.

We can use these reflections on the disadvantages of anger to inspire us to engage in the practice of meditation; to apply it in our daily life; and to contemplate these disadvantages again and again. There are two reasons to meditate: there are the qualities that one needs to further develop and there are the faults one needs to discard. Meditation is precisely what will help us to accomplish that. When we adequately apply the meditation technique, it becomes the optimum protection for our own mind — our sense of peace and well-being will be enhanced and protected. A calm and a peaceful state of mind (which we all naturally have at some level) is something that we really need to try and protect at every cost. If we make the time to apply the meditation technique, it will help us to develop a clear, happy and a genuinely relaxed mind. Anyone who actually establishes such qualities will be a happy person, wherever they go and in whatever situation they may find themselves. No external conditions will be too daunting for them. They feel relaxed and calm wherever they may be and in whatever company they find themselves. The result is that others also experience that calmness, so it is something of mutual benefit.

Maintaining a happy mind should be a priority for our own well-being. That means actively engaging in analysing one's own state of mind, checking up on what's occurring in one's thoughts and attitudes. Asking oneself, 'what kind of state of mind am I in right now? Is it a happy and calm state of mind or on the verge of declining? Am I imbued with thoughts that promote and increase a sense of happiness and well-being within myself, or am I obsessed with thoughts that obstruct my happiness and calmness?' Undertaking such an analysis on a regular basis will contribute to our overall well-being.

Rather than spending all our time and energy focussing on external conditions, we need to develop a much more internal focus. Although being completely immersed in external conditions brings some sort of temporary benefit to a certain degree, it leaves no time to acquire sufficient conditions for our inner well-being. So if we can adopt an attitude where, at every cost, we attempt to protect our own well-being and inner happiness then, regardless of the external conditions we will be able to maintain a sense of dignity, which encompasses that sense of calmness. When things are going well externally, everything may seem just fine. But when eventually things don't go so well, for example, when there's a difficult situation, or one's living conditions are temporarily reduced, if one has maintained an inner well-being, then one will not be daunted and will be able to adapt to whatever external conditions prevail. That is the most suitable way for us to conduct our lives.

We need to start paying attention to, and analysing our mind and our thoughts, looking for the thoughts that have greatest influence. If we find a negative state of mind, we ask ourselves, 'How do I overcome this?' 'What are the best ways to try and overcome this negative state of mind?' If, on the other hand we find that we have a positive state of mind, then be joyful and happy about that and think of ways to further increase and nourish that positive state of mind. Such analyses and ways of thinking are really worthwhile and helpful for our own well-being.

The essential point is that the most precious possession one can ever have is a genuine sense of love and compassion. Any person endowed with a true sense of love and compassion is liked by everyone, and they will be welcomed wherever they go. When you can see that in others, then it must also be true for yourself. If you wish to be liked by others, then genuinely love them and be compassionate and help them when you can.

If you are unable to render help, you can at least make a commitment not to harm others, which is also appreciated. The person who does not intentionally harm others is generally appreciated and trusted. So we can see the great value of adopting these attitudes and, at best, exhibiting a true sense of love and compassion. We are the greatest beneficiaries of such an attitude.

One of the things people often talk about is trust. Some people complain that they are not trusted by others, or that their partner doesn't trust them, or that their friends don't trust them. If one wishes to be viewed as being trustworthy, then one needs to really look into what makes one trustworthy. Trust has to be earned! The optimum way to gain the trust of others is by exhibiting true love and compassion for them, and a true sense of concern. That is the best way. If one is not trusted, then one needs to look at the reason why that is the case. Has one's love and compassion, or true sense of concern for others perhaps declined? If that is so, then it follows that others will not render any trust.

Someone once asked me, 'Are there perhaps some mantras to recite to make others like me?' My response was, 'Well, there could be mantras, but that's not really necessary. If you really want others to like and appreciate you, and to draw others towards you, the best way is by developing a true sense of love and compassion. That is the best way'. But that didn't seem to go down too well!! [laughter] There is a story that Lama Zopa once related to me. One of the first FPMT centres in America was Vajrapani Institute, and its first geshe, Geshe Lobsang Gyatso, was one of the first geshes to go to the west from Sera. Apparently the translator had a bit of a hard time with him and was not able to translate everything, and Geshe Lobsang Gyatso seemed to be a little annoyed with him. The translator tried to please him, but to no avail. Then the translator apparently asked Lama Yeshe, 'Is there some mantra I can recite for the Geshe to like me?' [laughter] It seems that many people suspect that Buddhists to have some sort of mantra that can be recited as part of their tantric rituals to overcome or to acquire certain things.

Love and compassion is essential in all relationships, such the relationship between parents and children. It seems that in Western countries the relationship between parents and children causes a lot of suffering. The children might have faults and do things that are inappropriate, but I suspect that even from the parents' side, there are times when they lose the genuine sense of caring, love and concern for their children. It is when there is a mutual waning of that sense of genuine concern for each other, when love and compassion have declined, that relationships are strained. Consequently, suffering is experienced by both the children and the parents, which is uncomfortable for both sides.

This is something we need to really think about: Since we are living in a world in which we have to rely upon others, it is worthwhile that we have a good relationship with them. So, we need to consider what are the main elements needed to have a good relationship between parents and children and so forth? In order to maintain our sense of love and compassion, we also need to develop patience. While we may extend our love and compassion, which in very simple terms is having a genuine concern for others, there may be times when the other lacks appreciation and so forth. When that happens, one may lose the sense of concern for the other which is a result of the love and compassion for the other beginning to decline. That is the time when it is very important to apply patience. Regardless of their attitude or any inappropriate remarks that they may make, we need to think, 'I should not be daunted by that; I must maintain a genuine sense of concern for them'. With that element of patience, we will be able to endure any temporary difficulties that we may experience in caring for others.

Having extensively explained the importance and the great advantages of love and compassion, we now turn to the techniques of how to develop the genuine wish to benefit others based on love and compassion. This is precisely explained in the text we have chosen to study, which is The Bodhisattva's Way of Life or Engaging in the Bodhisattva's Actions, composed by Shantideva. This text is renowned among the great Indian and Tibetan masters. All of them agree that this text is the optimum source for advice on how to develop the mind of enlightenment or in simple terms the optimum way to benefit others based on love and compassion. Shantideva explains in great depth and detail the methods of how to develop this unique altruistic mind of enlightenment.

The benefit of developing love and compassion is unequalled. Developing love and compassion is the optimum way to achieve a true sense of well-being, so it is definitely a valuable practice that we need to engage in. Now, in saying that this is really a valuable practice, I am not implying in any way that I have mastered love and compassion myself. I am not saying that at all. But what I can say is that I do acquaint my mind with love and compassion regularly, contemplating the benefits and methods of developing love and compassion again and again. In fact I am mostly pre-occupied with thinking about the best ways to develop love and compassion within myself. My attempts to practise developing love and compassion give me a true sense of well-being and great solace. So, based on my limited experience of acquainting my own mind with love and compassion, I encourage you take up this practice as well. It definitely is a great tool for benefiting others while at the same time being a great source of solace and well-being for oneself. Thus it is something to which we can assign great value.

THE BODHISATTVA'S WAY OF LIFE

The great master Gyaltsab Je wrote a commentary on this text called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors. He presents his commentary in four main sections.

1. Meaning of the Title
2. Translator's Prostration
3. Meaning of the Text
4. Meaning of the conclusion

1. MEANING OF THE TITLE

The actual Sanskrit title of the text is Bodhisattvacharyavatara.

Bodhi in Tibetan is jang chub, which relates to the enlightened mind, or enlightenment;

The meaning of sattva, or sempa in Tibetan, is courageous or brave one;

Charya relates to the Tibetan word jopa which relates to actions or deeds;

Avatara or jugpa in Tibetan means to enter, or as in the translation 'an introduction'.

Thus the meaning of the title is, 'Introduction to the actions of bodhisattvas'.

There are different styles and systems of presenting the title of a text. It can relate to the person for whom the text was intended, for example there are sutras such as Advice to a King. A title can also relate to a place where the teaching was given, so the name of that place will be used in the title, such as Gawa-gore Sutra which is the sutra that was given on a particular mountain. Then there are titles based the time of the teaching. For example, there is a sutra the Buddha gave just before he passed into samadhi or nirvana, which is called The Nirvana Sutra. Finally there are titles such as this one, which present the content of the text in the title itself.

The meaning of the title is presented in a very meticulous way. The very name of the text can instil a great understanding in those who can relate to it. By merely seeing the title, a disciple who is of superior intelligence will be able to immediately understand the contents of the text. Those of medium intellect can derive a certain amount of understanding from the title alone, and even those with lower intellect would have some idea of what the contents would be. It is similar to labelling a medicine container. For those who are familiar with the name will know what type of medicine is in the container, just by reading the label.

In English the only translation we have of bodhi is enlightenment. With the Tibetan term jang chub, each word has a connotation of what that state actually indicates. The Tibetan word jang has the connotation of completely eradicating. This relates to having completely eradicated or abandoned the two obscurations — the deluded obscurations and the obscurations to omniscience. The Tibetan word chub has the connotation of acquiring all positive qualities and the ultimate quality to be accomplished is omniscience. So the state to be achieved, jang chub is a state in which all negativities are completely eradicated, and all positive qualities have been completely accomplished.

The Tibetan word sempa, which is a translation of the word sattva meaning a brave or courageous person refers to an individual who, with a courageous mind, is inspired and determined to achieve the state of enlightenment. They are not daunted by the task involved in achieving that state, which includes the practice of the six perfections. Thus, the person who willingly commits to engage in these actions to achieve that final state of enlightenment, is considered to be a courageous one.

So within the word bodhisattva, bodhi refers to the ultimate state that is to be achieved, and sattva to the courageous one who has dedicated themselves to achieve that ultimate state of enlightenment.

The definition of charya is the action or deeds, which most texts relate to the six perfections. However as His Holiness the Dalai Lama explained in his recent teachings on this text, the action itself can be divided into three stages:

1. The initial action, which is the development of bodhicitta — the altruistic mind wishing to achieve enlightenment.
2. The actual actions, which are engaging in practices of the six perfections.
3. The accomplished action, which is to obtain the ultimate state of enlightenment.

The last word of the title, avatara, which is translated in the commentary as the 'introduction', relates to introducing the complete methodology to engage in the actions of a bodhisattva, in other words the contents of this text.

In summary, Bodhisattvacharyavatara is a clear and unmistakable presentation of the unmistakable methods for engaging in the deeds or actions of a bodhisattva encompassing the six perfections, which lead one to the ultimate state of enlightenment.

This explanation of the title of the text can, in itself, provide us with something really significant to contemplate. As His Holiness the Dalai Lama recently said, 'Traditionally we don't hear about meditations on the Bodhisattvacharyavatara, but when we recite this text, we can contemplate the meaning of every single word in it. That would be a significant meditation based on the meaning of this text'. So it is good to really reflect on the meaning of each word in the title.

What does bodhi relate to? When we refer to Buddha, we may think that it just relates to a statue, but that is not correct. It actually refers to the state of enlightenment, which has been obtained by individual beings. When you use the Tibetan words and contemplate the connotations of each word, it gives an in-depth meaning. What does sattva mean? What does charya relate to? What are the actions that bodhisattvas engage in? What does avatara mean?' Contemplating each of these points becomes an adequate form of meditation.

The text itself is divided into ten chapters. As His Holiness recently explained, it is good to use the dedication prayer that we recite regularly, 'May the supreme jewel bodhicitta that has not arisen, arise and grow, and may that which has arisen never diminish but increase more and more', as the basis for our contemplation of this text.

As His Holiness explained, this aspirational prayer presents the structure of this text.

- The first three chapters introduce bodhicitta, and then clearly define the distinction between aspirational bodhicitta and engaging bodhicitta, and what is entailed in developing that. In other words they relate to the bodhicitta that has not yet arisen to arise and grow.
- The next three chapters, chapter four which is on conscientiousness, five on introspection and six on patience, explain how not to ensure that the bodhicitta which has already arisen does not degenerate or diminish.
- Chapters seven which is on joyous effort, eight on meditation and nine about wisdom, show us how to increase bodhicitta even more. While chapter eight explains the method for increasing conventional bodhicitta, chapter nine specifically explains in detail how to increase ultimate bodhicitta.
- The tenth chapter is a chapter on dedication which seals all the positive virtues that one has accumulated from having developed bodhicitta, by dedicating those virtues and aspirations.

The text explains all this in meticulous detail.

I had great fortune to receive a teaching on this text recently from His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Sarnath. It was a wonderful opportunity to receive it just before I was about to present it here in our study group. So, now I can be bold in presenting it to you!!

Geshe-la then mentioned a few others who had been present with him at the teaching.

The way His Holiness presented this very precious teaching was really incredible. He was so skilful in the way he presented it, that you didn't necessarily have to be a Buddhist to relate to it; he presented it so that it could be used by anyone who listened to the teachings regardless of what tradition they may come from or even if they didn't follow a particular religion.

That will be sufficient for this evening. Those of you who have the material can start to familiarise themselves with it as preparation for class. That will be a good way to conduct the teachings.

I mentioned that it would be good to compile the teachings I give on this so that it can later be published in book form, and Ross has very kindly and courageously accepted that task. But it would be good for everyone to render support and help with that.

Although I have conducted numerous teachings over the years, we have not been able to produce that many books. I am not about to boast, but such detailed teachings and explanations on a certain text are not found all that readily. That is why compiling a book will be useful.

Shantideva's Bodhicharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དབའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སློལ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

19 February 2013

As usual we can spend some time in meditation. The Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer that we have just recited will suffice for our motivation. We need to bear in mind that the purpose of taking refuge is to protect us from following a wrong path, while generating bodhicitta protects us from following the lesser path. That will ensure that our practice is a Great Vehicle, or Mahayana practice. [meditation]

As we have just attempted to do in our short session, it would be really beneficial to adopt a regular meditation practice in everyday life. The positive result of that would be that our love and compassion for others will be established and further increased.

In order to further increase a genuine sense of happiness within ourselves we need to work on establishing and further developing our love and compassion, which naturally brings about a genuine sense of peace. The tong len meditation practice will ensure that we establish a peaceful state of mind not, along with ensuring that what has already been established becomes firmer and steadier so that it does not decline, and that which has been firmly established to further increase. This is how the meditation practice will help us to obtain a peaceful state of mind, that we all naturally wish for.

So in this way we can see that the conditions for our happiness and wellbeing do not lie entirely with external circumstances, but in developing our inner qualities. The more attention we pay to further developing our inner qualities, the greater our genuine sense of wellbeing and happiness will be. When our mind is in a happy state, it will definitely have a positive effect on our physical health as well; a happy mind naturally brings about a healthy body. That is something that we need to consider.

As mentioned previously, it is essential for us to secure a positive motivation for engaging in the teachings. The optimum positive motivation can be generated by thinking along these lines: In order to benefit all sentient beings, by liberating them from all suffering and establishing them in supreme happiness, I need to achieve the ultimate state of enlightenment first. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings based on the explanation of this text composed by the great master Shantideva, and put it into practice well.

The four main sections of the text are the meaning of the title; the translator's prostration; the meaning of the text and the meaning of the conclusion.

1. MEANING OF THE TITLE

In our last session we explained the meaning of the Sanskrit title of the text Bodhisattvacharyavatara, by breaking it up into its parts. Bodhi means enlightenment; sattva means brave or courageous one; charya means action; and avatara means introduction.

As explained in our last session, it is really worthwhile to contemplate each of these components of the title. For example, bodhi or buddha relates the state of enlightenment. So what does that state of enlightenment, or buddhahood actually refer to? By contemplating the meaning of each part of the Tibetan word for it, jang chub, we understand that the state of enlightenment encompasses having overcome all adversities and negativities and accomplished all qualities.

Whenever we hear the name Buddha, or relate to the Buddha when engaging in practices of making offerings, paying homage and so forth; it is good to remember that the Buddha refers to a being who had first generated bodhicitta to become a courageous one (sattva), and thereby achieved enlightenment, a state in which all defilements have been abandoned and all supreme qualities fully established. He did that for the sole purpose of benefitting all sentient beings.

The practical benefit of contemplating the meaning of even just one word such as 'buddha' is that when we aspire to achieve enlightenment, (as we did with the motivation that we generated earlier) we gain a true sense of what it is that we are aspiring to achieve. When aiming to achieve enlightenment, we are aspiring to achieve a state where we have removed all faults and defilements, and acquired all possible qualities.

Defilements fall into two main categories — deluded obscurations and obscurations to omniscience. Deluded obscurations i.e. the delusions themselves, are obscurations to achieving self-liberation, whereas the imprints of the delusions are the obscurations to omniscience.

For as long as we have the imprints of the delusions in our mind, in particular the mode of mistaken dualistic appearances, to that extent the obscurations that prevent us from reaching the fully omniscient state of enlightenment, will always be present.

Understanding that the Buddha was an enlightened being, endowed with the characteristics of having overcome all defilements and accomplished all supreme qualities, means that when we do prostrations or make offerings or request blessings from the buddhas, we do so with that understanding. This will help us to purify the negativities of our own three doors of body, speech and mind, whilst receiving the blessings of the Buddha's holy body, speech and mind. That is a very meaningful way of relating to the Buddha. Of course, we could go into more detail here—however let us proceed with the text.

It is essential that we have a proper understanding, right from the beginning, as to what enlightenment really means. Then, when we relate that to our own practice, we will have the understanding that we are aspiring to achieve a state where all adversities or defilements have been completely abandoned and all positive qualities have been completely accomplished.

It is also really important to understand that the state of enlightenment is not obtained instantaneously. Rather, our commitment to avoid each and every tiny non-virtue, while acquiring each every good quality, becomes the basis for creating the causes for achieving enlightenment. This gradual process will eventually add up to the point where we reach the state of overcoming all faults and acquiring all good qualities. It is essential that we have this understanding.

This is a very pungent instruction for our own personal practice. Whenever we find ourselves intentionally avoiding some negativity or non-virtue, and voluntarily adopting good virtue, we can rejoice and feel encouraged by the fact that we are creating the basic causes for enlightenment. This is no trivial achievement but a very significant one that can be a source of tremendous encouragement for our daily practice.

Every time we make sincere attempts to overcome faults, and acquire positive qualities, we are getting closer and closer to enlightenment; meanwhile creating the causes for a genuinely calmer and more peaceful state of mind. When we sincerely adopt this practice in our everyday life we will find that our mind gradually becomes a little bit more settled and peaceful. In this way we can see how engaging in these practices on a daily basis is really worthwhile as we experience the benefits right now. It is not as if we have to wait until enlightenment to experience positive results from our practice. In fact the positive results we experience now will lead onto obtaining more significant qualities in the future.

Other texts explain that one benefit of presenting the title in Sanskrit is that it is the language used by the buddhas of the three times when they turned the wheel of Dharma. Presenting the title of the text in its original form blesses our mind with the blessed language of the buddhas. Using the original Sanskrit title also leaves a good imprint on our minds to be able to master this language so that we can listen and teach in Sanskrit ourselves. In addition the Sanskrit title indicates the authenticity of the text, showing that it originates from the source of great Indian treatises.

If the title is presented in Sanskrit for these reasons, we might well wonder why it is also presented in Tibetan. The purpose for doing that is said to be to remember the kindness of the Tibetan translators. Without the great lengths that the Tibetan translators went through to translate the text, it would be very difficult for us to access these great treatises now. Only a few scholars in Tibet were able to translate the original Sanskrit into Tibetan, but through their efforts many, many more Tibetans have been able to study those texts, and put their instructions into practice.

The great Tibetan masters have studied, meditated on and practised the instructions on Bodhisattvacharyavatara in unbroken succession. They were able to do so because of the translation of this and other Sanskrit texts into Tibetan. Without the translations they would not have been able to study these texts. In my own case, I attempted to study some Sanskrit, but I wasn't able to master it to a point of being able to confidently read and study the Sanskrit versions. I have only been able to make attempts to understand these classic texts because of the availability of the texts in Tibetan.

In fact many of the classic Indian texts don't seem to exist in their original Sanskrit form, but they are all available in Tibetan and therefore are available for translation into other languages. So the English translations of these texts are based on the Tibetan translations. Therefore it is quite appropriate for us to remember and celebrate the work of the great Tibetan translators; without their work we would not have the English translations that we use today. Apparently some of the classic texts have been translated into Japanese, and perhaps some into Chinese. I have heard that it is not very easy to translate them into Japanese, as one also needs to be a master of classic Chinese. So in this way we can see the significance of remembering the kindness of the Tibetan translators.

On the right of the altar there are over one hundred volumes of Tibetan translations of all of the Buddha's words, which are called the Kangyur in Tibetan. On the left we can see the Tengyur, the two hundred or so volumes of commentaries by the great Indian masters called, also translated into Tibetan, and hence available to this day.

THE FIRST BUNDLE

Although not presented in the English translation, in the Tibetan text, right after the title there is mention of the First Bampo. This relates to the system of applying separate sections in the original text. The word bampo comes from the Tibetan word used, for example to describe the bundling of hay into a haystack, or a bunch of flowers when you bundle together individual flower stems. Similarly when parts of the text are bundled together as one section, the collection is called a bampo. There is also the term bamdrol which refers to a sub-section of a bampo, which contain specific number of verses—three hundred verses in some cases and five hundred in another text. The Heart Sutra, a short text containing only twenty-five verses, has only one bampo.

2. TRANSLATOR'S PROSTRATION

I prostrate to all buddhas and bodhisattvas.

There is no literal explanation of this line in Gyaltsab Je's commentary, as its meaning is quite clear. However Gyaltsab Je does, however, explain the purpose of the prostration as follows:

The purpose of the translator's prostration is to pacify the obstacles to the translation and to identify this text as a commentary belonging mainly to the sutra basket of teachings, although in general it is a commentary on all the baskets of teachings.

Here the word basket refers to the collections of the Buddha's teachings.

Pacifying the obstacles to the translation includes the obstacles to the completion of the composition. Thus, the prostration to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas is done as a way to receive their blessing during the translation, in order for the translator to complete the composition successfully.

Because all buddhas and bodhisattvas encompasses all supreme beings, paying respect to them is the optimum means to accumulate extensive amounts of merit. It is due to the merit that one possesses that one will have success in whatever one does. Here in the west people talk about luck or fortune. I am not really sure what that means, but from the Buddhist point of view we need to have a sufficient amount of merit to accomplish anything that we wish to accomplish.

The second part of the commentary explains that prostrating to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas also implies that this text belongs to the sutra basket of the Buddha's teachings. This is in accordance with a decree by an early king of Tibet that all translations had to begin with a salutation to indicate to the readers the collection of the Buddha's teaching that the text belongs to. For texts that relate to the sutra basket, as is the case here, the salutation is to all buddhas and bodhisattvas. The texts that belong to the abhidharma collection have a salutation to Manjushri, the deity of wisdom; while those belonging to the vinaya basket have a salutation to the Omniscient One meaning the Buddha.

So just from the prostration in the beginning of the text, we can immediately detect that this text belongs to the sutra basket of the Buddha's teachings. In addition to the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings, these salutations can also relate to the three trainings; the training of morality, the training of concentration and the training in wisdom. The sutra basket relates to the training of concentration, the abhidharma to the training of wisdom and the vinaya basket relates to the training of morality.

When these three trainings are related to the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings, as in this case, they are called higher trainings to indicate that the trainings surpass the practices of other traditions. Consequently a higher training surpasses other forms of training.

Even though they are presented as higher forms of training, we all have, to a certain degree, some level of morality, concentration and wisdom within ourselves right now. We all practise some form of morality in our present state, and to a certain degree we are all able to engage in meditation, and we all have a certain amount of intelligence or wisdom. So, these trainings are not unfamiliar or irrelevant to us. When we notice that we do have these trainings within ourselves to a certain degree, it encourages us to further develop them.

In fact all of the Buddha's teachings are said to be presented in a practical way, suitable for the capacities of the various dispositions of his disciples. It is said that even if we don't have the actual practice, we may have the seed of the practice, or the potential to practise, or even a similitude of that practice.

For example when we recited the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, that form of taking refuge complemented with bodhicitta is the means for us to adopt all three levels of practice. The very act of taking refuge encompasses some form of morality; when we take refuge very sincerely, with a contemplative mind and strong faith, it encompasses concentration; and our understanding of the benefits of taking refuge, encompasses wisdom. When it is complemented with bodhicitta then that act of taking refuge becomes the ultimate form of refuge which is the Mahayana refuge. Thus the practice of taking refuge and generating bodhicitta encompasses all three levels of practice, and that is why it can be considered a very significant and high form practice. This is how we can relate to the practice in a practical way.

3. MEANING OF THE TEXT

The commentary refers to the First Bambo. As that makes it clear that this is the first section of the text, there is no need for further explanation.

The text has two main sub-divisions:

3.1. The preparatory actions for explaining the stages of the Mahayana path

3.2. The actual explanation of the stages

As I have explained previously, the headings themselves can tell us what the actual contents of the text will be. They are presented in a very meticulous and logical manner. Initially the preparatory actions or preliminary actions of the Mahayana path are explained, which is then followed by the actual explanation of the stages of the path.

3.1. THE PREPARATORY ACTIONS FOR EXPLAINING THE STAGES OF THE MAHAYANA PATH

This section of the text has three subdivisions:

3.1.1. Homage

3.1.2. Pledge of composition

3.1.3. Humility and the reason for joyful composition

3.1.1. Homage

The homage has three subdivisions:

3.1.1.1. The purpose of paying homage

3.1.1.2. Summary

3.1.1.3. Meaning of the words

3.1.1.1. The purpose of paying homage

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the purpose of paying homage thus:

By expressing the qualities of special objects and going for refuge, one comes to be understood as a holy being, and the obstacles to the composition of the treatise are pacified. In the end, one attains definite goodness and other disciples will also follow this example. As a result, they too will achieve all accumulations of goodness.

It is good to understand the significance and relevance of this presentation. The statement by expressing the qualities of special objects and going for refuge, one comes to be understood as a holy being, contains a great truth. We all regard Shantideva as a great master and holy being, so it is clear that as a result of his respectfully paying homage to holy beings, he in turn came to be regarded as a holy being himself. Thus, when one takes sincere refuge in a holy object and practises the commitments of refuge, we can understand the positive outcome will be that one will attain the state of becoming a holy being oneself.

When the obstacles to the composition of the treatise are pacified then all obstacles during the composition will be removed, and the end result is that one obtains definite goodness and other disciples will also follow this example. And as a result they too will achieve accumulation of goodness. In short, paying homage encompasses a twofold benefit, i.e. benefit for oneself and benefit for others.

This is in accordance with the practice of all the great holy and noble beings. In whatever activity they undertake, they first take refuge in the Three Jewels and a particular deity they have strong faith in, such as Tara, or Avalokiteshvara and so forth. It is customary for all holy beings to pay homage before they engage in any activity.

Recently I heard the national anthem of Sri Lanka and, if I am not mistaken I thought I heard the word namo at the beginning of the anthem. As I understand namo means salutation, and because Sri Lanka is a Buddhist country I assume that it is a salutation or prostration to the Buddha, which is quite significant to have in a national anthem.

3.1.1.2. Summary

1ab. To the tathagatas possessing the dharmakaya, their children

And to all who are suitable for homage I prostrate respectfully.

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

Shantideva prostrates to the Triple Gem and all others worthy of homage.

3.1.1.3. Actual meaning of the words.

In Tibetan, the Sanskrit word Sugata is translated as de sheg. Sugata is comprised of two words, su meaning 'great bliss' and gata means 'gone or completely gone beyond'. So the meaning of sugata is that by relying on the blissful bodhisattva path, one obtains the result of the ultimate enlightened state, which is a state where one has gone completely beyond cyclic existence.

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section by stating:

The term sugata relates to abandonment and realisation.

Here, realisation particularly relates to dharmakaya, the truth body of a buddha.

Gyaltsab Je then presents the three qualities of excellent abandonment in the form of analogies.

- Similar to a person possessing a good body, if one has exhaustively abandoned the afflictive obscurations, then one has gone to the good or beautiful.

When one has exhaustively abandoned afflictive obscurations then one has gone to the good or beautiful stage of enlightenment.

- Similar to having completely purified a contagious disease, one has gone beyond falling into cyclic existence through the power of the afflictions.
- Similar to a well-filled vase, having gone to all and thus having gone to bliss, through having exhaustively abandoned the non-afflictive ignorance.

Next, Gyaltsab Rinpoche explains the meaning of the word sugata in relation to the Tibetan word shegpa.

[Dewa or] bliss is referred to as good, and [shegpa or] 'gone' means to have become the living example of that.

Then Gyaltsab Je states:

The three [qualities of excellent abandonments] respectively distinguish a non-Buddhist who is free from attachment, from a stream enterer [or once returner], and a Hinayana arhat.

That covers what are called the excellent abandonments.

In general there are three particular types of abandonments: newly abandoned; abandoned to the point where it never reoccurs again; and exhaustively abandoned.

Gyaltsab Je's explanation of the three types of excellent realisation reads:

Having gone to bliss because of 1) directly understanding the suchness of the two selflessnesses; 2) having stable understanding; and 3) understanding all. Respectively these distinguish the three kinds of persons as well.

Then the first two lines of the root text are discussed.

Earlier, the word sugata was explained in terms of the Tibetan word de sheg, meaning bliss and gone respectively. So when the verse reads to the tathagatas, it is referring to the qualities of a buddha or enlightened ones, who are endowed with excellent abandonments and excellent realisations.

Next the commentary refers to the words possessing dharmakaya. The first line of the verse refers to the Buddha Jewel.

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

These lines show the praise to the Buddha Jewel.

Next, Gyaltsab Je's states that:

The dharmakaya is the naturally pure sphere free from all stains, which is the Dharma Jewel, and those possessing it are the ones gone to bliss.

The dharmakaya is the naturally pure state free from all stains which is Dharma Jewel. This refers to the truth of cessation within the Buddha's continuum. Having first presented the definition of the dharmakaya, i.e. that it is naturally pure from all stains which is the Dharma Jewel, Gyaltsab Je then goes on to explain that those possessing it are the ones gone to bliss. Thus the first line encompasses all three jewels, tathagatas—the Buddha jewel; possessing the dharmakaya—the Dharma jewel; and their children—the Sangha jewel.

As the commentary reads:

The first¹ and second² terms also contain the two form bodies of a buddha, and the second term also represents the truth of cessation and the truth of the path of a bodhisattva. Hence, all Buddha Jewels and Mahayana Dharma Jewels are the object of prostration.

Children refers to superior bodhisattvas; with their inclusion the Triple Gem is complete.

Here we need to explain why bodhisattvas are referred to as children or, more literally, the sons of the buddhas. This is in accordance to ancient royal system in India where the king's son, the crown prince, is recognised in the social hierarchy as the one who will be entrusted with the sovereignty of the kingdom as well as the key to the treasury. In other words, the king's son, who is of the lineage of the king himself, is the one who will be entrusted with the most valuable assets of the kingdom.

Using that analogy, the son or the children of the buddhas are the bodhisattvas who hold the complete lineage of the Buddha's doctrine. Just like being entrusted with the key to the treasure vault, through their realisations they hold the key to the knowledge of the Buddha's teaching, which leads to enlightenment. As the Buddha in his physical form has passed into nirvana, it is the bodhisattvas who are preserving and maintaining the Buddha's teaching, and causing it to further flourish.

Just like the crown prince holds the lineage of the king, the bodhisattvas hold the complete unmistakable doctrine of the Buddha. Just as the crown prince assumes continues the work of his father when the king reaches old age or passes on, bodhisattvas establish the doctrine of the Buddha and cause it to flourish in the minds of other sentient beings.

Gyalsab Je concludes his commentary on The Meaning Of The Words with:

Shantideva prostrates respectfully with body, speech and mind to them, and to all others worthy of prostration, such as abbots, preceptors and so forth.

The commentary further explains, [this part is missing in the translation] that at the end of the second line in the first verse of the root text, there is the Tibetan letter te, a continuative particle which indicates that there something else to follow. If we were to use a continuative particle such as 'having' in the English translation, then the verse could read, 'Having prostrated respectively to the tathagatas possessing the dharmakaya, their children, and all suitable for homage', that then would indicate that something else has to follow the prostration. It is similar to saying, 'Having washed, I will take my meal'. If you just say 'I have washed' then that in itself doesn't indicate another action to be followed. But if you say 'Having taken a shower...', then that indicates an action to be followed after the shower.

This Tibetan continuative particle te is also used in the offering prayer Lama sang-gyā lama ch'ö, D'e-zhin la-ma ge-dün-te, Kun-gyi j'e-po la-ma-te, which implies that something else is to follow that. However there is nothing that follows after the mention of lama. So that's why there are some teachers who say that rather than saying, Kun-gyi j'e-po la-ma-te it is better to say Kun-gyi j'e-po la-ma-ny. That is because the nyi has the connotation of referring to only the lama himself. Nevertheless the word te is used in the actual prayer.

The parts up to now in the text have been quite technical and perhaps a bit tedious. However, because the explanations are presented in the commentary, we need to cover it. It has its place and purpose, so it is good to have an understanding of it. Henceforth the explanations in the text will be more straightforward and easy to follow.

After this evening, you might, at the very least, have a better understanding of what the word Buddha refers to and what a bodhisattva actually means.

Another thing that may be relevant and practical is the significance of doing prostrations. The act of prostration to holy objects accumulates the merit to be able to successfully engage in whatever activity we choose.

As the great master Potawa mentioned in one of his works: Don't rely too much on humans, rather make strong prayers to the enlightened beings and deities. I think he is making a great point there. The deity can be whatever enlightened deity one has a strong connection with.

Just recently someone mentioned to me how making strong prayers to Tara has been really helpful in their life in times of difficulty or problems. He is an older person who helps other elderly people. He told me how one of the people he was helping scolded him a lot, which was really very uncomfortable. It was hard to confront this elderly person to try to stop that abuse, so, he said, 'In desperation I started to pray to Tara, and recited some mantras, which actually started to help my own mind'. Apparently the old man who had been making comments such as, 'Don't come near me again', so he was just sitting in a corner. But a little while after the volunteer started reciting the Tara prayers the elderly man called out saying, 'So you are not coming towards me are you?' And he replied, 'well, if you want I could come near you again' If you are happy I will come', and the old man said, 'Please do come over'. So it seems that conflict was immediately appeased by praying to Tara and reciting those prayers.

Shantideva's Bodhicharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷོ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

26 February 2013

We can now engage in our meditation practice. The motivation that we generated in the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer that we have just recited will suffice as our motivation for this practice.

The first two lines of this prayer identify the objects of refuge. In the Tibetan version the first line reads To the Buddha, the Dharma and the highest assembly; the Buddha relates to the supreme guide; and as this is a Mahayana refuge, the Dharma encompasses the truth of the Mahayana path and the Mahayana truth of cessation; while the highest assembly specifically indicates the Mahayana Sangha. It is because the Sangha is regarded as a highest or supreme assembly, that making offerings to them is considered to be a highly meritorious deed.

In the lam rim teachings, refuge is presented in four categories: identifying the objects of refuge; explaining the causes of going for refuge; the manner of going for refuge; and having taken refuge, the stages of training. These are really significant points to bring to mind whenever one takes refuge.

The second line of the verse in Tibetan, I go for refuge until I am enlightened, indicates the duration of going for refuge. As it is the Mahayana refuge, one goes for refuge until reaching the complete state of enlightenment. In the common refuge, such as when one takes the lay person's vows, it is going for refuge until the end of one's life. The I indicates the individual person who is going for refuge, and go for refuge indicates the objects of refuge and the manner of taking refuge, intact with the two causes for taking refuge.

Thus, going for refuge implies that the two causes for taking refuge are intact. The first cause is to have unbearable fear of taking rebirth in the lower realms in particular, and experiencing the sufferings of cyclic existence in general. Out of this fear arises the second cause, which is wholehearted reliance upon the objects of refuge, the Three Jewels.

The manner of taking refuge has four points outlined in the lam rim teachings are: recognising the qualities of the objects of refuge; recognising the differences between the objects of refuge; going for refuge with acceptance; and abandoning going for ultimate refuge in other objects. These points are implicitly indicated in the prayer as well.

The main point is that this one verse of taking refuge and generating bodhicitta encompasses a complete and really profound practice. Reciting this verse and contemplating its meaning is, in itself, a meditation practice. Treating it as a mere preliminary formality and assuming one is going onto some higher form of practice afterwards is completely missing the point. Without the basis of taking refuge wholeheartedly, with the complete understanding of what refuge and generating an altruistic mind involves, there is no real practice.

We need to consider the reason why this is such a profound practice. At an individual level we want to be free from the miseries of unfortunate rebirths and the shortcomings of samsara in general. Without obtaining that freedom ourselves we cannot possibly benefit all other beings. So our primary concern must be adopting the best methods to free ourselves from the miseries and sufferings of the lower realms in particular, as well as the suffering of samsara in general. How we do that is solely dependent on taking refuge in Buddha, Dharma and Sangha. Only these objects of refuge give us the methods to free ourselves from cyclic existence.

The second half of the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer indicates the generation of bodhicitta. In from the virtuous merit that I collect, the I indicates the individual person who is collecting the merit. The merit is the merit one accumulates specifically from generosity, morality and meditation. His Holiness the Dalai Lama has indicated on several occasions that using the Tibetan word tsok-nam kyi which includes both accumulations, rather than sonam kyi, which identifies only merit, would be much more meaningful as it encompasses both the collection of wisdom, as well as the collection of merit. That, as His Holiness explains, will encompass far more virtues, and also reminds us of the importance of engaging in both accumulations. The virtue that comes from both accumulations thus serves as a substance for generating the altruistic mind of bodhicitta. As you may recall, during initiations and so forth, it is customary to bring a small offering when taking the bodhisattva vows, to represent the bodhicitta substance. Here the virtue from the two accumulations serves as a supreme substance for generating bodhicitta.

In the last line, [here the English translation corresponds exactly to the Tibetan]— to be able to benefit all sentient beings, indicates the purpose for taking refuge which is to benefit other sentient beings. Those who are familiar with the definition bodhicitta will recall the two aspirations that are needed to qualify as bodhicitta — the aspiration to achieve enlightenment and the aspiration to benefit all sentient beings.

In the words may I attain the state of Buddha to be able to benefit all sentient beings, the state of Buddha identifies the aspiration to achieve enlightenment, while to benefit all sentient beings identifies the aspiration to benefit others. So the combination of these two aspirations qualifies bodhicitta as the supreme altruistic mind. The words may I attain indicates generating that specific aspiration in the form of a very strong wish. In one of the commentaries on Maitreya's Ornament of Clear Realisation, called Clear Meaning, it explains by quoting a sutra that bodhicitta is developed in the nature of generating a strong wish. Amongst the twenty-one commentaries on Maitreya's Ornament of Clear Realisation, the most supreme one is said to be Clear Meaning, composed by Indian master Haribhadra.

Thus the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer suffices for our motivation when it is based on having the full knowledge and understanding of what it encompasses. I'm exhorting you not to forget these points and keep them firmly in mind. The reason why I remind you of these points again and again is because taking refuge and generating bodhicitta is essential and crucial for any practice to become meaningful.

Now we can engage in the meditation practice. [Meditation]

In our last session we covered the homage, so what are the objects of the homage? They are the Three Jewels, and all others worthy of prostration, such as abbots, preceptors and so forth.

1.2. Pledge of composition

The pledge of composition has four sub-divisions:

- 1.2.1. Identifying the subject
- 1.2.2. Rejecting the fault of self-creation
- 1.2.3. Rejecting repetition
- 1.2.4. Identifying the purpose, essential purpose and relation

1.2.1. Identifying the subject

The relevant words of the root text are:

1c. ...to the discipline of the tathagatas' children

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

This is a compendium that contains all the stages of the path that cause one to achieve enlightenment, such as the practice of the perfection of generosity and so forth, that were engaged by the buddhas and bodhisattvas upon initially generating the mind of enlightenment.

The order of the lines in Tibetan is different from the English translation we are using. As the commentary explains, tathagatas indicates the buddhas, and children indicates the bodhisattvas. So generating the mind of enlightenment specifically indicates the bodhicitta that has to be developed. So developing bodhicitta and then engaging in the practices of the perfections of generosity and so forth, leads one to that ultimate state of buddhahood.

The word discipline refers to engaging in the practices such as the perfection of generosity and so forth after having generated the mind of enlightenment.

Here we need to understand that the perfection of generosity and so forth implies the practices of the six perfections such as morality, patience, joyous effort, enthusiasm, meditation and wisdom, which will be presented individually in later chapters. By engaging in these practices bodhisattvas reach the ultimate state of enlightenment. Even though the literal translation of dom is discipline or vow, as used in this translation of the root text, the word dom has the connotation of a compendium as used in the commentary.

Thus, Shantideva's text is a compendium that contains all the stages of the path that cause one to achieve enlightenment

1.2.2. Rejecting the fault of self-creation

This is covered in the words:

1cd. This introduction ... according to the teaching.

In explaining these words, Gyaltsab Je poses a hypothetical question to Shantideva:

Have you not made it up yourself? Who is supposed to believe in this?

As a response to that Gyaltsab Je goes on to say:

There is no fault of self-creation, this introduction to all the stages of the Mahayana path is according to the explanation of the scriptural teachings of the Buddha.

This is a rejection of the fault of self-creation.

1.2.3. Rejecting repetition

Again Gyaltsab Je raises a hypothetical question in his commentary:

Yes, one generates realisations in dependence on the scriptures, but to what end compose this text?

In other words: what reason is there to compose this text? The response is in these words in the root text:

1d. I shall formulate in brief...

Then, in accordance with the root text, Gyaltsab Je indicates Shantideva's response:

There is no fault of repetition because I explained the teachings in a condensed way so that the meaning of the scriptures can be easily realised.

These few lines contain a very significant point that indicates the great kindness of Shantideva. As indicated here there is no repetition of other texts as this composition is formulated in a condensed or brief form. We need to derive from this how incredibly kind Shantideva has been to compose a text that condenses all of the essential points of the Buddha's teachings.

As the opening hypothetical question indicates, one generates realisations in dependence on the scriptures. This, of course, is true. One can generate realisations in dependence on the scriptures, which, as the Buddha's own words, are stainless and faultless. However, the reality is that there are so many volumes of text of the Buddha's words that it would be virtually impossible to even find the time to read all of them. That is because we are living in degenerate times. Our life span is short, we lack a significant amount of wisdom and we lack enthusiasm or joyous effort, and on top of that, with our dull intellect we are quite lazy!

To re-emphasise that point, the reality is that we are living in degenerative times where our life span is short in general and not fixed, which means that death can occur at any time. We also lack wisdom, enthusiasm and on top of that we are lazy. This indicates that even if we were to find the time to read the Buddha's words, it would be hard for us to derive their entire meaning. Nor do we have the capacity to condense these words into a manual of practices that extracts the essential points. Thus Shantideva's kindness is limitless, as illustrated by his presentation of this text which contains the essential points of all of the Buddha's teachings in a condensed form.

As mentioned in the past, the teachings on the Prajnaparamita (which means the wisdom gone beyond) are contained in four thick volumes. It is virtually impossible for us to try to read and understand all of that, and then to condense it into a set of practices. Hence, the relevance of this compendium compiled by Shantideva. As indicated here, by relying on Shantideva's text we can easily realise the meaning of the scriptures.

1.2.4 Identifying the four, purpose and so forth

First Gyaltsab Je identifies the subject which is:

The Mahayana path and its result are the subject

Secondly, Gyaltsab Je mentions the purpose:

Then to ultimately attain enlightenment in dependence on this is the essential purpose.

The purpose can be divided into the initial purpose and the ultimate or essential purpose. The initial purpose is to understand the meaning of the text and the essential purpose is to achieve enlightenment.

The third point is the relationship between these two purposes, which is, as Gyaltsab Je explains:

...that the later does not come about with the earlier...

Here the later means that the later part of the text or subject is dependent on the earlier explanations.

The final point is the purpose of making the pledge, which is so that the composition will be carried all the way through to its conclusion.

It is customary for the great scholars to make a pledge to complete their composition. From this we can understand that once we make a promise it is important to keep that promise and fulfil it.

1.3 Humility and joy in composition

This section has three sub-divisions:

1.3.1. Humility and not written primarily for the purpose of others

1.3.2. The reason for joyful composition

1.3.3. Expressing that it becomes meaningful for others of the same fortune

1.3.1. Humility and not written primarily for the purpose of others

The Tibetan word for humility has the connotation of letting go of one's pride. This heading is indicating that the composition was not intended to instil pride but rather the opposite - letting go of one's pride.

The first two lines of verse two relate to this heading:

2. *I do not express anything that did not exist earlier
And I also do not possess poetic proficiency.*

As a way to explain these two lines Gyaltsab Je raises another hypothetical question:

If it was written according to the teachings of the Buddha, and one needs to attain realisations in dependence on the teachings of the Buddha, why then did you compose this text?

The answer to the hypothetical question is presented as if Shantideva himself was responding:

There are two reasons why I have not written this treatise for those who can easily realise the meaning of the subject matter by depending on the teachings of the Buddha:

This is indicating that the treatise was not intended for people who could easily realise the meaning of the subject matter by depending on the teachings.

The two reasons are:

This text does not express anything that is not already taught in the scriptures.

Here Shantideva is posited as saying 'I've not presented anything that has not been explained by the great masters such as Asanga and so forth, who composed great treatises on the Buddha's words'. Again, this is indicating his great humility.

The second reason is:

Although there is no difference in meaning, I also do not have the poetic proficiency to be able to make changes to the words according to their heaviness, lightness, increase and so forth.

Other treatises are written in very poetic ways, using elegant words with subtle meanings, as do some of the scriptures of the Buddha which have a lot of poetic analogies. Here Shantideva is implicitly indicating that he has overcome pride in two respects: pride in understanding the meaning of other sutras, which is saying, 'I have not presented any extra meaning here which has not been presented before'; and pride in relation to quality of his words, saying, I do not have poetic proficiency. These are the two reasons why the text was not written for the purpose of others.

There can also be another implication in the words it was not written primarily for the purpose of others, which is that this treatise is not intended for those who assume that they can gain realisations without relying on authentic sources of the Buddha's words and the great masters of the past. There are those who feel attracted to treatises that are written in a very poetic way, regardless of their contents. Shantideva implicitly indicates that this is not the purpose of the treatise. That is my recollection of how His Holiness explained it. If you have a copy of the treatise of those teachings, you can refer to that, but that's how I remember it.

Then having mentioned the explicit and implicit reasons why the text was not written for the purpose of others, the next question is, 'If there is any purpose, then what is it?' This is covered in the next section.

1.3.2. The reason for joyful composition

In essence this is saying, 'It is not that I don't have any purpose for composing this text, as I do have great reasons for a being joyful about this composition'.

The root text states:

- 2cd. *Therefore my intent was not for the purpose of others.
I composed this to acquaint my own mind,*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary essentially indicates that Shantideva is saying:

There is a reason why I composed this treatise. It is for acquainting my mind, so that what I understood earlier does not decrease but increases.

This is a very significant point for us to consider, and it is a personal instruction for us as well. As Shantideva indicates, he composes this treatise to acquaint his mind with whatever he has understood from the Buddha's teachings in the past, so that it does not decrease, but further increases.

I try to remind students that it is essential to preserve the understanding we have already gained in the past, and reflect upon it again and again as a way to increase our knowledge. Sometimes people learn something and then put it aside, and go off to find something new, without utilising what they have gained from the earlier teachings. So we need to be mindful about avoiding this.

Another point of personal instruction is that the way to ensure one's understanding and knowledge do not to decrease, and to enable it to increase further is to acquaint one's mind with those teachings again and again. That is the only way to ensure our understanding does not decrease and further increases.

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary goes on to explain that:

The reason for using the determiner this is to indicate either that the text is already complete in the master's mind, or that he is composing it, and that it is not yet complete.

Saying that the text is already complete in the master's mind describes the way in which Shantideva composed the text. We would write a few paragraphs, and then search for other material, and incorporate that and then go onto the next chapter and so on. We have to find the resources as we go along. In this case, however, Shantideva already had the full understanding and knowledge in his mind before commencing his composition.

More specifically, having that knowledge already in his mind definitely indicates that through his earlier studies and practices Shantideva had gained a full understanding of the Buddha's teachings. He was endowed with that understanding in his mind before engaging in the composition.

In relation to this, the qualities of a scholar are said to be three-fold: they are great masters of debate; they have great knowledge and they are masters of composition.

Being a master of debate, means that having removed all mistaken views, there are no faults in their understanding of the Buddha's words or teachings. Being a master of knowledge refers to having clear and unmistakable understanding of the Buddhadharmā. Being a master of composition means having the quality of ensuring that the doctrine, i.e. the Buddhist teachings, do not decline but remain for a long period of time. The teachings explain that of these three qualities the quality of composition is the most supreme, because it ensures that the knowledge does not decline but remains for a long time to benefit many.

I have often encouraged people to write down their experiences. If they want to write a book, I encourage them to do so. From a practical point of view others will appreciate what has been written and can learn from it. If someone with knowledge keeps it to themselves, then their knowledge will die with them, as there will be no record of their knowledge or experiences. So we can see that, even from a conventional point of view composing and writing books is a good deed; it survives the person and remains for others to appreciate in the future. Also there can be financial benefits from writing books, as many authors do.

With respect to Shantideva's composition, we can see that Shantideva definitely had that greater purpose and intention in mind. He composed this text as a way to benefit beings for many generations, just as we are now doing.

To explain a further point Gyaltsab Je poses another hypothetical question:

Shantideva composed the treatise for the purpose of self. If he did not understand it, then he was unsuitable to compose the treatise; if he understood it, then that in itself is enough to meditate on. So what need is there then to compose the text?

This is a reasonable question to ask even though it is a hypothetical one. It also indicates that without having understanding, there is nothing to meditate on! This hypothetical question is raised as an introduction to the next two lines of verse:

3ab. To familiarise with virtue and the strength of my faith, Initially this will increase them.

Gyaltsab Je answers this question from Shantideva's perspective:

I composed the treatise to familiarise my mind in an uninterrupted manner with the extensive virtue that I entered into earlier. By putting it in the form of the treatise, it also increases this mind more and more.

Hence, by composing the treatise through the force of my faith, wisdom and compassion, all three of these will initially increase in my continuum.

So the reason for being joyful about having composed this treatise is that my faith, wisdom and compassion, will initially increase in my continuum. The word initially also has the connotation that:

... in dependence on that, others of equal fortune as me to see this treatise, will also understand it.

That is also implying that while it helps to increase the virtue in Shantideva's own mind through acquaintance with it, others who also have the fortune to see it will also understand this treatise.

1.3.3. Expressing that it becomes meaningful for others of the same fortune

This particular point is indicated in the next two lines:

*3cd. Should others of equal fortune to myself
See any of this, it will be meaningful for them.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

The purpose of others is also definitely accomplished, because when other Mahayana practitioners of fortune equal to mine see this text, it will become as meaningful to them as it is for me.

Here we can see the great extent of Shantideva's kindness and compassion and the consideration that he has for other beings. As we relate to the text we will begin to see the extent to which he has benefitted others. Of course, as all great masters of the past have agreed Shantideva was not only a great scholar and master, but a great, noble and compassionate being. The main point here is the humility and great joy with which Shantideva begins this composition.

There is a two-fold meaning in these lines: on one hand Shantideva adopts humility, which counteracts pride, and on the other hand, he finds great joy in composing the text. We need to reflect on these two points with respect to both our study and practice, and our everyday life. We need to be very mindful of protecting ourselves from the two extremes of pride on the one hand and despondency or low self-esteem on the other. These two are said to be the main obstacles that prevent one from gaining knowledge in the first place and then being able to maintain that knowledge and practice.

If one has great pride, then that will definitely prevent one from obtaining knowledge from authentic sources. The assumption that one knows everything and there's no-one better than me and so forth will prevent one from gaining more knowledge from others. Whereas the other extreme of being despondent, also prevents one from developing further. Feeling despondent is actually another form of laziness, in that that comes in the aspect of feeling 'I am not capable of doing that', which means that one does not engage in gaining knowledge. Adopting a sense of humility and having a great joyful mind overcomes these two extremes, because they encourage us to adopt the practices and study and so forth.

Overcoming pride and adopting humility and having a joyful mind aren't just related to the composition of the text. It is also a way to benefit others of equal fortune. This is specifically indicated in the text. Thus there is a two-fold benefit – for oneself and others.

We can often see these two extremes being displayed. There are times when one walks tall with an air of superiority: 'I know everything; I am the master of all'. Then there are other times when one curls up in a corner thinking, 'I don't know anything, I am worthless'. These are important points to reflect on during the course of our whole life. If we wish to lead a meaningful life, then we need to ensure that we protect ourselves from these two extreme attitudes.

Shantideva's Bodhicharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷོ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

5 March 2013

As was extensively explained last week, the taking refuge and generating bodhicitta prayer can suffice as our motivation. Bringing to mind the meaning of that prayer is the best way to generate a positive motivation for the meditation practice. [meditation]

When a practice is preceded by the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer then it becomes a very profound practice indeed. In meditation one makes an attempt to keep a focused mind, not just with a single-pointed focus but with the residue of that understanding of having taken refuge and developing the altruistic mind of bodhicitta. Then our focus on the object of the meditation will be encompassed by the great virtues of that earlier practice.

The lam rim tells us that refuge is the entrance to the Buddha's doctrine while generating the altruistic mind of bodhicitta is the entrance to the Mahayana or the Great Vehicle practice and path. So we can see the importance of this practice.

2. THE ACTUAL EXPLANATION OF THE STAGES OF THE PATH

This is sub-divided into two categories:

- 2.1. Exhortation to take the essence of the basis with its freedoms and endowments
- 2.2. The method for taking the essence

2.1. Exhortation to take the essence of the basis with its freedoms and endowments

The relevant line from root text is:

4a To find such freedoms and endowments is extremely rare.

Here we need to recall the presentation of the precious human birth in the lam rim teachings. I would like to explain the topic of the precious human rebirth as presented in the lam rim, however that would take too much time. Nevertheless it would be good for those who have received the lam rim teachings in the past to apply your understanding here. Specifically the lam rim presentation has three main points: identifying the precious human rebirth; the rarity of the precious human rebirth, and the ease with which it can be lost. This line from the text relates to identifying the precious human rebirth and how it is extremely rare.

In the Tibetan word dal-jor, the first syllable dal has the connotation of being free from certain conditions, while the second syllable, jor, relates to conducive conditions, more specifically to the conducive conditions for practising the Dharma. Amongst the ten endowments, five are in relation to oneself and five are in relation to other factors. These will be presented later on.

So a precious human rebirth is identified as being a human rebirth that is free from certain adverse conditions and endowed with certain good conditions, and it is this combination of conditions that enables us to practise the Dharma. When we relate to the precious human rebirth in this way, we can see that it has a more profound meaning than any ordinary human rebirth.

If we can immediately relate whatever teaching or practice that is being presented to the lam rim then, because of the extensive explanations presented in the lam rim, it becomes much more meaningful and profound. If something is mentioned in a few words in other texts, and we incorporate into it our understanding from the lam rim, we will be able to savour the real meaning of the words.

I'm in no way about to boast, but when I was studying in the monastery I made attempts to memorise the entire outline of the lam rim. Then I was able to read and familiarise myself with the subject matter while keeping in mind its place in the whole outline. If you were ask me to recite the outline now, my memory might fail me in my old age, however when I was capable of memorising it I took the opportunity to do so.

Having such a holistic approach to study, and then trying to implement it in my practice, means that even though I have not been able to acquire any profound realisations, I can safely say that as a result I have a happy mind wherever I go. Whatever the occasion, I seem to naturally be able to have a positive outlook and maintain a happy state of mind. I attribute that to the genuine attempts in studying and practising the Dharma in the earlier part of my life.

The main point that I am emphasising here is that as you now have all the conducive conditions and opportunities to practice, it is really worthwhile and meaningful to apply yourself, as much as possible, to incorporating whatever understanding you have gained from your study into some level of practice. If you wish to have a genuinely relaxed and happy positive state of mind in your old age then it is worthwhile to invest in that now, when you have the time and when you are capable of putting some energy into it.

Rather than treating the explanations in the teachings as a mere process of intellectual understanding, try to relate them to your own personal life and practice. At this point, we are identifying the precious rebirth which has conditions of the eight freedoms and ten endowments. Reflect on how we have all of these freedoms and good conditions right now, and how we have the perfect opportunity to make our life meaningful. In this way we can exhort ourselves to utilise the opportunities we have now, seeing them as an opportunity for personal practice, rather than as mere external conditions.

When Venerable Michael's mother met me recently, she told me about how when she first met the Dharma, she was one of the first Westerners who went to the Tibetan Library in Dharamsala when Geshe Dhargye was teaching there. She said that there were only five or six students attending the teachings at that time and 'except for me all of them have become scholars'. She recalled that Geshe Dhargye constantly exhorted the students, 'While study is important, make it more than just an intellectual understanding. The most important thing is to practise well'. As the great masters of past used to say, 'We are not deprived of knowledge or understanding but lack the practice'. So if you find that having understood the Dharma hasn't helped to subdue your mind then that is not a result of lacking knowledge, but a consequence of lacking the practice.

To return to the line from the root text, To find such freedoms and endowments is extremely rare, the lam rim teachings present the rarity of finding a precious human rebirth in three points:

1. The causes required to find it are difficult to obtain.
2. An analogy illustrating the difficulty of finding a precious human rebirth
3. Contemplating the difficulty in terms of number; i.e. the number of human beings in general is much less compared to numberless other sentient beings

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on the line from the root text thus:

One needs to make certain that one practises the Dharma on this basis...

This is an exhortation to take the essence of the precious human rebirth. Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

... that possesses freedoms and endowments, because it is very difficult to find such a basis that possesses the eighteen dharmas ...

In relation to the lam rim outline on the difficulty of finding such a precious human rebirth, if one were to ask the question: why is it be difficult to find such a basis that possesses the eighteen dharmas?, then the answer is:

... due to it being very rare to establish the causes for it.

We can see how this very logical presentation is profound in itself, as it is also a presentation of the interdependent nature of cause and effect. Without a cause, there cannot be an effect, which means that if one wishes for a positive result or effect, one has to acquire the causes. The interdependent relationship between a cause and its effect is such that if one is lacking, the other cannot come about. Without acquiring the causes, one cannot experience the effect that one wishes for. That is the logic that is being presented here.

If the causes for such a rebirth are so rare, one may further ask, 'Why is it so rare? Why is it difficult to establish those causes?'

Here, Gyaltsab Je explains:

To attain a human body one needs to practise a single act of pure morality ...

Students who studied Chandrakirti's Middle Way text, the Madhyamakavatara, may recall that one of the verses says that there is no more supreme cause for obtaining high status and definite goodness other than morality. In other words, the supreme cause for obtaining high status is morality. What Gyaltsab Je is also saying here is that one cannot possibly obtain a human life, let alone a precious human life, without having observed a single aspect of morality in the past.

At this point we can ask, 'What else do we need to practise in order to obtain a precious human life endowed with the eight freedoms and the ten optimum conditions?'

To this Gyaltsab Je's commentary replies:

One needs to support it with the practice of generosity and so forth ...

Thus one needs to support morality with the practice of generosity, and so forth, which includes the rest of the practices of patience, joyful effort, meditation and wisdom.

Then the commentary further explains:

... and complete it with stainless prayer. This is exceedingly difficult to find.

Stainless prayer means that the prayer needs to be without the faulty stain of merely focusing on the benefits of this life. Thus, if one were to practise morality, for example, with the intention of merely being appreciated by others or to become famous in this life and so forth, then that morality is tainted or stained with the intention of seeking benefit merely for this life. The meaning of prayer is aspiration, so if one's aspirations are mainly to obtain benefits in this life, then that is all one will achieve and one's practice of morality will not become a cause for obtaining a precious human rebirth in the next life, or any of the other forms of high status. To ensure that one's practice of morality becomes a cause for obtaining a good rebirth in the next lifetime (such as having high status), the practice of morality must be completed with an aspirational prayer that is focused on future lives beyond this one. Any aspiration that is focused beyond this lifetime will be a pure or stainless prayer.

A precious human life that possesses the eighteen dharmas is rare because the causes are so difficult to obtain. We need relate this to our own personal practice. Do we possess all the causes? Are the causes intact or not? How do we go about ensuring that we have the causes? Simply put, the basic cause is, as explained here, observing morality. Here we can think about each of the ten virtues and consider whether they are intact within us. Do we abide by the morality and ethics of not killing? If so, then one act of morality is observed and is thus intact, and we can rejoice about that. Do we refrain from stealing? If so, then that is another act of morality that one is observing. One can go through each of the remaining non-virtues: sexual misconduct; the four of speech, lying, divisive speech, harsh speech and gossip; and the three of mind, covetousness, harmful intent and wrong views. Check within yourselves? Ask, 'Am I abiding by these ethics or not?' If so, then we can rejoice about the fact that there is no question we have created the causes for a good rebirth in the next lifetime. If we focus on that and make aspirational prayers for that to occur then we will definitely have the basis for a fortunate rebirth, and so we can rejoice!

If, on the other hand, any of these virtues are lacking, we can still make a genuine attempt to try to incorporate that practice and to abide by the morality of refraining from the ten non-virtues. When it comes to understanding the teachings, looking outwards to see whether or not others have these causes doesn't help oneself. It is only by checking one's own mental continuum that the teachings become meaningful. Then all of these explanations become personally relevant.

There is the story from Tibet, where a lama was once giving a teaching on this very point of the difficulty and rarity of finding a precious human rebirth. Upon hearing this, someone attending the teaching said, 'Oh the lama must never have been to China, because China is full of people!' Clearly this individual did not have a real understanding of what a precious human rebirth meant, let alone relating it to himself.

Having explained how that precious human rebirth is very rare and difficult to obtain, the lam rim teachings go on to explain that such a rebirth is very meaningful. Thus having contemplated the rarity and difficulty of obtaining the precious human rebirth, and then determined that the causes are all present within oneself, one should then contemplate how meaningful that is and how it can be utilised for great purpose.

Contemplating the great meaning of the eight freedoms and ten endowments

The remaining lines from Verse 4 read:

*abcd If I do not do anything beneficial now
To achieve the purpose of sentient beings
How shall I subsequently attain it perfectly?*

The first two lines present the great benefit that can be derived from having a precious human rebirth, and the last line shows the rarity and the difficulty of finding it. In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains how to contemplate the meaning of the freedoms and endowments in accordance with the meaning of the verse:

On the basis of this possession of the freedoms and endowments one needs to accomplish the purpose of others, because one has attained the basis, in dependence on which one can realise the higher status and definite goodness of others, which is their purpose. Hence one should practice with great effort.

Because one has obtained the freedoms and endowments, one has responsibility for helping others to achieve their purposes as well. Everyone is determined to fulfil their own purposes. This can be seen even in a worldly context, where people run around trying to achieve so many things – study, work and so on. Without an intention to achieve some purpose no one would bother to do anything. The most beneficial purpose, even as a temporary goal, is to inspire others to obtain high status and definite goodness. The ultimate purpose of course is to help them to actually achieve enlightenment.

There's no need to mention that, if a mere worldly purpose relates to some temporary benefit in this life, then most people are more than capable of achieving such personal goals and benefits in this life. Here, however, the purpose extends beyond this life. It is a goal that is oriented towards achieving a purpose in a future life, which is a very noble purpose.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary further explains:

Should one not accomplish the happiness of the next life and beyond, due to the idea of one's permanence and the like, ...

This is an exhortation to practise with great effort now, when we have all of the eight freedoms and ten optimum conditions intact. All too often we fall victim to grasping at permanence. Every morning when we wake up, we assume that we will live for a long time, and our day ahead is premised on existing well into future. We have this view that our life is permanent and durable and will last for a long time. That is where we fall short, because we don't contemplate the reality of how fragile our precious human rebirth is, and how it could end at any time. That is what is being explained here.

... then how shall one subsequently attain such a perfect base again?'

The stronger the notion 'I am not going to die', the stronger our attachment to this life's concerns becomes. If we have strong attachment to the pleasures of this life, then we have not contemplated the reality of how our life is impermanent and that we can perish at any time. Conversely, the best way to make life meaningful is to contemplate the impermanence of our life, knowing that it can end at any time. With such an understanding of the impermanence of one's life, strong attachment to this life's concerns and pleasures will definitely be reduced. In this way we can see the significance of the practice of contemplating impermanence and understanding that death can occur at any time.

If, on the other hand, we hold onto the notion that, 'I'm only 25 now, I am young and I have to work hard and save a lot because I am likely live to be 100!', then all one's time and energy will go into in acquiring as much wealth as possible to fund that long life! But the reality is that no matter how much wealth we accumulate out of our strong sense of attachment to this life's concerns, there will be no real sense of satisfaction. As the great Indian master Asvaghosa said, 'The lack of satisfaction is one of the strongest forms of suffering that one can experience'. Without that sense of inner satisfaction, then all the wealth in the world will not be adequate, and there will never be enough. That is the disease of dissatisfaction. We really need to contemplate how a sense of satisfaction comes from understanding how our life is very fragile and that there is no point in grasping too strongly at the affairs of this world.

As I often comment, if one is satisfied with having enough to survive on for one day, then each day can be a meaningful and happy one. If we can train our mind to be satisfied with what we have each day, and do the same the next day, and the next, then that will be sufficient to carry us through our life!

If, on the other hand, one holds on to the notion of definitely living to be 100 one then starts to calculate how much one would have to earn to last that long. Once one starts making those calculations, it can bring about lots of anxiety and fear, 'How am I going to be able accumulate enough money to last me for that long?' With all these unnecessary calculations and fears, one can actually become very anxious! But those fears are caused by nothing more than one's own fears and doubts, what we call the superstitious mind. It seems that many retired people start worrying about whether their savings will last them until the end of their life. They go over and over the calculations, thinking 'Will it be enough?' 'I am just spending and there's no money coming in'. Those sorts of fears and doubts end up making them quite miserable. It seems that some cannot even enjoy the food they are eating because they so preoccupied with such worries and anxieties.

The teachings on the meditations on death and impermanence tell us that death will definitely come. That is certain. Contemplating the certainty of death is really meaningful because the more one incorporates that understanding and actually puts it into practice the more the fears and anxieties about having to plan for the future naturally subside, and one becomes more relaxed and more flexible.

When we begin to understand the significance of this practice, we will begin to reap the benefits of that practice. As presented in the teachings, the first point is that death is certain. Yet while death is certain, the time of death is uncertain. So there is a certainty about death but there is no certainty about the time of death. The reality of that uncertainty about when death will occur is contemplated in two main points.

1. There is no certainty about the time death will occur. It can happen to the young as well as the old. Also death does not spare the rich; it happens regardless of whether one is rich or poor.
2. There are many more conditions for death than there are conducive conditions for survival. Even those very conditions that are usually conducive for survival can in fact become a cause for death. As we all know, there are many ways to perish after having a nice meal: it could be food poisoning; some die from over-eating; people choke on their food. There are many things that are normally conducive for our survival but which can be a very cause for death.

The point is that reflecting upon all of these realities will reduce our strong notion that our life is permanent. When that idea of a permanent life is overcome, then strong grasping at the necessities for survival or at the pleasures and attachments of this life will naturally be reduced. Then the mind will be much calmer and more relaxed.

Another important point is that reducing attachment does not necessarily mean getting rid of one's possessions. Divesting ourselves of possessions will not eradicate attachment to things. It's the grasping that one has to remove, not the possessions. One can still utilise one's possessions—the main thing is to reduce strong attachment to them. Then, at the time of death, one will be able to die very peacefully and because there is no attachment and clinging to possessions there will be nothing holding one back, and it will be a genuinely peaceful death.

The significance of these points is that while we may not be able to do anything to prevent our death, which is a reality, we can definitely do something to prevent fear and anxiety at the time of death.

Preparation for death has three main elements: 1) practice of morality, 2) supported by practices of generosity and so forth, and 3) completed with stainless or pure prayers.

We can choose to observe the morality of abiding by the ten virtues by refraining from killing and stealing and so forth. When we have voluntarily adopted an ethical way of living such as abiding by the ten virtues and refraining from the ten non-virtues, then that is the ultimate preparation and protection for us at the time of death.

As a result of one's preparation for death, one can actually feel great joy and happiness about experiencing death. That is definitely possible when one has adopted the practice of engaging in the ten virtues and avoiding the ten non-virtues, which serves to protect us from anxiety and fear at the time of death. We can be protected from those fears by the practices that we have engaged in during our life.

Of the three objects of refuge the Dharma Jewel is the actual refuge, and it is the Dharma, the practices we have done, which are the ultimate refuge and the ultimate protection at the time of death and beyond. So we can incorporate that understanding as well.

The word Dharma has the connotation of 'holding onto', which can also mean to protect. So when we incorporate the literal meaning of Dharma, we can derive the understanding that it is the practices one has established which will hold or protect one from the fear of unfortunate rebirths. We really need to understand how the practices that one has incorporated into one's life, is the actual Dharma refuge, the ultimate protection.

Of the Three Jewels, the Sangha will be unable to protect us from fear and anxiety at the time of death and the unfortunate rebirths beyond that, although there may be some blessings from their prayers. If the actual Buddha were present, he would be able to render some assistance. But the real protection comes from one's own practice, from one's own mind. What we can call uncommon or particular cause that protects one from the fears and anxiety at the time of death and beyond is the actual practice, the Dharma that one has incorporated within oneself. There is great solace in knowing that one has established the basis of Dharma within oneself, and has engaged in the practices to the best of one's ability. Then one will have confidence about facing death without any fear and be able to joyfully and happily go beyond onto the next life. Real solace comes from one's own practice.

The actual definition of the word 'dharma' is 'that which holds its identity'. So the literal meaning of dharma incorporates all existence. Therefore all existence uses the term 'dharma', because everything that exists has that nature of holding its own identity.

We can apply that definition of dharma of holding its own nature or identity to this glass. The fact that this object is an object which holds its own identity or nature means that whoever relates to it will be able to relate to it as a glass. As long as its identity as a glass remains intact, it will always naturally retain that identity, and thus be able to function in that way. Thus we can always relate to it as a glass.

If it didn't have the ability to hold its own identity, then people would no longer relate to it as a glass, because it could change from one thing to another. It is good for us to have an understanding of that general definition of dharma, as well as the Dharma that is one of the Three Jewels.

The next session is the discussion evening. It is part of the study group discipline to participate in both the discussion and the following exam. The discussion is a meaningful commitment, and it is good to come to it with a joyful and happy mind as a way to further extend one's understanding.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

26 March 2013

Based on the motivation that we generated when we recited the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in our meditation practice, which encompasses the basis of love and compassion. [meditation]

That will be sufficient for now; if the meditation session is too long, there is the danger that the meditation turns into sleep.

The meditation practice that we have just engaged in is one that establishes, and further develops the basis of love and compassion within oneself. Indeed, this practice is an essential one, in that without a basis of love and compassion there is no way that we can truly benefit other beings. Love and compassion is our best companion and brings us great solace, because it protects our minds from negativities. We can safely conclude that the practice of love and compassion is essential throughout life and not restricted to meditation sessions. So we need to try to incorporate love and compassion into all aspects of our daily life.

It is not as if we lack the basis of love and compassion, or that we need to develop it afresh because the basis of love and compassion exists in all human beings. That is true regardless of whether we are religious or not. You can see how even animals express love and compassion, so it is should be more pronounced among humans. What we need to do is to further develop and cherish the love and compassion that we already have within ourselves.

Love and compassion are the fundamental basis of Dharma practice. To neglect developing love and compassion and engage in some other form of practice, while assuming that one is practising the Dharma is completely missing the point! In fact, such a person would be an object of the great compassion of the noble and enlightened beings. Neglecting to develop love and compassion shows they have not understood the essence of the Dharma. It is really important to understand that if we wish to engage in Dharma practice, we need to know the essential basis of Dharma practice, which is to cultivate love and compassion. We can sit rigidly through long hours of meditation and say many prayers, but we won't be actually practising the Dharma unless our practice is based on the cultivation of love and compassion. That is what we really need to keep in mind.

Out of love and compassion one will take the initiative to avoid intentionally causing harm to others. Non-violence is practised on the basis of love and compassion, and when further developed it will provide the impetus to extend that love and compassion to benefit all sentient beings. The practice of not harming, but benefiting others in every situation, is the very foundation of Dharma practice.

If, after many years of engagement in some form of Dharma practice, one finds that one is not becoming kinder and more gentle, then that is an indication that one is neglecting a very important element of the Dharma. If we have practised developing love and compassion as part of our Dharma practice, we will definitely see some improvement in our conduct and behaviour. But if we find we still lack a gentle nature and a genuinely kind heart, then that shows that we have neglected to focus on developing love and compassion. This is a really important point to understand.

As Lama Tsong Khapa has so very kindly exhorted us to do, we need to put whatever teachings we have heard and validated by thinking and investigating it, into the practice of meditation. That is the approach we need to take if we are to engage in the practice of the Dharma. To merely acknowledge, 'Oh that makes sense' or 'that is a good point' but not actually applying it to our own life, would mean that the Dharma we have heard has not been of much benefit, and a deeper transformation will not take place.

An analogy to illustrate how the Dharma practice can help to transform one's mind is that just as a mirror reflects what's on our face, the Dharma can reflect what lies within our own mind. The mirror is serving its purpose when reflecting dirt on our face so that we can clean it up. Likewise, the Dharma reflects the faults in our own mind, which we would otherwise be unable to detect. Thus through the medium of the Dharma, we are able to clearly see the dirt-like defects in our own mind.

Having recognised these defects as faults, we then need to take the initiative to start clearing them away and thus work on transforming our mind. When we take the initiative and begin to apply the Dharma in our practice, we will begin to see a true transformation taking place as our minds naturally become kinder and calmer. If, however, one tries to practise the Dharma without first gaining a proper understanding, then at a certain point when one realises that a true sense of change and transformation has not taken place, then there is the great danger of criticising and forsaking the Dharma. One may end up thinking 'There is no real value in the Dharma as it doesn't work and it doesn't serve any purpose'. At that point there is the grave danger of entirely giving up the Dharma.

We need to take the initiative to analyse our own mind and investigate what is going on within, and try to differentiate between the positive and the negative states of mind. When we notice a negative mind, we need to actively engage in trying to overcome that negativity, while further increasing the positive states of mind. If one applies that measure on a regular basis, then a true transformation will gradually but definitely take place.

My meagre attempts to engage in Dharma practice have definitely benefited my own mind. I am not in any way claiming that I have done any great practice, but I have made genuine attempts to practise developing love and compassion, really thinking about how to strengthen and further develop love and compassion within myself. So at this stage in my life, I can safely say that I have experienced real benefits as a result of my meagre efforts—I have witnessed some transformation taking place in my mind.

If this has been true for my meagre attempts, then there is no question that there will be a great transformation and tremendous positive results for those who are able to engage in a serious practice of developing love and compassion, meditating on it extensively, and dedicating their whole life to developing love and compassion. My meagre practice has not only confirmed the benefits of this practice, but it has also given me great respect and reverence for those who have actually perfected love and compassion, such as the buddhas and the bodhisattvas. They are the objects of our faith and veneration and we can see why that is the case—they have completely perfected love and compassion to the point that they are actually an embodiment of love and compassion. They have become enlightened beings and bodhisattvas because they have developed and increased their love and compassion. So they have become a great inspiration for us to follow their example, and that is the real reason why we pay respect and venerate the enlightened beings. Of course you must not misinterpret this to mean that I am claiming to have developed any great qualities. That is not the case at all!

The great master Atisha said that we need to hide any qualities that we may possess while proclaiming our own faults, and proclaim the qualities of others and hide their faults. This is very practical advice. If we fall into the normal pattern of focusing on others' faults, then the only their faults will appear to us. So others will always appear to us in a negative light as we are focussing only on their faults.

Regardless of whether or not others have faults, we need to make an attempt to acknowledge their qualities, and then they will appear to us in a positive light. That will, in turn benefit our own mind, helping it to maintain a positive outlook. This also relates to the recent findings of scientists who have claimed that when you see a fault in any object, for example when you are angry, only 5% of that fault lies in the object whereas the other 95% is a projection from one's own mind. That is definitely in accord with what the teachings present—when we see faults in others it is mostly our own projection. Understanding this point is extremely beneficial for our own mind. If we constantly focus on the faults of others then how will we be able to get along with them? We need to get along with so many other people, and focussing on their qualities is the most practical way to deal with the situation in a most effective manner.

Now we need to get on with the study of the material that we have in front of us.

2.1. Exhortation to take the essence of the basis with its freedoms and endowments

In our last session there was a presentation of how a precious human life is very rare and difficult to obtain. This is explained here with an analogy which shows how the causes for obtaining the precious human life are so rare. A more detailed explanation of this will be presented in the fourth chapter.

The Difficulty of Achieving Freedoms and Endowments

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je introduces this heading and then quotes from Nagarjuna's Letter to a Friend:

Like a golden yoke on a great ocean in motion
And a turtle meeting it; it is more difficult to be an animal
And to become human even more difficult. Work with the human power
To achieve this aim by practising the holy Dharma.

The analogy presented in this verse indicates the extreme unlikelihood of taking a fortunate rebirth. The yoke of an ox's harness has a hole in the middle where the ox's head goes in. In this analogy the yoke is drifting on the surface of an ocean. It is just about impossible for a blind turtle, which rises to the surface once in a hundred years, to meet the yoke and putting its head into the hole.

In the analogy the term golden is used to indicate something that is very precious. Thus, the golden yoke represents the Buddha's teachings, which are very precious.

The yoke not remaining in one place but drifting in different directions indicates that it is not certain that the Buddha's teachings will remain in the one place for too long.

The turtle putting its head into the hole of the yoke is an indication of taking refuge in the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha, which is considered a doorway to adopting the Buddha's teachings, and putting them into practice.

The turtle surfacing every hundred years indicates the rarity of obtaining a precious human rebirth. If it were to come to the surface regularly, it would have a greater chance of placing its head into the yoke. But surfacing every hundred years indicates the rarity of obtaining a precious human life with all the conditions—the eight freedoms and ten endowments—intact.

This analogy reminds us that it is a very rare coincidence to have met with the Buddha's teachings with all of the conditions intact. As we have actually achieved this rare state we must now seize this opportunity and utilise it to make it most meaningful, by putting the teachings we have received into practice, as it is very unlikely that these conditions will recur in the future. The main point is that we must seize the opportunity that we have now to derive the essence of this life.

We should not regard what is being presented here merely as a fancy narration. Rather we must take the meaning to heart and apply it to our own situation. We need to understand that we must seize the opportunity provided by these precious conditions and utilise them for our own practice. If one has no inclination to practise the Dharma, then of course all of this is irrelevant. But if we are inclined to practise the Dharma, then we need to see the relevance of what is being presented here and take it as a personal instruction. There will be no better opportunity to practise Dharma other than now, when we have all of these conditions intact.

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je follows his quotation from Letter to a Friend with this statement:

By abandoning the eight states of non-freedom one achieves freedom.

As explained previously, freedom or leisure refers to being free from certain adverse conditions.

Gyaltsab Je then continues:

[Nagarjuna's] Letter to a Friend states that the eight states of non-freedom are:

Holding wrong views and birth as animal,
Hungry ghost or hell being,
Without the conqueror's teachings and birth as barbarian
In a border country and being deaf and dumb,
And birth as long life god, being born as any of these,
Is called being born without freedom.
Having found freedom free from those,
Strive to become free from birth.

The specifics of the eight freedoms are clearly presented in other sources such as Lam Rim teachings. We can refer to those more extensive explanations to gain a clearer understanding of them. The essential point Nagarjuna is presenting here is that having found freedom, free from those eight adverse conditions (in which one would not have the opportunity to engage in the practice of Dharma), we must strive to become free from birth, which means to be free from being reborn with these adverse conditions. In accordance with explanations given in the past we first need to contemplate the great sufferings that are experienced under those eight adverse conditions, such as the suffering of being born as an animal. Then we need to personalise that and consider how unbearable it would be if we were born in that situation. Out of the fear of being born in those suffering conditions, we take refuge in the Three Jewels. Then, based on our sincere reliance on the Three Jewels, we adopt the practice of avoiding non-virtue and accumulating virtues. This is how we strive to be free from being reborn in such uncomfortable and unfavourable situations in the future.

These eight adverse conditions can be subdivided into two main categories: four of which are non-human rebirths, such as being born an animal and so forth; and four adverse conditions while being born as a human, such as being born where the teachings have not occurred, as a barbarian, or as a deaf and mute. If we were reborn with any of these adverse conditions there would be no possibility for us to properly understand the Dharma. We can safely assume that our current freedom from these adversities is our great fortune. Not utilising these conditions would be a complete waste of a wonderful opportunity.

Having quoting Nagarjuna's text, Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Because there is no freedom to practice the Dharma in these eight states they are called states of non-freedom.

As explained in the commentary, these eight states are called freedoms because they are the opposites of the adverse conditions of not having the freedom to practise the Dharma. At this point, one can ask, 'What are the good conditions needed to practise the Dharma'? The good conditions are referred to here as the ten endowments, which can be divided into two categories: five that are related to personal favourable conditions and five that relate to external favourable conditions.

Next, Gyaltsab Je states:

The Hearer's Grounds states that the ten endowments are:

The five endowments of self:
Human, central born, complete faculties,
Not having transgressed the limits of karma, faith in the source

Not having transgressed the limits of karma means not having committed or not having induced others to commit the immediate actions. Having faith in the source means to have faith in the three baskets of the teachings

The first endowment is to be born human. Unlike some other rebirths, the very fact of being human means that one has the capacity and intelligence to be able to understand what is being presented. Actually, the definition of a human is 'a being who is able to speak and understand'. This means being able to communicate whatever one feels and wishes to express, as well as being able to understand what others are expressing. Thus, being born as a human means that we have the capacity to understand the Dharma.

Being central born means being born in the central land, which is a land where the Buddha's teachings are prevalent.

Having complete faculties clearly means having all the sense faculties intact.

Not having transgressed the limits of karma (which will be explained in the text itself) basically means that one has not committed any of the five heinous crimes, meaning the five actions of immediate retribution.

Faith in the source means having faith in the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings.

With respect to the last five endowments that relate to external conditions, Gyaltsab Je again quotes from The Hearer's Grounds:

A buddha has come and taught the holy Dharma; the teachings abide, and those following; there is affectionate compassion for others.

A buddha has come refers to the Buddha actually having come to this world.

And taught the holy Dharma refers to having given the teachings or turned the wheel of Dharma

Although we have not been born in the actual presence of the Buddha, we have been born at the time of the Buddha in a sense, because we live at a time when the Buddha's teachings are prevalent. That is due to the unbroken lineage which has been passed them down.

Teachings abide means that the teachings are being actively taught and practised.

Those following refers to the hearers, solitary realisers and the bodhisattvas who created the unbroken lineage of the teachings.

Affectionate compassion for others, indicates that there are affectionate and compassionate individuals who are willing to support us as we follow and practise the Dharma.

If the Buddha had not come to this world then, even though we have been born as a human, we would not have met all the necessary conditions that are conducive to ensuring a fortunate rebirth. So we meet the requirement of having been born at a time when the Buddha has come. Not only that, but he has given the teachings. If he had not given the teachings, we would not benefit from them. And the teachings have not only been presented, but they still abide at this time. Those who follow the teachings refers to the great practitioners such as the bodhisattvas, the great meditators and so forth. As they have gained significant realisations from having practised and followed the Dharma, they serve as a great inspiration for us. Even if all of the other conditions were intact, we still need others whose love and compassion will support us and encourage us to engage in the practice of the Dharma. And we are living at a time where there are those who actually support us in our practice and so forth. If one wholeheartedly dedicates one's life to practising the Dharma, there will be no need to worry about finding the means to support oneself, because there will definitely be others who will render that support. We can feel incredibly fortunate because we have met all the conditions mentioned here.

There is a saying in Tibet that initially when one sincerely begins to practice the Dharma, one's resources can be so meagre that it is as if the mouth can't find food! But later on, having practised and endured many hardships, one reaches a point where there is so much food around that it doesn't find enough mouths to feed! When we apply that example to our time, we can witness so much food going to waste, which is because it has not found adequate mouths to feed!

2.2. The method for taking the essence

This is the next of the meticulously presented headings. Having described the appropriate conditions to achieve a human rebirth with the eight freedoms and ten endowments intact, and exhorting us to take the essence of that to make our life most meaningful, the question that then arises is, 'Well how does one actually take the essence of one's life to make it meaningful?'. Hence this heading, which has two main parts:

2.2.1. The general presentation

2.2.2. Explaining the individual meanings

2.2.1. The general presentation

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section thus:

This text [Bodhisattvacharyavatara] shows the complete stage of the path to enlightenment. It shows the training in the thoughts of the small and middling beings as preliminaries for the training in the thought of the great capable being. It shows that having generated the mind of supreme enlightenment, one then trains in the six perfections of generosity and so forth.

Then Gyaltsab Je goes on to summarise the contents of each of the chapters.

Initially, to generate the mind of supreme enlightenment, one needs to strongly increase joyful strength through contemplating its benefits well. This is described in the first chapter, which also shows the training in the thoughts of the small and middling being as auxiliary limbs for the generation of the mind of enlightenment.

In order to generate the mind of supreme enlightenment or bodhicitta, one first needs to develop a strong joyful strength by contemplating the benefits of bodhicitta. That is the main topic of the first chapter, which is a presentation of the benefits of the mind of supreme enlightenment or bodhicitta. The term auxiliary limbs means, that this chapter also presents the practices of the small and middling scopes.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Then, to generate the mind of supreme enlightenment, which has the root of love and compassion, one must confess the opposing conditions, i.e. the negativities, and one must build up the conducive condition, i.e. accumulate merit.

This is done on the basis of having cleaned the place of practice, as if one is expecting a wheel-turning king to visit one's house. Then one needs to take the mind of enlightenment. The former is explained in chapter two and the latter in chapter three.

Thus chapter two describes how to purify the negativities, while chapter three presents the conducive conditions for the accumulating merit to develop the mind of enlightenment or bodhicitta. As conducive conditions refers to the accumulation of merit chapter three is based on the means of accumulating merit.

Next, Gyaltsab Je's commentary describes the fourth chapter:

The fourth chapter demonstrates the need for conscientiousness, the factor that prevents the degeneration of virtues gained from training in generating the perfections.

Thus the subject matter of the fourth chapter is how to develop conscientiousness as a way to protect the mind gained from training in the perfections from declining.

Gyaltsab Je then concludes his commentary on this section:

The next chapters provide the way of training in the six perfections. The fifth chapter gives extensive instructions on the way of training in morality by way of protecting one's mind with mindfulness and introspection. The way of training in patience, enthusiasm, mental stabilisation and wisdom are explained in the next four chapters.

The tenth chapter gives a comprehensive overview of the way of training in generosity, with extensive notes on how to train in the mind of giving by dedicating one's body, possessions and virtues to others. The training in generosity is also explained at the time of taking the mind of enlightenment and so forth. The resulting buddhahood is explained in the ninth chapter.

With this general presentation, the commentary clearly explains how the Bodhisattvacharyavatara divides its subject matter—how to develop the awakening mind or the mind that aspires to achieve enlightenment—into different chapters.

In order to present a guide for developing bodhicitta, the benefits of the awakening mind or bodhicitta need to be understood, and that is the subject matter of the first chapter. In order to be able to develop bodhicitta, one needs to first purify one's own mind of negativities, which is the subject matter of the second chapter. The third chapter relates to establishing the conducive conditions for accumulating merit. Then, having developed the bodhicitta or the awakening mind we need to ensure that it doesn't decline, for which we need conscientiousness and mindfulness, and those are explained in the next two chapters. The six perfections are then presented in the remaining chapters. This is a concise summary of the subject matter of the whole text.

Thus, the concise presentation of the Mahayana path or the Great Vehicle is that it consists of a mind that is an awakening mind or a mind of bodhicitta, and the practice of the Great Vehicle is the six perfections. This is the subject matter of the Bodhisattvacharyavatara.

We will now recite the Eight Verses of Mind Training and dedicate the merits of the recitation to Susan Coates' father, who has passed away.

I explained the visualisation when we did the Eight Verses of Mind Training in our last Easter course. As explained at that time, we visualise the Buddha Amitabha on the top of our crown. Then as we make requests to Buddha Amitabha, light emanating from his body descends into us and purifies the negativities of the deceased person. So we can base the visualisation on that.

I know Susan Coates to be very modest and good person, who is one of the older students of our study group. Personally, she has been very kind to me, and she always makes very nutritious and delicious food when she provides meals for me. Of course every time I receive a meal I also make strong prayers and dedications. Yesterday I happened to have a meal with her and when I asked 'How is your dad?', she said, 'Actually, he has passed away'. Last Thursday Llysse told me that Susan's father was critically ill, and I was already doing prayers. Susan told me that his passing away was very gentle and peaceful.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེད་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

2 April 2013

Based on the motivation that we have just generated with the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in the meditation practice. In particular we generate this intention: In order to benefit all sentient beings by leading them to the ultimate state of happiness and freedom from all suffering, I will engage in the tong len meditation practice, which is based on the expression of love and compassion for all sentient beings.

[meditation]

The meditation that we have just done will suffice as our motivation for the teaching as well, as it has enhanced our original motivation. Every time we engage in the tong len practice, we are directly increasing the sense of love and compassion within our own heart, and that is something that we really need to work on developing, because it is as a result of our lack of love and compassion that we find ourselves engaging in so many negative actions. So there is not much point in putting the development of these essential qualities of love and compassion to one side, while focussing on some other practice.

As I regularly emphasise, love and compassion is the basis for whatever practice we do. So it is relevant that the subject matter of this very text that we are studying now is also based on love and compassion. It presents methods on how to generate the superior intention and the mind of enlightenment or bodhicitta.

The text begins with a meticulous presentation of the benefits of bodhicitta, followed by the reasons for developing bodhicitta. As I emphasise again and again, we need to relate to this on a personal level, and daily develop the strong intention, 'I am going to do my utmost to benefit living beings and my utmost to not harm any living being' before engaging in any other activity. At the very least we can certainly manage to adopt that intention as a wish which, at our beginner's level, will suffice for a bodhicitta attitude. As we develop and increase that intention it becomes the basis for developing actual bodhicitta. I find this to be really useful and beneficial point to contemplate.

If we develop that mind as a basis for developing bodhicitta, that will in turn become the basis for developing the excellence of all good qualities, the ultimate state of enlightenment. What may otherwise seem like a simple intention is in fact the basis for developing all the qualities of a bodhisattva. The bodhicitta attitude encompasses benefitting other sentient beings in every possible way and avoiding even the slightest harm to any sentient being. As there are numberless sentient beings, there are numberless ways to benefit them, and equally, numberless ways to avoid harming sentient beings. By reflecting upon that, we can get an inkling of the extent of the bodhisattvas' deeds, which will then inspire us to develop bodhicitta ourselves.

When we relate to the benefits of developing bodhicitta in a logical way, we will definitely begin to see that there are so many benefits from developing the mind that aspires to achieve enlightenment. As mentioned previously, there are numberless ways to benefit sentient beings and numberless ways to avoid harming sentient beings, simply because there is an infinite number of living beings. When we contemplate this fact, then we will begin to see why the mind aspiring to achieve enlightenment is so precious and invaluable.

Another point to keep in mind is that, as the past masters have said, without the wish for others to be happy and free from suffering, there is no way that the actual wish to benefit others will arise. So the wish to benefit others is based on these two essential elements—wishing others to be happy and wishing them to be free from suffering. When we understand this we will see why those who have developed an unceasing, spontaneous wish to benefit others and who are actually engaging in deeds to benefit numberless sentient beings and avoid harm, are indeed worthy objects of veneration. This is precisely why bodhisattvas are considered as holy beings. As we deepen our understanding of the actual benefits of the awakening mind, it becomes a personal inspiration for us to develop the awakening mind ourselves.

I cannot emphasise enough the great benefits that can be derived from every effort that we make to develop love and compassion in our hearts. The more we acquaint ourselves with genuine loving kindness, the more our own mind will become really calm and settled, and not easily disturbed by either excitement or depression. Rather than being judgmental and hostile or overly excited when we meet someone, we will be able to relate to them in a genuine calm manner. So we can see how having a calm mind changes the way how we relate to other sentient beings. Of course this will be explained in detail in the text itself.

2.2.1. Explanation of the Individual Meanings

CHAPTER 1: CONTEMPLATING THE BENEFITS OF THE MIND OF ENLIGHTENMENT¹

There is a significant reason why contemplating the benefits of the mind of enlightenment is presented first. In order to be inspired to develop the mind of enlightenment, one first needs to see the benefits of having that mind, which also includes the purpose for developing the mind of enlightenment.

There are two parts to the chapter:

1. Explaining the text of the chapter
2. The title of the chapter

1. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

The text of the chapter has two subdivisions:

1. The advice that is suitable to abandon negativity and to accomplish virtue
2. Contemplating extensively the benefits of bodhicitta

1.1. THE ADVICE THAT IS SUITABLE TO ABANDON NEGATIVITY AND TO ACCOMPLISH VIRTUE

The suitable basis for developing the awakening mind is two-fold: a good physical body and a pure mind. The suitable body needed to develop the awakening mind was presented earlier with the explanation of the eight freedoms and ten endowments. Gyaltsab Je's commentary now turns to the suitable mind needed as the basis for developing the awakening mind, which is a pure mind that abandons negativity and accomplishes virtue.

¹ To keep things manageable the numbering system will start again for each chapter.

As Gyaltsab Rinpoche points out with the heading, the advice contained in this section of Shantideva's text is that it is suitable to abandon all negativity and to accomplish virtue.

It is always good to relate the topics presented in this text to the lam rim teachings as well. To use simple terms to understand the point being made here, we all have a natural inclination to strive for happiness and avoid any kind of suffering. Thus the reason we need to abandon negativity is because negativity is the cause leading us to experience the result of suffering. Conversely engaging in virtue is naturally the cause that leads us to experience the consequence of happiness. As such, when the lam rim teachings present karma in detail, they are explaining how the cause and effect process actually works.

The definition of negativity is that which brings about unpleasant results. The definition of virtue is that which brings about a happy result. So that is the basis of the advice for the need to accomplish virtue and shun negativity, which is explained in great detail in the lam rim. Gaining a sound understanding of karma is said to be the very foundation of Dharma practice. These are really significant points to keep in mind.

The reason why I emphasise this point is that understanding the profundity of the cause and effect sequence of karma is related to the understanding of interdependent origination, or dependent arising. The masters have indicated that it is only when one has gained a full understanding of interdependent origination that one begins to understand the correct view of emptiness. Without that sound basis of understanding interdependent origination, one cannot possibly gain a true understanding of emptiness. Although one may assume one is meditating on emptiness, it could only be some form of vacuity, where there is nothing to be realised.

Understanding that a particular type of cause brings about a particular type of effect means that it is crucial to understand the nature of causes. A negative cause needs to be shunned and eradicated; and a positive cause needs to be adopted and really cherished, just as a farmer cherishes his seeds. Although some seeds may appear to be small and insignificant, the farmer knows the good effects that each seed can produce. In a practical sense, we need to understand the relevance of karma in the same way.

The point that I derive as a personal instruction is that negativity is really much stronger than virtue. We don't have to think much about engaging in negativity, because it comes about spontaneously. Virtue, on the other hand is very weak. In fact it is so weak that we barely have any intention to engage in virtue, and even when we do, it doesn't have much strength and is only of short duration. So there is little opportunity to accumulate virtue. When we acknowledge that negativity is prevalent and strong, and virtue is very weak, it gives us the initiative to try to change them around. This is the point that I get from the following presentation.

Just to re-emphasise the point, negativity is that which brings about unpleasant results, things that we don't wish for and that we don't want to experience. Virtue is that which brings about pleasant experiences, the effect of which is happiness. As what is being presented here is abandoning or overcoming negativity and adopting virtue, it is good to understand from the very outset what negativity and virtue really mean.

The relevant lines from the text read:

5. Just like a flash of lightning illuminates the Dark clouded night sky for a moment, Likewise sometimes, through the power of the Buddha, Worldly beings receive wisdom and merit occasionally.

6a. Hence, virtue is always meek

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Nowadays, when we are of little merit and our negativities are very strong, it is appropriate to meditate on the antidotes to the negativities.

Nowadays refers to our present degenerate times. In these few lines Gyaltsab Je has derived the essence of the verse. As we don't have much merit and have very strong negativities, that in itself is the reason why it is appropriate for us to meditate on the antidotes to the negativities, and to engage in actions to purify those negativities.

The example presented in the verse is then explained in the commentary:

For example, just as one can see form very clearly for an instant when the dark clouded night sky is illuminated by a flash of lightning, ...

There are three significant elements in this analogy.

Night indicates it is night time when there is no illumination from the sun, which is analogous to the lack of the Buddha's omniscient wisdom radiating down to illuminate the minds of sentient beings.

Dark indicates a moonless night, which is analogous to the darkness of not knowing what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded.

Clouded indicates that even the stars are not being visible, which refers to the mind being clouded with the three poisons.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary then explains that just as such a sky is illuminated by a flash of lightning:

... in the same way, for worldly beings the wisdom that establishes virtue thinking, 'I have to act meritoriously' arises only occasionally. Beings do not possess such thinking continually.

These points need to be seen as a personal instruction. Acting meritoriously or accumulating virtue arises only very occasionally. It is through the blessings of the enlightened beings, and maybe some small virtue or merit we have accumulated in the past, that the thought of engaging in meritorious deeds will arise briefly. So we can understand now why it is so hard to engage in accumulating merit or virtue.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary then continues:

For that reason they always remain with little virtue, and similar to the dark clouded night sky, they have difficulty overcoming the strong negativities that cause rebirth in the lower realms.

The analogy of lightning on a dark night is a very vivid one. The illumination from the flash of lightning remains for only a few seconds, and when the lightning fades we are engulfed in darkness again. Similarly, it is incredibly difficult for the mind of virtue to arise in ignorant beings, and when it does arise, the duration is very short. What we need to really consider is how precious virtuous thoughts are, and how we need to look for every opportunity to develop a virtuous mind. At the same time we need to remind ourselves that we have accumulated some virtues, and rejoice in that. Then we need to look for find further opportunities to engage in virtue, which is the most suitable way to strengthen whatever virtue we have. If we find that our mind is oppressed by negativities then that should encourage us to engage in some suitable purification practice. That is the personal instruction we need to derive from what is being explained here.

Gyaltsab Je's conclusion is:

Worldly beings take rebirth in very fearful places, which should be understood as very dreadful times, and therefore one should strive to accomplish virtue and abandon negativity. Hence, virtue is always meek is explained in relation to time. It can also be explained in relation to the occasion when virtues are of little power and negativities are very strong.

As some other commentaries have indicated, Virtue is always meek, can also relate to the occasions when virtue has little power and negativities are very strong. However the main point is that we are now in a time when virtue is meek, with little strength, and negativity is much more prevalent. What we need to take as a personal instruction is that one needs to cherish every moment when it is possible to accumulate virtue, and take every opportunity to abandon and purify negativities. We need to maintain whatever virtue we have and use that as a base on which to slowly begin to increase that virtue. That is the most practical approach. Otherwise we may end up in a situation where we feel that we have to do something extra, but in the process, give up what we already have! That would be a sad situation as we have completely missed the point.

Here I recall the very profound advice that the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargye once gave to Jampa Ignen when he was a monk. Apparently he had sought some advice from Geshe Ngawang Dhargye about doing some extra study or practice, and Geshe Ngawang Dhargye's advice was, 'Well, that's quite good, but wouldn't it be more worthwhile to strive to protect the vows that you've already got and really work at that'. That apparently was very timely advice for Jampa Ignen. When others later heard of the advice to work on maintaining what you've already got they found it to be very profound advice.

The advice that we take here is that if negativity is prevalent, we need to apply the antidote. If for no apparent reason there are times when one feels melancholy and sad, or a little depressed, then that is a sign that negativity is prevalent. If we don't want that experience of feeling sad and unhappy, then we need to get rid of the cause of that, which is the negativity in one's own mind. That, as I have previously mentioned, is what we need to be focussing on. What I often find is that some people do the exact opposite, taking every opportunity to create negativity and feel sad and sorry if they miss an opportunity to create negativity! So when you are feeling sad about something, look into why you are feeling sad. It might well be related to not having had an opportunity to create some negativity.

Feeling sad about not being able to engage in negativity specifically implies being sad about not having had an opportunity to engage in activities that are driven by strong attachment or aversion, in particular attachment. There are things that we want to accomplish purely out of attachment, and when we are not able to do that, we feel sad. When we really think about it from a Dharma point of view, how could anyone possibly consider themselves as a Dharma practitioner if they are constantly looking for opportunities to engage in activities associated with attachment and then feel sad when those opportunities don't arise? We often find people who claim they are doing something to help others, when in fact they are misleading themselves and in fact dragging them further into creating more negativity. That is not the act of a Dharma practitioner at all, is it?

Sometimes people complain about feeling lonely and say 'I feel lonely Geshe-la, I feel lonely!', and in a kind of naïve way I say, 'Well can't you find some people you can talk to. Don't you have some friends you can call up to chat with?' Then they respond by saying, 'Oh Geshe-la, you don't really understand the point; you don't understand what I am saying!' Then there are some who, even though they have a partner, say, 'Oh I feel lonely' and when I point out, 'You have a husband (or wife)', they reply, 'No Geshe-la, you don't understand!'

Apparently there was an occasion when His Holiness was meeting with a minister and Kevin Rudd, During their discussions apparently this the minister asked His Holiness, 'What is a secret happiness?' and His Holiness' responded, 'I don't know anything about that, I sleep all night!' This minister was also present during the recent annual event at the Loden Centre. When he was speaking to the gathering he quoted His Holiness the Dalai Lama and spoke highly about him. On that occasion I didn't get to speak with him, but he had come up and chatted to me on previous occasions.

2. CONTEMPLATING EXTENSIVELY THE BENEFITS OF BODHICITTA

This section is sub-divided into four categories:

- 2.1. Explaining the benefits of bodhicitta
- 2.2. Identifying the nature of bodhicitta
- 2.3. The reason why it has these benefits
- 2.4. Praising the person who meditates on bodhicitta

2.1. Explaining the benefits of bodhicitta

This has three sub-divisions:

- 2.1.1. It has the power to destroy all negativity and accomplish all virtues
- 2.1.2 One will become special in name and meaning
- 2.1.3 Explaining the benefits with example

2.1.1. It has the power to destroy all negativity and accomplish all virtues

This is further sub-divided into three:

- 2.1.1.1. Destroying great negativity
- 2.1.1.2. It can accomplish supreme virtue
- 2.1.1.3. It can accomplish one's wishes

2.1.1.1. DESTROYING GREAT NEGATIVITY

Having previously indicated that it is suitable to abandon negativity and to accomplish virtue, bodhicitta is explained here as being the best way to destroy great negativity. The remainder of verse six reads:

*6bcd. And powerful negativity dreadful
How can this be overcome by other virtue
That is not the mind of enlightenment?*

As well as sufficing for accumulating the greatest merit and bodhicitta also suffices for purifying the heaviest negative karmas.

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

It is appropriate to meditate on the two bodhicittas [aspiring bodhicitta and engaging bodhicitta], because how could this dreadful negativity, which is the cause of the lower realms, be overcome by any other virtue that is not the mind striving for complete enlightenment? It cannot.

Nothing else can overcome dreadful negativity other than the mind striving for complete enlightenment. So the awakening mind is explained here as being the most supreme way to purify such heavy negative karmas as the five karmas of immediate retribution (or heinous crimes in some translations), which are an immediate cause to be born in the lower realms. Such unfortunate rebirths can be overcome by developing the bodhicitta.

Then Gyaltsab Je goes on to explain:

This does not relate primarily to the ultimate bodhicitta that can abandon the seed of the obscurations. Rather, it shows the benefit of conventional bodhicitta purifying the earlier accumulated causes for the lower realms, as well as cutting the continuity of later ones.

There may be room for some misunderstanding about how conventional bodhicitta could be a cause for purifying negative karma, when in fact it is ultimate bodhicitta that removes the seed of the obscurations. So Gyaltsab Je is stating that amongst other benefits, the benefit of conventional bodhicitta is that it also purifies earlier accumulated causes for rebirth in the lower realms as well as cutting the continuity of further ones.

The Tibetan term for purification has an additional connotation of training, which is also applied to the accumulation of virtue. Here engaging in the training of purifying negative karma means to engage in activities so that one does not have to experience the consequences of those negativities. The sign of purification is one that one does not experience the consequences of negativities. Whereas, training in virtue means to accumulate and further increase good deeds as causes for happiness.

At this point, it is good to remind ourselves that these points are not just some fancy presentation. Rather, we need take them to heart and apply them to our own practice, and thus adopt the essential points that are being presented here. They are not all that complex or profound, and their application is quite manageable.

We have just seen how the mind of enlightenment or bodhicitta is a cause to destroy great negativity, specifically throwing karma, which is the karma that is a specific cause of rebirth in the lower realms, or unfortunate rebirths. Now we will see how familiarising ourselves with, and then developing bodhicitta, is the optimum way to accomplish the highest virtues.

It is good to relate to these points in a practical way. Simply put, we don't wish to experience any suffering and we wish for happiness. In particular we don't wish to experience the great suffering of unfortunate rebirths, and bodhicitta will overpower the accumulated causes for that. If one were to question, 'If generating bodhicitta prevents me from experiencing suffering, will it also help me to experience happiness?'. Generating bodhicitta is a means to accomplish supreme virtue, which as explained previously, is the optimum cause for happiness. We need to relate this logical, systematic presentation to our own experience, aspirations and even questions. If we really pay attention to the manner of this presentation, we will notice the meticulous detail of the explanations.

A practical approach to generating real conviction in this presentation is to relate it to our own experiences. If we truly look into our own state of mind, we will all recognise that when we are in negative states of mind, we more readily engage in activities that will actually harm both ourselves and others. Even in everyday life, we see the truth of the law of cause and effect in relation to how non-virtuous or negative states of mind lead to undesirable consequences.

When we look into situations that are conducive for engagement with others or virtuous activity, we see that it is when we are in a positive state of mind that our relationships with others are good. Then we see the immediate cause and effect sequence between our state of mind or attitudes and the effects which are experienced. That is a good basis on which to begin to establish the possibility that the activities that we do now will definitely have an effect on our future lives.

If the altruistic attitude of love and compassion were to be developed then that would be the most powerful way to purify negativities that are the cause of our own suffering, as well as adopting the highest virtues that are the cause of our own happiness. When convinced of this, it becomes reasonable and necessary to develop bodhicitta.

Before we end the session let us now recite the long life prayer for Lama Zopa Rinpoche. I had some dreams of Rinpoche a few days ago and just yesterday I received a scarf and a gift from him, which is a bit of a coincidence. So he must have also been thinking about me. I took that as a sign that it would be good for us to do some prayers to remove obstacles to his health.

We recite the long life prayer and dedicate our merits so that every obstacle and hindrances to Rinpoche's long life will be completely removed, and for the flourishing of his virtuous Dharma activities. It would be rather narrow-minded just to think, 'I am doing this prayer because Lama Zopa Rinpoche is my guru' or because 'he is Tara Institute's spiritual guide and guru'. It is much more worthwhile to think, 'If Lama Zopa Rinpoche were to have a good health and a stable long life, his virtuous Dharma activities would proliferate and increase, which brings benefit to many sentient beings'. Making aspirational prays for Lama Zopa Rinpoche's long life so that he may continue to benefit many sentient beings is much more relevant and beneficial.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་མ་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

9 April 2013

With the motivation that we generated during the recitation of the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

We have just attempted to train our mind in giving happiness to other sentient beings, which is based on love, and taking up the suffering of other sentient beings, based on compassion. We can use these very positive intentions, to generate the motivation for receiving the teachings as well: May the benefit that I gain from listening to the teachings become a cause for the well-being and benefit of all sentient beings and may the Buddha's teachings flourish and remain for a long time. With that intention in mind we can now engage in listening to the teaching. Just as the listeners generate a positive motivation, as the teacher, I also, from my side, need to generate that same motivation as best as I can. I might be sitting on a throne and higher than you, but in terms of motivation I am down at the same level as you are.

2. CONTEMPLATING EXTENSIVELY THE BENEFITS OF BODHICITTA

2.1. Explaining the benefits of bodhicitta

2.1.1. It has the power to destroy all negativity and accomplish all virtues (cont.)

2.1.1.2. IT CAN ACCOMPLISH SUPREME HAPPINESS

Later in the text there will be a more extensive definition of supreme happiness, but basically the ultimate state of happiness refers to actualising the two bodies of an enlightened being.

The relevant verse reads:

7. The powerful able ones, who have contemplated this

For eons, see this alone as beneficial.

Through it an immeasurable number of beings

Easily accomplish supreme happiness.

The powerful able ones refers to the enlightened beings of the past who, over a long period of time, contemplated how to accomplish the supreme and ultimate happiness that is the enlightened mind of bodhicitta. This is also a personal instruction indicating that meditating on bodhicitta is the best way to accomplish the ultimate benefit for ourselves and others. We need to apply it to our own practice, rather than expecting others to do it.

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je elaborates on the meaning of this verse:

It is appropriate to strive to meditate on bodhicitta because the able ones who, over countless eons, thought deeply about what is beneficial for sentient beings, and the method with which to achieve that benefit, see only this mind of enlightenment as beneficial.

The term Able One is way of referring to Buddha Shakyamuni. Here, it indicates that prior to achieving enlightenment, Buddha Shakyamuni spent countless eons over countless lifetimes practising on the path leading to enlightenment. Having contemplated the best way to benefit suffering beings and to alleviate all forms of suffering, Buddha Shakyamuni found the mind of bodhicitta to be the most beneficial. The term only this mind is an expression indicating that among the many techniques and methods for benefitting sentient beings, the mind of enlightenment is the most beneficial. At a personal level, this is an exhortation to us to strive to develop that mind of enlightenment ourselves.

Gyaltsab Je then goes on to say further:

This very bodhicitta is the seed with which an immeasurable number of sentient beings can easily and happily accomplish supreme happiness, without having to rely on austerities such as tearing out one's hair and so forth.

It is as was said: Going from happiness to happiness; knowing the mind, who will be lazy?

It is not necessary to adopt the extreme measure of practising austerities such as tearing out one's hair and so forth in order to accomplish supreme happiness. Rather, the ultimate method is to meditate on the supreme mind of bodhicitta, and further develop and increase that mind.

As emphasised in the commentary, this very bodhicitta is the seed with which an immeasurable number of sentient beings can be led to happiness. Once the mind of enlightenment or bodhicitta is developed, it implants the seed that will lead one swiftly to the state of enlightenment, where one can accomplish the welfare of all living beings and thus benefit them. The essence of bodhicitta is that it is the seed that will develop into the ultimate fruit of enlightenment, which is what we need to strive to achieve.

As the basis of that seed is loving kindness that is where we need to begin our practice. When one has developed genuine loving kindness, then the wish to benefit others will naturally arise, and whatever other activities we engage in will be very meaningful. As the great master Lama Tsong Khapa said, 'If one has a kind mind, then the practices that establish the grounds and paths will also be gentle and good. If, on the other hand, one has an evil or negative mind, then whatever grounds or paths one establishes will also be unsuitable'. So developing a kind heart and an attitude of loving kindness is essential. That is what we really need to contemplate.

2.1.1.3. IT CAN ACCOMPLISH ONE'S WISHES

The verse relating to this is:

8. Those wishing to eliminate the hundredfold suffering of cyclic existence

Wishing to clear the unhappiness of sentient beings and

Wanting to enjoy a hundredfold of happiness

Should never give up the mind of enlightenment.

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this verse by reemphasising the essential point that without developing bodhicitta there is no way one can fulfil the needs of others, or to bring about the ultimate benefit for them.

It is appropriate to meditate on bodhicitta since it is the supreme method for accomplishing the purpose of self and others.

As explained previously, love and compassion is the basis for developing bodhicitta. We could not possibly go about helping others without a sense of the love that wishes others will gain genuine ultimate happiness, and the compassion that wishes for all beings to be free from suffering. If we are to achieve our goal then it is essential that we develop the mind of bodhicitta.

In relation to explaining how this actually accomplishes the purpose of self and others, Gyalsab Je explains:

Having trained in the practices of a medium capable being, one wishes to destroy the hundredfold suffering of cyclic existence in one's continuum; having trained in the motivation of a great capable being, one wishes to clear away the unhappiness of all sentient beings.

In the teachings common to the medium scope, the suffering of birth, sickness, ageing and death is explained in great detail. Having contemplated how we will have to experience these sufferings again and again for as long as we remain in cyclic existence, we develop the keen wish to be completely free from cyclic existence. Thus, by overcoming the sufferings of cyclic existence, one accomplishes one's own purpose. Then, having trained in the motivation and practices of the great capable being, one develops the strong wish to clear away the unhappiness and suffering of all sentient beings. Thinking about their plight, we generate the distinct mind of wishing that all living beings to be free from all forms of suffering. In this way we accomplish the purpose of others.

Then the commentary goes on to say:

Regardless of whether one wishes to enjoy the hundredfold happiness of higher status or definite goodness, there is no better method. One should generate bodhicitta alone, and never give it up, or let it degenerate.

There is no better method to achieve the happiness of higher status or definite goodness than developing bodhicitta, which is based on love and compassion. We might not have developed bodhicitta yet, but we do have the basis of love and compassion within our own hearts. In order to transform basic love and compassion into bodhicitta, first we need to firmly establish the love and compassion that is within our heart, then further increase it and develop it so that it turns into unconditional and unbiased love and compassion for all beings. The more we train in this, the firmer it becomes, it further increases, and will less likely degenerate. This is how we can use this explanation as a personal instruction.

As I have shared with you previously, the most practical approach, appropriate at our level, is to develop the following attitude on a daily basis: 'I will not harm any living being in the slightest manner and I will do my utmost to benefit other living beings in the best possible way'. This attitude can then be complemented with the thought: 'I will take the personal responsibility for freeing all living beings from every suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness'.

The more we generate this thought, and the more we familiarise ourselves with it, the closer we will get to actually developing bodhicitta. While I can't claim that engaging in some other form of practice while neglecting to familiarise our mind with these basic attitudes will prevent you from developing bodhicitta, I can say that it will be hard for one to get any closer to developing bodhicitta. If one does not familiarise one's mind with these basic attitudes then the very basis of developing bodhicitta will be missing. Thus the most practical way to engage in developing bodhicitta is to familiarise ourselves with this attitude of loving kindness on a regular basis.

Adopting the determination, 'I will not harm any living being in the slightest way and I will do the best I can to benefit other sentient beings' serves as the best basis for developing bodhicitta. If I recall correctly, on an occasion when His Holiness was teaching in Bodhgaya he mentioned that this attitude will suffice for a bodhicitta attitude for ordinary beings. He definitely did emphasise the importance of developing this attitude. His Holiness always presents us with most practical ways to engage in practice.

While love and compassion serves as the basis for developing bodhicitta, on another practical level it definitely serves as an antidote for overcoming delusions such as intense anger, strong attachments, jealousy and so forth. The more we familiarise our mind with these attitudes of benefitting others and not harming any living being, the more we are developing a direct opponent to the self-cherishing mind, which is the basis for all delusions. When the self-cherishing mind itself is opposed, the mind of cherishing other beings is further developed and there is not much room for manifest delusions to arise. This is the most practical benefit of adopting love and compassion as our daily practice.

As I regularly mention, I haven't really developed any great realisations as such, but I do try to familiarise myself with this attitude of love and compassion in my everyday activities. Whether I am sitting or trying to engage in prayers, or I am moving about outside, or even when I am taking a shower, I try to occupy my mind constantly with thoughts of not harming other sentient beings in any way and benefitting others in the best way I can. From the little experience I have in developing these attitudes, I definitely find that they help to overcome delusions. So I can confidently share with you that the practical result of having attempted to practice in this way is that I do have a happy mind now. Wherever I go I seem to be able to maintain a happy attitude and a happy mind, and I attribute that to my attempts to engage in these practices.

I consider these attitudes to be my best friend. In terms of wealth, these attitudes are the best possessions that I own, and they are the best guide and teacher. I don't know if I am missing the mark and have it all wrong, but I definitely seem to find some personal benefit. Some might remark 'Well that is a crazy geshe's attitude!', however it is not uncommon for practitioners to be called crazy. Even great practitioners such as the renowned master Ensapa was called crazy as was Milarepa the most famous hermit.

I was about to relate a story about Milarepa and his sister, but we might get side-tracked and so you can look it up for yourselves.

Through our meagre attempts to develop a genuine mind of loving kindness, our minds will naturally be transformed, and we will become more gentle and kinder. But such a mind does not develop naturally or appear spontaneously, or as a result of practices of mere austerity. We have to actually make the effort to familiarise ourselves with these positive attitudes. That is why I exhort you and remind you again and again of the importance of paying attention to this practice of developing loving kindness.

2.1.2. One will become special in name and meaning

This section explains how the transformation achieved through the mind of bodhicitta influences the way one will be known.

The relevant verse reads:

9. *Should one generate bodhicitta. Then in one instant
Those pitiful ones bound in the prison of cyclic existence will be Referred to as the children of the tatagatas,
And become objects of prostration for worldly gods and humans.*

The first part of Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse says:

Should one generate the wishing and engaging bodhicitta, one will instantaneously attain the distinguished name 'child of the tatagatas' ...

The moment one generates wishing and engaging bodhicitta one will be considered as a child of the tatagatas, or child of the buddhas. As explained previously, just as the son of the king is held in high regard because he holds the royal lineage of the king and the royal family, being a child of the tatagatas means being a suitable vessel to carry on the lineage of the buddhas. Thus the buddhas consider it appropriate to bestow on such beings the essential teachings, meanings and so forth.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

... and as the meaning of the name indicates, one will become an object of prostrations for worldly gods and humans.

Just as their name indicates, children of the tathagatas will become an object of veneration, offerings and so forth by humans and gods alike.

Then, Gyaltsab Je explains:

It is not only the bodhisattvas who have entered the great grounds that have these qualities, but...

This relates to a natural doubt that that these great qualities are only befitting for bodhisattvas who have reached the higher grounds, and as such they do not relate to us personally. In response to this doubt, Gyaltsab Je states:

...also the pitiful ones bound to the prison of cyclic existence by affliction and karma attain these benefits instantly, the moment they generate bodhicitta.

This will be elaborated later in the text. In terms of a suitable basis, any individual being is capable of developing this, be they male or female, of high status or low status, rich or poor, from any kind of social background or lineage; anyone one who has the appropriate conditions is a suitable basis for developing bodhicitta. The very moment bodhicitta is developed they become the object of veneration, because all the qualities mentioned previously are obtained. So the essential point here is that everyone has the potential to develop bodhicitta and become special in name and meaning. There is no discrimination based on gender, status, race and so forth.

That concludes the benefits of bodhicitta.

2.1.3 Explaining the benefits with analogies

The six benefits of developing bodhicitta are described using analogies.

2.1.3.1. Analogy showing how the lesser becomes supreme

2.1.3.2. Analogy showing its rarity and preciousness

2.1.3.3. Analogy showing the unending and increasing result

2.1.3.4. Analogy showing its ability to rescue from great danger

2.1.3.5. Analogy showing how it destroys negativity effortlessly

2.1.3.6. The benefits that are explained in the sutras

2.1.3.1. ANALOGY SHOWING HOW THE LESSER BECOMES SUPREME

The verse relating to this reads:

10. *Like the supreme elixir that makes gold,
Having taken this impure body, it transforms it
Into the priceless precious body of a conqueror;
Hence, strongly hold that called 'mind of enlightenment'.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains that:

Having contemplated these benefits and generated that which is called the mind of enlightenment, one should hold onto it firmly.

Again, this is an exhortation to take these explanations of the benefits of bodhicitta as a personal instruction. We need to think like this: 'I must do my utmost to develop bodhicitta because of its great benefits, and whatever bodhicitta I have developed, I need to establish firmly and further increase it'. We need to pay heed to this advice and really take it to heart.

The analogy presented is that:

Just like one *sang*¹ of supreme gold transforming elixir can transform one thousand sang of iron into gold, this mind can transform this body that one has taken, impure both from the point of view of cause and nature, into the priceless precious body of a conqueror.

In Tibetan, the first line of the verse refers to having taken this impure body, which refers to being impure from the point of view of both cause and nature. We don't have to go into detail now but the cause of our body was substances from our parents, which are not normally considered as being clean substances. Whichever way we look at it our body is, by its very nature neither a clean object nor pure in nature. The words having taken have the subtle implication that one has taken this impure body repeatedly, again and again. So the contaminated body that we have is impure both from the point of view of cause and nature.

We have taken this body over and over again in the past and for as long as cause and the conditions are intact, we will have to further take it again and again in the future. When the mind of enlightenment is further developed it can transform this impure body into the priceless precious body of a conqueror.

In the analogy Gyaltsab Je explains that a small portion of supreme gold transforming elixir can transform one thousand sang of iron into gold. Similarly, when one develops the mind of enlightenment or bodhicitta, that mind can transform this impure body that has to take rebirth again and again, into the precious body of a conqueror or a buddha.

Finally, Gyaltsab Je makes reference to the sutras.

The Array of Stalks sums up the benefits of bodhicitta with the example:

One sang of mercury, which appears as gold, can transform one thousand sang of iron into gold.

The main point being presented here is that bodhicitta serves as an elixir that can transform an impure or contaminated body into a pure or uncontaminated one. To go a bit further, on the hearer and solitary realiser paths, when the being on the path of preparation transcends to the next path, which is the path of seeing, their contaminated body remains intact. In other words the being on the hearer and solitary realiser path who reaches the path of seeing becomes an arya or noble being but still retains a contaminated body. Whereas, on the Great Vehicle's path, when the bodhisattva on the path of preparation attains the path of seeing their very contaminated physical body transforms into an uncontaminated body. That physical transformation takes place due to the bodhisattvas having the extra quality of bodhicitta in their mental continuum, which hearers and solitary realisers don't have. While I haven't seen this specific explanation in other teachings, in my view this has to be the reason for the difference and relates to the point being explained here.

2.1.3.2. ANALOGY SHOWING ITS RARITY AND PRECIOUSNESS

The verse which relates to this is:

11. It is very precious since the sole captain of migrators
Investigated well with immeasurable awareness.
Those who wish to be free from the place of migration
Should hold well onto the precious bodhicitta.

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Those who wish to be free from all faults of cyclic existence, the place of migrators, should hold well onto the precious bodhicitta and protect it from degeneration like a powerful king of jewels.

Those who wish to be free from the faults of cyclic existence, in the place of migrators specifically relates to the six types of realms that beings migrate to. Those who wish to be free from all of the faults of the six realms should hold well onto the precious bodhicitta and protect it from degeneration, just like those who have found a powerful king of jewels.

Gyaltsab Je further explains:

Like the skilful captain, who brought the merchants to the jewel island, the unequalled sole captain of migrators, the Buddha, with his immeasurable wisdom awareness, investigated thoroughly what the best method may be to eliminate the poverty of migrators, and saw that only bodhicitta was that precious, meaning that it is rare and extremely beneficial method.

Just like the analogy of a captain who guides merchants to the jewel island the unequalled sole captain of migrators (i.e. living beings in the six realms), the Buddha with his immeasurable wisdom awareness (referring to the omniscient mind of the Buddha), having investigated thoroughly what the best method may be to eliminate the poverty of migrators, saw that bodhicitta was rare and precious and the most beneficial method for alleviating the sufferings of the migrators of the six realms.

The Buddha's omniscient wisdom does not have the slightest fault in the way it perceives and distinguishes phenomena. So there is not even the slightest fault in the Buddha's mind, because of that omniscient wisdom. When that wisdom looks into what would be the most beneficial way to alleviate the suffering of sentient beings, the Buddha sees that bodhicitta is the ultimate method. If we have faith in the Buddha, then we know that he sees everything just as it is, properly and correctly. Since he said that bodhicitta is the most precious and beneficial way to benefit sentient beings, we need to strive to develop that mind for ourselves.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

16 April 2013

Based on the motivation that we generated when we recited the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in the practice of meditation.

For this meditation, we imagine that we are surrounded by all sentient beings who are deprived of happiness and experiencing various forms of suffering. We generate the wish for them to abide in happiness and, based on love, imagine giving our own happiness to them. Then we focus on their suffering, and generate the wish that they not experience any suffering, and based on compassion, we imagine taking upon ourselves all their suffering. This is how we can engage the meditation practice. [meditation]

The motivation for engaging in the teaching also needs to be based on love and compassion. So we can generate this motivation:

In order to benefit all sentient beings, to liberate them from all suffering and to lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put into practice well whatever I understand from it.

As I regularly emphasise, in addition to our meagre attempts to develop love and compassion in our meditation, it is essential that we try to maintain and strengthen that sense of love and compassion in our everyday life. Personally, I attempt to do this practice regularly, and I encourage you to do so as well. As I have mentioned over and over again, the most valuable companion we can have is this quality of love and compassion and loving kindness within our own heart. In fact, if we secure this most valuable companion within our own heart, then we will not be deprived of external companions. Conversely, if we harbour the delusions or negative states of mind such as intense anger, attachment, jealousy and so forth, then it will not be possible to find good external companions and friendship.

If we are obsessed with delusions such as intense anger and attachment, then the companions we find will naturally be ones who harbour anger and attachments as well. Even if they were not initially dominated by strong delusions such as anger and attachment, our own negativity will start to rub off on them, changing them into an angry person. If we are infested with strong attachments, that naturally influences others, and brings out attachments within them. If we harbour intense anger within our own mind, then when we relate to others it will naturally be out of anger, which triggers the anger in their mind and they too will start to become angry as well. It's the same with jealousy. If we have a very jealous mind, and discuss things with others out of jealousy, then that will naturally arouse jealousy in their minds. These situations occur as a result of not having overcome delusions in one's mind. Whenever we encounter objects of delusions they serve as a trigger for our delusions to arise, which that is why the delusions seem to arise very easily.

We need to use our rational and logical mind to see how our own delusions can trigger the manifestation of delusions in the minds of others. If you have strong attachment and anger you will end up having to deal with friends who also have strong attachments and anger. Conversely, if we practise love and compassion with a genuine intention, then that will become a positive trigger for positive states of mind to arise within others. Therefore, as I remind you again and again, we need to begin with those in our immediate surroundings and practise expressing genuine loving kindness in our speech, mannerisms and so forth. That will definitely contribute to the development of a genuinely calm and harmonious relationship with our companions and others. On a practical level these are really good points to think about.

In the event that our companion becomes angry or says inappropriate things in a state of anger, if we take the initiative to remain gentle and calm, it can have the positive effect of calming down our angry companion too. This is a very practical approach. I can relate a personal story about this. I had a very good childhood friend in Tibet called Tinley Dhargye. He was not able to escape with us to India and was imprisoned, and later passed away in prison. He was really very faithful and loyal friend but he was known to be a bit short-tempered. However, despite being easily irritated he was also known to be really good-hearted. Knowing that he trusted me, I would sometimes provoke him by playing pranks on him. When he was falling asleep, I would put odd things in his mouth, and when he woke up he would immediately become very angry, and sometimes he would even strike me. But when I just smiled and laughed, he couldn't really respond to that with anger. Eventually he became less and less irritated and he even began to participate in those pranks himself. This is yet another example of how, with a genuine concern and without anger from our side, we can help others to overcome their short temperedness, sometimes even by provoking and teasing them.

Reflecting on the great benefits of bodhicitta will encourage us to further develop it in our own minds. While we might not have yet developed uncontrived bodhicitta, we do, to a certain extent, have a contrived aspect of bodhicitta within our hearts. At its most basic level we all have the inclination of not wanting to intentionally hurt others and wanting to benefit others in any way we can. We all feel uncomfortable when we see others who are hurt, and we all have wish to help others. When these intentions become purer and more unconditional, then the mind moves closer and closer to developing actual bodhicitta. We need to look at our current state in a practical way. We may not have developed uncontrived bodhicitta, but we can definitely use what we already have as a substitute for that. We can use our inclination of not wanting to harm others and wishing to benefit them as a basis of our reflection. When we think about this again and again throughout the day, wherever we are, the more familiar we become with this positive attitude, and the stronger and firmer it will be established in our mindstream.

2.1.3.3. ANALOGY SHOWING THE UNENDING AND INCREASING RESULT

12. *All other virtues, similar to the plantain tree
Are exhausted upon bearing fruit.
Since the fruit tree of bodhicitta constantly
Bears fruits, it is not exhausted but increases.*

In his commentary on the text Gyalsab Je opens his explanation of the meaning of the verse with these words:

It is also appropriate for those who wish for unceasing and increasing virtue to meditate on bodhicitta.

This is another very meticulous explanation of the benefits of developing bodhicitta. Virtue is defined as that which brings about pleasant results. We all want pleasant and good results, and as that comes from virtue we have an impetus to engage in accumulating virtue. Here, in a most practical way, we are being advised that for those who wish for unceasing and increasing virtue, it is also appropriate to meditate on bodhicitta.

While this will be explained more extensively later on, we can reflect here on how we can engage in accumulating vast amounts of virtue. As mentioned previously, while we may have not developed an uncontrived bodhicitta mind, we can, by intentionally making some effort, develop our love and compassion—wishing all beings to be free from all suffering and wishing them ultimate happiness—into a strong aspiration to achieve enlightenment. We can combine our practice of accumulating virtue with the bodhicitta attitude by thinking, ‘May whatever virtuous activities I engage in become a cause for achieving enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings’. We try our utmost to maintain this bodhicitta attitude, even if it a contrived one, while we are engaging in the virtuous action and at the end dedicate it with a bodhicitta attitude. As mentioned previously, although the contrived state of bodhicitta at our level requires some effort, it is the seed of actual bodhicitta. So we must not underestimate the value of developing even a contrived level of bodhicitta attitude in our practice. We need to really keep that in mind and make every effort to develop it further.

To put it in a very simple way, there is nothing to lose but much to gain from generating the bodhicitta attitude. Indeed, far from any loss, there is only benefit, in this life as well as in all future lifetimes. This practical approach will encourage us to develop the bodhicitta attitude to the best of our ability.

In his commentary Gyalsab Je then explains why this is appropriate:

Virtues that are not held by bodhicitta are like the plantain tree, whose ability to produce a fruit is exhausted after it produces one.

Here the plantain or banana plant is used as an analogy. The plantain produces only one crop of fruit after which it perishes. A new plant has to spring up before it can produce fruit again. The analogy is that if whatever virtues one accumulates are not accompanied with a bodhicitta attitude, then when the result of that virtue is experienced, then that will be it! There will be no further results of that virtue. Applying that at a personal level, our present human rebirth is a result of virtue, and the good conditions we have now are also the result of past virtue. If our virtuous actions with these good conditions are not accompanied by the bodhicitta attitude, we will use up all our good karma now, and our human life will end here. So our good karma will be like the plantain tree which produces fruit only once: we have a human rebirth this one time, and it will be very hard to obtain it again. Whereas if we utilise the bodhicitta attitude in our life, and develop and increase it with the good conditions that we have now, then our virtuous actions in this very life will produce more human rebirths in future lifetimes.

As Gyalsab Je states in his commentary:

On the other hand, the tree of bodhicitta produces fruits unceasingly. Like the wish-fulfilling tree it increases more and more.

A wish-fulfilling tree is a mystical tree that produces fruit unceasingly. The more you take from it the more it produces, and the fruit is never exhausted. That wish-fulfilling tree is an analogy showing how the accumulation of virtue is increased with a bodhicitta attitude. Rather than being exhausted, the virtue increases evermore. So we can see how incredibly valuable the bodhicitta attitude is.

It is because of their bodhicitta that bodhisattvas are able to come back again and again to this world with all the perfect conditions, to continuously benefit sentient beings. For example, the practice of morality for bodhisattvas is the means to accumulate great merit to obtain a good rebirth such as a human rebirth with all of the perfect conditions intact. The bodhisattva’s practice of generosity is the optimum cause to acquire good resources, great wealth and so forth in the future, as a way to continuously benefit other sentient beings. The practice of patience is the optimum cause for the bodhisattva’s charismatic features and qualities and so forth, which again serves as a means to benefit other sentient beings. In this way, all of the bodhisattvas’ practices of serve as the optimum causes to obtain all the perfect conditions, rebirth after rebirth, all the way up to enlightenment, where they will be able to benefit all sentient beings in the optimum way. More extensive explanations will come later, but it is good to reflect on these points now.

Finally, in order to back up the earlier explanation, Gyalsab Je quotes from the Sutra of Inexhaustible Wisdom:

The Sutra of Inexhaustible Wisdom states:

Just as a drop of water that falls into the ocean abides until the end of an eon, the virtue that is dedicated for enlightenment remains until the essence of enlightenment is fulfilled. It does not cease.

This quote from the sutra presents another very vivid analogy. When a drop of water falls into an incredibly vast ocean it merges with the water of the ocean. The only way that the drop of water could be exhausted would be for the whole ocean to dry up. So, because of the vastness of the ocean, the drop of water abides until the end of an eon, which is an incredibly long time. Likewise the essence of whatever virtue one has accumulated and dedicated to enlightenment, will not be exhausted and the seed of it will remain until one actually achieves enlightenment. The main point to derive as a personal instruction is: this: if we generate a bodhicitta motivation to the best of our ability before engaging in any practice, then remind ourselves of the bodhicitta attitude again and again during the practice, and dedicate our practice with the bodhicitta attitude at the end, then that will seal our virtue so that it becomes unceasing and increases more and more.

To take that further, Lama Tsong Khapa says in his teachings that we should not neglect or underestimate the value of virtue and gravity of negativity no matter how small they may be. In the sutras the Buddha himself mentions that we should not underestimate the gravity of even the smallest negativity. The Buddha presented the analogy that they are like the small spark that ignites a fire, which can cause great destruction. Likewise, one should not neglect or underestimate the value of small virtues, for just as small drops of water eventually fill a large container, small virtues can accumulate to achieve great results. The analogies the Buddha used are very practical and straightforward, and easy to understand because they relate to our own experiences.

We can see how skilfully the Buddha used analogies that are relevant to our own experiences. For example, in the Black Saturday bushfires, I heard that many houses were set alight not by the fire itself but by small sparks that were carried on the wind. We can also relate the analogy of filling a huge container with drops of water to saving money. If we consider one dollar as having little value and don't bother saving any dollar coins, we might never be able to save any significant amount of money! On the other hand if we take an initiative to start saving a dollar at a time, we might eventually be able to save up $1000. So, in this way we can see that the Buddha presented so many great analogies with logical reasons to help us become more intelligent, and accomplish what we wish for.

The really significant point here is to understand how the Buddha used skilful means to guide us. He didn't exhort us to go to great lengths in order to accumulate virtue, which could potentially overwhelm us. Rather, he exhorts us to avoid creating small negativities and adopting small virtues. Thus the Buddha showed us really practical ways of accumulating virtue as methods for us to begin our practice by taking small steps at a time. Engaging in small manageable virtues at a time becomes a cause for us to accumulate great virtues, and reap great positive results in the future.

2.1.3.4. ANALOGY SHOWING ITS ABILITY TO RESCUE US FROM GREAT DANGER

The verse relating to this reads as follows:

13. *Even having generated extremely terrible negativities,
One becomes liberated from them instantaneously if one relies on it,
Like from great dangers in dependence on a brave one.
Why do the conscientious not rely on it?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Why don't the conscientious, who are patient concerning what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned, rely on bodhicitta? It would be appropriate to do so.

Here Gyaltsab Je reframes the question posed in the verse: Why don't the conscientious, who are patient concerning what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned, rely on bodhicitta? Then Gyaltsab Je answers Shantideva's rhetorical question with, it would be appropriate to do so, and explains his reasoning.

If one has created very frightful negativity such as harming the Three Jewels or creating the five immediate karmas then, by generating the mind of enlightenment, one can become free from the fears of the lower realms in an instant. It is like relying on a powerful brave person to protect one from the fears of a very dangerous road.

Here, the heavy negative karmas such as those created by showing disrespect to, or criticising the Three Jewels, are described as frightful. Other heavy negative karmas are translated here as the five immediate karmas, which are also known as the five heinous crimes or the five karmas of immediate retribution. These include killing one's mother, killing one's father, drawing blood from a tathagata and so forth. They are so gravely negative that, if not purified, an unimaginable amount of suffering is to be experienced in the immediate next life as the result. We have definitely created these karmas in past lifetimes when we were completely ignorant. Even in this life, where we are quite intelligent and enjoy very good conditions, we find ourselves engaging in so many negativities and create so much negative karma. When we were completely ignorant, and in desperate situations, there would have been nothing to stop us from creating such grave heavy negative karmas. We still have the residue of those imprints in our mind now, so we need to take great measures to try to overcome those negative propensities. That is why it is appropriate for us to engage in practices of purification, most importantly by developing the bodhicitta attitude, which is one of the most powerful ways to overcome those negative karmas.

The way to become free from the fears of the lower realms is to overcome negative karmas by generating the mind of enlightenment or the bodhicitta attitude. The analogy presented here is that it is like relying on a powerful brave person who can protect one from the fears of a very dangerous road. If we have to travel along on a road known to be very dangerous, and we don't know the area at all, we will have to rely on a powerful person who can guide us across that treacherous and dangerous land. Similarly, bodhicitta can lead us away from fear of the lower realms.

In brief, bodhicitta has a two fold purpose: it serves as a powerful means to purify negative karma, as well as being the most powerful means to accumulate extensive merit. As explained in Nagarjuna's Commentary on Bodhicitta: The merits that a single being accumulates from developing bodhicitta even for a moment, is said to be so vast that all the buddhas and bodhisattvas in the ten directions are not able to describe the amount of merit that is obtained.

2.1.3.5. ANALOGY SHOWING HOW IT DESTROYS NEGATIVITY EFFORTLESSLY

There are two lines in relation to this heading:

14ab. *Like the fire at the end of the eon, the great negativities
Are completely burned up in an instant.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of this verse as follows:

If one has generated this mind, then one is endowed with great power to destroy negativity. Similar to the fire at the end of the eon destroying all the worlds below the first concentration, bodhicitta definitely burns the strong karma that causes rebirth in the lower realms in an instant.

The implication is that:

If it can destroy the power of karma that will definitely be experienced, then what need is there to mention that the karma that will not definitely be experienced will also be destroyed? The great trail blazers said that confession complete with the four opponent powers purifies the karma that will definitely be experienced.

To explain the analogy of the fire at the end of the eon destroying all the worlds below the first concentration, there are three main periods in the world system: the formation, the remaining duration, and then the end or the destruction of the world. It is said that the destruction of the world occurs with the fire that burns downwards from the first concentration, which destroys the world below that. Just as that great powerful fire destroys the world systems, likewise bodhicitta can definitely destroy the karmas that cause rebirth in the most unfortunate lower realms.

Next Gyaltsab Je explains that if it can destroy the power of karma that will definitely be experienced, then what need is there to mention that the karma which will not definitely be experienced will also be destroyed? There are various ways of explaining karmas that are definitely to be experienced. One of these refers to the three ways in which the karma is accumulated. The first of these is karma both caused and accumulated, and this is a karma where the results will definitely have to be experienced. The results of the next two, karma which is accumulated but not caused, and karma which is caused but not accumulated, will not definitely have to be experienced.

However it has also been explained in the teachings that when the four opponent powers are intact and applied in a purification practice, then whatever karma one has accumulated (even heavy negative karmas) will definitely not be experienced, as the appropriate measures for opposing those negative karmic imprints have been applied.

As explained here the great trail blazers Nagarjuna and Asanga have said that confession complete with the four opponent powers purifies the karma that will definitely be experienced.

This indicates that even karmas that are otherwise classified as definitely to be experienced, can be overcome when the four opponent powers when they are applied fully. These four opponent powers will be explained in more detail in the next chapter, which specifically deals with purification; meanwhile you can do some research and prepare yourself for the explanations that will be given in more detail then.

The commentary concludes by explaining that definitely to be experienced means that if one does not meditate or apply the antidote, it will definitely be experienced. This is established with both quotation and reasoning. Again, this relates to our own personal practice: we have had so many previous lifetimes where we were completely overwhelmed with negativities, ignorance and so forth and so there is no karma that we haven't adopted or engaged in. At this point in time, however, we are aware of that karma and so we can apply the antidotes and engage in purification practices to overcome those grave negative imprints that remain in our minds.

2.1.3.6. HOW THE BENEFITS ARE EXPLAINED IN THE SUTRAS

This heading is covered in the remaining lines of verse fourteen:

*14cd. Its boundless qualities
Were explained by the aware Maitreya to Sudhana.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

The mind of enlightenment definitely creates these benefits¹ because [as a way to back it up with a quotation from the sutras] Maitreya, who is endowed with awareness, explained these benefits and infinitely praised this mind in the Array of Stalks sutra to the bodhisattva Youthful Sudhana.

Then there is a quote from the Array of Stalks sutra:

The Array of Stalks Sutra has an extensive explanation:

Son of good family, the mind of enlightenment is like the seed of all enlightened dharmas. It is like a field because it increases the white dharmas of all migrators....it is like the pure vase because it perfectly accomplishes all thoughts. It is like a spear because it causes the downfall of the enemy of the afflictions.

These are just some of the analogies presented in the sutra, which has a much more extensive list.

The main point is that the benefits that were explained earlier were not made up by ordinary people, but they were actually presented by the Buddha himself in a sutra. So the benefits of bodhicitta come from an authentic source that one can rely upon.

As you are aware the next session will be the discussion evening. As usual I encourage you to do the discussion with good intention, in a spirit of sharing your understanding and knowledge, and further expanding one's own understanding. The week following that will be the test. That is also a very worthwhile activity to engage in with a good motivation.

Before we conclude with the usual dedication prayers, let us do the long life prayer for Lama Zopa Rinpoche. It is important that we make strong and fervent prayers for an authentic and genuine teacher such as Lama Zopa Rinpoche to have a long and stable life. For this is an immediate cause for the Buddha's teachings to remain for a long time to benefit many sentient beings in this world. His Holiness the Dalai Lama has emphasised the great importance of being able to distinguish a genuine teacher from a false one. So it is important to be cautious and apply the correct discernment.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱུང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

7 May 2013

As usual we will spend some time in meditation. The Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer that we have recited will suffice for our motivation. It's good to really think about the meaning of the lines in that prayer.

For the purposes of our practice it would be good to envision the objects of refuge, Buddha Shakyamuni surrounded by all gurus, buddhas and bodhisattvas, in the space before us. At the front, in the centre, we can envision all those beings towards whom we feel hostile. To the right we envision our father of this life surrounded by all relatives and friends of the male aspect, and to the left side our mother and all other relatives and friends of the female aspect. Surrounding these are an infinite number of sentient beings. As one engages in the tong len practice of giving and taking, envision receiving inspiration from the objects of refuge, and then engage in the practise of giving and taking in relation to the surrounding beings, who are the objects of our love and compassion. This ensures that we are doing a very good and appropriate practice.

As we become familiar with this visualisation, we will be able to use it whenever we recite the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer. When we commence the prayer we will be able to recall the objects of refuge in front of us and the objects of bodhicitta surrounding us. Also as we recite the prayer we can imagine ourselves to be like a chant leader, leading all other sentient beings surrounding us into taking refuge as well. As we sincerely take refuge in the objects of refuge we imagine that all beings surrounding us also take refuge in the objects of refuge and that we all receive the blessings. With this in mind we can now engage in the practice.

[meditation]

This is a very meaningful practice. As we engage in it we can generate the strong aspiration, 'May I be able to put this into practice. May I be able to actually implement this visualisation and make it an actual practice'. Then our meditation practice becomes really meaningful. We should not consider this a mere simple practice. It is, in fact, an incredibly meaningful and powerful practice. The teachings mention again and again that the root of all happiness lies in generating true love and compassion within one's heart. So this practice of tong len is definitely a very high level practice. Any practice that we engage in that is not based on love and compassion is only a practice that is sullied with personal interest and gains.

The more we familiarise ourselves with the practice of love and compassion, meditating and thinking about it again and again, the more it will help us to reduce anger towards others, which is a practical benefit for ourselves as well as others. That is because the practice of generating love and compassion in one's heart involves focussing on those sentient beings who are experiencing suffering, and who are deprived of happiness. So the more we familiarise our minds with their plight and wishing them not to experience any suffering, the more endearing and closer they become. Thus we begin to really open up our hearts to them.

As we progress with our practice, we slowly begin to transform that initial wish for sentient beings to be free from suffering and endowed with happiness into the state of taking on a personal responsibility for doing that ourselves. Thus we transform our love and compassion into superior intention, where we make the resolve, 'I will myself lead all sentient beings out of the state of all suffering and place them into the ultimate state of happiness'. Having developed this superior intention, we are now very close to developing the actual awakening mind. This is how we gradually develop our intention to benefit other sentient beings.

As mentioned previously, when we relate to the plight of those who are deprived of happiness and who are experiencing great suffering there is no room for an angry and hostile mind to arise. That is because our thoughts are filled with genuinely wanting them to experience happiness and not to experience any suffering. When we are feeling love and compassion, thoughts of anger cannot arise. Likewise, thinking in this way will definitely help to overcome feelings of jealousy, contempt, competitiveness and so forth towards other beings. Through this practice these kinds of negative attitudes will definitely be overcome. So we can see how, as we develop our mind and improve it further, what seems like a simple practice is really a profound one. This is the way to progress on the path to enlightenment.

Of course the very reason we engage in the practice of meditating on love and compassion is so that we can implement it when we actually interact with others. We need to remind ourselves again and again, that the whole purpose of meditating on love and compassion is so that we can integrate and apply it in our daily lives. When we come out of our formal meditation practice and begin to interact with others, we need to ensure that our interactions are actually based on the sense of love and compassion with which we have been familiarising ourselves with during the meditation sessions. If we do this sincerely with a strong commitment, then the positive effect of our meditation will indeed extend into our everyday lives where we interact with other beings. This is how we need to actually engage in the practice.

I emphasise these points regularly as a way to remind you that these are essential practices—they are the very practices we need to take to heart. The teachings remind us again and again that love and compassion is the very basis for every Dharma practice. So we need to actually implement this advice in our own practices.

During the recent Easter course there was someone who said she used to come here regularly. She confided that she had practised meditation for over ten years, but her practice had lapsed for a while. However she has taken it up again recently. She said that while she is able to maintain her focus during meditation for about half an hour and even up to an hour at times with no problems, she reverts to being grumpy and irritated as soon as she comes out of her meditation. She was being very truthful about her difficulties in maintaining her practice.

Being truthful like that is far better than being pretentious about not being affected by the world. Others may not detect what is going on, but affecting this pretentious calm and cool attitude when there is actually internal irritation can harm our progress. It is far better to be honest about the failings in our practice. When we are honest about where we are at, then when we listen to the teachings and receive advice, it can really hit the mark and help us to transform our mind.

This situation of not being able to extend our calm state of mind during meditation into the post-meditation state, arises because of not maintaining mindfulness and introspection out of the meditation session. It is because we have not maintained mindfulness and introspection outside the meditation session that the faults of becoming agitated and grumpy occur.

As I have mentioned previously, someone else confided in me that although he had been familiar with the meditation practice for over ten years, he had never heard about the specifics of applying mindfulness and introspection in meditation. He said it was really incredible when he was introduced to it. How had he missed this essential point?

2.1 Explaining the benefits of bodhicitta

Having heard of the benefits in detail, one will then feel inspired to develop bodhicitta. The way the text next introduces the nature of bodhicitta is really very skilful. Here, we can note the meticulous presentation of the great master Shantideva. Firstly he inspires us by explaining the benefits of bodhicitta, and then he explains what the nature of bodhicitta is.

2.2. Identifying the nature of bodhicitta

This heading has three divisions:

2.2.1. Divisions by nature

2.2.2. Explaining the divisions with an example

2.2.3. Explaining the difference between the benefits of the wishing and engaging minds

2.2.1. Divisions by nature

The divisions of bodhicitta by nature are presented in this verse:

15. *The mind of enlightenment, if summed up,
Should be known in two aspects:
The mind wishing for enlightenment and
The one engaging in enlightenment.*

Of course these two divisions of bodhicitta have been presented many times in previous teachings to older students.

The explanation in Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Take the subject 'the generation of the mind of supreme enlightenment': by way of nature it should be known in brief in two aspects—the mind focusing on wishing for enlightenment, and the mind focusing on engaging in enlightenment.

Thus, there are two divisions of bodhicitta by nature: wishing bodhicitta and engaging bodhicitta.

Next Gyaltsab Je presents this definition of bodhicitta:

The definition of the Mahayana mind generation is the mind that accompanies the aspiration to achieve complete enlightenment for the purpose of others.

This of course is an abbreviated definition; we have gone over the more detailed definition of the Mahayana mind generation in previous teachings.¹ However, the definition of the Mahayana mind generation presented here is that it is the mind that accompanies the aspiration to achieve complete enlightenment for the purpose of others.

Here we need to take note that within the divisions of mind and mental factors, bodhicitta is a primary mind and thus not a mental factor. It is however accompanied by the mental factor of aspiration which is of two-fold: the aspiration to benefit other sentient beings and the aspiration to achieve enlightenment oneself.

The first aspiration is the aspiration to benefit others, which is generated within one's mind-stream on the basis of having developed love and compassion and superior intention. From that follows the aspiration to achieve enlightenment oneself for the sake of all sentient beings. This is the actual aspiration that accompanies bodhicitta. In other words, in order to fulfil the aspiration to benefit other sentient beings, one needs to first fulfil the aspiration of achieving enlightenment oneself. Thus we need to obtain enlightenment first in order to benefit others to the fullest extent. This is an essential point that we need to recognise and understand.

In summary, the Mahayana mind generation or bodhicitta is a primary mind that is accompanied by two aspirations. The aspiration to benefit others is the causal aspiration, whereas the aspiration to attain complete enlightenment is the resultant aspiration that accompanies bodhicitta. Thus the aspiration to achieve enlightenment is that which accompanies bodhicitta, i.e. the mind of supreme enlightenment.

As mentioned previously, in terms of development, the aspiration to benefit others is generated first followed by the aspiration to achieve enlightenment for oneself. In terms of obtaining the results, one first obtains the state of enlightenment and will then be able to lead other sentient beings to the state of enlightenment. So, one needs to obtain enlightenment first in order to be able to actually engage in the ultimate purpose of benefitting others, i.e.

¹ There are two Tibetan terms used in this context, teck-chen sem-kye and jang-chub sem.

The Sanskrit term bodhicitta is jang-chub sem in Tibetan – jang-chub means enlightenment and sem means mind, hence the literal translation is 'mind of enlightenment'; however the implicit meaning is the 'mind that aspires to obtain enlightenment'. The person who has this mind that aspires to obtain enlightenment is a jang-chub sem-pa, or bodhisattva in Sanskrit.

The term teck-chen sem-kye is translated in the commentary as 'Mahayana mind generation' – teck-chen means Mahayana, sem means mind and kye means generation. It specifically refers to a mind that is characterised as a Mahayana mind from the moment it is generated and for as long as it is maintained.

So the two terms essentially refer to the same thing with respect to the nature of the mind which aspires to enlightenment. The difference lies in the fact that one term involves a process, i.e. generation, and a setting, i.e. Mahayana, whereas the other is focussed on the result, i.e. the 'mind of enlightenment' or more specifically that which aspires to obtain enlightenment.

lead them to the state of complete enlightenment. As the teachings mention, when we work solely for the benefit of others, it will naturally fulfil our own purpose as well. So, this means that when we are fully committed to benefiting other sentient beings, that will also serve as the optimum means to obtain enlightenment ourselves, because we realise that without obtaining enlightenment oneself first there is no way that we can fully benefit others.

More specifically, you will recall that in the seven-point cause and effect sequence for developing bodhicitta, the state of mind that serves as the immediate cause to achieve the result of bodhicitta is called superior intention. This is where one takes on full responsibility for leading all beings to happiness and removing them from all suffering. The mind of superior intention makes this resolve, 'I will not rely on others to do it, but rather I will take it upon myself to bring happiness and free all beings from suffering'.

Having taken on that personal responsibility, which is based on love and compassion, and making the courageous commitment to bring all beings to the ultimate state of happiness and free them from all suffering, one then reflects on whether one has the ability to do that right now. When one realises that one does not have that full ability now, one investigates who has that ability, and comes to realise that only a buddha has the full capacity to benefit all sentient beings.

When one takes refuge in the Buddha by reflecting on the enlightened qualities in detail, such as the qualities of his holy body that is adorned with the enlightened signs and marks, the numerous qualities of his speech, the unimaginable qualities of his omniscient mind, and his vast virtuous activities, then that in itself becomes a strong impetus to develop exactly those same qualities for ourselves. It is only when one has obtained all the qualities of enlightenment that one will gain the full ability to free all other beings from suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness. When one develops the strong aspiration to obtain enlightenment as a way to benefit all sentient beings fully and completely, then one has developed bodhicitta or the awakening mind. This is how one develops the Mahayana mind generation—a mind that aspires to obtain supreme enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings.

You also need to understand that bodhicitta is developed only on the basis of having first obtained calm abiding. As explained many times previously, the mind basis for developing bodhicitta is a higher realm mind called the preparatory stage.² As explained in the teachings, calm abiding, the preparatory stage and the mind of higher realm are all obtained simultaneously. The reason why bodhicitta cannot be generated based on a mind of the desire realm is because the mind of the desire realm is a very gross level of mind, and since bodhicitta is only developed in relation to a subtle mind and particularly a very firm and stable mind, it has to be generated based on calm abiding which is a higher realm mind.

You can refer to the more extensive definition of bodhicitta that is presented in other texts and compare it with the definition presented here. Does the definition presented here include all of the necessary elements of bodhicitta? It's good for you to investigate this. So, is this definition intact?

Students: Yes.

But this definition would apply even to an ordinary being who has not yet entered the path. Ordinary beings just prior to entering the Mahayana path would have generated the mind that aspires to enlightenment, and even though it is a contrived mind it still meets all the criteria of this definition, doesn't it?

Also, the Buddha's eye consciousness is a primary consciousness, which also meets the criteria of the definition, but it would not be referred to as being bodhicitta. Thus the crucial element that needs to be added on to this definition of the generation of a Mahayana mind is that it is a Mahayana primary mental consciousness. So, thus the full definition would read: the Mahayana primary mental consciousness that accompanies the aspiration to achieve complete enlightenment for the purpose of others. This definition carries the criteria for it to be the full definition of the generation of the Mahayana mind of bodhicitta. Adding the extra element 'Mahayana primary mental consciousness' to the definition, rules out the primary consciousnesses of the other senses such as eye primary consciousness, the nose primary consciousness, the tongue primary consciousness and so forth as bodhicitta.

The inclusion of 'Mahayana' in the definition also rules out the mental consciousnesses of an ordinary being who has not yet entered the Mahayana path, as being bodhicitta. In the definition presented here it just mentions a 'mind that accompanies the aspiration' and does not specify that it has to be a Mahayana mental consciousness.

We will not go further into the extensive explanation in the commentary at this point, as you can read that for yourselves. As presented there, in addition to this two-fold division Gyalsab Je mentions twenty-two divisions by example and four by boundary, all of which are explained in the lam rim teachings. The commentary also refers to abandoning the four black dharmas and relying on the four white dharmas and so forth, and again these are also explained in the lam rim teachings. As the author of the commentary, Gyalsab Je, mentions, to understand all of these more extensively, you must study the lam rim teachings.

2.2.2. Explaining the divisions with an example

The next verse goes into more detail.

16. *In the same way one understands the difference between Wishing to go and going,
Those who are proficient should Understand the difference of the two sequentially.*

² A preparatory virtuous state of concentration within the sphere of the form and formless realm that directly generates an actual state of meditative concentration of either the form or formless absorption. There are eight types of preparatory meditative concentrations.

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

The mind that thinks, 'I want to go to that place' while resting and not being held by the action of going, and the mind that thinks, 'I shall go to that place' while held by the action of placing one foot down and raising the other, are the same in being an awareness that thinks 'I should go to that place'.

The difference lies with being held, or not being held by the action of going.

That is the example. Then the commentary continues:

The respective difference between the wishing and engaging mind generation should be understood by those who are proficient in the same way. They are the same in being a mind that thinks, 'I shall attain enlightenment for the welfare of others', but one of them does not depend on being held by the practice of the perfections of generosity and so forth, and the other does depend on that.

So the difference between wishing bodhicitta and engaging bodhicitta does not lie in the intention, which is the same for both, i.e. 'I shall obtain enlightenment for the welfare of others'.

What does differentiate the two is that wishing bodhicitta is not accompanied by engaging in the practices of perfection of generosity and so forth. Whereas engaging bodhicitta, while having the same mind of 'I shall obtain enlightenment for the welfare of others', is held by the practices of the perfection of generosity and so forth. With engaging bodhicitta the practice of the perfections of generosity and so forth is manifest.

One way to understand this is that a bodhisattva who is in meditative equipoise is not actively practising engaging bodhicitta, but they do maintain the wishing bodhicitta within their mental continuum. When the bodhisattvas come out of meditative equipoise and enter into the post-meditative state, they engage in activities of benefiting others such as by practising generosity, giving teachings and so forth; and at that time their mind is held by the engaging bodhicitta. It is good to understand this distinction between wishing or aspiring bodhicitta, and engaging bodhicitta. That should be sufficient for now—you can do more research on that for yourselves.

The commentary ends the section with this comment:

The master Kamalashila and others explained it in the same way, so I will not elaborate it here.

2.2.3. Explaining the difference in the benefits of the wishing and engaging minds

This is sub-divided into two:

2.2.3.1. The benefits of the wishing mind

2.2.3.2. The benefits of the engaging mind

2.2.3.1. THE BENEFITS OF THE WISHING MIND

In his commentary on this section, Gyaltsab Je begins with this quotation from the sutra called The Liberation of the Superior Jampa:

Son of the lineage, it is like this: For example, the precious diamond, though broken, outshines the supreme ornaments of gold and so forth, still keeps the name 'precious diamond', and eliminates all poverty. Son of the lineage, likewise the precious diamond of the mind that generates omniscient knowledge, even without significance, outshines all the gold of the qualities of the hearers and self-liberators. It keeps the name of bodhisattva and eliminates all the poverty of cyclic existence.

This quote was also mentioned when we were studying the Madhyamaka (or Middle Way text), so you will be familiar with it.

Then the verse from the root text is presented:

*17. Though from the wishing mind of enlightenment
Great benefit arises while circling,
Continual merit, similar to the mind
Of engaging, does not arise.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

As stated here, though a great result from the mind wishing for enlightenment arises while being in cyclic existence, a similar uninterrupted stream of merits, such as that which arises from the engaging mind does not arise.

As a result of the merit accumulated from a wishing mind of enlightenment while one is in cyclic existence one actually experiences great positive results, such as being born as a universal monarch and so forth.

However an uninterrupted stream of merit is not obtained from a mind that merely wishes for enlightenment. The engaging mind produces an uninterrupted stream of merit, which is far superior and far greater than the merit one gains from just the wishing mind.

The distinction between the mind that generates a wish for bodhicitta and the mind that engages in bodhicitta can be understood in terms of how each is actually implemented. The wishing mind is where one develops that keen aspiration to achieve enlightenment, 'May I achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings', which suffices for the wishing mind. Based upon that aspiration of wishing to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, the engaging mind actually makes a promise to achieve enlightenment. When we talk about the bodhisattva vows, we are talking about vows that are based upon the engaging mind. Based on the earlier aspiration 'for the sake of all sentient beings I aspire to achieve enlightenment', the engaging bodhicitta mind promises to engage in the practices of the six perfections such as generosity and so forth. So we can see that there is definitely a difference between a mere aspiration and making a promise to fulfil that aspiration.

We can relate this to the practices and commitments that we regularly undertake, such as the Vajrayogini sadhana. The practice begins with 'I aspire to achieve the united state of Vajrayogini and for that purpose I will now engage in these practices of generating myself as the deity and so forth'. The first part 'for the sake of achieving enlightenment may I achieve the state of Vajrayogini' suffices as wishing bodhicitta. The second part 'for that purpose I will engage in the self-generation of Vajrayogini' suffices for engaging bodhicitta. It is good to apply this understanding to any practices we may engage in.

One also needs to understand that it is the promise that makes engaging bodhicitta so much more powerful. We can see this with our practice of the virtues, such as refraining from killing. The mere act of refraining from killing is of course a virtuous act in itself. However if one were to actually promise, 'Today, I will not engage in any act of killing' or 'I will completely refrain from killing' then the act of refraining from killing becomes much more powerful and much more meritorious. This is important to understand.

It is good to study the definition of the Mahayana mind generation or bodhicitta and become familiar with what it actually means. That doesn't mean just being able to repeat the definition, but rather having a personal understanding of what bodhicitta actually means. What is the actual difference between wishing bodhicitta and engaging bodhicitta and so forth? We need to really understand this so we understand what we are striving for.

Bodhicitta is not something to be left as merely an intellectual understanding. We will gain the most benefit from bodhicitta when we actually meditate on it. Initially meditating on bodhicitta can be done with the explanation based on the sequential development of bodhicitta. As I have presented on numerous occasions, there are two main methods for developing bodhicitta. One is based on the seven-point cause and effect sequence, and the other on the technique of equalising and exchanging oneself with others. In the form of a meditation, or as part of familiarising one's own mind with them, it is good to go over these points and try to reflect upon them.

The seven-point cause and effect sequence begins with developing equanimity towards all living beings. We begin the process of developing a contrived bodhicitta by 1) contemplating how all beings have been equally kind to oneself, as they have all been one's mother in an infinite number of past lives. At this point you need to use logical reasons to determine that, as one's mental continuum has gone back beyond the conception of this life through numerous, countless, and infinite past lives, then all beings must at one time or another have been one's mother. Then 2) we remember the incredible kindness shown to us by all beings, just like one's mother in this life. In this way we remember their great kindness. Next, 3) we develop the strong intention of wishing to repay that kindness. Then 4) we develop heart-warming or appealing love for all beings, 5) followed by compassion. The sixth cause 6) is superior intention. Having meditated in this sequence one has, using this contrived means, reached a point where one really wants to do anything possible to benefit sentient beings, to bring them happiness and remove their suffering. When we acknowledge that we do not have the full potential or ability to achieve that goal, then the aspiration to obtain enlightenment is developed.

When we develop that thought, 'How wonderful it would be if I could obtain enlightenment in order to benefit all beings', we have generated a contrived bodhicitta attitude. We need to further familiarise our mind with this contrived attitude until it becomes the effortless and spontaneous wish to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all living beings.

The technique that Shantideva presents in great detail in the eighth chapter of The Bodhisattva's Way of Life is the equalising and exchanging self with other technique. The exchanging self with other technique has four stages, beginning with 1) equalising oneself with others, which is developing equanimity. Then based on that, 2) one contemplates the many faults of cherishing oneself; followed by 3) contemplating the benefits of cherishing others. Then comes 4) the actual practice of exchanging self with others, which incorporates superior intention. You would have done this tong len practice of giving and taking over the three weeks when I went to India last year.

Some texts indicate that when one engages in the practice of developing bodhicitta using the exchanging self with others technique, then the seven-point cause and effect sequence is subsumed into that technique. Whereas if you're practicing the seven-point cause and effect sequence for developing bodhicitta, that doesn't necessarily suffice as a practise of exchanging self with others technique.

Some have commented that the exchanging self with others technique doesn't necessarily mean that you have to think about past lives. I think this particular explanation is presented in Liberation in the Palm of your Hand, which also mentions that the exchanging self with others technique incorporates the seven-point cause and effect technique as well.

So it's good to refer to different texts and read their various explanations as a way to increase your understanding and wisdom. The opportunity we have now is, of course, very rare, and this is a good opportunity to try to bring this about again in the future. But that's very hard to predict.

Before she passed away Caryn Clarke confided in me, 'I have no real hesitation about death itself, but the prospect of not meeting with such an opportunity to be with you again is a prospect that really frightens me'. She was referring to me, but of course she really meant having the opportunity to practise Dharma and meet with teachers. We need to take this as a personal instruction. The great Kadampa masters had similar ways of presenting instructions; with predicaments and so forth. Caryn said, 'You know I've had the opportunity to be with you for about seven years, and that was a great time of being together, for learning and practice. I worry that I won't have this opportunity again'. These are points that we need to remember.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

14 May 2013

Based on the motivation we generated in the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

It would be good to generate from the depths of one's heart a positive motivation for receiving the teaching such as: For the purpose of all sentient beings, to free them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of enlightenment and happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself; so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well'.

2.2.3. Explaining the difference in the benefits of the wishing and engaging minds (cont.)

The distinction between the wishing mind and the engaging mind was presented in the last session, along with the benefits of the wishing mind of bodhicitta. It is good to reflect on those benefits.

Again, I exhort you to contemplate the meaning of the teachings that have been presented and not to just leave it as a mere intellectual understanding thinking, 'OK, I've heard that. It makes sense'. There is not much benefit in just skimming over what is being presented. The only way to derive any personal benefit is by really contemplating and reflecting on the meaning of these points. Only then can one taste the real flavour of what is being presented. Having reflected on and digested the meaning of what the great scholar and master Shantideva presented, we will begin to really admire and venerate him.

The most important application of these teachings to our practice is to see how they counteract our very stubborn mind, which cherishes our own interests and well-being. It counteracts that self-cherishing because everything being presented here relates to thinking about the welfare of all other beings, and how to benefit them. By its very nature the material presented here extends our view beyond ourselves to benefiting others, which definitely counteracts our focus on our own interests and our self-cherishing mind.

The essence of this presentation lies in the ways and means to benefit others, which also helps to simplify what might otherwise seem to be a complex teaching. When we look into it, we find that we already have, to a certain degree, a wish to benefit others. So it is just a matter of further developing and expanding that. That is essentially what is being presented here.

2.2.3.2. THE BENEFITS OF THE ENGAGING MIND

The two verses relating to this heading are:

18. *Whoever, from the time they perfectly generate
With an irreversible attitude,
This mind to liberate the infinite
Realms of sentient beings,*
19. *From then on, although they sleep
Or become reckless, manifold
Merits of uninterrupted power,
Equalling space, strongly arise.*

In his commentary Gyalsab Je begins his explanation of the meaning of these verses as follows:

Whoever, from the moment they perfectly generate an irreversible engaging mind for the purpose of others, to completely liberate all realms of beings and place them in the state of enlightenment, for as long as cyclic existence lasts,...

These verses are introducing the nature of the engaging mind as a way of explaining its benefits. As explained earlier, the wishing mind is a mere aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the sake of other sentient beings, whereas the engaging mind is a mind accompanied by actions or deeds such as the six perfections. From the moment someone makes that pledge or vow to engage in the bodhisattva deeds they perfectly generate the irreversible engaging mind for the purpose of others. This refers to engaging in the actions solely for the purpose of benefiting others for as long as cyclic existence lasts and to completely liberate sentient beings in all realms. This is the extent of the pledge that is made when one takes the engaging bodhisattva vows.

So, the engaging mind is this very strong and stable pledge to not abandon working for the purpose of others for as long as cyclic existence lasts. This means continuously working for the purpose of others until the very last sentient being is liberated. Here we need to take note that the negativity from breaching the bodhisattva vows is only incurred when one has made this pledge. With a wishing mind one has not made any pledge, so if one does not apply oneself to the practice, or if one breaches any of the practices, there will be no resulting negativity, simply because one has not made the pledge. The negativity of a downfall occurs only when one breaches the commitments of a pledge.

Having explained the engaging mind and that it involves making a pledge, Gyalsab Je indicates that from the time the bodhisattva makes the pledge and generates the engaging mind:

... from then on, whether they sleep or become reckless through intoxication and so forth, they will still create a manifold uninterrupted power of merit as vast as space.

That is because the wishing mind is generated merely through aspiring to the result, while the engaging mind is held by the practice of completing the causes for enlightenment.

As this is such a clear presentation it is good for us to reflect on its meaning. Because of the power of the pledge and the power of the mind that one has generated (i.e. the resolve to benefit all sentient beings until the end of samsara), bodhisattvas continue to create merit even while asleep, or during moments when they are not being conscientious, such as becoming intoxicated. Some bodhisattvas may engage in worldly activities, such as socialising with others, maybe even drinking to the point of becoming a little intoxicated, and temporarily numbing the mind. However, due to the power of their pledge they are still accumulating merit at that time.

Here we need to understand that there are occasions where, even though their mind is not manifestly active such as when it is intoxicated, or sleeping, the bodhisattva still accumulates merit. But it is important that we don't misinterpret this. It doesn't mean that once the pledge is made, one does not need to further develop that engaging mind—bodhisattvas still need to train to further develop that altruistic state of mind. However, once they have developed the engaging mind they will continuously accumulate merit, as vast as space, in all their activities, even while sleeping and eating. When eating, for example, they will consciously consume the food with the intention, 'It is for the purpose of nourishing my body to make it stronger, so that I can further develop myself to be in the service of benefiting others, that I eat and drink'. They sleep with the intention, 'I go to sleep in order to rejuvenate and restore the energy of my body, so that I can further work for the welfare of other sentient beings'. So in this way, any activity, even sitting or moving about, is engaged with a conscious mind of doing so for the purpose of benefiting others. That is how bodhisattvas are said to accrue an incredibly vast amount of merit. All their activities become the means to accumulate merit, because they are done for the purpose of other sentient beings.

The main point here is that the way to accumulate a continuous stream of merit is by holding that intention to benefit others. Then whatever activity one engages in actually becomes a means to benefit others. The simple act of opening a door can be done with the intention, 'By opening this door may I open the door to liberation for all sentient beings'. With the bodhicitta attitude a normal and simple activity such turning on the light can generate an altruistic intention such as, 'May turning on this light become the cause to remove the darkness of ignorance within all sentient beings'. So, whatever seemingly simple, mindless activity we normally do, it becomes a supreme means to accumulate extensive merit when it is accompanied by the intention of wishing to benefit others. So combining any practice or activity with that intention of benefiting others is a means to accumulate great merit.

On a practical level, if we can ensure that whenever we engage in any activity we do so with an intention that the activity will benefit others, then that will be a direct antidote to the self-cherishing mind. As explained extensively, because so many faults arise out of a self-cherishing mind, we definitely need to overcome it. A practical way to begin overcoming that negative state of mind is by turning every activity into an intention to benefit others, which will act as a direct antidote that overcomes the self-cherishing mind.

In addition to these ways of training our mind to overcome self-cherishing, there is the practice of equalising and exchanging self with others. This is a practice where we intentionally engage in methods to lessen the self-cherishing mind and replace it with a mind that cherishes others. As mentioned previously, when we ensure that our actions are held with the intention to benefit others, then these actions actually become a practice of cherishing others. Doing anything with the intention of benefiting others will naturally overcome the self-cherishing mind. The practice of exchanging self with others can be thus applied with this intention. We have heard of these practices and techniques many times, so now it is up to us to use every opportunity to try to apply them. That is how we will gain the greatest benefit from the practice.

However, you need not worry that your own welfare will suffer if you cherish others! As mentioned in the teachings, the side-effect of cherishing others will be that your own welfare and wellbeing will naturally be enhanced. More extensive explanations about the benefits of cherishing others and overcoming self-cherishing are found in the eighth chapter of this text.

As mentioned in that chapter, we just need to look at the difference between the Buddha and ourselves in order to understand the disadvantage of cherishing oneself and the benefit of cherishing others. Having surpassed the practice of cherishing others, the Buddha became a supreme enlightened being, whereas we are still ordinary beings suffering in cyclic existence. That is because we have held onto the self-cherishing mind. This really summarises the benefits of cherishing others. If we have any doubts that we might lose or miss out if we don't cherish ourselves, we can encourage ourselves by remembering that the ultimate benefit of cherishing others is that we will become enlightened, just like the Buddha. There is no greater benefit than that!

We can see the significance of becoming a buddha by recalling how many beings are naturally drawn to the Buddha now—they naturally respect and admire him and want to follow his advice. His Holiness recently mentioned that it had come to his attention that a general survey in China had revealed that there are over 200 million Chinese people who are interested in the Buddhist teachings and who consider themselves to be Buddhists. That is the extent of the interest in the Buddha in these times. Of course, in the past, China was mostly a Buddhist country. When I was in Tibet I used to hear from the elders that things began to decline in China when the emperor was no longer able to reign. If he had been able to rule continuously there would have been peace and wellbeing in China. That is because the emperor was regarded as a manifestation of Manjushri. If the emperor had remained in power, then as a follower of the Dharma, and as a manifestation of Manjushri, he would have brought peace and harmony throughout the Chinese nation. That's what the elders in Tibet used to say.

To this day one of the prominent places of pilgrimage in China is the Five Peaks of Manjushri, where there are many monasteries and temples on the main mountain. I wouldn't mind going on a pilgrimage there but at my age I don't know if I would be able to reach the summit! There's a Tibetan saying that whoever makes the pilgrimage to the Manjushri peaks will definitely receive some sign of making a connection with Manjushri.

Getting back to the main point mentioned earlier, lest we feel we are missing out by cherishing others and overcoming our self-cherishing mind, we can reflect on the Buddha's deeds and qualities, and how we will achieve the same state of buddhahood. That will really help to encourage us to practise cherishing others.

2.3. The reason for these benefits arising

Thus far the many benefits of cherishing others have been presented. Lest one wonders how and why these benefits come about, Shantideva very meticulously presents the reasons why these benefits arise. He does so under two headings:

2.3.1. Stating the quotation

2.3.2. Establishing it with reasoning

2.3.1. Stating the quotation

The quotation is presented in this verse:

20. *That this has validity
Was taught by the Tathagata
In the Subahuprccha
For those aspiring to the lesser.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je elaborates:

That it is valid that the engaging mind has these benefits was established by the Tathagata himself in the Sutra Requested by the Bodhisattva Subahu with reasoning ...

The sutra that is referred to here is the Sutra Requested by the Bodhisattva Subahu, and with reasoning indicates that the quotation from the sutra is a citation that withstands the three-fold analysis. As older students would be aware from previous teachings, the three-fold analysis determines whether a quotation is valid or not.¹ The three-fold forms of analysis are:

1. Obvious phenomena are not contradicted by direct valid perception.
2. Slightly obscure phenomena are not contradicted by valid inference based on the force of evidence. Examples of slightly obscure phenomena would be impermanence, selflessness and so forth.
3. Extremely obscure phenomena are not contradicted by valid inference based on scriptural authority. Examples of extremely obscure phenomena would be the subtleties of karma.

The main point is that a quotation is established as a valid quotation when it withstands the three-fold analysis.

Gyalsab Je's commentary continues:

Why did the Buddha do this? It was intended for those sentient beings who are inclined to the lesser; such as a person whose hearer lineage is not definite, but who is afraid of accumulating vast merit, and thus they turn away from the Mahayana path and aspire to the hearer's enlightenment. It was to help them give up their inclination to the lesser, so that they could be placed in the Mahayana.

We need to clearly understand what is being presented here and what we should specifically rely upon. As mentioned here in the commentary, the Tathagata or the Buddha specifically explained the benefits, especially for those who might be inclined to the Hinayana or the Lesser Vehicle. Like a person whose hearer lineage was not definite means that if a being's lineage is already definite or fixed, then there would be no point mentioning it to them because they have definitely entered the Lesser Vehicle. Those whose lineage is not yet definite could turn to either the Mahayana or Hinayana path depending on which teachings inspire them. Such beings might be afraid of the effort needed to accumulate the vast merit required in the Mahayana path and possibly turn away from the Mahayana path and aspire to the hearer's enlightenment. So in order to help them give up their inclination to the lesser vehicle and become established in the Great Vehicle, the Buddha explained the benefits of cherishing others.

At a personal level, this is very sound advice. We might safely assume that we don't have the hearer's lineage, meaning that there might be no immediate danger that we will enter the hearer's path. Nevertheless we may lack aspiration to practise the Mahayana path because we are afraid of the vast amount of merit that needs to be accumulated. The prospect of having to accumulate extensive merit might be so daunting that there might be times when we start to think, 'Um, maybe I will set the practice for enlightenment aside for now, and go for self liberation!'

There is a reason why the lam rim teachings present the practices of the three scopes sequentially. If the great scope practices are not presented, then there is the danger for the trainee to aspire to self liberation after they have trained their mind in the small and medium scope practices. When the trainee becomes familiar with the practices of the small scope followed by the practices of the medium scope, they will develop confidence about being able to obtain liberation. So if bodhicitta is not presented to them at that stage then there is the danger that they will strive just for self-liberation. When the practices of the great scope are introduced they will be able relate their own plight in samsara to all other sentient beings. That can then be developed into the great resolve of liberating all sentient beings and thus entering the Great Vehicle. We need to see how the lam rim has been presented in this way so that there is no danger of entering the lower vehicle; i.e. the path aspiring to self-liberation.

To put this into a more specific context, the benefits of bodhicitta are presented to beings who are not yet inclined to enter the lesser vehicle, such as the hearer's vehicle. If all the great deeds of the bodhisattvas are presented initially to a beginner trainee, that could be too daunting for them and hence there is the danger that they might turn to the lower vehicle.

For example, the great deeds of generosity practised by a bodhisattva could extend to giving away their own limbs and even their whole body. There are many accounts of how in his previous lives as a bodhisattva the Buddha gave away his limbs and his own body in order to benefit others; he gave away his possessions; and there are even accounts of him giving away his children and wives and so forth. His generosity was so great that he was able to give away much that would otherwise be cherished as being so very dear. The thought of such practices of generosity can be very daunting, and there could be a danger that one might think, 'I can't manage that!', and enter the Lesser Vehicle. However, when the mind is not yet set and the potential to enter the Great Vehicle is still intact, presenting the benefits of bodhicitta in detail will really inspire them to enter the Great Vehicle path.

So the benefits of bodhicitta are presented by starting with the disadvantages of cherishing oneself, and then describing the great benefit of cherishing others. When these are presented systematically, they will be a source of inspiration to actually engage in those practices, because the great benefit in cherishing others will be apparent.

2.3.2. Establishing it with reasoning

This section is subdivided into two:

2.3.2.1. The validity of the benefits of the wishing mind

2.3.2.2. The validity of the engaging mind

Having presented a valid quotation, i.e. a quotation that withstands the three valid forms of analysis, the benefits of bodhicitta are established more firmly using logical reasoning.

2.3.2.1. THE VALIDITY OF THE BENEFITS OF THE WISHING MIND

This is further subdivided into four:

2.3.2.1.1. Great benefit because of the infinite applications for virtue

2.3.2.1.2. There is no higher concern for others than this

2.3.2.1.3. Sentient beings do not generate such a concern even for their own purpose

2.3.2.1.4. Praising it as a summary

2.3.2.1.1. Great benefit because of the infinite applications for virtue

This is presented in two verses:

¹ This threefold analysis is discussed in the teachings of 19 June 2001, 18 November 2003, 23 October 2007, 15 November 2011.

21. *Even if one thinks: I shall Alleviate just the headache of sentient beings,
Since it has the intent to benefit
One becomes endowed with boundless merits.*
22. *What need is there to mention the wish to alleviate
The boundless unhappiness of each sentient being
And to establish each of them
In boundless qualities?*

The commentary explains:

Captain Friend's Daughter, though generating only the limited thought, 'May I free sentient beings from their headaches', had a true concern for others which generated infinite merit...

The explanation in Gyaltsab Je's commentary is related to an account of events that took place in the past. The tong len practice of giving and taking is said to have originated from this historical account.

It is a rather long story but I can give a brief account of the story of Captain Friend's Daughter, who was actually his son. Long ago there was a captain called Friend who really longed for a son, but every time a son was born to his wife it died soon after it was born. Thinking that there must be a spell on his family, he decided to name the next born son Daughter instead of son. In due course his wife bore a son, who he named Daughter, and indeed the son didn't die. Hence he was referred to as Captain Friend's Daughter. He grew up to be a fine young man and followed his father's footsteps, becoming a merchant and sea captain. He would go on sea voyages to buy wares from other places, and sell them on his return. Whenever he made a profit he would give it to his mother and he was also very generous to the poor as well.

On one occasion he set out on a dangerous voyage with some other merchants to find some particular jewels. Thinking of the great dangers, his mother was concerned and didn't want her son to go. So she tried to prevent him from leaving by holding on to his clothes, and lay down in the doorway so as to not let him pass. However, because he had decided that he really wanted to go on this voyage, he stepped over his mother's head and went out to his ship.

The ship was wrecked because of bad weather, but Daughter was spared. Clinging to a plank from the ship he drifted towards an island. It is said that once he landed on the island, he passed through many different kinds of magical valleys of great enjoyment. Eventually he came to a place where he witnessed people undergoing great suffering. In particular, he saw someone whose head was pierced by a turning cartwheel. When the cartwheel turned over his head it drilled through his skull which meant that his brains and so forth oozed out, which he licked up.

Captain Friend's Daughter asked the locals, 'Why is this happening?' What was the karma that this person created in the past to experience this kind of result now?' He was told that this was the result of this individual having kicked his mother's head in the past. When he heard that, Daughter immediately started to feel very anxious and fearful, remembering how he had stepped over his mother's head when he left home. At that very moment the cartwheel changed direction and headed towards his own head. When the cartwheel fell upon his head and started drilling a hole, he began to experience excruciating and unbearable pain. At that moment he thought, 'May this great agony and excruciating pain that I am experiencing now suffice to take away the headaches of all sentient beings'. It is said that the moment he generated that intention, the cartwheel detached itself from his head and flew away.

There are different versions of what happened next. One says that after he had developed the intention to experience the suffering of headaches of all sentient beings, the cartwheel detached itself from his head and he went up to the pure lands. Another version says that he returned to his homeland. The main point of the story, however is that this individual practised the two main aspects of the giving and taking practice. Earlier, he had engaged in great deeds of generosity, giving his profits to his mother and also to charity; later he engaged in the practice of taking, when he took upon himself the suffering of all beings experiencing excruciating pain.

So, even just the wish to alleviate the headaches of others was the means for that person to accumulate a great amount of merit. That being the case, Gyaltsab Je argues:

If that is so, then what need is there to mention that the wish to eliminate infinite unhappiness of each sentient being, and to establish each of them with the infinite qualities of a buddha, has limitless merit?

If even the thought or wish to alleviate the headaches of sentient beings produces such great merit, then there is no need to mention the limitless merit that would be accumulated by generating the thought of eliminating the infinite unhappiness or suffering of each and every sentient being, and establishing their ultimate happiness with the infinite qualities of the buddhas.

Here we need to establish through logic how this altruistic wish of the bodhicitta attitude is a means to accumulate an extensive amount of merit. There is so much merit to be gained by thinking about alleviating the suffering of just one sentient being, or even one aspect of the suffering of other sentient beings. We can see that with examples from everyday life. When someone is suffering, we have a genuine wish for them to be free from the suffering, which is a really noble thought. Based on that wish to alleviate their suffering, we do everything in our power to help them to be free from that suffering. When someone is gravely ill and bed-ridden, then after generating the initial thought of wanting them to be free from the suffering, we might then do something practical to help them. Likewise, with the bodhicitta attitude, when we generate the wish for all beings to be free from all suffering and to lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, we can see, just through logic, how much more merit that would generate. This is how such an intention would result in limitless merit.

From this explanation we can also understand the teaching when it says, 'It is through the bodhicitta attitude that one can accumulate the most extensive merit as well as purifying extensive negative karmas'. These are important points for us to reflect upon: thinking about removing suffering from even one sentient being is a great deed, and the moment we generate the thought to alleviate the suffering of all sentient beings, we accumulate a great, extensive amount of merit.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱུང་ཚུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Sitting in an appropriate posture, focusing our mind inward, and bringing to mind the motivation we have generated earlier, we can now engage in the practice of meditation. [meditation]

It is important to also generate an appropriate motivation for receiving the teaching such as: 'In order to benefit all sentient beings, to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching, and put its meaning into practice well'.

2.3.2.1.2. There is no other superior intent to benefit than that

Having mentioned the benefits of the wishing mind earlier, the text is re-emphasising that there is no greater superior intent to benefit than this. The root text states:

23. *Regardless of whether it is father or mother,
Who has such intent to benefit?
Regardless of whether god, sage,
Or brahmas, do they possess it?*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je begins with a question:

In the transitory world, what father or mother who wishes to benefit their child has such an intent to benefit?

The intent to benefit referred to here is the wish for all beings to obtain supreme happiness and to be free from all suffering, i.e. wishing bodhicitta. So, what is being explained here is that there is no greater intent to benefit others than bodhicitta. The text explains the reason for this being so by comparing it to the intent to benefit that other beings in the transitory world have, such as fathers and mothers who have the intent to benefit their child. Although in our contemporary world we would regard the parent's intention to benefit a child to be one of the highest and noblest, it is however merely focused on the child's welfare for this life only. Thus a parent's intentions for their child's welfare would be in relation to the child having sound health and being free from illness; receiving a good education so they can earn a lot of money and become rich and famous; having good companions; and to become powerful. One could argue, in our mundane or contemporary world there is no higher intent than that. Gyaltsab Je then asks:

What other person has such a wish to establish supreme happiness?

This is a rhetorical question indicating that indeed there is no-one else in the transitory world who has such an intent to establish others in supreme happiness.

Then Gyaltsab Je answers his question:

Not the gods or the true speaking sages, and not the brahmas who abide in the four immeasurable thoughts have such a mind to benefit.

As a way to understand why others in the transitory world don't have such an intent to benefit, one might wonder if it is because others lack any sense of love for others? As explained earlier, parents have a great amount of love for their children. Yet even fathers and mothers, who love their children dearly, don't have the intention for their child to obtain supreme happiness. Even though in the transitory world the greatest wish to benefit is the one that parents hold, they don't have that intention to benefit their children beyond this life's goals.

If one further wonders, is it because others lack clairvoyance that they don't have such intent? As explained in the commentary, not even the gods, such as Indra who has great clairvoyance, have such an intent to benefit. If one wonders, is it perhaps because others lack knowledge that they don't have this intent? Further, even the true speaking sages, such as the great sage Serkya who had vast knowledge and was skilled in so many arts and treatises, don't have that intent to benefit. Is it because others lack the intention to benefit others altogether that they don't have that intent to benefit? To remove such doubts the text explains that even brahmas, who abide in a joyful land with the four immeasurable thoughts, do not have that intent to benefit. Brahmas live in the joyful lands where there is no immediate suffering and they are endowed with the four immeasurable thoughts, such as immeasurable love and so forth, so they definitely have the intention to benefit others. However, even their intent to benefit can't equal the intent to benefit others to obtain supreme happiness.

Here it is good to reflect on this presentation to really get a sense of how noble and how superior this intent to benefit others, which is based on the bodhicitta attitude, really is. It is the highest intent to benefit others, which surpasses all other forms of intention to benefit others in the transitory world. In our worldly system we might ask what could surpass a parent's love and their intent to benefit their children? What could be greater than that? However, as explained, the intent to benefit others that is based on bodhicitta is far superior to that.

We might feel that even though parents have the best intentions for their children, they are not really able to benefit their children to the greatest extent as they lack the knowledge and don't have clairvoyance. We may feel that having clairvoyance would be the optimum way to benefit others. However, as pointed out in the text, although being clairvoyant is a tremendous mental achievement, without the intent of benefiting others based on bodhicitta, that clairvoyance in itself does not suffice to be able to benefit other beings to the fullest extent. Simply put, just having clairvoyance is not such a big deal in comparison to the bodhicitta attitude. The benefits of bodhicitta far outweigh any benefits one may gain from developing clairvoyance, and it is a far more meritorious attitude to meditate on and to cultivate.

Furthermore, we might feel that if one has immeasurable thoughts of benefiting others, such as that in which a brahma abides, then that mind might be the noblest intent to benefit others. However, as pointed out here, the intent to benefit others based on bodhicitta outweighs even that. These are important points for us to reflect on. If whatever intent we might have to wish to benefit others is merely focused on the worldly benefits of this life, then it is a very limited intention to benefit compared with the bodhicitta attitude. But even though we haven't developed bodhicitta yet, just generating the thought, 'I will not harm any living being, and do whatever possible to benefit others', is extremely beneficial for our mind, and is a means for us to acquire merit. As mentioned previously, it is really important that we generate such thoughts on a regular basis.

Some of the practical ways to generate the bodhicitta attitude that I explained in previous sessions are exactly in accord with the text that His Holiness the Dalai Lama will be covering in the teachings in Sydney, Vast as the Heavens, Deep as the Sea, Verses in Praise of Bodhicitta by Khunu Lama Rinpoche. Just last weekend I made a commitment to myself to read this text again. It's incredibly uplifting and really inspiring. And the ways to cultivate the bodhicitta attitude are exactly as I have explained to you earlier, so it is not really difficult to understand at all. Reading the text would also be good for you who are intending to go to the teachings to prepare yourself. The beautiful presentation really inspires us to generate that mind ourselves.

In my last session, I explained how, when a bodhisattva generates that bodhicitta attitude, then whatever activity they engage in will become a meritorious act. Even such activities as walking or sleeping or even opening a door and so forth will generate merit. That is exactly how it is explained in Khunu Lama Rinpoche's text, which explains the many ways of turning what would normally seem to be mundane activities into great meritorious deeds by generating the bodhicitta attitude. As I mentioned earlier, the text is not very difficult to comprehend, and the passages and verses are easy to understand. They are extraordinarily beneficial for anyone who is inspired to develop the bodhicitta attitude. Reading this text will further inspire anyone who has even just a spark of that inspiration. So I exhort you to read it.

The presentation in the text is very meticulous. It first encourages us to remember bodhicitta in every activity that we engage in. When sitting remember bodhicitta; when you are standing remember bodhicitta; when you walk remember bodhicitta; and before you sleep remember bodhicitta. The author first exhorts one to remember bodhicitta, then gradually exhorts one to actually generate bodhicitta, when sitting, walking, eating and before sleeping. So the text exhorts us to generate the bodhicitta attitude at a beginner's level. The text essentially complements this very text that we are studying, The Bodhisattvas Way of Life. It unmistakably puts the onus on us take the initiative to do as it instructs.

Our daily activities can be basically summarised into four activities: we are usually sitting, eating, walking about, or sleeping. So, the main point here is to always be mindful while engaging in those activities to take the opportunity to remember bodhicitta. The great master Atisha advised us, 'When you are alone, watch your mind; when you are with others, watch your speech', which is very beneficial and practical advice. Of course this instruction was given with respect to Dharma practice, but even in a worldly context it is also very relevant and applicable. These are really important points to keep in mind.

Other Kadampa masters have also pointed out that the best instruction is to look into one's mind, the best companions are mindfulness and introspection, and the best knowledge is the wish to benefit others. That very succinctly summarises the main points. All the great masters have presented such succinct yet very poignant instructions about how to go about our daily lives.

2.3.2.1.3. Sentient beings do not generate such a concern even for their own purpose

The relevant verse is:

24. *These sentient beings have not generated
Previously such a mind for their own purpose,
Not even in their dreams;
How would they generate it for others?*

Here these sentient beings refers to those beings mentioned earlier, such as parents who have great love for their child, gods who have clairvoyance, the sages who have great knowledge and brahma, who has the four immeasurable thoughts in their mind. As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Sentient beings have not previously generated such a mind for themselves, and not even dreamt of it in their dreams. So how could they manifest it now while they are awake?

If sentient beings don't have an intent to benefit others in their dreams then how can they manifest this attitude when they are awake? The main point here is that if they don't have the intention to benefit others even in their own dreams, meaning for their own purpose, then how could they have that intention to benefit others while they are awake?

This relates to points that I have emphasised in many teachings. Without having developed renunciation, there is no possible way to develop love and compassion for others. Hence, there is no possibility of developing bodhicitta without renunciation. If we were to look at it sequentially, one needs to first develop renunciation, i.e. the wish to renounce the suffering of samsara oneself, and based on that, one generates the altruistic wish for others to be free from the suffering of samsara. These are very important points to reflect upon, and there are many such points in the Buddha's teachings.

One needs to first have an experience oneself and only then can one relate it to others. This, in its simplest term, is the point to consider. Here the first experience is one of being completely overwhelmed by the suffering of samsara. That generates a keen longing to be free from that suffering, and one has developed renunciation when that mind unceasingly and spontaneously has this longing to be free from the sufferings of samsara.

Then we relate it to others and see how all other sentient beings are in the same plight. Based on our own experience and understanding of the suffering of samsara and wishing to be free from that, we can wish other sentient beings to be free from that suffering as well. Then, based on that, one develops the altruistic attitude of bodhicitta.

As I have related earlier, a good example that portrays the way one's own experience makes such a great difference in the way one relates to others, is found in the army. A general who has reached his rank by progressing from the lowest ranks will interact and relate to others with kindness and understanding, which will differ greatly from those who become generals because of their connections. The general who has reached their high rank from lowly beginnings has endured the whole range of experiences and hardships. So they can relate to new recruits and understand the difficulties they may face.

Again and again the teachings emphasise that without developing renunciation first, there is no possibility of developing bodhicitta. Furthermore, the development of renunciation has to be based on practising morality. As explained in the teachings, if one practises pure morality without renunciation, then that practice of morality will suffice merely as a cause to obtain high status such as being born as a human or in one of the celestial god realms in the next life. That practice of morality, as pure as it may be, cannot be a cause to obtain liberation unless it is combined with renunciation. It is only when one develops renunciation based on the practice of pure morality that the practice of morality will be a cause to obtain liberation.

2.3.2.1.4. Praising it as a summary

The next verse contains similar points:

25. *Others do not generate this mind for the welfare of others
Even for their own purpose.
This distinguished precious mind,
Something special unprecedented was born.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

While it has not been generated even for a moment by other sentient beings for their own sake, for this precious wondrous exalted mind wishing to attain enlightenment in order to place all sentient beings in happiness and abandon their suffering, which has not arisen before, to be generated now by bodhisattvas is praiseworthy. Thus others also need to hold it as being praiseworthy and strive for it.

The main point presented here is that the precious superior mind of a bodhisattva, the wish to attain enlightenment in order to place all sentient beings in the ultimate state of happiness and to free them from all suffering, has not been generated for even a moment by other sentient beings for their own sake. So when the bodhisattvas generate such a mind, others should acknowledge and praise it, and strive to develop it themselves.

What is referred to here as the distinguished precious mind is the actual bodhicitta that encompasses the engaging mind. It doesn't refer merely to the aspiration to achieve enlightenment, but to the mind aspiring to achieve enlightenment that is combined or held with engaging in the deeds of the six perfections.

It is really important to reflect on what kind of mind bodhicitta is? What is the superior intention? By contemplating these questions and gaining a profound understanding, we will naturally develop a genuine admiration and respect for bodhisattvas, who are the noble beings that are endowed with this mind of bodhicitta. As explained in the teachings, the mind of a bodhisattva is bodhicitta, and the actions in which they engage in are the practices of the six perfections. Thus in both thought and deed they are incredibly noble, and surpass all other ordinary beings who may be endowed with good thoughts and engage in basic good deeds.

The only intent of a bodhisattva is the wish to benefit others, and for the sake of all other beings they aspire to achieve the highest goal of enlightenment. In fulfilling that aspiration their deeds and actions are completely selfless and solely for the benefit of others. Thus a bodhisattva does not even have an atom of self interest—their only intention is to benefit others. As a way to appreciate the great extent of that intention and to understand just how noble it is, we can consider the example of someone who has the altruistic intention to benefit all the people in Australia, with no self interest at all. If we think about it, completely dedicating one's whole life to the welfare of each individual in Australia would be an incredibly noble deed, wouldn't it? If doing that is, from a worldly perspective, great and admirable, then just imagine how great it would be for someone to have the intent to benefit not only the people of Australia and this world, but all sentient beings in the entire universe. Imagine not leaving out a single living being, but wishing to benefit all sentient beings equally and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness and freedom from all suffering. We can only try to fathom how incredible that is. This is how we can think about the intentions of bodhisattvas.

In practical terms, even non-Buddhists such as Christians seem to appreciate the teachings on bodhicitta. As I have related previously, when I went to a Christian monastery up in the Yarra Valley I met a young Christian monk there. I don't know how much understanding he had of bodhicitta but he did say to me, 'The teachings and the explanations you have of bodhicitta in your Buddhist tradition are really incredible and astounding'. He seemed to really relate to that. Indeed, who wouldn't appreciate such a state of mind and the intent to benefit others?

2.3.2.2. THE VALIDITY OF THE ENGAGING MIND

That is subdivided into three:

- 2.3.2.2.1. Actual
- 2.3.2.2.2. Its validity
- 2.3.2.2.3. Clearing away doubt

2.3.2.2.1. Actual

The relevant verse reads:

26. *The cause for the joy of all migrators,
The remedy for the suffering of sentient beings,
The merits of the precious mind,
How can it be comprehended?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

If the benefits of the wishing mind are very great, then the benefits of the mind that is held by the practice of the perfections are even greater.

Having gained a sense of the great benefits of the mere wishing mind, one can naturally understand that the benefits of the engaging mind are far greater. At this point we can reflect upon the differences between the wishing mind, the mere aspiration to achieve enlightenment, and the engaging mind, where the aspiration is combined with actual deeds, and actions such as the six perfections.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Since it works to achieve the happiness of higher status and definite goodness of all migrators, ...

As explained in the commentary, with wishing bodhicitta one also works to achieve the happiness of higher status and definite goodness. Generally speaking that is the goal of the small and medium scopes, which is a good result and a desirable achievement. Khunu Lama Rinpoche explains this very point in his text when he states that the bodhicitta attitude itself will suffice as a means to obtain one's temporary goals of high status and definite goodness (liberation). Thus the temporary good results and benefits such as obtaining high status and liberation are obtained through the cultivation of bodhicitta.

Here we can take note that when he praises bodhicitta His Holiness the Dalai Lama often uses this verse from the prayer to Maitreya:

I prostrate to bodhicitta,
The mind that reverses the lower realms,
Shows the path to high status,
And guides one to freedom from ageing and death.

This verse indicates how bodhicitta suffices to free one from the lower realms, leading one to high status, and it frees one from the fears of aging and death, which indicates liberation.

You would have heard His Holiness reciting this verse and praise it in his teachings, so it's good to keep this in mind. I am older than you are and my brain should be weaker, but somehow I seem to remember these points that His Holiness presents. You of course have much fresher minds.

Then Gyaltsab Je explains:

... it is the cause for their joy and the precious wish-fulfilling jewel that is the medicinal elixir that destroys the sickness of suffering of all sentient beings.

The point here is that bodhicitta itself will suffice to obtain one's temporary goals such as high status and definite goodness or liberation. Furthermore it brings about happiness for all sentient beings and is thus like the precious wish-fulfilling jewel.¹ Bodhicitta is a wish-fulfilling jewel that serves as a medicinal elixir which destroys the sickness of all suffering. It is not as if bodhicitta is able to cure only some kinds of sufferings while not managing to cure others. Rather it is able to overcome the entire range of sufferings of all sentient beings.

Then Gyaltsab Je asks this rhetorical question:

How can one put a measure to the merits of such a mind, since it is infinite?

The merits for developing bodhicitta are said to be infinite, in support of which the commentary quotes from the Sutra Requested by Viradatta:

From the Sutra Requested by Viradatta:
The merits of the mind of enlightenment,

If they were put into form
All the sphere of space would be filled
It is even more than that.

As indicated here, if the merits were in tangible form, then even the extent of space will not be sufficient to hold the merits of generating bodhicitta. We can also recall Nagarjuna's explanations in his Commentary to Bodhicitta, where he explains that the merit that one accumulates from a single moment of generating bodhicitta cannot be expressed, even by all the buddhas.

Then the commentary ends this section with:

More extensively, one can know from the Compendium of Deeds where it quotes the Array of Stalks Sutra.

2.3.2.2.2. Its validity

Here, we can relate the validity of the engaging mind to the three valid reasons that establish validity.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

27. *If even the mere intent to benefit
Is far superior to offerings to the buddhas,
What need is there to mention the striving
For the happiness of all sentient beings?*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

It is taught in the King of Concentration Sutra that even the mere motivational thought, 'I shall attain enlightenment to rescue all sentient beings' is more meritorious than making offerings to all of the buddhas found in the billions of buddha fields.

If this is so, then what need is there to mention the infinite merit of striving extensively in the practice to achieve the highest happiness for all sentient beings?

When the King of Concentration Sutra mentions the mere intention or aspiration to achieve enlightenment to rescue all sentient beings, we understand that to refer to the wishing mind. The merit from the wishing mind is far more superior than making offerings to all the buddhas found in the billions of buddha fields.

As explained in the teachings, there are billions of buddha fields, so to make offerings to billions of buddha fields would mean that each offering would be immensely extensive. As the King of Concentration Sutra indicates, the intention to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings is much more meritorious than that. Shantideva is saying that if that holds for the mere wishing mind, then what need is there to mention the infinite merit of striving extensively in the practice to achieve the highest happiness for all sentient beings, which is the engaging mind. i.e. the intention combined with the actual practices. The point here is that generating this engaging mind gives rise to far more extensive merit.

We need to rely on scriptural authority that withstands the three-fold analysis, such as the King of Concentration Sutra, because the extensive merit gained from developing bodhicitta falls within the category of extremely obscure phenomena, and thus cannot be validated by valid perception and valid inference.

The threefold analysis

As presented last week, there are three categories of phenomena: obvious phenomena, slightly obscure phenomena and extremely obscure or subtle phenomena.

¹ If one possesses this legendary jewel, all of one's wishes are fulfilled.

Obvious phenomena are not contradicted by valid perception. When the Buddha talked about obvious things such as the colour of the snow mountain being white, then that can be validated by a valid perception. Of course, someone with jaundice will not see it as white but as yellow, but that is not a valid perception because their perception is impaired. Thus, an obvious object can be analysed and be validated as being true by mere valid perceptions that confirm it as being true.

Slightly obscure phenomena are not contradicted by valid inference based on the force of evidence. For example, when the Buddha taught that the nature of products is that they are impermanent and transitory, this can be analysed and validated by the valid inference holding it to be true. The opposite, which is that products are permanent, does not hold as it does not withstand analysis using valid reasoning. The Buddha's statement that things do not have a self, for example, is also within the category of slightly obscure phenomena, so it has to be validated through valid inference.

Extremely obscure phenomena are validated by scriptural authority. This means that the analysis is based on validating the phenomena by reference to scriptures that withstand the three-fold analysis. Examples of extremely obscure phenomena are the subtleties of karma, and the extensive merit gained from bodhicitta, which is in this category. So we need to rely on citations from the Buddha's teachings, i.e. the scriptural authority of a valid being, to validate such extremely obscure phenomena.

The syllogism to validate the King of Concentrations Sutra is: Take the subject, the King of Concentrations Sutra: Its contents are infallible—because it is a citation that it withstands the three-fold analysis. I have explained this syllogism several times in previous teachings, so it would be good for you to look it up as way to expand on your understanding on this. I will not go into further detail now.²

I remember that on one of His Holiness's visits some years ago, His Holiness presented the very same topic in his teaching that I had just taught. After the teaching Lobsang Jinpa commented, 'His Holiness went into great detail on that particular topic. He must have been intending that for the senior geshe who were present', indicating that it would have been too obscure for general listeners. However, I later heard that many students who had been attending my classes actually understood what His Holiness was presenting, based on what I had explained in our classes here.

That might have been a way for you to gain a little bit more confidence in my teachings [laughter]. You may gradually develop confidence in my teachings like that!

2.3.2.2.3. Clearing away doubt

First of all, certain doubts that might go through our minds are presented. Doubts such as if sentient beings naturally don't want to experience suffering and they naturally want happiness then wouldn't they be capable of working that out for themselves? Why would we have to actually do it for them? Those sorts of doubts are raised and then the teachings explain how to clear them away. Shantideva wrote these poignant lines, which are often quoted in the teachings:

28. *Though having the wish to destroy suffering
They run directly to suffering itself or alone;
Though desiring happiness, due to ignorance
They destroy their happiness like an enemy.*

Due to ignorance specifically refers to being ignorant of what righteous things to adopt and what negative things to discard or abandon.

This presentation relates particularly to the practices that are presented in the small scope of the lam rim teachings. This is, of course, my personal interpretation as to how this definitely relates to the practices presented in the small scope. More specifically, ignorance refers here to not knowing how to adopt virtues such as the ten virtues and how to shun or to abandon the ten non-virtuous deeds. Overcoming that ignorance is the way to stop creating the causes for one's own suffering.

This teaching is not really all that difficult to understand. It's just a matter of reading it, trying to contemplate it and then trying to integrate it into your own way of thinking. That's how it will benefit you. Even if you are not able to practice it in extensive ways with large numbers of beings, it is important to begin with your own companion or partner. It's important to begin at home and really try to practice this teaching with those you relate to in your everyday life.

Our mental agony seems to begin with a lack of harmony with our very closest companions. So if we can make peace, beginning with those we live with, then we will have a joyful smile and a happy mind. The reason we live with companions is so that we can derive a mutual benefit, but of course our predicament is that often we seem to receive a lot of harm from the very person from whom we feel we can gain benefit. The reason why we seem to have more intense anger towards someone who is supposed to be close is because of that very expectation we have: 'I expected to gain benefit from this person, but instead of benefit I am receiving harm'. That is why anger erupts like a huge fire in our minds. I have often mentioned that if children don't respond well to their parents and have a good rapport with them, then there is a significant reason for parents to feel distraught and unhappy.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

28 May 2013

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta motivation that we generated earlier, we can now engage in the practice of meditation with a focused mind.

[meditation]

It is important to generate a proper motivation prior to receiving the teaching, such as: In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment myself.

So we generate the thought, from the depth of our hearts, of wishing to achieve enlightenment in order to benefit all sentient beings, and for that purpose, listening to the teachings and putting them into practice well.

Shantideva presented the unique exchanging self with other technique for developing bodhicitta, and a good preparation for engaging in this practice whole-heartedly is to engage in this practice at a meditation level.

2.3.2.2.3. Clearing away doubt

The first verse of the three verses relating to this heading is:

28. *Though having the wish to destroy suffering
They run directly to suffering alone;
Though desiring happiness, due to their ignorance
They destroy their happiness like an enemy.*

It is good to really contemplate the very profound meaning of this verse.

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section with a rhetorical question:

Sentient beings wish for happiness, and do not wish for suffering, and by striving in this way they are able to achieve happiness and abandon suffering. Therefore are they not proficient in the practice of achieving happiness and abandoning suffering? Why should others strive for that purpose?

It is indeed true that we all like to believe that we are skilled in acquiring the means for our own wellbeing and in removing any unwanted problems or suffering. We all have the notion, 'Oh, I am quite skilled at that', and might well have the assumption that, because we are already well-equipped, we do not need any further advice. It is, of course, a fact that sentient beings wish for happiness and do not wish for suffering, and at a personal level we make every attempt to make this wish come true.

The doubt that is raised here is that, if individuals are already proficient in the practice of achieving happiness and abandoning suffering for themselves, then why should others strive to achieve their purpose. The answer, as stated by Gyaltsab Je, is:

One definitely needs to strive.

Then Gyaltsab Je goes on to explain the reason:

Although sentient beings have an intent to abandon suffering, through the power of the afflictions they only create the causes for suffering. Thus they run infinitely in cyclic existence, especially towards the suffering of the lower realms.

This very meticulous presentation explains that while none of us wish to experience any suffering, it is as if we are intentionally running towards our own suffering. That is because we actually engage in accumulating the very causes of suffering. So it is as if we want to experience suffering. A very vivid analogy that illustrates this is with moths, which, being attracted to light, fly into a flame or a lamp. We can see so many moths perish in the flame of a candle or get trapped in a light fitting and perish because of the heat. Our predicament is exactly like that: we run towards the very sources that cause us so much suffering.

The causes of suffering are, for example, engaging in the ten non-virtues. Rather than abandoning these ten non-virtues, sentient beings intentionally create negativities such as killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, divisive speech, harmful speech, gossip, and the three of the mind; covetousness, harmful intent and wrong view. So, sentient beings engage in the very deeds or actions that are the causes of suffering. Rather than abandoning or refraining from engaging in these causes of their suffering, they are attracted to and engage in the very causes of suffering. That is how sentient beings inevitably end up experiencing suffering.

As explained in many other teachings as well, if we don't wish to experience suffering, we need to overcome the causes of suffering; the only way to eliminate suffering is to abandon the causes of suffering. Other commentaries explain the lines having the wish to destroy suffering, they run directly to suffering alone, to mean that if we intentionally adopt the causes of suffering, then it is inevitable that we will experience suffering. If we adopt the causes rather than abandoning them, then the outcome is that we will definitely experience the consequence, which is suffering.

As I have mentioned previously in other sessions, we need to consider this predicament carefully. We need to be really mindful of our actions. There are often cases where, when we are not able to engage in some negative action, rather than feel a sense of loss, we feel glad about it. We might even claim, 'Oh, I have missed a great opportunity'. How many times have we been in a state where we intentionally strive to engage in some negative action and if we are unable to do so we feel sad about that? For as long as we hold onto such an attitude, we will not be abandoning the causes of suffering. If we intentionally create the causes of suffering and feel sad and distraught when we are not able to do so, then how are we ever going to overcome suffering?

Having considered and contemplated our own predicament first, we can then relate it to others who are totally ignorant about the causes of suffering. What chance do they have when they are completely ignorant about what the causes of suffering are? They are completely ignorant of the fact that they are repeatedly creating the causes of suffering that lead them to perpetually experience great sufferings. It is said that when we think about the predicament of other sentient beings in this manner, then we will develop a much more profound and deeper level of compassion towards them.

This level of compassion is called uncommon compassion, which is unlike the common form that arises in relation to witnessing the obvious suffering of others. The uncommon compassion arises when one understands and sees how beings intentionally strive in creating the very causes of suffering. From our own experience we know very well how difficult it is to avoid creating some of the causes of suffering, even though we know that they are causes of suffering. Beings who are completely ignorant and who do not have that understanding are in a much more pitiful situation.

These profound lines from Shantideva are very poignant, and it would be really good to memorise them.

*Though having the wish to destroy suffering,
They run directly towards suffering alone
Though desiring happiness, due to ignorance,
Destroy their own happiness like an enemy.*

It would be good to reflect on the meaning of this verse on a daily basis: 'Am I running towards suffering by creating the causes for suffering? Am I holding onto the very causes of suffering? Could I be destroying the causes of my own happiness?' It is really important to consider these points. By memorising these lines you can remember their meaning on a daily basis, which will be very helpful.

Based on the understanding of what is being presented here we can slowly get a sense of the value of the mind training practices, where we train the mind to be happy when we experience suffering, and unhappy when we have pleasurable experiences. Being happy when we experience suffering arises from understanding that whenever we experience suffering we are experiencing the result of previously created negative karma. So the experience of suffering means that previously created negative karma has ripened, and as we are experiencing suffering we are actually exhausting that negative karma. So we should be glad that the negative karma is ripening now, so that we won't have to experience it in the future. Willingly accepting any difficulties that we might be experiencing now will enhance our practice.

The reason why this practice serves as an antidote to overcome worldly concerns is because training our mind to think in this way helps to overcome the delusions. If we don't embrace this practice of being happy when we experience suffering, then because we are not happy about it, our mind will begin to feel agitated and slowly become angry. So if we don't endure suffering when we experience it, we will inevitably start to feel angry, and create negativity from that anger.

It is the same with being unhappy with pleasurable experiences. When we have fleeting pleasurable experiences, we are using up our good karma. If we are attached to the pleasurable experience then it is just a waste of our good karma, which is not something to be happy about. Furthermore, if you don't embrace this attitude of feeling unhappy when experiencing pleasant situations, then your happiness will slowly turn into attachment to that pleasurable experience, and thus we create negativity.

So embracing these points of practice is essential if we are to overcome the delusions, in particular anger and attachment. As such, they are a supreme means to overcome the eight worldly concerns.

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Though they wish for happiness they are confused about the methods for happiness, and out of ignorance they destroy their happiness, as if it were their enemy.

When one does not adopt the causes for happiness and actually intentionally abandons those causes, then it is as if one is destroying the very causes of the happiness one longs for.

As explained in the teachings on karma, if one wishes to abandon suffering, one needs to abandon the causes of suffering. The causes of happiness are refraining from the ten non-virtuous actions, so if one intentionally adopts these non-virtuous actions then one is destroying the causes of happiness. Yet so often we seem to intentionally adopt non-virtuous actions, such as taking life, stealing and so forth. There are many who take great pleasure in engaging in non-virtuous actions such as killing!

Whenever we experience suffering, we should think, 'This suffering is the consequence of engaging in negativity in the past. As I do not like this experience of suffering, and do not want to experience it again, I should therefore avoid adopting the causes of suffering'. Every time we remember to think in this way, the suffering becomes worthwhile, because it encourages us to refrain from further adopting the causes of suffering. In fact the teachings mention five qualities of suffering from which we derive benefit.

Likewise when one experiences a happy situation, then rather than being attached to that happy state, we should remember, 'Since this is a happy state that I wish to experience, and as it is a result of engaging in the positive causes for happiness, may I strive to further adopt the causes for true happiness'. That is how we need to exhort and encourage ourselves to adopt these practices.

Gyaltsab Je concludes his commentary on verse 28 with these words:

In this way, they engage mistakenly in the methods for achieving happiness and avoiding suffering.

As so meticulously explained earlier, this is exactly the predicament of sentient beings.

Since we unavoidably experience suffering, the advice for our personal practice whenever we experience any kind of suffering or uncomfortable situation, we should take that as a message from the Buddha reminding us to avoid engaging in negativity. Whenever we experience a pleasant situation, that is also a message from the Buddha reminding us to adopt virtue. Whenever we experience an unpleasant situation, we need to consider it as a personal message from the Buddha, and remember, 'Since it is an uncomfortable situation I should avoid the causes of suffering, which is all negativity'. Likewise whenever we experience happiness, we should regard it as a message from the Buddha to adopt virtue.

When we actually put these points into practice then we will be able to adapt to any kind of situation that we may encounter, and it won't disturb us to any great extent. When we experience suffering, then rather than becoming agitated and wary and feeling despondent about it, we can think, 'OK, this is a reminder for me to further engage in virtue and avoid negativity, and to engage in practices to purify the causes of suffering'. If we adopt this way of thinking then when we experience suffering we can make that suffering part of our practice. Then, rather than being in a situation that causes us distress, making us feel despondent and completely overwhelmed, it will actually become a means to further enhance our practice.

Whenever we experience a pleasant situation, rather than relaxing, taking it for granted and becoming lazy, we should think, 'Well this is the result of good karma that I have created previously. So, now I can use this opportunity to further enhance my practice. I should not become attached to these good conditions, but rather create more virtue and causes for happiness'. Thus, we incorporate both pleasant and unpleasant situations into our practice. In that way our practice becomes steady, rather than constantly fluctuating.

It is in this way that we can use whatever circumstances we find ourselves in to engage in the practice of adopting what needs to be adopted, and abandoning what needs to be abandoned. We need to constantly be mindful of this practice.

If we don't know how to transform our suffering to encourage ourselves to engage in further practice, then we will really miss out; we can become completely lost and immersed in our own suffering. Thus, transforming suffering into the path is an essential method to enhance our practice.

The next lines from the root text are:

29. *Those who are destitute of happiness
And who have many sufferings,
I shall satisfy them with every happiness and Remove all their sufferings.*

30ab. *I shall also eliminate their ignorance
What other virtue could equal that?*

With regard to first two lines Gyaltsab Je explains:

For that reason, what virtue is equal to the mind that wants to satisfy sentient beings, who are confused about the methods of happiness and suffering, and who lack happiness and have many sufferings?

What greater virtue could there be than wanting to satisfy sentient beings who are confused about the methods of happiness and suffering, and who lack happiness and have so much suffering? This rhetorical question implies that there is no greater virtue. Again we are being presented with the optimum method for developing profound and deep compassion for sentient beings.

The second two lines I shall satisfy them with every happiness and remove all their suffering, relates to the bodhicitta attitude.

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

What virtue, with all the happiness of higher status and definite goodness, wants to cut the continuity of all suffering and clear the ignorance that is confused with regard to what is to be practiced and what is to be abandoned?

This refers to another doubt: Why should one strive for the purpose of others? The answer is that, although wishing to avoid suffering sentient beings create the very causes for their own suffering because of their ignorance, and although wishing for happiness, they destroy the causes of their own happiness, because of their ignorance. Therefore there is no equal or higher virtue to the mind that wants to satisfy sentient beings who are confused about the methods of happiness and suffering, and who lack happiness and have many sufferings.

Here, wishing them to have all the happiness of higher status and definite goodness refers to enjoying all forms of happiness, and removing all forms of suffering from the temporal happiness of high status all the way up to ultimate happiness of definite goodness, liberation and enlightenment.

The aspect of love within the bodhisattva's mind is wishing all beings to experience the happiness of high status all the way up to definite goodness; the aspect of compassion in the bodhisattva's mind is wishing all beings to be free from all sufferings; the aspect of wisdom within the bodhisattva's mind is that which wishes to clear away the ignorance of sentient beings, i.e. that is confused with regard to what is to be practised and what is to be abandoned. This is the main point that is being presented. Bodhisattvas strive to help beings who wish for happiness and who do not wish to experience any suffering, but who completely lack the knowledge to attain their wishes. These beings are confused about what is to be practised and what is to be abandoned, so the bodhisattvas intend to lead them to that state of understanding, by removing their ignorance of the causes of suffering and happiness. Thus, the answer as to why it is essential to strive to work towards providing happiness and removing the suffering of other beings, is that because of their ignorance sentient beings lack the optimum means to do it themselves.

In relation to this particular point, Shantideva says: I shall also eliminate their ignorance. Thus: what other virtue could equal that?

It is bodhicitta that enables bodhisattvas to work towards eliminating the suffering of sentient beings, and endowing them with a state of happiness. The question Shantideva poses: What other virtue could equal that? is a rhetorical question, implying that bodhicitta is indeed the highest virtue. As such there is no power equal to the power of bodhicitta.

Although the commentary explains the meaning of the verses, it is good to remember the verse itself and then use the commentary to elucidate its meaning. Verses are easier to recite and to reflect upon because of their concise nature, and because of the profound meaning, they are optimum means to instil love and compassion within us.

The last two lines of verse in this section are:

30cd *Where else is such a friend?
Where else is such merit?*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

What other friend is there who establishes all happiness and rescues from all suffering? What other merit is there that shows correctly what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned? There is none. That is why one should strive to generate the mind of enlightenment.

What other friend is there who establishes happiness and rescues us from suffering, implies there is no superior friend than that mind of enlightenment, and that there is no intent superior than that wish to benefit others.

This is exactly what I have been saying to you over and over again in my teachings. The wish to benefit others, and the love and compassion within your heart is your best friend. How do we define a best friend? It is someone who only thinks of benefiting us and who does not wish us any harm. The bodhicitta attitude, based as it is on love and compassion, is an attitude that can only benefit us. There is no harm in holding this attitude, there is only benefit; there are only advantages and no disadvantage. Therefore we need to strive to cultivate that state of love and compassion in our heart. I am just trying to re-emphasise what the great master Shantideva presented in this very special teaching.

The way we need to take this to heart is to really think again and again about the unmatched value of love and compassion and ultimately, of course, bodhicitta, which is all condensed into the whole-hearted wish and resolve to benefit others. We develop it from the depth of our heart, by thinking again and again about the great benefits of developing love and compassion. The more we contemplate the value, benefits and great advantages of developing such an attitude, the more we will be inclined to really develop it. When it is well established in our minds, the wish to benefit others will be cultivated from the depth of our heart. We need to be inspired to develop and establish bodhicitta, just as indicated in the dedication verse we recite regularly.

May the supreme jewel bodhicitta
That has not arisen, arise and grow,
And may that which has arisen never diminish,
But increase more and more.

This one verse encapsulates the presentation of the entire Bodhisattvacharyavatara. As mentioned previously, the first three chapters of Bodhisattvacharyavatara focus on developing the bodhicitta that has not yet been developed. The subject of the next three chapters is increasing the bodhicitta that has already been developed. Then chapters seven to nine show how to firmly establish bodhicitta so that it never declines, and the last chapter is the dedication.

By relating to the text in this way, we can be encouraged to develop bodhicitta within ourselves.

2.4. Praising the person who has generated such a mind

Thus far we have covered the benefits of bodhicitta, and now we come to the noble being who has generated bodhicitta.

It is inner qualities we see in someone that determine whether they are considered as praiseworthy. Even in a conventional sense we praise people for their character and their good qualities, not just their physical body. Here, when we contemplate the unequalled value of bodhicitta, we will naturally be able to see that anyone who has bodhicitta is praiseworthy.

There are three subdivisions in this category:

- 2.4.1. Suitable for praise because of helping out of compassion, without being asked
- 2.4.2. If even small benefit is praiseworthy then achieving all happiness and benefit is even more praiseworthy
- 2.4.3. Praiseworthy because of becoming the supreme field

2.4.1. Suitable for praise because of helping out of compassion, without being asked

We regard anyone who helps us when we are in difficulties, even if we have not asked for help, as being very kind. This section relates to that particular aspect of a bodhisattva.

The relevant verse is quite easy to understand:

31. *If any repaying of benefit
Is momentarily praiseworthy,
What need is there to mention the bodhisattva
Who does good without being asked to?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse begins with:

One should praise and eulogise bodhisattvas.

The reason that is presented is:

From a conventional point of view, someone who repays a kindness is praised, with the saying, 'That is a grateful person'.

We all agree that whenever someone benefits from the kindness of another, they will praise that kindness, and say they are very grateful for that. That is definitely the case at our conventional level.

I have related to you previously that I go to the St Kilda sea baths regularly. Last year there was a man who regularly brought his aged mother to the pool. He was very attentive to her, helping her into the pool, helping her while she was in the pool, and then helping her to get out. On one occasion I put my thumbs up, indicating that what he was doing was a really good thing. I haven't seen him with his mother again this year, so maybe his mother's age is such that she finds it too difficult to come now.

There was also another lady who would come with her mother and help her. I once asked her, 'Is she your mother?' and she said, 'Yes'. I praised her saying, 'It is really very good that you are helping your mother, bringing her here, helping her out. Your kindness is quite incredible'. Later I met her at the pool again, when she said, 'Oh, my mother is not able to come now, but she would really like to see you again'. When I see the younger generation taking care of the older generation, particularly their parents, it moves my mind and is praiseworthy.

I used to see some definitely older people in the baths and they seemed to be happy to see me, but I haven't seen them for a while. Maybe they are not able to come any more. There were also young children who used come to the pool as well, but they don't come any more. Maybe they have to go to school now. These toddlers were very happy and glad to see me when I was there.

We need to take these examples of people who are serving the elderly to heart, and to try to implement it as part of one's practice, particularly if one has aged parents. I consider caring for aged parents as one of the highest virtues. And in fact that is not just my personal view. The Buddha himself mentioned in his teachings that caring for the sick and the elderly and one's parents creates great virtue and is very meritorious. As the Buddha indicated, when one's parents are aged and not very well, then all of the conditions to create merit are met in caring for them.

My practical advice, which I have shared with others in the past, is that when caring for your parents, try to not even think about the past. There might be uncomfortable memories, but at present that is all irrelevant. Just think, 'These are my parents and I am their child, and it is fitting for me to be helping them now'. Just focusing on that, and helping and serving one's father or mother is a really great deed. Having shared this practical advice, some have confided in me that they have really benefited from that advice, which encouraged them to take the initiative to actually care for their parents. They thanked me, saying they would never forget that advice. If we can take this to heart it will really be a practical and great way to accumulate virtue.

A more specific account is the exchange that I once had with Toby Gilles. It must have been several years ago, as his mother passed away about two years ago. So it was some time ago when I asked after his mother, and his response was, 'Oh, Mum is quite frail and unable to go out much, but her mind seems to be quite happy'. He went on to explain that his sister was really caring for her, making tea, cooking and nursing her, and my immediate response to that was, 'That is incredibly good. She is really practising the Dharma'.

Then I went on to say, 'I can't say for certain that sitting down, doing your prayers, and meditating is practising Dharma, but I can definitely confirm that your sister's care for her mother is Dharma practice'. He was a bit taken back and said, 'Do you really mean it? I said, 'Yes, I can definitely confirm that your sister is practising Dharma, but whether your sitting down and saying prayers and meditating is Dharma or not, I cannot say for sure'. Then I explained that my reason was based on one definition of Dharma, which is that benefiting others is practising Dharma. In this case, Toby's sister was definitely benefiting their mother by helping and caring for her, and so there was no question about whether or not that virtue was Dharma, whereas, the virtue of reciting prayers and meditating depends on one's motivation, and as such, one can't say for sure whether that the action itself is a Dharma practice or not.

I was able to speak in that very frank way with Toby because he was quite fond of me. We had a good rapport. Whenever I used to go to Geshe Loden's centre in the past, he would always take it upon himself to make tea or coffee for me and make sure that I was comfortable. He even went to the extent of saying, 'If you were come to live here, I would definitely take care of all your needs', but changes have taken place and he is not living there any longer.

It has been a while since I last saw Toby, but the last time we met I mentioned to him there is a nice venue at Bacchus Marsh where we used to go for Easter courses and it might be good for him to arrange for some Dharma talks there, and that people who are interested might come to the talks. I was encouraging him to share his knowledge of the Dharma in that way. I haven't met him since then. I was invited to his birthday some time after our last meeting, but I was not able to go.

To continue with Gyaltsab Je's commentary, if, in worldly terms, someone who repays a kindness is praised, then:

What need is there to mention that bodhisattvas, who achieve all happiness and benefit out of compassion without being asked, are worthy of praise by gods and humans?

From the conventional point of view we are grateful to someone who helps us and praise them for their kindness. So what need is there to mention being grateful to bodhisattvas who, out of great compassion, extend their help to all beings, without even being asked, benefiting others to achieve the ultimate state of happiness. Without any doubt, such bodhisattvas are worthy of praise, not only by humans but also by gods.

As you are aware, the next session is the discussion session and following that is the exam. As I mention regularly it is good to engage in the discussion as well as the exam with a good attitude, in a spirit of sharing and further developing your understanding.

More importantly it is good to keep these points in mind in our regular daily life. We need to really understand these points and try to put them into practice as much as we can. Our kind attitude should be based on love and compassion and kindness, and the practice that we engage in has to be the practice of adopting virtue and abandoning negativity. To the best of our ability, we need to take every opportunity to accumulate virtue or merit and to abandon and really minimise negativity.

That, in essence, is the practice that we need to adopt. The benefit from the virtue or the merits that we accumulate from that will travel with us to the end of this life and beyond. None of us are extending our life span. In fact we are all getting closer and closer to our next life. Whether young or old, we are all in the same predicament—we will come to the end of this life and go onto the next life. So it is good to be equipped for that journey, and to take something with us into the next existence.

The alternative to preparing ourselves in this way would be trying to hold onto whatever wealth we have accumulated. I have recently heard an account of someone who was always holding onto his pillow. When he died and they took his body away they found the pillow was filled with his money. This goes to show the extent of clinging that someone can have for their money.

There is another story of the Tibetan who passed away in Dharamsala. It was traditional to sell the possessions of the dead. He had a doona which, of course, was sold very cheaply. The person who bought it took it to the river to wash it and noticed that there was something unusual stuffed inside. The Tibetan had been using the doona to store his money.

Then there was the Tibetan in Dalhousie who was known to always carry his cushion with him wherever he went. Later it became known that he did so because it was his safe for storing his gold. In the early days of course he would not have had good accommodation, so he might not have really found a good place to keep his gold. So he was quite clever to put it in a cushion which was the last place people might think to look. He was never separated from this cushion, which was his safe.

This is just one account of how having wealth doesn't necessarily bring calm and peace, but can cause more worries. Of course, I have many other stories like that, but I will leave them for another time.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

25 June 2013

Based on the motivation generated during the recitation of the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

Also, as for the motivation for receiving the teachings, it would be good to generate a motivation based on bodhicitta; such as the thought:

For the sake of all sentient beings, in order to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teaching and put its meaning into practice well.

The main point is to try to generate a motivation that is not tainted by mere self-interest.

2.4. Praising the person who has generated such a mind (cont.)

2.4.2. If even small benefit is praiseworthy then achieving all happiness and benefit is even more praiseworthy

This heading is covered in these two verses:

32. *Even giving scornfully just one instance
Of ordinary food, which lasts only half a day, To a few migrators
Is praised by beings, saying:
'It is an act of virtue'.*
33. *What need is there to mention the continual generosity
Of working to complete all mental intentions,
The highest happiness of the tatagatas,
For countless sentient beings for a long time.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on these verses reads:

In worldly terms, someone who gives inferior ordinary food in an inferior manner, with scorn and no praise, to a small number of beings, (such as one hundred), enough for only half a day, will be regarded by the people as a great sponsor who practises virtue.

What need is there to mention then that someone who continually gives the superior object, the highest uncontaminated happiness of the tatagatas, with the special benefit that it satisfies each and every thought, in a respectful manner to the expansive field of innumerable sentient beings for as long as cyclic existence remains, is praiseworthy?

Therefore one should have single-pointed respect for the bodhisattvas who have this mind.

As explained in detail here, the benefit that bodhisattvas extend is definitely an object worthy of praise and veneration, because this benefit is focused on all living beings, which is an incredibly expansive scope.

2.4.3. Praiseworthy because of becoming the supreme field

This section is subdivided into three:

2.4.3.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to be even a little disrespectful to a bodhisattva

2.4.3.2. The reason why it is suitable to meditate on faith

2.4.3.3. They are worthy of praise and going for refuge

As Gyaltsab Rinpoche clearly elucidates, the negativity incurred by criticising a bodhisattva is very grave. As we are not able to discern who is a bodhisattva and who is not, there is always the danger that we might be criticising or ridiculing someone who is in fact a bodhisattva. Therefore we need to be incredibly cautious about criticising others in general, because we would incur grave negativity if they are a bodhisattva. Thus Gyaltsab Rinpoche cautions us to be really mindful and careful about this point.

Can you give me a definition of a bodhisattva?

Student: A person of the Mahayana lineage who is intent on benefiting others by achieving enlightenment, accompanied by the deeds.

When an explanation of what a bodhisattva means is sought, it would be good to have a clear, concise and succinct explanation already in mind.

A bodhisattva is a being who has developed bodhicitta, which has two components bodhi and citta. The Tibetan word for bodhi is jang chub, which has two syllables and a separate connotation of each. It is good to contemplate what bodhi or jang chub implies. If you can remember, this was discussed at the very beginning of the text.

The title of the text is Bodhicharyavatara. The charya relates to the actions, which includes the basis, the path and the result or fruits; so all three aspects of the path are explained in that one word charya.

A bodhisattva is a being who has developed the bodhicitta mind. Thus a succinct explanation of a bodhisattva is a being who has developed the mind that aspires to enlightenment, and who engages in the actions of the six perfections.

As I have also explained previously, a buddha has bodhicitta in their mental continuum, however they are not referred to as bodhisattva. These are important points to keep in mind.

2.4.3.1. THE REASON WHY IT IS UNSUITABLE TO BE EVEN A LITTLE DISRESPECTFUL TO A BODHISATTVA

34. *If one generates negative minds towards
One bodhisattva patron like this, one needs
To remain in the hells for eons equalling
The number of negative minds, the Buddha taught.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Should one criticise or generate a negative attitude towards those ultimate bodhisattva benefactors, who offer all benefit and happiness to any sentient being, then this negative attitude is the supreme among negativities. If one generates a negative attitude, then it is taught in the Sutra of Strong Peace Definitely Abiding Magical Emanation:

Jampel, should a bodhisattva generate anger or a criticising mind towards another bodhisattva then it is said for that many eons he will remain in the hells. Therefore, wear your armour.

As taught here by the Able One, one will remain in the hells for as many eons as the number of moments one generates the negative mind. Therefore, one should be careful concerning this object.

From the Sutra of the Seal Generating the Power of Faith:

It generates much more countless negativity to generate a negative attitude and so forth towards a bodhisattva who aspires to the Mahayana, than to destroy or burn stupas equalling the number of sand grains in the Ganges.

As support it states that the buddhas are born from the bodhisattvas, and that to harm the cause of the buddhas is taught in many teachings and commentaries as supremely negative.

Gyaltsab Je's explanation is quite clear so there is no need for further elaboration.

2.4.3.2. THE REASON WHY IT IS SUITABLE TO MEDITATE ON FAITH

This is covered in these two lines:

*35ab. But, if one practices clear faith
Its result will increase even more,*

Gyaltsab Rinpoche's explanation is meticulous. First, it indicates that because bodhisattvas are working towards the ends of all sentient beings, it is a grave negativity to criticise, ridicule or disparage bodhisattvas. Then, because they are an object of faith, if one were to generate a moment of faith with a clear mind, one's virtue will increase incredibly. This is a very logical and meticulous presentation.

As his commentary reads:

However, if a person has clear faith in a bodhisattva, then the result of that virtue will increase more than the earlier explained result of negativity.

While the negativity incurred by disparaging and criticising a bodhisattva is very grave, vast virtue is accumulated from a clear mind of faith in a bodhisattva. Praising and having faith in a bodhisattva will accumulate an incredible amount of merit. So there is far more benefit in generating faith and veneration, and paying respect to a bodhisattva, than the negativity incurred from criticism.

This can also be understood in conjunction with the qualities of a bodhisattva. The benefits of developing the mind of bodhicitta and the qualities of someone who has developed bodhicitta have been explained extensively. These are directly related to the great virtue or merit that one accumulates by praising a bodhisattva.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

For however many moments of clear faith there are, for a much greater number of eons one will experience the special result.

This is explaining the great results from generating faith, for even just one moment. These explanations exhort us to develop that faith in the qualities of a bodhisattva.

Finally, Gyaltsab Je says:

This is taught in the Sutra of the Seal of the Definitive and Indefinite.

There is a quote from this sutra, but we will not go through that.

2.4.3.3. THEY ARE WORTHY OF PRAISE AND GOING FOR REFUGE

The next two lines of verse read:

*35cd. Even great force against the conqueror's children
Will not raise negativity, it increases virtue naturally.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Even if the great children of the conquerors are confronted with the intent to harm or cause suffering, they will not generate negative minds such as anger and so forth, and their virtue will naturally increase, even when faced with danger or loss of their lives.

As explained in the mind training teachings, adverse circumstances, or any kind of difficulties (such as lacking sufficient food, clothing, dwelling and so forth) will not daunt the person who is intent on practice. Those very difficulties can be transformed into the path. The Tibetan word dogal translated here as great force also has the connotation of the significant difficulties that one may face. As mentioned in the teachings, transforming difficulties in the path does not literally mean that negative circumstances will actually become the path. Rather, difficulties and so forth can complement one's practices on the path. That is the main meaning of transforming difficulties into the path. Rather than becoming a hindrance, difficulties and so forth become an aid for one's practice. In this way not only can suffering be more readily endured, but it can be transformed as an aid to complement one's practice.

The crucial point lies in the lines, they will not generate negative minds such as anger and so forth, but instead their virtue will naturally increase, even when faced with danger and loss of their lives. An ordinary mind responds to suffering and difficulties with anger, or at the very least some annoyance and agitation, and the moment that this happens there is no way for virtue to increase. From the very instant we generate anger and so forth we immediately incur and accumulate negativity.

As explained here, a bodhisattva, even when their life is at stake, will not allow any situation to become a cause for engaging in negativity or allow a negative mind to arise. Rather, they will use that situation as a way to further increase their virtue. We need to take this advice to heart and try to implement it in our own practice. If bodhisattvas do not allow even a moment of negativity to arise, even if their life is at stake, and only accumulate virtue, then that should be an example for us to try our best. When we face minor difficulties in life, we should not allow a negative mind to arise and we should try to maintain a virtuous mind. That is the main point.

When bodhisattvas are referred to in the teachings they are always referred to as being objects worthy of veneration and praise. If we really understand the practices of bodhisattvas then we will come to understand for ourselves why bodhisattvas are regarded as holy or noble beings.

The next verse comes under the same heading:

36. *This precious holy mind
Whoever has generated it, I prostrate to their body.
Though harmed they remain connected with happiness
I take refuge in this source of happiness.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse thus:

For those reasons¹, I respectfully prostrate with my three doors to the body of the person who has generated such a precious holy mind.

I take refuge in the bodhisattvas, who are our source of happiness (as explained later on in the chapter on patience), who when harmed, not only refrain from retaliating, but only offer happiness, just as in the life story of the king Maitrabala who, despite the five yakshas drinking his blood, led them to the state of a superior being.

The crucial point being emphasised is that when harmed, bodhisattvas not only refrain from retaliating, but only offer happiness, unlike ordinary beings who retaliate by returning harm for harm. Instead of returning harm with harm, bodhisattvas only offer happiness to the one who has harmed them, and lead them to the state of ultimate happiness. This in itself is an unprecedented act of compassion. If we think of ourselves as an example, when someone utters uncompromising words, hurtful speech or inflicts any kind of harm on us, we immediately create a negative mind and wish to get back at them! For a bodhisattva, there is not even a hint of retaliating with harmful intentions, only the wish to lead them to the ultimate state of happiness. The connotation of though harmed they remain connected with happiness is that they connect those who harm them with ultimate happiness. Thus, I take refuge and offer veneration to the source of happiness.

Another important point to note here is that there may seem to be a discrepancy here between the earlier explanation, that if out of a negative mind one harms or criticises a bodhisattva, then that will incur the negativity of being reborn in the hell realms for many eons. Whereas here it is explained that if you harm a bodhisattva, they will hold you dear, and by not forsaking you, they will lead you to supreme happiness. So it may seem that there is a discrepancy or a contradiction between these two points.

The earlier point refers to the infallibility of the law of karma: if you create positive karma you will reap positive results, and if you create negative karma you will reap negative results. Thus it concerns one's own karma: if out of a negative mind one harms a bodhisattva, then one's own karmic consequences will be a negative result in the form of unfortunate rebirths in the hell realms and so forth.

Here, however, the point concerns the qualities of a bodhisattva. Even if you harm a bodhisattva, they will hold you dear. Through their compassion they will never forsake you. From the bodhisattva's side, they will never give up on you and will guide you to the ultimate state of happiness. So these points need to be understood in their proper context.

Through their compassion, aspirational prayers and their skilful means, a bodhisattva leads others, even those who harm them, to the ultimate state of happiness.

Furthermore, as the commentary explains:

In short, regardless of whether one enters the tantric or perfection path, the door to the Mahayana is the generation of bodhicitta alone. Therefore, one needs to generate this mind by striving in many methods. As explained earlier, to generate it one must first develop strong, heartfelt enthusiasm for the benefits of meditating on this mind.

Basically, if one is to develop an attitude of bodhicitta a courageous mind is essential.

Then, as Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

That one needs the seven limbs with refuge is explained by this supreme commentary on the stages of the path of a bodhisattva, as well as in the Compendium of Deeds.

To generate the mind of bodhicitta one first meditates on its benefits again and again, which generates a strong inclination to develop that mind, and as an aid to develop that mind we need the seven limb practice. As His Holiness the Dalai Lama recently mentioned, if we add refuge to the usual seven limbs then it becomes eight limbs. I don't know if you recall it but I definitely remember hearing that. Sometimes there is reference to ten limbs of practice, which adds the limbs of faith and bodhicitta as well as the limb of refuge to the usual seven limbs. It is good to remember that so that you don't become confused. The importance of the seven (or eight) limb practice is explained in the Bodhicharyavatara as well as the Compendium of Deeds, which was also composed by Shantideva.

Gyaltsab Je goes on to say:

If the aforementioned explained benefits are condensed, then there are two, which can be subsumed into temporary and ultimate benefits. The first again has two: not falling into the lower realms, and being reborn in a happy migration.

We went through these points in earlier verses, and His Holiness recently emphasised them in his teachings. He quoted the Praise to Maitreya which says that generating bodhicitta protects one from the lower realms, as well as leading one to a happy migration.

Then Gyaltsab Je goes on to present his reasons:

If one generates this mind, then many earlier accumulated causes for the lower realms are purified, and the future accumulation of further causes is interrupted. The causes for a happy migration that one has already accumulated increase due to being held by that mind, and those to be accumulated will be inexhaustible because of arising from that mind.

This succinct explanation states that due to the bodhicitta state of mind, both the causes for unfortunate rebirths are purified, and further causes for unfortunate rebirths are interrupted; and the causes for a happy migration that one has already accumulated will increase, and further causes will be inexhaustible. For as long as the bodhicitta attitude is held in one's mind, one will continuously be accumulating virtue. The personal instruction is, as mentioned again and again in the teachings and by the teachers, that generating the bodhicitta attitude prior to engaging in any virtuous activity is extremely important. When one generates a bodhicitta attitude, it will ensure that whatever activity one engages in will become a means to accumulate the highest form of merit, thus becoming a cause for one's temporary and ultimate happiness.

Furthermore, Gyaltsab Je says,

Ultimately, one easily attains liberation and enlightenment in dependence on this mind, but first one needs to have the spontaneous aspiration to attain those temporary and ultimate benefits because, since these benefits arise from the generation of bodhicitta, one may say, "I shall generate the mind", but it will be mere words. If one analyses one's mind, this will be very clear.

As I mention again and again, it is important that we ensure that our deeds and our attitudes are not just mere words, but that we have actually developed that attitude. We need to really try to put some effort into generating and cultivating that bodhicitta attitude, otherwise, when we recite the text there is a danger that it will become mere words or lip service.

Then Gyaltsab Je further explains:

To generate the wish to attain the two benefits of higher status and definite goodness one needs to first train in the motivations of the small and middle capable being, and then meditate on the mind of enlightenment, which is rooted in love and compassion.

Here again the commentary is stating very clearly that in order to create the causes to obtain higher status, such as a good rebirth (i.e. as a human being) in the next lifetime, one needs to have a good understanding of karma as well as practising it. This is explained clearly in the small scope and the middle scope of the teachings. Without that basis of a profound understanding of the law of karma and abiding by that law, there is no way one can establish the causes to create a higher status.

Without developing an understanding of emptiness and realisation of emptiness, there is no way that one can obtain definite goodness or liberation. To gain a profound understanding and realisation of emptiness, one also needs to have a good basis of the practices of the small and medium scopes.

What this really means is that we need to develop renunciation, because without developing renunciation there is no way that one can gain the realisation of emptiness. Recently when I was among the other geshe we were debating certain points, and I made the comment that there is no way for us who still seek pleasure in samsara to obtain the realisation of emptiness! How could we possibly realise emptiness if we don't give up the pleasures of samsara? Indeed the teachings say: without developing renunciation there is no way to gain the realisation of emptiness.

Even non-Buddhist practitioners such as the Tirthikas, who are classified as extremists, have actually renounced certain levels of suffering. They definitely have developed disgust for the sufferings of the desire realms. With disgust for the pleasures of the desire realm they develop a longing for the pleasures of the higher realms, such as the form and formless realms. Then, when they gain the absorption of the form realms while in a meditative state, they realise that even the pleasures there are mediocre relative to the higher realms. Thus they develop disgust for the pleasures of the form realms and long for the pleasures of the formless realms. Then they go further into meditative absorption to obtain the pleasurable state of the formless realms. So while they have developed a certain amount of renunciation in relation to the two sufferings (the suffering of suffering and the suffering of change) of the lower realms, they have still not overcome the third suffering, the all-pervasive compounded suffering, which is the primary form of suffering. For as long as one does not renounce that third level of suffering, one cannot develop renunciation of the pleasures of samsara. This is the crucial point that we need to understand.

Based on the training of the practices of the small and middle capable being, one meditates on the mind of enlightenment, based on love and compassion. We need to really understand and realise these practices and go through them in systematic stages, leading up to engaging in the higher practices of developing bodhicitta.

Then Gyaltsab Rinpoche, author of the commentary, sums up the meaning of the chapter in this verse:

Those who know they have attained a human body with freedoms and endowments
Meditate with effort on the two bodhicittas.
This is the supreme taking the essence of the freedoms and endowments.
Initially meditate on the benefits of that mind.

THE TITLE OF THE CHAPTER

This is the commentary on the first chapter called The Benefits of the Mind of Enlightenment from the commentary on the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

Having completed the first chapter we will begin the second chapter in our next session. The main subject matter of the second chapter is a detailed presentation of the practices of the seven limbs. You can prepare for this by reading relevant texts such as the lam rim teachings. I taught this chapter at one Easter course in conjunction with the seven limb practice from the lam rim, so you may refer to your notes from that.

At the recent teaching on the Heart Sutra, His Holiness discussed the very beginning of the sutra where it states that the Buddha is absorbed in the meditative state called Profound Illumination. His Holiness explained that the words profound and illumination indicate that the Buddha is simultaneously in meditative as well as in post meditative equipoise. In other commentaries, the profound and illumination are said to refer to subject and object. His Holiness' explanation showed that the quality of the Buddha was such that he could be in these two states simultaneously, and this explanation brought tears to my eyes!

As he has done in the past, His Holiness mentioned in his teaching this time that the word also (from the line: also looking perfectly and correctly at the emptiness of the inherent existence of the five aggregates) has a profound implication. His Holiness offers a very profound explanation of this. Most commentaries explain that also means that not only the aggregates, but also the constituents are empty of inherent existence. However, as His Holiness explained, also implies that not only are the aggregates empty of inherent existence, but the person who is designated upon the five aggregates is also empty of inherent existence. This is a much more profound explanation of the word also, because it has the implication of presenting the lack of inherent existence of both persons as well as other phenomena. This explanation is not really found in other commentaries. Beginning with this explanation His Holiness then went on to explain the essence of the Heart Sutra.

On this recent visit I had many opportunities to be close to His Holiness, which was really good. His Holiness really showed clear signs of being really pleased. So if I don't now attempt to do some practice it would be really embarrassing!

When we were in New Zealand His Holiness approached me and asked how old I was and I offered that I was actually 78 years old, and then at the Quang Minh temple, after the teaching he came down and held my hand and said 'We are of the same age, so we are old buddies!' After the second session at Quang Minh, His Holiness came down and held my hand and said, 'Thank you for what you do'.

The event at Geshe Ngawang Dhargye's centre in Dunedin was really very good. His Holiness was scheduled to visit for only half an hour, but ended up spending about two hours there. When he saw the picture of the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargye, His Holiness spent quite a long time looking at it and commented, "This picture must have been when Geshe-la was quite ill, because normally he was quite plump wasn't he?"

When His Holiness was interviewed soon after he arrived at the New Zealand airport, he explained that one of the main reasons for his visit was to come to the centre which was established by the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargye, who was a great scholar and a practitioner and a great friend. Having been a great friend of His Holiness, he said, "It befalls upon me to take on the responsibility for looking after his centre now". Later I mentioned to the centre staff that if they were to listen to what His Holiness said, they would find great points there for them to consider. There wasn't time to receive His Holiness at Dunedin airport, so I waited at the centre for his arrival. As soon as His Holiness stepped out of the car he came up towards me and held me in his arms for a while. This was definitely an auspicious occasion.

It is important to utilise the teachings to subdue one's mind and not to increase one's pride. As His Holiness himself mentions, if we use the teachings and the words of buddhas to subdue one's mind then it contributes to a happy mind. But if one remains pompous, with a sense of pride, it does not help to contribute to a joyful and happy mind. This is very practical advice presented by His Holiness.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

2 July 2013

Having generated our motivation with the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in meditation, focussing single-pointedly on the practice.

[meditation]

It would also be good to now generate the positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings, as a way to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teaching and put it into practice well.

Familiarising ourselves with these positive intentions is extremely beneficial. At the very least we can familiarise our mind with the thought of how wonderful it would be if all beings could be free from suffering and abide in ultimate happiness, and then think, 'May I be able to do that'. If we can remind ourselves again and again of this intention, and periodically bring it to mind in any activity we engage in, we will be familiarising ourselves with the basis of love and compassion, which then becomes the foundation for developing bodhicitta within our own mind. Familiarising ourselves with this attitude is incredibly meaningful and beneficial. Although as beginners we have not yet developed actual bodhicitta, this sort of attitude can be a substitute for that bodhicitta attitude at our level.

In our last session we completed the first of the ten chapters of the Bodhicharyavatara, which explained the benefits and the many great qualities of bodhicitta. The main topic of the second chapter is how to engage in the purification of negativities.

It is good for us to identify what negativity is, as well as its opposite, virtue. Negativity is defined in the teachings as that which brings about unwanted or unpleasant consequences. So any activity that brings about unpleasant consequences is engaging in negativity. The opposite of negativity, virtue, is that which brings about positive and pleasant consequences for oneself.

We can succinctly identify negativity by referring to the ten non-virtues, which are easy to list. The lam rim teachings explain karma in great detail—the different types of karma, the four pathways of creating karma and so forth. Through this we can understand in greater detail how one creates and engages in negativity. The opposite of the ten non-virtues are the ten virtues, which we can also relate to the lam rim teachings. Thus we will be able to see that intentionally engaging in the ten virtues is a way of accumulating virtue.

We need to have a reason to engage in the practice of abandoning non-virtue and negativities and adopting virtue. Why do we need to abandon negativity and adopt virtue? The reasons can be understood when we think about the unpleasant consequences of negativity and the positive results of virtue. If we don't wish to experience unpleasant results, then we need to abandon negativity; if we want to experience positive results then we need to adopt virtue. It's as simple as that! When we relate this basic understanding to the extensive explanations in the lam rim teachings, we will gain a broader picture of how karma works, which would be really meaningful.

Relating to the lam rim teachings will broaden our understanding of the range of material about karma. So if we are asked, for example, to teach about karma, we will not be short of material to relay—if, that is, we have studied the lam rim. On a practical level it is good for us to expand our own understanding by referring to other teachings, both for our own development as well as to present the topic to others. Then, when a situation arises where we need to present the Dharma to others, we will readily be able to access the knowledge that we have gained from our study of the texts. It is good to take this practical approach to studying the texts.

I've heard comments that the Bodhicharyavatara is an easy text to teach. I personally feel that it is not that easy at all to teach the Bodhicharyavatara thoroughly; one needs to have a broad understanding of the lam rim teachings, the Madhyamaka teachings, the mind training teachings, as well as a good understanding of tenets.

In the past, in our recitations of the Bodhicharyavatara, as you were doing the recitation in English it seemed to take much longer. In particular, when we came to the ninth chapter I would hear you recite terms such as Chittamatra, and I wondered where that came from in the actual text. Later I learnt that the ninth chapter was translated as a commentary, and was not in verse form.

I can safely say that I have made every attempt to study the earlier mentioned subjects, so it's not as if I am trying to present this text without having done any prior study myself. Even though I cannot claim to be able to give you a profound explanation, I have at least attempted to complete the study. I have to assume that when His Holiness the Dalai Lama thanked me, it was because what I'm presenting here might have some value and benefit. There would be no reason at all for His Holiness to thank me about anything else.

1. THE PREPARATORY ACTIONS FOR EXPLAINING THE STAGES OF THE MAHAYANA PATH¹

2. THE ACTUAL EXPLANATION OF THE STAGES OF THE PATH

2.2. The method for taking the essence

2.2.2 Explaining the individual meanings²

2.2.2.1. CONTEMPLATING THE BENEFITS OF ENLIGHTENMENT (CHAPTER 1)

2.2.2.2 THE WAY OF TRAINING IN THE PRACTICES UPON GENERATING THE TWO BODHICITTAS

This is subdivided into two.

2.2.2.2.1. Taking the mind of enlightenment

2.2.2.2.2. The way of training in the perfections

¹ These headings relate to the structural overview of the entire text. The numbering of each chapter is self-contained.

²This heading was introduced on 26 March 2013.

The two bodhicittas were explained in detail in chapter 1, so here we need to be able to immediately reflect on our understanding of what these two bodhicittas refer to.

From just the outlines alone we can see how profoundly the material of the text is presented. Just one heading can carry the whole entire path within it, as is the case with this outline. It implies that having cultivated and developed the two types of bodhicitta (the awakening mind that aspires to enlightenment and the mind that engages in the practices), the next step is to actually engage in the practices, such as the six perfections and the four means of gathering disciples. So this outline is concisely referring to the bodhicitta attitude as well as the practices of the six perfections.

Even just this one line can be a basis for contemplating the entire presentation of how a bodhisattva practises along the path. As mentioned here, the two bodhicittas refers to aspiring bodhicitta and engaging bodhicitta, which can be developed using two specific techniques. With regard to the seven point cause-and-effect technique, it would be good to reflect on what those six causes and their effects are, and contemplate each point. Then we can contemplate the various points within the exchanging self with other techniques. As training in the practices refers to the six perfections, we can reflect on the nature of generosity and how it is practised, and likewise morality, patience, joyful effort, concentration and wisdom and how each of these are practised. The bodhisattva's practices also include the four means of gathering disciples, which are the means by which a bodhisattva gathers disciples.

2.2.2.2.1. Taking the mind of enlightenment

This has two main sections.

2.2.2.2.1.1. Confessing the disruptive conditions, the negativities, by way of the complete four powers, after having done the preliminaries of prostrating, offering and going for refuge

2.2.2.2.1.2. The actual taking of the mind of enlightenment after having applied the conducive conditions of accumulating merit such as rejoicing in virtue and so forth.

The precious mind of enlightenment, or bodhicitta, is not generated spontaneously. Rather, it depends on specific causes and conditions of which there are two types, abandoning the disruptive conditions that have to be purified, and adopting the conducive conditions for developing bodhicitta that need to be acquired.

The conducive conditions are acquired through the accumulation of merit. Without the accumulation of merit there is no possible way to generate bodhicitta within one's mental continuum. Therefore, various methods of accumulating merit are presented in the teachings as a way to acquire the conducive conditions for generating bodhicitta.

The disruptive conditions are the negativities. Thus the negativities need to be purified, for without purifying the negativities there is no possible way to develop bodhicitta. So an extensive explanation of how to purify the negativities is also presented here.

Nagarjuna explains how one definitely needs to accumulate extensive merit as a way to develop bodhicitta, while Asanga explains how one definitely needs to have faith, in order to develop bodhicitta.

The optimum way to incorporate both of these aspects of accumulating merit and generating faith is to engage in making offerings. In addition to accumulating merit the very act of making offerings in an appropriate way will induce faith in the holy objects.

2.2.2.2.1.1. Confessing the disruptive conditions, the negativities, by way of the complete four powers, after having done the preliminaries of prostrating, offering and going for refuge

Having applied the conducive conditions of accumulating merit such as rejoicing in virtue and so forth, taking on the mind of enlightenment begins with engaging in the conducive preliminaries of prostrations, making offerings and going for refuge. Then one engages in the practice of purifying negativities by way of the four opponent powers.

We need to take this presentation as a personal instruction. If we aspire to develop bodhicitta, then we need to engage in the preliminaries. It is not as though we can skip the preliminaries, and suddenly develop bodhicitta. Without engaging in the preliminaries, there is no way we can develop bodhicitta. Therefore we need to identify what the preliminaries are and what the practices involve, and then attempt to really engage in those preliminary practices. That is the optimum method to establish the basis for developing bodhicitta within ourselves.

There are texts that will help us to identify the preliminaries. One of these is Bodhicharyavatara, the text we are studying. The lam rim teachings present the preliminaries as well, particularly in the practices of the small and medium scopes, which are the preliminary practices for developing bodhicitta. So we can refer to these texts to gain a good understanding of the correct sequence of engaging in the preliminaries. Then we can confidently present the preliminary practices to others if they ask us. So understanding the preliminaries is for our own benefit, as well as the benefit of presenting it to others.

CHAPTER 2: PURIFYING NEGATIVITIES

The chapter has two subdivisions:

- I. Explaining the text of the chapter
- II. The title of the chapter

I. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER³

The chapter is divided into four sections:

1. Offerings
2. Prostrations
3. Refuge
4. Confessing of negativity with the four complete powers

In the lam rim the first of the preliminaries is prostration, whereas here the first practice is offering; except for the order there is not much difference.

³ To keep things manageable the numbering system starts again for each chapter.

1. OFFERINGS

This has two main headings:

- 1.1. The need to make offerings
- 1.2. The actual practice of offering

The Tibetan word for offerings is chopa which comes from the Sanskrit word puja, and it has the connotation of pleasing the minds of the gurus, buddhas and deities such as Tara and so forth. So, when we imagine that the object of one's offering is pleased, we are making the actual offering. For our own sake, making offerings is to be understood as an antidote for overcoming miserliness.

The manner of presenting the offerings is clearly presented in the lam rim.

First of all the offerings themselves have to be pure. That is they have to be free from deceit, which is sub-divided into two categories:

1. Free from deceit on a causal level.
2. Free from deceit on a motivational level.

To be free from deceit on the causal level, one needs to ensure that the object of offering is not obtained through wrong livelihood, or acquired through heavy negativities. Wrong livelihood involves pretentious behaviours and so forth. The teachings explain four different types of wrong livelihood. We can, however, offer what we have obtained from others if others have given it to us willingly. Even if we have to ask for donations or beg for an offering, as long as it is given willingly it can be offered, as it would not be an offering obtained by a wrong livelihood. Otherwise, if something is obtained from pretentious behaviour and so forth, then the offering has been obtained through causal deceit, and thus will not be a pure offering.

On a motivational level, the offering has to be free from the eight worldly concerns, i.e. not made with the eight worldly concerns in one's mind. This is extensively presented in the lam rim. Offerings made out of worldly concerns are tainted and cannot become a cause for liberation and enlightenment.

The lam rim teachings present this under the heading of the Six Preliminary Practices. The first of these is to clean the area well first and then arrange the altar with the representations of the three objects of refuge. The offerings have to be on a clean surface, presented in clean containers and so forth, and also arranged very beautifully. When we make water bowl offerings for example, the water bowls have to be arranged neatly and so forth. It is good to understand these details of how to engage in the practices of offering so you can incorporate them into your daily practices. I have previously explained this in detail and it is also good for those of you who were present to refer to those notes.

In addition to the text we are studying, I exhort you to refer to the lam rim teachings which have a very detailed presentation. We cannot forget about the lam rim teachings when we are studying Bodhicharyavatara, and it is good to complement our study of this text with the lam rim as a way to enhance your understanding.

It is good to note Gyaltsab Je's meticulous presentation where he uses the outlines as a way of explaining and summarising the body of the text.

1.1. The need to make offerings

The first verse of this chapter reads:

1. *To take this precious mind,
I make wholesome offerings to an ocean of qualities:
The tathagatas and the holy Dharma,
The stainless Jewel, and the buddhas' children.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je commences his explanation of this verse as follows:

One respectfully makes offerings in thought and action in a wholesome way, with exalted objects.

Here, exalted objects refers to the actual objects of offering. What is to be offered has to be an exalted object. This implies these are objects that are free from deceit, i.e. that they are pure objects. The manner of offering is respectfully. In thought and action can refer to offering with the intention to benefit all sentient beings, to lead them to the ultimate state of happiness and to free them from all suffering.

This is another very meticulous presentation by Gyaltsab Je. It is a concise explanation of the complete form of making an offering in relation to both our physical actions and our thoughts; our gestures in relation to the object itself; and the substance we offer and so forth. All of that has been presented in these few words.

The presentation in the commentary follows the order of the Tibetan version of the verse. Following his explanation of making offerings Gyaltsab Je asks:

To what end?

In other words, for what purpose do we make the offerings. The answer to that is:

For the purpose of taking the precious mind, from which all the masses of goodness of all sentient beings arise.

That is an explanation of the first line of the English translation of the verse. As a way of explaining the following lines of the verse, the commentary presents this rhetorical question:

To which object?

That is to say, to what objects are we presenting the offering? Again it is good for us to understand the meticulously logical quality of the presentation, which reflects how our mind works. It poses questions as a way to quell doubts or queries as they are likely to arise. After the explanation that one should make offerings respectfully in a wholesome way, and that the objects have to be exalted objects, one might ask, 'For what purpose? Why would one need to do that?'

So Gyaltsab Je next presents the objects to whom one presents the offering:

As one makes offerings to the tathagatas and the holy superior beings, and also to the holy Dharma Jewel, the Mahayana truth of cessation that is free from adventitious stains on top of being naturally pure, and the truth of the path, is an object of offering.

The ocean of qualities that are the children of the buddhas, such as the superior lord Avalokiteshvara, Manjushri and others, are included as well.

The meaning of tathagata was extensively explained at the beginning of chapter one, so we can refer to that. A tathagata is an enlightened being. The holy superior beings are the bodhisattvas (of which we have also given an explanation). The holy Dharma refers here to the Dharma Jewel which is the Mahayana truth of cessation and truth of the path. The Mahayana truth of cessation consists of that which is free from adventitious stains, which is naturally pure. Free from adventitious stains refers to the cessation of the deluded obscurations, and naturally pure refers to the obscurations to omniscience. Thus cessation includes being free from both the deluded obscurations as well as the obscurations to omniscience. That is what the cessation means in the Mahayana Dharma Jewel. Then the truth of the path is also included in the Dharma Jewel. Thus the two aspects of the Dharma Jewel are cessation and the truth of the path. The ocean of qualities of the children of the buddhas refers to the holy superior beings, as mentioned here.

1.2. The actual practice of offering

This is subdivided into three:

- 1.2.1. Offering substances that are not owned
- 1.2.2. Offering one's own body
- 1.2.3. Offerings that are emanated by the mind

1.2.1. Offering substances that are not owned

This section has three subdivisions:

- 1.2.1.1. Offering substances
- 1.2.1.2. The way of offering
- 1.2.1.3. The reason for offering substances that are not owned

1.2.1.1. OFFERING SUBSTANCES

The substances that we offer are:

2. *Whatever flowers and fruits there are,
Whatever medicines there are,
Whatever precious objects there are in the world,
Whatever clean and beautiful waters there are,*
3. *High mountains and likewise,
Forested areas, isolated and beautiful,
Flowering trees adorned and weighted with flowers,
All trees whose branches are weighted down with fruit,*
4. *Divine and worldly smells and Incense, wish-fulfilling trees and precious trees,
Uncultivated crops and Further, ornaments suitable as offerings,*
- 5a. *Lakes and ponds adorned with lotus flowers,
And beautiful swans making pleasant sounds.*

Offerings classified as unowned offerings are those things that are not personally owned by oneself. In fact, these are the best offerings for those of us who feel that we don't have much to offer. When we think about these lines of verse, we will find we have no shortage of offerings.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary elaborates on each of the substances listed in the verses.

The unowned flowers of the world, such as lotuses and so forth;

Lotuses and so forth are an example of very beautiful flowers. When we are out and about in a beautiful park or garden, rather than just enjoying it for our own personal pleasure, we can immediately remember to mentally offer these beautiful flowers to the objects of veneration—the objects of refuge. It might be inappropriate to pick a flower as soon as we see it; if it is completely unowned then maybe that's fine, but not if we are in someone's garden or a park where we are not allowed to do that. The advice is to mentally offer the beautiful flower as soon as you see it. The Mandala Offering refers to visualising, which means a mental offering. There can be no dispute if you do that, as you will not be actually taking anything from the environment.

One needs to understand that these are incredible ways for us to take every opportunity to engage in practice and accumulate virtue. As soon as we see a flower we can immediately seize that as an opportunity to make an offering, which is a way for us to accumulate virtue. So it is in these small and moderate ways that we need to start accumulating merit and virtue.

Then as the commentary continues:

- Whatever fruits there are such as aryara and so forth;
- Whatever medicines there are such as camphor and so forth;
- Whatever precious substances there are in the worlds such as gold, silver and so forth;
- Whatever clean and pleasant waters there are such as lakes, ponds and so forth;

This means that whenever we come across small lakes or ponds we can immediately offer them.

The eight mountains of gold and so forth;

These are mythological offerings. Here one visualises offering great mountains of gold and so forth to the objects.

Likewise forests, isolated and beautiful areas;

Along with the objects of offering such as beautiful forests and so forth, isolated and beautiful areas are areas that are conducive for meditation, in particular, for developing calm abiding. So these sorts of places can also be objects of offering.

Flowering trees that are weighted down and adorned with their flowers;

Trees fully in bloom with beautiful flowers are also objects that can be offered.

Trees whose branches are bent by the weight of their ripe pure fruits;

Here, we visualise trees laden with fruit, like mangoes or apples, where the branches are weighed down with their load of fruit.

Pure scents of gods, nagas and so forth, natural ones, applied ones and created ones;

Pleasant incense;

Natural ones refers to pleasant scents that are naturally fragrant. Applied ones and created ones refers to those which are created or applied by the mixing of substances, such as incense. So incense is included in the category of scents which are created, meaning that you have to put many substances together in order to create the nice smell.

The wish-fulfilling tree that gives what one needs and wishes, and trees made out of precious substances;

The wish-fulfilling tree is a mythological tree that is said to bear whatever one wishes for. Now, of course, we refer to a mythological tree, but it is very possible that such trees did exist when the merit of the beings in the world was much greater.

Lakes as one thinks they should be and ponds for bathing, that are adorned with lotuses, where beautiful swans make pleasant sounds;

It is very good for us to visualise these beautiful places and areas to make as offerings. Visualising such an offering can be really soothing and pleasant, and it is really a form of meditation. Visualising pleasant objects can really lift you up and make you feel quite joyful.

The crops that grow by themselves without the need to plough the fields and

This again relates to the time called the fortunate era, when it is said that beings on this planet didn't need to sow seeds to reap a crop. In fact, it is said that if a crop was harvested in the morning, it would already be growing again by evening. This was a fortunate time when merit was very high. It is also said that it declined when humans started to amass things for themselves, when they didn't have to. I think this is one of the heaps on the long mandala offering, the Mandala of the Thirty-five Heaps.

All unowned offerings are summarised in this last offering:

Beautiful ornaments that are suitable to be offered to the tatagatas.

In summary, whatever offering that is suitable to be offered to the tatagatas can be offered. This also implies that there may be certain offerings which are not suitable to be offered, either mentally or actually.

It is also explained in the teachings that we should use the best substances we can afford as an offering. There is a Tibetan sweet cake made out of butter and tsampa which turns mouldy and green if you keep it for too long. Cutting off the mouldy part and offering it would not be suitable. Nor is it suitable to offer a plant with yellowing leaves. In other words one should not be making offerings of substances that one would not use oneself. 'Oh, this is spoiled, I cannot use it, so I might as well offer it!' would be the wrong way of making an offering. Rather one should offer things that are in their prime.

On a personal level, these explanations encourage us to make offerings on a regular basis in whatever way that we can—water bowl offerings, or flowers or even visualised offerings of beautiful parks and so forth. That is a way to accumulate merit in our daily lives.

Offering substances such as one's wealth will not deprive us of food and drink. Rather it will be the reverse; it will be a cause for us to have even more food and drink. So you need not worry that you will be losing out by making offerings of your food and drink to the holy objects.

Whenever we can make actual offerings of substances we obtain them through our own means. Whenever that is not possible we can use unowned objects as a way of making offerings. So what we have learned here is that we are never deprived of means or substances for offerings. As the teachings mention, it is not the lack of substances that will deprive us of making offerings to the holy objects, but rather the lack of faith.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱུང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྐྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

9 July 2013

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta motivation that we generated earlier, we can now engage in the meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the following motivation for receiving the teachings:

In order to benefit all sentient beings by liberating them from all suffering and leading them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teaching and put its meaning into practice well.

Generating such a motivation can definitely ensure that our time listening to the teaching will contribute to the flourishing of Dharma and the welfare of all sentient beings.

1.2.1. Offering substances that are not owned (cont.)

1.2.1.1. Offering substances

Last week we covered the list of unowned substances that can be offered. Now we turn to the way in which we offer these substances.

1.2.1.2. THE WAY OF OFFERING

The relevant lines from the root text are:

- 5cd. *Extending to the end of space
All of these, which are unowned,*
6. *Having mentally created and offered them
To the Able One, the supreme of beings, and his children,
May those with holy qualities and great compassion
Consider me with affection and enjoy these offerings of mine.*

The opening line, extending to the end of space, indicates the measure or extent of whatever offerings we are presenting. When offering flowers, for example, one can imagine that the whole sky is filled with flowers. With this visualisation the merit one gains will not be limited to offering just a few flowers. Rather it will expand to the extent of space. It is the same with all the other offerings. Not limiting an offering to one or two items but making such expansive offerings is a way to amass much greater benefit from the offerings.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with:

All the objects not possessed by anyone, having mentally created and offered them...

The implication of all the objects is that we can make offerings in the most expansive way. All the objects particularly relates to all the unowned objects, a list of which was presented last week. Another way to understand how to make extensive offerings would be, for example, when offering a flower then we can also bring to mind the particular beautiful features of the flower such as its beautiful shape, colour, and scent. When one presents the offering, thinking in detail about all of its beautiful features, it becomes a much more expansive offering.

A significant point about mentally creating the offerings is that even though these objects are unowned external objects, when we personally take the initiative to mentally create and offer them expansively to the extent of space and so forth, they become offerings made from our own side. Also, the Mandala Offering is created in one's mind. As the six-session prayer reads, 'Holding in my mind an exquisite jewel-filled mandala'. So one needs to understand what this all actually means.

The next part of the explanation identifies the holy objects that we present the offerings to. As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary we make offerings:

...to the supreme of beings, the Able One, and his children, respectfully in a good way. May those possessing qualities and great compassion consider me with affection and enjoy these offerings of mine.

The supreme of beings, the Able One refers to Buddha Shakyamuni, who is also referred to as the supreme being of the bipeds (those who walk on two legs, i.e. humans). The term Able One indicates that he has overcome all adversities and acquired all good qualities. And his children, refers to the bodhisattvas. The manner of making these offerings is respectfully in a good way. The term good way can refer to the actual arrangements of the offerings, but more specifically it relates to presenting the offerings with the bodhicitta attitude in our mind. That is the optimum way to make the offerings.

When we present the offerings, we are also making a request to those supreme beings possessing great qualities and who have great compassion. Possessing qualities refers, of course, to the great qualities of the enlightened beings such as Buddha Shakyamuni as well as the bodhisattvas. Here one can envision those bodhisattvas who were the close disciples of the Buddha, such as Manjushri, Vajrapani, Maitreya, Samantabhadra and so forth who possess incredible qualities and who have great compassion for all beings. The greatest quality of the Able One, Buddha Shakyamuni, and the bodhisattvas is, of course, their unbiased and unflinching compassion for all sentient beings who are experiencing unbearable sufferings. They have no ulterior motives; the only concern of enlightened beings and the bodhisattvas is how to free all beings from suffering.

As explained in other teachings, if, from our own side we have suitable faith, there will be no doubt whatsoever about the capacity and the willingness for the enlightened beings and bodhisattvas to help us. So if we, from our own side, pay respect, and more particularly develop faith, we will be suitable receptacles for receiving their help. So, consider me with affection, implies that if we open our own mind with faith, we will definitely receive unceasing benefit and help from the enlightened beings and bodhisattvas.

With respect to the actual offering, enjoy these offerings of mine, indicates that one needs to imagine that having made these offerings, the buddhas and bodhisattvas very gladly and joyfully accept the offerings, and for each moment that they accept an offering, they experience a fresh, new uncontaminated bliss in their mind. Here we need to note that this newly generated uncontaminated bliss does not mean that they are obtaining a new bliss that they have not obtained before. That is because obtain implies obtaining something by the virtue of overcoming a defilement. Enlightened beings have already abandoned all adversities and negativities, so we need to understand the difference between the generation of uncontaminated bliss and obtaining uncontaminated bliss. Generating uncontaminated bliss doesn't necessarily mean that it is newly obtained but rather that it is freshly experienced. It is reasonable to acknowledge that each time we make a new offering the enlightened beings experience new uncontaminated bliss.

1.2.1.3. THE REASON FOR OFFERING SUBSTANCES THAT ARE NOT OWNED

I have mentioned these points many times before but I'm not sure if you are holding onto them or you have just let them wash over you each time.

The verse relating to this topic reads:

7. *I have no merits and am very poor
And have no other wealth to offer;
Therefore, may the protector who thinks about the purpose of others
Enjoy them merely due to the fact of it being for my purpose.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation of this verse commences with a qualm.

Argument: Why offer only offerings arisen from the mind? It is appropriate to offer diverse pleasant offerings.

The implication here is this: isn't it more suitable to offer real substances, rather than mentally created ones? This is a reasonable argument. Will it be sufficient to make mentally generated offerings if one actually has the means to make actual offerings? One way to understand this is that one only offers mentally created substances when one lacks the means to make actual offerings. So by offering mentally created substances one is not deprived of making offerings.

Another way to understand mentally created offerings is that we don't limit the actual offering substances, such as flowers and so forth, to a mere bunch of flowers. Rather they are mentally multiplied to fill the entire space.

Now if one only makes mentally created offerings when one has the means to make physical offerings then, as previous teachers have indicated, that could be a way to create the karma to be reborn into an area where we can see many nice things, but which we lack the karma to use. Life in the western world is a good example. We see fancy cars and houses and many beautiful things, but we can't use them all because we don't have the wealth to purchase them. Thus one should not resort merely to mentally created offerings if one has the means to make actual offerings.

Then Gyaltsab Je gives a direct answer to the earlier qualm:

Answer: Because I have not accumulated extensive merit previously I have become destitute, without desired enjoyments...

One reason for mentally creating offerings is that one is destitute now as a result of not having previously accumulated extensive merit. This implies that while one may have the means to reach some level of enjoyment, one does not have the means now to obtain whatever one wishes for. The first thing we need to understand here is that being poor and destitute now and not being able to experience desired enjoyments, is a result of not having accumulated extensive merit through acts of generosity in the past. So we need to understand that the law of cause and effect, or karma, is also being presented here.

If one has not engaged in the act of generosity in the past, then one will experience the consequence of being destitute or impoverished in this lifetime. The direct implication is that this is a consequence of not having accumulated extensive merit previously. So in order to secure good resources in the future, we need to engage in acts of generosity now, when we will have the means to accumulate merit. Thus, if one does not have the means to make extensive offerings now, then one has to resort to offering mentally emanated ones to accumulate merit.

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Since I do not possess other wealth to offer, I request that the protector, who thinks singularly about the purpose of sentient beings, to enjoy this unowned offering for my purpose.

Gyaltsab Je is saying, 'Through being destitute and not having great wealth to make elaborate offerings as I do not possess other wealth to offer, I make this request to the protector, who is the enlightened being who thinks singularly about the purpose of sentient beings. Please accept this unowned offering for my purpose.'

Here, my purpose indicates for the purpose of accumulating merit, and abandoning both the deluded obscurations and the obscurations to omniscience. So for the personal purpose of overcoming the two main obscurations and amassing great extensive merit one requests those who have great compassion (such as the Buddha) to accept these offerings. In straightforward language, we are saying, 'Even though I don't have great extensive offerings, and I only have these meagre ones, please accept them out of your great compassion, as a way to fulfil my purpose of accumulating merit and so forth'.

However, we need to acknowledge that we do have the means to make basic offerings, such as water bowl offerings, flowers, fruit and so forth. But we should not limit whatever physical substances we may be able to place on our altar without too much effort or cost. Rather, that simple offering can serve as a base for the extensive, expansive offerings that one mentally creates. No matter how meagre or simple an offering may be, mentally turning it into an expansive offering is a way to accumulate extensive merit. This is the main point that we need to understand.

One needs to bring to mind that these are the extensive practices of a bodhisattva. Of course bodhisattvas have already generated bodhicitta, but prior to generating bodhicitta they contemplated the benefits of bodhicitta as a way to develop that bodhicitta. As a cause for developing bodhicitta one needs to accumulate extensive merit, for which purpose one engages in the practice of making such extensive offerings.

Even if these practices involve some effort and hardship one will definitely reap the benefits and gain positive results. There was once an occasion where there were some other geshe visiting here, and as we were doing some practices, nice meals were brought to us. Geshe Jampel Sengye commented, 'Oh, they are bringing such nice food! We might be reaping the benefits of the difficulties and hardships we went through earlier in life'. I commented, 'Oh, I don't think we should limit the reaping of a good result to just merely receiving nice food now'. Geshe Jampel Sengye said, 'Well, that might be true, but couldn't we still consider the good things that we are receiving now are a result of our earlier hardships'?

1.2.2. Offering one's body

We now come to offering one's body, which is something that we definitely do possess.

The two verses relating to this outline read:

8. *To the conquerors and their children
I always offer my body completely,
May the supreme brave ones enjoy me!
With respect I make myself your slave.*
9. *Being perfectly held by you
I shall, without fear, benefit sentient beings in existence.
I shall leave earlier negativities behind in every respect,
And henceforth not create other negativities.*

In relation to the way of making an offering of one's body Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

Regarding the statement, "Since I have a body that can be offered thus I offer it":

To the conquerors and their children I offer completely and always this body of mine, giving up the mind that makes it completely mine. Please, supreme brave beings, enjoy it.

The objects to which one offers one's body are the conquerors, the enlightened beings and their children, the bodhisattvas. The way to offer it is completely and always; what one offers is this body of mine, and the manner is giving up the mind that makes it completely mine. Basically, this refers to giving up our sense of identity or attachment to our body. Normally, we naturally have a very strong sense of ownership of our body thinking 'this is my body', which is accompanied by very strong attachment and a very strong sense of identity. Leaving aside that strong sense of ownership and identity, one offers one's body to the conquerors and their children to use as they wish.

Next Gyaltsab Je states:

Please, supreme brave beings, enjoy it. The purpose of offering it is that I make myself your slave with faith and respect and will follow your advice according to your instructions.

Normally we use our body as a slave to our senses and to sustain ourselves. Here, one decides to use one's body to fulfil the wishes of the conquerors and their children. Offering ourselves as a slave or servant means to willingly follow every advice of the conquerors and their children. The king's commands to his ministers and subjects are followed because the king is their ruler, so they have to obey whatever command the king gives. Similarly, as specified here, one offers oneself with respect, willingly following the advice and instructions that have been given by the conquerors. Thus we are putting ourselves into the service of the conquerors and gurus and follow their wishes.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary then raises another query: what does one accomplish by having offered one's body as a servant to the protectors? The answer is:

Having offered it, whatever action I do, since I am being held by you, the protector, I am unafraid of cyclic existence because I am relying on a refuge that is free from all fears, and I will benefit sentient beings.

The specific implication of the benefits of offering one's body to the supreme beings is that a supreme being is an ultimate refuge that is free from all fears. Offering oneself to a supreme being who is free from all fears, will free one from all fears, particularly the fears of cyclic existence. Because one does not fear the shortcomings of cyclic existence, one has a courageous mind, which is then used to benefit sentient beings.

So that is the ultimate purpose of offering one's body as a slave to the supreme protector, the ultimate refuge—as a way for oneself to become fearless in benefiting other sentient beings.

To extract the main points from these few lines; being a servant implies following every wish or command of the supreme beings. The object to which one is making this offering is the Supreme Being, who is free from all fears, the ultimate protector and refuge. From that one enjoys a state of fearlessness. However, it is not as though one is achieving that fearless state just for personal gain, to further strengthen one's sense of pride and ego. But rather, the purpose for being in a fearless state is to utilise that state to benefit other sentient beings. Here, one again reflects upon the elements of love and compassion in benefiting sentient beings.

Those of you who have received initiations will recall a similar pledge made to the guru at the end of the initiation: As I have offered myself to you as a servant, I will now follow whatever instructions you give.

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the further endeavours in which one engages:

I will leave behind all the meaningless negativities that I have accumulated before, and I will not create new negativity, even at the cost of my life.

This is indicating the importance of purifying the negativities one has created in the past, and of making a resolution to no longer create any negativity. So, with a strong sense of regret of the previous negativities one has amassed, one feels compelled to purify them and not to create any new negativity.

1.2.3. Offerings that are emanated

Here there are two subdivisions:

1.2.3.1. The common offerings

1.2.3.2. Peerless offerings

Some translate the Tibetan terms, lana yopa and lana mepa as surpassed and unsurpassed, respectively. When we use the term surpassed, translated here as common, then that indicates that there are even greater offerings beyond that. Unsurpassed, translated here as peerless, implies there is nothing that surpasses that. So an unsurpassable offering is the highest form of offering, and there is no offering greater or grander than that.

There are twelve common or surpassed offerings. These all relate to normal worldly activities of our everyday life, which we transform into offerings.

The twelve common offerings are:

1.2.3.1.1. Bath

1.2.3.1.2. Clothes

1.2.3.1.3. Ornaments

1.2.3.1.4. Scents

1.2.3.1.5. Flowers

1.2.3.1.7. Food

1.2.3.1.8. Light

1.2.3.1.9. Crystal palaces

1.2.3.1.10. Blessing parasols

1.2.3.1.11. Instruments

1.2.3.1.12. The blessing that they may be continually in the aspect of offerings

1.2.3.1.1. Bath

This has three subdivisions:

1.2.3.1.1.1. Bathing house

1.2.3.1.1.2. Way of bathing

1.2.3.1.1.3. Drying the body

One of our everyday activities is bathing ourselves. In order to do that we need to have a bathhouse, without which we cannot take a shower; then there is the manner of how to bathe; after which we need to dry ourselves. These are all normal daily activities which can be turned into offerings.

We can go through these quite quickly as they are easy to comprehend, and we don't want to take up too much time with them.

1.2.3.1.1.1. Bathing house

10. *In a fragrantly smelling bathhouse
With crystal ground, bright and sparkling,
With pleasant pillars ablaze with precious objects,
Decorated with canopies made from bright pearls,*

There are some variations in how to offer the bathing house: some mention visualising it in the space above. But, in our practice, if we have the merit field in the space above us, then it is good to visualise the bathing house in front of ourselves, in between ourselves and the merit field.

Again, Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary with a query, followed by an answer:

Where does one offer the bath?

In a bathhouse smelling fragrantly because of sprinkled sandalwood, with a floor of crystal, clear of colour, bright and completely clean...

So one visualises a beautiful bathing house with crystal panes and crystal floors.

...having adornments like conch shells and pillars blazing with precious objects,...

The pillars refers to the pillars at each corner of the bathing house, which are adorned with beautiful ornaments.

From the top being adorned with a canopy glowing from the bright pearls permeating it.

So basically the bath house is sheltered by a canopy adorned with many pearls.

We will not go into an elaborate explanation of these points here as I have explained them previously. So you can refer to previous notes. They are also explained in the preliminaries of the lam rim teachings, so you can refer to that text. The main point here is that one visualises that the holy beings in the merit field actually come into the bathing house, and take off their garments, which they put in beautiful places and so forth.

1.2.3.1.1.2. Way of bathing

As presented in the teachings one visualises dakinis around the bathing house where the enlightened beings of the merit field are bathing. There are three particular dakinis: one which holds a vase; another holding a substance for cleaning the body, like what we call soap, and the third dakini holds a towel to dry the holy bodies.

11. *To the tathagatas and their children
Out of many precious vases well filled
With pleasant incense water, accompanied by
Music and dance, I offer in various ways a bath.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation is:

One offers a bath to the tathagatas and their children out of many vases made from gold and other precious materials...

Here the dakinis use the vases to scoop up the scented water from the basin, and then pour that out as a way of showering.

That bowl is:

...filled with pleasant incense water that is fragrantly scented and has beautiful flowers in it, accompanied by music and dance.

The water has flower petals in it, which gives the water extra fragrance and scent. There are also dakinis who are playing music and offering dances.

1.2.3.1.1.3. Drying the body

This visualisation involves drying the holy bodies at five points. First the water on the top of the body is dried, then the water on the right side of the body, followed by drying the water gathered on the left side. Then the water at the heart of the body is dried, followed by the water below the navel.

In the bathing ritual, a mirror is used to visualize the entire merit field in it. One needs to understand that the five dots or points of drying represent the five Dhyani buddhas.

The next two lines of the verse relate to drying of the body:

12ab. I thoroughly dry their bodies with Unequaled cloth, clean and infused with scent.

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Then one dries the bodies of the objects of offering with unequalled cloth, which is soft and clean, and infused with pleasant scents.

Here unequaled cloth implies a very special cloth is used to dry the bodies of the holy beings. We don't appreciate towels that are too coarse or rough and need to have soft towels and soft clothing. Likewise, here we visualise the best cloth for drying the holy bodies.

1.2.3.1.2. Clothes

I have previously extensively explained the specifics about the garments that are to be offered and you can refer to that.

The next lines of verse are:

*12cd Then I offer them holy and well-scented
Clothes of nice colour;
Various pure clothes, thin and soft.*

Here Gyaltsab Je explains:

Having dried their bodies I offer them holy fragrant garments of good colour...

If they are of the aspect of an ordained Sangha, then one offers the three types of robes, or:

...If they are in the aspect of a householder [or a layperson] then I offer them a variety of soft, fine clothes of good size and colour.

It is good to take note that in addition to making offerings to the normal objects of refuge, such as ordained Sangha, one also makes offerings to bodhisattvas in the lay aspect. This is another way to see the unbiased nature of Buddha's teachings. Suitable objects are to be venerated and are objects of offerings, whatever aspect they may be in. A bodhisattva having the aspect of a lay householder is depicted in lay garments, such as Manjushri, Maitreya and so forth. Ordained bodhisattvas include Shariputra and Maudgalyayana, who were the close disciples of the Buddha.

I have already explained how to discard old clothes.

1.2.3.1.3. Ornaments

In our worldly life, it is not enough just to have fine clothes. It seems that one needs to beautify oneself even further with ornaments. So we can make offerings of these.

The verse relating to this is:

*13. And hundreds of supreme ornaments
I offer also to the supreme Samantabhadra and Manjushri
And to the ruler of the world and so forth.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je says:

I offer hundreds of supreme ear ornaments, bracelets, anklets, necklaces and so forth, to, among others, Samantabhadra, Mipham, Manjushri, bodhisattvas in a lay aspect, and to the ruler of the world.

These are examples of bodhisattvas in the lay aspect, which implies that one need not make offerings of ornaments and so forth to ordained Sangha, bodhisattvas and so forth.

Of course in the worldly manner, after beautifying oneself with nice ornaments or jewellery, one will also apply nice smelling substances, scents and so forth. That is the next offering, which we can leave for our next session.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

16 July 2013

Based on the motivation we have just generated in the recitation of the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

You may come out of your samadhi now!

We have just attempted to engage in the practice of giving and taking in the form of a meditation practice. It would be very worthwhile if we could develop the determination to engage in this practice as much as possible in our everyday lives, so that our thoughts, actions and speech contribute to giving our happiness to others, while taking away their suffering. If we can apply this in our everyday life as much as possible, this would, of course, be most worthwhile.

The benefits one derives from doing such a practice are quite obvious. In countries like Australia, people are generally not deprived of sufficient food, clothing or shelter, and if that is the case then there are many practical ways to help them.

The most prevalent kind of suffering experienced here in the west tends not so much to be physical suffering, but suffering on a mental or psychological level. When suffering is of a psychological nature, people don't need physical help with food, shelter and so forth. Rather, the best form of assistance to someone who is experiencing mental or psychological suffering is companionship. We often see how true companions and friends really assist and help others. So we can see that there are many ways we can help others and that we don't need to be wealthy in order to extend our help to others.

We also need to apply the giving and taking practice in practical ways to those who are close to us, because if we can't apply it to them then there aren't many other practical ways to engage in practice. As mentioned previously, the problems of our companions are mostly psychological or mental ones, conflicts of interest and so forth. These problems are very prevalent because they often arise through their relationships with their companions and the partners and so forth. So the problems need to be solved within those relationships.

My way of taking a practical approach is to deal with the immediate situation, and then use that as a basis for improving and expanding one's practice. The practice can then be extended to help others on a broader level. If we are inclined to engage in this supreme practice of giving and taking then we need to remind ourselves again and again what it is that we are attempting to practise. Basically, it is a practice to increase and to further develop the sense of love and compassion within oneself. So it is worthwhile to make this determination: 'I need to try to implement the practice in every possible way, beginning with those who are close to me'. Many of you have found that the practice of tong len or giving and taking is a very beneficial one. If you want to gain further benefits from it then this is the way to go about practising it.

1.2.3. Offerings that are emanated

1.2.3.1.4. Scents/Perfumed balms

The Tibetan word jukpa refers to perfumed balms that are applied to the body.

14. *The supreme smell that gives rise
To all the smells of the three thousand worlds
I apply to the able ones' bodies
That are glowing like polished refined gold.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains this verse thus:

The supreme smell that gives rise to the fragrant smells of all the three thousand worlds I apply to the bodies of the able ones, ...

Here smells of the three thousand worlds implies that the fragrance of the balms pervade the whole universe. The bodies of all the able ones refers to Shakyamuni Buddha and all the enlightened beings.

Then the quality of the bodies of enlightened beings are presented:

... that are glowing and blazing like polished refined gold.

At this point one brings to mind the incredible qualities of the Buddha's body which are enumerated in the list of the thirty-two major and eighty minor marks of the Buddha. As mentioned here, the Buddha's enlightened body is glowing and blazing like polished refined gold—it has a natural radiance that fills the entire universe.

When refined gold is polished it has a brilliant glow, and the radiance of the Buddha's body is much greater than that. Blazing indicates that the Buddha's holy body has such beautiful radiance, that the more it is seen by sentient beings the more they want to look at it. That is, by merely seeing the Buddha's holy body it produces great joy in the minds of sentient beings.

Earlier, when we were studying Precious Garland, we covered the qualities of the Buddha's body, speech and mind in detail. The qualities are also explained when identifying the objects of refuge. So here we can immediately relate to the qualities of the holy Buddha's body. Thus we can see that the earlier explanations serve as a basis to understand further references in the text. Otherwise we would have to spend significant time now in explaining the Buddha's qualities in detail.

1.2.3.1.5. Flowers

We usually offer flowers in front of the image of the Buddha, enlightened ones and deities. In addition, we can also visualise offering flowers to Tara's head ornament, when we do the offering in the Tara practice. For enlightened beings who are in the aspect of a renunciate, we can also imagine offering flowers as a canopy above them. So we should not be limited to offering flowers in just one way.

Also, as depicted in some drawings, dakinis make offerings of flowers by sprinkling them from the sky. My interpretation of this offering is that it is said that certain celestial deities can't come too near humans because we have a foul smell!!! So, from the sky above, they sprinkle flowers onto enlightened beings who are on Earth.

On another level, when His Holiness the Dalai Lama teaches, he is addressing the humans sitting on the ground below him. But there are definitely celestial beings who are listening to the teachings at the same time. They don't sit at the same level as the humans but they are in the space above. So we need to visualise them above a great lama or a master when they are teaching. Even where one has to give a teaching oneself, there may be celestial beings listening to it. So we need to visualise that. There are of course nagas at ground level, but celestial beings such as gods and dakinis are in the space above. So the main point is that offering flowers includes visualising sprinkling flowers from the sky.

The verse that relates to the offering of flowers is:

15. *To the offering objects, the able ones,
I offer beautiful flowers, mandarava, lotuses,
Utpala and so forth; all that are well smelling,
In beautiful well-arranged garlands.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with an answer to a rhetorical question, 'Who should I make offerings to?':

I shall make offerings to the able ones, the supreme objects of offering.

Then Gyaltsab Je poses another question, which he also answers:

With what? With pleasant flowers like mandarava, lotus, utpala flowers and so forth, which disperse all the fragrant scents. I also offer flower garlands well spread out and beautiful.

These flowers are not only beautiful to behold, but they have a beautiful smell. The Tibetan word selma is used here, which refers to loose petals or flowers that do not have stems. Thus, flowers with stems are offered as garlands, while flowers without stems are sprinkled or spread out. So the offering of flowers to the objects of refuge includes beautiful stemmed flowers as well as loose flowers.

1.2.3.1.6. Incense

The first two lines of the next verse read:

16ab. *I also offer billowing clouds of smoke from supreme incense
Pervaded by a scent that robs one of one's senses.*

The Tibetan word translated here as incense has a connotation of a substance which, when burnt, produces a beautiful aroma. This is an offering to the smell sense.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of these two lines as follows:

I offer billowing clouds of incense, spreading into the ten directions, of supreme well scented incense that robs one of one senses, like *akaru*¹ and so forth.

The offering here is substances that, when burnt, produce a sweet-smelling scent in the form of smoke. So in this visualisation we can imagine continuous billowing clouds of smoke being emitted from a sweet smelling substance such as incense or other substances which create that beautiful smell or scent.

1.2.3.1.7. Food

The next two lines of the verse relate to the offering of food to the taste sense. They are quite easy to understand so we need not spend too much time on them.

16cd. I also offer divine feasts made of Various foods and drink.

As Gyaltsab Je explains:

I offer to the conquerors and their children various foods, like sugar cane, and various drinks; both as divine feasts possessing various colours, smells and tastes.

One needs to be mindful about presenting the food offerings in beautiful clean containers. The food offering presented to the taste sense includes drinks as well, and it should have a variety of colours and taste and an enticing aroma. With some practices, we offer things that represent the traditional offering called a torma, which is a food offering to the deities or the enlightened beings.

Those who are familiar with tantric practices will recall that we visualise deities accepting the torma offerings by visualising a hollow tube of light descending from the enlightened being's mouth to the torma. The outside of the torma has the appearance of a hard substance, and inside is a nectar-like liquid. It is this nectar which is accepted by the enlightened being when they suck up its essence through the tube of light that serves as a pipe.

The reason why I relate this here is that there are many who do a regular Tara practice. When offering the torma in the Four Mandala Tara practice, the sadhana indicates that a HUNG at the tongue transforms into that hollow tube of light through which the Tara deity partakes of the essence of the torma. That is the visualisation that one does. However one does not need to do that visualisation every time one makes an offering.

One important thing to visualise is that one makes an offering of food or flowers to the deities respectfully and with both hands. So that would be good to visualise when presenting the offerings.

1.2.3.1.8. Light

The first two lines from the next verse read:

17ab. *I also offer precious lamps
Mounted on golden lotuses.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary then explains the meaning of these two lines:

I offer bright precious lamps mounted on bases of many arranged golden lotuses.

The golden lotuses serve as containers in which to offer the lamps. So, one can visualise light being offered in many beautifully arranged golden containers, which are in the shape of lotuses.

As the offering of light is an offering of illumination, it is an offering to the eye sense. However ordinary beings like ourselves may feel uncomfortable offering light which is placed too close to the eyes; we may feel that it is too bright and may actually burn the eyes. So as a way to comfortably make these offerings, we can imagine offering them the illumination of light by arranging them in front of the deity.

1.2.3.1.9. Crystal palace

The next six lines of verse read:

17cd. *On clean ground anointed with incense
I arrange delightful fresh flowers.*

18. *A beautiful crystal palace reverberating with melodious praises
Ablaze with tassels of pearls and precious substances;
Infinite, becoming an ornament of the skies,
I also offer to the great compassionate ones.*

In explanation of this verse the commentary reads:

I offer to those in the nature of great compassion a beautiful [priceless] crystal palace ...

The Tibetan word shalme, translated here as beautiful, has the connotation of being priceless.

... where the well-polished floors are sprinkled with scented water, where delightful flowers are laid out,...

Again the Tibetan word selma specifies either petals or flowers without stems. Although not mentioned here, other presentations indicate that one visualises a beautiful throne, which is supported by eight snow lions (two on each side), in the middle of the palace.

... where goddesses sing melodious praises, and which are beautified with tassels made from pearls and various precious substances blazing with their splendid infinite light. With its infinite qualities it beautifies the essence of space and such becomes an ornament of the skies.

That is how the palace is visualised.

1.2.3.1.10. Parasols

The verse relating to this heading reads:

19. *Precious beautiful parasols with golden handles,
Seamed by dazzling ornaments,
Well-shaped and uplifting when seen,
I always offer to the able ones.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

I always offer beautiful parasols made from a variety of precious substances, with golden handles, the edges of the parasol are seamed by many dazzling jewel ornaments, and magnificently shaped so that it is uplifting for the mind just to see it.

Here we visualise a parasol of magnificent shape, with a rim encrusted with various beautiful jewels and ornaments. It is so beautiful that merely seeing it brings much joy. One offers the parasol to shade the heads of the enlightened beings.

1.2.3.1.11. Instruments

Next is an offering of instruments for making music.

The verse for this reads:

20. *Further, may arrays of offering clouds
Of instruments with delightful melodies
That dispel the suffering of sentient beings
Be scattered about.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

In addition to the earlier mentioned offerings, I also present offering clouds of instruments, such as clay drums, with delightful melodies that dispel the sufferings of sentient beings, and satisfy them just through hearing.

May arrays of such offering clouds be scattered about.

The Tibetan word sosor ne, translated as scattered, indicates 'may an array of such offering clouds manifest, residing separately in various locations'.

1.2.3.1.12. The blessing that they may be continually in the aspect of offering

This is basically an aspirational prayer that all the offerings that have been presented continually abide, to please the senses of the enlightened beings.

The verse relating to this reads:

21. *May it rain unceasingly
Precious flowers and so forth
On the holy Dharma and all Jewels,
Stupas and the holy bodies.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

May it rain unceasingly precious flowers and other offerings on the twelve types of scriptures ...

The twelve types of scriptures refers to the Dharma Jewel in the aspect of scriptures. When we make offerings to the Three Jewels, we can visualise texts to represent the Dharma Jewel, which is the speech of the Buddha in the form of writing.

The commentary continues:

... that are contained in the truth of cessation and the truth of the path

This is the actual Dharma jewel.

... on stupas that contain relics of the Buddha and physical representations of the body of the Buddha, such as paintings and so forth.

In the Tibetan translation, the aspirational prayer comes at this point.

May it rain unceasingly, until the end of cyclic existence, precious flowers and other offerings.

As mentioned previously, this is in a form of an aspirational prayer, referred to as 'blessing the offerings'.

1.2.3.2. Unequaled or unsurpassed offerings²

The verse relating to this heading reads:

22. *Just as Manjushri and so forth,
Make offerings to the conquerors,
I make offerings in the same way to
The tathagatas, protectors and their children.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Just like the empowered bodhisattvas Manjushri, Samantabhadra and so forth make offerings to the conquerors by emanating them into the whole of space, ...

Empowered bodhisattvas refers to high level bodhisattvas who, because of the level of concentration they have attained, are able to manifest incredible, expansive offerings that fill the sky. Taking that as an example to emulate:

I also make offerings to the tathagatas, the protectors of gods and humans, and their children.

In other words: 'Just as these great bodhisattvas present unsurpassable offerings, likewise I make these offerings'.

Then the commentary quotes from another sutra:

From the sutra Precious Lamp:

Most flowers are like canopies and are sent out by light rays; having arranged various flowers everywhere the great ones make offerings to the conquerors.

To further explain how to present unsurpassable offerings; as explained in other teachings, one visualises the entire space filled with offerings. This involves visualising the bodhisattva called the Supreme Being Samantabhadra in the aspect of a renunciate (i.e. wearing the robes of one who is ordained), his hands folded at his heart, holding a jewel between his palms. There is a more elaborate form of visualisation, but the condensed form is visualising oneself as Samantabhadra holding at one's heart the jewel held between one's palms. The jewel radiates innumerable rays of light which fills the entire universe. The method of building this visualisation involves visualising each tip of radiated light emanating further offerings. At the tips of each of the light rays that are radiated from the jewel, one visualises various types of offerings manifested. Then from each of the offerings, further light rays are emanated and then from each of the tips of the light rays emanated from the offerings, further replicas of the offerings manifest. Then from those offerings, light rays again radiate forth and from the tips of each of those light rays, further offerings are presented. So because there are infinite offerings that are manifested from infinite rays of light, the entire universe is filled with offerings, which is what we present to the enlightened beings; the buddhas and bodhisattvas. It is said that this visualisation is the easiest one for us ordinary beings to do as a way to present unsurpassable offerings.

Another interpretation of what unsurpassable offering means is that the unsurpassable offering is to engage in the practice of Dharma, and to uphold the doctrine. More specifically it refers to listening to the Dharma and putting it into practice. This form of unsurpassable offering is, of course, a very significant one.

Another way of explaining unsurpassable offering is to visualise one's own virtues from the three times transforming into offerings and then presenting those offerings.

Then there is the most supreme of offerings, which is the actual generation of bodhicitta.

It is good to also take note that these forms of unsurpassable offerings are not beyond our reach. We are already making attempts to engage in these practices. Upholding the doctrine means that if we are contributing to the preservation and proliferation of the Dharma, we are, in fact, making an unsurpassable offering. Furthermore, when we listen to the Dharma and make our own attempts to try to practise it, we are also making unsurpassable offerings. The very fact that we make attempts to accumulate virtue means that we have a basis of virtue to transform into offerings. And to whatever extent we are able, we are at least trying to aspire to generate the bodhicitta motivation.

We need to recall the earlier explanations to ensure our practices, such as upholding the doctrine of the Buddha, listening to the doctrine and trying to put it into practice and so forth become an offering. As mentioned earlier, the real offering is pleasing the minds of the enlightened beings and our gurus. When we engage in, or make an attempt to engage in this practice of upholding the doctrine, which is the source of happiness and goodness for all, or make attempts to uphold that, then that is definitely a means to please our gurus and the minds of the enlightened beings. Furthermore, listening to the Dharma and trying to put it into practice and so forth are the optimum means to please the minds of the enlightened beings. This is how we can ensure our practice becomes an offering.

There will be a bit of a change in our usual routine for the next few Tuesday evenings. Next Tuesday, 23 July, and the following Tuesday, 30 July, I will continue to teach. So, discussion night will be on 6 August. The seminar will be on 11 August, and you have to participate in that well. Tuesday 13 August will be the exam evening and as usual it is good to participate in that exam. On 18 August the annual White Tara initiation takes place.

It would be good for you to organise the seminar well, with good subjects, complemented with some meditation. If it is arranged early enough, people will have time to prepare well. In the past these seminars have been in the form of two groups engaging in discussion or debate. So, if it is done in that way, each group has to know what the subject is in order to present it, and they also have to know the other groups' subjects, so that you will be ready to raise questions on their topic. And of course you have to be ready to answer questions that are raised by the other group.

As I regularly mention to the Monday night presenters, it is not sufficient just to write down notes of what you will be presenting. You also need to prepare yourself so you can answer questions when they are asked. Also one needs to be mindful when you present topics that have lists of different things. You do have to be able to list what they are. I wouldn't blame you if you get stuck in that situation once in a while. There have been some geshe who have prepared to explain a topic, but who were not prepared enough to give a precise list of the things they were presenting.

It is important for those presenting the Dharma (such as on Monday evenings) not to be satisfied with just preparing material from books and notes. It's important to do some internal preparation as well, which involves spending some time meditating and thinking about the topic that you are going to present. In that way the presentation will not be merely dry words, but because one has spent some time internalising it, it will carry some weight.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

23 July 2013

With the motivation generated with the bodhicitta prayer, we can now engage in the meditation practice.

[meditation]

It would be good to train our mind to the extent that, whenever we see any living beings, we feel a spontaneous wish for them to be happy and free from all suffering. That would be an incredible state of mind to develop. Right now, however, we find it hard to develop a mind of wishing even one sentient being to have happiness and be free from suffering. However it is possible to develop that wish if we further develop our mind.

Right now the only example we have in this world of someone who has spontaneous genuine concern for another being is the love and concern of a mother for her child. If we could develop a similar attitude of genuine love and compassion towards all living beings, then we would, as defined in the teachings, have developed great love and great compassion. It is called great love and great compassion because the wish is directed towards all living beings.

As explained in the teachings, the positive outcome of meditation is said to be the lessening of the delusions. So the more we familiarise our mind with developing this sort of wish for all beings to be happy and free from suffering, the more our delusions will definitely lessen, which will be of direct benefit for our mind. Stronger delusions can definitely be weakened and we can even overcome certain delusions. So if we sincerely practise any genuine form of meditation, the delusions will definitely lessen.

Training our mind in love and compassion means training our mind to be able to immediately respond to the plight of sentient beings. As soon as we see them we will immediately relate to the suffering that they are experiencing and develop a keen wish for them to be free from that suffering. This comes about when we really think about the experiences of sentient beings in cyclic existence.

We are already quite familiar with the teachings of the lower scope, which describe the suffering nature of all existence, and in particular the three types of suffering. Relating to the various levels of suffering in cyclic existence is also a way for us to be able to relate to any kind of sentient being. For as long as they are a sentient being, then, whatever their status, even if they are temporarily enjoying good conditions, they are still an object of our compassion.

Personally, when I see someone enjoying their wealth and opulent lifestyle I immediately feel, 'Ah, they look very happy – but only if they didn't have to die'. Indeed if they were immortal, then perhaps their wealth and luxuries would bring them some form of everlasting happiness. It often might be hard to recall my own mortality, however when I see the seemingly very joyful states that others are enjoying, I am reminded that in reality we all have to die some day and leave behind whatever seeming pleasures that we enjoy now. Underneath that seeming pleasure that others are experiencing on the surface they are constantly experiencing the suffering of all-pervasive suffering. And of course, they may be experiencing the suffering of change, and the suffering of suffering. Of these, the dormant suffering is the all-pervasive compounded suffering.

This is because of the fact that sentient beings possess the appropriated contaminated aggregates. So the very fact of having the contaminated aggregates serves as the basis for the all-pervasive compounded suffering. This level of suffering is said to be very subtle and deep rooted. In fact it could be rightly said that we can only find the explanation on the subtleties of this form of suffering in the Buddhist teachings. So, to the extent that we relate to the subtler level of sufferings of sentient beings, the more profound our compassion for them becomes.

This is something that we really need to pay attention to, as it is the very basis of our practice. It would be quite presumptuous to eagerly want to practise higher levels of practices without first developing a strong foundation. We can see this with external examples, such as a building construction; if the foundations are not sound then the whole building collapses. That is a fact, isn't it? It is the same with our practice. We need to really train and pay attention to forming very strong foundations for our practice, based on the principles of love and compassion.

EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

2. PROSTRATION

Having covered the section on the various types of offerings, how to present them and so forth, which the text and the commentary explain in great detail, we need to actually try to put the advice into practice. There are no other more profound sources with instructions for making offerings other than what has been presented here. If, after having been exposed to these explanations we still feel, 'Oh, I wonder how I should make an offering', then we have definitely missed the point! Thus, if we are keen to practice then we need to rely on the very detailed instructions that are presented in this text.

If we are not careful we might end up finding ourselves with books stacked up in the bookcases in front of us, but when it comes to our actual practice we might start wondering about, 'How do I actually make offerings? How do I do prostrations? and so forth'. Having access to these teachings and books and not being able to use them would be completely missing the point. That would be a great pity. Thus, having studied these texts and manuals of instruction, when it comes for us to do a certain practice, we need to be able to readily recall, 'OK, this teaching has a very good explanation on this point about this practice, and that teaching gives that explanation'. So in this way, we are able to access what we need for our practice. And of course, many of you have the transcripts, which serve as notes, so that is another reference for you.

A while ago someone who had come to some of my classes here was asked to lead a meditation in Auckland. He said that he initially thought, 'Oh, what should I talk about?' and felt a little bit apprehensive. Then, he said, he remembered that he had some notes from the meditation sessions that I had been giving, so he took them out and read them, and found that he was not short of material to present to others.

As explained earlier, the purpose of presenting offerings to the objects of refuge is so that we can amass great merit to further develop ourselves. So amongst the various types of offerings, as explained earlier, hearing the Dharma and putting it into practice is the best offering. We need to really take this point to heart. As the great yogi and adept Milarepa said in one of his songs, 'I have no other offerings besides my practice that I offer to please my gurus'.

This section on prostrations is presented with two subdivisions:

2.1. Verbal praise

2.2. Physical homage

Here we can take note that that verbal praise is listed in this commentary as part of prostration, whereas other commentaries on The Bodhisattva's Way of Life present verbal praise under the category of making offerings. As an offering, verbal praise takes the form of melodious hymns. Here, however, it is listed under the heading of prostrations. It can fit comfortably into either category.

Benefits of prostration

- As a practice, prostration is one of the supreme antidotes for overcoming pride.
- Another specific benefit is that one creates the amount of merit to be reborn as a wheel-turning king.
- A further benefit is that prostration is one of the greatest forms of purification practices. Thus, it is an optimum method for cleaning our mind to improve our mental health.
- Another practical benefit is that since it involves physical exertion, it is actually a very good form of physical exercise. So we derive some physical benefit from the practice as well.

If someone were to ask, 'Is there any form of practice in Buddhism that has physical benefits?' we can confidently say, 'Oh yes, prostrations'.

As explained in other teachings as well, along with physical prostration there is also verbal and mental prostration. When one engages in the practice of prostrations, it is important to recall the qualities of the objects of refuge, such as the enlightened beings. That is how we derive much greater benefit and merit from the practice. As many of you would already be aware, the physical prostration begins by putting your palms together with your thumbs tucked in between your palms.

Before prostrating onto the ground, we place our hands at either three points or four points on our body.

If it is four points, the first is above one's crown, which symbolises obtaining the crown protrusion of the Buddha, which is one of the qualities of the enlightened body. The second is at our forehead which symbolises obtaining the Buddha's spiral hair. Next is placing our hands at the throat, which is to acquire the merit of obtaining Buddha's holy enlightened speech, and fourth is at the heart, which signifies creating the causes to obtain the quality of a buddha's mind.

If it is three points then the first is above the crown, then at the throat and then the heart, which symbolise obtaining the qualities of the holy body, speech and mind respectively.

The Tibetan word for prostration is chag-tsal, which has two syllables. Each syllable carries a specific meaning which doesn't come across in the English word prostration. The first syllable, chag has the connotation of clearing away, which indicates clearing away the negativities and imperfections of our body, speech and mind. The syllable tsal has the connotation of acquiring, in this case the qualities of the holy body, speech and mind of the enlightened beings. It is good to bring this meaning to mind when one actually does the prostration and really think about the qualities of the enlightened body, speech and mind. Then, as we do the prostration we can really feel that we are receiving the blessings of an enlightened body, speech and mind.

As with any other Mahayana practice, the motivation needs to be bodhicitta; so try to generate the bodhicitta attitude as best as possible. I have explained this many times, so bring to mind the bodhicitta attitude prior to engaging in the practice.

During the recitation of whatever prayers or praises you may be reciting during the prostration, remind yourself that you are clearing away and purifying the negativities of body, speech and mind that you have accumulated from beginningless times. At the same time think that the blessings of the enlightened body, speech and mind actually enter into your heart; keeping these points in mind while engaging in the practice will ensure that the practice becomes most meaningful and beneficial.

2.1. Verbal praise

Verbal praise refers to praising the qualities of the enlightened beings, which takes the form of a verbal salutation. The relevant verse reads:

23. *I eulogise an ocean of qualities
With an ocean of melodious limbs of hymns;
These clouds of melodious praises to hear,
May they arise everywhere.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation of this verse begins with:

This oceans of qualities of knowledge, such as love and so forth, I eulogise with limbs of melodious hymns that express infinite qualities.

The commentary explains that the Tibetan term yang, translated in the verse as hymns, refers to words or sound of the praise, while yenlag or limbs refers to the cause of the praises, and ocean has the connotation of many. These are good points to remember as they come in many other texts as well.

Then Gyaltsab Je further explains:

Thus, carry out the praise by visualising that each body has many heads and each head has many tongues.

This visualisation is also presented in The King of Prayers, which is a specific practice to gain extensive merit. One does this visualisation to multiply the praise that one is offering by imagining that one has many bodies, and that each body has many heads and each head has many tongues. Thus there are many manifestations of oneself offering the eulogy at the same time.

The final part of Gyaltsab Je's explanation of this verse reads:

Further, even if one does not actually sing the melodious hymns oneself to the great numbers of superiors, may infinite clouds definitely reach them in every place and at all times.

Even if one is not actually singing melodious hymns oneself, hold in mind 'May the infinite clouds of praise and eulogies constantly be presented to the numberless superior beings in all places and at all times'. The last line of the verse should read, 'May they definitely arise everywhere'.

2.2. Physical homage

This has three subdivisions.

2.2.1. To the Triple Gem

2.2.2. To the basis for generating bodhicitta

2.2.3. To abbots, preceptors and so forth

2.2.1. To the Triple Gem

The root text reads:

24. *I prostrate humbly with as many bodies
As there are atoms in all the realms
To all the buddhas gone in the three times,
To the Dharma and the supreme assembly.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

I prostrate humbly to all the buddhas who have come and gone in the three times, to the scriptural and realised Dharma and to the supreme assembly of superior bodhisattvas ...

The objects of refuge

Of the three objects of refuge, the first is the prostration to the Buddha. Offering prostrations to all the buddhas of the three times refers to the buddhas who have come in the past, who are residing in the present and who will come in the future. Prostrating to all buddhas means that you are not just limited to one or two buddhas of the past and present and future. Rather, you are visualising all the buddhas who have come in the past, which is an infinite number of buddhas; all buddhas resident throughout the universe at this very time, which is also an infinite number of buddhas, and all the buddhas yet to come in the future, which is again an infinite number of buddhas. Thus one offers the prostration to an infinite number of enlightened beings.

The next prostration is to the scriptural and realised Dharma. Here, scriptural refers to the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings in general, and realised Dharma refers to, for example, the practices derived from the scriptures on three higher trainings.

When we refer to upholding the Dharma it is good to understand that the Dharma one is upholding has these two aspects of scriptural and realised Dharma. Upholding the scriptural Dharma means to study, listen, contemplate and think about the subject matter of the scriptures, such as the three baskets of the Buddha's teaching. Upholding realised Dharma refers to, having studied the scriptures to actually put the meaning of the scriptures into practice. This would be, for example, engaging in the three higher trainings of morality, concentration and wisdom; or actualising the truth of the path and the truth of cessation.

We can relate this distinction between scriptural and realised Dharma to the Buddha's doctrine; there is the doctrine that is the scriptures or speech of the Buddha and there is realised doctrine. The doctrine of the Buddha's speech or words is the three baskets of the Buddha's teaching, and the realised doctrine of the Buddha is putting the meaning of his scriptures (or words) into practice. More specifically, the Dharma here is Mahayana Dharma, which relates to the Mahayana truth of the path and the Mahayana truth of cessation.

This forges a direct link to the Sangha jewel which is identified here as the supreme assembly of pure bodhisattvas who are practising the Mahayana path and actualising the Mahayana cessation.

In summary, when prostrating to the first of the Three Jewels, the Buddha, one is prostrating to infinite numbers of buddhas. The Dharma relates to the scriptural and realised Dharma of the three baskets of teachings and the three higher trainings. More specifically, it refers here to the Mahayana Dharma, which is the Mahayana truth of the path and the Mahayana truth of cessation. Sangha, in general terms, relates to any assembly of arya beings, and more specifically here to the supreme assembly of superior bodhisattvas, which is specifically identifying the Mahayana Sangha.

The next part of Gyaltsab Je's commentary is a response to a hypothetical question.

How does one prostrate?

... with bodies emanated as many as there are particles in all the buddha fields

That is how one prostrates.

The visualisation that one does during the prostration is to emanate one's body as many times as there are particles in all the buddha fields. As explained in The King of Prayers, there are numerous buddha fields within just one atom. From this we come to the conclusion that there are many more buddha fields than there are atoms. That is how we actually create the visualisation of prostrating with as many bodies as the infinite numbers of buddha fields, where the Buddha resides.

That covers the explanation of how to do physical prostrations to the Three Jewels.

Explanations in other teachings

According to explanations in other teachings such as The King of Prayers, in addition to visualising one's body manifesting as numerous bodies and offering prostrations to infinite numbers of enlightened beings, another way is to visualise oneself as being surrounded by other sentient beings, each of whom manifests numerous bodies. So one is prostrating to the entire universe filled with infinite numbers of enlightened beings, manifesting infinitely.

Here it is relevant to present the unique instruction that has been passed down from the earlier masters, which is that when one does the prostration, one visualises manifesting one's body over the infinite lifetimes of the past. Thus, one imagines each and every life that one has taken in the past in a human aspect, rather than in whatever form it might have been. Thus one is surrounding oneself with an infinite number of manifestations of oneself in human form.

Benefits

As one does the physical prostration one imagines all of these manifestations of oneself prostrating at the same time, thus purifying all the negative karma created in all those previous lifetimes. It is said that the uniqueness of this practice is that even doing just one prostration purifies heavy negative karmas one has created over beginningless lifetimes in the past. So we purify an incredible amount of negative karma because of our intention and visualisation. Likewise, because one is prostrating to an infinite number of enlightened beings at the same time, one accumulates an infinite amount of merit at the same time. So this is an incredibly powerful way to do the practice of prostration.

Prostrating in this way, with these visualisations and an appropriate motivation, is an incredible practice. During the practice itself our mind is really calm and peaceful, because we have a virtuous frame of mind as a consequence of focusing our minds on a virtuous object. In addition, as we are engaging in a real sense in true virtuous activity, we definitely purify negative karma and accumulate vast amounts of merit. That is a great benefit of this practice. It is really good to understand that this is a really beneficial practice and bring these points to mind when you actually do the practice.

The action

Another point to mention here is that a full physical prostration involves touching the five limbs — which are the two hands, our head and our two knees—on the ground. If you are doing a full-length prostration you need to be mindful to stretch out completely on the ground and then to stand up immediately. You should not remain on the ground for too long.

Some teachings explain that we need to ensure that all four aspects of ourselves are straightened out. This begins with stretching out our body, which allows the channels within us to be straightened out. When the channels are straightened out then that allows the wind to be straightened out, meaning that it will be flowing well within the channels. As a result of that the mind will be straightened out, meaning that it will be in a good frame; a fresh and clear state of mind. As these instructions are given in the teachings, they must definitely be significant.

That covers physical prostration, explained here under the heading Physical Homage.

2.2.2. To the basis for generating bodhicitta

This is covered in these two lines of verse:

*25ab. To the bases of the awakened mind
And to stupas I prostrate.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

The basis of bodhicitta refers to the causes from which that mind is generated:

There is a Tibetan term nam in the verse which indicates numerous, and this refers to the numerous causes of bodhicitta.

Then the commentary lists the causes from which that mind of bodhicitta is generated. The first is:

The three Mahayana baskets;

This refers to the Mahayana scriptures, which give specific instructions on how to develop bodhicitta, such as the seven point cause-and-effect method of developing bodhicitta, and the exchanging self with other technique of developing bodhicitta.

This text we are studying, Shantideva's Bodhisattva's Way of Life, is definitely an object of prostration as we always have access to it and by studying it we can understand the supreme method to develop bodhicitta. So this text definitely serves as one of the causes.

The individuals who become a condition for generating that mind;

This refers to genuine individual beings who help us understand what bodhicitta is. They show us the way to generate bodhicitta that has not been generated; they help us to maintain whatever bodhicitta we may have already developed; and they encourage us to further develop and increase that bodhicitta. Such genuine individual beings who help us in that way are definitely causes for developing bodhicitta.

The place where it is generated;

This refers to holy sites where enlightened beings and holy beings have generated bodhicitta. They are places that inspire us to generate bodhicitta ourselves.

The body of the Buddha and so forth;
Stupas;

The body of the Buddha refers to actual representations of the Buddha. As other teachings explain, one can take the bodhisattva vows, either from a living teacher or in front of a holy image such as a Buddha image or a stupa, which represents an enlightened being's mind.

To put all this together, once we have gained an understanding of what this precious mind of enlightenment is, we develop that keen determination to develop it ourselves. Then all the causes and conditions for developing that mind naturally become an object of great respect and veneration. Thus we naturally generate great respect for the teachings and the texts that present the ways and means of how to develop bodhicitta. Then the living masters, the virtuous friends or gurus who present these explanations and give us the vows and so forth, definitely become objects of veneration and respect, along with the place where it is generated, such as holy sites, images of Buddhas as well as stupas. All of these causes are naturally worthy of great respect and veneration, and thus an object of prostration.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary concludes with:

To these I prostrate

2.2.3. To abbots, preceptors and so forth

Here abbots refers to abbots who bestow the novice vows, as well as abbots who bestow the full ordination vows.

Preceptors refers to teachers of novice vows as well as the lay person vows.

The lines of the verse relating to this are:

*25cd. I prostrate to abbots and likewise to preceptors
And to the supreme adepts.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

I prostrate to the abbots who connect and complete the earlier and later words of individual liberation; likewise I prostrate to the preceptors who bestow the vows.

As mentioned here, abbots confer the rituals of taking individual liberation vows; abbots and preceptors can also refer to one's spiritual teachers.

... and to the supreme adepts who carry the burden of training in the supreme disciplines of the path to liberation.

So the prostration is to the abbots and preceptors who bestow and explain the vows of self-liberation. It is also to those who have taken those vows, and who actually uphold that discipline, which is the path to achieve liberation.

3. REFUGE

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འདུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

30 July 2013

As usual let us spend some time engaging in the meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate a positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings by removing them from all suffering and leading them to ultimate happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

REFUGE

In the Lam Rim Chen Mo, or Great Exposition of the Stages of the Path to Enlightenment, refuge is presented in four subdivisions. Liberation In The Palm Of Your Hand, however, adds a fifth subdivision. The four subdivisions of refuge are: the cause of going for refuge, identifying the objects of refuge, the manner of going for refuge and the commitments after having taken refuge. Lama Tsong Khapa's four-point presentation of the essentiality of refuge is very meticulous.

Having a good understanding of what refuge entails is essential. It is considered to be the doorway, or entrance, into the Buddha's doctrine. So refuge is the foundation of the Buddha's doctrine. As presented in the Buddha's teachings, it is also the basis on which one can receive the vows.

1. Causes of going for refuge¹

The causes of refuge can also be understood as the reasons for seeking refuge. As explained in the teachings there are two main causes, the first is to generate fear of the general sufferings of cyclic existence and in particular, the sufferings of the lower rebirths. The second cause is, having generated the fear of the sufferings of cyclic existence and lower rebirths, generating the confidence that the objects of refuge have the ability to liberate one from these fears. Thus one seeks refuge in the objects of refuge.

Refuge in the Three Jewels with these two causes intact will be a pure and stable refuge. Of course, one may initially have a general sense of refuge in the Three Jewels; however a pure and unflinching refuge is one which has these two causes intact. Having complete reliance on the Three Jewels means believing in them one hundred per cent, acknowledging from the depths of one's heart that the Three Jewels have the full capacity to free one from all fears and sufferings. The essential point here is to cultivate an unflinching and absolute reliance upon the Three Jewels.

The greater the fear and sense of reliance one has, the stronger the mind of renunciation one also develops. So we need to see how taking refuge and developing renunciation have a connection and are complementary.

If we are keen to practise the Dharma, then we cannot underestimate the value and essentiality of understanding and taking refuge properly. As explained in many teachings, it is the very foundation of the Dharma. Generating a true sense of longing to be free from the general sufferings of cyclic existence, and the lower realms in particular, arises from contemplating the plight of having to experience these sufferings over and over again. Would you be able to bear the thought of having to repeatedly experience these sufferings, over and over again? When we really consider this plight, we will definitely generate a keen wish to be free from all suffering. Then, automatically, we will start to think about how best to free ourselves, and who can help us. It is at this point that we turn to the objects of refuge as the unmistakable source of help. The more we gain a deeper understanding of the qualities of the refuge, the greater our confidence and reliance in the objects of refuge will become.

When someone experiences the symptoms of a severe illness, they feel extremely uncomfortable and really long to be free from the sickness and their suffering. It is at the point when they keenly want to be free from their sickness that they seek a skilled and trusted doctor who can prescribe a treatment that will cure their illness. This is a very good analogy that illustrates the need and appropriateness of going for refuge to the Three Jewels.

Gyaltsab Rinpoche mentions in his Commentary on the Uttaratantra that an intelligent and sharp-minded trainee needs to have the realisation of emptiness if they are to take unmistakable refuge in the Three Jewels. Other texts also indicate, that even if one has not realised emptiness directly, one would, at the very least, have to have an unmistakable and correct understanding of emptiness that has been established through reasoning.

As mentioned previously, because strong refuge is dependent on developing a sense of renunciation, we need to reflect on the reason why we experience suffering. Suffering doesn't not come about randomly or arise spontaneously from nothing; rather, it is dependent on its own causes and conditions. So what are the causes and conditions of suffering? When we contemplate in this way we realise that it is as a result of negative karma that one created in the past that we experience suffering now.

Taking that further one can ask: why did one create such negative karma? It was because our intentions and actions were influenced by the delusions. When we look further into which specific delusion influences us to create negative karmas, we come to realise that the main delusion is the fundamental ignorance of grasping at the self. At this point one comes to the understanding that without applying the antidote to this fundamental root ignorance, there's no way that the inevitable consequence of suffering will cease. At this point one arrives at the understanding that the antidote for overcoming the ignorance of grasping at the self is none other than selflessness or emptiness. We can relate this to two of the four noble truths: that suffering is to be known, and the origination of suffering is to be abandoned.

When one thinks about the various types of suffering that one experiences, and the origin of that suffering, then an understanding of the need to abandon the causes of suffering will arise. Understanding this will definitely help us in daily life. Whenever we experience any kind of uncomfortable difficulties we can immediately reflect, 'Whatever uncomfortable feeling I am experiencing now has not come about randomly without causes and conditions. It has been caused by something!' So, contemplating in that way actually lessens our pain and suffering, and in this way helps us to cope and better deal with that difficulty or problem.

¹ Ed: These headings have been introduced to relate the teaching to the structure presented in the lam rim.

In summary, there are two main causes of going for refuge, and it is by contemplating those two causes that one develops that keen wish to rely upon an object of refuge to help free oneself from the causes of those fears. With this understanding we need to be able to come to the conclusion that we cannot develop a genuine and strong sense of refuge without reflecting on those two causes.

2. Identifying the objects of refuge

The definition of the Buddha jewel is the ultimate source of refuge having the eight qualities of being non-produced and so forth. The Buddha jewel has two subdivisions: the conventional Buddha jewel and the ultimate Buddha jewel.

Conventional Buddha jewel: Of the four bodies of the Buddha, the form body and the emanation body are examples of the conventional Buddha jewel.

Ultimate Buddha jewel: The remaining two bodies, the wisdom truth body and the nature truth body identify the ultimate Buddha jewel.

The definition of the Dharma jewel is a completely purified truth in the continuum of a superior being which has any one of the eight qualities, such as being inconceivable and so forth. The Dharma jewel is also sub-divided into two:

Conventional Dharma jewel: The twelve limbs of the Buddha's teachings are an example of a conventional Buddha jewel.

Ultimate Dharma jewel: the truth of cessation and the truth of path.

The definition of a Sangha jewel is a superior being possessing any of the eight good qualities of realisation and freedom. It is also subdivided into two main categories: the conventional Sangha jewel and the ultimate Sangha jewel.

Conventional Sangha jewel: This is an arya being i.e. a being who has gained the realisation of emptiness.

Ultimate Sangha jewel: The truth of cessation and truth of the path within the arya being's mental continuum. So it needs to be understood that the two truths can be related to both the Dharma jewel as well as the Sangha jewel.

If one wonders, 'Why do we need to have three jewels as objects of refuge?' then the answer lies in this prayer:

To the Buddha jewel, the unsurpassable supreme guide; the Dharma jewel, the unsurpassable supreme protector; and the Sangha jewel, the unsurpassable supreme companions;

To these Three Jewels that are objects of refuge, I make offerings.

This verse presents the reason for the identification of Three Jewels, which is that we need a supreme guide to guide us in the right direction on the path leading to liberation and enlightenment. So reliance on an unsurpassable supreme guide is most essential to gain the unmistakable method. We also need to have the ultimate protection, which is identified as the Dharma jewel. Likewise we need to rely upon unflinching and compassionate companions to help us along the path, which is the Sangha jewel. So in this way we can understand the need to rely on the Three Jewels.

Now again, if one wonders, since it is the Dharma jewel which is the actual protector, then why do we need to rely upon the Buddha jewel and the Sangha jewel? Doesn't that make them redundant? Are the Buddha jewel and Sangha jewel not protectors as well? The answer is that all three objects of refuge are equally supreme protectors. But the reason why the Dharma jewel is identified as the actual protector is because ultimately the only way to liberate oneself from suffering is by practising and actualising the Dharma jewel within oneself.

Here we need to gain this very profound understanding that while the Buddha has unbiased and unlimited love and compassion for us, and the Sangha jewel are also completely dedicated and committed to assisting us and being our companions, they are however not able to liberate us just by themselves. Without applying the Dharma jewel within our own mental continuum and actualising it, the Buddha and the Sangha jewel cannot by themselves liberate us. If that were possible, then we would have been liberated long ago; we certainly would not be suffering in cyclic existence now!

The fact that we are still in cyclic existence and experiencing various sufferings is because we have not yet actualised the Dharma jewel within our mental continuum. To give a practical example, we can all identify the ten non-virtues and their opposites, the ten virtues. Making a commitment to avoid the ten non-virtues is the basis for morality, and it is this practice of ethics that will help to protect us from taking rebirth in the sufferings of the lower realms. We need to understand that taking the initiative to adopt the practice of avoiding the ten non-virtues and adopting the ten virtues has to be our own decision. It is by practising that commitment and actualising it in one's mental continuum that one actually establishes the protection that is necessary to avoid the sufferings of future unfortunate rebirths. That is how we need to understand how the Dharma jewel is the actual protector.

As the Buddha himself said, 'I have shown you the method and path to liberation. Now it's up to you to adopt it and put it into practice'. So the Buddha clearly mentioned that, while he presented the unmistakable methods and paths leading to liberation, the decision to actually get there lies with the individual themselves. Furthermore, the Buddha gave this very good analogy of how Dharma practice works: which is of a patient, the doctor and the treatment. When a patient comes to a doctor with certain symptoms, the skilled doctor will definitely prescribe the unmistakable treatment, which is giving, for example, the correct medicine. However if the patient refuses to take the medication or treatment, the patient cannot hope to be cured. Skilled doctors and kind nurses cannot help the patient if the patient is not willing to undertake the necessary treatment.

If someone practises the abandonment of the ten non-virtues, and then observes morality of abiding by the ten virtues then, because they are leading an ethical life, it will be a life that is relatively free of complications and problems. Most importantly, at the time of death, such a person will have a natural confidence that, having to the best of their ability practised avoiding the ten non-virtues and adopting the ten virtues, they will not go through an unfortunate rebirth in the next lifetime. That level of confidence can definitely manifest at that time. So to that extent we need to pay attention to this very crucial practice.

With all of this explanation we can come to another very profound understanding. While one regards, the Buddha jewel, the Dharma jewel and Sangha jewel as supreme and holy objects, one might however relate to them as having being holy from time immemorial, thinking that they have always existed as holy objects. That would be a completely wrong understanding. If we view them as some sort of primordial supreme being, then we might also develop a false belief that they can help or protect us without any effort on our part. So that would be the wrong conclusion.

The right profound understanding is that the supreme objects of refuge that we rely upon did not come about spontaneously without depending on causes and conditions. Rather, they reached that state as a result of practising avoiding every smallest misdeed, and by adopting every small virtue along the path. It was that practice along the path that led them to achieving the ultimate result. What that shows us is that this is exactly how we need to engage in our practice right now. We need to avoid the smallest misdeeds and adopt every single small virtue. Slowly accumulating small virtues is the way we create the causes and conditions for reaching the ultimate state of enlightenment. So this practical approach is actually a very profound level of understanding to adopt.

Here I have covered only the very basics of the objects of refuge. You can rely on the lam rim teachings for a more elaborate and complete explanation. Then, as we go through the text, covering refuge briefly, it will supplement the study you've already done.

EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

3. REFUGE

Unlike most other subdivisions in his commentary, Gyaltsab Je's commentary on the Refuge section of the chapter does not begin by quoting the relevant verse from the Bodhisattvacharyavatara. Rather it begins by explaining the meaning of refuge as follows:

The meaning of refuge is to mentally hold and verbally express the objects of reliance for liberating one from dangers and suffering.

Thus refuge carries two main causes. As explained here succinctly, the meaning of refuge is to mentally hold, refers to mentally holding that full confidence in the objects of refuge. With that full confidence in the objects of refuge, one expresses verbal refuge. These are the objects of reliance for liberating one from the dangers of suffering; this encompasses all suffering. That is the meaning of refuge as explained here.

Then Gyaltsab Je goes on to state:

There is causal refuge and resultant refuge. The first is to hold the Three Jewels that already exist as objects of reliance for liberation from dangers.

The causal refuge is a refuge that already exists, such as Buddha Shakyamuni and other enlightened beings who are already enlightened; as well as the Dharma jewel and Sangha jewel that are present now. Here reliance can be understood as relying on an unfailing friend, someone who will help us at any time; especially when faced with many difficulties. Thus the objects of refuge such as the Buddha are definitely unfailing friends who present us with so much inspiration, advice and so many teachings about how to overcome and uproot our misery and suffering. By relying on them we can definitely achieve liberation from all dangers.

Then Gyaltsab Je describes resultant refuge:

The second is to hold the Buddha jewel and Dharma Jewels that one is going to realise in one's own continuum, as objects of reliance for liberation.

This refers to the fact that one will develop Buddha jewel or Dharma jewel in one's continuum in the future.

Practically speaking, we normally take causal refuge in the Buddha jewel that already exists as an enlightened being that we relate to, and to whom we make offerings and salutations and so forth. We relate to this causal refuge as an entity that has already obtained the qualities of enlightenment. These supreme enlightened beings are an object of our reliance because of their kindness to us and the unmistakable advice that they present to us. So one visualises the Buddha and the Dharma and the Sangha from whom one receives inspiration and kindness.

The resultant refuge relates to the future objects, where one actualises the Three Jewels; becoming an enlightened being, actualising the Dharma jewel and the Sangha jewel within oneself. Contemplating that is the resultant refuge.

Gyaltsab Je' commentary continues:

The causes for refuge, the refuge objects, and the four ways of going for refuge—by knowing the qualities, by knowing the differences, by acceptance, and by not asserting other refuges—as well as the advice of refuge and so forth one can know from the Great Exposition of the Stages of the Path of the Perfections by the great lama. Hence I do not explain them here.

3. The manner of going for refuge

Here Gyaltsab Je presents the third subdivision of the topic of refuge with four further subdivisions:

- by knowing the qualities refers to knowing the particular qualities of the Buddha jewel, the particular qualities of Dharma jewel and Sangha jewel;
- by knowing the differences, which is explained in six categories in the lam rim
- by acceptance, and
- by not asserting other refuges,

4. The commitments of taking refuge

In stating as well as the advice (or commitments) of refuge and so forth, Gyaltsab Je is referring to the final subdivision of the topic of refuge. The addition of and so forth indicates the benefits of taking refuge. This is also explained extensively in the lam rim, as Gyaltsab Je himself mentions:

... one can know from the Great Expositions of the Stages of the Path of the Perfections by the great lama. Hence I do not explain them here.

Here, the text is explaining the four divisions of refuge exactly as I mentioned earlier in the overview of the topic of refuge.

Gyaltsab Je further mentions:

The refutation of the mistaken assertion that the truth of the path is never an ultimate refuge, the general presentation of refuge, the difference between ultimate and conventional refuge and so forth I have already explained in the Commentary on the Uttaratantra. Thus you can learn from that.

The refutation of the mistaken assertion that the truth of the path is never an ultimate refuge is presented in Gyaltsab Je's Commentary on the Uttaratantra. The truth of the path within the Buddha's continuum is explained as an ultimate refuge.

With the difference between ultimate refuge and conventional refuge, conventional refuge is understood as a temporary source of refuge while ultimate refuge is to be understood as a permanent refuge.

Thus far, the commentary is identifying the objects of refuge in terms of a general presentation that can apply to all the tenets of Buddhism. The presentation from this point onwards is based on specifically identifying the Mahayana refuge.

The difference between the common refuge and the uncommon refuge, which refers to the Mahayana refuge, can be understood in the manner of how the refuge is taken. With common refuge, when one takes those vows of refuge the commitment is, 'I'll seek refuge in the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha until the end of my life'. So the commitment is only for the duration of this life. Whereas the uncommon or Mahayana refuge is taking refuge with intention to take refuge until one reaches the state of enlightenment.

The actual Buddha refuge in both the common refuge and uncommon refuge is the same object, the Buddha. However, when it comes to the Dharma jewel, the uncommon or Mahayana Dharma jewel relates to specifically the Mahayana truth of path and the Mahayana truth of cessation; while the Sangha jewel relates specifically to the Mahayana arya Sangha.

Different texts have slightly different presentations of causes of the uncommon Mahayana refuge. The commentary on the lam rim called Manjushri's Words indicates that by contemplating the qualities of the Three Jewels, one generates a reliance on them, specifically by thinking about how they have the full ability to liberate one.

In relation to the fear of suffering, one uses one's own wish of not wanting to experience suffering to understand how all other beings are exactly the same; they too do not wish to experience any kind of suffering and they also want to experience all happiness. So one generates a specific fear in relation to oneself, and extends that to all other beings who will also have to experience these various sufferings again and again. Extending that wishing to be free from suffering, as well as being free from those fears to all beings, is the particular cause for taking refuge.

The verse from the root text is placed at this point in Gyaltsab Je's commentary:

26. *Until attaining the essence of enlightenment
I go for refuge to the buddhas;
Likewise, I go for refuge to the Dharma
And to the assembly of bodhisattvas.*

In addition to this verbal assertion of taking refuge one generates the motivational thought that, 'In order to liberate all beings from all suffering, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I take refuge. Until I achieve enlightenment, I take refuge in the buddhas, the Dharma and the bodhisattvas.

In the Tibetan version the next lines in Gyaltsab Je's commentary are:

... by taking the Three Mahayana Jewels that already exist in the continuum of others, and the Three Jewels that will exist at one point in one's own continuum as the focal object, ...

So, as mentioned previously, this object of refuge is a causal refuge:

... from now until the attainment of the essence of highest enlightenment, when one manifests the dharmakaya at the foot of the bodhi tree,

This is indicating that one takes refuge until one achieves both the place and the state that one aspires to. Specifically the place is at the foot or site of the Bodhi tree, and the state is the dharmakaya body of a buddha. One achieves the dharmakaya body of a buddha at Bodhgaya, or in the Akanista buddha field where the sambhogakaya form of buddhas reside. So one goes for refuge until one is at the place of the seed of the bodhi tree which is in Bodhgaya, and until one achieves the dharmakaya or a buddha's truth Body.

Gyaltsab Je then further explains:

Until that time one takes refuge in the buddhas and likewise in the Mahayana Dharma jewel and takes refuge in the assembly of bodhisattvas, the superior bodhisattvas.

Again, this is identifying the specific objects of refuge: until that time one takes refuge in the buddhas and likewise in the Mahayana Dharma jewel and the assembly of bodhisattvas, the superior bodhisattvas.

Furthermore:

One takes the buddhas that are already established as guides of the path, the Dharma jewel that one will generate in one's own continuum as the actual refuge, and Mahayana superiors who have already achieved the Dharma jewel, as companions to achieve refuge.

This description of the way one takes refuge is exactly as I presented earlier.

Next week is the discussion night, so please engage in the discussion well. Following that is the exam, so try to do that well too. And the seminar is coming up, so it is also good to prepare for that and try to participate in it well.

The main thing is to utilise all of this study and practice as a way to ensure that your mind and heart becomes a bit more gentle and kind. That is the main purpose. If we ensure that whatever practice we do helps to reduce the unruly, negative states of mind that are so prevalent within us, then the more that unruly mind is tamed, the more a kind and more gentle mind is manifest and developed further. Then, not only this life, but also at the time of death and in all future lives, we will definitely experience a much more joyful and happier state of mind.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta motivation we have just generated, we can now engage in the meditation practice. [meditation]

For next week's class I would like to ask Tara Garward to lead the prayers before the meditation. It is important that the younger generation start to take a more active role by training in how to lead prayers and so forth. Tara Institute definitely needs to continue to exist, regardless of how long I am around. So my intention is to provide the means for that continuity to be maintained. I am constantly thinking about what will benefit the centre; when things are working well for the centre it brings me great joy! Of course if it's beyond my ability to help then I can't do much, but I do think about what is best for the centre. I am not intending to boast but I have personally done over a thousand Tara pujas for the success of the centre. Mentioning this now might sound as if I am seeking compensation for buying offerings and so forth, but this is definitely not the case. Normally I am not the type who announces what I do for the centre; rather the main thing is if it is beneficial for Tara Institute.

When I first started teaching at Tara Institute, Wayne and Jeremy were the younger generation—I think Jeremy might have been the youngest. Wayne used to have a good voice then. When we were up at Atisha centre Geshe Dawa used to say, pointing at Wayne, 'Oh, that young lad there has a good voice. If we ask him to lead the pujas, it would be good!' Of course now we can hear that his voice has changed a fair bit; in the recent guru puja his voice was quite hoarse. [loud laughter] Wayne himself may not think that he's much older, but the fact remains that he has aged! In any case, the main point is that it would be good for the younger students to start taking initiative in leading pujas and so forth.

In the past I have commented that there always needs to be an assistant for every role. For example a director needs to have an assistant, so that if the director is unavailable then the assistant can temporarily fill that position. The Spiritual Program Co-ordinator also needs an assistant who can step into that role if need be, and in relation to even myself, the teachings will continue to be presented regardless of whether I am around or not.

I remember being in Adelaide once when Jampa Gendun was anticipating going to Italy. I was asked, 'What will we do if he leaves?' I said 'Khensur Rinpoche is here, so why don't you check with him. Why do you need to ask me when Khensur Rinpoche is still here?' Apparently there was no other western teacher who was trained well enough to be able to teach if Jampa had to leave. So they asked, 'What do we do now? How would we find someone to replace him?'

However it's not really our business to think about what is happening in other centres!

Nevertheless, I am always happy when I see a flourishing, well-run Buddhist Dharma centre because it serves a great purpose in helping others. Beyond Dharma centres, even when I see a Christian church for example, running well with a good community, that brings me great joy too, for it fulfils the purpose of the congregation. Thinking in this way and maintaining such positive attitudes will definitely lessen mental pain and agony, and contribute to one's own mental happiness. So, this is a very important point that I am passing on to you.

4. CONFESSING WITH THE FOUR COMPLETE POWERS

Here confession refers to the practices that purify negativities. This need to purify negativities is based on an acceptance of karma. If someone doesn't believe in karma then they would not see the need or relevance for engaging in any purification practices.

The need to purify negativities comes about because one does not wish to experience the consequences of negativities, which are not limited to the suffering of pain. In fact any kind of unwanted or unpleasant experience is the consequence of having amassed negativities in the past. Likewise, if we wish to experience pleasant circumstances we need to take an interest in accumulating virtue, as any happiness that we experience is a result of virtue. So, we need to know how to accumulate virtue and how to discard and purify negativities.

A keen interest in wanting to purify negativities arises from an understanding of the cause and effect sequence of the law of karma. One might wonder about the purpose of engaging in purification practices. The simple answer, as presented in the lam rim teachings, is because one wishes for happiness and does not wish to experience any suffering. As will be explained, purification is achieved when the four opponent powers such as regret and so forth are intact. These four opponent powers are also explained extensively in the lam rim teachings on karma.

When one understands that the causes of suffering are negativities, and one does not wish to experience suffering, then one understands the need to purify those negativities. Likewise if one wishes to experience happiness, one needs to create the cause of happiness, which is virtue.

This understanding of karma, even at this very basic level, can be related to our everyday experiences in this very lifetime. When we relate the various unpleasant experiences we have in our everyday life, as well as the sense of fulfilment and joy when things go well to the explanations of karma, then our understanding of karma deepens and is firmly established. We have all experienced the ill-effects of anger. Because it is such an unpleasant experience, no-one willingly chooses to feel angry, so in order to overcome the unpleasant experience of anger one will attempt to practise patience. As one develops more patience, one will notice that the mind of anger becomes weaker. It is through one's own experience that one will see the positive effect of practising the virtue of patience. Thus, acquiring virtuous states of mind, such as developing patience to oppose the non-virtuous state of mind of anger, will help to overcome disturbing and unpleasant states of mind.

We would all consider ourselves Dharma practitioners who engage in some form of practice. So if we are really inclined to practise the Dharma, then we need to ensure our practice is one that is essentially based on the actions of discarding and adopting, which means discarding negativity and adopting virtue. If our practice does not comply with this practical aspect, then we won't really have much of a basis for real practice. We need to understand that this is how we need to engage in practice.

There are two subdivisions to this section of the text:

4.1. General presentation

4.2. The individual meaning

4.1. General presentation

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins his explanation with:

One should strive to not have any negativity from the very start. However should one, although striving in this way, receive faults through the power of carelessness and the many afflictions, then it is unsuitable to just leave them thoughtlessly.

As the commentary explains, it is best to strive from the very start to not engage in negativity. However, due to the faults of carelessness, or lack of conscientiousness, and the many afflictions we continue to accumulate negativities. This is actually indicating one of the four ways that compel us to engage in negativity. As explained in the teachings, the four conditions for creating negativity are:

1. Lack of conscientiousness
2. Having many delusions
3. Lack of faith
4. Because of not knowing

So when one does incur negativity it is unsuitable to just leave them thoughtlessly or carelessly. Rather, as the commentary further explains:

One should strive in the method for confession as laid out by the Compassionate Teacher.¹

The confession of downfalls should be done as explained in the higher and lower vows. The confession of negativity should be done with the four powers.

Higher and lower vows relate to the particular set of vows. For transgressions of the tantric vows there is a particular confession method explained in the tantric teachings. Likewise, if one has committed a downfall of a bodhisattva vow, the way to confess that is explained in accordance with the bodhisattva vows. It is the same with the self-liberation vows, with particular methods of confession for fully ordained monks and so forth.

Having mentioned that confession of negativity should be done with the four powers, the four powers are thus introduced.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

From the Sutra of the Four Dharmas:

Jampa, if bodhisattva mahasattvas possess the four dharmas then, although they create and accumulate negativity, it will be cleared away.

This refers to one of the four ways of amassing the karma that is both created and accumulated; also referred to as the karma where the result is definitely to be experienced.

To continue with the quotation from the sutra:

If the four are stated they are: thorough application of strong repudiation, thorough application of the antidote, the power of reversing from the fault and the power of the basis. These are as it is explained.

If the created and accumulated karmas are karmas definitely to be experienced, then what need is there to talk about those that are not definite.

It is important to not only be able to identify what the four opponent powers are, but to recall them when engaging in purification practices.

The power of regret

Then Gyaltsab Je goes on to explain the four opponent powers individually:

The first power: This is generating many regrets for the non-virtuous karma created. To generate this, one needs to meditate well on the way the three results are generated from non-virtuous karma.

To explain this point we can use the example of the negative karma of killing. In order to develop regret about the negative karma of killing, one needs to contemplate the three types of results that will be experienced as a consequence, which are:

1. The ripened result
2. The result similar to the cause
3. The environmental result.

As explained extensively in the lam rim teachings, there are specific consequences that accompany each of the types of results. So when one thinks about the prospect of having to experience one of these results, then strong regret about having engaged in the negative act of killing will develop. As explained in the teachings, the intensity of the regret should be to the same degree as regret about having consumed poison, where there is a profound wish to expel the poison from your system. Another example is a poisonous snake suddenly dropping on your lap; you immediately want to get rid of it!

With the example of consuming poison, three individuals consume the same type and quantity of poison at different times. The first person is already dead and the second person dangerously ill and facing death. The third person, having seen that the first person has perished and that the second person is very ill, becomes very anxious when he realises that he has consumed the same substance. With one dead and the other dangerously ill and facing death, the prospect of having to face the same consequences is quite apparent!

While that third person may not have experienced the effects of the poison right away, seeing the fate of the other two he would develop very strong regret and would definitely want to get rid of that poison from his system. This analogy is presented as a way of indicating the extent of regret about having engaged in negativity.

Chapter 2

As the teachings explain, if someone develops strong regret about having engaged in some negativity, then half of the negative karma can be purified just by developing that regret. Furthermore, when strong regret is developed then that will automatically encourage the individual to refrain from engaging in negativity again, thus the power of reversing from the fault will be applied. Then the means to purify negativity, with thorough application of the antidote and the power of the basis, will also naturally arise in the mind. So we can see that the application of the later three opponent powers is related to having developed a strong regret first.

To return to that illustration of the three individuals who have consumed poison, the first person is analogous to the person who has created negativity in the past and, as a result, has been reborn in the lower realms. The second person is analogous to one who is about to be reborn in the lower realms. The third person, seeing the fate of the first and second persons, realises that the negativity that they have created is the very same cause that will lead them to the same consequence experienced by the first and second persons, which is to be reborn in the lower realms. So by contemplating the suffering of the lower realms and realising that one has created the causes to be reborn there oneself, the urgency to purify those negative karmas will naturally develop. In this way a keen wish to purify negative karma will naturally be developed. This is how the understanding of the cause and effect sequence of karma is definitely related to the intensity of our determination to purify our negative karma.

The analogy of the three individuals who have consumed poison, in particular the third individual who is facing the prospect of the same fate of the first two, is a very powerful one. The third person still has a chance to rid themselves of the poison so that they won't have to experience the same fate as the first two. If the poison is identified quickly, there are ways of neutralising or eradicating it. When someone is bitten by a snake, for example, there are anti-venom injections to counteract that poison.

But if measures to eradicate the poison are not taken, it is quite certain that the third individual will have to experience the same consequences as the first and second individuals. So it is up to the third individual to do something about it and to take urgent measures to get rid of the poison. It is good for us to identify ourselves as the third person, who has created negativity but who still has a chance to purify negative karma. When we think about the prospect of having to experience the consequences, we will develop an urgent need to purify negative karma.

It is appropriate to relate ourselves to the third individual. It gives us some sense of hope, in the sense that we are not in the position of the first and second individuals. As an example of the third person, we still have good prospects as we have the chance to purify our negative karmas. So this is a very relevant example to use to encourage ourselves.

Earlier we mentioned the four conditions that compel us to engage in creating negativity. We have just dealt with the first, lack of conscientiousness. The second is having many delusions, the third is lack of faith and the fourth is the lack of knowledge. These are really important points to consider.

How true it is that we lack conscientiousness?

When the delusions are very prevalent, then they are a doorway to engage in negativity.

Third is the lack of faith, which can be directly related to the lack of faith in karma. If we don't have faith that negativity will result in unpleasant suffering, and that virtue will result in happiness, then there will be nothing to prevent us from engaging in negativity. One will also not take any interest in accumulating virtue.

The fourth condition is quite obvious—if we lack knowledge we won't know how to avoid creating negativity. Lack of knowledge is overcome by gaining knowledge. Once we gain the knowledge of how to engage in virtue and abandon negativity, we will develop the necessary measures for the desired outcome. The whole purpose of our study is to remedy the lack of knowledge. The lam rim teachings tell us that if we lack the knowledge of how to apply the antidotes, then when we come out of meditation there will be nothing to prevent us from engaging in negativity again. The lam rim teachings, which I have covered in the past, explain these points thoroughly.

The power of remedy

Having described the first power the commentary then presents the second power, known as the power of the remedy or, more literally, the application of the antidote. One should not take a limited view of these remedies. Some teachers explain that all virtues can be the application of the antidote. Others explain that all virtues done with the intention of a purification practice will become the application of the antidote. However the fact remains that all virtues serve as a means to become an antidote to negativity. This is a good point to keep in mind.

Gyaltsab Je's presentation in his commentary reads:

The second power: There are, as explained in the Compendium of Trainings ...

Shantideva's text Compendium of Trainings presents six remedies:

1) ... relying on profound sutras, ...

Here relying means to actually recite profound sutras.

2)... meditating on emptiness, ...

This is one of the most profound remedies.

3)... relying on recitation ...

Recitation specifically relates to the recitation of mantras of particular deities, which are powerful for purification.

4)... relying on the holy form, ...

This implies constructing holy images such as statues, and stupas and so forth.

5)... relying on offerings ...

This refers to making offerings.

6)... relying on the names ...

Here names means reciting the names of holy beings such as buddhas and bodhisattvas.

The power of resolve

The third power: Refraining perfectly henceforth from creating negativity.

This implies developing a strong commitment that 'Henceforth, I will not create negativity'. One of the points in refraining perfectly henceforth from creating negativity, is that in order for it to be a sincere and honest resolve, one needs to develop the strong intention, 'I will not engage in that negativity again'. At that moment one develops a strong intention to refrain from negativity. If, however, later on, due to the earlier mentioned conditions, one finds oneself creating negative karma again, it will not incur the extra negativity of lying, because of the fact that one was sincere and honest at the time the resolution was made.

There are also explanations about how one can make a promise to refrain from negativity for a specific period of time, such as a few hours, one day, two days and so forth.

The power of reliance

The fourth power: Meditating on bodhicitta and so forth.

Although not mentioned explicitly here, this also refers to generating refuge as well as meditating on bodhicitta. This is as explained in other teachings.

Some may think that the power of reliance, or the power of basis, only refers to the three objects of refuge. However, as indicated here, generating bodhicitta is also the power of reliance. One needs to understand this point.

As explained in the teachings, any negative karma we create is in relation to either the objects of refuge or ordinary sentient beings. The negative karma that one creates in relation to the objects of refuge is purified by taking refuge in the objects of refuge. The object we rely upon is the very object with which we created the negative karma! The negative karma we create in relation to sentient beings is remedied by generating bodhicitta for sentient beings. That is why refuge and bodhicitta are specifically listed as being the powerful basis.

Gyalsab Je then explains in the commentary:

Here the first power is explained elaborately.

Here indicates the first power being explained elaborately in this chapter.

Furthermore:

Regarding this one needs to remember the time of the negativity, the cause, the doorway, the action, the object and how often one did it.

This is a very meticulous presentation of how to purify negative karmas. In relation to the time we engaged in the negativity, it might be hard to recall all of the details of the negativities one has created in the past, such as when we were quite young. But we can definitely recall on a day-to-day basis the kind of negativities we engage in now. The doorway indicates the three doorways of body, speech and mind. Action refers to the kind of action the negativity involved. The object, refers to the object of the negativity and how often one did that. As mentioned earlier, although we might not recall specific details from our past, we can definitely relate to instances of the negativity that we create now.

This can also be related to the might of the omniscient mind. The mind of the Buddha is an omniscient mind, thus it is the only mind that is said to know karma in its entirety; i.e. which knows the most subtle and detailed aspects of karma. Only an omniscient mind is able to know the details about past lives. As ordinary beings we cannot recall any instances of our past lives—we don't have that memory. However when an omniscient being looks at our continuum, they are able to see each and every instance of our past lives and details of how and when we created negative karmas. The time, the specific negativity, the cause and so forth, all of these details would be known in great detail. That is why the subtleties of karma are said to be extremely obscure phenomena, which only an omniscient mind can know in full detail.

4.2. The individual meaning

This is subdivided into four categories:

This section explains the meaning of each opponent power again, which are:

4.2.1. The power of thorough repudiation

4.2.2. The power of the basis

4.2.3. The power of the thorough application of the antidote

4.2.4. The power of reversing from faults

4.2.1. The power of thorough repudiation

This is also subdivided into four:

4.2.1.1. Generating regret by analysing the way one created negativity

4.2.1.2. Meditating on regret by fearing dying with negativity and going for refuge

4.2.1.3. Meditating on regret by considering elaborately the way one meaninglessly generated negativity

4.2.1.4. Considering the way negativity is frightful

4.2.1.1. GENERATING REGRET BY ANALYSING THE WAY ONE CREATED NEGATIVITY

Again this is also subdivided into four:

4.2.1.1.1. Making requests to the object of confession

This involves declaring one's negativities and making requests to the object of one's confession.

4.2.1.1.2. General confession from the point of view of time, cause, aspect and so forth

4.2.1.1.3. Confessing heavy negativity created with regard to special objects

4.2.1.1.4. Confessing with regret generated by contemplating the undesired results of non-virtue

4.2.1.1.1. Making requests to the object of confession

The verse relating to this reads:

27. *The complete buddhas residing
In all directions, and the bodhisattvas,
Those possessing great compassion,
I request with folded hands.*

In his commentary Gyalsab Je explains the meaning of this verse thus:

With hands folded I request the fully enlightened buddhas [such as Buddha Shakyamuni] and the bodhisattvas abiding in all the directions, those endowed with great compassion, to listen to my regretful confessions of negativities.

At this point one visualises the enlightened beings, the buddhas, in the space in front of oneself surrounded by the bodhisattvas. Thus the buddhas and bodhisattvas are the objects of reliance to whom one is confessing one's negativities. Even reading this verse itself can be a very meaningful way to build up that visualisation, and to remind oneself of the object of focus for one's confession.

One is pleading with the buddhas and the bodhisattvas abiding in all the ten directions to 'Please listen to my regretful confessions'. Here regretful has the implication of very strong regret about having engaged in such negativities, to an extent similar to the analogy of having consumed poison and wanting to immediately get rid of that poison. Thus in the presence of these enlightened and holy beings, buddhas and bodhisattvas, who have great compassion and the means to help us to purify our negativities, we declare our negativities and plead with them to please listen to us.

Earlier I explained the analogy of the three beings who consumed poison. When one really thinks about that in relation to the negativities, then one's regret will not just be fleeting. Rather we will definitely develop a very strong and deep sense of regret, and the wish to purify the negativities will naturally be quite strong as well.

It is really important that we reflect upon the consequences of the three types of results of negativity in order to develop that strong determination to purify our negativity. The three types of results are extensively explained in teachings such as the lam rim and it would be good for you to refer to that, to familiarise yourself with those types of results and so forth.

We need to understand the real significance of engaging in preliminary practices such as purification, which is a prerequisite to further developing our meditation practices. The reason we find that it is very hard to focus on the meditation object now, and that our mind is very dull and unclear, is because of negativity, specifically the strong negative imprints that we have on our mind. So, negativity is what hinders our further development.

Another important point to note is that there is a difference between negativity and a negative mind. For example, attachment in the desire realm would be a negative mind and the imprint of attachment left on the mind is the negativity. This is to be understood as follows: whenever one creates any negative action, in the very next moment that particular action will have ceased, however an imprint is left upon the mind in the form of a potential to produce negative results. That imprint left upon the mind is the negativity. Therefore a distinction needs to be made between a negative mind and negativity, and likewise, between virtue and a virtuous mind. While a virtuous mind and non-virtuous or negative minds are consciousness, virtue and negativity are not consciousness. I have explained these distinctions previously as well, and it is important to keep them in mind.

Generally we would say that there are no redeeming qualities in negativity. However the lamas have a common saying, 'Negativity does have one good quality, which is that it can be purified'. This is also an important point to acknowledge. I have also explained previously that the purification of negativity actually takes place when one engages in a practice that will prevent one from experiencing the negative results of a previously created negative action. So, when a purification practice is done properly, one will not have to experience the negative result of that negativity. There is also a word in Tibetan, jang which, when used in relation to negativity, means to purify negativity. But when this particular Tibetan term is used in relation to virtue it implies increasing virtue.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

27 August 2013

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta motivation that we have just generated, let us now engage in the meditation practice. (Pause for meditation)

You can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, to free them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

4. CONFESSING OF NEGATIVITY WITH THE FOUR COMPLETE POWERS

4.2. The individual meaning

4.2.1. The power of thorough repudiation

4.2.1.1.1. Making requests to the object of confession (cont.)

In our last session we spoke quite extensively about the purpose and need for purification practices. Then we covered verse twenty-seven. As presented in this verse and explained in the commentary, one first visualises the enlightened beings and the objects of refuge in the space before oneself. One then makes the request to these enlightened beings; in particular to the Omniscient and Compassionate One, Buddha Shakyamuni, to accept one's confession. One then engages in the purification practices. In fact, it is really very good to recall the Buddha's presence in all our activities, both mundane as well as spiritual. That is a really good way to be mindful about ensuring that one maintains a virtuous frame of mind.

In our normal activities such as drinking or eating, it is good to recall the Buddha and make offerings of the food and drink to the Three Jewels. When that becomes a habit, then whenever we consume food and drink, even if it is just a cup of tea, we will remember to offer it. If we were to forget to offer it in a rushed moment, soon afterwards we would start to feel a bit uneasy and feel regret, 'Oh, I didn't get the opportunity to offer my tea'.

When we start to feel uncomfortable in the event that we forget to make an offering, then that is one sign that we have actually incorporated the practice into our daily life. Likewise, it is good to remember the enlightened beings during other activities such as travelling and so forth. Also before we go to bed it would be really good to visualise the Buddha right above our pillow. Recalling the enlightened beings just before we go to sleep would indeed be a very good practice.

We can notice for ourselves that when we are not able to engage in a familiar activity we start to feel uncomfortable. This is particularly true with mundane activities, such as when we have formed the habit of going to a movie once a week or watching an episode of a TV serial every week. When we don't get a chance to do that activity then we feel uncomfortable and regret what we might have missed.

It is because of our familiarity that there is a sense of unease and regret when we break that habit. Just as that is true for insignificant mundane activities, so too as we start to develop more and more familiarity with engaging in virtue, that same sort of regret will arise when we miss an opportunity to engage in virtue.

We need to make it part of our practice to periodically recall the enlightened beings such as the Buddha, so that we feel the presence of the Buddha at all times. Every time that we contemplate the qualities of the enlightened beings, we obtain immeasurable benefit. The more we become familiar in recalling the unsurpassable qualities of the enlightened beings, such as their great love and compassion, the more it benefits our own mind. Thus, any kind of mental disturbance that we may feel will subside the moment that we recall the qualities of the Buddha. Our mind will definitely feel at ease and we will feel a real sense of fulfilment. This is a very practical benefit.

By recalling the Buddha on a day-to-day basis we familiarise our mind with the qualities of the enlightened beings, which will naturally carry through all the way to the end of our life. Then, when we are facing death, due to our earlier familiarity we will naturally be able to remember the Buddha. Focusing on the Buddha at the time of death will definitely protect us from being reborn in the unfortunate realms in the very next life; that is because one's mind will be completely immersed in virtue. As explained in the teachings, when the last thought in our mind is a virtuous one, it will ensure that we will have a higher rebirth. This is how the Buddha, the enlightened beings, and the objects of refuge protect us, by enabling our mind to be in a virtuous state.

The following verse was presented last week:

27. *The complete buddhas residing
In all directions, and the bodhisattvas,
Those possessing great compassion,
I request with folded hands*

These lines exhort us to recall the enlightened and noble beings, buddhas and bodhisattvas, all of whom possess great compassion. The essence of the qualities of the enlightened beings and bodhisattvas is great compassion, and just recalling this will ensure that our mind is in tune with great compassion. This is an incredible method to generate a virtuous and positive frame of mind, as well as a way to amass great merit. As mentioned previously, through the familiarity with this state of mind in our daily life, we will automatically be able to anchor our thoughts and focus on the objects of refuge at the time of death. Our mind will be clear and calm and focused on the essence of the practice, which is going for refuge.

If we don't pay enough attention to this fundamental aspect of practice and constantly seek some higher form of practice, then the danger is that at the crucial moment of death we will be confused as to what to focus on. If we have never developed real familiarity with any one practice, then at the critical moment when we face death we may wonder what practice to do and what object to focus on. A confused mind is not a conducive state of mind to be in at the time of death. So we really need to acknowledge the essence of the practice and try to familiarise ourselves with it. At our level we may not yet be able to engage in grand or high level practices, however we can definitely manage to focus on the objects of refuge.

4.2.1.1.2. General confession from the point of view of time, cause, aspect etc.

This is another meticulous presentation. Here we go into detail about the time, cause and aspect of the negativities that one has engaged in. Recalling these details and confessing them makes our purification practice a complete form of practice.

The following verses are quite easy to comprehend, so we can go through them quickly.

28. *From beginningless cyclic existence,
In this life and in others,
The negativity that I have done by myself
Or induced others to do,*
29. *Which I hid due to being confused by ignorance,
That I rejoiced in,
Seeing these faults
I confess them to the protector from the depth of my heart.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Since beginningless time I have circled in cyclic existence. I confess all negativities in this and other lives due to being confused with regard to the ripening result of karma.

Time

The first part refers to the duration. In terms of duration we have circled in samsaric existence since beginningless lifetimes. It is said in the teachings that we cannot pinpoint our first life, thus there is no beginning to samsara; the continuity goes back endlessly. We could hypothesise about our beginning, but it is in fact impossible to determine the first human race on earth. Likewise with going back through our past lives; it is impossible to determine that there was a beginning. Thus, as indicated here, we have been circling in samsara over beginningless lifetimes.

Cause

One confesses all the negativities one has done in this life, as well as all other previous lifetimes. The cause of those negativities is being confused or, more literally, not knowing the ripening result of karma. So confusion or ignorance particularly refers to ignorance of karma, i.e. not knowing the cause and effect sequence of karma, such as that engaging in non-virtuous actions will bring about unpleasant consequences, and engaging in virtuous actions will bring about happy results. So here ignorance specifically means not knowing the cause and effect sequence of karma. In particular, as explained here, the ripening results of negative karma are suffering; particularly to be reborn in lower realms. That covers causes.

Aspect

Because of confusion or ignorance one does not know that by engaging in virtuous actions one will experience happy results, and by engaging in non-virtuous actions one will experience suffering. Without knowing this, how would one possibly avoid creating negative karma and adopt virtue? Without that knowledge there is no encouragement to practise in that way.

This understanding of the cause and effect sequence of karma helps to prevent one from creating negative karma, while at the same time adopting virtue. Most importantly, it will help one to generate great compassion for others who are engaging in non-virtuous activities. Normally when we see someone engaging in grave negative deeds, we might scorn them or feel hostile, thinking that they are really bad and evil. But with this understanding we will feel great compassion for them, knowing that they are engaging in deeds that will bring about the grave consequences of great suffering. Then our attitude towards them will be naturally one of great compassion, because we understand that they are creating these negative deeds out of ignorance. Overpowered and controlled by ignorance, they are compelled to engage in those negative deeds. This is the reason why we should feel great compassion for them.

We can relate to this with our own experiences. Whenever we have engaged in negative deeds it was because we felt that we were compelled to do so; we either didn't know the consequences or because we were controlled by strong delusions.

The way to really contemplate how beings who are voluntarily engaging in great misdeeds have no control over their actions, and indeed are compelled to engage in these negative deeds, is to relate it to ourselves. We are supposed to have an understanding of karma, knowing that engaging in non-virtue will bring about suffering and engaging in virtue will bring about happiness. Yet we still find ourselves engaging in negative deeds under the influence of strong delusion. If that is case for us who have some understanding about karma, then how much more so will it be true for those who don't have any understanding about karma?

When we bring that understanding to mind, then instead of feeling hostile and generating anger towards those who are creating misdeeds, we can develop a sense of great compassion for them. Understanding karma becomes a means for one to develop compassion and also develop a sense of patience with them. These are really important points for us to consider. Whenever we relate to passages in the teachings such as those presented here, it is always good to try to reflect upon the main points. How does it become personal instruction? How does it encourage us to engage in the practice of developing essential points about the path? How does it help us to develop a sense of renunciation? How does it help us to gain higher levels of understanding? How does it encourage us? To relate the teachings to one's own understanding of the essential points of practice is most important.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary then further explains:

I confess the negativities that I have done myself and those that I have induced others to do, as well as the faults of having rejoiced in the negativities of others, due to being oppressed by the confusion of ignorance regarding the law of cause and effect.

As the commentary explains, we are confessing the negativities that I have done myself. Thus we are confessing negativities we have engaged in ourselves, as well as those that we have induced others to do. The negativities that we have engaged in include non-virtuous actions such as killing, stealing and so forth. Inducing others means influencing others to engage in negative actions. Here it is important to note that in order to incur a negativity of killing or stealing and so forth, one does not need to perform the action oneself. If one influences or orders someone else to perform an action on behalf of oneself, or for the purpose of both, then when they complete that action, one incurs the negativity of that misdeed oneself. It is essential to understand this.

Furthermore there is the fault of having rejoiced in the negativities of others. This refers to feeling glad when others are engaging in negativity, rather than acknowledging their actions as being a fault or a misdeed. One incurs negativity when one is happy to see others engaging in negativity.

One commits these negativities due to being oppressed by the confusion of ignorance. As explained previously, one engages in these negativities as a result of being completely confused or ignorant about the law of cause and effect.

Thus there are three main types of negativity: those performed by oneself; those that one has induced others to do; and rejoicing in the negativities that others perform.

In his commentary, Gyalsab Je further explains how to develop regret and make a confession.

Generating an understanding of these faults of mine I regret them, and accordingly confess them from the depth of my mind to the protectors, not hiding or concealing them.

As explained here, generating an understanding of these faults of mine, indicates that one actually recognises the negative actions that one has created and acknowledges them as faults. There is a part in the confession ceremony for monks and nuns where the abbot asks, 'Do you see the faults as faults?', to which the response is, 'Yes, I do'. That response indicates that one is acknowledging the faults as being faults and taking personal responsibility for them. Following that, the next question is, 'Henceforth will you apply restraint well?', and the response is 'Yes, I will'.

Confessing faults from the depth of my mind indicates acknowledging one's negative actions as being misdeeds, and from the depth of one's heart generates a determination to confess and purify them. As mentioned here, one confesses these negativities to the protectors, which means the enlightened beings and bodhisattvas. So the enlightened beings are the object of one's confession, and one does not hide or conceal negativities in their presence. This indicates that one completely declares all the negativities one has accumulated since beginningless time.

Following that confession with a strong regret that is generated from the depth of one's heart, one then develops a strong commitment not to engage in negativity again. That is the third power, the power of resolve or refraining henceforth from creating negativity. So we can see in these two verses a summary of the four opponent powers.

As the past masters have indicated, if one develops very strong regret for any negativity that one has engaged in, then half of one's negative karma is purified. This shows how important it is to develop a strong regret. When one applies the third opponent power of resolve or refraining from creating negativity, then one has secured an intact practice of purification; it is in this way that negative karmas are definitely purified.

One also needs to take note that regret can be either virtuous or non-virtuous. As the great master Vasubandhu indicated, when one develops regret about non-virtuous actions, then that is a virtue. Whereas, if one regrets doing good deeds, that is a negativity.

When one recalls the misdeeds and negativities that one has engaged in in the past and develops strong regret about that, then that becomes a major part of the purification practice. Later, after having engaged in other forms of practice to accumulate virtue, if one rejoices in the virtue that one has accumulated, then that becomes the means to further expand and increase one's virtue.

So it is good to know that developing regret about misdeeds is a way to purify them, while rejoicing in good deeds will be a means to accumulate virtue. Otherwise we could fall into the danger of actually regretting having engaged in good deeds, which would be a complete waste of positive energy.

On a practical level it is good for us to take this as a personal instruction. As ordinary beings it is quite impossible for us to completely avoid engaging in negativity, because we are still oppressed by the confusion of ignorance. But we do have these methods for purifying that negativity. So it is good for us to develop a sense of regret whenever we find ourselves engaging in any kind of negativity. If we can remind ourselves to immediately regret any negative action, then slowly we can improve to transform ourselves. Of course, this will be explained in more detail later.

As mentioned in last week's session, past teachers have indicated that one quality that negativity has is that it can be purified. This means that we don't have the excuse, 'I can't do anything about it'. We definitely can purify negativity if we engage in purification practice. However, one needs to be mindful not to become complacent thinking, 'Oh well, if negativity can be purified I might just as well engage in negativity'. That would be a lame excuse for creating more negativity.

4.2.1.1.3. Confessing heavy negativity created with regard to special objects

These special objects are presented in Nagarjuna's Precious Garland, the last text we studied. The special objects are those objects that are endowed with unsurpassable qualities, such as the objects of refuge; the Three Jewels; those who have been personally kind and benefitted us, such as our parents; and objects that are the source of whatever understanding that we have gained, who are our abbots and teachers, our spiritual friends. Spiritual friends can be the source of kindness as well as a source of knowledge and qualities.

Any negativities with respect to these objects are very heavy negativities, and need to be purified.

The root text reads as follows:

30. *Whatever harm I have inflicted
To the Three Jewels,
Father, mother and other teachers
With body, speech and mind, due to afflictions.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

I confess all negativities that I, this confused person, created with regard to the Three Jewels, my father, mother and other fields of merit like teachers and others, due to the cause of the three poisons, with the three doors of my body, speech and mind.

The particular negativities that one confesses are the negativities relating to oneself as a confused person who is oppressed by ignorance. Due to this confusion, one has created negativities with regard to the Three Jewels, which are the objects endowed with great qualities, and my father and mother, who are objects of kindness and benefit to oneself. Fields of merit like teachers indicates one's own teachers, and others refers to those like the abbot, who have bestowed vows and so forth upon oneself. It can also refer to teachers with whom one may not have direct connection, or other beings who are special objects; so others can be quite expansive.

The cause for creating negativities in relation to the special objects is the three poisons, and the manner or doorway through which one creates those negativities refers to the three doors of one's body, speech and mind.

There is a possibility that, as a result of strong delusions, one might physically harm special objects such as one's parents or teachers.

Or we may have harmed them verbally, criticising what they are saying, or saying it is not true, or reversing their points against them.

Creating negativity through the doorway of one's mind would be generating wrong views in relation to the Three Jewels, one's teachers or one's parents, or having harmful intentions towards them.

Whenever one engages in any negativity, it is always through these three doors; there is no other way to engage in negativity other than through our physical actions, our speech and negative states of mind. Of these three, the most important to protect at all times is one's state of mind. That is because physical misdeeds and negative speech come about as a consequence of having negative intentions in one's mind.

As indicated in the Vinaya sutras, the main emphasis has to be on protecting and disciplining one's mind. Then, as one disciplines one's mind, one's physical and verbal actions will naturally be disciplined as well. So, that is where we need to really focus our attention.

On a practical level, we might in this lifetime have not found occasions where we might directly criticise the Three Jewels or create heavy negative karma in relation to the Three Jewels; we might not have been in close proximity to teachers for long, thus have not accumulated heavy negativity with respect to them.

However, one arena where we have probably created heavy negative karma is in relation to our parents. We might have found many occasions where we have engaged in physical, verbal or mental negativities. So this is something that we need to really acknowledge and take ownership of. Then we will see that there is a definite need to engage in purification practice.

The confession and purification practice with regard to the special objects is to confess the negativities and engage in purifying them, by applying the antidote. Then resolve, 'Henceforth I will not create such negativities in relation to the special objects'. This is how we engage in the purification practice.

With respect to these special objects, the way to purify one's negative karma is by developing a strong sense of regret from the depth of one's heart, confess one's negativities, and then making the commitment, 'Henceforth I will not engage in these negativities'.

4.2.1.1.4. Confessing with regret generated by contemplating the undesired results of non-virtue

This is another significant point. Here one contemplates the undesirable results of non-virtue, where one thinks about the ripened result of each specific non-virtue, as well as other types of result of each of the negative karmas we have created. When one contemplates the prospect of having to experience those results, then a strong sense of regret and wishing to confess those negativities will arise quite spontaneously.

The relevant verse is:

31. *I, this sinner, afflicted with various faults
Of different negativities, whatever frightful
Negativities I created,
I confess to those that guide all.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

I, this sinner, who is afflicted with the many faults of attachment and the like, the causes that produce the results of the hell realms and so forth, have created many heavy negative karmas of killing and so forth. Whatever frightful negativity I created I confess to the ones that guide all.

The commentary indicates that the one who has created the negative karma is oneself, a sinner afflicted with many faults. The extent of the negativities we have amassed is such that we are the very embodiment of faults of attachment and the other two poisons. The many negative karmas, such as killing and so forth that we have created are the causes that produce the results of hell realms and so forth. So the faults within oneself act as the causes that produce the resulting suffering states, such as the hell realms. With a sense of a strong regret, one confesses all this frightful negativity to the omniscient buddhas, who are the guides to all sentient beings. Thus, by contemplating the undesirable result of non-virtue one will generate a strong sense of regret, and following that, actually engage in an action of confession and purification; then a sense of restraint will naturally follow.

4.2.1.2. MEDITATING ON REGRET BY FEARING DEATH WITH NEGATIVITY AND GOING FOR REFUGE

We can leave this for the next session.

In relation to the points that have been covered this evening, it is good to really bring to mind and acknowledge any negativities one has created, with the understanding and knowledge that they can be purified. Then one develops a strong sense of regret, and in the presence of omniscient and compassionate beings, such as the buddhas and the bodhisattvas, one makes a confession. When we take the initiative in this way we will definitely reap the benefits of the confession.

The following verses in the chapter are an elaborate presentation of the ways one has engaged in negativities. Lest one is tempted to think, 'Maybe I am free from negativity', or 'I might not have engaged in much negativity', the following verses present very clearly the ways in which one has created negativities. They also explain the consequences of not confessing and purifying those negativities. Both the gravity of the situation and the urgency of having to purify those negativities are explained very clearly. So reading the following verses and contemplating them is a really meaningful personal practice.

We are quite familiar with the seven limb practice, which can be presented in a few lines. However, each of those seven limb practices can be practised very elaborately. Earlier in these teachings we covered the limb of offering, and then the limb of prostration was presented. Now we are in the limb of confession. Each of the seven limbs are actually presented very elaborately in this text in great detail. So when we recite the Seven Limb Prayer and do some sort of practice in relation to the seven limbs, all the material presented here will enhance our practice, because of our deeper understanding.

The Seven Limb Prayer that we recite regularly prior to engaging in teachings and other practices begins with:

I prostrate with my three doors.

This indicates the doors of body, speech and mind. So what does the prostration of the three doors imply? This was elaborately presented earlier.

I make actual offerings and mentally created offerings.

What those actual offerings are and what mentally created offerings are was also presented very elaborately. Do you remember?

I confess all negativities that I have created since beginningless time.

All of this has been explained in great detail tonight.

These verses might consist of just a few lines, but when one has a deeper understanding of what each practice entails, it will, as mentioned previously, really enhance one's practice.

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

3 September 2013

Based on the motivation we have just generated, we can engage in the meditation practice. [meditation]

In order to ensure that our tong len practice is intact, we first need to familiarise our mind with meditating on compassion for all sentient beings. That entails bringing to mind the various sufferings that are experienced by sentient beings, and generating a strong wish that they be free from that suffering. Here we can think about the different types of sufferings that are experienced. We first contemplate on the suffering of suffering, which are the obvious physical and mental suffering that sentient beings experience. Then we focus on the suffering of change that sentient beings experience. Finally we focus on the all-pervasive suffering of sentient beings. As we contemplate the various forms of suffering that they experience, we generate the strong wish, 'May all sentient beings be free from every type of suffering'. So in this way, by bringing to mind the sufferings of sentient beings and wishing them to be free from that, we generate compassion.

To ensure our love and compassion for sentient beings is free from bias, we need to develop a state of mind that sees all sentient beings as being equal. We already have a spontaneous feeling of love and compassion for those closest to us. When we see them being deprived of happiness, it is natural for us to wish them to be happy. When we see them suffering, it is also natural for us to wish them to be free from that suffering.

When we go beyond those who are close to us, in particular, those who we don't get along with, or those we consider as enemies, we might actually feel glad when they are deprived of happiness and experiencing suffering. We often hear comments such as, 'Oh they deserve to suffer!' made by others when they see people they don't get along with experiencing suffering and hardships. They may even wish that their enemy experience even more difficulties and hardships. That attitude is the complete antithesis of the love and compassion that is to be developed here, which is an unbiased love and compassion towards all beings.

We need to change our attitude and our way of thinking, particularly in relation to those we normally don't get along with; those who irritate us and so forth. When they are suffering and deprived of happiness, if we can start to feel how wonderful it would be if they were to be happy and free from their suffering, then that is a sign of the transformation that is taking place in our mind—the benchmark of a true sense of love and compassion. So we need to familiarise our mind with developing an unbiased sense of love and compassion towards all.

When we feel love and compassion for those we feel close to, while feeling hostile towards enemies, wishing them even more suffering and deprived of happiness, then that is a biased form of love and compassion. We need to train our mind so that we can extend our love and compassion towards all beings, particularly to those who are difficult to get along with. We begin to establish the real basis of unbiased bodhicitta when we genuinely wish them happiness, and that they not experience any kind of suffering.

While we may have not yet developed actual bodhicitta, we can definitely establish the basis of bodhicitta in our mental continuum. That in itself would be an incredible achievement in this lifetime. We would have then secured an incredible personal benefit for our own physical and mental well-being. When we start feeling a genuine sense of concern for others, wishing them to be happy and wishing them not to experience any suffering, then naturally we won't feel any hostility or ill-will towards them.

Furthermore, because it's an unbiased love and compassion, we will not be particularly attached to some and distant to others. That in turn enables a lot of disturbing thoughts based on attachment and hostility to subside. Then, quite naturally, our mind will become much more tranquil, happy and joyful. So, there is an immediate personal benefit. As mentioned earlier, if we can establish a firm basis of bodhicitta in our mental continuum, we can feel quite satisfied with this significant achievement in this life.

Familiarity with unbiased love and compassion towards all beings will naturally induce the intention to benefit others, which is also unbiased and without discrimination. That establishes the proper basis to benefit other sentient beings. Thus, whatever help one extends to others will be really pure, because it is not mixed with the self-cherishing attitude.

Even though we may not have developed spontaneous, uncontrived bodhicitta yet, we can definitely acquaint ourselves with a genuinely unbiased and indiscriminating wish to benefit others that is based on unbiased love and compassion. Through contemplation, we come to realise that if we are to benefit others by freeing them from all suffering and leading them to ultimate happiness, we need to achieve enlightenment ourselves. Even though that attitude may not be uncontrived bodhicitta yet, it is a very similar attitude; at our ordinary level, that is the closest we can get to actual bodhicitta. As it is similar to actual bodhicitta, it is a really worthwhile achievement. In fact, the unbiased wish to benefit others without discrimination, which is based on unbiased love and compassion for others, is essential.

Lama Tsong Khapa had a very significant purpose in mind when he emphasised the importance of first developing immeasurable equanimity as the first of the seven-point cause and effect technique for developing bodhicitta. In fact this presentation of developing equanimity first is said to be a unique presentation of Lama Tsong Khapa, as it is not found in the works of the other Kadampa masters. When the four immeasurable thoughts are presented, immeasurable love and compassion usually comes first and immeasurable equanimity comes later, but in the six-session practice immeasurable equanimity is presented first. So this is in line with Lama Tsong Khapa's presentation, which comes from his own experience of his practice of developing bodhicitta. I have explained this point many times previously which is really important for you to keep in mind.

Also in order to develop unbiased love and compassion, we need to first develop renunciation. Without developing renunciation there is no way that we can develop love and compassion in our hearts. Thus, the order in which these states of mind are developed is presented meticulously in the teachings. If we wish to develop this incredible state of mind of bodhicitta, we need to establish the sequence by cultivating earlier states of mind.

If we are to subdue our unruly mind it is essential that we try to incorporate the understanding we gain from the teachings into our practice. Otherwise there's not much purpose in listening to and studying the Dharma. Although it will definitely leave a good imprint on the mind, there will not be much more benefit than that. We need to make an effort to really integrate the practice into our life so that our mind starts to be transformed from an unruly one to a more subdued, gentler and kinder mind. Otherwise our practice has not really served much purpose. However this transformation doesn't come about immediately. Rather, it requires investigating our state of mind on a daily basis, and analysing what kind of thoughts or attitudes are influencing our mind. A daily analysis of our thoughts and state of mind is crucial for our practice.

If we stubbornly remain just as we are, then the Dharma will not have much effect upon us. We can check whether any transformation has taken place so far by looking back at our lives. Before we heard and made any attempt to practise the Dharma, when someone out of attachment showed us nice gestures and so forth, we would have also responded out of attachment with nice gestures and the like. Likewise, when someone related to us with anger and hostility, we would have also immediately responded with anger and hostility. That's how our mind was prior to integrating the Dharma in our life. So have we changed or not? Has any true transformation taken place or not? This is something we need to gauge now. Do we react in the same way as we did previously? If we do, then we have remained stubborn, and a true transformation has not taken place. But if we find that our reactions have changed significantly, then a transformation has taken place.

Are we practising Dharma if we respond with attachment to someone who relates to us out of attachment? How could it be Dharma? If we really look into our situation we will see that it is because we react to attachment with attachment that so many complications and problems arise in our life. Alternatively, if we start to relate to others with a genuine sense of concern and a kind mind, then that is the gauge of a true transformation. When we start to become much more relaxed, joyful and happier in this life, that leads onto even more benefit in our future lives. So by developing a kinder mind, we experience both the long-term benefit in our future lives, as well as the short-term benefit in this very lifetime.

In summary, for any transformation to take place we need to integrate the Dharma into our life. Then we won't stubbornly hold onto our same old attitudes and same old behaviours. The way to make that transformation is to really analyse our mind, constantly being aware of our attitudes and our state of mind, and then making an attempt to overcome and change that, rather than holding onto the same states of mind and attitudes. By applying the Dharma in that way, we make that transformation come about. If we remain as we are with no change at all, then the Dharma is not having any effect.

These are points that are presented in the text we are studying, which is why I am highlighting them to you here. The next few verses indicate that we need to be mindful of how we have the perfect conditions right now for practising the Dharma and integrating it into our lives. We are human beings free of all adverse conditions and we have come into contact with the perfect Mahayana teachings, and the perfect Mahayana teachers who present those teachings. We also have all the other conditions that give us leisure to practise the Dharma. So we have to make some attempt to utilise these incredible and fortunate conditions to transform our mind, and practise according to the basic principles of the teachings. Right now we have the good fortune of having sufficient food, shelter, clothing and all the rest of the good conditions associated with being human. But if we are not mindful to secure and protect our future wellbeing, then in twenty years or so we might find ourselves living amongst animals and surrounded by the conditions of the animal realm. We will then be deprived of all the good conditions that we enjoy now. This is not fantasy but a real probability.

So in order to protect ourselves from having to experience that fate, we need to really integrate the essential points of the practice of the Dharma into our everyday lives. That is what I personally feel. I feel liberation and enlightenment might be quite beyond my reach right now, but I can, at the very least, protect myself from unfortunate rebirths. If I cannot do some practice and integrate the Dharma to a certain degree, then having met the perfect Mahayana teachings and perfect Mahayana teachers would have been completely wasted.

If we cannot even protect ourselves from being reborn in the unfortunate realms, then what benefit would there have been in meeting with these perfect conditions now? We might aspire to the highest goals, but on a more practical level we need to ensure that, at the very least, we protect ourselves from being reborn in the unfortunate realms in the near future.

Before she passed away, a former study group member, Caryn Clarke said, 'I'm not really afraid of death itself. I don't feel too anxious about the actual experience of death, but what I do really feel anxious about is not being able to meet with similar opportunities again in the future'. Then she went on to say that studying with me for about seven years was an incredibly fortunate time, and that her only anxiety was, 'Will I be able to obtain such conditions in the future again?' In fact Caryn was giving us a really significant message. The conditions that Caryn was not sure she would get again are the very conditions that we enjoy now! So we have to utilise them as a way to gain something meaningful.

Caryn also confided in me that she felt much more relaxed and calmer at the hospice. Whenever she went back home, there were relatives and family and a lot of disturbances and distractions, whereas at the hospice she had more time to herself. So despite the pain and agony in her body, she was still considering what was best for her practice. She said, 'In the hospice environment I get the opportunity to do more Tara mantras and recite some prayers, and I feel much calmer, and my mind is much more settled'.

Again, the outline just by itself presents a really significant point. It concerns how to develop a sense of regret about the prospects of having to die without purifying one's negativities. Having contemplated that, one takes the initiative of going for refuge.

We'll get to the explanation in the commentary shortly, but first we need to get a sense of the context of this heading. Fear of having to die with negativity refers to the fear of having to experience the ripened result of negativity. As mentioned in our last session, the ripened result of negativity is to be reborn in the unfortunate realms, which are realms of intense suffering. The way to prevent that unfortunate outcome is to rely on an object that can protect one from having to experience them. Here the objects of reliance are the Three Jewels. Thus, and going for refuge indicates the fourth of the four opponent powers, the power of the basis or reliance. Here, relying on the Three Jewels means wholeheartedly taking refuge in the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha; this serves as an antidote for overcoming the consequences of negativity, which would otherwise have to be experienced as a ripened result in the lower realms.

When one generates that strong fear of having to experience the consequence of the suffering of the lower realms, a strong sense of regret arises. The greater the extent of the fear in our mind, the greater the sense of regret about having engaged in that negativity will be. Then one contemplates, 'Can I overcome this negativity?' 'What can I rely upon that will overcome my negativities?' If it is possible to rely upon something that will protect us, then obviously we will want to rely on it wholeheartedly.

It is at this point that one develops a strong sense of refuge in the Three Jewels. So the first part of the cause for developing refuge is the fear of experiencing the sufferings of the lower realms, and the second part is wholehearted reliance on the objects of refuge.

By relying on the Buddha we are able to rely on the unmistakable method and the teachings that the Buddha presented. The Sangha helps us to access the teachings and practise them. While the Buddha presents the unmistakable method, which is the teachings, and the Sangha are the helpers, the actual protector is the Dharma itself. When the Dharma is actualised in one's own mind, then it becomes our actual protector. So we need to understand that the Dharma is the real protector. This systematic presentation is helpful in understanding how the objects of refuge protect us.

The relevant verse of the root text is:

32. *Without having purified my negativity,
I will die before by having been killed.
Please rescue me from this with the method
That liberates quickly.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

If I do not confess my negativities immediately, then I will be killed prematurely by the lord of death while possessing unpurified negativity, and go to the lower realms.

Therefore I petition you to rescue me with all means, to quickly free me from the negativity.

We are now at the point where we have recognised and identified what the negativities are. Thus the need to confess and purify them naturally follows. Confessing one's negativities as a way to purify them means that one will not have to experience the ripened results of those negativities. That is the real meaning of purification. Negativity is purified when one applies a method that prevents one from having to experience the ripened results of negativity.

If I do not confess my negativities immediately conveys a sense of urgency. That is because the time of death is uncertain. Because of the uncertainty of when death will occur, there is a very strong probability that one could die before one gets around to confessing and purifying one's negativities. So if one confesses and applies a purification practice immediately, one can be comfortable about not having to experience the result in the next life, regardless of how soon one dies.

This presentation is related to the three main reasons why the time of death is uncertain, which are presented in the lam rim: death itself is certain; however the time of death is uncertain; and at the time of death nothing but the Dharma can be of benefit. The point being made by this verse is that the time of death is uncertain.

When the commentary says then I will be killed prematurely by the lord of death we need to understand that the lord of death is not some sort of mythological demon of death. We need to relate lord of death to the conditions of death and understand that we could meet with the conditions of death at any time. If we experience death while possessing unpurified negativity then we will be reborn in the lower realms. Therefore, as mentioned here, I petition you, which refers to the three objects of refuge, to rescue me with all means, to quickly free me from the negativity. So refuge is presented here as the ultimate protector, serving as the unmistakable objects of reliance to purify one's negativity.

Then Gyaltsab Je poses a query to introduce the next verse.

Query: Why should it be necessary to be rescued quickly, as one will not die before one has finished purifying one's karma?

The answer to that is presented in the following verse:

33. *This capricious lord of death
Does not rely upon whether it is accomplished or not.
Hence everybody, the sick and healthy,
Cannot trust their adventitious life.*

In his commentary, Gyaltsab Je explains how the verse serves as an answer to that earlier query. As it reads:

Answer: This lord of death cannot be relied upon for even one moment. He will come, regardless of whether one has accomplished purifying one's negativities or not, regardless of whether one has finished one's projects or not, and so forth.

Hence, everybody, whether sick or not, whether the life force is finished or not, dies adventitiously, and it is uncertain even if one will die today or not. Therefore one should purify it quickly.

Again we need to remember that what is personified as the lord of death refers to the conditions of death, which cannot be relied upon. In other words death can happen at any moment. We all know of so many instances where one moment a person is around and the next moment they are not. They can be sitting on a chair, or standing up, and by the time they sit down on the chair their life has ceased. We might assume we will live to be 80, or maybe 70 or 75 if we are less ambitious! But there is no guarantee that we will live to such a ripe old age. When we look around there are so many who die prematurely; so death can occur at any moment.

Death does not wait until one has completed purifying one's negativities. So the answer to the opening query, 'What is the rush in trying to purify my negativities? I'll only die after I have purified my negativities' is that the time of death is uncertain. If we don't know when it will occur, how can we possibly guarantee that we will have purified all our negativities before we die? The fact is that death could easily befall us before we get around to purifying our negativities. Death does not wait around for us to finish whatever project we may have; it's not as if death says, 'I will let you finish what you're doing first and then I will come'. Death can come at any time. Furthermore it's not as if death only follows those who are sick and spares those who are healthy. Whether one is sick or healthy, death can occur at any time.

This gives us the impetus to immediately purify our negative karmas through confession. The simplest way to do this is by firstly developing a strong regret for the negativities one has engaged in, and then going for refuge. This is one very simple method that we can do at any time. Developing strong regret and based on that, taking wholehearted refuge in the Three Jewels, is a really simple practice that we can easily do.

In relation to the point that death does not wait around for us to finish our projects, previous masters have told this story about how a teacher promised to take a young monk on a picnic. So, the young monk would periodically remind the teacher, 'teacher, when are we going to go on a picnic? The teacher's usual response was, 'We will go, we will go, once I finish all my work'. On one occasion the teacher noticed something in the distance and asked the young student, 'What is that over there?' to which the student replied, 'Oh that is someone who is going on a picnic after having finished all their work!' What they were seeing, in fact, was the body of a dead person being carried to the cremation site.

The main point of the story is that death can happen at any time, so we cannot wait around thinking that we will have time to finish our tasks sometime in the future. This implies that we need to apply the antidotes for overcoming our negativities immediately, because death can happen at any time.

Another point we need to derive is that we need to put our mind to accomplishing whatever we have decided to do. If we just leave it as something to be done later, then we may end up never being able to accomplish it. Overzealousness can also be a problem. There is another story about an individual who neglected the practical aspects and was too ambitious about what he wanted to try to practice. He came to me and said, 'I am very, very determined to do a long retreat'. So I tried to give some practical advice, saying 'Perhaps focus on earning some money to secure your livelihood first'. But he was determined and he said, 'Well, you know, I could die before I am able to do a retreat, so I would rather do the retreat right away'. I said, 'Well, that's true. That sort of thinking is good, so OK, do what you wish'. As it turned out he ended up doing neither the retreat nor securing his livelihood, because he lost his job as well!

We need to put an effort into accomplishing Dharma practice, and put aside any thoughts of procrastination. There's no sense in saying, 'You know, maybe I won't do that now; I would rather not do it'. We need to try to accomplish our Dharma practice as a matter of urgency.

With respect to the point about the lord of death not waiting, regardless of whether someone is sick or not, I can share another story on this point. In Dhargye Monastery, which was near my home town in Tibet, there were two brothers, one of whom was quite ill, who was nursed by his healthy brother. However, the healthier brother suddenly died, while the sick one was still alive. When the other monks were consoling him he made this comment, 'It seems that the lord of death has brought the wrong message. Why did he take my brother who was healthy, when it should have been me?'

When the commentary states whether the life force is finished or not, it is referring to age. The lord of death, or more specifically the conditions for death, can occur at any time regardless of one's age. We have all seen many examples of someone dying, regardless of their age or physical condition. Just recently on the news there was a report of a house collapsing during a wedding ceremony, which caused the death a number of people, and of course there are earthquakes and so forth where this happens. Not so long ago there was a story about a well-known person who went for a walk in the park and did not return, because he had suddenly died.

The emphasis here is on really contemplating the impermanent nature of our life, and the many examples of unexpected death, and use that understanding as a reminder of how our life is very transient and death can occur at any time. The reason for contemplating this is so that it can serve as an impetus to practise the Dharma, and integrate it into our everyday lives.

We need to regret our negativities and apply the measure of confession to purify them. If we look around we can see that while there are many who are completely distracted by frivolous and mundane worldly activities, there are very few who are seriously practising Dharma. Some people die before they even have a chance to understand Dharma, let alone being able to practise it. These are bare facts. So death is a reality that we need to keep in mind as an impetus for our own practice.

These points are really significant personal instructions, which should serve to encourage us to take our practice a bit more seriously, and put a bit more time and energy into it.

Now we will recite the Tara Praises, which we can dedicate to Lyn Coleman who is about to have surgery either today or tomorrow. As she hasn't had her surgery yet, there's time for us to do prayers for the surgery to go well and be successful, and that she may recover quickly, and be able to join us again in study group.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

10 September 2013

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta motivation that we have just generated, we can now engage in the meditation practice. [meditation]

4.2.1. The power of thorough repudiation (cont.)

This is subdivided into four categories:

4.2.1.3.1. Regret for having created negativity for friends, relatives, body and possessions, not knowing that they are unreliable

4.2.1.3.2. An example of how it becomes a mere object of memory at the time of death

4.2.1.3.3. Regretting having generated negativity for them by directly seeing their unreliability now

4.2.1.3.4. Regretting having generated negativity, by not realising the uncertainty of the time of one's death.

From the headings alone we can see the meticulous presentation of the material of the text. We need to see this presentation as a personal instruction that will serve as a means to generate virtue and merit, and abandon or purify negativity. These are the two main aspects of practice that we need to develop.

4.2.1.3.1. Regret for having created negativity for friends, relatives, body and possessions, not knowing that they are unreliable

From this presentation one can derive an understanding of how negativities are created because of not knowing that friends, relatives, body and possessions are unreliable. This implies that once we gain an understanding of the Dharma and the points mentioned here, we will know all the reasons for engaging in the practice of avoiding creating negativity.

The verse that relates to this outline reads:

34. *Leaving all behind I have to depart.
Not understanding this
I create manifold negativities
For the purpose of friends and non-friends.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Leaving everything behind, such as friends, possessions and even the flesh and bones I was born with, I have to depart alone to the other side.

Not understanding this, I generated many negativities because of protecting friends and destroying enemies. This I regret.

This is quite easy to understand. As explained in the commentary leaving everything behind indicates that eventually one has to leave everything behind, such as friends and possessions. Friends can turn into enemies, and those we once considered as enemies can turn into friends. So to that extent they are also unreliable. However the main point is that we will eventually have to leave behind friends as well as possessions, which include all the things that are essential to sustain ourselves, such as food, dwellings, clothing and so forth.

Even the flesh and bones I was born with refers to our most intimate possession, our own body, which we have possessed from the moment we were born. So when we die we have to leave behind even our most intimate possession. In order to go forward to the next life we have to leave behind everything that we possess now. Inevitably we have to face departing from this life alone. We also experience the transition to the next life completely alone. However most of us fail to understand or accept this reality.

The important point to derive from this explanation is that we are unable to take anything with us onto the next life. Thus, friends, possessions and even our own body cannot help us at the crucial moment of death. This understanding can be of practical benefit in our life now because it can help to lessen our strong cravings and attachments to these things. Normally we have strong attachment to those we feel close to, such as our relatives and friends, and aversion to those who are distant, and because of that we create a lot of negativity. So a lot of negativity is incurred as a result of maintaining such attitudes.

As the commentary states, not understanding this, I generated many negativities because of protecting friends and destroying enemies. This I regret. As mentioned previously, we have created a lot of negativities under the influence of strong attachment to those we consider close. We have also created a lot of negativity when we have been under the influence of anger and hatred for our enemies. By bringing to mind all the negativities that we have created, and specifically thinking about the unpleasant consequences, i.e. the ripened results of these negativities, we develop strong regret about having created these actions. Developing strong regret has deep significance because, as the masters have explained in the past, strong regret in itself will purify at least half of the negativity that one has incurred.

In order to explain the meaning of the next verse, Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary with:

It is unsuitable to create negativity for their purpose ...

The verse comes at this point:

35. *Non-friends become non-existent,
Also friends become non-existent.
As I also become non-existent
Everybody becomes non-existent.*

Then Gyaltsab Je goes on to explain the meaning of this verse:

... as non-friends, friends and oneself all become non-existent immediately afterwards.

Similarly, relatives, possessions and the like become non-existent. They are completely unreliable, and any negativity done for their sake, out of attachment or anger, is regrettable.

Here non-friends refers to enemies, who become non-existent. Even if one is not able to vanquish one's enemies, they will naturally become non-existent when they die. Not only will our fierce enemies become non-existent when they die, but our close friends and dear relatives will also die, and also become non-existent. So there is no purpose in exerting ourselves in creating negativities to try to nourish and protect them.

The next point is that we also become non-existent. Not only will external friends and enemies become non-existent when they perish, but the very individual who discriminates between friends and enemies will also become non-existent. This is indicating that inevitably we all have to face the same fate of death. It is not just a matter of looking outwards and seeing what fate others will have to undergo, but we too will have to undergo the same fate. So, the main point is that we need to relate the reality of this situation to ourselves.

Having mentioned that one creates a lot of negativity in relation to one's friends and enemies, there might be some thought that although enemies and friends will perish, one will not have to experience that same fate oneself and therefore will not experience the results of those negativities in the future. However, that is not the case. The creator of that negativity will definitely perish and have to experience the consequences of the negativity they have created. That is the crucial point that one really needs to reflect upon.

4.2.1.3.2. Example of how they become a mere object of memory at the time of death

All worldly things become mere objects of memory at the time of death, so they cannot help us in any way at that crucial time. The only thing that will be of benefit at that time is the Dharma. That is the implication of this heading.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

36. *Like the experiences during a dream,
Each and every phenomenon we engage
Becomes also an object of memory.
All that is past becomes unobservable.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je states:

For example, the minimal happiness experienced during a dream is only an object of memory after we wake up. Similarly, the objects that we fantasised to be happiness at first, and which we engaged in, are, at the time of death, but a mere memory.

As explained here, when we dream we have all sorts of experiences; sometimes happy experiences and sometimes, when we have nightmares, very fearsome ones. However, whether it was a pleasant or unpleasant experience, when we wake up those experiences are not there anymore, and we realise that it was all but a mere dream. As the commentary explains, the happiness experienced in a dream is merely an object of memory after we wake up. Of course, we have all had that experience. We sometimes have dreams where everything seems to be so pleasant; the area we are in, and our friends are pleasant and everything is so very comfortable. But at other times there may be great fears and so forth. Of course, when we wake up, there's nothing left but a memory, as dreams don't leave any physical residue behind.

Using that as an example, the commentary explains that similarly, the objects that we fantasised to be happiness at first, and which we engaged in, are, at the time of death, but a mere memory. What is referred to as fantasised to be happiness refers to all of the worldly or contaminated samsaric pleasures, which are just fleeting and momentary and not true objects of pleasure. At the time of death nothing but memories remain.

Then Gyaltsab Je goes on to explain:

- Therefore one should make repeatedly the decision to only practise the Dharma right now.

This is the main point: at the time of death, nothing is of benefit except the Dharma. What we normally consider as being of benefit, such as relatives, friends and possessions and so forth, cannot benefit us at the time of death. Likewise, what we normally consider as being harmful, such as enemies, cannot harm us at the time of death. The real harm comes from the negativity that we have accumulated, and the only benefit we can receive at the time of death comes from the Dharma.

To emphasise the main point again, it is not friends or relatives and the like who can benefit us when we die, but only the Dharma. Likewise, at the time of death enemies cannot harm us. Nothing can harm us but our own negativity. At the last stages of our life only our own negativities can harm us. Contemplating that prospect, we need to make the decision to only practise Dharma. That is the only concern we should have in mind. This decision to practise the Dharma comes as result of repeatedly thinking about these points, and then reaching the firm conclusion that one needs to only practise the Dharma, beginning right now.

4.2.1.3.3. Regretting having generated negativity for them by directly seeing their unreliability now

From this outline we can derive the understanding that we don't have to resort to memories of our past lives to see how friends, possessions and so forth and enemies are unreliable. From our own experience in this very life, we know the unreliability of friends, relatives and the like, and thus regret having generated negativity in order to benefit them.

The verse relating to this reads:

37. *Even during the short time we are alive
Many friends and non-friends have passed.
The negativity created for their purpose
Is so unbearable and remains before us.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Further, even during the short time we are alive, we know from experience that many friends and non-friends have passed. Since the frightening fruitional result of the negativity that we created for their sake still remains in front of us, it is as explained, 'If it cannot be shared by others what use are obstructing friends?'

As the commentary explains, even during the short time you are alive you have experienced the passing of many friends and non-friends. This is particularly true for those in their late 70s, and 80s. Just looking around, we can remember so many acquaintances and good friends who are gone, and even those with whom we clashed are also gone. Even the younger generation may have had the experience of someone you have known who has passed on and who are no longer around. We know from our own experience that so many friends, relatives and the like, as well as enemies, have passed on.

The next point in relation to this explanation is that the frightening fruitional result of the negativity that we created for their sake still remains before us. As so many relatives, friends and acquaintances, as well as enemies or those we didn't get along with have passed on, we might think that the negativity that we created in relation to them has passed on with them, and so everything is fine. However that is not the case. Although the individual beings have passed on, our negativity in relation to them still remains to be experienced as results in the future life. As the commentary states, the frightening fruitional result of the negativity still remains in front of us.

The main point we need to reflect upon is that the fruitional results of the negativity that we have created will have to be experienced in the next life. If not confessed, the negativity will not dissipate by itself, thus it will have to be experienced.

As a way to emphasise the earlier point, Gyaltsab Je gives this quotation:

If it cannot be shared by others, then what use are obstructing friends?

Even though friends and enemies may have passed on, the negativity one has created in relation to them remains. We might think it would be fair enough if we could share that negativity with the friends and enemies who were the object of that negativity. However, as this quotation explains, that is not the case. Rather, one will have to experience the consequences of that negativity solely by oneself. Thus, what use are obstructing friends? implies that as it is due to attachment to friends that one has created so much negativity, friends are of no real use or benefit to one. In fact, obstructing friends are actually detrimental to one's own well-being and happiness.

As I have indicated in the past, we cannot share either our happiness or our suffering with others. We might be able to share our possessions and wealth with others to some extent, but we can't really divide our own happiness and share it with others. Likewise, others cannot share their happiness with us. Nor can we divide and share unpleasant experiences and suffering. We have to experience that unpleasantness solely by ourselves. This is an important point we need to reflect upon. While we create the negativity in relation to others, the consequences of the negativity are experienced solely by ourselves. As a positive consequence of contemplating these points again and again, we will be motivated to reduce our attachment and aversion to others.

Then Gyaltsab Je concludes his commentary on this verse with the resolution one needs to make:

One should contemplate this again and again, according to the way it is taught, and generate regret for the negativity done for their sake.

This is a summary of the main point. We need to develop strong regret for the negativity that we have created. You might think that if you have ten friends who were willing to share the burden of your negativity, your share would definitely be lighter, and you would not need to experience the consequences alone. However, that is not the case, as negativity cannot be divided.

It would indeed be quite consoling if we could share our sufferings and even happiness with others. There might be some friends or family who would quite willingly share and remove some of our suffering. But the fact remains that no matter how much concern they have for us (or how much we have for them), we cannot share our suffering.

It would be wonderful if we could actually share our happiness with others but we can't do that either. If that was possible, I can quite confidently say that I have quite a bit of happiness that I am willing to share with others. Unfortunately, I cannot do that. When I see others in a distressed state deprived of any sense of joy and happiness, I would definitely share my happiness and give it to them if I could. When we see the immense suffering of others we might feel compelled to help them, even to the point of taking on their suffering; but while that can be done in the form of a practice, it can't be done in reality.

4.2.1.3.4. Regretting having generated negativity, by not realising the uncertainty of the time of one's death.

This, in fact, is one of the main obstructions to practising the Dharma seriously. Even someone with a terminal disease still hopes that they will live for a while longer. In our everyday life, we engage in so many frivolous worldly activities, completely oblivious to the fact that we may die at any moment. The time of death is uncertain, and death can happen at any moment, but because we don't understand this, we continue to engage in amassing negativities.

The verse in relation to this outline reads:

38. *In this way I am said to be adventitious.
Because I do not realise this,
I generate a multitude of negativities
Out of ignorance, attachment and anger,

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

In this way it is explained that I am adventitious, with a mere, brief life where the time of death is uncertain. Not realising this, I have created a multitude of negativities out of ignorance, attachment and anger.

Because negativity causes downfall into the hells, one should meditate on regret many times for having created negativity, by contemplating the certainty of death, the uncertainty of the time of death, and that at the time of death only the Dharma is of benefit, as well as the faults of the lower realms.

This is a clear explanation here, however to emphasise a few of these points further, I am adventitious, means that one's life is adventitious, neither being reliable or steady. With a mere brief life where the time of death is uncertain refers to the reason why one's life is adventitious or unreliable, because the time of death is uncertain. By not understanding this point or ignoring it, one creates a multitude of negativities out of this ignorance.

Here ignorance relates specifically to the ignorance of grasping at an individual 'I' or self. It is due to this strong grasping at the 'I' that the sense of self-importance arises. With this sense of 'I am the most important', everything that one does becomes a means to gratify 'me, me, me'! Due to this ignorance of grasping at the self, which induces a strong grasping at the 'I', one develops attachment to one's relatives and those close to oneself who help 'me', and anger or aversion to those one considers being an enemy who might harm 'me'. So out of that strong grasping at the self one creates a lot of negativities.

If those negativities didn't hinder a fortunate rebirth in the next life, then we could rest assured that there would be nothing wrong with creating them. But these negativities lead to rebirth in the unfortunate realms. By contemplating this fact, one regrets many times over the negativity one has created.

The points to really consider again and again are that the time of death is uncertain, and that at the time of death only the Dharma can help us, as well as the faults of the lower realms.

Contemplating the faults of the lower realms means contemplating the various types of suffering that are experienced there. As mentioned previously, the prospect of having to be reborn as an animal, where one lacks all of the present conditions that we have now should instil a very strong sense of remorse about having created the negativity that leads to such an unfortunate rebirth. We need to think, 'I cannot let my negativity remain unpurified. I definitely have to confess and purify it'. Contemplating the consequences that one will have to experience leads to strong remorse and regret about having created the negativity.

4.2.1.4. CONSIDERING THE WAY NEGATIVITY IS FRIGHTFUL

This has four subdivisions:

4.2.1.4.1. Since nothing can be added to life and it runs out continuously one will definitely die, and if one were to die with negativity, it is fearful

4.2.1.4.2. If one does not purify negativity, then one must experience suffering even in this life

4.2.1.4.3. The reason why it is so very fearful

4.2.1.4.4. The way one will be overwhelmed by suffering later

4.2.1.4.1. Since nothing can be added to life and it runs out continuously one will die, and if one were to die with negativity, it is fearful

If we were destined to live to 100, and that span of a hundred years were to remain constant, then we may not be too worried about it. But from the moment we are born the number of moments, days, and years we still have becomes fewer and fewer. That is the fact that is being presented here.

The relevant verse is:

39. *As day and night have no abiding
This life is continually becoming less;
If there is no adding to the weakening,
Why would someone like me not die?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Regardless of whether one is walking, sitting or lying down, without day and night remaining for even one moment, this life is constantly running out and it is impossible to add anything to the lessening life. Why would that not become a reason for someone like me to certainly die? It does.

Regardless of whether one is walking, sitting or lying down indicates that whatever activity in which one may be engaged, without day and night remaining for even one moment, this life is constantly running out. Our life is running out with every moment that passes. Just as we look at a clock, for example, we can see how every hour decreases moment by moment. The second hand does not stop for even a moment. That is exactly how our life is—every second that passes is a second less of whatever lifespan we may have. Even if we have a long lifespan, it is decreasing moment by moment. Furthermore, as the commentary explains, it is impossible to add anything to the lessening life. While life is naturally decreasing moment by moment, there is no extra life that can be added on. So the conclusion is, why would that not become a reason for someone like me to certainly die? This is a rhetorical question that implies that we will, of course, have to die sooner rather than later.

The conclusion that we need to contemplate is:

Since one will definitely die, and the time of death is uncertain, one should exert oneself in purifying negativity.

The negativity remains with us as we approach death, moment by moment, unless it is purified. Because death is uncertain and can happen at any time, one should exert oneself in purifying negativity with the same intensity that was mentioned earlier i.e. by developing strong remorse and regret in one's mind.

Once one comes to accept and understand that one has amassed great negativity and develops a strong wish to purify that negativity, the next step then is to know how to purify the negativity with the four opponent powers. Being able to identify the four opponent powers and knowing how to apply them is essential if one is to purify negativities.

Next week will be the discussion week. As usual it would be really good to do the discussion in a good way. The week following that is the exam, and again, it is good for you to prepare well for that.

Based on the motivation that we have just generated, we can now engage in the meditation practice. [meditation]

Let us now generate a positive motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

I need to obtain enlightenment for the sake of benefitting all sentient beings. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

4.2.1.4.2. If one does not purify negativity, then one must experience suffering even in this life

This has three subdivisions:

4.2.1.4.2.1. If one does not purify one's negativities, then one's friends and relatives cannot rescue us from the suffering of the life-force being cut

4.2.1.4.2.2. It is fearful because of not having created merit

4.2.1.4.2.3. One will be overcome by regret

4.2.1.4.2.1. If one does not purify one's negativities, then one's friends and relatives cannot rescue us from the suffering of the life-force being cut

This is an essential point because it relates to the most critical time of our existence, which is the transition to the next life. As the outline indicates, friends and relatives cannot help us at all at that time. The analogy that is given in other teachings is that the end of our life is like plucking a hair from butter; just like the piece of hair comes out solely by itself, there is nothing you can take with you when you go onto the next life.

The point here is that the consequence of not purifying our negativities is that we will experience suffering when our life force is cut, hence the need to purify negativities. If one were to die without having the opportunity to create any merit or virtue, the prospect of having to experience the consequences in a future life would generate great fear. However, as everyone here is engaged in purification practices, I'm sure no one here would have this fear!

Nothing can help us at the time of death except for our stock of virtue and merit, coupled with the purification practices we've done. So here we are being exhorted to actually engage in purification practices.

The lines relating to this section are:

40. *While I am lying on my bed,
Although I am surrounded by all my relatives and friends
The feeling of being separated from life
Is experienced by myself alone.*

41ab. When I am held by the minions of the lord of death

What benefit are friends, what benefit are relatives?

Shantideva is saying, 'There is nothing to alleviate my fear; friends and relatives are of no use against the minions of the lord of death when he holds my frightened flesh'. This again is not very obscure or abstract—it is quite obvious that when someone dies, they are completely alone and nothing can help them at that time.

The explanation in Gyaltsab Je's commentary is also quite clear so we will go through the next few verses quite rapidly. As Gyaltsab Je explains:

If one does not create merit, then at the time of death, when I am lying on my bed, although friends and relatives surround me with their affection and sorrow, I will have to experience by myself alone the suffering feeling of having my life-force cut.

We can readily understand that merit is accumulated by abandoning the ten non-virtues such as killing, stealing and so forth. In fact, adopting the ten virtues and avoiding the ten non-virtues are very practical ways to accumulate merit. If one has not engaged in practices such as these, then, even though we are surrounded on our deathbed by loving friends and relatives, which is often customary, they cannot help us.

As the commentary explains, no matter how much affection they have for us, at that time I will have to experience by myself, alone, the suffering the feeling of having my life force cut. When the teachings refer to the suffering of death they are specifically referring to the suffering that arises when the mind, or the consciousness, is separated from the body. For those who are not prepared, that will be a time of great suffering.

While the main suffering at the time of death is the separation of the mind from the body, there are other kinds of suffering too, such as being separated from one's loved ones, one's wealth, possessions and all the enjoyments one was attached to in this life. This separation brings great mental agony and suffering.

As explained in the teachings, one form of suffering is not being able to meet with those we want to meet and not being able to accumulate the wealth we want and so forth. Having amassed a certain amount of wealth and met with loving people, we experience suffering when we have to separate from loved ones and discard our wealth. As explained in detail in the teachings, all of these sufferings become more pronounced and more intense at the time of death.

In this life, we all know that even a temporary separation from one's relatives and loved ones causes us suffering. But there is always the likelihood of meeting them again or finding another loved one, at which time the earlier suffering will be alleviated. But at the time of death, the separation is permanent; you will have to leave absolutely everything behind, never to be seen or enjoyed again.

As the commentary explains, friends and relatives cannot help us against the minions or messengers of death.

When the lord of death holds our frightened flesh, friends and relatives are of no use. Only the Dharma can rescue us at that time. It is said that those who have created a lot of negativity and have not got around to purifying it, will experience all kinds of fearsome visions at the time of death, which cause great fear and suffering. Conversely, it is said that those who have accumulated a lot of virtue and merit will have pleasant experiences which will help to soothe and settle down their mind, rather than causing fear. These sorts of experiences seem to take place when an individual's life force is being separated from their body.

What point is there in being excessively attached to wealth, friends, relatives and so forth when at the time of death they cannot be of any help to us? We spend so much time and energy trying to please them, yet when we need them the most they cannot help us. In order to apply antidotes to overcome strong attachment to worldly objects such as relatives, possessions and so forth, one needs to engage in accumulating virtue, which is the Dharma. So here we are being exhorted to realise that only the Dharma can rescue us and help us at the time of death.

Our ultimate protector is the Dharma, which brings us back to our practice. One particularly powerful practice that we regularly attempt to do in our sessions is the tong len practice of giving and taking. How incredibly beneficial it would be if we could implement this powerful practice at the time of death resolving, 'At this time I am taking upon all of the suffering of all beings and may whatever discomfort I am experiencing now be a substitute for the suffering of other beings. May their suffering ripen upon me and may other beings not have to experience such suffering'. If we are familiar with this practice we will be able to recall it without hesitation when we are dying. What an incredible practice that would be!

As a consequence of this amazingly powerful practice of offering love and compassion to all other beings, the mind will naturally become calm and peaceful. And if one were to die in that peaceful and tranquil state there is no question that one will be protected in the next life, and not be reborn in the unfortunate realms. Indeed the very purpose of the tong len, or giving and taking practice, is that it is a way to transform all difficulties on the path to enlightenment. This is really an important point and I want to emphasise the importance of not taking the tong len practice lightly; if we take it seriously now it will definitely be of help at that crucial time of death.

We might not be experiencing extreme difficulty or great suffering right now, and so we might not see the relevance of doing this giving and taking practice. The real purpose of doing the practice now is to familiarise our mind with it. Then, when difficult situations arise, we will be able to immediately and naturally rely upon this practice because of our familiarity with it. If we don't pay much attention to practices such as the tong len practice now, but familiarise ourselves with strong desires and attachments then, due to that familiarity, it will be quite natural for strong desire and attachment arise at the time of death. So it is really important that we prepare ourselves from now on.

The tong len practice is definitely one of the highest forms of practice as it protects one from unfortunate rebirths. As mentioned previously, it is based on love and compassion towards other sentient beings, and if one dies with a sense of love and compassion in one's heart, then there is no possibility of taking an unfortunate rebirth. Not only will dying with love and compassion in one's heart secure a good rebirth, but it will be a rebirth endowed with the conditions of meeting with the Mahayana teachings and the perfect Mahayana gurus, and all of the conditions that will enable one to practise the Dharma. These are essential points that we need to keep in mind.

Even though it will be explained in more detail further on, we need to see that this explanation relates to the real meaning of Dharma. The Dharma protects whatever virtue and merit we have accumulated within our own mental continuum. In the teachings the actual or ultimate Dharma is presented as the true cessation and the true path that are in the mental continuum of the arya beings. If that's what we relate to as the Dharma, then how could the truth of path and truth of cessation in an arya being's mental continuum actually help us? We cannot relate to that on a personal level. If we relate to the Dharma in that way then it is really hard to explain how Dharma serves as our protector. Whereas when we relate to the Dharma to the virtue and merit that we have accumulated within our own mental continuum, then it makes sense when the teachings explain that the Dharma is the actual protector. That is what is to be understood.

To restate the point, it is explained that the Dharma protects one from the unfortunate realms. So when we relate to the Dharma as a protector, we need to understand how it protects us from an unfortunate rebirth in the next life. When we understand that it is the merit and virtue within our own mental continuum that protects us from taking an unfortunate rebirth, we begin to understand how the Dharma protects us. When we see that, we can understand the literal meaning of Dharma, which is to hold its own entity. In the context of the Buddhadharma, this means holding one's mind from adverse conditions. This is the real meaning of the Dharma. The meaning of the word dara in Vajradhara also means to hold; thus Vajradhara literally means 'the one who holds a vajra'.

4.2.1.4.2.2. It is fearful because of not having created merit

This implies that if one has created merit, there is no need to be fearful at the time of death. We can relate this to the experiences of people who are facing death. When people who normally don't pay much attention to spiritual practice and so forth come to the end of their life and face death, it seems that it suddenly dawns on them that there is something beyond the material world. It seems that they realise that there is some intangible thing that is not found in the physical or material world. At that time, they may experience sadness that they had not paid any attention to this during their life, when they were completely immersed in the worldly aspects of the material world. This experience is not restricted to spiritual or Dharma practitioners—it dawns on ordinary people from all walks of life.

The next two lines of the verse are:

*41cd. At that time only merit can rescue,
But I also did not rely on that.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on these lines read:

At that time only merits such as refuge, keeping morality and so forth are the supreme refuge, but I also did not rely on them.

This shows regret because of not having practiced virtue.

When the commentary explains, at that time only merits such as refuge, keeping morality and so forth are the supreme refuge, the word only implies that, as explained earlier, one's wealth, possessions, relatives and friends are of no help at the time of death. The only thing of benefit is the merit that one has accumulated by taking wholehearted refuge in the Three Jewels and observing morality, which is referred to in the commentary as the supreme refuge.

Observing morality is based on abandoning the ten non-virtues, which we can all definitely attempt to practise. There is no need for us to take the life of others, so we can definitely avoid killing; we are fortunate enough that we don't have to engage in the act of stealing due to insufficient means; as lay people you can definitely avoid sexual misconduct such as adultery and so forth. None of this is out of your reach. Avoiding the remaining non-virtues is also within your capacity. So abandoning the ten non-virtues is not an obscure practice, or difficult to relate to.

In fact the Abhidharma says that most Dharma practices are actually subsumed into abandoning the ten non-virtues and adopting the ten virtues. It is good to really pay attention to observing the ten virtues. In everyday life, we all take refuge as part of our daily practice, and we should spend significant time considering the qualities of the refuge objects and how they are the supreme objects, rather than just giving lip service and merely repeating the words. Taking such wholehearted refuge in our daily life, as well as observing ethics and morality, is a way to amass merit and virtue, which will help us at the time of death. This is the point that is being presented here.

Today when I was reading the text I spent some significant time just reflecting on these essential points—I became quite immersed in them for almost an hour.

Our whole practice is subsumed in the heading It is fearful because of not having created merit. That is the crux of our practice, so I try in my daily life to spend time considering these points. It would also be good for all of you to really pay some attention to them and take them to heart.

When studying this text or referring to these points, it is good to relate them to the Lam Rim teachings. The topics of the Lam Rim should not be put aside when one is doing other study or practices. The points in the Lam Rim are the very basis of whatever practice we do, so we should complement the explanations in this text with the understanding we have gained from reading and studying the Lam Rim. Then our study will be more beneficial.

4.2.1.4.2.3. One will be overcome by regret

All of the earlier points relate to the power of regret which is one of the four opponent powers. This is an essential part of any purification practice because it is said when strong regret is generated it suffices to purify half of the negativity that one has incurred. So it is essential that we try to develop a strong sense of regret for any negativity that we may have created in the past, along the lines of, 'It is incredibly unfortunate that I was compelled to engage in this negativity, and I need to overcome and purify it by every possible means'. That is the kind of intention one needs to develop.

We are all here under the assumption that we are Dharma practitioners, so we need to really pay attention to what is essential for our practice, which is developing regret about negativity, rather than rejoicing in it. There is the danger that one may regret some virtue, feeling that it is too hard and difficult. There is also the danger of rejoicing in having an opportunity to create negativity, thinking 'For years I have wanted to experience this and I have not had the opportunity so far. It's really incredible that I have this opportunity now. How wonderful!'. Rejoicing in negativity in this way is completely contrary to the actual practice of Dharma. So we definitely need to protect our minds from this danger.

Since we all bear the name of Dharma practitioners it is not out of place for us to attempt to practise the Dharma in the most appropriate way, which means developing regret for negativities, and rejoicing in our virtues and so forth. I don't blame those who try to fill what otherwise seems to be an uncomfortable and lonely life by trying to find a girlfriend or a boyfriend, who may seemingly fill that void and provide some sort of pleasant experiences. However, when we really think about it, there is really no ultimate benefit in spending time and energy on that.

The verse under this heading reads:

*42. Protector, I, this careless one,
Did not search out these dangers.
Even though, in this impermanent life
I accomplish much negativity for them.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary quite succinct:

Referring to the object of refuge as Protector one proclaims: I, this reckless person, did not search out these dangers of the lower realms and I did not know about them. But I generated much negativity in this impermanent life for the purpose of this life, such as friends and so forth. This I regret.

As the commentary indicates, the objects of refuge such as the buddhas and the great bodhisattvas are protectors who are endowed with loving kindness. In proclaiming them as protectors the commentary is indicating that one must rely on them. Thus one proclaims in front of these objects of refuge who are endowed with great love and compassion, 'I, this reckless person, did not search out these dangers or fears of the lower realms'. Here reckless comes from the Tibetan word bak-me, which is the opposite of bak-yo which means conscientiousness. Thus reckless refers to the lack of conscientiousness, which I've explained previously.¹

So a reckless person would be one who does not maintain a conscientious mind. Such a lack of conscientiousness would allow the delusions to overpower the mind, leading to actions that incur many faults. Thus, many faults are created under the influence of the delusions because of the lack of conscientiousness. Conversely when we apply conscientiousness, we protect ourselves from the influence of the delusions, and thus from engaging in many faults.

When one does not apply conscientiousness, one becomes a reckless person, and out of recklessness, or a lack of conscientiousness, one did not search out these dangers of the lower realms because one does not know about them. This implies that recklessness arises as a result of ignorance, in particular ignorance of how karma functions. Due to a lack of faith in karma one doesn't realise that the consequence of negativity is suffering and so forth. Here dangers refers to the suffering of death itself, both at the point of the separation of one's mind from the body, as well as the sufferings of the intermediate state.

Apparently there are particular sufferings that are experienced in the intermediate state such as visions, and of course there is the suffering of the next life in unfortunate rebirths. Not considering the consequences of negativity brings about this suffering. And, as explained here, 'Due to this ignorance, I generated much negativity in this impermanent life for the purpose of this life such as friends and so forth'. One's life is impermanent and by not reflecting upon the impermanence of one's life, one incurs a lot of negativities due to attachment to friends, constantly trying to please them, and trying to vanquish or overcome one's enemies, or those with whom one disagrees due to aversion. In this way, one will incur a lot of negativities. Having realised that, and understanding the consequences, one will develop strong regret about having engaged in these negativities.

The essential point of this verse is that it is by reflecting upon the various negativities one has accumulated in this very lifetime, one develops strong regret, along with the intention to purify those negativities.

4.2.1.4.3. The reason why it is so fearful

The two verses presented under this heading read:

43. *If a person is led today to the place Where his limbs will be chopped off, he is frightened.
One's appearance will differ to before,
With a dry mouth, burning eyes and the like.*
44. *One will be held by the terrifying
Helpers of the Lord of Death
And befallen by the terrifying sickness,
What need is there to mention the very pitiable?*

The commentary then presents the meaning of these verses:

A person who is being led today by other humans to the ground where his limbs will be chopped off, will be frightened. His mouth will be dry, his complexion will be pale, his eyes will burn and so forth. As such, his appearance will be quite different to before.

If that is so, then what need is there to mention the fear of the extremely pitiful person, whose flesh is being held by the fearful minions of the lord of death and who is stricken with the fear of death. Such a person will have great fear:

Hence, generate regret for negativity!

In the past those who stole were punished by having their hands chopped off. So being led to the place of punishment where their limbs were be chopped off would generate a lot of fear. Using this analogy the commentary explains that when such a person is led to the place of punishment, they will be stricken with great fear to the point of their mouth being dry, the complexion of their face becoming completely distorted and their eyes burning and so forth. When we see someone being led to a trial and so forth, their heads are bent down and you can see on their face a lot of embarrassment, and the fear they are experiencing, and how their very appearance is completely different to their normal state.

People are taken to the places of punishment by other humans who have the same nature and body and so forth. If being led to the place of punishment by other humans generates great fear, then what need is there to mention the fear of the extremely pitiful person, whose flesh is being held by the fearful minions of the lord of death.

As mentioned previously, those who have engaged in negativities will experience extreme and fearful visions at the time of death. When such a person has these visions of fearsome beings leading them away from their life source, it definitely gives rise to extreme fear. I've heard that when those who have engaged in warfare and have taken the lives of others, such as generals and so forth, approach the last stages of their life, they have visions of weapons coming towards them, or others coming to kill them with weapons and so forth. It seems that what they engaged in during their life comes back to them in the form of these fearsome visions. In their mind, it is very real and brings about tremendous fear.

The point in relating all of this is that one needs to generate regret for one's negativity with the intention of wanting to purify it. We might bring to mind whatever negativity we can recall from this very lifetime, but there might be occasions when we feel, 'Oh, I haven't done anything as bad as taking a life and so forth'. But if one considers one's previous lifetimes, one can definitely assume that one has accumulated all sorts of negative and evil deeds in previous lifetimes. All of that needs to be brought to mind, and we need to develop regret for that as well, with a sense of wanting to purify that negativity.

¹ See, for example, the teaching of 21 March 2006.

4.2.1.4.4. The way one will be overwhelmed by suffering later

This is referring to our future lives. The two verses under this heading are:

45. *'Who can perfectly rescue me from
These great dangers', I exclaim.
With fear showing in my wide open eyes
I look into the four directions for help.*
46. *Seeing that there is no refuge in the four directions
My mind becomes completely dark.
If there is no refuge in that place,
Then what shall one do at that time?*

In explaining these verses Gyaltshab Je's commentary reads:

Having been reborn in the hells and seeing the hell guardians, one becomes very afraid and exclaims: 'Oh, which person can rescue me from this great fear?'

With fear showing in one's wide open eyes, one searches in the four directions for a refuge. When one does not find one despite one's search, one's mind becomes completely dark. Hence one should go for refuge to the Three Jewels starting right now.

If there is no refuge in the hells that rescues one from dangers, then there is nothing to do then, and one must make an effort right now to becoming free from the causes of those dangers.

While the commentary is quite clear, the main point being presented is the importance of contemplating the prospect of having to be reborn in unfortunate realms such as the hell realms. The very nature that state is such that one has no immediate protector. Even if it occurred to one to search for refuge, one couldn't find it because that is the very nature of having such a rebirth, which, of course, is the result of one's negativities. If it is daunting to think about that prospect, the implication is that now is the time to rely upon the unmistakable refuge as protection from being reborn in states where there will be no refuge.

In very simple language, we are in the condition right now where protecting ourselves is definitely within our grasp! As the commentary concludes, one must make an effort right now to becoming free from the causes of those dangers. So, in simple terms, we rely upon ultimate protection and refuge, which we can all identify, and we can apply the practices of adopting the ten virtues and avoiding the ten non-virtues. We need understand that now is not the time to lay about thinking that this is something we can put aside until later. Rather we need to make the commitment to apply it, beginning right now.

4.2.2. The power of the basis

We can leave this for our next session.

The main point of this evening's presentation is to reflect on the negativity that one has incurred during one's life, and to develop strong regret about that. Then, based on that strong regret, one engages in purification practices in order to purify those negativities. This is an essential practice for our own benefit. These are really important points for our own personal benefit.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འདུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

8 October 2013

As usual we can engage in the meditation practice.

Now we can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put into it into practice well.

Generating this strong wish to benefit others will be extremely beneficial; it also encourages us and is really important for our practice.

As the Lam Rim teachings indicate, the states of mind that allow one to actually benefit other beings are great love, great compassion and the superior intention. These are three of the six causes of the seven-point cause and effect sequence, which produces the bodhicitta that compels one to actually benefit others. Whereas the first three - recognising all beings as one's mother, remembering their kindness, and wishing to repay that kindness - serve as the basis for developing that wish to benefit others. The Lam Rim presents very precise instructions on how to actually develop that bodhicitta state of mind. So if we rely on these instructions and put these very orderly steps into practice, then we can definitely develop the mind that compels one to benefit others.

The love and compassion that we need to develop, as presented in the teachings, is unbiased love and unbiased compassion. How wonderful it would be if we were to actually develop a love and compassion that does not discriminate between friends, enemies and strangers! What an incredible state of mind to develop! Once we develop that, then the Great Vehicle or Mahayana path will be established within our mental continuum. It will then be possible to practise on that path and obtain the fruit of the path. I personally feel that it is really important to put all one's energy into this core practice of developing unbiased love and compassion, which, of course, I attempt to do. It is definitely the case that without developing unbiased love and compassion, the rest of the Mahayana practices are not obtainable.

I feel like expanding on this point a bit more, however I will leave it for now. If one really analyses these points then the logical conclusion we reach is that this is really the core of our practice, for it is also a powerful means for accumulating merit and purifying negativities. So in this way we can see the great value of these practices.

4.2.2. The power of the base

We have come to the second of the four opponent powers. What is the first power called?

Student: The power of regret.

Regret is not the literal translation of the Tibetan term. Does anyone recall the term used in the commentary?

Student: Power of thorough repudiation.

That's correct. So what is that power of repudiation?

Student: Recognising that we have created negativity.

More specifically, what is the mind that one should generate in order to develop the power of thorough repudiation?

Student: Fear of the consequences of that negativity that we have created.

That is correct. The way to develop that opponent power of thorough repudiation is to contemplate the consequences of the negativity that one has engaged in in the past. When one really thinks about these consequences in detail, great fear will naturally arise, and then the power of thorough repudiation will be generated in one's mind.

The second opponent power is the power of the base or reliance. So, what is the power of reliance?

Student: Refuge.

The Tibetan word for the power of the base or reliance is ten kyi top, and ten means to rely. Here it means to rely on the objects for one's confession and purification. So, what do we rely upon? It is explained that whatever objects we created negativity with are the very objects we need to rely upon to purify those negativities. We create negativities in relation to either the Three Jewels or sentient beings, so we have to rely on both the Three Jewels as well as sentient beings for purification.

Thus, by relying on the objects of refuge, one is able to purify one's negativities.

As presented in the commentary, this section has three subdivisions.

4.2.2.1. Relying on the refuge of the Three Jewels, starting right now

4.2.2.2. Relying on the powerful prayers of the children of the conquerors

4.2.2.3. Having gone for refuge, practising according to the advice

4.2.2.1. RELYING ON THE REFUGE OF THE THREE JEWELS, STARTING RIGHT NOW

In accordance with the earlier explanation, when one is born in an unfortunate realm such as the hell realms, then there is no opportunity to rely upon the objects of refuge at that time. We need to take this as a personal instruction, and rely upon the objects of refuge ourselves, right now while we have all the conducive conditions, and not leave it for later when we may not have these good conditions.

The very outline itself presents the meaning of the verse of the text and it becomes most meaningful if we take it as a personal instruction. We need to take it as a reminder that relying on the objects of refuge will ensure that whatever practice we do becomes intact. We might assume that we are Dharma practitioners, but without genuine and strong reliance on the objects of refuge there is no real basis for our practice. Every attempt that we make in relating to this advice and putting it into practice makes the foundation of our practice established much more firmly.

To actually contemplate this, think about the words relying on the refuge of the Three Jewels starting right now. How do you understand them? Contemplating how it is essential to go for genuine refuge beginning from right now actually becomes the means to establish the foundation of our Dharma practice. The more we develop this mind of reliance on the objects of refuge, the more it lessens our clinging to the affairs of this lifetime. As the clinging to the affairs of this life reduces, to that extent, our Dharma becomes purer.

This is another way to relate to the meaning of what is presented here.

The two verses relating to this heading read:

47. *Therefore, from today onwards I take refuge
In the Conqueror, the protector of migrators,
Who works to rescue migrators
And who eliminates the powerful dangers.*
48. *I also take perfect refuge
In the Dharma that he understood,
Which eliminates the dangers of cyclic existence,
And into the assembly of bodhisattvas.*

Even though my intention is to try to go quite quickly through these verses somehow that doesn't seem to be happening! Gyaltsab Je's commentary on these verses is:

One does not find a refuge when one is reborn in the lower realms, even if one searches. Therefore I quickly take refuge in the Conqueror, the protector of migrators, who strives to rescue all migrators, and who has the perfect ability to eliminate all the very powerful dangers.

Further, I accept the Dharma that the Conqueror understood and taught, the Dharma Jewel that eliminates all the fears of cyclic existence.

I also accept the assembly of bodhisattvas that have attained the state of a superior, as friends helping to accomplish the path, and purely go for refuge to them.

When the commentary states One does not find a refuge when one is reborn in the lower realms, even if one searches, this is a clear explanation that as we will not be able to find refuge when we are reborn in the lower realms, we need to take refuge in the conquerors, from now on. What we need to understand from this presentation is that that developing a strong reliance on the objects of refuge, and taking refuge in them is the means to block the door to the lower realms. We actually shut the door to the lower realms by taking refuge.

If one were to ask, 'What is the method for blocking the doorways to rebirth in the lower realms?', then the answer is 'By taking refuge'. As presented in the teachings, if, at the moment of death, we have strong refuge in our mind that will, at the very least, definitely prevent rebirth in a lower realm in the immediate next life. Even if we have engaged in quite a lot of negativity during our life, if our mind is in tune with taking strong refuge at the time of death, then this completely virtuous mind will definitely prevent rebirth in the lower realms in the next lifetime. In contrast, if someone were to spend most of their life seemingly engaging in Dharma practice, but at the time of death their mind is not in a virtuous frame then, because of the non-virtuous state of mind at that time, they will have an unfortunate rebirth in the next life.

The only way that we can prepare ourselves to ensure that we are in a virtuous state mind at the time of death, is to continuously familiarise ourselves now with the conqueror Buddha Shakyamuni, which is done by meditating on and visualising the image of Buddha Shakyamuni while reciting the mantra. Whatever time we spend on a regular basis, such as meditating and reciting the mantra, even to the extent of remembering the Buddha in our daily activities, and every time before we go to bed, and perhaps even having dreams of the Buddha, then, due to that familiarity, it is said that an image of the Buddha will naturally come to mind very vividly at the time of death. Seeing an image of the Buddha and having faith in him at the time of death would be wonderful! Likewise with the familiarity one gains by relying on a deity such as Chenrezig, or Avalokiteshvara as one's main deity; reciting the Om mani padme hum mantra and remembering Chenrezig daily and before going to bed, and even having dreams of Chenrezig, will also have the result of having very vivid clear image of Chenrezig at the time of death. It is said that it is as if one is actually in the presence of the Buddha or a deity at the time of death, which would have a soothing and calming effect, with no fears or anxiety whatsoever. This would be incredibly beneficial at that crucial time.

The commentary goes on to explain that due to this fear of a lower rebirth one quickly takes refuge in the Conqueror. The Conqueror is described as the protector of migrators because he entered the path that leads to enlightenment from the moment he first developed bodhicitta, and from that time onwards he completely dedicated his life to benefiting sentient beings through the practice of the six perfections and so forth. Through all of those practices, the Conqueror reached the ultimate state of having the perfect ability to help all beings eliminate all the fears of cyclic existence.

The qualities of the Buddha or the Protector are actually presented in the first line. When the text refers to the protector of migrators, who strives to rescue all migrators, and who has the perfect ability, the term perfect ability can also relate to the various enlightened qualities of the Buddha, such as the ten powers and so forth. The Conqueror has the ability to eliminate all the very powerful dangers, which are the sufferings of the cyclic existence of migrators. So for that reason, as presented at this point in the text, I quickly take refuge in the Conqueror, here, quickly indicates that from this moment on, one takes refuge in the Conqueror morning, day, and night.

Thus, the first paragraph of the commentary presents taking refuge in the Conqueror or the Buddha as a guide on the path. As this is a Mahayana refuge, one needs to also understand that the commitment one makes in taking refuge is that we take refuge in the Conqueror as our guide on the path until we attain the final state of enlightenment.

We need to understand that the second line, I accept the Dharma that the Conqueror understood and taught, refers to the two main aspects of the Dharma, which are the realisations and the oral teachings of the Buddha. Taking refuge in the Dharma Jewel that has the ability to eliminate all the fears of cyclic existence, indicates that one relies on the Dharma Jewel as the path that leads to the ultimate result of enlightenment. The Dharma Jewel also has two other aspects, which are the Mahayana truth of cessation and the Mahayana truth of the path.

When the third paragraph of the commentary states I also accept the assembly of bodhisattvas that have attained the state of a superior, the superior specifically indicates the superior Mahayana state of a non-returner. When the commentary states as friends helping to accomplish the path, and purely go for refuge to them, the word purely indicates that going for refuge to the Three Jewels needs to be free from deceit and doubt. It would be deceitful if one gives mere lip service to the words but does not actually have strong feeling of refuge. If one is not really convinced that the objects of refuge have the ability to protect oneself then that would be doubt. So purely going for refuge indicates having a heartfelt genuine mind of refuge that is free from deceit and doubt.

Purely also indicates having the conviction that the objects of refuge have the full capacity to free one from all fears. Having generated the fear of an unfortunate rebirth and cyclic existence, one develops an absolute conviction that the objects of refuge have the full ability to free one from those fears. So, pure refuge is a heartfelt faith in the objects of refuge, knowing that they have the ability to free one from the lower realms and samsara.

To summarise the essential points, one goes for refuge with the two causes for going for refuge intact.

- The first cause is having generated fear of the lower realms and the suffering of cyclic existence in general, and urgently wanting to be free from those fears. Seeing that the objects of refuge have the ability to free one from those fears, one takes refuge in them.
- The second aspect of taking refuge is a heartfelt reliance on the Buddha as the guide, the Dharma, which is the Mahayana truth of cessation and Mahayana truth of path, and the Sangha, which is the supreme assembly of Mahayana arya beings. So one develops complete reliance on these three, and generates the mind, 'I will go for refuge to them until I achieve enlightenment'.

Having that single-pointed focus on the objects of refuge, and relying upon them single-pointedly is the way of taking Mahayana refuge. It is important to keep this summary in mind for your daily Dharma practice.

4.2.2.2. RELYING ON THE POWERFUL PRAYERS OF THE CHILDREN OF THE CONQUERORS

Here the children of the conquerors, refers to the eight close disciples of the Buddha, which I think we listed in an earlier session.

The next two verses read:

49. *Having become afraid of the dangers
I offer myself to Samantabhadra,
Also to Manjushri
I offer this body of mine.*
50. *Also the protector Avalokiteshvara, Whose actions are non-deceptive due to compassion,
I implore in anguish:
Rescue me, the sinner.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Having become afraid of the fears of the lower realms I offer myself to the child of the conquerors, Samantabhadra, who does many powerful prayers. Through this, please rescue me from the dangers.

Likewise to Manjushri, without others having to urge me I offer my body with a clear mind.

To Avalokiteshvara, whose non-deceptive actions for others are motivated by compassion spontaneously and uninterruptedly, I also implore in anguish to please rescue me, who is pitiful due to these dangers. Please rescue me the sinner.

When the commentary states, having become afraid of the fears of the lower realms, it is specifically indicating the three unfortunate rebirths that are explained in detail in the teachings. There are the unimaginable and unbearable sufferings of the hell realms, and the hungry ghost realm, and even in the animal realm, which is, of course, is familiar to us. It is unbearable to even think about the prospect of having to experience such suffering. Having generated such fear of the lower realms one offers oneself to the child of the conquerors.

The way to be free from the fears and the sufferings of the lower realms is to rely on, and take refuge in, the objects of refuge. As Lama Tsongkapa mentioned in one of his works, 'There is no certainty that we will not be reborn in the lower realms. Therefore we take heartfelt refuge in the objects of refuge as only they have the power to protect us from this fear of a lower rebirth'.

Children of the conquerors refers to the disciples who were close to the Buddha. They are referred to as children because of being close disciples. Another implication of children of the conquerors is that it refers to those who hold the entire lineage of the teachings of the Buddha. So there are different implications of child of the conquerors.

Samantabhadra is one of the bodhisattvas who was a close disciple, who does many powerful prayers; while I offer my body to the conquerors is an entreaty, 'Please rescue me from the dangers'. Similarly with Manjushri, who was another close disciple, there is the proclamation, without others having to urge me, I offer my body with a clear mind.

Also Avalokiteshvara, whose non-deceptive actions for others are motivated by compassion spontaneously and uninterruptedly, indicates that Avalokiteshvara benefits sentient beings continuously and spontaneously. Avalokiteshvara is called Chenrezig, which in Tibetan means that which constantly sees the sufferings of sentient beings, and this indicates that Chenrezig's eyes are always open and always looking down at sentient beings with compassion. That is the connotation of the name Chenrezig.

I implore in anguish, means that out of desperation one implores the children of the conquerors, 'Please rescue me, who is pitiful due to these dangers. Please rescue me the sinner'.

Then Gyaltsab Je poses a question as an introduction to the next two verses:

If asked, 'In what manner?'

51. *The superior Essence of Space and
The Essence of Earth and
All compassionate protectors
I implore from the heart to rescue me*
52. *I take refuge into the Vajraholder
Whose mere sight causes the Angry minions of the lord of death
To flee into the four directions.*

The explanation in Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Likewise I go for refuge to the bodhisattva superior Essence of Space and Essence of Earth, and to all greatly compassionate protectors who have love and have eliminated obscurations. I implore them from my heart: Please rescue me.

I also take refuge into the Vajraholder (Vajrapani), whose mere sight causes the angry minions of the lord of death to scatter into the four directions.

I implore is the translation of the Tibetan word sol, which has the connotation, 'I have something to request'.

Having listed three children of the Conqueror earlier, i.e. Samantabhadra, Manjushri and Avalokiteshvara, this verse refers to the bodhisattva superior Essence Of Space (Akasagarbha), the bodhisattva Essence of Earth (Ksitigarbha) and all compassionate protectors. The next verse refers to the Vajraholder, who is Vajrapani. I have explained the qualities of Vajrapani extensively in the past. Vajrapani has the power to eliminate adverse forces, obstacles and obscurations that hinder Dharma practice.

The other two close disciples which are not mentioned here are Maitreya and Sarvanirvarana Viskambhin (Dripa nam sel in Tibetan; the literal English translation is clearing away all obscurations). When the commentary says I implore them from my heart, it means that one makes a heartfelt request to be rescued by these children of the Conqueror.

The implication of mentioning the eight children of the Conqueror is that they are all arya beings and are worthy objects of refuge.

4.2.2.3. HAVING GONE FOR REFUGE, PRACTISING ACCORDING TO THE ADVICE

The real implication of going for refuge is so that one will practise according to their advice. Also there are specific commitments that we need to uphold after having taken refuge.

In essence, practising the advice encompasses the practice of the three scopes. Another way of presenting this is that relying on the objects of refuge is the means to achieve the ultimate goal of complete enlightenment. What the advice actually entails is adopting those practices we need to accomplish - which is to accumulate virtue and merit - and abandoning that which needs to be abandoned, which are negativities. So, refuge is actually subsumed into these two practices of adopting and abandoning.

This is presented in the following verse:

53. *Previously I transgressed your words
Now, having seen great danger,
I take good refuge in you; by this Eliminate all dangers quickly I request.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this this verse reads

Previously I transgressed your words, committed negativities and did not practise virtue. Now, having seen the infinity of cyclic existence and the great dangers of the lower realms, I take refuge in you.

By my implementing what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned, according to your advice, please quickly eliminate all fears I pray.

Previously I transgressed your words refers to not following the advice of the Buddha. In essence, the Buddha advised us to shun negativity and create virtue. However, because of not having followed that advice, one has committed negativities and did not practise virtue, and as a result now finds oneself being completely overwhelmed by the sufferings of cyclic existence.

Seeing now that the consequence of not following that advice will lead one into the infinity of cyclic existence, the connotation here is that if one relies on the object of refuge to some degree, then it might free you from some of the great sufferings in the next rebirth. As explained earlier, by taking heartfelt refuge in the object of refuge at the time of death, one will be protected from rebirth in the unfortunate realms in the next life. However, merely taking refuge and not practising the advice means that one will still be reborn in cyclic existence, not only once or twice but for an infinite number of times.

When one thinks about that prospect, it becomes apparent that it is urgent that one follows the advice of the Conqueror and takes refuge in him, by implementing what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned according to your advice.

This means that we are saying that we will implement these practices of abandoning what has to be abandoned and adopting what has to be practised into our daily life. We really need to take this as personal advice. To this we can add a further essential, which is the three higher trainings of morality, concentration and generating wisdom. Practising the three higher trainings is another way to implement the Buddha's advice.

As mentioned previously, the more we really contemplate and take to heart the two causes of going for refuge, the more firmly it is established, the stronger one's conviction in the infallibility of karma becomes. These are the essential practices that establish that foundation.

We will recite together the Eight Verses of Mind Training, and dedicate it to my old friend, Geshe Sonam Rinchen, who passed away on Saturday morning. He was a very dear Dharma friend; we studied together in the same class, under the same teacher, and went through many hardships and difficulties together. We shared whatever meagre food we had and escaped into India together, continuing our studies there later on. We shared difficulties and hardships and the joy of our studies and so forth for so many years. He was not just an ordinary geshe but someone who had accomplished great knowledge of the Dharma, both in understanding and in practice. Not only was he skilled in citing the teachings but he was also skilled in logic and reasoning. So he was endowed with the qualities of the scriptural understanding as well as the logic of the teachings. By sharing that great knowledge he benefited so many beings in his thirty-five years in the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives. The many students and disciples who studied under him found him to be very kind in sharing his Dharma knowledge.

I tried to visit him when I was in India at the beginning of this year. I purchased a ticket to go up to Dharamsala but unfortunately the airline, Kingfisher, went bankrupt, so the ticket was useless. In any case the teachings didn't end on time. So I was not able to see him—in fact, I haven't been able to see him for many years.

From my side the best thing we can offer is our practices. With the recitation of the prayers we generate the wish that he come back again for the purpose of the teachings, and to benefit sentient beings. May he come back in another reincarnation and once again engage in the Dharma as a way to benefit other beings. With that sort of intention in our mind we make strong prayers, which will help us to make a connection with Geshe-la and meet him again in the future.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

15 October 2013

With a motivation based on the Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer, we can now engage in the meditation practice. [meditation]

It would be very good to regularly engage in the tong len practice that we have just attempted to do. As it is a practice that increases one's love and compassion for other living beings, the tong len practice really seems to be the essence of the Mahayana practice. As one further develops and establishes love and compassion within one's own mental continuum, and as this becomes stronger and stronger, one will actually be able to engage in this practice of giving and taking.

4.2.3. The power of thorough application of the antidote

Having completed the power of thorough repudiation or regret, we can start to think about the order of the four opponent powers and how they are a means to engage in the purification practice. Relating to their sequence is in itself really beneficial.

It is good to have a general understanding of the term the power of thorough application of the antidote. In general, it is an antidote that counteracts the negativity that one has created. As presented in the teachings, any virtue accumulated with the intention that it will serve as an antidote to negativity is sufficient to overcome that negativity!

More specifically, there are the six different methods that were listed earlier and it is good to keep them in mind.

This section is subdivided into two:

4.2.3.1. The reason why it is appropriate to purify negativity

4.2.3.2. Why it is appropriate to purify soon

Here, the Tibetan term jang, which is usually translated as purify, can also mean practice. In this case the practice to overcome negativity refers to a method that counteracts the consequences of the negativity that one has created. So, as the translation suggests, purify in this case refers to purification practice. Practising virtue, on the other hand, refers to the practice of accumulating merit and so forth. By further developing and increasing the virtues within oneself one is practicing virtue. So the Tibetan term jang refers to practices that can have different intentions. I have explained this previously, but it is good to refresh one's memory.

4.2.3.1. THE REASON WHY IT IS APPROPRIATE TO PURIFY NEGATIVITY

It is good to consider the way the commentary uses headings to put the text into a logical context. Through their systematic, logical sequence the headings in themselves are quite profound. Rather than beginning with how to purify negativity we are first presented with the reason why it is appropriate to do that. If we understand why it is appropriate to purify negativity then we will naturally be more inclined to engage in that practice. Next we can consider why it is appropriate to purify our negativity right now.

We actually gain a lot of insight just from the way the material is presented. In fact one could say that the manner in which it is presented is, in itself, a means to increase our intelligence and wisdom. It is important to first see the reason why we engage in an activity, and then analyse whether there is any benefit or not. When we find that there is benefit in a certain activity, we will then naturally be more inclined to adopt it. We can apply this practical principle to our everyday life activities. Even though these are classical teachings we can still derive a lot of practical advice that we can apply in our everyday lives. Basically, they are teaching us how to make best use of our intelligence and wisdom.

There are two sub-headings in this section:

4.2.3.1.1. Showing by example of sickness why it is necessary to purify soon

4.2.3.1.2. Showing the necessity to relate it to the example of the abyss

4.2.3.1.1. Showing by example of sickness why it is necessary to purify soon

This is subdivided into three:

4.2.3.1.1.1. Stating the meaning of the example

4.2.3.1.1.2. The sickness of the three poisons has many shortcomings and the medicine to destroy it is rare

4.2.3.1.1.3. It is appropriate to practice in accordance with the advice of the supreme physician

4.2.3.1.1.1. Stating the meaning of the example

The relevant verse reads:

54. *If one has to act according to the doctor's advice
Even when in fear of an ordinary sickness,
What need is there to mention one who Is afflicted by the hundreds of faults of attachment and so on?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

When one is concerned that one may die as one is afraid of the sickness, one has to implement the method to destroy the sickness in accordance with the advice of the physician, even to cure a common disease like a disturbance in the winds or bile.

If that is so, then what need is there to mention that it is appropriate to rely on the antidote according to the instructions of the Conqueror, the supreme physician, in order to be cured from the chronic disease of the three poisons of attachment, anger and ignorance, as one has been continuously beaten down since beginningless time by the sources of hundreds of thousands of shortcomings.

It is appropriate to rely on the antidote to negativity.

According to traditional medicine, the cause of many illnesses is disturbance in the winds or bile. When an illness worsens it is common to rely upon a doctor and, depending on the severity of the illness, to willingly undergo quite severe treatments such as surgery, or even amputation, in order to be cured. Harsh and severe treatments are necessary at times to save one's life. Thus we are patient and are willing to endure them, knowing that they are for our own benefit. When the doctor prescribes a treatment that includes changing our normal lifestyle, regulating our diet to avoid certain kinds of food and drink, or taking up some sort of exercise, we take all that advice willingly in order to be cured. Rather than holding a grudge against the doctor for the severe treatment, we are quite happy to accept it.

The point of the analogy is that we willingly accept unpleasant treatment knowing it is for our own benefit. It has been statistically shown that if one doesn't have confidence in the doctor, then the prescribed medicine doesn't seem to be of much benefit. Mostly though, as the commentary explains, with respect to ordinary ailments we follow the advice of the physician in order to cure the disease.

Then the commentary uses the illustration of the analogy to conclude, If that is so, then what need is there to mention that it is appropriate to rely on the antidote according to the instructions of the Conqueror, the supreme physician, in order to be cured from the chronic disease of the three poisons of attachment, anger and ignorance. To these three poisons, we can add the other delusions.

When we really think about the harm that these delusions cause us, we realise that they are indeed a very deep-rooted disease. We experience the effects of the three poisons on a continual basis, and we have been affected by these afflictive delusions from beginningless lifetimes. The disease of the three poisons affects almost everyone regardless of their status and their physical condition; those who are physically healthy are not immune to the mental afflictions.

We can definitely see that most people have, at some time in their life, had to endure some form of mental distress caused by attachment, anger or some other delusion such as jealousy, pride and so forth. Even though they are seemingly well physically, there is always an underlying mental distress and agony; some sort of an unsettled and restless mind is always there in the background. As mentioned in the commentary, ordinary beings have been affected by this mental distress over countless lifetimes; one has been continuously beaten down since beginningless time by the source of hundreds of thousands of shortcomings. Because they are so very deep-rooted, they are classified as a chronic disease.

The delusions, and in particular the three poisons, are like a chronic disease because we have been continuously affected by them since beginningless time and they are the source of hundreds of thousands of shortcomings and suffering. In order to be cured of this chronic disease, it is appropriate to rely on the antidote in accordance with the instructions of the Conqueror, who is likened to the supreme physician. So the antidote for overcoming the chronic disease of the three poisons was presented by the compassionate teacher, the Conqueror.

Even though we have not seen the Buddha directly, we have definitely come into contact with qualified teachers who have presented the unmistakable teachings of the Buddha. So right now we have these incredible conditions where we can use the teachings of the Buddha as an antidote for overcoming this chronic disease. We have the ability and intelligence to recognise what the delusions are, their shortcomings, how they affect us, and the need to overcome them.

We would be doing ourselves a great disservice if we do not take advantage of these perfect conditions that we have now to make a genuine attempt to apply the appropriate antidotes for overcoming the delusions in our mind. Trying to develop an attentive and focussed mind in meditation is not sufficient by itself. We need to really work at applying the specific antidotes for overcoming the different delusions, which involves first recognising them. As the great teacher and master Lama Tsong Khapa mentioned, the real sign of one's meditation and practice bearing fruit is when we develop strong faith in the Dharma, along with the confidence that if we apply the antidotes, we will be able to overcome the delusions in our mind.

So applying the antidote means applying the antidote to the very causes of negativity, which are the delusions; the three poisons in particular. In fact, these three are the fundamental cause of all our physical and mental diseases and suffering. So, as mentioned here in the teachings and in the commentary, we need to apply an antidote to the source of the hundreds of thousands of shortcomings, i.e. the delusions. That is what we need to focus on.

4.2.3.1.1.2. The sickness of the three poisons has many shortcomings and the medicine to destroy it is rare

As I have explained earlier, it might be difficult to find these good conditions again in the future. So not utilising these conditions now while we have them would be like not bothering to seek treatment for a chronic disease. There is no benefit in having access to an incredible panacea and not making use of it. If we don't take our prescribed medicine we will not be cured. Likewise, if we don't apply the practices and antidotes for overcoming our delusions, we can't expect the delusions to naturally fade away, leaving us completely cured! The heading alone, the sickness of the three poisons has many shortcomings and the medicine to destroy it is rare, actually points out the great conditions we have now, and that we have that rare medicine right now!

We have met with the unmistakable Dharma teachings and the pure teachers who present them, so it would be an incredible waste if we don't utilise this wonderful opportunity now. The point is that, as the teachings mention, if a skilled doctor has prescribed the best of medicine to cure a disease, but the patient doesn't follow the treatment, then the patient cannot expect to be cured from the disease. Likewise, we are not deprived now of the teachers and the teachings, so if we find we are not making progress in our practice of overcoming the delusions, it is not the fault of the Dharma or the teachers. The fault lies with us because we have not applied the practice to ourselves. So we need to ensure that we don't fall into this trap of not using this opportunity we have now.

We really need to take to heart just how essential it is to apply the antidotes to overcome the delusions. I assume you are afflicted by the disease of the three delusions—I certainly am! So if we are alike in being afflicted by the chronic disease of the delusions, then we are alike in that it is up to us to try to cure it. It's not as though we are deprived of the means to do so. We all have the ability to apply the cure for overcoming the chronic disease of the delusions; more specifically the root delusion of grasping at the self.

In this way we see that the teachings gives us the way to overcome the very core of our chronic disease, which is grasping at the self. The more we gain an understanding of the selflessness, or emptiness, of persons and the emptiness of phenomena, the more profound that understanding will be. Then we can begin to actualise that understanding and gain even more insight into emptiness. As explained in the teachings, the direct realisation of emptiness is the ultimate antidote for overcoming the chronic disease of grasping at the self. So once we are able to overcome this grasping at the self we begin to shatter our grasping at all other phenomena, and then the delusions will slowly become weaker and weaker. It is good for us to really reflect upon how the realisation of selflessness or emptiness serves as an antidote that overcomes grasping at the self.

In order to understand that, we first need to understand how grasping at the self affects our perception. How do we perceive things when we are grasping at the self? How does grasping at the self cause delusions? The more we understand that the grasping at the self is the cause of all of the delusions and the problems and suffering that we experience, the more we will realise that we need to overcome that grasping. And the means to overcome grasping at the self is to realise selflessness, or the emptiness of the 'I' and other phenomena. That is the crucial antidote. These are the essential points to understand.

In his Lam Rim teachings Lama Tsong Khapa explained that we should begin by applying the antidote to the strongest and most prominent delusion. As presented very succinctly in the teachings, the antidote for overcoming strong attachment is to meditate on the imperfections of the object. To overcome anger one generates love and compassion for the object of anger. To counter ignorance, one meditates on emptiness. To eliminate pride one meditates on the various aspects and different categories of phenomena; and the best method to overcome discursive and disturbing thoughts is to meditate on the breath.

Although these methods will not overcome the very root of these delusions, they will definitely help to settle down the mind and to overcome the manifest aspects of these delusions, which means that the strong feelings these delusions give rise to will subside. So to that extent we will definitely benefit from applying these antidotes. We all know that during intense moments of anger we are really disturbed, and when that intense anger subsides, we definitely feel relief and a genuine sense of calmness. Of course we may not yet have overcome the very root of anger, but even at a manifest level the intense anger has subsided; so we do gain benefit from these techniques.

If one leaves these instructions to overcome strong and pronounced delusions in one's mind aside, and instead attempts to meditate just focusing on an object, I wonder how focused one could really be on any chosen object while in the grip of strong delusions. Even if one were to achieve some sort of focus temporarily, it would soon be overridden by that strong delusion. So it is much more practical to overcome the strong delusion first, and then apply the meditation technique. Some people have confided in me that, 'When I attempt to meditate, I am able to focus for quite a long time. However after the meditation finishes and I come out and begin to interact with my partner, I immediately become very upset and angry!' That illustrates that the intended effect of the meditation is not taking place.

The term three poisons is very succinct, yet we can easily relate to it. As presented in the teachings, the three poisons are attachment, anger and ignorance. The ill effects of the three poisons are not obscure; we have all experienced them. Feeling ignorant about something is quite daunting and disturbing, and another form of ignorance is where the mind becomes very dull and dark. So we can see the ill-effects of ignorance. We definitely know the strong effects of anger as we have all experienced that! Then there are the ill-effects of attachment. It is attachment that keeps us very busy, rushing around all the time; it makes us go to work, to earn money and so forth. The driving force behind all this busyness is actually attachment.

On a subtler level ignorance is of course what prevents us from knowing the ultimate nature of phenomena, which is emptiness. As the teachings present, our problems arise because of this fundamental ignorance. So we can see how essential it is to gain the profound understanding and realisation of emptiness.

The verse relating to this heading is:

*55. Even a single one of these destroys
All humans of Dzambuling [or Earth]
If one does not find a different medicine
In all the directions to cure it.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

Even one moment of anger towards a bodhisattva can destroy all humans in Dzambuling and throw them into the lower realms. The medicine against this great sickness, meditating on the path and so forth, one will not find anywhere else, apart from the texts that reveal it.

If one cannot find it in any other place, such as the world of Brahma and so forth, then it is unfindable elsewhere and therefore rare.

As the commentary explains very precisely, even one moment of anger towards a bodhisattva can destroy all humans of Dzambuling (our world) by throwing them into the lower realms.

In his many texts Gyaltsab Rinpoche often refers to the great negativity that would be incurred by engaging with a bodhisattva in a hostile manner. There is, of course, a profound reason why Gyaltsab Je specifically uses the example of bodhisattvas in this way. In A Commentary On Valid Cognition, Gyaltsab Je mentioned that it is extremely difficult to know who really is a bodhisattva. So the great danger in harming others is that if they are a bodhisattva, which may not be at all obvious, then we will incur very heavy negative karma. Gyaltsab Je explains this with the analogy of a pit with burning embers at the bottom, camouflaged with leaves and so forth on the top. If someone happened to step on the leaves over the pit, they would fall in and be burned by the embers. Just as we don't know where the camouflaged pit may be, likewise, we can't tell who could be a bodhisattva. There may be some bodhisattvas amongst us here right now. How are we to know? We wouldn't! So, as explained in many teachings, the best way to relate to others is by developing a pure view and seeing others in a good light and not focusing on their negativities. We need to always remember that what appears to us is not necessarily based on reality. In general we can say that it is best not to criticise those who have good qualities, who may also be quite learned! At least this can be quite obvious. Criticising someone who has good qualities is quite dangerous, so we need to be careful.

The particular delusion that Gyaltsab Rinpoche and other masters caution us against is anger towards these supreme beings. Of course, other delusions are also as damaging, but anger is the most likely one that we might develop and, as just explained, the consequence is very heavy negative karma. As mentioned in the commentary, even one moment of anger, or any other delusion for that matter, can cause a human to be reborn in the lower realms. If one delusion can cause so much harm and bring so much suffering, there's no need to mention the suffering created by all of the delusions combined together!

Having explained the great danger in allowing delusions such as a moment of anger to rule our behaviour, the commentary goes on to say that, the medicine against this chronic disease is meditating on the path and so forth, and this is something one will not find anywhere else, apart from the texts that reveal it. The teachings of the Buddha present the unmistakable antidotes for overcoming these delusions. As emphasised here, one will not find it anywhere else, which indicates that there is no instruction other than the unmistakable teachings that present the unmistakable methods for overcoming the delusions. One cannot find it in any other place, such as the world of Brahma and so forth, therefore it is unfindable elsewhere and rare.

We need to be able to apply this to ourselves, by recognising and acknowledging that we have met with these rare teachings that provide the unmistakable methods to apply the antidotes to overcome these chronic diseases. We have an incredible opportunity now, when we have these perfect conditions and have met with these rare teachings! So we need to really take it to heart and try to apply the practice as much as we can, while making strong prayers to never be parted from these profound teachings of the Buddha. In this life and in all future lifetimes we need to continuously meet with these perfect conditions until we reach our ultimate goal of enlightenment. So we must not waste this opportunity that we have now, and it is also important to make strong and fervent prayers to meet with these conditions again in the future.

Having explained how it is very rare to meet with these conditions, a question which may arise as to whether it is appropriate to practise according to the advice of the supreme physician. In other words, do we have the capacity to practise in that way? The meticulous presentation here shows how this is definitely possible.

The verse relating to this reads:

56. *And if one thinks not to act in accordance With the advice of the all-knowing physician,
Which can cure all pain,
Then that is extremely ignorant and the object of ridicule.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

If one stays obsessed with the causes of infinite cyclic existence and the lower realms, instead of putting the advice given by the all-knowing physician, who knows all the medicines to eliminate the sickness of the afflictions, and that liberates from all the pain of the afflictions, into practice, then that action is extremely ignorant and the object of criticism.

Therefore one should take refuge in the teacher from one's heart and practise the Dharma shown by him accordingly.

The opening lines from the Tibetan text are that the medicines to eliminate the sickness of the afflictions are presented by the all-knowing physician, which refers to the omniscient Buddha. Because the cure to overcoming the disease of the afflictions is presented by the omniscient one, that in itself answers the earlier hypothetical query, 'Is it appropriate to practise according to the advice of the supreme physician?' The answer is that it is definitely appropriate because it is presented not just by anyone, but by the supreme being who is all-knowing and thus free from all obscurations. Because the all-knowing omniscient Buddha is free from all obscurations, the methods and techniques presented by the Buddha will not have any mistakes or flaws. So it is appropriate for us to apply this medicine-like teaching and practice, because it is presented by the unmistakable Buddha, the all-knowing one free from all obscurations. Thus we put into practice the advice given by the all-knowing physician, who knows all the medicines to eliminate the sickness of the afflictions; that liberates from all the pain of the afflictions. But if one stays obsessed with the causes of infinite cyclic existence and the lower realms; in other words, if we don't put the advice into practice, then the flaw comes from our own side.

As the commentary explains, the medicine-like antidote to overcome the disease, which is presented by the all-knowing one, the Buddha, eliminates the sickness of the afflictions. It is also implied here that this antidote eliminates the sickness of the afflictions at its very core. As explained earlier, the very core of all our delusions, problems and mistakes is grasping at the self, and the Buddha presents the techniques and methods to overcome that grasping. Eliminating that grasping at self eliminates the sickness of all afflictions. When we overcome the very cause of the disease, then naturally the disease itself will subside. So when the core and the very root of those afflictions, self-grasping, is completely eliminated, all afflictions are eliminated.

If, rather than implementing this technique we intentionally create more causes to be in samsara, then as the commentary states, that action is extremely ignorant and the object of criticism. Whenever someone wastes a great opportunity, they are scorned with comments like, 'How stupid that is'. We would fall into that category if we neglect to adopt the practices and intentionally create even more causes to remain in samsara. To avoid falling into this trap one should take refuge in the teacher from one's heart. This means that having understood the qualities of the Conqueror, the omniscient one, the great compassionate all-knowing one, who has no flaws and who is endowed with only great qualities, we need to take heartfelt refuge with the confidence that the Conqueror has the ultimate means to free us from the disease of the delusions. Then, having taken refuge, we practise the Dharma taught by the Buddha, which is the means to cure the disease of the delusions. Just like receiving treatment for a disease, we implement Dharma practice to cure ourselves. Accordingly, we should follow what the unmistakable teacher, the Buddha, taught.

As the Buddha very succinctly said, 'Don't engage in any negativity, accumulate all virtues, and subdue your mind; this is the teaching of the Buddha'.

The three higher trainings are the realisation of the Buddha's doctrine and the three baskets are the oral teachings of the Buddha's doctrine.

There followed a discussion of the translation of two specific Tibetan terms that are translated interchangeably as Dharma or the teachings.

In a general sense dharma refers to all phenomena because the literal meaning of dharma, is to hold its own identity. So whatever holds its own identity is the dharma. This glass, for example, holds its own identity. Whenever we see it, whenever we look at it, wherever we put it, it is always a glass.

Earlier we referred to the Buddha's doctrine or teachings as an antidote to overcome the delusions. Here Dharma refers specifically to the Buddha's doctrine or teachings, rather than general phenomena or dharmas.

If we refer to the Dharma as the Buddhadharmas, it might have a more specific connotation and relate more to the Buddha's teachings. Also there are many faiths which have personal benefits and we can then say that these are dharmas too, but they are not the Buddhadharmas or the Buddha's teachings.

As I have mentioned hundreds of times, whatever practice we do can become a Buddhist practice if it is based on the principles of non-violence and having sound faith in the Buddha.

This is my definition of Buddhadharmas: if one practises non-harmfulness and goes for refuge to the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha, then whatever one engages in will be a Buddhist practice.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྣོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

22 October 2013

By focusing on the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer as a motivation we can now engage in the tong len meditation practice. [meditation]

To set the motivation for the teaching, we can think along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings, by liberating them from suffering and leading them to the ultimate state of happiness, I first need to achieve enlightenment myself. So, for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and practise well.

If one wonders, 'What is the purpose of coming to listen to these teachings?', then this motivation can serve as a reminder of the purpose of listening to the Dharma. This motivation indicates that it is not sufficient just to aspire to become enlightened; rather we need to actually put the Dharma into practice. When we set this motivation it actually ensures that our activities of teaching and listening to the Dharma becomes meaningful.

It is good to understand the significance of one's motivation. When one generates such a positive motivation in accordance with the altruistic wish to achieve enlightenment, that which encompasses the three principles of the path, then the whole Mahayana path is encompassed in that motivation. That's why it is extremely meaningful. While generating that positive motivation is crucial, the only way to bring that to fruition is through study and practice. Without both study and practice, one cannot actualise those good intentions.

Now let us return to the text; my intention is to try to go through the text a bit more quickly.

4.2.3. The power of the thorough application of the antidote

4.2.3.1. THE REASON WHY IT IS APPROPRIATE TO PURIFY NEGATIVITY (CONT.)

4.2.3.1.2. Showing the necessity to relate it to the example of the abyss

The outline uses the example of an abyss to show the necessity of purification.

The relevant verse in the root text reads:

57. *If one needs to be conscientious
Regarding ordinary small abysses,
What need is there to mention
The abyss that goes down a thousand bagtse?*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

If one needs to be very conscientious with small heights like hills, where falling down would merely cause injuries to one's limbs, then what need is there to mention that one has to be conscientious about not falling into the great abyss of 32000 bagtse, only indicated here by one thousand, where one needs to remain for a long time if one falls down?

One needs to rely on the antidote to the afflictions.

The first part of the commentary presents the analogy of an abyss between mountains. One has to take great care and be very conscientious about not falling down into an abyss. Out of the fear of falling and breaking one's limbs and so forth, one applies conscientiousness to avoid falling down into such an abyss. Now if we normally take extreme measures to protect ourselves from physical injury, then, as the commentary mentions, what need is there to mention the need to protect ourselves from the great abyss that one would fall into if one commits negativities. Such an abyss is greater in depth than any abyss on mountains; the text mentions an abyss of 32000 bagtse or leagues, which is the measure of the depth of the lower realms. So the abyss that one would fall into by creating negativities would be that of the unfortunate rebirths, which are not only incredibly deep but also extremely difficult to escape from.

Therefore one needs to be conscientious and apply methods to protect oneself from falling into the deep abyss of the lower realms. One needs to ensure that one applies the antidotes to the afflictions, which are the cause of all negativities, within a virtuous frame of mind. There is a significant point why the power of thorough application specifies applying antidotes to the afflictions; that is because in order to completely eradicate all negativity one has to apply the antidotes to the afflictions.

What one needs to derive from this explanation is that the ultimate goal is to completely overcome and purify all negativity from its very roots. Thus, it is only by completely eradicating the afflictions from their very root that we can be satisfied that we have completely purified all our negativities, and that eradication is achieved through the purification practices that have been presented.

As explained in the teachings, the main afflictions are attachment and grasping. Due to the ignorance about karma and its effects, we are compelled to take rebirth again and again in cyclic existence. So when the link of grasping and attachment is severed, we will not have to take rebirth again in cyclic existence. Therefore attachment and grasping are the main links that we need to break in order to achieve the cessation of rebirth in cyclic existence, and the lower rebirths in particular. The main point is that without overcoming attachment and grasping, one will have to continuously experience the consequences of negative karma in cyclic existence.

4.2.3.2. WHY IT IS APPROPRIATE TO PURIFY SOON

This outline indicates that it is not adequate to think that we will purify our negativities some time in the future, by thinking, 'Oh, I can gradually and slowly purify negativities'. The point presented here is that one needs to engage in purification right now!

There are two subheadings to this heading:

4.2.3.2.1. Strive in the antidote to the afflictions starting today.

4.2.3.2.2. It is unsuitable to be lazy in meditating on the path, because there is no reason to be unafraid of suffering.

With respect to the first subheading, we need to see that this is an exhortation to strive to apply the antidote for overcoming afflictions, starting right now, and not leave it for another time. We are so habituated to procrastinating and leaving things for later! This teaching cuts through all of that and points the finger at us saying, 'You can't leave it for later; you have to do it right now!' If we actually take heed of this presentation, we will find great purpose and meaning in this exhortation.

The second subheading is very profound. There is no reason to be unafraid of suffering also implies that when one achieves the state of being certain of not having to experience the consequences of negativities, then at that time there is no need to be afraid of suffering. This means that one should be very afraid of suffering if one has not purified the negativities and applied antidotes to one's afflictions. It is unsuitable to be lazy in meditating on the path, means that one needs to apply the meditations and practise on the path.

4.2.3.2.1. Strive in the antidote to the afflictions starting today

The verse from the root text reads:

58. *It is unsuitable to abide comfortably
Saying 'I won't die right today'.
The time of the self becoming non-existent
Will come about without any doubt.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse quite clearly, so I might not have to elaborate too much. I will of course elaborate when I feel capable of doing so, but when I am not too sure about something then I won't! The commentary begins with a rhetorical proposition:

One may think: Although it is necessary to strive in the antidote, it is good enough to start next month or year.

The answer to that is:

It is appropriate to start right from today because it is unsuitable to remain comfortably, not applying the antidote and being lazy, thinking that one will not die today. As there is no certainty that one will not die today, the time for me to become non-existent will most likely be tomorrow.

Hence I shall not be lazy and strive from today.

This of course relates to the points I've mentioned earlier. As a way to overcome the thought that it is not necessary to strive to apply the antidote right now, this is an exhortation to apply it right away. Immediately! The rationale behind the hypothetical proposition is that it may be acceptable to apply the antidotes to the delusions and negativity later. The response is in fact it is appropriate to start right from today because it is unsuitable to remain comfortably, not applying the antidote and being lazy, thinking that one will not die right today. Thinking that one will not die today implies that there is no certainty about when death will occur.

Here, laziness refers to the laziness that is associated with feeling comfortable about indulging in frivolous activities, or having a good time in a worldly sense—socialising with friends, having a party, perhaps going out for a picnic and having a drink or two, enjoying a nice meal and so forth. The underlying state of mind that makes these plans definitely gives no thought to the fact that one could die at any given moment. That is the laziness of comfort, where we remain comfortably, engaging in worldly pleasures.

Actually all forms of attachment have an aspect of laziness. The definition of enthusiasm or joyous effort is being happy and joyful about creating virtue; the opposite of that is laziness, which is being happy to engage in non-virtue. Laziness does not necessarily refer to being inactive and passive, lying around doing nothing—some forms of laziness involve being very active. Indeed, the definition of laziness here is applied to someone who would normally be seen as being very active and talented, but only in pursuing their attachments.

Therefore we are being exhorted to not give in to the laziness of being comfortable, thinking we will not die today and not applying the antidote. This is inappropriate, as there is no certainty one will not die today, the time for me to become non-existent will most likely be tomorrow! As death could come as soon as the next day, the conclusion is I shall not be lazy and strive from today.

Then Gyaltsab Je quotes from a text called the Letter of Kanika

From the Letter of Kanika:

This is for tomorrow, today I do this—
This is not a pure action for a human
Because the time to become non-existent,
The tomorrow, is certain to come.

The practical implication of these instructions is that we need to ensure that we apply the antidotes to negativity by following the process of purification throughout the day. As ordinary beings it is inevitable that we will commit some negativity, however as soon as we realise that we have done so, we need to apply the antidote, which is purification; this is essential. If we commit negativity in the morning we need to try and confess and purify that by noon; if negativities have been committed at noon, we need to purify them by late afternoon; and at night we recall the negativities committed in the evening or throughout the day and apply the antidotes for purifying them. If we were not to purify them that evening, and die before we get out of bed the next day, then some of our negativity would remain unpurified, which would be most unfortunate.

To re-emphasise the point, if we purify our negativities before going to bed, then even if we were not to wake up the next morning, we would have purified at least some negativities. That is the attitude we need to carry throughout our lives.

The way to purify negativities is to apply the four opponent powers, which are being presented here in this second chapter.

- The first part of the confession and purification is to develop strong regret about having committed that negativity, thinking, 'It is extremely unfortunate that I have again fallen victim to the delusions and have thus committed such negativity'.

- Having generated that remorse one will naturally want to do something about it. 'What can I do to rectify that negativity I have committed?' At that point one needs to rely on an object that will help one to rectify that negativity. So the next opponent power is the power of reliance on the basis, which is the Three Jewels and sentient beings. When one develops a strong reliance on the objects of refuge, the relevance of that strong refuge becomes most apparent.
- Even though they are essential, developing regret and relying on the objects of refuge is not sufficient, as they do not completely eradicate the negativity. The next opponent power is the power of thorough application of the antidote. Here one needs to engage in the activity of applying the antidote to the negativity, in particular to the delusions that are the cause of the negativity. So applying the antidote and understanding how to apply the antidote is really essential.
- To seal all of that, one resolves not to commit that negativity again.

This is how we purify negativity. We need to be aware that we can very easily engage in negativity. Just as we might be compelled to engage in some negativity within a few moments, by the same token it is also possible for us to apply the purification practice within a few moments. When we know the method then it's just a matter of bringing it to mind and acknowledging the negativity one has committed, feeling regret and so forth. So these four opponent powers can be applied in the same time that it takes to commit the negativity! So, as we have the means on hand at all times, it is most appropriate that we apply them.

As many of you would already be aware, the preliminary practices before engaging in a committed meditation practice, such as a long retreat, mainly consist of purification practices, and we need to understand their significance. Without purifying the negativities that our mind is still carrying, our meditation would not be fruitful as we would not be able to maintain any clarity or focus. We need to apply that principle to our regular practice, as purification practice is not just important but essential. I feel that as beginners, it would be more worthwhile to spend fifteen or twenty minutes doing a purification practice, rather than sitting cross-legged, with our eyes closed trying to focus on an object, while still being affected by distractions, and assuming it is meditation. Because we have not purified our negativities, our mind will not be focussed and will drift here and there. So I feel that it would be much more worthwhile to use one's time for a purification practice. Indeed, without having purified negativity the mind will be neither settled nor focussed. I'm relaying an important point here.

In relation to the appropriateness of applying the antidote to afflictions, let us take the example of attachment. If one has applied the antidote to overcome attachment, then to the degree that one has successfully done so, the mind will not be affected by attachment and so one's meditation would be much more stable. Otherwise attachment will be a hindrance to one's meditation, and most of the obstacles to meditation are in the form of attachment. Because of this, Shantideva explains the antidotes for overcoming attachments in great detail in the eighth chapter of the Bodhicharyavatara text.

4.2.3.2.2. It is unsuitable to be lazy in meditating on the path, because there is no reason to be unafraid of suffering

As mentioned previously, there is no certainty about not having to be afraid of suffering, so it is unsuitable to be lazy in meditating on the path.

The verse relating to this reads:

59. *Who will offer me freedom from fear?
How will I be freed from danger?
If I am definite to vanish
How can I remain with a happy mind?*

Again, Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with a hypothetical proposition:

Even though death occurs, being afraid of it will not help, so there is no need to be afraid.

Then the commentary continues:

One sees and hears that all others die. Thus while the fear of falling into the lower realms is there, what holy person can bestow fearlessness by saying that there is no need to be afraid of negativities and death?

Since there is nobody that can bestow freedom from negativities and death, how will one attain liberation if one does not strive in the antidote? One will not, and through death one will definitely become non-existent.

So why do you, due to the force of laziness, remain with a happy mind, and not strive in the antidotes to the negativities? This is unsuitable. Strive in meditating on the antidote!

We all operate under the assumption of the preliminary hypothetical statement. We often make comments like, 'Oh, I'm not afraid of death? Why should I be afraid?' Yet even though we say this casually, that fear might definitely arise quite strongly when the prospect of death is imminent. As the commentary explains, one sees and hears that all others die and the fear of falling into the lower realms is there. This is something that we can all relate to.

What holy person can bestow fearlessness on you emphasises the earlier point, that while one sees and hears that all others die, and the fear of falling into the lower realms is there, and since there is no holy being who can bestow fearlessness on you, you need to purify negativities.

Since there is nobody who can bestow freedom from negativities and death, how will one attain liberation if one does not strive in the antidote? One will not, and through death one will definitely become non-existent means that life as one knows it will completely end. It doesn't mean that one becomes totally non-existent, rather that this life will be severed, thus becoming non-existent in the context of this present life.

Thus the conclusion is, so why do you, due to the force of laziness, remain with a happy mind, and not strive in the antidotes to the negativities? This is unsuitable and one should strive in meditating on the antidote!

Again, laziness does not refer to the laziness we understand in the worldly sense, which refers to someone who is inactive and just laying around and not doing anything. In this context a lazy person could be very active and engaging in much frivolous activity, and be enjoying the comforts of life out of attachment. To be more specific, applying the antidotes requires some exertion and some effort. Thinking that everything is fine and that we are just enjoying life, while not considering the negativities one is engaging in, let alone the need to apply the antidotes, is the laziness that is referred to here. As indicated earlier, the laziness of procrastination is also included here. We also need to protect ourselves from the sort of laziness that thinks, 'Oh, I can do it tomorrow, the day after tomorrow, or next week, or next month and so forth'.

As mentioned in the teachings, all virtues can become an antidote when they are practised with the intention of purifying negativities. As we all attempt to engage in virtue on a regular basis, and do some practices and so forth, it is good to ensure that these practices become a means to serve as an antidote.

4.2.4. The power of not reversing into the fault again

The fourth power is the power of not reversing into the fault again. It is good to remember the significance of the actual order of the practices of the four opponent powers. As explained previously, the first power, the power of thorough repudiation is, in short, the power of regret. The stronger the sense of regret one has, the more readily the intention to do something about the negativity one has committed will arise, and the more stable the next opponent power, the power of the basis, will naturally be. Then the third opponent power, the power of the thorough application of the antidote, will also be strong.

The power of not reversing into the fault again is divided into three:

4.2.4.1. Restraining oneself henceforth because of regretting the negativity

4.2.4.2. Confessing what one did before

4.2.4.3. Making a promise to refrain from the negativity after having requested attention

4.2.4.1. RESTRAINING ONESELF HENCEFORTH BECAUSE OF REGRETTING THE NEGATIVITY

This is sub-divided into two:

4.2.4.1.1. Purifying meaningless negativity

4.2.4.1.2. Striving day and night to be liberated from negativity

4.2.4.1.1. Purifying meaningless negativity

This is further sub-divided into two:

4.2.4.1.1.1. It is unsuitable to be attached because possessions are unreliable

4.2.4.1.1.2. It is unsuitable to be attached to family and so forth

4.2.4.1.1.1. It is unsuitable to be attached because possessions are unreliable

The verse relating to this reads:

60. Of past experiences, which have ceased,

What has remained of them?

By grasping at them

I transgressed the advice of the teacher.

The commentary's explanation of this reads:

The experiences of enjoyment of past cyclic existence were unreliable and have ceased. Now what is left of these enjoyments that I took to have essence? There is nothing left.

Therefore, regret having transgressed the advice of the teacher, and then generated negativity due to having grasped at, and being attached to, these phenomena without essence.

As the commentary explains, the experiences of enjoyment of past cyclic existence were unreliable. This also implies that one has experienced all types of enjoyments within cyclic existence. That is definitely true! There are no enjoyments that we have experienced in this life that are not related to the five senses—we have seen beautiful objects and sights, we have heard beautiful sounds, we have tasted beautiful tastes and enjoyed fragrant smells, and have experienced beautiful tactile feelings. If we think of past lifetimes then we can definitely say that there is nothing that we have not experienced. But while we have definitely experienced every pleasure in relation to the five senses, they were unreliable, meaning that there was no real value and substance to them.

When the commentary mentions that they were unreliable and have ceased, it is indicating that because they cease, they are unreliable. So there is an interrelationship between cessation and unreliability. Whatever the enjoyment or pleasure we may have experienced from the five senses, the moment of actual pleasure is the first moment when the sense consciousness meets with the sense object. But the very next moment, the pleasure that one has experienced ceases. Therefore nothing remains; there is no substance and nothing remains. So what remains from the enjoyments in the past? They were only momentary and there's nothing left to show the enjoyment we experienced.

When the commentary says now what is left of these enjoyments, the implication of now is, why do we still become attached to the enjoyments, failing to see that they were momentary and unreliable? Why are we still so attached to the enjoyments of the five senses when they have no essence? We experience pleasure or enjoyment at the moment of contact between the sense and the sense object, but at the very next moment the enjoyment ceases and there is nothing left. Not having realised this, we have continuously engaged in negativities.

Having considered that, we need to take the initiative, and regret having transgressed the advice of the teacher and then generated negativity due to having grasped at, and being attached to, these phenomena without essence. Here, teacher can refer to one's own teacher, the teacher of the three times, the Buddha Shakyamuni, and the bodhisattvas. We have transgressed or completely ignored the advice they presented in the past, and have continuously engaged in negativities by grasping and being attached to phenomena. The verse under the heading It is unsuitable to be attached because possessions are unreliable has thus explained succinctly that the enjoyment that we experience is only momentary and is thus unreliable. So why continue to engage in that, as there is nothing to be gained? The Tibetan word used here, lhakpa, means extra. So there is nothing extra to be gained by engaging in the enjoyments of the five senses. Having understood and acknowledged that, one needs to apply the opponent power of regret about having transgressed the advice of the teachers and so forth.

4.2.4.1.1.2. It is unsuitable to be attached to friends and so forth

The verse relating to this reads:

61. *If, in a similar fashion to this life,
I have to give up friends and relatives,
And I have to go alone,
How suitable are all friends and non-friends?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

This body I have while alive is without essence, and leaving behind friends and relatives in a similar fashion, I have to go, without certainty of the direction and without freedom.

Regardless of whether they are friends or non-friends, they do not have the slightest benefit, and it is unsuitable to have attachment to them.

This body I have while alive is without essence indicates that even though one is alive, one's body is already without essence. If that is so now, how much more so when, at the time of death, one has to discard one's body, friends and relatives. Those to whom one would otherwise have been attached will be of no help.

One has to leave behind the things with which one is most familiar such as one's cherished body, one's friends and relatives, and go completely alone on an unfamiliar journey. We have no choice; while it is certain that we have to go on to the next existence, the next life, we don't have any knowledge or wisdom regarding how to go about that. We are not sure how that journey is taken and how we will go on that journey. There is no certainty. So here again, we are exhorted to be wary about having too much attachment to our body, our possessions and particularly to our friends and relatives.

Now is the time to train our minds to prepare for the time of death. Here we are being given a succinct presentation of the method and means to prepare ourselves for our death, which is inevitable. The main point is that neither friends nor relatives can benefit us or help us at the time of death, the crucial moment when we have to go on a journey all by ourselves. So we need to reduce our strong attachment to our possessions, body, friends and relatives, which will release the mind so that it will accept and be ready for death whenever it occurs.

As one of the great masters mentioned, our body is just like a guesthouse where we spend a night or two, where the consciousness is the guest!

As explained and emphasised in this and other teachings, at the time of death nothing but the Dharma will help. Since it is only the Dharma that will benefit us at the time of death, we need to rely upon it now, and try to integrate the practice of the Dharma into our lives now. Without applying ourselves to practise now, we cannot expect the Dharma to miraculously help us at the time of death. So the way to practise the Dharma now is to avoid creating negativity in relation to our possessions and friends and so forth, and to create virtue.

The next session is a discussion session followed by the exam, however my intention is to try to finish the third chapter this year. So we can have the discussion night, skip the exam and then we continue with the teaching straight after the discussion.

It seems that there are many who like the discussion and who seem to benefit from it.

Student: Some prefer the exam.

Maybe that's something we can look into at the next session. It is good to find a general consensus of what works and what doesn't work based on our experience. When there is a general consensus of what works, then it is worthwhile following. Of course, we can't always accept the opinions of one or two people, but when there is a general consensus of what works and what doesn't work, we can follow that.

It's good to follow the opinions of the younger generation such as Tara, who comments that she likes the discussion.

So as a compromise, this time around we will have the discussion but no exam, and continue the teaching after that, but next time around we will have the exam and no discussion. Next year we will see how we should proceed. Of course from my side, I like to try to go through the text, but I think that two teachings a week might be too hard for you.

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

5 November 2013

As we have already generated our motivation while reciting the prayers, we can now engage in the practice of meditation. [meditation]

You can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So, for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put it into practice well.

4.2.4.1.2. Striving day and night to be liberated from negativity

The implication of the outline is that there will be grave consequences if we do not strive day and night to be delivered from negativity. So we need to contemplate this, and follow this advice. The relevant verse reads:

62. "From non-virtue arises suffering
How does one become free from that?" you say.
It is suitable that I contemplate
This alone day and night.

With respect to this, Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins:

'From non-virtues such as killing arise the sufferings of the hells and so forth. How can I become free from that?' As presented:

It is suitable for me to contemplate day and night only karmic cause and effect.

The quote from non-virtue arises suffering is from Nagarjuna's Precious Garland, which explains that the sufferings of the hells and so forth arise from non-virtues such as killing. While killing is specified here, the rest of the ten non-virtues are implied as well. When one engages in non-virtues such as killing, the definite consequence will be suffering in unfortunate rebirths such as in the hell realms. The implication here is that karma is infallible—once the cause is created one will definitely have to experience the consequences.

One has definitely engaged in non-virtues such as killing, stealing, sexual misconduct and so forth in the past, so a great amount of negativity has already been accumulated. By contemplating the law of cause and effect, one realises that the consequence of engaging in such negativity is that, if it is not purified, then one will definitely take unfortunate rebirths in the hell realm, or hungry ghost realm or animal realm and experience great suffering. Faced with this prospect the question arises, 'How can I free myself from the consequences of my negative acts?' Thus, it is suitable for me to contemplate day and night only karmic cause and effect.

The Tibetan word tak-tu means at all times, so the implication here is to think about karma at all times—day and night. Also when the root text says this alone, it is emphasising that one should be contemplating the essential points of karma at all times. When one really contemplates the effects that arise from the creation of negativities, then the need to purify those negativities will inevitably become a primary concern.

The next part of Gyaltsab Je's explanation is this essential point:

If one does not gain certainty with regard to karmic cause and effect, then one will not have certainty for any Dharma that makes the Conqueror happy.

Therefore everybody should strive in this.

This really encapsulates the essence of the verse. If one doesn't gain certainty with regard to karmic cause and effect, refers to the understanding one needs to gain from contemplating that the consequence of engaging in non-virtue is definitely suffering, and that the consequence of engaging in virtue is definitely happiness. There is no room for negotiation: negative karma definitely brings about unpleasant and unhappy results, and positive karma or virtue definitely brings about happy results.

Until one gains certainty about this point, whatever Dharma one does will not be in accordance with what would make the Conqueror happy. The emphasis here is to always be mindful about the infallibility of karma in all our activities. When we really take the initiative to contemplate the infallibility of karma, then the more we contemplate this, the more confidence we will gain about the certainty of karmic causes and effects. And as we gain more confidence about the certainty of karma, the stronger our determination and willingness will be to refrain from engaging in non-virtues such as taking the life of other sentient beings, and so forth. Likewise, our willingness to engage in accumulating virtue will naturally increase. So the essential practice of shunning negativity and adopting virtue comes about from an understanding of how karma works. Thus, cultivating certainty about karma is essential.

This is also in line with the advice of the Kadampa masters, who said, 'We regard any person who engages in the practice of avoiding the ten non-virtues and adopting the ten virtues, while encouraging others to do likewise, as a real practitioner and a true adept, regardless of the tradition that they may be following'. The great Kadampa masters said that that they were not concerned about particular traditions or particular appearances, i.e. whether they are a monk or a lay person; if they are truly practising this essential point then they are a real practitioner, a true adept, a noble being, and a real virtuous friend. This is something that we need to keep in mind.

It is also good to reflect on the common ground of all traditions, which is to acknowledge that adopting the ten virtues and avoiding the ten non-virtues is common to all religions. There are differences in explaining what it means to hold a wrong view, but the importance of avoiding killing and so forth is common to all religious traditions. In fact anyone with some commonsense would definitely accept the ten non-virtues as misdeeds. Thus, as presented in the commentary, abiding by the law of karma is an essential practice that makes the conquerors happy.

The commentary concludes with:

That some say they have gained certainty with regard to emptiness but do not value karma is clearly a distorted understanding. They have not ascertained that emptiness is in actuality dependent arising.

If someone claims that they have gained some understanding of emptiness, and that they do not need to abide by karma (the law of cause and effect), then that in itself proves that what they are claiming is distorted and a completely wrong understanding. The reason it is a wrong understanding is because they have not ascertained that emptiness is in actuality dependent arising.

The point that is raised here is that emptiness is in actuality dependent arising. I have explained this extensively hundreds of times. So, if you have paid good attention then you will recall those explanations. This explanation is based on the teachings of the great master Nagarjuna and his disciple Chandrakirti. These great masters gained a profound understanding of emptiness by exhaustively applying themselves to understanding the Buddha's teachings particularly those on ultimate truth. They then very kindly presented this unmistakable view to us through their written works. We need to regard these great masters as being extremely kind in presenting the unmistakable view of emptiness to us, as without their clarification we would definitely be lost. We would come to wrong conclusions and develop a distorted view of emptiness.

This point is encapsulated in these words from the Heart Sutra, 'Form is empty, and emptiness is form'. This indicates that while form is completely empty of inherent existence, it is within the sphere of emptiness that form is able to manifest and function interdependently. It is because things are empty of inherent existence that it is possible for things to exist interdependently as form, sound, smell, taste, tactile objects and so forth. When the Heart Sutra states, Form is empty, emptiness is form, it is explaining that while form and so forth are ultimately empty of inherent existence, conventionally they do exist interdependently. You need to remember this essential point always.

4.2.4.2. CONFESSING WHAT ONE DID BEFORE

This has two subdivisions:

4.2.4.2.1. What one has to confess

4.2.4.2.2. The way of confessing

4.2.4.2.1. What one has to confess

This refers to the negativity that one needs to confess. The verse relating to this point reads:

*63. I, out of unknowing ignorance,
Have created natural non-virtuous actions
And accepted negativities. Any of these
That I have done,*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Due to unknowing and ignorance with regard to karmic cause and effect, I have created either natural non-virtues which are a negativity whoever commits them—regardless of whether one has vows or not, and misdeeds through decree which are committed only by those who have taken vows. Thus, I declare whatever wrong doings that I have committed.

One has created each and every negativity because of a failure to recognise actions as being negativities due to unknowing and ignorance, specifically ignorance of the karmic law of cause and effect.

Here, whatever refers to the two ways of creating negativity—the misdeeds of a person with vows who creates negativity with respect to their vows, and those without vows who create natural non-virtues.

The Tibetan text presents natural non-virtue first. Killing is a natural negativity or misdeed because it is a misdeed, regardless of whether the perpetrator knows it is a misdeed or not, regardless of whether they have taken vows or not, and regardless of whether they are ordained or not. Anyone who engages in the negative act of killing, for example, will incur negativity. That is why it is called a natural misdeed.

Whereas negativity by decree, which is translated in the root text as accepted negativity, is negativity committed by those who have taken particular vows, such as ordained monks and nuns, who incur negativity if they break their vows. If a lay person engages in the act of killing, they would incur the natural negativity or misdeed, but a monk or nun who engages in the act of killing would incur both the natural misdeed, as well as the negativity or misdeed by decree, because they have taken vows to refrain from killing.

With both natural negativities and the negativity of decree one creates negativity in relation to self and others.

So, confession involves confessing negativity incurred by either natural misdeeds, or a negativity that one has incurred because of decree. Regardless of how the negativity was committed, it has to be purified.

To summarise the main point, one needs to recall whatever negativity one may have created in the past and identify it as negativity by confessing it. This then gives one the impetus to engage in practices to purify it.

That covers the point about what one has to confess, which are the negativities incurred in the past.

4.2.4.2.2. The way of confessing

The verse relating to this outline is:

*64. Before the eyes of the protectors,
With hands folded and a mind seeing the fears of suffering,
I prostrate again and again
And confess all of them.*

The explanation in Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

One should confess all one's negativities by prostrating repeatedly in front of the buddhas and their children with folded hands and a mind that sees the dangers of the negativities.

As the commentary explains, the way to confess negativities is to begin by visualising the buddhas and their children, indicating the bodhisattvas, in front of oneself. We really need to pay attention to the importance of visualising the buddhas and bodhisattvas as the objects of reliance. When we do a purification practice such as prostrating, it is important to really bring to mind the buddhas and bodhisattvas, and try to generate as much as possible a strong sense that they are actually present in the space before us.

This has great significance because the more we develop that awareness of the presence of the buddhas and bodhisattvas, the stronger our inclination to confess and engage in a purification practice becomes. It also guards us against engaging in further negativities.

An awareness of the presence of buddhas and bodhisattvas helps to develop a conscientious mind, as well as the mental factor of shame and embarrassment. Basically, when there is the awareness of the buddhas always being present, one will be hesitant about creating negativities. The awareness that because the buddhas are omniscient they always know what one is doing, will protect one from engaging in negativity.

Prior to prostrating, one can kneel in front of the buddhas and bodhisattvas with one's palms together, recalling the negativities one has engaged in the past, and being moved to tears by strong regret and remorse, one now acknowledges the great opportunity that one has to purify this in the presence of the buddhas and bodhisattvas. So with that understanding in mind one can then engage in the purification practice such as prostrating, which also encompasses taking refuge in the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

The word repeatedly in the commentary indicates that one needs to engage in confession and purification practice again and again.

As mentioned previously, the degree of regret that one feels is dependent on recalling the consequences of the negativities. When one has a strong sense of how the consequences of the negativities will result in suffering, then strong regret and remorse will definitely arise; which will then be followed with the strong wish to refrain from negativities; followed by making a promise to refrain from such negativities in the future. This is how to engage in this practice.

4.2.4.3. MAKING A PROMISE TO REFRAIN FROM NEGATIVITY AFTER HAVING REQUESTED ATTENTION

The meaning of this heading is quite clear. The relevant verse is:

65. *I request the guides to accept my Negativities as mistakes.
Since they are not wholesome
I shall not do them again.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Oh guides, for these reasons, please accept my negativities as mistakes. Since these negativities are not wholesome I promise not to do them again, even at the cost of my life.

Make the promise in this way, not to do the negativity henceforth, by cutting off the continuity.

As the commentary explains, one pleads with the guides—the buddhas and bodhisattvas—for these reasons,—referring to the negativities that one recalls and their great consequences—please accept my negativities as mistakes.

Since these negativities are not wholesome I promise not to do them again, even at the cost of my life is where one makes a promise to refrain from negativity in the future. As mentioned previously, this is also in line with the confession ceremony for the sangha where the abbot asks, 'Do you see your faults as faults?' and the reply is, 'I do'. 'Henceforth will you refrain from engaging in them again', to which the reply is 'I will'. It is the same with any confession and purification practice. Having pleaded with the guides or the buddhas and bodhisattvas to pay attention, one proclaims one's negativities and accepts them as negativities, and then makes the promise, 'I will not engage in negativity again even at the cost of my life. This should be the extent of one's promise.

As I have mentioned previously, when one promises not to engage in negativity it needs to be a very sincere promise, from the depth of one's heart. There must be a definite determination not to engage in any negativity by clearly accepting them as faults. If one thinks, 'I am not so sure if I wish to avoid engaging in negativity', then the 'promise' is more like a lie, because there is no actual intent to avoid engaging in negativity. So making the promise with keen determination to avoid negativities in the future is essential. This is emphasised in the commentary which explains that one makes the promise not to commit negativity by cutting of the continuity.

Then Gyaltsab Je continues:

Although there are many doors for purification explained in the teachings and treatises, that which has the antidote complete is to purify by way of the four powers intact. Thus, this is the way to purify.

As explained here there are many doors for purification, meaning that there are many purification methods. For example, those negativities incurred by breaching the commitments of tantric vows are purified by engaging in the practice of Vajrasattva, while the negativities incurred by breaching the commitments of the bodhisattva vows are purified by engaging in practices such as Thirty-five Buddhas practice. This practice commences with the indication it is the means to confess and purify the negativities incurred by breaches of the bodhisattva vows. While there are different methods, one needs to apply the four powers for them to be a complete antidote. In order for the Vajrasattva practice of purification and the Thirty-five Buddhas practice of purification to be complete antidotes, one has to actually apply all four opponent powers, thus all four powers have to be intact. This is the actual way to purify negativity.

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary goes on to say

That this purifies also the karma definitely to be experienced is explained in the Togke Barwa and The Great Commentary to the Eight-thousand Verse Sutra.

I had explained previously that when the four opponent powers are intact, even the karma that is to be definitely experienced can be purified. And, as explained previously, the karma that is to be definitely experienced is that which is both created and accumulated. This is explained in the Buddha's teaching in sutras such as Togke Barwa and The Great Commentary to the Eight-thousand Verse Sutra.

Then Gyaltsab Je exhorts us with the following lines:

We, who do not know the instances of karmic cause and effect well, ...

This means that we might lack a complete knowledge of the instances of karmic cause and effect

... and who, although knowing a little, do not practise what has to be abandoned and what has to be practised accordingly, should confess on a daily basis, uninterruptedly, by way of the four powers.

This is really succinct advice reminding us that while we may not know about karmic cause and effect in great detail, we do have some understanding. But while we do have some understanding we may not really engage in the practice of abandoning negativity and adopting what has to be adopted, which means that we still find ourselves engaging in negativities on a daily basis. So because we find ourselves engaging continuously in such negative deeds, it is befitting for us to engage in confession by way of the four powers, continuously, on a daily basis.

As I have explained in the past, it will be really worthwhile at the end of the day, before we go to bed, to really recall the day and if one has engaged in negativities, to confess that, and then rejoice in the virtues that one has accumulated. It is important to reflect on these points.

Actually it would be a good idea to memorise these few lines so that you can recall them regularly.

The commentary concludes its explanation of this section thus:

Especially one should practise by focusing on purifying the obstacles to the generation of bodhicitta.

This presentation returns us to the main topic of the root text, the methods of generating the altruistic mind of bodhicitta.

Summarising verse

Then the author of the commentary, Gyaltsab Je, presents his summarising verse:

Those tormented by the faults of attachment, jealousy
And conceit due to exaggeration will not generate the supreme mind.
Hence, whatever mistakes one made with body,
speech and mind,
Confess them from the depths of one's heart to the protectors.

In Those tormented by the faults of attachment, jealousy and conceit, the Tibetan word zir, translated here as tormented, also has the connotation of being intoxicated. So the first two lines of this verse mean that it is not possible for the altruistic mind, the supreme mind of bodhicitta, to be generated by those who are tormented or intoxicated with the faults of attachment, jealousy and conceit, which can only result in the continuous creation of negativity.

Realising that, one needs to exhort oneself to confess to the protectors whatever mistakes one has made in body, speech and mind, from the depths of one's heart. The confession practice is essential if one is inclined to purify one's mind.

II. THE TITLE OF THE CHAPTER

The root text reads:

This is the second chapter on confession, from the Introduction to the Actions of the Bodhisattvas.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary concludes with:

This is the commentary on the second chapter called Purifying Negativities from the commentary on the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

Of the seven limbs, this chapter has covered the limbs of prostration, offering, and confession, in addition to refuge. However the chapter is called the chapter of confession, because the primary focus is on confessing and purifying negativities.

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

12 November 2013

Based on the motivation we generated with the prayers we have just recited, we can now engage in the practice of meditation. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

2. THE ACTUAL EXPLANATION OF THE STAGES OF THE PATH¹

2.2. The method for taking the essence

2.2.2 Explaining the individual meanings

2.2.2.1. CONTEMPLATING THE BENEFITS OF ENLIGHTENMENT

2.2.2.2 THE WAY OF TRAINING IN THE PRACTICES UPON GENERATING THE TWO BODHICITTAS

2.2.2.2.1. Taking the mind of enlightenment²

2.2.2.2.1.2. The actual taking of the mind of enlightenment after having applied the conducive conditions of accumulating merit such as rejoicing in virtue and so forth.

As I have mentioned previously, with anything that we wish to achieve there are certain factors that oppose that achievement and certain factors that contribute to it. Likewise with the development of bodhicitta, there are certain opposing factors and certain conditions that are conducive. The opposing factors are the negativities that have to be removed through purification practices, which was the topic of the second chapter, and the conducive conditions are the means by which we accumulate merit.

Some of the means of accumulating merit, such as prostrations and so forth, were discussed in the second chapter, and this outline continues that presentation, beginning with rejoicing.

As the outline indicates, the actual mind of enlightenment is generated after having built up the conducive condition of merit through rejoicing and so forth. This also implies having rid oneself of the opposing factors, which is done by confession and purification. What we need to derive from this outline is that if we wish to develop the mind of enlightenment we need to overcome the opposing conditions as well as acquiring the conducive condition of accumulating merit. Without engaging those two aspects, there is no way we can establish the basis for generating the mind of enlightenment.

Using sound reasoning and logic we can also understand that whatever result we wish to achieve, there are bound to be some opposing factors that need to be overcome, and some conducive factors or conditions that need to be acquired, and both are necessary for success. So whatever result we seek, we need to endeavour to overcome the opposing factors and acquire or establish the conducive factors.

The heading Taking the mind of enlightenment after having built up the conducive conditions of merit and rejoicing in virtue and so forth is covered in Chapter 3.

CHAPTER 3: TAKING THE MIND OF ENLIGHTENMENT³

I. Explaining the text of the chapter

II. The title of the chapter

I. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

The chapter has three sub-divisions.

1. Preparation
2. Actual
3. Conclusion

1. PREPARATION

This section has five sub-divisions:

- 1.1. Rejoicing in virtue
- 1.2. Requesting to turn the wheel of Dharma
- 1.3. Requesting not to pass beyond sorrow
- 1.4. Dedicating virtues
- 1.5. An auxiliary of the perfection of generosity: training in the thought of giving away body, possessions and roots of virtue

1.1. Rejoicing in virtue

This is further subdivided into three:

- 1.1.1. Rejoicing in the virtues that are the causes of higher status, and in their effects

Here the merit from rejoicing in virtues is held in conjunction with the causes for higher status and their effects. This means that the merit is not held with renunciation, or the mind of awakening (bodhicitta), or the wisdom realising emptiness.

- 1.1.2. Rejoicing in the virtues that are the causes of mere liberation, and in their effects

Here the merit from rejoicing in virtues is held in conjunction with obtaining liberation.

- 1.1.3. Rejoicing in the causes of highest enlightenment, and in their effects

1.1.1. Rejoicing in the virtues that are the causes of higher status, and in their effects

Higher status refers to taking a fortunate rebirth in the god realms or as a human being. This was explained in detail in Precious Garland, which was the last text that we studied.

The first verse of the chapter reads:

1. *In the virtues that give respite from the sufferings
Of the lower realms of all sentient beings,
And in the abiding in happiness of them that suffer,
I rejoice with pleasure.*

Gyaltshab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse as follows:

¹ These headings relate to the structural overview of the entire text. The numbering of each chapter is self-contained.

² The first subdivision of this heading was covered in Chapter 2.

³ The heading numbering begins again with the new chapter.

I rejoice in the causal virtues that give respite from the sufferings of the lower realms to all sentient beings abiding in cyclic existence, and which cause them to attain special higher status.

The Tibetan text begins with the words all sentient beings abiding in cyclic existence. By specifying sentient beings who are abiding in cyclic existence the text is referring to sentient beings who have the contaminated aggregates, also known as the appropriated aggregates. Having these contaminated aggregates means taking uncontrolled rebirths in cyclic existence again and again. We need to relate sentient beings abiding in cyclic existence to beings who are still suffering and bound to samsara, such as ourselves. There are of course many sentient beings who have abandoned cyclic existence, such as the arhats or foe destroyers, as well as the bodhisattvas abiding on the eighth ground and above.

For sentient beings who are bound in cyclic existence, rebirth in a higher status gives some respite from the intense sufferings of the lower realms, so we rejoice in the virtues that are the cause for obtaining that high status. Here virtues does not refer to virtues that are held by renunciation; rather we are rejoicing in the virtues that are the cause for merely obtaining the good result of higher status. Seeing others accumulating such virtues is also an opportunity for us to rejoice.

We need to be mindful that when we rejoice in virtuous activities it doesn't mean that we are developing an egotistical pride in our achievements. Rather, rejoicing is an act of great humility, in which one acknowledges that one has had a great opportunity to accumulate some virtue. When one dedicates that virtue for the benefit of all beings then it becomes a pure practice.

Rejoicing has many qualities: when one rejoices in the virtues of others it serves as an opponent to jealousy, and it actually serves as an antidote to overcome jealousy we might feel in relation to the good deeds of others. In addition, as Lama Tsong Khapa mentions, rejoicing is the optimum way to accumulate extensive merit with the least effort. Furthermore, whenever one rejoices, it can help to increase whatever merit one has accumulated in the past, it gives an impetus to accumulate more virtue now, and further encourages one to accumulate virtue in the future.

As explained in the teachings, the merit that one accumulates from rejoicing is vast and extensive. It is said that when one rejoices in the merit of those who are superior to oneself, one will obtain at least half of the merit that they have accumulated, just by virtue of rejoicing in their merit. If the other is of equal status, one will achieve the same amount of merit as they have. When one rejoices in the merit of someone who is lesser than oneself, one will obtain even more merit than they have accumulated. This is explained in sutras that I mentioned previously regarding the offerings made by King Prasenajit to the Buddha.

One of the main points about rejoicing is that it helps to increase merit by acknowledging that one has had a great opportunity to accumulate virtues. One needs to focus on the fact that one has had a great opportunity to accumulate merit, rather than feeling pompous that one has done a great practice. Holding this kind of attitude will help to overcome pride. Otherwise one might develop an egotistical pride about meagre attempts of accumulating merit. Developing pride defeats the purpose of engaging in virtue—far from achieving good results from one's practice it can bring harmful results. Whatever virtue and merit that one accumulates needs to serve the purpose of reducing pride, rather than increasing it by thinking, 'I have done a great deed! I have accumulated so much virtue'. One needs to adopt a sense of humility and rejoice in the great opportunity of creating merit, and generate the thought, 'May I further get such opportunities to engage in virtue and accumulate merit again'.

The essential point is to recognise the difference between egotistical pride and genuine rejoicing. With pride, one starts to feel pompous and self-righteous about one's achievements, thinking 'I have done great practice!'. Whereas, rejoicing implies a feeling of genuine modesty, of subduing the mind and making it more gentle. If one ensures that the effort one puts into accumulating virtue becomes a means to subdue one's own mind, then one's attempts to accumulate virtue have served their purpose.

The main point is that rejoicing serves as an antidote to the negativities or vices that may otherwise arise in our mind. Genuine rejoicing opposes pride, while rejoicing in the virtues of others helps to overcome jealousy. This text and other teachings mention that by the mere fact of rejoicing in a bodhisattva's virtues and great deeds we accumulate extensive merit. These are important points to keep in mind.

So we can see the great practical value of the practice of rejoicing. We don't have to exert ourselves and go to great lengths of engaging in extensive practices—it basically comes down to having the right attitude. We can accumulate great merit thinking about the great deeds of the noble beings and rejoice in their great deeds, even while lying down.

The first part of Gyaltsab Je's explanation relates to rejoicing in the cause of the higher status. The second part is rejoicing in the results of the higher status. As the commentary reads:

I also rejoice in the result, i.e. the abiding of the suffering sentient beings in the happiness of higher status.

Rejoicing in the result refers to rejoicing in the result of the virtues that one has accumulated, which is obtaining the higher status. Beings who are abiding in suffering refers to beings who are abiding in the three types of suffering: the suffering of suffering, and/or the suffering of change, in addition to pervasive conditioned suffering. When beings who are experiencing the immense suffering of the lower realms are placed in the happiness of the higher status, they are temporarily relieved of the suffering of suffering of the lower realms. However they are still in the nature of suffering. So, as a result of the virtues that have been accumulated, beings who would otherwise have to repeatedly experience sufferings in the lower realms have now been placed in a temporary state of happiness in higher realms.

In the human realm we are familiar with the qualities of high status. There are those who have great wealth, good physical features, who are renowned, and those who have fame and power. These are all qualities that we normally admire and even wish for ourselves, because there is a certain amount of happiness and wellbeing associated with them. So if we see others who have any of these qualities, then we can rejoice in their qualities rather than being jealous. This can then prevent many unhappy states of mind.

The immediate benefit we gain from rejoicing is that it releases our mind from the pangs of jealousy, as well as being a means to acquire merit. As mentioned previously, if we find ourselves with any of the good conditions that promote our wellbeing, we should rejoice as a way to overcome pride. When we rejoice in these conditions rather than being proud, we are acknowledging that we enjoy these conditions as a result of the virtues we have previously accumulated, which becomes the means to accept the good conditions we have now. This will enhance our sense of humility about having obtained these good conditions.

What I'm attempting to explain here is that one rejoices in the happiness of higher status obtained by those who are otherwise still abiding in the suffering of cyclic existence. A more vivid example is our own condition of having been reborn in the higher status of a human being. While we have been born as human beings, nevertheless we still experience all three levels of suffering; the suffering of suffering, the suffering of change and pervasive compounded suffering. Yet the mere fact of being born as a human comes with conditions that can provide a certain amount of happiness and wellbeing. Many of us are not deprived of resources such as wealth, being renowned, or having good features, which are some of the qualities of the high status. So while we still abide in suffering, we nevertheless have these good conditions that allow us to experience a certain amount of happiness and wellbeing. Many others also experience these good qualities and conditions, and we should rejoice in their happiness too.

Another significant point to grasp is that enjoying the happiness of higher status also gives us respite from the suffering of the lower realms. While we would all have experienced the suffering of the lower realms in previous lifetimes, it is as if we are now taking a break and enjoying a rest from the otherwise intense suffering of those realms. So we need to acknowledge that. If we don't utilise this opportunity in a proper way, the immense suffering we have previously experienced in the lower realms might continue in the future. Therefore we can't afford to be complacent; we really need to take on board that this is just a mere rest from the otherwise intense sufferings of the lower realms, and that we need to utilise these conditions now to the best of our ability.

So rejoicing is an incredibly profound practice and we should not underestimate its value. There are many different ways of rejoicing in the virtues, good qualities, status and so forth of others, as well as our own good deeds, virtues and merits of the past, present and future. In particular, we should keep in mind that rejoicing is a really practical practice that helps subdue our own mind and relieve a lot of unnecessary angst.

If we think about it, whenever we feel mentally unsettled, we will notice that it is very much related to what we see and hear about others. We may see others doing very well and being successful and so forth, or hear about their achievements, which can cause us to feel very uncomfortable and unsettled, and create much mental pain. Then, out of jealousy, we may start to engage in criticism and so forth. So a lot of vices arise out of not being able to bear the good qualities and successes of others.

If we can really take on board the practice of rejoicing, then all of this unnecessary angst can be overcome. The achievements of others will no longer bother us because our mind will be happy and joyful about their achievements. If, whenever we see or hear about others doing well, we can immediately relate that to the fact that they are experiencing the good results of their past virtues and merits, and feel joyful about that, then that can really help to settle down our own mind.

As mentioned previously, it is very easy to develop a sense of pride in our own good deeds, virtues and achievements. Such egotistical pride destroys whatever virtues and merits we have otherwise accumulated. It is said that all of the Buddha's 84,000 teachings serve as an antidote to overcome the ego. So we need to understand how the practice of rejoicing is a means to overcome pride. When we develop a genuine sense of rejoicing, it helps to subdue the mind. Rather than feeling elated and pompous, we should feel grateful about having this opportunity. We should not be content with whatever skill or virtue we have developed but rather foster a keen wish to engage in practices to further develop ourselves. In this way we can see there are great benefits in this practice.

It would be really wonderful if we could find the means to overcome that which causes mental agony, such as a strong sense of pride as well as jealousy. There are those who have confided in me, 'I suffer from a strong ego'. When one acknowledges how ego hinders one's development, one can see how it is a great obstacle. Any simple practice that overcomes the agony and pangs of pride and jealousy, like the practice of rejoicing, is truly wonderful and of immense benefit.

1.1.2. Rejoicing in the virtues that are the causes of mere liberation, and in their effects

Here the virtues that one is rejoicing in are the causes for mere liberation. One needs to understand that in this context liberation refers to the liberation of hearers and solitary realisers from samsara or the cyclic existence. The very meaning of liberation is freedom. What are hearers and solitary realisers free from? From being bound to cyclic existence by karma and delusions. The analogy is of a person who is bound by a rope to a pole, who will gain his freedom when freed from those bonds. In applying the analogy, karma and delusions are like the rope which binds the person to the contaminated aggregates, likened to the pole, and we are the ones who are bound to contaminated aggregates by karma and delusions. Thus we experience various types of suffering as a result of being bound by karma and delusions to our own contaminated aggregates. That is how we need to understand the analogy of being bound by karma and delusions, and thus having to experience the various types of suffering in cyclic existence. So the state of liberation is freedom from cyclic existence.

Mere liberation indicates that the virtues specified here are the virtues that are the cause for liberation from the sufferings of cyclic existence, but not the ultimate state of liberation, which is enlightenment.

The verse relating to this outline is:

2. *I rejoice in the accumulation of virtue
That becomes the cause for enlightenment.
I rejoice in the definite liberation
Of embodied beings from the sufferings of cyclic existence.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

I also rejoice in the accumulation of the virtue which becomes the cause for the enlightenment of the hearers and self-liberators, such as the virtues that harmonise with liberation.

As mentioned previously, in this context virtue refers specifically to the virtues that harmonise with liberation. The accumulation of virtue refers to all of the virtues that are held with renunciation. Hearers and self-liberators achieve liberation by engaging in the ten virtues and the practices of the three higher trainings, which are morality, meditation and wisdom, on the basis of renunciation. So here we rejoice in our virtues that are in harmony with liberation, without any sense of pride, and we develop a joyful state of mind in having had the opportunity to accumulate such virtues.

Next comes rejoicing in the result, about which Gyaltsab Je says:

I also rejoice in the attainment of definite liberation from the sufferings of cyclic existence by embodied beings as a result of that virtue.

The sufferings of cyclic existence refers in general to the suffering of cyclic existence, and more specifically to having overcome pervasive compounded suffering, which serves as the basis for the other two types of suffering. The state of liberation is obtained when one is completely free from pervasive compounded suffering. One rejoices in the attainment of liberation from the sufferings of cyclic existence by the embodied beings, arhats or foe destroyers, the hearers and solitary realisers. So here rejoicing does not relate to ourselves, as we have not yet obtained liberation. The term definite liberation indicates that we need to rejoice in others having obtained that state. As we have not obtained liberation it refers to beings such as the hearers and solitary realisers and arhats, who have definitely achieved this state.

The practical benefit of rejoicing in this way is that it will establish an imprint in our mind to obtain the state of liberation ourselves. When we feel joyful and happy about others obtaining that state, we are acknowledging the great value of the achievement of that state of liberation, which is the state of being completely free from suffering.

Rejoicing like this encourages us to accumulate virtues which are held by renunciation. Any virtues we accumulate that are not held or based upon the mind of renunciation will merely become a cause for obtaining higher status. Rather than being completely free from the actual sufferings of samsara, higher status is only a temporary release from the intense sufferings of the lower realms.

In comparison, the virtues which are not held or based on the mind of renunciation are not of much value. This encourages us to ensure that when we engage in virtue, it is based on a mind of renunciation, which means directing one's virtues towards the goal of being free from all the sufferings of cyclic existence, rather than just a temporary release from the suffering of the lower realms.

From this presentation we can also derive a greater understanding of the presentation of the three principals of the path, which are renunciation, the mind of enlightenment or bodhicitta, and the realisation of emptiness.

- Virtues cannot serve as a cause for obtaining liberation if they are not held by the mind of renunciation. So the mind of renunciation is an essential element of the path, because it will ensure that whatever practice one does becomes a means to obtain the state of freedom from the suffering of cyclic existence.
- For any practice to become a cause for obtaining enlightenment, it has to be accompanied by the mind of awakening or bodhicitta. This altruistic mind ensures our practice of virtues and merits becomes the cause to obtain enlightenment. In other words, enlightenment is achieved in dependence on the merit accumulated held with the altruistic mind of bodhicitta.
- The realisation of emptiness ensures that whatever practice we do becomes an antidote to the very root of all our suffering, which is grasping at the self. Without the realisation of emptiness, we cannot overcome the grasping at the self.

That is why renunciation, bodhicitta and the realisation of emptiness are referred to as the three principal aspects of the path.

1.1.3. Rejoicing in the causes of highest enlightenment, and in their effects

The next two verses cover this heading

3. *I also rejoice in the enlightenment of the protectors
And in the grounds of the conqueror's children.*
4. *In the ocean of virtue that is the mind generation,
Which works for the happiness of all sentient beings,
And in the actions benefiting sentient beings
I rejoice with pleasure.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

I also rejoice in the complete enlightenment of the protectors of migrants, and in the ten grounds of the Conqueror's children.

Here, complete enlightenment has the connotation that there is no enlightenment greater than the full enlightenment of Buddhahood. Nothing can surpass that final state of enlightenment.

The next part of the commentary reads:

I also rejoice with joy in the causes of these, the ocean of virtue that is the mind generation for complete enlightenment, which works for the happiness of all sentient beings, and also in the actions that benefit sentient beings.

Having presented the ultimate state of enlightenment and the ten grounds of the Conqueror's children, the commentary explains that the causes of these are firstly, the ocean of virtue that is the mind generation for complete enlightenment. The mind generation of complete enlightenment refers to the bodhicitta that is developed within the mental continuum of bodhisattvas. This bodhicitta is the cause of a great ocean of virtues, which indicates an incredible amount of virtue that bodhisattvas accumulate by working solely for the happiness of all sentient beings.

The second cause, also in the actions that benefit sentient beings, specifically relates to the actions or the deeds of the bodhisattvas which, as mentioned many times previously, are the six perfections. One thus acknowledges the great deeds of the bodhisattvas in practising the six perfections: the extent of their generosity, the deeds practised by the bodhisattvas to benefit sentient beings; the great extent of their morality and ethics that the bodhisattvas observe in order to benefit sentient beings; and likewise their patience, joyous effort, meditation and wisdom. Recalling the incredible deeds arising from engaging in the practices of the six perfections, one develops a genuine sense of appreciation and rejoices in the incredible deeds and merits of the bodhisattvas. As I have mentioned many times over, a glance summary of the bodhisattva path contains these two aspects: a being who is endowed with the mind of enlightenment or bodhicitta, and who engages in the actions of the six perfections. The way to rejoice about this is then explained in the commentary:

On all of these I meditate with clear faith that is combined with mental happiness, and rejoice with pleasure.

So the way to rejoice is by meditating or contemplating these two aspects of bodhisattvas with clear faith. Of the different types of faith, clear faith refers to having a sound understanding of the qualities, combined with a sense of happiness and joy in acknowledging their great deeds. This is the way to rejoice in the causes of highest enlightenment and in their effects.

The different aspects of rejoicing are not too obscure. They are quite easy to understand and comprehend, so we can go through the following verses quite rapidly. Keep in mind that the practice of rejoicing is essential, a point specifically indicated when we take the bodhisattva vows when these lines are recited:

I take refuge in the Three Jewels
I confess all my negativities individually, and I rejoice in the good deeds of myself and others.

As explained in the teachings, in order to develop even an aspirational mind of bodhicitta, the two main conditions need to be intact: purifying one's negativities, and accumulating merit. The rejoicing specified here is one of the optimum methods for accumulating merit, and that is the significance of the practice of rejoicing.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་ལྷན་པ་ལ་འཇམ་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

19 November 2013

Based on the motivation that we generated with the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in the practice of meditation. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment myself, so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

In previous sessions we went into quite a bit of detail about the significance and purpose of rejoicing, and it is important to remember those points.

1.2. Requesting to turn the wheel of Dharma

The verse relating to the next limb of the seven limb practice reads:

5. *To the buddhas of all directions
I request with my palms folded:
Please light the lamp of Dharma
For sentient beings confused in the darkness of suffering.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je begins his explanation of this verse as follows:

The respectful request is made with palms folded to the buddhas of all the directions, who became enlightened recently and have not started to teach the Dharma yet:

This also relates to the life story of Buddha Shakyamuni. After he became enlightened the Buddha didn't teach the Dharma right away but remained in meditation for seven weeks. It is said that the gods Brahma and Indra requested him to turn the wheel of Dharma. Brahma offered a thousand spoked golden wheel while Indra offered a right turning conch shell, which to this day is quite rare, and together they exhorted the Buddha to teach proclaiming, 'You engaged in amazing great deeds in the past and as a result have now surpassed all practices and have become fully enlightened. We, the people of Magadha¹, are capable of listening well, we are of sound mind and have intelligence and faith, request you to please turn the wheel of Dharma for the benefit of all'. The Buddha accepted this request and gave his first teaching, thus turning the wheel of Dharma. I have already explained this in detail in previous teachings, so you can refer to your notes and the transcripts.

Of course, because of their great compassion, enlightened beings will naturally and spontaneously teach the Dharma to benefit sentient beings, regardless of any request being made. However, requesting Buddha Shakyamuni to turn the wheel of Dharma illustrates the eagerness to receive the Dharma. It also establishes an auspicious interdependent connection with the teacher, thereby ensuring that the Dharma teaching benefits the listeners and becomes the means to subdue their minds and accumulate great virtue. So making this request is very meaningful and of great benefit. As one of the seven limb practices, it is also the means for accumulating great and extensive merit.

While making the request, the physical gesture should be as indicated in the commentary; a respectful manner with one's palms folded. When doing this practice it is appropriate to visualise that one is presenting a thousand spoked golden wheel as an offering to request the buddhas and one's gurus to turn the wheel of Dharma. As explained extensively in the gor chor preliminary practice, when making the request to turn the wheel of Dharma, one visualises numerous bodies of oneself—as many bodies as there are enlightened beings—and a replica of oneself in front of each and every enlightened being requesting them to turn the wheel of Dharma. This visualisation is a supreme means to accumulate vast and extensive merit.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues with the actual request:

Please light the lamp of scriptural and realised Dharma that clarifies the path to liberation, for the purpose of sentient beings who suffer and who are confused in the darkness of ignorance.

Having said that one makes a respectful request, the commentary then indicates that the request is for the purpose of sentient beings who suffer, and who are confused in the darkness of ignorance. As indicated here, the request is specifically to light the lamp of scriptural and realised Dharma that clarifies the path to liberation. Here, the lamp is an analogy for the scriptural and realised Dharma that dispels the inner darkness of ignorance within sentient beings, which is the cause of all suffering. In accordance with the gor chor preliminary practice, a mandala is traditionally offered at this point to accompany the request. One then imagines that the buddhas are actually accepting the request.

We need to understand that this practice of requesting the buddhas to turn the wheel of the Dharma is a means to accumulate extensive merit for ourselves. It is also said to be a supreme antidote for overcoming the negativities of disparaging the Dharma, which is one of the heaviest negativities that one can incur. Engaging in this practice will purify such negativities. Furthermore, one's wrong views, held due to ignorance and so forth, will also be purified, so that in all future lives wrong views will not be generated in one's mental continuum. In addition, one will not be separated from the light of the Dharma.

1.3. Requesting not to pass beyond sorrow

This again establishes an auspicious interdependent connection with the buddhas and our teachers. Here we request them to remain with us, rather than showing the aspect of passing into nirvana or passing beyond sorrow. The explanation in the commentary is quite clear, so there is no need to clarify much.

Since we engage in the seven limb practice regularly it is really worthwhile to fully understand the practice and its significance. For example, we do the Ganden Lha Gyama prayer regularly in our sessions here, which consists of the seven limb practice. It is good to note however that in the Ganden Lha Gyama prayer the request not to pass beyond sorrow and remain steadily with us is presented before requesting to turn the wheel of Dharma.

The relevant verse is:

6. Requesting with palms folded
The conquerors wishing to pass beyond sorrow
To not place these migrators in blindness
And remain for uncountable eons.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

The request with folded palms is made to the conquerors who wish to go beyond sorrow:

Please do not cause the wisdom eye of these migrators to be blinded by ignorance. Rather, please remain for uncountable eons to illuminate the darkness of ignorance.

As mentioned previously, the buddhas and the enlightened beings may show the aspect of going beyond sorrow. So here we are requesting them to remain with us as our guides and not pass beyond sorrow. Again, the request is made with one's palms folded at one's heart.

The actual request is, Please do not cause the wisdom eye of these migrators to be blinded by ignorance. Rather, please remain for uncountable eons to illuminate the darkness of ignorance. So we are requesting the conquerors to remain with us for many eons in order to remove the darkness from sentient beings who are blinded by ignorance.

The immediate personal benefit derived from this practice of requesting not to pass beyond sorrow is that one establishes the cause to attain the state of immortality. It is said that a supreme practice to ensure one's own long life is to request a lama to live long. Furthermore, it is an antidote to overcome the negativities that one has accumulated through losing faith in the guru, which might include disparaging or upsetting the guru, or inflicting any kind of harm on the guru's body and so forth.

We have covered the benefits in brief although there are many more benefits that can be enumerated.

1.4. Dedicating virtues

This is subdivided into four:

- 1.4.1. General dedication
- 1.4.2. Dedication for the sick
- 1.4.3. Dedication to alleviate hunger and thirst
- 1.4.4. Dedication for the fulfilment of all wishes

As we can see, these are really beneficial aspirations.

I recall that when the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargye was teaching at the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives in Dharamsala, he would encourage his students to regularly recite the Seven Limb Prayer with a very melodious tune.

Geshe-la then sang the first two verses of dedication using a tune that he said was very similar.

1.4.1. General dedication

The verse under this heading reads:

7. Having thus done all of this,
Whatever virtue I have accumulated,

May through it all sufferings
Of all sentient beings be cleared away.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Through these virtues, from making offerings up to making requests, as well as all other virtues that I have accumulated, may the suffering of all sentient beings be cleared away.

The virtues from making offerings up to making requests that are to be dedicated are those that are accumulated from the first six of the seven limb practices. The first three limbs, prostrations, offerings and confession, were the main focus of the second chapter, and we have just completed rejoicing, requesting to turn the wheel of Dharma, and requesting not to pass beyond sorrow. Now comes the final limb, which is to dedicate these practices.

As well as the specific virtues accumulated through these practices, one also dedicates all other virtues that one has accumulated in the past, thus dedicating all one's accumulated virtues to clearing away all suffering of all sentient beings. This suffices as a general dedication.

In summary, all of the virtues that have been accumulated, from the specific practices such as making offerings and so forth, are dedicated towards the end of completely clearing away all the suffering of sentient beings. This also shows the purpose for accumulating virtue. One accumulates virtue so that one can dedicate it to the alleviation of the suffering of all sentient beings. So here we are being shown in a very succinct way the purpose of accumulating virtue and merit.

As presented in the yor chor preliminary practice, dedications are made for the achievement of the ultimate state of complete enlightenment; for the long life of one's gurus; for one to be always held in the guru's care, i.e. always under the guidance of the guru; for the Buddha's teachings to expand and flourish; and to always be with the Buddha's teachings in all of one's future lives. This encompasses the general dedication of one's practice.

As I have explained previously, in order to dedicate a practice one has to have accumulated a root virtue. This means that one has to have accumulated some virtue in order to make a dedication. All dedications can be aspirations, whereas all aspirations are not necessarily dedications.

1.4.2. Dedication for the sick

The verse under this heading reads:

8. Until all migrators who are sick,
Are cured from their disease,
May I be their medicine, physician,
And their nurse.

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Through the power of these merits may I be the medicine, physician and the nurse for the sick migrators until they are cured from their disease.

Through the power of these merits can relate to the merits that one has accumulated with the specific seven limb practice as presented here, as well as all the merit that one has accumulated in the past. The specific dedication is that, due to these merits, may I be the medicine, physician and the nurse. These aspirations are not just a mere wish. By dedicating one's merits in such a way, we are implanting the seed in our mind to be able to actually help those who are in need, such as the sick. By making such dedications now in the form of aspirations, we will be able to assist the sick as doctors, nurses and so forth in the future, when we acquire the right conditions. These aspirations by the great bodhisattva Shantideva to directly benefit those who are sick are incredibly vast. When we dedicate our merits it helps us to accumulate the causes to help others in this way.

Again, we can recall the life story of Buddha Shakyamuni, who personally nursed the sick. Out of his great compassion, Buddha Shakyamuni led by example and showed how to benefit others, such as by personally taking care of the sick and disadvantaged. So it is important for us to make dedications and aspirations such as, 'May I be able to assist those who are sick and impoverished', and 'May I be able to be of service to them until all sickness is completely alleviated'.

1.4.3. Dedication to alleviate hunger and thirst

The verse relating to this reads:

9. *With a rain of food and drink
May I clear the suffering of hunger and thirst.
During the intermediate eon of famine
May I become food and drink.*

The explanation in Gyaltsab Je's commentary is not too obscure and is easy to understand.

May I be able to clear away all harm of hunger and thirst with a rain of various foods and drink for all those that are hungry and thirsty.

At the time of the intermediate eon of famine, one of the three intermediate eons, may I be able to pacify the hunger and thirst of sentient beings by becoming food and drink for them.

As with previous dedication, the dedication is also in the form of an aspiration. One of the three intermediate eons is the eon of famine. So we are making an aspiration for that specific time, 'May I turn into food and drink to pacify the hunger and thirst of sentient beings'. We can see the great extent of the bodhisattvas' intention to benefit sentient beings just from these aspirations.

In the event that we become a skilled doctor or a nurse in the future, then when the conditions are appropriate we will be able to benefit those in our care. Even in these times we find doctors and nurses who are genuinely kind and caring, and who really benefit the sick and their patients really respect them. Their capacity to benefit others comes not just from their skills but from their compassionate mind, which is the result of previous aspirations and prayers. So if we develop these aspirations and make these dedications now, we will definitely have the capacity to benefit others at the appropriate time. There is an indication of this in the words accomplishing magnificent prayers, in the short long life prayer for Lama Zopa Rinpoche. As with any other practice, it is good to relate to what accomplishing prayers actually means.

1.4.4. Dedication for the fulfilment of all wishes

The root text reads:

10. *May I become an inexhaustible treasure
For destitute and poor sentient beings,
And abide as various requisites and necessities
In front of them.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

For the sentient beings who are destitute and lack the requisites and necessities of life, may I become a treasure that is inexhaustible despite being used. May I abide effortlessly in front of them as the various necessities they need.

Again, the dedication is in the form of an aspiration. Here the aspiration is that one's merits will be a means to fulfil the needs of sentient beings who lack the requisites and necessities, by becoming a treasure vase that is inexhaustible. In other words, we are aspiring to become an inexhaustible treasure vault, which will naturally replenish itself no matter how much you take out of it.

May I abide effortlessly in front of them as the various necessities they need means being able to spontaneously and effortlessly fulfil the needs of those who are deprived. The specific connotation of effortlessly is that, while one might have an inexhaustible treasure vault, there might be some hesitation in using that wealth if effort is required to do so. If there is effort involved we might not be so inclined to use those resources to benefit others. So effortlessly has the specific indication that one has no hesitation and will be naturally and spontaneously able to give to others in need.

1.5. An auxiliary of the perfection of generosity: training in the thought of giving away one's body, possessions and roots of virtue

In order to be generous we first need to train our mind in generosity, such as when we do the tong len practice of giving and taking, where we give away our body, possessions and virtues.

As indicated here, we are initially training in the thought of giving away our body, possessions and roots of virtue. The significance of training one's mind in doing these practices is that there will be no hesitation and no sense of miserliness when it comes to actually giving. Without that training we might develop miserliness or hesitation when we give to others. So training the mind in the thought of giving is most important.

Having covered some specific dedications, it is good to come back to the significance of dedication in general. It is said that dedication in general is an antidote for overcoming negativities that one has incurred through holding wrong views, specifically the wrong view that there are no past or future lives, and wrong views in relation to the cause and effect of karma.

When one makes a dedication towards the achievement of complete enlightenment then imprints are implanted in one's mind to obtain the four enlightened bodies of a buddha. We need to understand that someone who does not believe in past and future lives, and who has the wrong view about karma, would not engage in any kind of dedication to benefit the future lives. Because they have no belief in the positive effect of karma for good deeds, the thought of dedicating towards future lives would not occur to them. When we intentionally engage in a dedication practice it actually serves as an antidote for overcoming negativities otherwise incurred from these wrong views held in the past.

This section of the chapter is subdivided into three:

1.5.1. Training in the thought of giving away one's body, possessions and roots of virtue

1.5.2. Dedicating it to be the cause of inexhaustible virtue

1.5.3. Dedicating it to be the cause of enjoyment

1.5.1. Training in the thought of giving away one's body, possessions and roots of virtue

This is further subdivided into three:

1.5.1.1. The way of giving

1.5.1.2. The reason why one should definitely give

1.5.1.3. How to practice after the offering

1.5.1.1. THE WAY OF GIVING

The verse relating to this is:

11. *Also my body, possessions
And all virtues of the three times
I will give away without regret
To achieve the purpose of all sentient beings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Also my body and possessions, such as food and drink, and all my virtues of the three times that are related to and contained in the three bases, I offer with a mind free from regret and dependence, to achieve the temporary and ultimate goals of sentient beings.

In relation to the explanations here, one is again training one's mind in the thought to give away one's body and possessions, such as food and drink.

The three times refers to the past, present and future. One could not however be generous with food that has already been consumed in the past. You can't say, 'Oh, I will give you the lunch that I had yesterday.' How could you possibly give away food that you have already consumed? However one can be generous with food in the present and in the future. You can say, 'I will share my lunch with you tomorrow', or 'I will give you some food tomorrow', and it would not be a lie if you actually intended to do that. So dedicating in this way has a sense of being a promise.

- One can definitely dedicate virtues accumulated in the past. Even though the actual accumulation of the virtue occurred in the past, what remains of those positive actions is their imprints. Whenever one creates karma, an imprint remains in one's mental continuum. Therefore, the virtues of the past, refers to the positive imprints of the virtues accumulated in the past.
- Likewise the virtues one is accumulating in the present can definitely be dedicated.
- Dedicating now is also a way to encourage oneself to accumulate more virtue in the future, which will be a very significant means to accumulate merit, which is definitely significant.

Another point to note is that when one mentally offers food, possessions and so forth to the Sangha or others, it is permissible to consume food that has actually been offered, if it is for the purpose of benefitting others.

The three bases refers to the practices of the three trainings, i.e. generosity, morality and meditation.

The purpose of engaging in the practices of giving away one's possessions, food and drink and virtues is to fulfil the temporary and ultimate goals of all sentient beings.

1.5.1.2. THE REASON WHY ONE SHOULD DEFINITELY GIVE

We can leave this for the next session.

My intention is to try to finish this chapter by the end of this year.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

26 November 2013

Based on the motivation that we have just generated, we can now engage in our meditation practice.

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment myself, so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

1.5.1. Training in the thought of giving away one's body, possessions and roots of virtue

In our last session we introduced the topic of how we should give away our body, possessions and virtues of the three times.

The relevant verse reads:

11. *Also my body, possessions
And all virtues of the three times
I will give away without regret
To achieve the purpose of all sentient beings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Also my body and possessions, such as food and drink, and all my virtues of the three times that are related to and contained in the three bases, I offer with a mind free from regret and dependence, to achieve the temporary and ultimate goals of sentient beings.

As explained in the commentary, one offers one's body, possessions and virtues to all sentient beings, for the purpose of achieving the temporary and ultimate goals of sentient beings. Giving should be free from regret or dependence on fame and so forth. Being free from regret, means that the gift should be free of any taint of miserliness. Any thoughts of, 'Oh, maybe I gave too much', or 'I wish I hadn't given that', would not be pure giving. Nor would giving in dependence on fame and so forth be a pure form of giving. In brief, giving should be done with the motivation of achieving either the temporary purpose of obtaining high status and liberation, or the ultimate purpose of achieving enlightenment. We need to keep that in mind.

One of the implications of being free from dependence is not to be dependent on a good result solely for ourselves, such as giving a meagre portion of our possessions with the intention of getting back more in return. Giving with such contrived intentions is not a pure practice of giving. Giving in dependence can also refer to giving in dependence on a greater return in the future, such as giving with the intention to accumulate the karma that will yield a good result in the future, just for ourselves.

That would be contrived giving because it is not free from self interest, i.e. it will be giving merely to achieve one's own purposes. The main point to understand is that if giving is contrived with impure thoughts of gaining good results merely for oneself, then that giving cannot be a cause for liberation and enlightenment. In fact, it is even doubtful whether it would be a cause for high status in one's future life.

We need to understand giving in the full context of the perfection of giving. As beginners we might not have developed the capacity to actually give away our body, possessions, and virtues right now; nevertheless these practices are presented as a significant method to help trainees develop the mind of giving.

As explained previously, the perfection of generosity can be divided into two stages. The resultant state of the perfection of generosity is where generosity has actually been perfected, thus reaching the stage of unsurpassed giving. The causal aspect of the perfection of generosity is to engage in acts of generosity while one is still training one's mind on the path to enlightenment. So the resultant name perfection of generosity is given to the cause—every act of giving, however meagre, being motivated by bodhicitta. Thus, we need to feel encouraged to practise generosity. We need to understand that this is how we train our mind to eventually have no hesitation in giving away our body, possessions and virtues for the benefit of others.

Another significant point is that this is a practice that overcomes self-grasping. Because of our self-grasping, we hold on to things very tightly, and so we are only able to give away limited amounts of our possessions and virtues, or our body. The stronger the sense of self-grasping, the more difficult it is to part from them.

If we begin by training in the thought of giving, then, as we develop the practice further, we can reach the point where we can give selflessly, without any hint of self-grasping. When one reaches the point where there is no hesitation in giving one's body, possessions and virtues for the benefit of sentient beings, then one has overcome self-grasping. If we are able to give away the very basis of our self-grasping, which is our body, our possessions and our virtues, then how could self-grasping exist alongside of that? It is just not possible. What we need to understand is that training in the perfection of giving is ultimately a means to overcome self-grasping, which is a much more profound way of understanding the benefit of practising generosity.

1.5.1.2. THE REASON ONE SHOULD DEFINITELY GIVE

This section is divided into two:

1.5.1.2.1. By giving up attachment to everything and offering one goes beyond misery or sorrow

1.5.1.2.2. Making offerings to sentient beings is appropriate as they are the supreme field for generosity

1.5.1.2.1. By giving up attachment to everything and offering one goes beyond misery, or sorrow

Here we can get the sense of the significance of the practice of generosity just from the outline. When the practice of generosity overcomes attachment, then by virtue of overcoming attachment at its very root, one will definitely obtain the state of liberation. As mentioned previously, generosity is definitely connected with an understanding of selflessness, because without overcoming grasping at the self, one cannot possibly uproot attachment to one's body, possessions and virtues.

What I am sharing here is a more profound understanding of the practice, which is that by completely abandoning grasping at the self, one can overcome attachment to one's body, possessions and virtue. Then, as mentioned previously, there is no hesitation in giving, which in turn becomes a means to achieve the state beyond misery, or liberation. This is how we need to develop our understanding on a more profound level.

As we have learned from previous teachings, the essence of the path that is the main cause for achieving liberation, is gaining the realisation of selflessness, or emptiness. Thus emptiness, or selflessness, is the core realisation that one needs to obtain in order to achieve liberation. That is a key point to remember in this context.

The relevant lines of the root text are:

*12ab. Giving everything one goes beyond misery
My mind achieves the going beyond misery.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

My mind wants to achieve the non-abiding state beyond misery, and giving up one's body, possessions and all roots of virtue for the purpose of others, enables one to achieve that aim.

The purpose of others indicates that the giving has to be free from self-interest, and that one is giving entirely for the benefit of others. When it is free from self-interest, generosity enables one to achieve one's aim, which is to attain the non-abiding state beyond misery. From the very outset one practises with the aim of achieving that state beyond misery, which has two levels. One level of the non-abiding state beyond misery is where the deluded obscurations have been overcome. The other level is having overcome both the deluded obscurations as well as the obscurations to omniscience, i.e. the imprints of the delusions, and thus obtaining the ultimate state of enlightenment.

When taking the vows of ordination as a monk or nun the novice says, 'I take these vows with the intention of seeking liberation', so at the very outset the purpose of taking the vows is indicated. They are made with the intention of seeking liberation, which is why these vows are called the self-liberation vows. In fact any individual can seek liberation. If we have the mind that wants to achieve the non-abiding state beyond misery, then we can achieve that goal by engaging in the practice of giving up one's body, possessions and virtues for the purpose of others.

The commentary concludes with:

Hence it is appropriate to give up everything.

So giving one's body, possessions and merits is an appropriate practice.

1.5.1.2.2. Making offerings to sentient beings is appropriate as they are the supreme field for generosity

As sentient beings are the supreme field to accumulate merit, it is appropriate to make offerings to them.

The remainder of verse twelve reads

*12cd. To surrender everything at once
Is the supreme offering to sentient beings.*

The explanation in Gyaltsab Je's commentary is quite clear:

To surrender everything at once is equal to offering it, and to offer to sentient beings is the supreme offering, because through this offering one attains enlightenment.

Surrendering everything is equal to offering everything, but specifically making that offering to sentient beings is the most supreme form of offering. The main point here is that by offering to sentient beings, one attains enlightenment.

As explained here, the reason why sentient beings are supreme objects for practising generosity is because through the practice of generosity one will obtain the ultimate state of enlightenment. The very fact that we are able to engage in practices of purification and the accumulation of merit is due to the existence of sentient beings. As one of the lines in the Eight Verses of Mind Training reads, 'Sentient beings are more precious than a wish-fulfilling jewel'. As explained in these teachings, sentient beings are extremely precious because by relying on them we will gain all our temporary and ultimate goals.

For example, meeting our temporary needs of food, clothing, and shelter is dependent on other sentient beings. Furthermore, the practices that are the causes for achieving liberation and the ultimate state of enlightenment are also dependent on sentient beings. Without sentient beings we could not engage in the practice of the six perfections—generosity, morality, patience, joyful effort, concentration and wisdom. We engage in these practices only in relation to sentient beings, so sentient beings are the cause for us to achieve the ultimate state of enlightenment.

If we wish to acquire wealth, we need to depend on others who have wealth—without the wealth of others how could we acquire wealth ourselves? Furthermore, to acquire knowledge we have to depend on teachers and instructors who can impart that knowledge. Thus, to achieve anything we have to depend on others.

As Shantideva mentions later on in this text, the moment we see sentient beings we need to generate the thought, 'It is through these beings that I will achieve enlightenment; thus I behold them with great love'. It is with this understanding that one looks at others with eyes of loving kindness. As Shantideva says so very succinctly, the moment we see any sentient beings we need to remember, 'These are the very beings that will help me achieve my ultimate goal of enlightenment'.

So the appropriate way to relate to any sentient being that we encounter is to recall their great kindness, and view them with loving kindness. Although these are very profound ways of training our mind they are quite easy to understand, and as we learn these techniques and methods we can slowly train our mind in appropriate conduct towards others. These are supreme methods to maintain our positive attitude towards other sentient beings.

If we are really keen on practising patience we will welcome those who test our patience! Otherwise how would we ever know what levels of patience we have actually developed? So rather than considering someone who irritates us as an enemy, or someone to be avoided, we can welcome the opportunity to further develop our practice of patience. Then we can definitely hold them dear, seeing them as a spiritual friend, a teacher, and an aid to our practice. When we really think about these truly amazing methods for developing our mind, we gain a sense of how astonishing the bodhisattva practices are. Then, at the very least, we can be inspired to undertake the same training. The great master Atisha was known to have a very irritating attendant. When others commented on that, Atisha said, 'It is thanks to him that I am rapidly developing my practice of patience!'

1.5.1.3. HOW TO PRACTISE AFTER THE OFFERING

Having made our offerings, how do we practise? What attitudes should we develop?

This has three subdivisions:

1.5.1.3.1. Henceforth I give up the idea of having control over my body

1.5.1.3.2. Explaining the meaning of this extensively

1.5.1.3.3. Relating it to suitable action

1.5.1.3.1. Henceforth I give up the idea of having control over my body

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section with this query:

How should one act after having offered one's body.

The answer to that is presented in this verse:

13. *Since I have offered this body
To all sentient beings, to do with it as they please,
They can always kill it, criticise it,
Or beat it; whatever pleases them.*

The commentary goes on to explain:

Now that I have offered this body to all sentient beings to do with it as they please, it depends on what pleases them. They can always kill it, insult it with words or physically beat it and so on. I must give up attachment to my body and completely give up my anger towards others.

As the commentary explains, I have offered this body to all sentient beings to do with it as they please, which means you offer your body for others to do whatever they please with it. Since our body now depends on them, whether they choose to kill us or insult us or beat us is up to them. Thus by giving up attachment to one's body, one will completely give up any anger towards others when they inflict any kind of harm.

We can actually derive a great deal of inspiration from these words. We can see that that these extensive forms of dedications are also related to the practice of patience. When we reach the point of actually giving away our body, possessions, and virtues for the sake of others, then how could we become angry when this offer is taken up? There would be no reason to be angry when others harm one's body or criticise or insult one, because there is no longer any sense that one's body, possessions and virtues belong to oneself. This is the optimal way to practise patience, as it gives us the means to not hold any grudge, or retaliate when others harm us.

Giving away our body, possessions and even our merits for the sole purpose of benefiting others is a supreme practice that prepares us for the last stages of our life. There will be no sense of attachment, because we will have already given up our body, possessions and even our merits, and dying with a mind free of attachment is the best way to experience death.

Giving away one's virtues for the purpose of others is, in fact, the best means to acquire an inexhaustible stock of merit. We can easily understand the process of using our body and possessions because they are tangible objects. But how do we use up our virtue? It is said that every pleasant experience is a result of virtue. So whenever we experience a temporary good result we are actually using up our merit and virtue. Whereas, if we dedicate our virtues for the benefit of all sentient beings, then whatever virtue we accumulate will be inexhaustible. So the act of selflessly giving away our virtue to all sentient beings is actually a supreme means to create an inexhaustible amount of virtue.

These practices are supreme methods to further increase our merits. When we understand the deeper benefit of this practice, we will develop a genuine sense of enthusiasm about engaging in the practice. Our strong sense of holding on to our possessions and body and virtues and so forth comes from a very narrow-minded and selfish attitude. Our self-cherishing is likened to an animal's horn, which is hard to its core. So, in order for this hard and tough attitude of selfishness to soften, we need to engage in these practices. When we take these practices to heart and gradually engage in them, then our strong sense of self-cherishing mind will start to loosen and become soft like wool. Indeed our whole demeanour will begin to transform to naturally become more gentle and kind.

1.5.1.3.2. Explaining the meaning of this extensively

14. *Whether they use it for play, amusement
Or to ridicule it,
Since I have already offered it
Why should it concern me?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Since I have already unconditionally given my body to others, they should be able to do with it as they like. Henceforth, why should I concern myself with protecting it, even though they use it for play, amusement or ridicule it.

As the commentary explains, since I have already unconditionally given my body to others they should be able to do whatever they like with it. So why should I concern myself with protecting it, when others try to ridicule or play with it? There are times when people say things in jest that can go down the wrong way, which can be a source of hurt and so forth. If we have a strong sense of clinging to our identity, we are more vulnerable and prone to getting hurt.

The point here is that since we have given our body for the sake of others, then even though they use it for amusement or ridicule, it should not concern us—they can do with it whatever they see fit. So here we can see the relationship between the practice of generosity and the practice of patience. As we have already given our body to others, we will willingly accept their ridicule or use of us as a source of amusement, and not retaliate by becoming angry.

1.5.1.3.3. Relating it to suitable action

This heading refers to ensuring that one's actions are suitable rather than inappropriate.

The next two lines of the verse read:

15ab. *I shall allow them any action
That does not harm them.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

I shall let them do any action with my body that benefits self and others and does not harm self or others at all times, now and in the future.

As the commentary explains, let others use my body with any action that will benefit self or others, and which will not harm self or others. Using the words at all times means now and in the future, referring to both temporary and ultimate benefits. One allows others to use one's body for whatever purpose they wish, as long as it does not cause harm, and brings benefit in this lifetime, as well as forming the basis to refrain from harm while benefitting others in future lifetimes.

1.5.2. Dedicating it to be the source of inexhaustible virtue

This heading has three subdivisions:

1.5.2.1. Dedicating it to be only the cause of the welfare of others

1.5.2.2. Dedicating the thought as the cause for inexhaustibility

1.5.2.3. Dedicating the action as the cause for inexhaustibility

1.5.2.1. DEDICATING IT TO BE ONLY THE CAUSE OF THE WELFARE OF OTHERS

This implies dedicating our practice to only benefit other beings and not cause them the slightest harm.

The next two lines of the verse are:

15cd. *May looking at me
Never be meaningless.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

May it never become the cause for sentient beings to be disappointed when they look to me for help.

These are really incredible aspirations which, if we reflect upon them, are really meaningful and inspiring. This dedication in brief is, may the mere sight of my body be a cause of benefit, and never a cause of harm, and may it never be a cause for others to be disappointed.

1.5.2.2. DEDICATING THE THOUGHT AS THE CAUSE FOR INEXHAUSTIBILITY

The verse relating to this is:

16. *Whether a mind of anger or faith,
Arises, directed at me,
May it become the cause for all their purposes
To be continually fulfilled*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Regardless of whether it is a mind of anger or faith that has arisen, when directed at me may it become the cause that in all lifetimes all their temporary and ultimate aims are achieved.

Here faith can also refer to being appreciated by others. Whether others relate to me out of anger or out of appreciation, may that be a cause for the achievement of all temporary and ultimate aims in all lifetimes. So here is another incredible aspiration for the benefit of others.

1.5.2.3. DEDICATING THE ACTION AS THE CAUSE FOR INEXHAUSTIBILITY

The relevant verse reads:

17. *May whoever affronts me,
Harms me otherwise,
Or backstabs me
Have the fortune of enlightenment.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

May whoever affronts me verbally, or otherwise, physically harms me, or stabs me in the back, may all these actions become the cause for them to have the fortune of attaining the great enlightenment.

The Tibetan term translated here as 'affronts me verbally' has a particular connotation of others criticising you to your face, rather than using slanderous, negative words behind your back. So the aspiration is that when someone harms me verbally in this way, or physically harms me, may all these harmful actions become the cause for them to have the fortune of attaining great enlightenment. We need to remember that these dedications are the great aspirations made by the Conqueror's children, the bodhisattvas.

1.5.3. Dedicating it to be the cause of enjoyment

This section is subdivided into three

1.5.3.1. Dedicating oneself to become the cause of necessities

1.5.3.2. Dedicating for time and expansive actions

1.5.3.3. Dedicating for uninterrupted continuum of object and time

1.5.3.1. DEDICATING ONESELF TO BECOME THE CAUSE OF NECESSITIES

There are three verses in this section of the text.

18. *May I become a protector for the unprotected,
A guide of those travelling along a path,
A ship, ferry or bridge
For those who want to cross.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

May I become thus a protector for those without a protector, in all lives a guide for those travelling along a path, a ship, ferry or bridge for those wishing to cross the waters.

The first aspiration is may I become a protector or refuge for those without a protector and who are in distress.

Next is in all lives may I be a guide for travellers on a path. In the past people like traders and so forth needed to travel long distances on foot, through treacherous, unfamiliar lands with many dangers. So, being a guide was a really useful and beneficial way to benefit others.

Furthermore, may I also be a ship, a ferry and a bridge for those wishing to cross the waters.

This relates to the distance to be crossed. To cross the oceans you need a ship. Over a shorter distance a ferry will suffice to make the crossing, while bridges can be built to cross small creeks and rivers. So the aspiration is to be a means for beings to cross over to the other side of the water.

19. May I become an island for those wishing an island
A place of rest for those who wish to rest
A slave for all embodied beings
Who desire a slave

Here the commentary explains:

May I become dry land for those who wish for an island, a lamp for those who desire a lamp, a resting place for those who desire to rest, a slave for all those who desire a slave.

When people have been at sea for a long time they need to find land where they can rest and replenish their supplies. So for those who desperately need to find land, may I be like an island with nice trees and so forth, for them to rest and enjoy.

Next is a lamp for those who desire a lamp. In ancient times it would be hard, if not impossible, to read texts and so forth in the evening without a lamp. So a lamp is essential to be able to read and study, for example. Thus a lamp can provide the means to benefit others. A more subtle connotation of a lamp is that it that removes the darkness of ignorance.

May I be a resting place for those who desire to take a rest. The Tibetan word mal also implies bedding. So here the aspiration is not only a place to rest but also for bedding, such as mattresses, cushions and for those in need to take a rest.

Lastly the text says, May I be a slave for those who desire to have a slave. The Tibetan word dren, literally translated as slave, doesn't carry a negative connotation. The connotation is more like an obedient assistant. So the dedication is to be an assistant that does everything for those needing help - such as the sick, the impoverished, the weak and the aged - helping them to fulfil all their needs and providing them with what they wish.

After calling for a show of hands of those who would not be going away at Christmas, Geshe-la then asked everyone to make an effort to attend the puja marking the passing away of Lama Tsong Khapa which, he said, would be very beneficial. He said that since there were so many staying home over the break there should not be an empty gumpa.

He reminded us that many have commented how beneficial it was that there were sessions being held over the teaching break. The leader of the puja and classes will be Allys Andrews and it would be good for her to have a few supporters.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

3 December 2013

Based on the motivation we have just generated, we will engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment myself, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

1.5.3 Dedicating it to be the cause of enjoyment

1.5.3.1. DEDICATING ONESELF TO BECOME THE CAUSE OF NECESSITIES (CONT.)

There are three verses under this heading, the first two of which we covered last week. The third verse reads:

20. *May I become a wish-fulfilling jewel, a pure vase,
A knowledge mantra or powerful medicine,
A wish-fulfilling tree or cow
For embodied beings.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je gives this explanation of the verse:

May I be a wish-fulfilling jewel and a pure vase for those desiring food and drink and the like; a knowledge mantra accomplishing the actions of pacifying and increasing and so forth for those wishing to achieve those actions; the great medicine called the extraction of essence, which dispels all sicknesses; a wish-fulfilling tree that gives what is desired, such as food and drink; and a wish-fulfilling cow that can give whatever is desired by embodied beings.

Dedicate in such a way repeatedly.

The first of the aspirations in this verse is to become a wish-fulfilling jewel and a precious or pure vase for those desiring food, drink and the like. A wish-fulfilling jewel is a metaphor for something that is able to provide whatever one wishes for. So dedicating one's virtues to become a wish-fulfilling jewel that fulfils all wishes, hopes and desires is an incredibly noble aspiration. The second metaphor is the mythological pure vase, which is an inexhaustible treasure-like vase that can provide all of the necessities such as food, drink and so forth.

The second aspiration is to be like a knowledge mantra accomplishing the actions of pacifying and increasing and so forth, for those wishing to achieve these actions. There are four specific actions that are accomplished through the great power of mantra as an aid to benefit sentient beings: they are the controlling, wrathful, pacifying and increasing actions. The dedication here is that one may be a knowledge mantra with which these beneficial actions are accomplished.

The next aspiration is to be like the great medicine called the extraction of essence. Medicines that extract the essence of all essentials are a panacea that dispels all sickness.

The next two lines of the verse refer to the mythological treasures of the wish-fulfilling tree that gives what is desired, such as food and drink, followed by the wish-fulfilling cow that can give whatever is desired by embodied beings. These are dedications to fulfil all the necessities of sentient beings. As you will recall, both the wish-granting tree and the wish-fulfilling cow are included in the Long Mandala Offering. The wish-fulfilling tree is also mentioned in the Guru Puja as part of one's visualisation of the merit field.

The final line in the commentary, Dedicate in such a way repeatedly, is an exhortation to dedicate over and over again whatever virtues one has accumulated in the manner indicated in verses eighteen to twenty.

1.5.3.2. DEDICATING FOR EXPANSIVE TIME AND ACTIONS

This heading refers to dedicating that our actions be expansive and timeless.

The relevant verse reads:

21. *Like the elements of earth and so forth,
And like space as well,
May I always be the basis for the many necessities
Of the boundless sentient beings.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation of this verse reads:

May I always become, in many ways, the cause for the necessities of boundless sentient beings, like the four elements of earth, water, fire and wind are the basis for the actions of sentient beings, and similar to space, which is permanent.

From the Stacking of Jewels:

Bodhisattvas work for the welfare of sentient beings like the five elements.

As indicated in the commentary, when bodhisattvas serve sentient beings they become the cause for the necessities of boundless sentient beings like the four elements of earth, water, fire and wind. We can all relate to the fact that the basis of both ourselves and the external world is the four elements, and that nothing can be sustained without these four elements. So the four elements are incredibly vast causes of every material object. Using the four elements as an example indicates the expansive nature of the aspiration to provide the necessities for boundless sentient beings.

The next part of the aspiration is to be like space which is permanent. Just like time, space has no limits, and this is another example indicating the extent to which one aspires to benefit sentient beings.

The commentary quotes from the Stacking of Jewels Sutra as a source, indicating that these are suitable and valid ways of dedicating. The five elements are the elements of earth, water, fire and wind, plus the space element. So the extent of a bodhisattva's wish to benefit sentient beings is the same as that of the five elements, which serve as a basis for all phenomena to function.

The five elements serve as the basis of all phenomena to function, including ourselves.

- The earth element is said to establish the basis and firmness of our existence. It holds everything firmly together. For example, the earth element holds the components of a flower together, just as it does with our bodies;
- The water element nurtures that which is established;
- The fire element helps it to mature;
- The wind element helps it to increase. Another aspect of the wind element is that it allows external substances like plants and so forth and our bodies to remain fresh. Without the wind element, bodies and flowers, for example, would rot and wither away.
- The space element is said to be that which allows phenomena to be established. Without the space element nothing could be established, because there would be no space in which to establish it. For example, you can put a lid on a cup of tea, and it remains there even when the cup is full because of the presence of the space element. Generally within space there is compounded space and un-compounded space. The space in the sky above us is an example of un-compounded space, whereas very tiny particles make up compounded space. This distinction is good to note as well.

The extent to which bodhisattvas work for the sake of sentient beings by providing all the basic necessities is similar to the extent of the five elements establishing all existence. So this extraordinarily expansive dedication of one's merits is an extremely noble dedication. When one has accumulated virtues, then one can dedicate them in this way. However, even as an aspiration it is incredibly worthwhile and meaningful.

The dedications presented here are also a personal instruction on how to engage in everyday practice. People often ask, 'What kind of aspirations should I hold?', 'What are the kind of prayers that I should do?' So if you are in doubt about the kind of prayers, or the extent of how to dedicate your merit, then you need look no further than Shantideva's Bodhicharyavatara which explains very clearly how to make extensive dedications and aspirations. Furthermore, if you wonder about how to engage in the practice of prostrations, then again, you will find the explanation in Shantideva's Bodhicharyavatara. Likewise the Bodhicharyavatara explains how to do confession and purification practices. Rejoicing and requesting the gurus and the buddhas to remain is also explained in this very noble text, as is making requests for turning the wheel of Dharma to ensure the flourishing of the Dharma. So whenever we have a question about practice, we will find it explained very clearly in Shantideva's Bodhicharyavatara. The point here is that the benefit of studying this text is that it is the optimum resource on how to engage in our practices.

1.5.3.3. DEDICATING FOR UNINTERRUPTED CONTINUUM OF OBJECT AND TIME

Basically uninterrupted continuum means to continuously extend one's dedications and aspirations, without any interruptions. This means that nothing should come between one's aspirations, and to the extent they will benefit sentient beings. The verse relating to this heading is:

22. *Likewise, may I be the cause for the livelihood
Of all the realms of sentient beings,
That stretch until the edge of space,
Until they all go beyond misery.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Likewise, may I also become the cause for the livelihood of all the realms of sentient beings, which extend to the edge of space, by benefiting them in infinite ways, until they go beyond misery.

Train the mind like this again and again.

Likewise, may I also become the cause for the livelihood of all the realms of sentient beings, which extend to the edge of space is an indication of vast numbers of sentient beings. One benefits them in infinite ways, until they go beyond misery. That is a reference to the uninterrupted time over which one extends one's dedication—until all sentient beings, who are infinite as space, reach the ultimate state of going beyond misery—which is complete enlightenment. Then the commentary exhorts us to train the mind, or meditate in this way, again and again.

The personal instruction is that we need to take every opportunity to make as many expansive dedications and aspirations as possible. It is through this sort of training that we implant the imprints to actually work for the welfare of sentient beings as extensively as the buddhas and bodhisattvas. We also gain an insight of how the buddhas obtained their state of enlightenment. Thus we get an inkling of the vast activities of the buddhas and bodhisattvas from the fact that they have surpassed these very extensive aspirations.

Here Gyaltsab Je is exhorting us to train our mind again and again. This means that we need to take every opportunity, not just once or twice, but again and again, to familiarise our mind with making these expansive dedications and aspirations. These are the means of a supreme practice.

2. ACTUAL

Having covered the explanations under the first heading in the chapter Preparation, we now come to the second heading, Actual, which explains how to actually take the bodhisattva vows. This is contained in the next two verses.

23. *Just as the previous tathagatas
Generated the mind of enlightenment
And continued in the gradual Trainings of a bodhisattva,*
24. *I too shall generate the mind of enlightenment
For the welfare of sentient beings,
And train step-by-step
In the trainings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

When the previous tathagatas generated the mind of enlightenment they initially generated the supreme wishing bodhicitta in front of the buddhas and bodhisattvas, and then, to take the bodhisattva vows, they generated engaging bodhicitta. Subsequently, they trained and remained in the gradual bodhisattva trainings.

Likewise I, for the temporary and ultimate benefit of sentient beings, either in front of an actual preceptor with pure bodhisattva vows, or in front of invoked buddhas and bodhisattvas, upon the request for attention, shall generate the wishing mind of enlightenment. Likewise, I shall train and remain in the gradual trainings upon having generated an engaging mind.

Repeat the verses three times, either after the preceptor, or, if there is none, after the invoked buddhas and bodhisattvas.

As the commentary explains, we repeat these two verses three times after a preceptor if they are present, or if there is no preceptor, we imagine repeating them after the invoked buddhas and bodhisattvas.

As you should know, there are two stages of generating bodhicitta: aspiring bodhicitta and engaging bodhicitta.

It is when one generates the engaging bodhicitta attitude that one actually takes the bodhisattva vows with all the commitments. Generating the aspiring bodhicitta on the other hand, is not defined by the ritual of recitation. It involves merely generating an altruistic mind such as, 'May I obtain the state of enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings', accompanied by a commitment to not give up the altruistic aspiration to achieve enlightenment; and to adopt the four white dharmas, and abandon the four black dharmas or negativities. These eight dharmas were mentioned in chapter one and your homework then was to find out what they are.

Basically, generating aspirational bodhicitta involves making the commitment to generate that mind of enlightenment three times during the day, and three times during the night, and not to give up that aspiration. As it does not involve making a commitment to uphold all of the bodhisattva vows, it is a mere aspiration and not actually a vow.

Now, can those of you who do the Six-session Guru Practice tell me the line that comes after the four immeasurables?

Student: Not to give up the mind of enlightenment even at the cost of my life.

With aspirational bodhicitta one promises not to give up that aspiration, whereas with engaging bodhicitta, as exemplified in the Six-session Practice, one promises never to forsake those vows even at the cost of one's life. That's the main distinction between aspirational bodhicitta and the actual bodhisattva vows.

Aspiring bodhicitta and engaging bodhicitta can be presented sequentially or simultaneously i.e. at the same time. This is a simultaneous presentation. As His Holiness the Dalai Lama indicated in Sydney earlier this year, when you take the vows sequentially, some lines relate to aspirational bodhicitta and other lines relate specifically to the engaging bodhisattva vows. He then very clearly distinguished the lines containing aspirational bodhicitta from the lines relating to the engaging bodhisattva vows. Do you recall that?

As presented in the Six-session Guru Practice, the manner of taking the vows is to first take refuge, followed by generating the four immeasurable thoughts and then generating aspirational bodhicitta, followed by engaging bodhicitta. Next comes the request to the gurus to please pay attention to us. Then one absorbs the deity and the guru into oneself, and generates great joy. The main point is that the presentation in these two verses can be combined with the Six-session Guru Practice that some of you do regularly. Indeed, it is good to combine the two presentations to gain a complete understanding.

The purpose and manner of taking the vows

Returning to the commentary, when the previous tathagatas generated the mind refers to conquerors such as Shakyamuni Buddha, Mitrukpa, Amitahba, Medicine Buddha and so forth. At the beginning of chapter one there was an extensive explanation of what tathagata means.

Having generated engaging bodhicitta the tathagatas subsequently trained in and remained in the gradual bodhisattva trainings, which include the practices of the six perfections and the four means of gathering disciples. Likewise I indicates that just as the previous bodhisattvas generated aspirational bodhicitta, and then took the engaging bodhisattva vows, followed by engaging in the trainings of the six perfections and the four means of gathering disciples, I too will follow their example. The intention of this practice is for the temporary and ultimate benefit of sentient beings.

One way of taking the vows is in front of an actual preceptor with pure bodhisattva vows. Thus the preceptor should be someone who is endowed with pure bodhisattva vows. It is said that when one takes these vows in front of great pure masters who practise bodhicitta, it will help one to be conscientious about maintaining and upholding those vows. That is because the two mental factors of shame and embarrassment can easily arise when there is danger of breaching those vows. So taking the vows from an actual pure preceptor is quite significant.

If a preceptor is not present, one takes one's vows in front of the invoked buddhas and bodhisattvas. The commentary is clearly indicating that one does not have to rely on the presence of a preceptor in order to take the bodhisattva vows; one can also take the bodhisattva vows in front of the envisioned buddhas and bodhisattvas.

'Upon the request for attention' is another one of the elements of taking the bodhisattva vows. In the Six-session Guru Practice, there is this line: 'O lamas, buddhas and bodhisattvas, please pay attention to me'. So one seeks the attention of the lamas, the buddhas and the bodhisattvas in order to take the bodhisattva vows.

What follows from this is that, I shall generate the wishing mind of enlightenment. One generates the thought, 'For the sake of all sentient beings may I achieve enlightenment', which is aspirational bodhicitta.

Following that generation of aspiring bodhicitta, I shall train and remain in the gradual trainings upon having generated the engaging mind. Thus the engaging mind of bodhicitta is based on the earlier aspiration to achieve enlightenment for all sentient beings. What is added to the aspirational mind is the commitment, 'I will engage in the practices of the six perfections as way to develop my own mind, and engage in the practices of the four means of gathering disciples as a way to benefit others'.

As explained in the commentary, one repeats these two verses three times, and at the end of the third recitation the vows are actually established in one's mental continuum. As explained in the commentary, one repeats these verses either following a preceptor if a preceptor is present, or, if there is no preceptor, imagine repeating it after the invoked buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Of course, I have presented all of this previously, but I don't know how much you have retained. What also needs to be understood is that those doing, for example, the Nyung Nae practice, would take the eight Mahayana precepts in front of the preceptor if there is one present. If there is no preceptor present, then one takes those precepts in front of a visualised Avalokiteshvara; envisioning that one has taken those vows or precepts from Avalokiteshvara himself. Indeed, whenever one wishes to take the Mahayana precepts, it will suffice if one visualises all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, and takes the eight Mahayana precepts in their presence.

In relation to I shall train and remain in the gradual trainings, the term gradual training is as explained by Gyaltsab Rinpoche. There are some variations in other texts, but most versions are quite similar.

The meaning of training gradually

Gyaltsab Je goes on to explain the meaning of training gradually.

The meaning of training gradually: Practices like the generosity of one's body should not be done with an impure mind. Otherwise it becomes a fault. It should be done when it does not become a fault and rather becomes a great accumulation of merit.

Using the example of the practice of generosity as an example, one needs to train first in practising generosity within one's comfort zone, i.e. begin with giving something small. Then increase that generosity gradually, so that even though there is a greater level of generosity it is still comfortable to give.

More specifically one is advised against giving one's body initially, as it could become a fault if one is not properly prepared. The perfect time to give one's body is when one has reached the level of training where it is only a means to accumulate great merit. When one reaches that level of training, it is permissible and appropriate to give one's body. So this presentation explains the meaning of training gradually by using an example.

Gyaltsab Je further clarifies:

Some opponents posit that the meaning of sequential training is that one trains sequentially in the three moralities according to boundary, and this is incorrect.

The three moralities are the morality of restraint, the morality of building up virtue and the morality of benefiting others. According to boundary refers to the fact that some have posited that the morality of restraint is practised during the first path, the path of accumulation; the morality of building up virtue is practised on the path of preparation; and the morality of benefiting others is practised on the Arya paths, from the path of seeing onwards. So the practice of training sequentially refers to assigning each of the three moralities to one of the bodhisattva paths. However that is not correct.

As I have explained previously, all of the bodhisattvas' activities can be subsumed into two main categories: engaging in activities to ripen oneself and engaging in activities to ripen other sentient beings. There are no activities that are not combined in these two.

The morality of restraint and the morality of building up virtue are practices that specifically relate to ripening one's own mental continuum, whereas the morality of benefiting others is an activity of ripening other sentient beings. This is how all the bodhisattvas' activities are subsumed into the three moralities.

The six perfections can also be subsumed into two: those that are mainly to fulfil one's own purpose and those that are mainly practices to fulfil the purpose of others. I have explained this extensively in the past, however it will be presented later in this text.

Furthermore:

Others posit the meaning as having a separate ceremony for the generation of the engaging mind, and the engaging vows. This is also incorrect according to any of the great pioneers.

To take the engaging mind after having first taken the wishing aspiring mind and then training in the wish to practice the perfections is the supreme method that accords with the differences in different persons. It is also suitable to take the two minds sequentially in one ceremony.

Then Gyaltsab Je summarises his commentary on the actual method of generating the mind of enlightenment thus:

The way of taking them and so forth one can know from the earlier mentioned treatises of the great teacher.

The great teacher specified here refers to Lama Tsong Khapa.

Thus, I shall not elaborate on it here.

This is a reference to the explanations in Lama Tsong Khapa's texts, which I have also explained earlier. Perhaps it may seem that I elaborate too much, however it seems that whenever some point comes up I have already mentioned it somewhere else—but I don't know how much of it you retain.

What is important for us to really keep in mind is that these are the instructions on how to take the bodhisattva vows. For those who are inclined and who have previously taken the vows, it is permissible, indeed necessary, to take these vows throughout one's practices. As we have seen, we take these vows on the basis of refuge. So reciting the Refuge and Bodhicitta Praye, with the proper motivation and intention, and appropriate visualisation will suffice as a means to take the bodhisattva vows.

3. CONCLUSION

The conclusion is subdivided into two parts:

- 3.1. Rejoicing oneself
- 3.2. Inducing others to rejoice

3.1. Rejoicing oneself

This again is subdivided into two:

3.1.1. Achieving one's own purpose

3.1.2. Achieving the purpose of others

3.1.1. Achieving one's own purpose

This has three subdivisions:

3.1.1.1. Rejoicing by uplifting the mind

3.1.1.2. Meditating on conscientiousness after having found such a mind

3.1.1.3. Having found a mind that is difficult to find

3.1.1.1. REJOICING BY UPLIFTING THE MIND

There are two verses under this heading.

25. After the wise ones

*Took very joyfully the mind of enlightenment,
To engage and increase*

They praise the mind like this:

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

After the wise bodhisattvas have taken the two bodhicittas with a very clear joyful mind and faith, they engage in methods for it to not degenerate and to increase its practice. Towards this end they generate joy and praise the mind.

As the commentary explains, when the wise bodhisattvas take the bodhicitta vows they do so with a very clear and joyful mind that is full of *faith*¹. With this mind they engage in methods for it to not degenerate and to increase its practice. Thus, they generate joy and praise the mind that has been developed. In other words, when they see what they have generated, they develop a great sense of joy, and their mind is uplifted.

Gyaltsab Je introduces the next verse in this way:

If we explain how:

Then comes the verse.

26. Today my life has become fruitful,

The human existence was well attained.

Today I was born into the buddha family

Now I have become a child of the buddhas

Gyaltsab Je's commentary to this verse reads:

Today, as I generate the mind of enlightenment and take the vows, my life has become fruitful, my human existence has been well attained and the freedoms and endowments have become meaningful. Today I have been born into the family of the buddhas and become a bodhisattva.

In relation to the aspiration, 'When will I become a child of the Buddha', you generate joy by thinking 'Now I have become a child of the buddhas'.

As the commentary explains, the way to uplift the mind is by contemplating in this way: At this time, when I have generated the mind and taken the vows, my life has become fruitful, my human existence is well attained and the freedoms and endowments have become meaningful. This is indicating the great value and worthiness of generating such a mind. When we ask, 'How do we take the essence of a precious human rebirth?' then this is the most supreme way of taking the essence of this human rebirth with its freedoms and endowments — using it to generate that mind of enlightenment and taking the bodhisattva vows.

Our mind is uplifted when we contemplate how, by generating this mind, we have made our life most worthwhile and meaningful.

One further contemplates how, 'I have been born in the family of the buddhas and have become a bodhisattva'. The indication here is that generating bodhicitta and taking the bodhisattva vows is the hallmark of entering the path of the Great Vehicle. In fact, it is actually the doorway to the Mahayana path. So we contemplate, 'Today I have entered the Mahayana path, so I have actually entered the ranks of the Conqueror's children, and become a bodhisattva'. This is how one uplifts one's mind.

It follows that having developed these aspirations, one is keen about becoming a bodhisattva, thus generating the thought, 'When will I become a child of the buddhas? When will I become a bodhisattva?' The answer is, 'Today! Today is the day when I have fulfilled my repeated aspirations and endeavour to become a bodhisattva and thus become one of the Conqueror's children'. Thus, one generates joy by thinking, 'I have fulfilled my aspirations; now I am a child of the buddhas'.

If we wonder why the bodhisattvas are referred to as the Conqueror's or the Buddha's children, we need to recall that just as the crown prince who automatically succeeds the king carries on the lineage of his family, the bodhisattvas are those who carry on the lineage of the Buddha's doctrine. That is why they are referred to as the Conqueror's children'.

Even though Buddha Shakyamuni is not present in these times, we are definitely receiving his teachings and doctrines through his many lineage holders. Nagarjuna also explained this clearly in his commentary on bodhicitta—you would have received those teachings many times in the past.

Next Tuesday will be our last session for the year as I will be going to India earlier than I anticipated.

In any case, we have come to the auspicious point where we generate bodhicitta and joy about having generated that bodhicitta. Generating a sense of joy in partaking activities with a bodhicitta mind and attitude is the best way to really enjoy life.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

10 December 2013

The Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer that we have just recited will suffice as our motivation for the meditation practice, and so now we focus our minds on our meditation. [meditation]

It is important to engage in the practice of meditation, just as we have attempted to do in our short session.

Something that we really need to consider is using our precious human life with its eight freedoms and ten endowments meaningfully. So what does that mean? The worldly way of making life meaningful would be to exert oneself in amassing wealth, possessions, a good career, and to enjoy the status which that brings. But that is only a superficial view of a meaningful life. From the Dharma point of view, in order to make one's precious human life meaningful - which is also described as taking the essence of this precious human life - one needs to first generate the wish of wanting to do just that.

In order to generate that genuine wish to make one's precious human life meaningful, four types of attitudes must be generated. These are known as the four attributes for taking the essence of one's precious human life. I have explained these points previously and I find them very meaningful. The four attributes are: thinking about the need to practise the Dharma; thinking about the ability one has to practise the Dharma; thinking about how one needs to practise the Dharma in this very life; and thinking about why it is essential to practise the Dharma right now.

1. Thinking about the need to practise the Dharma

Why is there such a need? Put succinctly it is simply because we all wish for happiness and don't wish to experience any suffering. That simple fact has to be linked to the need to practise Dharma. In other words, we have to see how it is only through the practice of Dharma that we can fulfil our wish to experience genuine happiness and rid ourselves of all suffering.

Then we need to turn that understanding into a conviction that only the practice of the Dharma will fulfil that wish of gaining true happiness and eliminating suffering. Once that conviction is developed, we will spontaneously engage in accumulating virtues and shunning negativities. When we really think about this in detail we will be convinced that the only cause of happiness is virtue, while non-virtue or negativity is the cause of suffering.

What naturally follows is the conviction that it is only through the practice of Dharma that one establishes the means to accumulate virtue and shun negativity. To become a true Dharma practitioner, we need to contemplate these facts again and again and develop a deep sense of conviction in them.

2. Thinking about one's ability to practise the Dharma

Having contemplated at length on the need to practise the Dharma, and arriving at the conclusion, 'Yes, I definitely need to practise the Dharma', the next question that quite naturally arises, is, 'Do I have the ability to practise the Dharma?' So that question needs to be addressed. The reason that one does have that ability is because one has a precious human rebirth with the eight freedoms and ten endowments intact. That is the true meaning of a precious human rebirth.

The next step is to contemplate thoroughly the fact that one is free from the eight adverse circumstances in relation to personal favourable conditions, and thus endowed with the eight freedoms. In particular, one has the discriminating wisdom of being able to distinguish between what is right and what is wrong. Furthermore, one is endowed with the ten endowments in relation to the external favourable conditions, such as meeting with the perfect Mahayana teacher and so forth.

Contemplating these factors again and again, thinking about the precious rebirth and how one has all of these faculties intact, is a very worthwhile meditation—in fact, it's an essential meditation practice. Contemplating in this way again and again, helps to calm down and subdue the mind, thus providing further encouragement to practise the Dharma.

I spent a lot of time contemplating like this when I was around 18 or 19 years old, and I can safely say that, even though I cannot claim to have any realisations about the Dharma, this practice definitely helped me. I didn't do it to become well versed so that I could become well known and famous through my understanding of these topics. That was not at the forefront of my mind at all! I was considering these points on a personal level as a way to help to subdue my mind, and to that effect I can safely say that it has definitely been of benefit.

It is really important to work with whatever helps one's mind in the moment, and to utilise whatever understanding one has of the Dharma, at whatever meagre level that may be. If a practice helps your mind, then make that your main practice, rather than aiming at higher forms of practice. Aiming high while putting aside the practical approaches can be quite destructive for one's own development. I'm not saying that one shouldn't aim high, but the point is that aiming to do high level practices, whilst neglecting more practical approaches, can definitely be harmful.

Last week we reviewed Gyaltshab Rinpoche's succinct explanation on how to practise in the correct sequence. We need to take that important instruction to heart. As you will recall, he said that it can be dangerous to aim at high level practices of generosity, for example, or adopt practices that are inappropriate. We need to take instructions like these to heart. They come from precious teachers, lamas, and great masters, so we need to take heed of them.

3. Thinking about the need to practise the Dharma in this very life

Having contemplated the need to practise the Dharma, and understanding that one has the ability to practise the Dharma, one might fall into the trap of thinking, 'Well, maybe I can leave practising the Dharma to my next life'. To avoid that trap we need to think again and again about the rarity and difficulty of finding a precious human life. To contemplate the rarity and difficulty of finding a precious human life with the eight freedoms and the ten endowments intact, we need to consider the difficulty of acquiring the cause for such a precious human life.

The causes of a precious human life are the practice of morality aided by the practices of generosity and so forth, sealed with unstained aspirational prayers. So when we contemplate how difficult it is to acquire those causes, then we can see why the result, which is the precious human rebirth, is so rare and difficult to find.

When we really think about these points, asking ourselves, 'Do I have all of those causes intact?' and 'How difficult is it to obtain all of those causes?', then it will dawn upon us that obtaining such a precious human life with the eight freedoms and ten endowments intact is indeed very rare and will be difficult to obtain again in a future life.

4. Thinking about why it is essential to practise the Dharma right now

The fourth attribute of taking the essence of our precious human life is that we need to think about how this precious human life can so easily cease. We have already realised that we need to practise the Dharma in this life, but we might fall into the trap of thinking that we can practise Dharma next week, next month, or next year. To avoid procrastinating like that, we need to contemplate how the precious human life can so easily end in a moment.

How to take the essence of this precious human life

When we contemplate these four points again and again, then the outcome will be a genuine, unmistakable wish to take the essence of this precious human life, endowed with the eight freedoms and ten endowments. Having developed that wish, the next question that arises is, 'How, then, do we take the essence of our precious human life?'

As an answer to that we reflect upon the fact that there are three different levels of taking the essence of this precious human life: the small way, the medium way and the great way, and this is what we contemplate next.

To understand how these three scopes relate to what the Buddha taught, we need to recall that the Buddha taught the Dharma for the sole purpose of benefiting other sentient beings—the Dharma has no other purpose than that. There are three levels in which the Dharma benefits sentient beings. At the lowest level is the temporary benefit of being reborn again as a human or in the god realms; the medium benefit is becoming free from the cycle of samsara, in other words obtaining the state of self-liberation; and the optimum way to benefit sentient beings is to lead them to the ultimate state of supreme enlightenment.

These benefits can be grouped into temporary benefits and the ultimate benefit. With respect to the temporary benefits, the Buddha presented the unmistakable methods for obtaining high status, and most importantly that state of nirvana or self-liberation. To obtain the ultimate benefit, which is supreme enlightenment, the Buddha further presented the paths and grounds and so forth. So if the question, 'How did the Buddha benefit sentient beings?' arises, then we know that these are the ways in which the Buddha benefits us.

So how do we take this as personal instruction? Beginning with the temporary benefits, by avoiding the ten non-virtues and adopting the ten virtues will definitely close the door to being reborn in the lower realms in the next life. While it may be difficult to overcome the causes for unfortunate rebirths entirely, we can at least affect the course of our next rebirth, ensuring that there will again be an opportunity to continue to practice to avoid being reborn in the unfortunate realms in the life thereafter. When we think in this practical way, we can see that we can definitely manage to engage in this practice.

Next, we need to consider what prevents us from engaging in the pure practices that secure the causes for obtaining the fortunate rebirth in the next lifetime. When we look into those opposing factors, we will see that from beginningless times we have had a strong clinging to the pleasures of life, and it is this strong grasping and clinging to the pleasures of this life that prevents us from working towards the goals of our future lives.

So the way to overcome this strong grasping at the affairs of this life is by contemplating and thinking about the need for taking refuge, the importance of karma and its effect, and engage in confession and purification practices with four opponent powers. When we engage in these practices, and change our attitude from one of clinging merely to the affairs of this life, to one of thinking about the purpose of our future lives, then we have actually engaged in the practice of Dharma. That is the true meaning of Dharma—when the mind is held fast against strong clinging to non-virtues.

The small scope

Dharma practice at the small scope is replacing the strong clinging to this life with an attitude focussed on the purpose of the next life. As mentioned previously, that involves avoiding the ten non-virtues, adopting the ten virtues, taking refuge, implementing the correct understanding of karma and engaging in purification practices. When the mind is transformed from a state of clinging to this life to one that holds the future life as being more purposeful and more meaningful, then that mind is being held by the Dharma. That is the Dharma practice of the small scope; this is taking the essence of one's precious human rebirth in a small way.

The medium scope

As presented in teachings, when one considers the pitfalls of samsaric or cyclic existence, and, with the aid of the wisdom realising selflessness and so forth, actually develops a strong sense of renunciation, then that will be engaging in the practice of the medium scope, and taking essence of one's precious human life in the medium way.

Here the practice of Dharma means replacing clinging to samsaric pleasures with a genuine longing for liberation, and this transformation comes as a result of the practices of the three higher trainings. That which actually prevents us from having a true aspiration for liberation is clinging to the pleasures of samsara. For as long as we value the pleasures of samsara and cling to that, then the mind of longing for liberation will never arise. In fact, this clinging is the factor that obstructs the development of a true longing and aspiration for liberation. When one develops disenchantment with the pleasures of samsara, then that will be the antidote that overcomes clinging to samsara, and thus becomes an aid to developing a genuine aspiration for liberation.

The great scope

The supreme way to take the essence of the precious human life is to develop bodhicitta—if not actual bodhicitta right away, then a similitude of it. When that is developed and cultivated within one's mental continuum, and one engages in actions with that bodhicitta attitude, then that is the supreme form of practice. This was, of course, explained in earlier teachings.

The meaning of Dharma in accordance with the great scope practice is, when working for the purpose of merely oneself is replaced with an attitude of wishing to work for the benefit of all beings, when that mind of bodhicitta is generated, then that is the meaning of Dharma in accordance with the great scope.

Dharma in relation to the three scopes

We need to really understand how Dharma is defined in relation to the three levels of practice. The true meaning of Dharma is that it serves as an antidote for overcoming three types of attitudes. The Dharma of the small level serves as an opponent to clinging to merely this life's affairs. The meaning of Dharma at the medium level is when it serves as an opponent to overcome the clinging to the pleasures of samsara. Finally, when Dharma serves as an opponent to overcome the selfish attitude of clinging to merely one's own purpose, and replaces that attitude with one of working for the purpose of other sentient beings, then it becomes the Dharma of the great level.

The main obstacles for developing bodhicitta are these three attitudes of strong clinging to the affairs of this life, strong clinging to the pleasures of samsara, and clinging to merely one's own purpose. These selfish attitudes are definitely obstacles for developing bodhicitta. For as long as one harbours any one of these three attitudes, there is no way that one can develop bodhicitta. We need to consider these points thoroughly. There is nothing that prevents us from developing bodhicitta other than these three attitudes. So the more we develop ourselves and work towards abstaining from these three negative attitudes, and the more we distance ourselves from them, the closer we will get to developing actual bodhicitta. That's how the practice of Dharma works.

We can safely say that some are closer to developing bodhicitta than others. What determines that difference is none other than how closely the mind is related to these three opposing attitudes. The ones who are closest to the three opposing attitudes, holding them dear to their heart, are the ones who are furthest from developing bodhicitta. Those who are distant from these selfish attitudes, who don't hold them dearly in their heart, are the ones who are closer to developing bodhicitta. No-one else determines that other than oneself. This, of course, is explained in great detail in the Bodhicharyavatara. As Shantideva says, 'What need is there to mention more? Look at where the Buddha is now. Look at where we are now!'

Using a more contemporary example, while there might be some in this room who have developed bodhicitta, generally we don't know if that is the case or not. However if we were to consider ourselves as being at the same level of not yet having developed bodhicitta, then who of the seventy-eight individuals in this room will be the first to become bodhisattvas and become enlightened first? The obvious answer is that it will be those who are genuinely striving to work for the benefit of others, thinking of the welfare of others and being more concerned about that than their own mere purpose. Those who are holding their own interest as being of primary importance, and who have minimum concern for the welfare of others, will be further away from developing bodhicitta. That is basically what Shantideva is saying — it is our own way of thinking and our own attitudes that determine whether we will develop bodhicitta and obtain the ultimate state of enlightenment. We need to take that as a personal instruction. In brief, Shantideva is saying 'Be careful or you might miss out'. So, to make sure that you don't, generate the appropriate attitudes and get rid of the opposing attitudes.

Taking the essence of this precious human life at the small scope means overcoming strong clinging to the affairs of this life. That is done by contemplating the purpose of our existence in our next life. The more we think about the importance of working for our future life, the more the strong clinging to this life's affairs will gradually be reduced. That is the way to slowly transform our mind and imbue it with the genuine practice of Dharma. We need to understand that the real meaning of Dharma is not merely counting the number of achievements, like how much one has studied, or the numbers of particular practices, but rather it is to slowly transform our mind.

Finally, what I wish to convey is that you have done very well with your attendance and study this year; you have definitely put an effort into your study. That of course is really fortunate, and I rejoice in that. From my side it has also been fortunate; I have presented the teachings with the best intention and motivation that I can. So I have definitely seen this year as being very fortunate for us all.

The material in Shantideva's text, the Bodhicharyavatara, which we have been studying, is quite incredible. It has been praised by all the masters as being a really great and masterly and succinct teaching. From whatever point of view we look at it—sutra or tantra—there is no greater teaching, in terms of personal instructions, than this text. We can contemplate how fortunate we have been in having this opportunity to attempt to explain and study and understand the Bodhicharyavatara. So we can dedicate the virtues we have accumulated from all of our efforts in studying and practising this text towards being able to continuously engage in the study, understanding and practice of this text again and again in all future lives, in the company of virtuous Dharma friends like ourselves.

We just might be able to meet with these conditions again in our future lives.

We can be certain that being able to assemble here, and enjoy each others' company, and study and practise in this way, is the positive outcome of previous karmic connections that we have had. We have created an appropriate cause in the past to enjoy our present conditions. That is definitely the case, and that's something we can be definitely be joyful and happy about!

This text, Bodhicharyavatara, is the supreme means for understanding bodhicitta, and indeed, it is a manual for actually developing bodhicitta—the mind of awakening. His Holiness the Dalai Lama mentions this again and again. Whilst I cannot claim that I have any experience of the intended result of this text, when a supreme being such as His Holiness the Dalai Lama, who is endowed with bodhicitta himself, confirms the importance of this text and mentions it again and again, then that helps me to develop a stronger conviction in it as well. So it is on that basis that I can confidently say to you that it is indeed a supreme means to develop bodhicitta.

It is good for each of us, individually, to generate the resolve to take the initiative to develop this altruistic mind, by first working on the seed of bodhicitta, which is a kind mind with a genuine concern for others—in short, developing loving kindness. When we work at developing loving kindness in our heart, being considerate of others as much as we can, and practise that with the intention of developing this altruistic mind of bodhicitta, then our attempts won't be meagre at all. In fact they will be a great practice.

In a practical way, we need to think about how the more we genuinely attempt to adopt virtues and practise kindness, the more happiness we will have in this very life, not to mention it being a cause for happiness in our future lives. So we really need to work on developing kindness, more specifically love and compassion, on a regular basis. We need to understand that love and compassion is the basis on which to develop bodhicitta. Therefore, we need to further cultivate that basis to develop that which is not yet developed. Where kindness and love and compassion have not been generated or developed, we need to work on developing it, and when it has developed, we need to further increase it. This is how we establish a sound basis for enjoying the accrued benefits in future lifetimes.

As I regularly mention, the attitudes of love and compassion are really our best friends. When we have secured them as our best companion then we will not feel too disturbed when we are separated from external friends. Without such an internal friend, being separated from external friends can bring so much suffering. As I have mentioned previously, I have not developed any experience of bodhicitta myself, but just thinking about the necessity of love and compassion, and contemplating on it again and again has really become my best companion, regardless of when I am with others or when I am alone. I can confidently say that I don't experience the suffering of loneliness, or feel a lack of connection with others and so forth. On the contrary, I feel quite joyful and happy even when I am alone in my room.

When I am alone, love and compassion suffice to uplift my mind. As Shantideva and other masters such as Lama Tsong Khapa have so succinctly mentioned, one needs to generate love and compassion, not just in meditation sessions, but also in the post-meditative sessions. We shouldn't restrict the development of love and compassion to some allocated time, but really take it to heart and make it our core practice in whatever we are doing, and wherever we are. That is how we familiarise our mind with these positive attitudes.

When one has developed a strong sense of loving kindness and compassion, then friends and companions will be loving and kind. Conversely, when that loving attitude and love and compassion begin to weaken, then others may seem to have become distant or even appear to be enemies. As we all wish to have good companions and friends, we might as well develop the causes for that.

As mentioned previously, we need to familiarise our mind with loving kindness in our everyday life, again and again. Putting that into practice means beginning with our Dharma brothers and sisters, ensuring that we try to help each other as much as we can, and, at the very least, avoid harming each other. In particular, we need to be very careful that we don't cause harm to other's Dharma practice. As mentioned in several texts, one of the heaviest negative karmas is to harm Dharma practitioners by obstructing their Dharma practices. Thus, we need to ensure that we don't create such negativity by having harmful intentions and hurting others in that way. So we begin our practice with each other—we try to help each other with the genuine attitude of kindness, at the very least ensuring that we don't hurt and harm each other. That is very important to keep in mind.

A very simple reason for not intentionally hurting or harming others is because we do not wish to be hurt or harmed ourselves. If hurting and harming others didn't incur any negative consequences for ourselves, then we might think that there is no reason to avoid doing that. However, since we do not want to experience harm and negative consequences ourselves, it is good to consider not harming or hurting others. A few individuals (not necessarily Dharma practitioners) have confided in me, 'I don't know much about karma, but it does seem that when you are kind to others, something good happens in return, and if I intentionally harm or hurt others, something bad happens to me. That is something I do notice'. These are people who confess that they don't know much about karma. So if people who are not religiously inclined, or who do not consider themselves to be Buddhist, appreciate there is such a thing as the consequences of one's actions, then we Buddhists, who have faith in karma, definitely need to give much more consideration to this point.

As I said earlier, you have all definitely put in a lot of effort this year, by coming to the classes and doing all of the related studies and so forth, and I definitely appreciate it. You have been extremely kind to me and I appreciate your kindness.

Christmas Program

On a another note, you will remember that last week I checked out how many of you are staying behind and will be in Melbourne for the Lama Tsong Khapa Day puja. So, if you did raise your hands, then please make an effort to come to that puja on the 27th of December. I'll remember who raised their hands! Of course I can't really force you to attend, but if I later hear that you were not here then I might be a little bit disappointed! I might think, 'Oh, those who have not come to the puja may not be so keen about listening to my advice!'

The puja should begin with the recitation of the Mig-tse-ma Prayer, (the praise to Lama Tsong Khapa), followed by the guru puja itself. At the end recite the Prayer for the Flourishing of Lama Tsong Khapa's Doctrine, concluding with Mig-tse-ma Prayer at least eight or nine times. It would be good to begin with a silent meditation, generating your own good motivations. Rather than having someone speaking aloud, which could distract people, just sit quietly in meditation for a while before beginning the puja. Afterwards people can stay behind, have tea and interact with each other. It should be a joyful occasion, so you can announce, 'Geshe-la has said to stay behind and have tea, enjoy the company and have a good time'.

As there is also the tradition of staying up until midnight on New Years Eve, those who are so inclined might come together and do Tara Praises until midnight. You can take breaks for tea and so forth. However if you want to light firecrackers, then it's best to go down to the beach!

You will be aware that there will be a Medicine Buddha practice next Wednesday night, which will also be very beneficial, and another very good occasion for people to come together. I had thought about that anyway, before my change of plans.

Those who have family engagements at Christmas should generate the best motivation and intention, which will contribute to making it a joyful occasion. Some may decide to not engage in social or family gatherings. That's fine too, as long as you also generate love and compassion.

There are only two weeks where there are no sessions. Monday evenings begin on the 6th of January. My intention in having these sessions is so that you are able to maintain some kind of continuity in your practice. You could come and do your own practice if you don't feel like following what is being taught. Two of the Wednesday sessions in January will be Tara practice nights and the other two are Chenrezig meditation practices. These will be led by Allys and Jeremy, so that will also very good.

If those of you who live nearby want to gather for additional meditation sessions, you can take the opportunity to do those sessions here. When we were in St Kilda, there was a lady who would come regularly to the small gumpa that we had then, to do her meditation; she would come from her house, do her meditation and then go to work. So she was using the venue for her personal practice. Practising meditation in this gumpa will definitely make a difference because it is definitely a blessed place. The main thing to keep in mind is that the centre is always open and that there is a place to meditate if you want to come.

There used to be some people who would just come to sit in here for awhile. Apparently just spending a few minutes in this hall gave them a good feeling. So even though they might not have been meditating, just sitting here gave them some solace. I am not sure whether they still come or not.

So again, thank you everyone!

I have had to change my plans—I had no choice but maybe it has turned out for the better. The reason for the change of plans is that the reincarnation of one of my own teachers, Khensur Urygen Tseten, is being enthroned. The late Khensur Rinpoche was one of my main teachers; he really helped me to subdue my mind and I attribute this to his great kindness.

To give an indication of how close my teachers were to me, there was the occasion when I visited Khensur Urygen Tseten and Geshe Ngawang Dhargye in New Zealand. After spending some time there, when it came time for me to leave, Khensur Urygen Tseten and Geshe Ngawang Dhargye both wanted to come to the airport to see me off. I, who have no real qualities, was very moved that such great teachers wanted to see me off. At the airport, as I was waiting to pass through immigration and so forth, we spent the time chatting. As I went in, Khensur Urygen Tseten commented, 'Can't we come in there with you?' When they were told that they were not allowed to do so, Khensur Urygen Tseten commented, 'We will wait until we see your plane take off'. Apparently, as they saw the plane take off he commented, 'One of our friends has now left'. This shows how close we were, and the kindness my teachers showed to me.

Whenever I went to visit Geshe Ngawang Dhargye in Dunedin, he would always be there to greet me when I arrived. If I left early, he would excuse himself from accompanying me, saying, 'I have to finish my prayers'. But whenever I went there, he would always receive me, and his kindness was really remarkable.

Their consideration and care was really remarkable. They were never pompous. They never said, 'Oh I am the teacher', or felt there was no need to relate to their students. They really joined their disciples and showed their care in that way. Maybe some of those caring ways have rubbed off on me, as that is how I try to care for you too.

So as the volunteers bring in the tea, we can recite the Tara Praises. It is good to really make strong prayers to Tara—she is definitely unailing in providing assistance and help. I definitely have strong faith in, and a strong reliance, on Tara. This morning, for example, I did a Tara practice for over two hours, and tomorrow I also intend to do the same. She definitely brings a very swift result.

As usual we will devote some time to meditation and we can base our motivation on the Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer that we have just recited. [meditation]

Prior to taking up the practice of meditation it is very important that we understand both the conducive and the adverse conditions that affect meditation. Without recognising those two aspects, and making an attempt to overcome the adverse conditions and to adopt the conducive ones, our attempt to meditate will not be very successful. We may seem to achieve a temporary focus but apart from that we won't get much out of our meditation session. For a genuine meditation session, we really need to understand the way the conducive and adverse conditions affect a meditation session.

As mentioned regularly, the main purpose of engaging in the practice of meditation is so that one may be able to subdue one's mind. In order to subdue the mind we need to understand the process of gaining control over our own mind, otherwise we will maintain our habitual pattern of being controlled by our mind, which in turn is controlled by the delusions, and of the various delusions, the main culprit is the strong grasping at the 'I'.

We can assume that whatever activity we engage in is done with the intent of gaining happiness and eliminating suffering. Regardless of whether the activity actually serves that purpose or not, that is the ultimate goal. This is true for whatever activity human beings are engaged in—the pursuit of happiness and the elimination of suffering is always the goal. When we observe the activities of others we may notice that their activity is not serving that purpose. However, we can't tell them that, because everyone has the notion that they are using the correct methods to achieve their goal. Those methods are ingrained, and they believe that they will work for them, and so it is impossible to immediately change their approach, especially when they believe theirs to be the best method. So it is worthwhile for us to simply observe what others are doing and learn from that.

The practice of Dharma and meditation is a unique method for achieving happiness and eliminating suffering. However, we also need to understand that adopting meditation should not be presented to others as being contrary to leading a normal life in a worldly environment. Some may feel that adopting the meditation technique is a religious practice and therefore not related to their everyday life existence and wellbeing. If meditation is presented as having to lead a completely different kind of lifestyle, then it would be very difficult for ordinary people to see how meditation can benefit them. Rather, we need to present the meditation technique as being relevant to leading a happier life in their everyday existence. If one seemingly leads a normal lifestyle outwardly, but experiences a true inner transformation as a result of meditation and the practise of Dharma, then, based on that personal experience, we can share something of great value with others. Others from ordinary walks of life will feel comfortable in our presence and easily accept what we present. This will be of real benefit to others.

It is by solving our own personal difficulties and problems through the practice of Dharma and meditation, and experiencing an inner transformation, that we will be able to confidently share the Dharma with others. And, as such, what we present will be accepted by others, because no-one can dismiss a personal experience of positive transformation—especially when it relates to overcoming problems and difficulties similar to the ones they are facing themselves. How can others say that meditation has no value when you share with them the fact that it has helped to solve your own difficulties and problems? No-one intentionally wishes to experience any kind of problem or difficulty and everyone appreciates a state of wellbeing. So when a genuine technique is presented from the basis of personal experience, it will readily be accepted by others. That is because they are also striving towards the same goal of happiness and wellbeing and not to experience any difficulties and problems.

The main point is to ensure that your practice hits the target of subduing and controlling your own mind. The great Gyalsey Thokmay Sangpo said in his Thirty-Seven Practices of Bodhisattvas:

If you do not analyse your own faults,
You might put on a Dharmic facade while behaving in a non-Dharmic way.
Therefore, to continually analyse your faults and then discard them,
Is the practice of a bodhisattva.

The essential point here is that one really needs to detect and acknowledge the faults within one's own mind and then strive to overcome them first. Otherwise, as the great master Gyalsey Thokmay Sangpo mentions, there is a great danger that we will completely mislead others by presenting them with a false appearance. If one does not attend to the real intention of the Dharma, particularly if one engages in actions contrary to the Dharma, then there will be great danger of creating doubt about the value of Dharma in the minds of others. It can cause others to think, 'How could someone behave and conduct themselves in a way that is contrary to what they preach?' If we create the conditions where others doubt the Dharma and generate a negative state of mind it is a grave fault on our part. We should strive for others to generate virtue and not more negativity.

So we need to really pay attention to the main cause of our own faults and mental unrest, which lies within our own mind, and not in external conditions and circumstances. When we are feeling a little down or depressed we may resort to going out with friends and having a good time, which may give some temporary relief. But when the enjoyment of being with others has faded away, the mental unrest and the uncomfortable feelings and negative emotions return. That is because we are not paying attention to applying antidotes to overcoming the root cause of our problems.

Seeking temporary relief each time we feel depressed and unsettled will not help to solve the real problem. Rather, we need to ensure that whatever meditation we do, and whatever Dharma practice we adopt, becomes an antidote for overcoming the real problem that lies within. Each one of us can detect a troubling state of mind, attitude or delusion in our mind that is always there to harm us. So it is important for us to detect the cause of that, and work at overcoming the main culprit.

Of all the various delusions found in negative states of mind, the ultimate culprit is grasping at the self, an aspect of which is self-cherishing. There is some debate about whether the self-cherishing mind is actually a delusion but, regardless of that, it is quite clear that it harms us and hinders our happiness and joy. Grasping at the 'I' and self-cherishing are mutually supportive, and they work together like master and servant to cause us so much misery and pain.

Grasping at the 'I' is the root cause of all our problems, and when we are able to fully acknowledge that then the strong wish to overcome grasping at the self will develop. So what are the best methods and antidotes to overcome self-grasping? As the teachings present, the ultimate antidote for overcoming grasping at the self is realising emptiness or selflessness. There is no more supreme antidote to grasping at the self than to gain the realisation of emptiness. This is why the view of emptiness is held in such high esteem. It is considered a most precious realisation because it serves as the sole antidote for overcoming the root cause of all our problems, which is grasping at the self.

To see why grasping at the self is the cause for all unwanted misery and suffering we need to understand how it is the root cause of all other delusions and, in particular, the cause for the development of strong attachment and anger. This is not an obscure point. If we really think about it we will notice that this is true for ourselves. From strong clinging to the 'I' there naturally follows attachment to those things and individuals that are favourable to oneself, and aversion or anger towards those who oppose one's own interests. So, there is strong attachment to one's friends, relatives and the like, and anger towards enemies. Due to this strong attachment and aversion we engage in so many different activities that revolve around trying to please those who are close to us, while trying to subjugate those we consider our enemies and who oppose our interests, thus creating much heavy negative karma. In this way we come to understand how self-grasping is the root cause of all our unhappiness.

When we investigate further and look into how we carry these attitudes into our daily life we find that we make most of our decisions based on, whether 'I like this', or 'I don't like that'. Our strongly held opinions are based merely on the fact 'because I like this, I want it' or 'because I don't like it, I don't want it'. So, the driving force behind the decisions we make is mostly because 'I' like or dislike something.

We need to further investigate how that very strong opinionated 'I' appears to us. Through a sincere and thorough investigation we will come to realise that we view this 'I' as being independently existent; a very solid and unshakeable 'I' that does not depend on any other causes and conditions for its existence.

When we further investigate whether such an independent and solid 'I' actually exists or not, we come to realise that in fact such an 'I' does not exist at all. When we come to understand that such an independently existent 'I' does not actually exist, then one has identified the basis of the object of negation. Without abandoning the object of negation we cannot possibly overcome the grasping at the self. Thus, we come to understand the importance of realising selflessness.

When the Buddhist teachings present selflessness, it is not suggesting that the self does not exist at all and that there is no 'I'. Rather, it is a self-sufficient and independent 'I' that does not exist. Our wrong conception makes us believe and hold onto such a non-existent self or 'I'. However, when we understand that there is no such self-sufficient and independently existing 'I', then we begin to gain the true understanding of selflessness and emptiness. We also begin to understand that we have to realise selflessness or emptiness because we need to overcome that grasping at the self, which is the main cause of our suffering. Furthermore, we begin to see for ourselves why the teachings on emptiness are held in such high esteem, and why it is necessary to gain an understanding of emptiness; to work on developing that realisation.

This also leads to the main point that His Holiness the Dalai Lama presented in his recent teachings in south India, which many of you attended. You might recall that he said that the purpose of this gathering can be summarised into two main points. 'The purpose of gathering here' he said, 'is to find a means to overcome grasping at the self and the self-cherishing mind. So if you can take this essential point with you and work on that, then it serves the purpose of the teachings'. He said that if you take these two points with you and think about them constantly, then coming to teachings will have served its purpose. So, it is good to take that succinct advice to heart and really try to implement it in our daily lives.

If we work on these two essential points, then the more we reduce grasping at the self and the self-cherishing mind, the greater our happiness will naturally be. Conversely, the more we hold on to grasping at the self and maintain a self-cherishing attitude, the more our happiness decreases and our suffering increases. This is very true. To give a small practical example: if, in a mutual relationship, you have to make a decision about something and the other person says, 'Let's do it this way', and you say, 'No, I don't accept that', then from that very moment the situation becomes tense and you both start to feel uncomfortable. The stronger that sense of 'I' or 'me', along with what 'I want' and 'don't want' becomes, the more we feel unsettled and uncomfortable. But if we say, 'OK, I accept and agree with you' then things settle down. There is no conflict and dispute with the other person and naturally the situation is calm. Indeed, the more we increase our genuine kindness and concern for others, the more our happiness will increase. Thus, concern for others and taking their interests into account opposes the self-cherishing mind. The more we rise above the self-cherishing attitude and think about the welfare of others the more our happiness will increase. This is the practical way to think about the benefit of overcoming self-cherishing.

Of all the antidotes for overcoming a self-cherishing mind, the optimum antidote is none other than bodhicitta, the mind of enlightenment, and this is the subject matter of the text we are studying. In this very text Bodhisattvacharyavatara or Bodhisattva's Way of Life, Shantideva explains what bodhicitta is, how to develop bodhicitta and the benefits of bodhicitta and so forth. It is important that we have a deeper understanding of what we are studying and the purpose of this text from the very outset. Having such an overview and implementing it in our practice is really important for whatever studies we engage in.

Having earlier mentioned the importance of meditation, it is good to also understand how to develop a sound, genuine meditation practice. First of all, the mind has to have a single-pointed focus on the object, and secondly, it has to be a sharp and clear state of mind. Those are the criteria which need to be met in order to develop concentration.

It is also important to acknowledge the opposing factors to this sharp, clear state of mind that is single-pointedly focussed. The opposing factors are excitement and laxity. Excitement causes the mind to waver and is the main opposing factor to developing single-pointed concentration; whereas laxity is the main opposing factor to having a clear and sharp state of mind.

The conducive factors for developing and maintaining concentration are mindfulness and introspection. Mindfulness is the state of mind where there is a constant recollection of the chosen object, i.e. constantly bringing to mind whatever meditation object one has chosen to focus on. Introspection, on the other hand, is a state of mind that is constantly vigilant of our state of mind and our focus. If the mind starts to waver (either becoming distracted by excitement or when it starts sinking into stupor and laxity), one immediately notices that and applies the antidotes. The state of mind which allows us to do this is called introspection. So mindfulness and introspection are the most important conducive factors.

When one understands that genuine meditation requires a single-pointed focus and a clear and sharp state of mind, then the real meaning of meditation becomes apparent. Meditation entails choosing an appropriate object to focus on and then intentionally withdrawing the mind from all forms of distraction. The meditation begins when we intentionally focus on the object and maintain that focus.

An appropriate object for single-pointed focus is one that does not give rise to delusions. Because we have chosen an appropriate object to focus on, and because the technique of focusing on that object involves withdrawing from engaging in the delusions, we will naturally experience a mind that is genuinely settled. So, during the time of the meditation, at the very least, the manifest delusions will subside, thus creating a virtuous state of mind. By acquainting our mind with this technique the delusions will begin to have less influence on our mind.

As Lama Tsong Khapa said, when one notices that the delusions have become weaker, then that is the true mark of one's practice of the Dharma. Furthermore, when this is complemented with a stronger faith in the gurus, the buddhas and in the Dharma itself, that is a true sign of the fact that meditation and Dharma practice have worked for us. If, despite our attempts to practise, we find that the delusions are not weakening and remain the same or worse, becoming even stronger, then we need to acknowledge that something is not right and that we are not hitting the mark with our practice. Perhaps it's because we are not making sufficient effort or that we are not adopting the correct methods.

If one's meditation practice serves as an antidote that weakens the delusions, then it has served its purpose and one's practice has born fruit. However if our delusions start to increase then this is a sign that we have to be very cautious about how we are adopting the practice and the effects it has on our mind. An example of how one's practice does not serve the purpose of overcoming the delusions and, in fact, actually feeds one's delusions to a certain extent is starting to feel proud about one's practice of meditation and so forth. Such a sense of pride can manifest in feeling jealous of those who are practising. That is a sign that one's practices have completely missed the mark, and that the delusions are increasing rather than decreasing. If one's attempts to practice have been genuinely applied, then far from feeling pompous and proud and thinking one is doing better than others, or looking down on others, or even feeling competitive or jealous of those who are practising, one will feel very joyful and happy when one sees others engaging in practice. One might then rejoice in one's own attempts to practice, feeling 'I am very fortunate to have this opportunity to practise myself, and it's really great to see others engaging in practice too.' Wishing others well in their practice and encouraging them is a true mark of one's practice having a positive effect.

We also need to keep in mind how incredibly fortunate we are to have this opportunity to engage in these studies and practices. Most of you are still young and have the opportunity with all the right conditions intact, with the Dharma being available, and teachers presenting it. With all of these conditions intact, we need to really reflect upon having this great opportunity now, and understand how we really need to utilise and not waste this opportunity. We really need to cherish these ongoing opportunities to engage in study and practices, and remind ourselves again and again that the purpose of practising is to overcome the self-grasping and self-cherishing mind within us. That, in summary, is the purpose we need to always bear in mind.

We are up to the third and final part of Chapter 3, which is:

3.1. Rejoicing

Here the headings are:

3.1.1. Achieving one's own purpose

3.1.2. Achieving the purpose of others

3.1.1. Achieving one's own purpose

This is subdivided into three:

3.1.1.1. Rejoicing by eulogising the mind

3.1.1.2. Meditating on conscientiousness after having found such a mind

3.1.1.3. Generating joy because of having found a mind that is difficult to find

Having covered the first of these three we move on to:

3.1.1.2. MEDITATING ON CONSCIENTIOUSNESS AFTER HAVING FOUND SUCH A MIND

This refers to making use of this rare mind that is difficult to find, and applying conscientiousness to this mind.

The root text reads:

27. *From now on I shall as much as possible
Engage in actions befitting this lineage.
I shall act in a way so as not to sully
This faultless and holy lineage*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

If one thinks whether this alone is enough:

From now on I shall engage in actions of the three doors that befit the lineage of the father Buddha

I shall strive in the method in a way that does not sully this holy lineage, which is adorned only by qualities and is faultless in the beginning, middle and end, with the faults and downfalls of the wishing and engaging advice.

Having warned the reader, lest one thinks whether having found this mind is enough by itself, the commentary goes on to explain what needs to be done from now on, which is I shall engage in actions of the three doors that befit the family lineage of the father Buddha. As explained previously, the Buddha is like a father and, because bodhisattvas aspire to develop the enlightened mind, they are like his children. A prince who carries the lineage of the king has the responsibility of upholding that lineage in a manner that befits that lineage and without damaging it. Likewise, those who have now become the children of the Buddha need to engage in a manner that befits that lineage of the Buddha. That is the point being made here. The commentary then explains that the commitment is to strive in the method in a way that does not sully this holy lineage of the Buddha, which is adorned only by qualities and is faultless in the beginning, middle and end. One would sully the holy lineage by engaging in the faults and downfalls of the wishing and engaging advice or instructions.

Generating the aspiring wish to achieve enlightenment entails recalling that wish three times during the day and three times during the night, refraining from engaging in the four black dharmas, and adopting the four white dharmas. Engaging bodhisattva vows has eighteen root downfalls and forty-six auxiliary or secondary downfalls. So the commentary is urging us to refrain from committing these faults and downfalls, and if one finds oneself doing so, to immediately engage in purification practices.

Having taken the engaging bodhisattva vows, one adopts the practices of the six perfections such as generosity and morality and so forth. Not sullyng the practice of generosity, for example, would be to ensure that whatever one intends to give is given without any sense of miserliness, or pride, or other ulterior motives. In other words, in order to ensure that the lineage is not sullied, one needs to ensure that one counteracts the adverse conditions for the practices of generosity and so forth. There is a Tibetan word used here, tsunpa, which has the connotation of being ethical. However, the main point is to ensure we are free from strong delusions whilst engaging in the practice.

Recalling the meaning of this verse on a regular basis would be a good practice in itself. It will be a personal pledge that, in itself, is very powerful as it reinforces one's dedication to developing the bodhicitta mind.

3.1.1.3. GENERATING JOY BECAUSE OF HAVING FOUND A MIND THAT IS DIFFICULT TO FIND

Here we are being exhorted to really generate that sense of joy of having found a mind that is difficult to find, which is, of course, the actual awakening mind or bodhicitta. We can definitely generate a sense of joy about having that aspiration. We can, at the very least, safely assume that we have some sort of contrived bodhicitta attitude within our mind. The analogy in the teachings for contrived bodhicitta is that it is like the bark of sugar cane; while the bark doesn't contain the full sweetness of the actual sugarcane it does have some level of sweetness. Likewise, while we have not yet developed actual bodhicitta we can still generate a similitude of the bodhicitta attitude.

As I regularly suggest, we can, at the very least, generate on a daily basis this thought: I will not engage in any action that harms any living being and I will try my utmost to engage in as many ways as I can to benefit other sentient beings. We can definitely manage to generate that thought which, in itself, is a very precious state of mind. However, that thought is not generated naturally or spontaneously, so we need to put some time and energy into generating it. When we do generate that thought, even just for a moment, it is a very precious state of mind. So, if on a regular basis we could work on developing the mind, 'I will not harm any sentient being and I will do my most to benefit sentient beings', it will be a mind that we can cherish and we can feel great joy about having generated that intention.

The root verse is:

28. *Just like a blind person finding a jewel
In a heap of rubbish,
I generated this mind of enlightenment
Just by coincidence.*

As the commentary explains:

This mind of enlightenment was born within me by pure chance, just like a poor and destitute blind person finding a jewel on a heap of rubbish by sheer coincidence. It must definitely be through the force of the buddhas.

In the Tibetan text the commentary begins with the analogy of a poor and destitute blind person finding a jewel on a heap of rubbish by sheer coincidence. Not only is this person destitute, but they are blind, which makes it even much more unlikely that they might actually find a jewel. And of course in a place of great poverty, finding jewels lying around is quite unlikely. If a person who is destitute and blind finds a jewel in a heap of rubbish, then how much joy would that person feel? They would feel incredible joy at the extraordinary fortune and coincidence of finding this jewel.

The generation of this mind of enlightenment is similar. An ordinary being can be likened to a blind person in that we don't have the wisdom realising emptiness. The heap of rubbish is analogous to the delusions that infest our mind. Yet despite being riddled with delusions and blinded by ignorance we have encountered this precious mind, the awakening mind of bodhicitta. This is like the sheer coincidence of a blind person finding a jewel in a heap of rubbish. This has definitely occurred through the force of the buddhas, which means that due to the buddhas' blessings we have had the great fortune to have had this opportunity to generate this mind. Thus we are exhorted to develop a sense of great joy in having had this opportunity to develop this mind.

One of the main points we need to consider here is that while bodhicitta is indeed a difficult mind to find, it would be a complete mistake to put it aside thinking, 'Oh, it's too difficult to generate' and not make any effort at all. Even though it is a difficult mind to generate, it is definitely possible, and because of that possibility we need to strive towards developing it. If it was not possible to be generated then we might as well cast it aside as being a waste of our time, but that is not the case. This is the main point that we need to bear in mind.

The new program for our study group evenings will be eight teaching sessions followed by a discussion and then an exam. Maybe Ven. Lhamo could keep track of the number of sessions because in my old age I may start to forget!

There is mutual benefit in combining the wisdom of the elderly and the energy and clear mind of the young. The elders definitely have a wisdom that arises from whatever experiences they have had, whilst the younger generation have not had the experiences to generate that wisdom. So the elders can share their combined wisdom and experience. The younger generation have a full life energy force and a clearer, fresher mind, so they are less likely to be forgetful. So the combination of youth and age can be mutually beneficial. I think this is usually the way it works.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

18 February 2014

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta prayer and motivation that we have generated, we can now engage in meditation.

The most important thing is to visualise sentient beings who are deprived of happiness and genuinely and sincerely wish them happiness and goodness. Focus on beings who are experiencing tremendous suffering, and develop a very strong intention to free them from that suffering; to do one's utmost to make it happen, for them to be free from suffering. So with that intention in one's heart, engaging in the practice becomes more meaningful. Without visualising sentient beings deprived of happiness and experiencing suffering, and wishing them to be free from suffering, then one's meditation practice is on the surface with no real substance. [meditation]

So we'll now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings, to lead them to ultimate happiness and free them from all sufferings, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. For this purpose I will engage in listening to the teachings and put them into practice well.

3. CONCLUSION

3.1. Rejoicing (cont.)

Having completed the topic Achieving One's Own Purpose we now turn to the second part of this section of the text.

3.1.2. Achieving the purpose of others

Achieving the purpose of others is based on aspiring to develop the mind of enlightenment, the bodhicitta attitude. What is being encouraged here is to develop that mind so that one will be able to benefit others. Benefiting others is really the ultimate point of why we are striving to develop this state of mind that aspires to achieve enlightenment. So, the main point is to familiarise one's mind again and again with the intention to benefit others. As His Holiness the Dalai Lama mentions regularly, at our beginners' level, whilst we might not have developed actual bodhicitta yet, we can definitely generate the intentions 'I will not harm any living being' and 'I will engage in benefitting others as much as I can'. His Holiness says that even generating this state of mind at a beginners level can serve as a substitute for bodhicitta. Thus, focusing on this intention regularly and establishing it firmly in our minds is highly meaningful.

When we intentionally devote ourselves to cultivating this state of mind and further strengthen it, then as it becomes firmly established the result is that our mind naturally becomes happier and more joyful. Through this familiarity one is in fact establishing all the right conditions to develop actual bodhicitta, whereby the joy and happiness in our minds will increase unceasingly.

Indeed, developing this intention directly opposes the self-cherishing mind; an attitude that is completely obsessed with one's own self interests and which has a strong focus merely on 'I' or 'me'. As this positive state of mind that intends to benefit others opposes the self-cherishing attitude, it also serves as an antidote for overcoming the manifest levels of grasping at the self. Whilst it is not an actual antidote for abandoning the grasping at the self at its very root, it does serve as a means to minimise an otherwise strong sense of grasping at the self. For as long as one maintains a firm intention to benefit others and not to intentionally harm them in any way, there is no room for anger to arise, no room for jealousy to arise and no room for the strong sense of 'I' or 'me', that which focuses merely on one's own personal interests, to arise. Thus, whilst directly opposing the self-cherishing mind, it can also loosen the strong hold of the self-grasping mind.

If we were to sincerely investigate, we will come to notice that on a daily basis most of our thoughts, ideas and attitudes are driven by a strong grasping to the 'I'. An exception may be when we are sleeping, but in the waking period during most of our activities, if we were to ask ourselves, 'What is the driving force behind my actions?' we will find that it is mostly driven by self-interests which are related to a strong sense of grasping to the 'I'. As such, familiarising ourselves with a state of mind that opposes such a strong focus on the 'I' becomes a very high level practice. We need to adopt practical ways to cultivate the means to help overcome our chronic obsession with the self-cherishing mind.

Generating a positive attitude in one's mind and trying to maintain it becomes an optimum meditation practice in itself. As one becomes familiar with this positive attitude and maintains it, the mind naturally settles down to a clear and calm state. It is also an optimum Dharma practice because one is actively following the core advice of the Buddha: not to harm any living being and only benefiting sentient beings. This is really the ultimate intention and advice of all buddhas and bodhisattvas. Buddha Shakyamuni clearly mentions in the sutras: 'if you harm sentient beings you are harming me; if you benefit sentient beings you are benefiting me'. Notice the Buddha doesn't say, 'if you harm me then that is negative'. Rather, he says: 'If you don't wish to harm me stop harming sentient beings. If you wish to benefit me then benefit sentient beings'. So this shows the unequalled love and compassion that Buddha has for all sentient beings. Intentionally generating this state of mind and focusing on it becomes an optimum means to benefit oneself in this and future lives. In relation to both short-term and long-term benefit, it is really the optimum practice because it serves the purpose of fulfilling the wishes of all sentient beings. We can all relate to the fact that every single sentient being only wishes for happiness and does not intentionally wish to experience any suffering. So, when we actually generate a state of mind that wishes all sentient beings to experience happiness and further engage in ways to benefit them, whilst wishing all beings to be free from suffering and actively refrain from harming them, then one is actually fulfilling the needs and wishes of all sentient beings. One is not leaving any sentient being out, because every sentient being ultimately has this same wish. Thus, the practical approach to understanding the great benefit of generating this state of mind is to remember that you are ultimately fulfilling the wishes of all sentient beings.

By understanding this we can relate to how the bodhisattvas are always engaged in fulfilling two purposes: their own purpose, which ultimately is to fulfil the purpose of benefiting other sentient beings. Thus cultivating this state of mind benefits oneself by calming one's own mind. While I cannot personally claim that I have much experience, I do spend significant time generating this state of mind. I find that it really helps to settle and quieten the mind and make it more receptive to being virtuous. To that extent it becomes a very practical means to induce a positive and pure state of mind. If one makes a genuine attempt, one will definitely see the practical benefit on one's own mind. Thus, I encourage you and remind you again and again of the practical benefits that such a state of mind brings.

This outline, Achieving the Purpose of Others is subdivided into three categories.

3.1.2.1. It can eliminate the sufferings of sentient beings

This points out again that serving the purpose of others requires eliminating their sufferings and very succinctly shows how this is done.

3.1.2.2. It can eliminate its cause (its obscurations)

Again, not only does this mind eliminate the suffering of sentient beings but also the very causes which are the obscurations. Even though it is not explicitly presented here, we can relate this to the Four Noble Truths, particularly the first Noble Truth of suffering, and the second Noble Truth, which is the origination of suffering. If you can relate generating the bodhicitta attitude to the Two Truths it helps to eliminate suffering of sentient beings as well as the cause, the origination of suffering.

The obscurations here relate specifically to the deluded obscurations and the obscurations to omniscience, which encompass the origin of suffering. We derive a deeper understanding when we relate it to the Four Noble Truths.

3.1.2.3. It can achieve all benefit and happiness

Take special note that this relates to not only being able to achieve some minor level of happiness, but all benefit and happiness. So this is the extent to which the bodhicitta mind can benefit.

3.1.2.1. It can eliminate the sufferings of sentient beings

This is further divided into five sub-categories:

3.1.2.1.1. It can destroy the lord of death

3.1.2.1.2. It destroys poverty

3.1.2.1.3. It destroys sickness

3.1.2.1.4. It destroys the suffering of existence in general

3.1.2.1.5. It destroys specifically the sufferings of the lower realms

3.1.2.1.1. It can destroy the lord of death

Amongst the various sufferings we experience e.g. suffering of birth, sickness etc. this heading relates particularly to the suffering of death.

The first two lines of the verse relating to this point are:

*29ab. It is also the supreme nectar
Destroying migrator's lord of death.*

The commentary explains:

This bodhicitta is also the supreme nectar that destroys the lord of death through whom migrators die without freedom of choice.

Dying without freedom means that sentient beings have no choice over their mortality and have to experience death. That is the meaning of dying without freedom.

Bodhicitta serving as the supreme nectar that destroys the lord of death indicates that while there are other kinds of nectars, like those produced through the achievements of humans and gods, bodhicitta is the most supreme, as it is the one able to destroy the very lord of death. Thus, bodhicitta is likened to nectar of immortality. The Prayer to Maitreya reads:

Bodhicitta bars the way to unfortunate destinies;
It is the great teaching that leads to the highest realms;
And even to the state beyond old age and death.
To the mind of enlightenment, bodhicitta, I prostrate.

We can relate here to how bodhicitta is the supreme method for overcoming the lower rebirths, the supreme means for achieving the higher realms, and the supreme means to overcome aging and death.

In praise of bodhicitta, His Holiness the Dalai Lama quoted this very verse in the teachings in Sydney last year. This verse definitely summarises the qualities of bodhicitta. This is exactly how it is presented in the text here — developing bodhicitta becomes the means to overcome all unfortunate rebirths, leads one to the higher realms and to the state of being free from aging and death. Here the ultimate state of immortality is liberation, and the ultimate liberation is enlightenment. While it is possible to obtain the self-liberation of the lower vehicles without developing bodhicitta, i.e. the hearers and solitary realiser's state of liberation, there is no way that one can achieve enlightenment without first developing bodhicitta. Bodhicitta is the optimum cause for achieving enlightenment, and by relating to the benefits of developing it and maintaining it in one's continuum, a strong sense of awe can be generated in one's mind. Thus, one contemplates how wonderful bodhicitta is and the extensive benefits it brings. By developing bodhicitta one is able to achieve the most incredibly profound goal. Thus, by relating to the benefits of bodhicitta in this way, one will develop a great sense of awe, and a real inspiration that will leave the strong positive imprints to develop bodhicitta in one's mind. One will be inclined to develop bodhicitta oneself, because one sees the great value in it.

One needs to understand the explanation here in its proper context. When it says it can destroy the lord of death it is not referring to obtaining a miraculous feat, such as going around destroying suffering in other beings and freeing them from death without them having to create any causes and conditions; this is definitely not what is being implied here.

Developing bodhicitta will definitely have a great positive effect upon others. As the great Khunu Lama Rinpoche mentions¹:

The sheer fact of having bodhicitta within one's own mental continuum,
Naturally brings great solace to others
Even animals feel a great sense of comfort and fearlessness,
Not to mention humans and other beings alike.

So, developing bodhicitta oneself, even without any intentional activity on one's part, can bring so much comfort and ease to those around oneself.

However, the actual way that it eliminates sufferings and destroys the lord of death is by imparting the methods and teachings to others, particularly the teachings on what to adopt and what to discard. By presenting beings with the unmistakable teachings of how to accumulate virtue and abandon negativities, and when they adopt those teachings and practices, they will overcome their own sufferings and the causes of sufferings, ageing and death. Imparting advice to others needs to be in accordance with understanding their mental disposition and with a loving and kind attitude. Thus, presenting the unmistakable teachings to others with love and compassion is dependent on having developed bodhicitta oneself first. So this is how developing bodhicitta oneself actually helps to eliminate sufferings and death in other sentient beings. This is the proper way to understand this point.

As mentioned in the commentary, the way bodhicitta destroys the lord of death is by leading sentient beings to the ground which is free from old age and death.

3.1.2.1.2. It destroys poverty

The indication here is that bodhicitta becomes a cause to overcome or destroy poverty. The next two lines of the verse read:

*29cd. It is also the inexhaustible treasure
That eliminates sentient being's poverty.*

The commentary meaning is that

Because it gives inexhaustible material and Dharma, this mind generation is an inexhaustible treasure that eliminates the poverty of migrators.

Actually the meaning of the verse and explanation is quite clear. Generating bodhicitta also becomes the ultimate means for achieving the state where one has complete control over material gain as well as Dharma. When a bodhisattva reaches the eighth ground they obtain complete control over material wealth and knowledge of Dharma, and thus it becomes inexhaustible. It is like having an inexhaustible treasure house that can eliminate the poverty of migrators.

So this is how bodhisattvas benefit sentient beings. Initially, through their acts of generosity and kindness to others, they gather sentient beings close and then they impart their knowledge of the Dharma.

Other benefits touching on the same point are presented by Khunu Lama Rinpoche as:

The nectar of the mind is bodhicitta,
The jewel of the mind is bodhicitta,
The moon of the mind is bodhicitta
The sun of the mind is bodhicitta.

We can see that the way Khunu Lama Rinpoche presents the benefits of the bodhicitta from his own experience is aligned to how Shantideva presents the same meaning of the benefits of bodhicitta. Through his work from his own experience, we can definitely see that Khunu Lama Rinpoche was definitely a great practitioner of bodhicitta. Khunu Lama Rinpoche also said:

Bodhicitta is the optimum way to benefit others,
Bodhicitta is the optimum means for guiding others,
Bodhicitta is the optimum means to teach others.

It is presented in poetic form with very succinct meaning regarding the benefits of bodhicitta. Furthermore, he mentions:

If one wishes to benefit other sentient beings, that is done through bodhicitta;
If one wishes to be the friend of others, then the best way to do that is through developing bodhicitta.
Being a source of reliance, then that is achieved through bodhicitta.

Khunu Lama Rinpoche also mentions that if one wishes to be a virtuous teacher to others, then the optimum way is by generating bodhicitta. This is in line with what Lama Tsong Khapa mentions—without generating the wish for others to be free from suffering and for others to obtain happiness there is no way that one can really benefit others. So, the wish to benefit others is based upon wishing others to be free from suffering and to gain happiness.

3.1.2.1.3. It destroys sickness

The verse which relates to this is the next two lines:

*30ab. It is also the supreme medicine
Pacifying migrators' heavy diseases.*

The commentary reads:

It is also the supreme medicine that thoroughly pacifies all diseases of migrators.

The meaning of the verse is very clear here. The commentary explains bodhicitta is the supreme medicine that thoroughly pacifies the disease of migrators. The meaning here is linked to the earlier explanation, that the way it pacifies the diseases of other migrators is by presenting them with teachings of what to adopt and what to discard, to achieve the state of being free from disease.

As explained in the teachings, the ultimate source of migrators' sickness and disease is basically the three poisons: attachment, anger and ignorance. These really serve as the basis for all kinds of diseases and all sufferings. So the way bodhisattvas benefit beings to eliminate their sicknesses is by presenting antidotes to the three poisons. To overcome attachment, meditate on the unattractive features of the object of attachment. To overcome anger, meditate on love. To overcome ignorance, meditate on interdependent origination and emptiness. Presenting specific antidotes overcomes specific delusions, which are the very causes of all sufferings and diseases. Meditating on them and applying the antidote becomes the means to overcome the particular diseases of attachment, anger and ignorance, thus overcoming all sickness. This is how bodhicitta becomes the means to eliminate the sicknesses of other beings.

Chapter 3

3.1.2.1.4. It destroys the suffering of existence in general

The verse which relates to this is the next two lines:

*30cd. It is the fruit tree that is a resting place for migrators,
Who wander the paths of existence and are tired.*

The commentary reads:

It is also the fruit tree that provides a cool resting place for the migrators who are wandering on the paths of existence and are tired.

The analogy presented in the commentary is that like a tree that provides a cool resting place, those who need that rest are migrators, endlessly wandering on the path of existence and extremely tired. The teachings refer to the three types of existence: birth, death and the intermediate state. So, endlessly cycling through the three types of existence, migrating from one existence to the next, beings are extremely tired. Just as a large fruit tree would provide a cool resting place for those travelling in the heat and sun, bodhicitta is the optimum means for providing that ultimate rest for beings who are wandering in cyclic existence. Some texts would relate this explanation to the path of the medium scope, so bodhisattvas would show the path of the medium scope to those who are trainees in the medium scope, particularly solitary realisers and hearers. General existence is explained here and it means destroying the sufferings of the existence in general by leading to the optimum state of liberation.

The main point is that bodhicitta serves as a means for beings who are wandering on the path of cyclic existence to obtain that ultimate rest of achieving liberation, being free from all samsaric existence.

3.1.2.1.5. It destroys specifically the sufferings of the lower realms

The verse which relates to this is the next two lines:

*31ab. It is the universal bridge that liberates
All migrators from the lower realms.*

The commentary explains that Generating the mind of bodhicitta is also the universal bridge that liberates all migrators from the lower realms.

The analogy of the universal bridge indicates presenting teachings on adopting the ten virtues. Beings then follow this advice, adopting the ten virtues as the means to free themselves from the lower realms or to be reborn again in the lower realms. So this is how to understand how the bodhicitta attitude becomes the supreme means to present the teachings in accordance to beings' capacity and mental disposition; to present unmistakable methods and ways to be free from various types of sufferings, particularly the lower realms. It shows that when bodhicitta has been developed, it spontaneously helps sentient beings without much effort from one's own side. Also, it establishes a very suitable foundation for those who listen to the advice and teachings to naturally be able to adopt that advice and benefit from it. So this again shows the way by which bodhicitta becomes the supreme means to benefit others.

In summary, the main points that have been presented here are how bodhicitta serves as an optimum means to overcome the various levels of sentient beings' sufferings; that it destroys the sufferings of existence in general and particularly helps to destroy the sufferings of the lower realms. This is done by benefiting others. The first step of benefiting others is when bodhisattvas lead sentient beings to the state of liberation from the sufferings of cyclic existence in general. The next step of benefiting sentient beings is when bodhisattvas lead them to the higher status, free of the suffering of the lower realms.

Other commentaries explain the analogy of bodhicitta serving as a universal bridge. The connotation is from a Tibetan word for an actual bridge or platform from which you cannot go back. Providing this platform reverses beings from the lower realms and establishes them in higher rebirths to serve as the means to obtain the highest goal of liberation and enlightenment. This becomes the very basis for beings to further develop the causes which liberate them from samsara and the ultimate liberation of enlightenment.

3.1.2.2. IT CAN ELIMINATE ITS CAUSE

Cause refers specifically to the causes of a suffering existence (samsara) and a rebirth in a lower realm. The two main causes are explained in the subdivisions of this outline:

3.1.2.2.1. Eliminating afflictive obscurations

3.1.2.2.2. Eliminating the obscurations to knowledge

3.1.2.2.1. Eliminating afflictive obscurations

The verse which relates to this is the next two lines:

*31cd. It is the moon shining in the mind
That eliminates migrator's misery of the afflictions.*

The commentary reads:

This mind generation is also the shining moon that eliminates the heat and misery of the afflictions of migrators. That is, it has the power to eliminate all afflictive obscurations.

As mentioned previously, Khunu Lama Rinpoche's verse indicated that bodhicitta is the moon of the mind and the sun of the mind. This explanation also relates to moonlight or the cooling light of the moon.

The commentary explains that this mind generation is like the shining moon, eliminating the heat and misery of migrators' afflictions. This is because it has power to eliminate afflictive obscurations. Using this analogy, moonlight has a cooling effect which eliminates the suffering of the heat felt during the day when it is very hot. As soon as the sun sets and the moon rises, the moon's cooling light eliminates the suffering of extreme heat. Likewise here, the heat is an analogy for the actual misery (or afflictions) of the migrators, all their sufferings. The analogy explains that bodhicitta is that which eliminates all the afflictive obscurations of sentient beings. The main afflictive obscuration is grasping at the self and the delusions in general, but particularly grasping to the self. When bodhicitta has the power to eliminate this, there is no way for sufferings to be experienced, because when the cause of suffering is completely eliminated from the mind there is no way to experience the result, which is suffering. This is how bodhicitta serves to bring this about.

It is good to note here the descriptions of specific symbols, such as the moon, sun and lotus. For example, whenever images of deities or buddhas are presented on the moon, the symbolism of the moon represents bodhicitta. The symbol of the sun represents wisdom realising emptiness. Enlightened beings seated upon a lotus, sun and moon disc actually represent the significance of developing bodhicitta and the wisdom realising emptiness so the individual beings obtain the ultimate state of enlightenment and become a Buddha, an enlightened being.

3.1.2.2.2. Eliminating the obscurations to knowledge

The verse which relates to this is the next two lines:

32. *It is the great sun that dispels
The vitreous humour of not knowing.*

The commentary reads:

It is also the great sun that dispels from the root the non-afflictive not knowing of migrators, the cataract-like obscurations to knowledge. The reason for this is that the wisdom realising emptiness is adorned with great accumulations that exhaust the seed of the obscuration to knowledge.

As explained in the commentary, it is also the great sun that dispels from the root the non-afflictive not knowing of the migrators, the cataract-like obscurations to knowledge. Firstly, the non-afflictive not knowing of migrators refers to the obscurations to knowledge (which as the analogy refers to here, are like cataracts that causes the eyes not to see clearly). What obscures one from seeing ultimate reality directly is the mistaken appearance that obscures one from clearly seeing both truths simultaneously. For as long as one has obscurations to knowledge, one will not be able to see the Two Truths simultaneously, and one's current mistaken view serves like a veil to have mistaken appearance. Because bodhicitta serves as a means to overcome this obscuration to knowledge and remove the veil of mistaken appearance, it is like the great sun.

To further explain this analogy, the sun becomes the means to eliminate darkness because as soon as it rises darkness is completely eliminated. In a similar way, bodhicitta removes the cataract-like obscurations to knowledge completely. The commentary explains that the reason for this is that the wisdom realising emptiness is adorned with great accumulation, and this exhausts the seed of the obscurations to knowledge. Bodhicitta serves as the means for obtaining a great accumulation of merit. The merit based on love and compassion is generated when engaging in the practice of the six perfections; also extensive practice of generosity. All can be accomplished through the power of bodhicitta.

Furthermore, extensive practices of morality are accomplished through bodhicitta, also patience and joyous effort and meditation and finally, the wisdom realising emptiness. When the wisdom realising emptiness is complemented with bodhicitta, it becomes the optimum means to accumulate extensive merit and completely exhausts the seeds of the obscurations to knowledge, by completely eliminating it from the mind stream.

It has now been explained that developing bodhicitta is the ultimate means for overcoming all faults and obscurations and acquiring all qualities to achieve the ultimate state of enlightenment. It shows how bodhicitta serves as a means, and from the moment it is developed along the path, it achieves all the realisations and leads to the ultimate state of omniscience. This is all based on having developed bodhicitta; it becomes the very root and cause.

We'll conclude for the evening by reciting the prayer The Eight Verses of Training the Mind and dedicate it to the late Norman Henderson who, while he might not have been a member of Tara Institute, was definitely a very diligent student, coming here regularly. I have known him from when I was at Chenrezig Institute in Queensland. He used to come when I was up there, so I remember him and have known him for a long time; he is like an old friend. As he passed away recently, we'll dedicate the merit of the recitation of the prayer to him and also to Liam's grandfather who passed away recently.

I had already explained the visualisation that we can adopt for this practice, so I don't need to do that again. So, we try to do that visualisation as we recite the prayer.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

25 February 2014

The Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer that we have just recited should suffice to generate the proper motivation for our meditation practice.

Indeed the Refuge and Bodhicitta prayer is the most profound prayer that we say. If, while reciting the profound words through our mouth, we can also adopt the respectful physical gesture of prostration, and mentally go for refuge and generate the bodhicitta attitude then, within just a few minutes, we will definitely collect extensive merit. There is no doubt about that at all.

What needs to be purified are negativities, which we definitely have. But we also have the means to purify those negativities. And as explained previously, the optimum method to purify negativities is to rely on the objects of refuge and generate bodhicitta. We need to keep this point in mind.

If, after going for refuge wholeheartedly as we recite the prayer, we can visualise the objects of refuge merging into ourselves and thus blessing our mental continuum, our minds will definitely settle down. There is no question that any disturbing thoughts will definitely be appeased by taking refuge in this way.

Bearing that in mind we will now engage in the meditation practice for a few minutes. [meditation]

Now we generate the motivation to receive the teachings, by developing this strong intention:

In order to free all sentient beings from suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself, so for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

During the tong len practice that we engaged in earlier, our intention was to take upon ourselves all the sufferings of all sentient beings, as well as the causes of that suffering and the very imprints giving rise to those causes, whilst in return giving them our happiness and virtues. With that intention in mind, we generate the motivation for the teaching, to reaffirm that having taken on the sufferings of sentient beings we generate the intention to lead them to the ultimate state of happiness i.e. enlightenment. The motivation 'I need to engage in the practice of listening to the teaching' complements the tong len practice that we have just done.

Indeed, engaging in any activity with that motivation in mind will ensure that one's life becomes most meaningful.

3.1.2. Achieving the purpose of others

3.1.2.2. IT CAN ELIMINATE ITS CAUSE

3.1.2.2.2. Eliminating the obscurations to knowledge (cont.)

The relevant verse reads:

32ab. *It is the great sun that dispels
The vitreous humour of not knowing.*

We concluded the teaching last week with these lines, which indicate how bodhicitta serves as a means to remove the obscurations to knowledge, even the very subtle imprints in our mind that are the root of non-afflictive not knowing. This shows that it is our own responsibility to eliminate those imprints by applying the antidote to the obscurations to knowledge. We need to realise that we cannot expect others to remove our obscurations and that we need to take the initiative to do so ourselves. This is what we need to derive as a personal instruction.

3.1.2.3. IT CAN ACHIEVE ALL BENEFIT AND HAPPINESS

This is subdivided into two:

3.1.2.3.1. Achieving all benefit

3.1.2.3.2. Achieving every happiness

3.1.2.3.1. Achieving all benefit

This heading relates to achieving the ability to benefit all other sentient beings, and the lines that relate to this heading are:

32cd. *It is the essence of butter
That is derived from the milk of Dharma.*

We need to see the connection between what is presented here and what we are attempting to do in our own practice. Our earlier meditation was based on wishing to bring about benefit and happiness for all sentient beings and eliminate all their suffering. Achieving all benefit through developing bodhicitta relates to the same intention, and it is good to remember this point.

As you know, one of the methods for developing bodhicitta is the technique of exchanging self with others. In order to engage in that practice one needs to train the mind to the point where we have no hesitation in exchanging self-interest with the interests of other sentient beings. Thus the tong len practice of giving and taking serves as a basis for training the mind in exchanging self with others. When we actually attain that state of being able to exchange self with others and then develop bodhicitta, we will experience tremendous joy. That is because we will have achieved what we are striving to achieve, which is a state of mind that works for the welfare of other sentient beings. That naturally brings us great happiness and joy.

We need to understand how all of these practices - beginning with the meagre attempts of training our mind now - lead to the higher state of actually developing this incredibly precious state of mind called bodhicitta. We need to see the connection between what we are attempting to do now and the ultimate result we intend to achieve.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse quite succinctly:

This mind generation is the butter essence arising from churning the great ocean of milk that is the holy Dharma, with the churning wood of wisdom arising from listening and contemplating.

It is the essence of butter that can generate the taste of achieving each and every benefit, and therefore everybody should strive in it.

Here, the teachings or the doctrine of the Buddha are likened to a great ocean of milk. Butter is created by churning the milk with a wooden paddle, likewise listening to, contemplating and meditating on the Buddha's doctrine, is analogous to using a wooden paddle. Just as butter arises from churning the milk with a wooden paddle, wisdom arises from listening to, and contemplating and meditating on the Buddha's doctrine. Butter is actually a coarse substance that can be further refined to its essence by boiling it, and just like clarified butter, bodhicitta is the very essence of the Buddha's doctrine. This is similar to the presentation in The Three Principles of the Path, which states that bodhicitta is the very essence of the Buddha's doctrine that is praised by all the buddhas.

As the analogy explains, just as the tastiest part of butter is the essence of butter, the tastiest part of the Buddha's doctrine, its essence, is achieving the benefit of all beings through having cultivated bodhicitta. Therefore, one needs to develop that which serves as the very essence of the Dharma.

Developing the essence of the Dharma, which is bodhicitta, begins with the meagre attempts we make now of generating a genuine mind of consideration for others, with a genuine wish to help and benefit others. Part of our training is to develop that intention now to whatever extent we are able to. It would be quite lame to think, 'Oh, since I haven't yet developed bodhicitta, there is not much point thinking about it'. It is because of the very fact that we haven't yet generated bodhicitta that we are being exhorted to strive to develop it.

As mentioned previously, we do that by cultivating loving and kind attitudes to others with whatever means we have now. Then, slowly through our training and familiarity our mind will gradually become more and more attuned to having a genuine sense of concern for the wellbeing of other sentient beings. This then serves as a basis to further develop a genuine sense of love and compassion. This is how we make progress, and further develop the mind of bodhicitta.

The peerless instruction on the generation of bodhicitta by means of listening, contemplating and meditating is none other than this very text that we are studying now, the Bodhisattvacharyavata. This is the best source of advice to listen to, contemplate on and meditate on. So we have the most supreme instructions at hand on how to develop bodhicitta.

3.1.2.3.2. Achieving every happiness

This section of the text is explained in the following verse:

33. *The migrating guests wander on the paths of existence
And wish to engage pleasant enjoyments;*

*It abides close to supreme happiness
And satisfies the great samsaric guests*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

The migrating guests wandering in cyclic existence on the paths of the three existences wish for the pleasant enjoyments of gods and humans.

This mind generation abides close to the supreme method for establishing happiness, and satisfies the many guests from cyclic existence because it establishes the higher status and definite goodness of all sentient beings.

I have explained many times what cyclic existence connotes. As teachings explain, that which binds one to the appropriated aggregates again and again through the influence of delusions and karma is cyclic existence. In other words, the contaminated aggregates that we possess now are an example of cyclic existence. Over countless lifetimes we have uncontrollably obtained such contaminated aggregates, through which we experience the shortcomings of sufferings and so forth. So the real cycle is obtaining the appropriated contaminated aggregates again and again through the influence of delusions and karma. It is as if we are bound to these appropriated, contaminated aggregates which serve as the basis for all unwanted misery and suffering. This is the real meaning of cyclic existence.

The migrating guests are those who are bound by delusions and karma to this existence of obtaining the contaminated aggregates again and again. The paths of the three existences are the desire, form and formless realms. Thus, beings circle in these three different realms again and again. All those beings in the cyclic existence wish for the pleasant enjoyments of the gods and humans. So, not only does bodhicitta bring the ultimate benefit and goodness of liberation and enlightenment, but it also serves as a means to bring about the temporary benefits of humans and gods while circling in samsara.

Furthermore, this mind generation abides close to the supreme method for establishing happiness, and satisfies the many guests from cyclic existence. The reason for that is that it establishes the higher status and definite goodness of all sentient beings. So bodhicitta serves as a means to establish beings in the temporary wellbeing of the most fortunate rebirth in cyclic existence, and while bringing that temporary pleasure and enjoyment, it ultimately brings the definite goodness of the state of liberation and ultimately, enlightenment.

Thus bodhicitta is the supreme method to benefit sentient beings because the generation of this mind brings about the temporary and ultimate wellbeing of sentient beings; that is the main meaning of this verse.

Satisfying many guests also has a connotation of being a most supreme offering. There are explanations in the teachings that one of the best ways of gaining merit is making unsurpassed offerings to the enlightened beings and benefiting sentient beings. Of all the offerings that one can make to the buddhas and bodhisattvas, offering bodhicitta is the best, because it brings benefit for all sentient beings. So the generation of bodhicitta is the most supreme offering and method for accumulating merit.

We need to really contemplate these points, remembering how the generation of the mind of bodhicitta is dependent on first developing love and compassion. Thus, we need to really think about the great value of developing love and compassion again and again and train our mind daily in the development of love and compassion. This means that in whatever activity we engage, whether it is eating or drinking or going about our daily business, we constantly remember, 'I am doing this as a means to benefit sentient beings'. When we eat something, we offer it first to the objects of refuge and then we remind ourselves that we are consuming it to sustain ourselves for the purpose of benefiting sentient beings. When we drink something, we accumulate merit by offering it, and then drink it to quench our thirst and nourish us as a means of supporting ourselves so that we can benefit sentient beings.

If we can relate to every activity this way, seeing it as a means to benefit sentient beings, then we are familiarising our mind with the wish to benefit sentient beings and actually utilising our daily activities for that purpose. So, in this way we slowly and gradually establish a firm foundation for developing bodhicitta. Bodhicitta is not developed instantaneously; it requires effort and a great amount of training.

Of course, in explaining this I am not implying that I have obtained any great experiential levels from practising in this way, but I can assure you that I do attempt to practise in this way. So if you ask me whether I attempt to do these practices then the answer is definitely, 'Yes, I do try to practise like this in my daily life'. If you ask whether I have achieved any great realisation from this practice then the answer will be, 'No, I have not'. However I find that there is great benefit derived even from my genuine attempts to practice. Thus, I entreat you to really familiarise your mind again and again with these practices, and then, through constant familiarity you will gradually see a transformation taking place.

When the commentary says this mind generation abides close to the supreme method, the Tibetan word nyi-war-ne, has the connotation of 'definitely abiding'. So the meaning here is that the mind generation of bodhicitta definitely abides as the supreme method for establishing happiness.

Thus, the generation of bodhicitta is an unsurpassable offering to the supreme enlightened beings, as it is the supreme means to satisfy the many guests in cyclic existence. Why? Because, it establishes high status and definite goodness for all sentient beings.

3.2. Inducing others to be joyful

What is being explained here is that by generating the mind of bodhicitta, one induces joy in others. This can be understood with the analogy of someone who has the potential and ability to take care of all our needs by promising us, 'I will take responsibility for establishing your wellbeing and I will give you everything you need for your happiness'. Hearing such a promise would make us feel extremely joyful. Just the thought, 'Oh, I have someone who is going to take care of me', brings great solace and joy.

What actually is implied here, and this will be explained in the verse, is that someone who aspires to develop bodhicitta is making this promise to establish all beings in happiness: I will take responsibility for establishing all beings in a state of ultimate state of happiness and free them from all suffering. That is the vow that one makes.

The verse relating to this heading is:

34. *Today I have, in front of all protectors, Served migrators the hospitality of
A tathagata and intermediate happiness.
The gods, demi-gods and so forth should rejoice.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Today, in the presence of all the protectors, the conquerors and their children, I have invited all migrating sentient beings as guests and serve them the hospitality of becoming a sugata, one who has accomplished all ultimate benefit and happiness, and until they obtain that state I also give them the permission to satisfy themselves with the intermediate happiness of gods and humans.

'I' refers to oneself, and the time when the vows are taken is today. These vows or promises were made in front of all the protectors, who are the conquerors and the children, i.e. all the buddhas and bodhisattvas. Then one continues, I have invited all migrating sentient beings as guests and serve them the hospitality of a sugata, which indicates that one has made the pledge to lead all sentient beings to that ultimate state of a sugata who has accomplished all ultimate benefit and happiness.

As indicated in the commentary, the ultimate intention is to lead all beings to the ultimate state of buddhahood, but until that state is obtained, one offers all beings the permission to be satisfied with the intermediate happiness of gods and humans.

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

As such I have offered the supreme hospitality and from today onwards the gods, demi-gods, serpent kings and so forth should be happy.

This is to induce joy in others.

So others should be joyful because of the pledges that one has made today, in the presence of all the protectors, buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Then Gyaltsab Je exhorts us:

Preceding the generation of the two minds, as explained in this commentary:

This means that as a precursor to developing the generation of the two minds i.e. aspiring and engaging bodhicitta, one needs to:

Understand that mind generation upon having purified the disrupting conditions of the obscurations and building up the conducive conditions of the accumulations of merit, is the supreme way to take the essence of the precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments, and strive in it.

This is an exhortation that the supreme means to develop the mind of bodhicitta is to engage in the practices of accumulating merit and purifying one's negativities. That is the supreme means to take the essence of one's precious human rebirth with its freedom and endowments. That is what we need to strive for.

Summarising Verse

Gyatso Je offers this summarising verse as a final exhortation:

They who understand they have attained a human rebirth with freedoms and endowments
Should strive in generating the two bodhicittas,
The essential meaning of all the teachings of the conquerors,
The sole path traversed by the tens of millions of their children.

Anyone who understands that they have attained such human rebirth with its freedom and endowments indicates that those who have the wisdom to understand the value of the precious human rebirth, definitely need to strive in generating bodhicitta, which is the essential meaning of all the teachings of the conquerors, and the sole path traversed by the tens of millions of their children.

II. THE NAME OF THE CHAPTER

The root text concludes the chapter with:

This is the third chapter on taking the mind of enlightenment, from Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas.

The commentary reads:

This is the commentary on the third chapter called Taking the Mind of Enlightenment, from the commentary on the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

Now we come to the fourth chapter, the title of which is Applying Conscientiousness. To explain the context of this chapter, we need to return to the subdivisions introduced in chapter 1.¹

2. THE ACTUAL EXPLANATION OF THE STAGES OF THE PATH

2.2. The method for taking the essence

2.2.2. Explaining the individual meanings²

2.2.2.2. THE WAY OF TRAINING IN THE PRACTICES OF GENERATING THE TWO MINDS

2.2.2.2.1. Taking the mind of enlightenment

This was the content of the last chapter. Now we come to:

2.2.2.2.2. The Way of Training in the Actions, the Perfections

This has four subdivisions:

2.2.2.2.2.1. The way of meditating on conscientiousness, the limb preventing the degeneration of the training in the mind of enlightenment³

2.2.2.2.2.2. Explaining the way of training in morality, by relating it to introspection and mindfulness, the methods for keeping virtuous dharmas pure⁴

2.2.2.2.2.3. Explaining the way of training in the remaining four perfections⁵

¹ See the teaching of 26 March 2013.

² The following two subdivisions were listed in the teaching of 2 July 2013.

³ Covered in chapter 4.

⁴ Covered in chapter 5.

⁵ Covered in chapters 6 to 9.

2.2.2.2.2.4. Explaining the way of practising the generosity of offering one's body, possessions and roots of virtue to others, by way of the limb of dedication⁶

This list encompasses all the remaining chapters.

The first three chapters of the text, as you would recall⁷, present the means of generating bodhicitta, which has not yet been developed. The next three chapters, Conscientiousness, Mindfulness or Introspection, and Patience present the means of maintaining the bodhicitta that has been generated. Chapters 7 to 9 present the means of increasing bodhicitta, and the final chapter dedicates the merits of bodhicitta.

2.2.2.2.2.1. The way of meditating on conscientiousness, the limb preventing the degeneration of the training in the mind of enlightenment

This section also includes other practices that are needed for developing bodhicitta.

Conscientiousness is defined as state of mind that prevents one from being influenced by the delusions, and by maintaining enthusiasm it protects one from contaminated states of mind and increases virtue.

This definition has two main elements:

- It is a mental state of mind that prevents delusions from arising
- While maintaining enthusiasm it protects one from contaminated states of mind and increases virtue

That which encompasses all these attributes is called conscientiousness. Without conscientiousness, it said that one will not be able to engage in any of the three trainings of morality, concentration and wisdom. Therefore conscientiousness is an essential state of mind that we must develop if we wish to engage in our practice properly.

CHAPTER 4: APPLYING CONSCIENTIOUSNESS⁸

The chapter has two elements.

- I. Explaining the text of the chapter
- II: The name of the chapter

I. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

The chapter has three subdivisions

1. Short explanation of the way to meditate on conscientiousness
2. Explaining it extensively
3. Summary

1. SHORT EXPLANATION OF THE WAY TO MEDITATE ON CONSCIENTIOUSNESS

The first verse of the chapter reads:

1. *After the children of the conquerors,
Have very firmly accepted bodhicitta,
They should unwaveringly strive always
To not transgress the trainings.*

Gyaltso Je's commentary explanation of this verse reads:

⁶ Covered in chapter 10.

⁷ See 12 February 2013.

⁸ To keep things manageable the numbering system starts again.

After the children of the conquerors, the bodhisattvas, took very firmly the two minds of enlightenment as explained earlier, they should unwaveringly protect them with conscientiousness, so as not to wander from them for even a second.

They should also unwaveringly protect the trainings of the six perfections and the four ways of attracting disciples, so as not to waver from them, and that they never decrease.

I have already explained in the past the connotation of children of the conquerors, and also what conqueror refers to, so you may recall that. Having very firmly established the two minds of enlightenment, which were explained earlier, we must unwaveringly protect them with conscientiousness, so as not to wander from them for even a second. Furthermore they should also unwaveringly protect the trainings of the six perfections and the four ways of attracting disciples, so as not to waver from them, and that they never decrease.

What we need to understand from this is that once a bodhisattva generates the two states of mind of bodhicitta, there are only two activities that they will engage in from then on—activities that encompass fulfilling their own purpose, and activities that encompass fulfilling the purpose of others. The six perfections are specifically the means to fulfil one's own ultimate purpose, although they also directly benefit others. The four ways of attracting disciples are the activities that specifically and directly benefit other beings. Bodhisattvas have no other activities than these two.

The six perfections serve as a means to fulfil one's ultimate goal of achieving enlightenment, solely for the purpose of benefiting other sentient beings. As explained in the teachings, having generated a state of mind of bodhicitta, bodhisattvas are committed to striving to achieve enlightenment, which takes many eons of practice. So bodhisattvas need to ensure that they are not deprived of good conditions and that they have sufficient wealth and so forth over the many lives needed to achieve the ultimate state of enlightenment. Because that takes many eons, one has to ensure that all the conditions are in place so as to be able to continuously engage in the practices until achieving the state of enlightenment. The supreme means of ensuring that one has the appropriate conditions of sufficient wealth and so forth is none other than engaging in the practice of generosity. That is how the practice of generosity is the optimum means to establish those necessary favourable conditions.

In order to engage in the practice of generosity to amass sufficient means in good conditions one needs to have a basis, which is a perfect physical body. This is obtained through none other than the practice of morality. Thus, morality is the main cause of obtaining a perfect body.

Furthermore, having amassed the perfect conditions of sufficient wealth and so forth, and having the perfect base of a sound body, one needs to have a good retinue if one is to make use of those conditions. In both a worldly context and for the Dharma, one needs to have an appropriate retinue to help us to utilise those good conditions. What brings about a perfect retinue is none other than the practice of patience. That is why the practice of patience is said to be essential.

We also need to ensure that whatever activity we engage in is completed. That which ensures that any activity reaches completion is none other than the practice of enthusiasm or joyous effort.

Then we need to make sure that all the earlier good conditions that we have obtained do not become a condition for delusions to arise. So we need to adopt the practice of meditation to ensure delusions do not arise.

Being able to discern what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded is essential, and the unmistakable discriminating wisdom is acquired through the practice of wisdom.

We can see the relevance of all of this to our own practice. By seeing the practical benefits of engaging in these practices of generosity, morality, patience, joyous effort, meditation and developing wisdom, we are further encouraged to engage in these practices to accomplish our ultimate goal.

The purpose of obtaining the perfect conditions we enjoy now is twofold: ultimately it is to benefit other sentient beings, and to achieve one's own ultimate goal. The first three perfections, generosity, morality and patience are a direct means of fulfilling the benefit of other sentient beings.

Our own ultimate purpose is gained through the wisdom that leads one to obtaining the bliss or happiness of liberation. However, if the mind is distracted and wavering then it is not possible to develop that wisdom. So, in order to cultivate that wisdom one needs to have a very stable and undistracted mind, which is established through meditation, in particular concentration.

The ultimate concentration is calm abiding and based on calm abiding one achieves the wisdom of special insight. The union of calm abiding and special insight can only occur after having first obtained calm abiding. So we need to understand that special insight is preceded by calm abiding. However concentration and wisdom cannot be established if one is lazy. Therefore the perfection of joyous effort is essential to achieve both one's own purpose as well to benefit other sentient beings.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

4 March 2014

Based on the motivation we had just generated, we can engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

In our last session we started Chapter 4, which is Conscientiousness.

1. SHORT EXPLANATION OF THE WAY TO MEDITATE ON CONSCIENTIOUSNESS (CONT.)

The importance of applying conscientiousness was explained earlier as being essential to prevent bodhicitta from declining after it had been generated. I also explained how the bodhisattvas' activities are encompassed in the practices of the six perfections and the four means of gathering disciples.

Although I have already identified and explained the four means of gathering disciples previously, I will list them again. They are: giving whatever is necessary; speaking pleasantly; helping others; and consistency between words and deeds. Here we will notice that the incomparably kind Buddha presented these ways of benefiting others in very practical manner.

The first is giving people what they need through generosity. By engaging in giving, you develop an acquaintance with them where they begin to feel comfortable and develop a bond with you. Along with that, if you utter kind and pleasant words, that will really appeal to them.

We can all relate to the benefit of giving, however generosity needs to be accompanied with kind and pleasant speech so that the recipients can receive it gracefully, without fear or hesitation. For example, when you give food to animals, if you do so with pleasant words it creates a gentle atmosphere that makes them feel comfortable, and then they come close to you and gracefully accept the food. If even animals can appreciate this kind and gentle gesture, then there is no need to mention how humans would relate to it as well.

As you would know, generosity is classified into two types: generosity with material wealth and generosity with the Dharma. Likewise, speaking pleasantly can also be related to a worldly context—such as greeting and welcoming people with pleasant words, and presenting the actual meaning of the Dharma.

The third way of gathering disciples, helping others, particularly relates to presenting the Dharma. Taking the example of helping animals again, when an animal has been treated kindly (with food and pleasant words) it develops trust in the owner, who can then explain things which it will follow, like certain behaviour patterns or even tricks. Animals can learn quite a lot of skills willingly from their owners or trainers that they trust. In the context of bodhisattvas helping sentient beings, it refers not only to temporary benefit, but that which will benefit sentient beings in all future lives, up until achieving the ultimate state of enlightenment. As part of the means to benefit other beings, you can see that these ways of gathering disciples play a very important role in developing a good relationship with other beings. It is very much in line with the worldly concepts of enacting good deeds for others, thus we can easily relate to this as being a practical ways and means to benefit others.

When we see how the teaching presents these points so meticulously and logically, it gives us the initiative to implement and integrate them in our own practice. It gives us a deeper sense of understanding, and entreats us to use our intelligence, our reasoning and logical way of thinking. For me it definitely provides very good ways to think critically and logically; I am sure you can relate to it as well.

As explained to me by my own teachers and previous masters, the fourth means of gathering disciples, consistency between words and deeds, means to act in accordance with the Dharma. This relates to both entreating others to act in accordance with the Dharma and to follow the advice of the Dharma oneself. So, the third means is to help others by explaining the meaning of the Dharma while the fourth is to implore others, as well as to follow the Dharma oneself.

In our last session I explained how the six perfections serve as a means to acquire good conditions. It is important to also take note of the opposites to each of the six perfections, as the exact opposite is a hindrance to engaging in the practice. For example miserliness is the opposite of generosity, so when we are affected by miserliness this obstructs us from being generous. We will not be able to perfect the practice of generosity if we don't overcome miserliness. Thus, we need to apply an antidote to overcome miserliness to become more and more accustomed to being naturally generous.

We can definitely relate to the ill effects of strong miserliness. Some are not able to make offerings because they are too miserly to use their resources. Furthermore, out of miserliness some are not able to benefit others with their wealth and may not even be able to use their own wealth to benefit themselves. So we can see in a very practical way how miserliness obstructs one from using one's wealth in an optimum way. The antidote for overcoming miserliness is none other than actually engaging in the practice of generosity, by seeing the advantages and benefits of being generous. As we gradually increase acts of generosity, we will begin to overcome miserliness.

To list the other opposites: the opposite of morality is corrupt morality; the opposite of patience is anger or hatred; the opposite of joyous effort is laziness; the opposite of meditation (concentration) is mental wandering and the opposite of wisdom is corrupt wisdom.

So identifying the opposites of the six perfections and overcoming them is necessary to engage in the actual practices. By relating to a bodhisattva's practice of generosity we can definitely understand how it enables a bodhisattva to fulfil the purpose of others as well as one's own purposes. That should encourage one to also overcome miserliness and begin to practise generosity and so forth.

2. EXPLAINING IT EXTENSIVELY

This is subdivided into two.

- 2.1. Meditating on conscientiousness for bodhicitta
- 2.2. Being conscientious of the trainings

2.1. Meditating on conscientiousness for bodhicitta

This is further subdivided into two.

- 2.1.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to give up bodhicitta
- 2.1.2. The fault of giving it up

The first explains that having taken the bodhisattva vows and making that pledge, it is unsuitable to give up bodhicitta. The reason presented is encompassed in the second point, the fault of giving it up. That is, if one were to give it up, what would the faults be?

2.1.1. The reason why it is unsuitable to give up bodhicitta

The next two verses explain the meaning of this heading.

The first verse reads:

2. *Any action done in the spur of the moment,
Or done without having been considered carefully,
Although having already committed to them,
It is appropriate to analyse whether to act or to leave it.*

The commentary explains the meaning of this verse as follows:

Actions that were just engaged in impulsively, without consideration of their benefits and drawbacks, or actions that were minimally analysed but not well investigated before engaged in, are actions that are suitable to be investigated later on, to decide whether to continue them or not, despite having made an earlier commitment.

The first part of the translation reads actions that were just engaged in and uses the term impulsively which relates to the Tibetan term that has the connotation of not taking any measures to check whether the action one is about to engage in has any advantages or disadvantages, or benefits or drawbacks i.e. just engaging in an activity without first checking. For example, compare taking the bodhisattva vows without first checking the benefits and drawbacks, with first doing some analysis and then taking them. Taking the bodhisattva vows after analysing and understanding them is proper practice, whereas taking the bodhisattva vows without first analysing and understanding what they are would be improper and a fault.

The point to note here is that without consideration of the benefits or drawbacks or actions that were minimally analysed but not well investigated, are suitable to be investigated later on to decide whether to continue or not, despite having made earlier commitment.

The Tibetan commentary begins with despite having made an earlier commitment, which implies that one has already made a promise to do a certain action. However even if one has made a promise, there are actions that are suitable to be investigate later on, and decide whether one should continue doing them or not.

The point being presented here is in relation to a bodhisattva's promise. While this may not apply to us directly, as we have not actually developed bodhicitta yet, nevertheless we can still relate this to other aspects in our everyday life. As I regularly share with you, don't be hasty making promises or commitments to others prior to fully understanding what you are committing to. I have often heard people speak of a commitment in a lamenting way such as, 'Oh, I have to follow this through now because I have already made a promise'. A promise is taken very seriously and even though you no longer find the action suitable, because of a promise you feel an obligation to do it. So my advice, which is in line with what is being presented here, is don't be hasty making promises or commitments prior to investigating whether it is something suitable or manageable for you do to. You need to apply this advice into your everyday life situations.

The main point being presented here is that if normal activities that need further investigation are not given up because a promise is made, then what need is there to mention not giving up bodhicitta! This is explained further in the next verse.

What is explained here can also be understood in terms of the two types of trainees on the path: those of intelligent faculty and those of dull faculty. Those of intelligent faculty investigate thoroughly before they actually undertake any activity or practice etc. whereas those of dull intelligence or faculty don't really have the means to thoroughly investigate. They just accept and engage in the practices without too much investigation.

It is explained in the teachings that when those of intelligent faculty make a promise, the commitment is much more firm and stable than from those with dull faculty. That is because the promise or commitment is made after employing thorough investigation and analysis.

However, there is also a phrase in a text which says that siddhis or attainments may be obtained more swiftly by those with dull faculty because they immediately engage in the practice. By taking much more time to investigate and analyse, those with intelligent faculty sometimes get held back and don't engage in the practice right away. So there can be some drawbacks in taking a longer time to achieve their goals.

This relates to stories about some trainees who actually investigated bodhicitta for twelve years before finally feeling committed enough to engage in the practice, whereas those who did not have much intelligence but strong faith, just engaged in the practice, and would have developed bodhicitta sooner.

In comparison to actions done without considering the benefits and drawbacks, or minimally analysed with further room to be investigated and decided upon, the next verse points out:

3. *But how can I discard that
Which has been analysed
By the buddhas and their children with great wisdom*

And also analysed by myself repeatedly.

The meaning of this verse is explained with a quote from a sutra. It reads:

As it is stated in the Sutra Requested by Subahu, the buddhas, and their children such as Maitreya, ...

At this point you can relate to an earlier explanation about the close children or disciples of the Buddha, such as Maitreya, Manjushri and so forth, who ... investigated with great wisdom the mind, praised its qualities and taught it to be indispensable in the Array of Stalks Sutra and others. One had also investigated with various reasons why one should definitely take this mind, by thinking about its benefits and so on.

The sutra says investigated with great wisdom the mind, which refers to the mind generation of bodhicitta. The close disciples of the Buddha investigated with great wisdom the benefit of bodhicitta, praised its qualities and thought it to be indispensable in Array of Stalks Sutra and other sutras. Likewise one had also investigated with various reasons why one should definitely take up this mind by thinking about its benefits.

So, what is being explained here is that if one had already investigated and analysed the various reasons why one should definitely generate the mind of bodhicitta, by thinking of its numerous benefits (which were explained in the first chapter) then one should definitely see reasons to actually adopt it. Having taken such action to consider the benefits of bodhicitta, how can one discard it? One needs to protect it from degenerating until attaining enlightenment.

2.1.2. The fault of giving it up

This outline is further subdivided into three:

2.1.2.1. The fault of going to the lower realms

2.1.2.2. One will degenerate from the welfare of others

2.1.2.3. One has become far from attaining a ground

The thought of giving it up refers to the two stages of bodhicitta: aspiring and engaging. When one first takes the vows, one generates a genuine aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, and to bring about ultimate benefit and remove all suffering. Based on this very sincere and very strong intention, the aspiration to achieve enlightenment for that purpose is developed. So the aspiring bodhicitta is developed first and then based on that, one goes further and makes a commitment to actually engage in the practices of a bodhisattva in order to accomplish one's aspirations. So the pledges one makes when one takes the bodhisattva vows have great benefit in themselves. It is a great fault to give up bodhicitta after having taken the vows.

In one prayer about generating this mind, it mentions that one invites all sentient beings as guests to partake in the ultimate happiness and bliss of enlightenment. So having invited all sentient beings as one's guests, one then makes a further commitment to engage in the practices to serve the invited guests, to help them partake in ultimate happiness.

The fault, if one were to give up bodhicitta, is going to the lower realms. As one will have degenerated from the welfare of others, one has become far from attaining a ground.

2.1.2.1. THE FAULT OF GOING TO THE LOWER REALMS

This is subdivided into three

2.1.2.1.1. The reason for going to the lower realms

2.1.2.1.2. Stating supporting evidence

2.1.2.1.3. Refuting objections

2.1.2.1.1. The reason for going to the lower realms

The text reads:

4. *After having made this promise
If one does not engage into the actions,
Then one deceives all sentient beings.
How could one become a migrator?*

The commentary clearly explains the meaning of this verse:

Having made the promise to place all sentient beings in the state of enlightenment, if one then does not practice the path to achieve this aim, then one will have deceived all sentient beings. How will one then become a migrator, as one will never go beyond the lower realms?

The first part of the explanation begins with having made the promise to place all sentient beings in the state of enlightenment, if one then does not practice the path to achieve this aim. Many of you, who have already taken bodhisattva vows, will recall that taking the vows initially involves making the promise of generating the aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings. Based on that strong aspiration to free all beings from suffering and lead them to ultimate state of happiness, you then generate the mind, 'I definitely need to achieve enlightenment myself'. So, based on that aspiration, the promise involves willingly making the pledge to engage in practices of the six perfections and the four means of gathering disciples.

The pledge one makes when taking the vows is done in the presence of all enlightened beings, the conquerors and their children, i.e. all buddhas and bodhisattvas, so it is in their presence that one generates the aspiration to achieve enlightenment. If it were just an aspiration then there wouldn't be much more responsibility than just being an aspiration, but the pledge involves making a conscious commitment to engage in the practices to achieve enlightenment. So since these vows and pledges are willingly made in presence of all buddhas and bodhisattvas, one has already taken upon oneself the commitment.

One has already promised sentient beings that one will do that. So having made a pledge, if one gives it up, then one will have deceived all sentient beings. Why? Because it is a lie. One promised to do something but one is not keeping that promise. One is not just deceiving one being. Telling a lie to one being is a non-virtue, so you can imagine the negativity one would incur by deceiving all sentient beings. How will one then one become a migrator implies how then could one ascend to higher and more fortunate realms? One would not. Having incurred the negativity of deceiving all beings one is certain to take rebirth in the lower realms. It is commonly accepted in all religions traditions that lying and deceiving others is a non-virtuous act, and that is what is being explained here.

2.1.2.1.2. Stating supporting evidence

5. *If one will become a hungry ghost
When one does not give to the person
Even the common objects
That one already offered in one's mind,*

In explaining the meaning of this verse, the commentary reads:

Regarding not giving the object of offering that one has already given in one's mind, even if it is just one morsel of food, it states in the Sutra of Close Placement by Mindfulness:

The sutra presents the faults of this mind using a particular example, the fault of not giving something that one has already promised to give. The fault relates to not giving even to one being something as small as a morsel of food. In relation to pledges made to provide happiness to all the sentient beings invited as one's guests; in the presence of all buddhas and bodhisattvas, one has made the pledge to offer them the temporary happiness of high status of humans and gods, and ultimate happiness which is the definite goodness of liberation and enlightenment. That is what one has promised to do for all sentient beings in the presence of all buddhas and bodhisattvas. The commentary next gives explanations from the sutras about the fault of not giving even a small object, such as a morsel of food.

The quote here from the Sutra of Close Placement by Mindfulness reads:

If they do not give even the little they intended, they will take rebirth as a migrator in the hungry ghost realm. If they do not give what they promised, then the sentient being will go to the hell realm.

The Sutra Dividing Migrators also states:

Whichever person, by not giving the rice and vegetables, the roots and fruits they intended to, they will experience the hungry ghost world and terrifying suffering.

The meaning of the sutra is quite easy to understand. It states quite clearly that for whichever person, by not giving the rice and vegetables, i.e. the roots and fruits they intended to give, but does not give it afterwards, the consequence is that they will experience the hungry ghost world and terrifying suffering.

The next verse in relates to this same subheading:

6. *Then how could one go to a happy migration
If one deceives all sentient beings
Concerning the highest happiness
To which one invited them from the depths of one's mind*

The commentary explains the meaning of this verse:

If this is regarded as a cause to be reborn in the hungry ghost realm, then if one deceives all sentient beings with regards to the highest happiness and the temporary happiness of gods and humans, to which one invited all sentient beings, not just in mere words, but respectfully from the depth of one heart with a loud and clear voice, by discarding them, then how can one migrate to the happy realms? One will not.

The commentary clearly explains that when one makes a pledge and then does not give one's own food to others as intended, it creates the cause to be born in the hungry ghost realm.

If one deceives all sentient beings with regards to the highest happiness and temporary happiness of gods and humans, to which one invited all sentient beings, not just in mere words but respectfully from the depth of one's heart with a loud and clear voice: One has actually made a pledge, analysed the benefits and seen the purpose, so the decision is made from the depth of one's heart and one is not taking it lightly. One has considered the vows in all seriousness, not just mumbled them barely audible, but made the pledge in a clear loud voice. This relates to when we took the bodhisattva vows, when we all knelt down and put our palms together respectfully and we repeated the vows quite loudly after the master.

This point relates to those of us who have taken the vows and made those promises. We have followed in these footsteps, so while there are benefits in having taken the vows we also need be mindful of the faults of not upholding them.

2.1.2.1.3. Refuting Objections

As the text explained that the fault of giving up bodhicitta is that one will go to lower realms, an objection is raised:

The commentary first states the objection:

Question: The superior Shariputra, after having previously generated bodhicitta, was engaged in the practice of the perfections when he was asked by a demon for his right hand. Shariputra cut off his right hand and gave it to the demon with his left hand. Because of this he was severely abused by the demon and so Shariputra became sad and gave up bodhicitta. Yet he later attained the state of an Arhat. Does this not contradict what is taught in the quotes?

The objection here is that Shariputra apparently had given up bodhicitta, so Shariputra should have gone to the lower realms instead of attaining liberation.

The commentary explains that Shariputra, having previously generated bodhicitta, was engaged in the practice of perfections. When a demon disguised as Brahmin asked for his right hand and then abused him for giving it him with his left hand, Shariputra became disheartened thinking, 'I can't even help or please one sentient being', and that is when Shariputra gave up bodhicitta. So, we need to take notice that if one gives up the intention to benefit even one sentient being, one is giving up bodhicitta. From this account, we need to understand that giving up on one sentient being becomes a cause for giving up bodhicitta.

The objection here is how could Shariputra later attain the state of an arhat? Does that not contradict what is taught in the sutras?

The verse explains:

7. *Whichever person who gave up bodhicitta,
Their striving for liberation
Is karmic beyond thought,
And only known to the omniscient.*

In explaining the meaning of this verse, which refutes that objection, it explains that

Answer: When Shariputra, or anybody else for that matter, attains Arhatship despite having abandoned bodhicitta, then that is a karma that is beyond the knowledge of ordinary beings and can only be understood by an all knowing Buddha. It cannot be understood by anybody else.

The point here is that despite having given up bodhicitta, Shariputra attained arhatship. This is actually a result of previous karma, but it is an aspect of karma that is beyond the knowledge of ordinary beings. Only a Buddha with an omniscient mind is able to see the subtlety of the karma which became the particular cause for him to attain arhatship. It is generally explained in the teachings that the subtleties of karma are known only by an omniscient mind.

The subtleties of karma are inconceivable in relation to the time a particular karma was created, the individual who created it, and particular circumstances under which it was created. These details are said to be known only by an omniscient mind, the all-knowing Buddha. Consider a contemporary example such as a glass. It is a fact that glass is a combination of many billions of atoms. How many atoms make up this glass and where they came from? It is not something that we are not able to know. It is only something that the mind of a Buddha would know. Likewise, karma with subtleties of time, duration, manner and location, details of previous karmas committed a long time ago, is only known by an omniscient mind. I recall one of the previous masters in Sera monastery, Gyalrong Khensur Rinpoche often used to mention the quote 'karma is unconceivable' is something.

Despite Shariputra having given up bodhicitta at a particular time, and later obtaining the state of arhatship, he not only obtained that state of arhatship as a personal liberation but also to benefit many others who had particular karmic connection with him. They definitely benefited from Shariputra after he had obtained arhatship. So these factors then, the karma that Shariputra would have created in the past to obtain those results is really something which is said to be inconceivable, something which just cannot be known and conceived by ordinary minds.

There are various other explanations as to why, rather than falling to lower realms, Shariputra actually obtained liberation. One explanation is that when Shariputra gave up bodhicitta it was only the conventional bodhicitta he gave up and he did not give up the ultimate bodhicitta which is the realisation of emptiness. And so because he did not give up the realisation of emptiness that is what caused him to obtain the state of liberation. Another explanation is that even though he had given up bodhicitta, it actually became the cause for him to obtain liberation because he hadn't given up his determination to obtain liberation. Both explanations are valid. The first explanation, that is because Shariputra didn't give up ultimate bodhicitta (the realisation of emptiness), is in accordance to Gyaltsab Rinpoche, the author of this commentary. It actually has a profound meaning.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

11 March 2014

As usual we will now spend some time in meditation practice.

[meditation]

Now we can generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

In order to liberate all sentient beings from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I definitely have to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

If we carefully think about the meaning of this very brief motivation, we will realise that it encompasses both the aspirational bodhicitta attitude as well as the engaging bodhicitta attitude. It is aspirational in the sense of making a determination to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, whilst listening to the teachings and making a commitment to practise well encompasses engaging bodhicitta.

2.1. Meditating on conscientiousness for bodhicitta

2.1.2. The fault of giving it up (cont.)

2.1.2.2. ONE WILL DEGENERATE FROM THE WELFARE OF OTHERS

It is good to keep the essential points of the chapter in mind by relating to the outline.

There are three sub-divisions under this category:

2.1.2.2.1. If one's bodhicitta degenerates, then it is a heavy downfall and one's work for the welfare of others will degenerate

2.1.2.2.2. Even if one obstructs the virtue of another bodhisattva it is similar to that, and one will go to the lower realms

2.1.2.2.3. The reason why this is so

2.1.2.2.1. If one's bodhicitta degenerates, then it is a heavy downfall and one's work for the welfare of others will degenerate

If one's bodhicitta degenerates, then it is a heavy downfall, because it is one of the eighteen root downfalls of the bodhisattva vows. Relinquishing bodhicitta is said to be one of the heaviest of the eighteen root transgressions. One's work for the welfare of others will degenerate refers to the fact that if one gives up bodhicitta then that entails giving up the pledge to engage in the practice of the six perfections. As the very basis for benefitting sentient beings, i.e. bodhicitta, is uprooted, one will not be able to adequately benefit sentient beings.

The verse relating to this outline reads:

8. *This is for bodhisattvas
The heaviest of downfalls.
Therefore, if one receives it
One harms the purpose of all sentient beings.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je gives this explanation:

To degenerate from bodhicitta is for bodhisattvas, out of the root downfalls, the heaviest one. Since the wish to benefit degenerates, if one receives this downfall, then it harms the welfare of all sentient beings, because the basis for practice degenerates.

As the commentary clearly explains, allowing bodhicitta to degenerate is the heaviest of the root downfalls of the bodhisattva vows. Giving up bodhicitta harms the welfare of sentient beings because one's bodhicitta has degenerated as a result of having given it up. One harms the welfare of sentient beings because one breaks the pledge to help sentient beings. It is good to take note that giving up bodhicitta is one of the three ways in which a bodhisattva's vows degenerate. Another is giving up working for the welfare of even one sentient being; and the third is having an inclination to follow a path of the Lower Vehicle, e.g. the hearer's path.

Gyaltsab Je further explains that it harms the welfare of all sentient beings because the basis for practice, which is bodhicitta, degenerates. When bodhicitta degenerates, then the very basis for the practices of the six perfections, which are the means to bring about the welfare of sentient beings, is harmed, and hence the welfare of sentient beings is harmed.

Then the commentary quotes from a sutra:

From the Superior Compendium:

Although one has practised the path of the ten virtues
For 10 million eons, if one generates the wish to be a self-liberator arhat,
At that moment morality has received a fault and degenerates.
Generating such a mind is heavier than the defeat of a fully ordained monk's vows.

As explained here, if one generates the wish to be a self-liberator arhat (a state of liberation in the Lower Vehicle) then, at that moment, morality has received a fault and degenerated, even though one has practised the path of the ten virtues for millions of eons. Generating such a mind is heavier than the defeat of a fully ordained monk's vows.

Here we need to take note that bodhicitta degenerates the moment one generates the mind of a Lesser Vehicle goal, by thinking, 'Alas, achieving enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings is too hard'.

Furthermore, as mentioned previously, one gives up bodhicitta if one develops the thought, 'I will never, ever do anything to bring about benefit for this particular sentient being'. It is mentioned in another text that if one part of something degenerates then the whole is affected. The analogy given in the teachings is that if just one bead of a rosary falls off or is damaged, then the whole rosary is incomplete. Those of you who do the six session guru practice will recall that it mentions that giving up bodhicitta is a downfall of the root bodhisattva vows. Also, the tantric vows are broken if one gives up love for sentient beings.

The promise made in the bodhisattva vows is to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, who are as vast as space, and for that purpose one promises to engage in the practices of the six perfections. Thus, taking the bodhisattva vows encompasses all sentient beings. If the promise made was to help only some sentient beings, then not working for the welfare of one sentient would not necessarily be giving up bodhicitta. But a pledge has been made to work for all sentient beings, so if, at some stage, one decides from the depths of one's heart, 'I am not going to benefit this sentient being or engage in working for their welfare', then the bodhisattva promise has been broken. It's good to know why giving up on even one sentient being is giving up bodhicitta.

Gyaltsab Je then explains the meaning of the quote:

As it is stated, if a bodhisattva with vows gives up bodhicitta, he receives a root downfall. If he has no vows, then his negativity is still heavier than the root downfall of the vows of individual liberation.

In Tibetan the last line of the verse, translated here as one harms the purpose of all sentient beings, contains the word men, which has a connotation of being inferior. As some commentaries explain, a bodhisattva, overwhelmed by the goal of achieving enlightenment for the purpose of all sentient beings, might change their goal to that of achieving the liberation of the Lower Vehicle. If they give up bodhicitta in that way, and then attain the state of an arhat, they will, of course, still benefit beings to their capacity. However, compared to the buddhas' ability to benefit sentient beings it is quite inferior; after all, buddhas are able to help liberate countless sentient beings with just one ray of light emanating from their body; that is one explanation of the meaning of this verse.

2.1.2.2.2. Even if one obstructs the virtue of another bodhisattva, it is similar to that and one will go to the lower realms

The verse relating to this reads:

9. *When another, even only for one instant,
Obstructs their merits,
They harm the purpose of sentient beings,
There is no other possibility than to go to the lower realms.*

Gyaltsab Je begins his explanation with:

Whoever obstructs the merits, which are the virtues of a bodhisattva for even just one moment, harms the ability of that bodhisattva to accomplish the welfare of sentient beings. Where else could he go but to the lower realms infinitely?

Here Gyaltsab Rinpoche is emphasising a point made in the teachings, a point that I have presented several times in the past. The meaning of whoever obstructs the merits, which are the virtues of a bodhisattva for even just one moment, harms the ability of that bodhisattva to accomplish the welfare of sentient beings is quite clear. The consequence of this is that there is no other possibility than to go to the lower realms many times over.

Since any activity of a bodhisattva has the sole purpose of leading all beings to the ultimate state of enlightenment, anyone who obstructs the activities of a bodhisattva is obstructing the cause for the ultimate happiness of sentient beings. Such a person definitely creates the cause to take infinite rebirths in the lower realms. Another way of understanding obstructing the merits is that it refers to causing the bodhicitta of a bodhisattva to degenerate. As mentioned previously, that would be a very heavy misdeed, which will be a cause for infinite rebirths in the lower realms.

The main point being emphasised here is that every deed of a bodhisattva is a cause for the unsurpassable happiness of all sentient beings, and if one obstructs those deeds even for a moment then one is obstructing the unsurpassable happiness of all sentient beings; that incurs great negativity.

To back up this explanation Gyaltsab Je quotes from a sutra.

From the Sutra of Magical Emanations Definitely Pacifying:

It is heavier to obstruct the virtue of a bodhisattva of offering one instance of food or drink to an animal, than to rob all sentient beings of Jambudvipa of their food and kill them.

As the quote says: It is heavier to obstruct the virtue of a bodhisattva of offering one instance of food or drink to an animal, than to rob all sentient beings of Jambudvipa (or the world) of their food and kill them. This clearly explains that obstructing a bodhisattva's deeds incurs much more heavy negative karma than actually robbing others of their food and life.

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary further explains:

Because there are quotes like that, one should be careful regarding this point. One does not know who is a bodhisattva and so it is very easy to make this mistake. If one is able to protect oneself from this, then one is able to abandon the door of creating most faults with regard to people.

Here Gyaltsab Rinpoche is re-emphasising a point that he makes in his other works. We cannot judge other people from their appearances, and we cannot know another person's status just from their appearance. In other texts he says that one has to be very mindful and careful about judging and criticising others, because it could be similar to walking over a pit of fire that has been camouflaged with branches. If one is unaware of the pit of fire and, based on the external appearance, steps onto the branches, one will fall into the pit of fire and will be consumed by it. This analogy illustrates how we need to be very careful when it comes to judging and being critical of others, because we cannot know who is a bodhisattva. As Gyaltsab Rinpoche emphasises here, we cannot know who is actually a bodhisattva, because real bodhisattvas hide their qualities, and would appear as anything but a bodhisattva.

Here we can consider the example of the great Khunu Lama Rinpoche. When I had the great privilege of meeting him in Bodhgaya, he was wearing very simple clothes, almost rags really, and living very simply with only basic needs. If you saw Khunu Lama Rinpoche walking around in the street, you might think he was an ordinary beggar. People who didn't know him would not see his great qualities, but he was in fact a great practitioner of bodhicitta and a real bodhisattva. Even though I have not received any formal teachings from him I definitely had the opportunity to make a good Dharmic connection with him. When I went to see him he gave me a seed from the bodhi tree, and said I should recite the mantra of the Buddha and eat the seed as, 'That will be really good for you'.

Even though I didn't take particular note of it at that time, when I look back I really feel that it was a very significant gesture. Receiving that seed and instruction from Khunu Lama Rinpoche was almost a prediction that I would really try to take strong interest in teachings such as the Bodhisattvacharyavatara. I received teachings on the Bodhisattvacharyavatara from His Holiness, who received it from Khunu Lama Rinpoche. So it is a very close lineage—I received the teachings from a bodhisattva who received it directly from Khunu Lama Rinpoche himself. I have had that privilege of studying the Bodhisattvacharyavatara and now I have the opportunity to teach and share it with you.

When I met Khunu Lama Rinpoche I definitely had the opportunity to make a good connection with him. Even though I did not have much money I did have a silver coin with me which I was able to offer to Khunu Lama Rinpoche; it was the greatest offering I could make at that time. And in return Khunu Lama Rinpoche gave me that seed from the bodhi tree.

To return to the commentary, since one doesn't know who is a bodhisattva and who is not, if one refrains from this misdeed of criticising and being judgemental of others, or, worse, harming them and their good deeds, one is able to avoid the great misdeed of potentially harming a bodhisattva.

Also, as explained in the Precious Garland, harming others who are engaged in virtuous deeds such as Dharma practice is a great misdeed, because one is depriving them of the opportunity to create the causes for their happiness over many future lifetimes. So we also need to be really mindful about not harming the Dharma practice of others by causing them to give up the Dharma and so forth; we really need to be mindful of these points.

So we really need to take on board this succinct advice from Gyaltsab Rinpoche and try implement it in our own lives, then we won't create those misdeeds.

2.1.2.2.3. The reason why this is so

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section with a question.

Why are the abovementioned actions of infinite negativity?

The relevant verse reads:

*10. If one degenerates just by harming the happiness
Of even one sentient being,
What need is there to mention
Harming the happiness of beings infinite like space?*

Then Gyaltsab Je states:

If one destroys the happiness of abiding with life of just one sentient being, one degenerates from one's high status.

What need is there to mention that one will be reborn in the lower realms if one destroys the cause for the highest happiness of all sentient beings equalling space?

If one destroys the happiness of abiding with life of just one sentient being is basically saying that if one robs just one sentient being of their life, then one's high status degenerates. This is an unequivocal statement that the consequence of taking the life of just one sentient being isn't restricted to the loss of life of the other, but has the inevitable consequences of causing one's own high status to degenerate. That being the case with the life of one sentient being, what need is there to mention that one will be reborn into the lower realms if one destroys the cause for the highest happiness of all sentient beings equalling space? Again, we have a very clear explanation of the great negativity that one will incur in that instance; we need to be very mindful of that.

These explanations explain why obstructing the merits and virtues of a bodhisattva are a cause for infinite rebirths in the lower realms. If one creates a great misdeed of harming the happiness of even one sentient being, then by implication, obstructing the happiness of infinite numbers of sentient beings, who are as vast as space, will definitely be a cause for infinite negativity and infinite rebirths in the lower realms.

This is another very meticulous presentation: first there is an explanation, which is followed by logical reasons, which are illuminated with analogies and examples. It is important that when we read a text we are able to make that connection between its earlier and later parts, and so derive the full meaning of the text. It is good for us to know how to relate to the texts we study in this way.

The explanation we have just covered is also a profound explanation of the cause and effect sequence of karma. As mentioned earlier, one's high status degenerates if one destroys the happiness of abiding with life of just one sentient being. The implication is that those who are ignorant of the cause and effect sequence of karma will engage in acts of negativity, such as taking the life of others. It is basically through the ignorance of the law of karma that one incurs the fault of allowing one's high status to degenerate. So we can regard ourselves as being extremely fortunate to have been introduced to the law of karma. Through having some understanding and faith in the law of karma we are protected from creating misdeeds that would be the cause for one's own high status to degenerate.

2.1.2.3. ONE WILL BECOME FAR FROM ATTAINING A GROUND

As will be explained in the verse and in the commentary, it is implied here that if one generates very strong bodhicitta at one point, gives it up later and then strongly regenerates that bodhicitta, one will still be far from attaining a ground.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

*11. Thus, those with the heavy downfall
And with strong bodhicitta,
Should they further alternate in cyclic existence
Shall be far from attaining a ground.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Thus as explained earlier, those who have received the heavy downfall of abandoning bodhicitta, as well as those who re-generate bodhicitta strongly afterwards, will further circle in cyclic existence alternately, by taking alternate rebirths in the lower realms and in the higher realms due to afflictions and karma. It will take a long time to obtain the grounds such as Very Joyous and so forth. Therefore one should strive to avoid the degeneration of one's bodhicitta, even at the cost of one's life.

This is clearly explaining that for anyone who has incurred the heavy downfall of abandoning bodhicitta, as well as those who regenerate bodhicitta strongly afterwards, will further take alternate rebirths in the lower realms and higher realms due to afflictions and karma. Thus, as explained here, it will take a long time to obtain the grounds such as Very Joyous and so forth.

This explanation is quite specific: once bodhicitta has been developed strongly it has to be maintained without degeneration to obtain the intended result of enlightenment for the sake of all beings. Even though this explanation is directed towards bodhisattvas who have developed bodhicitta, it is also relevant to us. We sometimes have a strong aspiration to develop a good attitude and meditate, and we try to practise the Dharma with a lot of zest. But sometimes we completely forget about that and allow the delusions to run rampant. This is particularly the case when we leave this room. During a session we might assume a pious aspect of meditating and so forth, and then as soon as we leave we become completely crazed with attachment. We need to take the advice given here as personal instruction, which is to maintain continuity in our practice. The habit of vacillating between practising and not practising does not bear any fruit.

2.2. Being conscientious in the trainings

This section is divided into three:

2.2.1. Conscientiously abandoning faults

2.2.2. Conscientiously meditating on virtue

2.2.3. Conscientiously abandoning the afflictions

2.2.1. Conscientiously abandoning faults

Here there are five subheadings:

These are quite empirical points; it is good to have a general understanding of the structure and sequence of the sub-headings.

2.2.1.1. If one does not abandon negativity and downfalls one will stay in the lower realms

This shows us the importance of recognising negativities and downfalls. Then we can protect ourselves from committing them, and if they are created, we need to purify them. Otherwise we will have to endure the consequence of staying in the lower realms for a long period of time.

2.2.1.2. The buddhas and bodhisattvas will remain impartial

This indicates that if we don't take the initiative to develop and to uphold the bodhicitta vows and so forth from our own side, then the buddhas and bodhisattvas will remain impartial because there is not much more they can do for us. They can't do anything extra for us if we don't take the initiative to implement these vows in our own practice.

2.2.1.3. The freedoms and endowments will be difficult to find

2.2.1.4. If reborn in the lower realms one has no opportunity to generate virtue

2.2.1.5. Why it is difficult to find freedoms and endowments

2.2.1.1. IF ONE DOES NOT ABANDON NEGATIVITY AND DOWNFALLS ONE WILL STAY IN THE LOWER REALMS

Again, this is a personal instruction; it is really important to ensure that whatever activities we engage in become a cause for attaining liberation and enlightenment. Thus it is important for us to check whether an activity is in line with creating the causes for liberation and enlightenment, or whether it could become a cause to be reborn in the lower realms. One needs to investigate and analyse one's activities in this way to protect oneself from these unwanted consequences.

The verse that relates to this outline is:

*12. Therefore I should practice respectfully
According to my promise.
If I do not strive starting from today
Then I will go from low to low.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Therefore I should practise respectfully the trainings to attain enlightenment for the welfare of sentient beings according to my promise.

If, after having generated bodhicitta and taken the vows, I do not make an effort, I will continuously go from lower realm to lower realm due to heavy downfalls.

As the commentary clearly explains, because of the reasons explained earlier, I should practise respectfully the trainings to attain enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings according to my promise. Having considered the consequences of giving up bodhicitta (or allowing bodhicitta to degenerate), one commits here to practise respectfully, which means with great reverence, and one practises and engages in the training with great humility to attain enlightenment for the welfare of all sentient beings in accordance with the promise that one has made earlier. So this is what is clearly explained.

Furthermore, if after having generated bodhicitta and taken the vows, I do not make an effort, I will continuously go from lower realm to lower realm due to heavy downfalls reminds us again of paying heed to avoiding the downfalls. Here, downfalls refer to breaching a commitment of the bodhisattva vows. Likewise for those who have self-liberation vows, one incurs a downfall if one breaches a commitment of the self-liberation vows.

2.2.1.2. THE BUDDHAS AND BODHISATTVAS WILL REMAIN IMPARTIAL

The root text is introduced with this rhetorical thought:

One may think: I shall be all right because the buddhas and bodhisattvas will rescue me.

This section indicates that one cannot be complacent and think in this way. It is also indicating the unique manner in which the Buddha's teachings benefit sentient beings. You should take note of this.

The main point presented here is that we cannot be complacent, thinking, 'Even though I've not managed too well to date, things will be better later on'. We often fall into this habit of thinking, 'Oh, maybe I didn't do so well this year, but that's fine. I will do better next year' or 'Next time round, I will do better!' We often procrastinate in this way and rather than taking the initiative to put everything into practice now, we leave it for later.

Here, the fault is along the same lines: even if I have incurred some faults and so forth, the buddhas and bodhisattvas who are comparatively kind, will definitely rescue me and I will have no problem.

The verse which relates to this is:

13. *Although innumerable buddhas benefiting
All sentient beings have passed,
Due to my faults
I was not an object of their help.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with:

Innumerable buddhas and bodhisattvas who have worked for the benefit of all sentient beings have passed already, but due to one's own fault of degenerating bodhicitta and the trainings, one did not become the object of their cure.

As the commentary explains, innumerable buddhas and bodhisattvas who have worked for the benefit of all sentient beings have passed, which means that they have come to this world and have passed on. But due to one's own fault of degenerating bodhicitta and the trainings, one did not become the object of their cure.

This is also in line with a verse in the Guru Puja, which states

Even with the countless buddhas who have descended,
I have not been able to be subdued.

The implication of the heading The buddhas and bodhisattvas will be impartial is that if one allows one's bodhicitta and practices to degenerate then even though they are kind and have descended, one will not be an object of benefit from the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Then, Gyaltsab Je quotes this line:

From the Ornament of Clear Realisation:

Although the king of gods shower rain, and so forth

This is an analogy: even though the gods may send down heavy rains, if the seed in the ground is actually faulty or rotten then no matter how much rain descends, it will not be able to sprout. The fault is not the lack of rain, but lies with the seed. Likewise, the rain of Dharma from innumerable buddhas has fallen, but because of their faults many sentient beings have not benefitted from that, and thus realisations and so forth have not sprouted in their minds.

Then Gyaltsab Je continues his commentary with this:

One may then think: I will be all right because they will rescue me later.

Then follows the second verse under this sub-heading:

14. *If I continue to act like this
It will be the same again and again.
I will experience sickness, bondage,
Being cut and mutilated in the lower realms.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation of the meaning of the verse reads:

If I continue to act recklessly, I shall not become the object of their cure and will have to experience suffering continuously. I will have to take rebirth in the lower realms and even if I take rebirth in the happy realms I will have sickness and lack of freedom.

Either that or I will have sickness in the lower realms, and experience innumerable sufferings there, such as my arms and legs being cut off, and my body being lacerated.

This is explaining that after having made the pledge and generated bodhicitta, if one actually gives it up and acts recklessly, then one will not become an object of their cure. Rather, one will have to experience suffering continuously.

In relation to the ripened results, one will have to take rebirth in the lower realms. The environmental results are that, even if I take rebirth in the happy realms, such as the human realm, I will have sickness and lack of freedom. Even when reborn in the human realm, one may still experience innumerable sufferings such as arms and legs being cut off and my body being lacerated and so forth. So these are the types of sufferings that can be experienced even in a higher rebirth.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

18 March 2014

As usual we will now spend some time engaging in the meditation practise.

[meditation]

It is important to generate the appropriate motivation to receive the teachings. The main point is to ensure that the motivation is not tainted with self-interest. Then it is important to familiarise our minds with the wish to benefit others, as this naturally reduces self-interest. We need to intentionally develop this approach because otherwise almost every activity in which we engage has 'What is in it for me?' at the forefront of our minds. The practical benefit of generating the wish to benefit others is that the more we familiarise our minds with this wish, the less likely we will intentionally harm others. At the very least it will prevent us from harming others and actually help us to benefit whenever possible. By cultivating this approach we can start to measure the extent to which we have developed the genuine wish to benefit others.

Lama Tsong Khapa highlights that if we genuinely engage in benefiting others then our own needs will be fulfilled subsequently; this is an essential point. At his recent teachings in India His Holiness the Dalai Lama twice emphasised this point; we need to derive the real meaning from this. And that is, if we genuinely benefit others, our own needs will naturally be fulfilled subsequently, which in turn implies that we do not need to intentionally think or worry about our own needs. This approach prevents one from feeling discouraged from benefitting others. To summarise, the main point is that if one knows that one's own needs will be met and that we are not missing out by benefiting others, then one will not feel overwhelmed or discouraged about helping others. These are the essential points to bear in mind.

2.2.1.3. THE FREEDOMS AND ENDOWMENTS WILL BE DIFFICULT TO FIND

In relation to oneself, the point here is that if we give up bodhicitta (as mentioned previously), then this causes difficulty in finding the freedoms and endowments again.

As the outline here presents, the freedoms and endowments will be difficult to find, so we need to take this as a personal instruction to be conscientious in utilising the freedoms and endowments that we have now obtained. This heading is subdivided into two:

2.2.1.3.1. If bodhicitta degenerates, the freedoms and endowments with the condition of four wheels are difficult to find

2.2.1.3.2. Although attaining one, as it disintegrates quickly make an effort

2.2.1.3.1. If bodhicitta degenerates, the freedoms and endowments with the condition of four wheels are difficult to find

Due to a lack of conscientiousness, if one's bodhicitta degenerates, then the freedoms and endowments and the conditions of the four wheels, which are necessary to traverse the Mahayana path, will be difficult to find.

I will list and then explain the four wheels:

1. Living in a conducive place
2. Relying on a sublime being
3. Making aspirational prayers
4. Accumulating merit

1. The first is to abide in a place which is conducive for the Mahayana path to be actualised. This is also presented simply in some texts as living in a place where one can accumulate virtue.

2. The second is to associate and rely on a sublime being, such as a virtuous friend, who leads one on a path to abandon negativity (overcoming faults) and adopt virtue (acquiring good qualities). Thus, the first indicates the kind of place that one should abide in, and the second is in relation to the kind of being that one should rely upon.

3. The third is to be endowed with the results of aspirational prayers that one has previously made.

4. And the fourth is to be endowed with the results of previously accumulated merit.

The conditions of the four wheels were also presented in Precious Garland. As direct advice to the king, Nagarjuna highlighted that the freedoms and endowments with the condition of the four wheels are difficult to obtain in the future. He exhorts the king, 'since you have obtained the eight freedoms and ten endowments with the conditions of the four wheels now, you must definitely use them to ensure that they don't go to waste, by practising the Dharma'.

To take this as personal instruction, we need to relate all the points in the four conditions to our own lives; that is, to actually see the significance of making aspirational prayers and see the significance of accumulating merit etc. Whatever attempt we make to accumulate merit is extremely important because the merit that we accumulate now will be experienced later as ripened results with favourable conditions. Likewise, making very strong aspirational prayers now when we have the opportunity is also important and has great significance. As mentioned in other sutras and teachings, the enlightened beings are constantly benefiting sentient beings now as a result of their past aspirational prayers. These are the points we need to keep in mind by understanding their significance.

The main point here is that it is not sufficient just to have the eight freedoms and ten endowments and the conditions of the four wheels. What we need to do is ensure that they are utilised by practising the Dharma to bring about the ultimate goals we seek. That is the main point. It is presented here that the freedoms, endowments and conditions of the four wheels are extremely difficult to find, so we definitely need to utilise them wisely. You will recall that at the end of the Guru Puja there is a dedication, 'May I not be separated from the four Mahayana wheels'. This is exactly what is being explained here.

The commentary introduces the meaning of this verse with a hypothetical query:

One may think: I will make an effort when I attain the freedoms and endowments later on.

One may become complacent by thinking I will make an effort when I attain the freedoms and endowments later on. So, as a way to overcome this sort of apathetic resolution in one's mind, the verse presents:

15. *The coming of a tathagata
Faith and the attainment of a human body—
These, making it possible to meditate on virtue,
Since they are rare, when will they be attained?*

The commentary then reads:

To have attained the five personal endowments and the five circumstantial endowments that make it possible to meditate on virtue, is as rare as the Udumbara flower.

These are, among others:

- A tathagata has descended.
- One has faith in the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings.
- One has also attained a human body.
- One has been reborn in a central country.
- One has complete faculties.
- One has not transgressed the border of karma.

The commentary explains that a tathagata (or a buddha) has descended relates to one of the endowments. The ten endowments are categorised into five personal or internal endowments, and five that are circumstantial or external endowments. That a Buddha has descended to this earth is an external endowment. It relates to the fact that we are born in a light eon or an illuminated eon, which is at a time when the Buddha has descended to this earth; thus this condition is intact for oneself. There is also the period called a dark eon, which is a time when the Buddha has not descended.

The next line in the verse, One has faith in the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings is a personal endowment. The Lam Rim teachings present this in abbreviated form as having faith in the source, which is having faith in the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings. It is very rare indeed to have genuine faith in the three baskets of the Buddha's teachings.

The next lines are: One has also attained a human body and not only has a human body been obtained, but one has been born in a central country. These are both personal endowments.

The final two lines are: One has complete faculties and One has not transgressed the border of karma (or extreme actions).

The five personal endowments have been explicitly presented here: one has faith in the Buddha's teachings; one has obtained a human body; one has been reborn in a central country; one has complete faculties and one has not transgressed the border of karma, for example having wrong views about karma is concluding that karma doesn't exist, or that the objects of refuge don't exist and so forth.

Among the five circumstantial endowments 'a tathagata has descended' is presented here. The remaining four after the Buddha has descended are: the Buddha has taught; the teachings still remain in the world; there are those who are practising the teachings; there are those who are kind and support practitioners.

For us, all these endowments are intact. There is no question we've been born a human; born in a light age when the Buddha has come to this world and taught, and where the Buddha's teachings remain; born in a central country where the Buddha's teachings are taught; and being born with full faculties. Even though we may not have met the actual Buddha Shakyamuni, the teachings are presented to us by great teachers of his direct lineage. As these teachers represent Buddha Shakyamuni, we have received the unbroken lineage of the teachings from the unmistakable masters who are practicing at this time.

The commentary continues:

If this is so rare, then to have attained a precious human rebirth where one trains in the two minds is even rarer.

The precious human rebirth refers to one with the endowments, and where one trains in the two minds refers to the two minds of bodhicitta. The key point here is that if it is difficult to obtain the endowments, then to actually attain a state where one develops the two minds of bodhicitta is even rarer.

2.2.1.3.2. Although attaining one, as it disintegrates quickly make an effort

The next verse is preceded by another hypothetical doubt:

One may think: This body I have currently attained has no obstructing conditions against it and is endowed with conducive conditions. Hence I shall practise later.

This doubt represents the need to contemplate on death and impermanence as a way to show how such doubts and queries occur and obstruct one from utilising one's perfect opportunities.

The verse reads:

16. *A day like this without sickness,
Although there is food and no harm,
Life is deceptive on a momentary basis,
The body is a one-time loan.*

The commentary begins with:

One should not act as if one has leisure.

We need to really consider this point, as we often procrastinate about our practise of Dharma by falling under the illusion that we have time to practise later. When we look at how this thought affects us in what we do now, it leads to mostly non-virtuous activities which incur negativities. One must judge one's own activities. If one finds one is leaving one's practise until later, then what is being done now is activities that will incur negativity. This is the fault of thinking that we have leisure and that we have plenty of time to practise later.

An understanding of death and impermanence definitely relates to this point in that the reason why one should not act as if one has leisure is because one's life with the freedoms and endowments could end at any moment and then one's opportunity to practise Dharma would have been completely wasted.

The commentary further explains:

A human body without the obstructing condition of sickness is like a day in the context of saying: 'A day like this'.

The key here is the word 'a day' (or 'a sun' in Tibetan) which means a day without sickness.

The commentary goes on:

But a day like this, without sickness, without the obstructing conditions of harm...

This line refers to factors that oppose one's health or wellbeing, oneself in general, or one's life conditions

...and with the conducive conditions of food and so forth, is deceptive....

This line explains that it is deceptive to maintain the view that one has everything going well for oneself (food etc.) because, as the commentary goes on to explain:

Life does not abide even for one moment and disintegrates quickly. This body is only a one-time loan and one has no power over it.

The point presented here is that our life is being used up on a momentary basis, and it can end at any given moment. Thus one should not fall under the deception that one has time to practise the Dharma later on.

The commentary uses the analogy that the body is like a one-time loan. This is a very significant analogy to illustrate the point that our body is indeed like a loan, because we have to give it back—we don't have real power over it; i.e. all the good conditions that we have with this body can end at any moment. Recall using something borrowed: we always know we do not have complete control over the object because it belongs to someone else, and eventually will have to be given back. Also, we cannot use it for as long as we want, or do anything we like with it. Because it is on loan we have to take good care of it and give it back at the appropriate time. Similarly, our bodies are like this. An analogy presented in the thirty-seven practices of a bodhisattva compares our bodies to a guest house with the guest being our consciousness. So just as a guest stays in a guest house for a short time and then moves on, our consciousness comes into this body, remains for a short time and then moves on.

The teaching emphasises that our body is like something which is on loan. If we ask ourselves whether our body belongs to oneself, then technically it does, however we also recognise that we don't have real power or ownership over it because we have to discard it. At the time of death, the consciousness moves on and we have to leave our body behind. The Lam Rim teachings state that since our consciousness will definitely depart from our body, only the Dharma will help us at that time. This is the point to recognise: that it is only the Dharma that will help one at the time of death when our consciousness departs the body. As only the Dharma can help us, we need to try and implement it in our everyday lives to the best of our ability. I have tried to emphasise these points to you, and of course I do this out of great concern and kindness for your well-being. Recognise that you have an opportunity to accrue virtue even in everyday activities such as eating and drinking, by making offerings, by reminding oneself that one is eating for the sake of benefitting all sentient beings, that one is drinking for the benefit of all sentient beings etc. In this way, whatever activity one does, when one walks, sits, does tasks at work, in short, whatever activity one engages in can be utilised, and incorporated into one's practise so that it becomes a means to accumulate virtue. The practise of Dharma in short is to engage in creating virtue.

The commentary concludes:

Therefore, do not act as if there is time, and make an effort.

2.2.1.4. IF REBORN IN THE LOWER REALMS ONE HAS NO OPPORTUNITY TO GENERATE VIRTUE

Try to embrace what is being presented here and take it to heart. As I remind you again and again, don't lose the opportunity to practise or accumulate merit and virtue in whatever way you can now, when you have the opportunity, because if you were to lose that opportunity, it would be an incredibly great loss. It is hard for us to imagine being reborn in the lower realms (such as an animal) where one would not have the same opportunities again. In comparison to losing wealth, losing the opportunity to practise Dharma is a far greater loss. Recently you might have heard of instances where some very wealthy people, due to certain circumstances, lost their wealth and consequently became depressed, sick and died soon afterwards. All the sickness, the worry and the sadness was caused merely by losing material wealth. Compared to losing the opportunity to practise Dharma, losing material wealth is not really significant at all. Losing material wealth will not cause one to go to the lower realms, but losing the opportunity to practise Dharma is definitely a cause to go to the lower realms and be reborn as something like an animal. Therefore, pay attention to the following points.

Under this heading there are three subdivisions:

2.2.1.4.1. There is no opportunity for virtue in the lower realms

2.2.1.4.2. If one does not strive while in the happy realms one will be confused in the lower realms concerning what is to be practised and abandoned

2.2.1.4.3. It is extremely difficult to be liberated from the lower realms

2.2.1.4.1. There is no opportunity for virtue in the lower realms

The verse is again preceded with a hypothetical query:

It is unsuitable to relax, thinking: I will attain a succession of precious human rebirths, so I will practise later on.

The verse reads:

17. *With behaviour like this
I will not even attain a human body.
If I do not attain a human body
There will be only negativity and no virtue.*

The commentary reads:

Someone like myself, through actions that create negativity and no virtue, will not even attain a human body in the next life.

If I take rebirth in the lower realms, without attaining a human body I will only generate non-virtue and not the slightest amount of virtue, and it will be difficult to be reborn again in the happy realms.

As the commentary indicates we need to take the advice here as personal instruction. When looking into one's own behaviour, someone like myself, one is one's own best judge; one knows oneself best. Therefore looking honestly into oneself, if one's actions incur negativity and hardly any virtue through actions that create negativity and no virtue then the result is that one will not even attain a human body in the next life. This aims to counteract the notion we may have that: 'Oh, if I don't get around to doing well in this life I shouldn't worry too much because in my next life I can continue to practise.' But what does obtaining a human rebirth in the next life depend on - virtue or negativity? If the causes depend on virtue, then the question one needs to ask oneself is, 'Have I accumulated virtue?' Is one actually engaging in virtue now, or is one engaging more in negativity? This is something we have to look into. If, when you look into your actions you find that you are creating virtue and no negativity, then a good rebirth in your next life is guaranteed. But if, after looking into your actions you find you are creating more negativity and hardly any virtue, then, as the commentary states, you will not even attain a human body in the next life.

The commentary continues: If I take rebirth in the lower realms, I will only generate non-virtue and not the slightest amount of virtue, and it will be difficult to be reborn again in the happy realms. So, if one has found that one's actions are mostly negative, then the result is rebirth in the lower realms. If one were to be born in the lower realms, the opportunity to accrue virtue is almost none. Thus, since it is hardly possible to accrue virtue in the lower realms, it will be extremely difficult to be reborn again in the happy realms such as a human again.

The emphasis here is the importance of ensuring that one engages in virtue and shuns negativity. The cause for a fortunate rebirth in the happy realms is virtue, and the cause for rebirth in the lower, unfortunate realms is non-virtue. To be free from a rebirth in the lower realms, we must shun negativity and adopt virtue. At the time of death we don't disappear and become nothing; there is a continuity. Even those who believe in a creator or God agree that we don't completely disappear or disintegrate at the time of death and that there is continuity. They believe that if one has acted according to God's wishes then one will progress into a good state, and if not, one will go into an unfortunate state. The explanation here is the same: if we have created negativity we will have an unfortunate rebirth, and if we have accumulated virtues we will have a fortunate rebirth. The point is, as we will not disappear and become nothing after our death, we need to take responsibility for ensuring that we have a good rebirth. His Holiness explains that what the Christian faith calls the soul is similar to what we call the 'self'. So even in the Christian faith they say that after death the soul continues.

Again, why is it difficult to be reborn again in the happy realms? Firstly, we can relate to the existence of unfortunate rebirths. So, if we were to be reborn in any of these unfortunate states, such as the hell realms, the hungry ghost realms or the animal realms, we would be completely immersed in suffering. If this occurs there would be hardly any opportunity for virtue to occur in the mind. Take the example of the animal realm, where we can see that with many, their very existence depends on preying on other animals and consuming their flesh. They must actively go out and kill other living beings for their very survival. If they didn't do that they would not survive. Imagine how much negativity they incur just having to survive by killing other beings. Hence there is hardly any opportunity for animals to accumulate virtues when in the lower realms, which is why it is difficult to go from a lower realm to a higher realm. Note that it is easy to go from a higher rebirth to a lower rebirth—that is very easy! However, ascending from a lower rebirth to a higher rebirth is very difficult.

To summarise the meaning of the text in more practical terms, it is suggesting it is better not to go to a place where you would have much suffering and misery and in which it would be very difficult to accumulate virtue. Rather, wouldn't it be better for you to remain in a happier state where you can accumulate virtue? If you're enjoying some leisure now in this realm, wouldn't it be better to be reborn into such a realm again in the future, rather than having to take rebirth in a state of much suffering? If you agree that you don't want to be reborn in a realm where there is more suffering, and you want to be reborn continuously in happy rebirths, then what you need to do is intentionally avoid creating negativity and proactively accumulate virtue. This is how we need to practise to create the causes for that outcome.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་ལྷན་པ་ལ་འཇམ་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

25 March 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation.

[meditation]

Now we can generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, to alleviate all their suffering and bring them to ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put it into practice well.

2.2.1. Conscientiously abandoning faults

2.2.1.4. IF REBORN IN THE LOWER REALMS ONE HAS NO OPPORTUNITY TO GENERATE VIRTUE (CONT.)

2.2.1.4.2. If one does not strive while in the happy realms one will be confused in the lower realms concerning what is to be practised and abandoned

We need to consider how fortunate we are to have obtained this perfect human rebirth with its freedoms and endowments. If we were to be reborn in the lower realms we would hardly have any opportunity to engage in virtue, because of the lack of wisdom, and thus no opportunity to create the causes to obtain higher rebirths. So we need to remind ourselves again and again that it is like a miracle and pure chance that we have obtained such good conditions now. When we think about it in great detail we can see how incredibly fortunate we are to have these amazing conditions now, and in that way develop a great sense of joy. It would be extremely foolish to waste the good conditions that we enjoy now!

When we think of our own circumstances we can see how remarkable it is that we have all of these perfect conditions now. In my case it may seem more natural, in that that I was brought up as a Buddhist because of my birth into a Buddhist family. Traditionally, the very first thing Tibetan parents do is bring their child to a revered and respected lama or geshe. This happened in my case and I was given the name Lobsang Dorje. So we could say that the conditions were already there for me to be a Buddhist. Of course there was no choice—it was my destiny to be brought up in that way. As amazing as that is, your situation is even more amazing. Considering your background and so forth, it is really quite amazing for you to have met all of these conditions now.

The main point in considering all of this is that it should encourage us to engage in the practice of Dharma. Having considered how we enjoy these great conditions now, and how they will not come our way again easily, we need to take the initiative to utilise every minute of the day to practise the Dharma.

Newer students seem to find it hard to deal with the explanations of the sufferings. As many of you are already quite familiar with them it might be easier for you, but it seems to be really difficult for new students to listen to the extensive explanations of sufferings. At his recent teachings in Sera, His Holiness the Dalai Lama commented on the late Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey's great skills in presenting the teachings. Those of you who were there would have heard him say that. Indeed, when Geshe Ngawang Dhargye presented teachings on bodhicitta, the students' minds would naturally become subdued. Apparently there was one occasion when a new student attended a class where Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey was teaching on bodhicitta and the kindness of others. He went into great detail and explained it in a way that made this person really inspired and drawn to the teachings. However, when Geshe-la started to explain the sufferings, it became difficult for this student to take it in, so he started to slowly come out of the teachings. He just didn't want to listen to accounts of suffering.

In 1985 when Geshe Ngawang Dhargyey came to Australia he gave teachings at Atisha Centre. This time there was a lady from Germany who later commented that when she went to the teachings she was really inspired and it was very helpful for her mind. She did, however, confess that when it came to the topic of suffering, it was hard to accept all of it. About three years later she came to see me and confided, 'Those sufferings that Geshe-la was explaining in detail were hard for me to accept then, but later I actually experienced those very sufferings. It was exactly as Geshe-la described them'.

Initially it was hard for her to accept some of descriptions of the sufferings—even the sufferings of the human realm were hard for her to accept. However, later she found from her own experience that they were definitely true. This is an instance of where it might be difficult to fully grasp some aspects of the teachings initially, but because they are the words of truth, they gradually become much clearer due to one's understanding and experiences.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

*18. If, although having the fortune to practice virtue,
I do not create virtue,
Then what am I going to do
When completely confused by the lower realm's sufferings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

If, although having the fortune to practise virtue, I do not make an effort now to practise virtue, then how am I going to practise when I am in the lower realms?

At that time I am miserable because of continuously experiencing the feeling of suffering of the lower realms, and I am confused concerning what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned. As a result, I cannot practise anything.

Hence I need to make an effort now at this time when I have obtained freedom and endowments.

First of all, the commentary acknowledges that one has the fortune to practise virtue. Here we can use ourselves as an example of a fortunate one who is endowed with two types of fortune; the fortune of not being deprived of material necessities, and not being deprived of the conditions for practising the Dharma. I consider one is fortunate if one is endowed with both good external and internal conditions.

The Tibetan term kal-den, translated into English as fortunate, has the literal connotation of someone who possesses their share. So if we use that literal meaning from the Tibetan word, then fortune can relate to having our share of the perfect conditions to practise the Dharma, as well as having our share of material conditions.

As the commentary explains, although one does have this fortune to practise virtue, i.e. the good conditions that enable us to practise virtue, that is not sufficient in itself if I do not make an effort now to practise virtue. It is not sufficient to have these good conditions if we don't strive to put them into practice.

Here we need to understand that the emphasis is on the necessity for engaging in the practice of Dharma if we are to be saved from the sufferings. What is being implied here is that the Dharma Jewel is the real protector which needs to be cultivated within oneself. As the Offering Prayer reads:

To supreme teacher, the precious Buddha;
To the supreme protector, the precious Dharma;
To the supreme guides, the precious Sangha;
To these Three Jewels, the objects of refuge, I make this offering.

The Dharma developed within oneself is indeed the real protector, which implies that one is one's own saviour and liberator.

What we really need to consider is how we are our own protector and guide. The person who guides us to fortunate rebirths in the higher realms is none other than ourselves. So we are the ones who need to take the initiative to guide ourselves to a higher rebirth and protect ourselves from lower rebirths. How foolish would it be to practise the reverse, and guide ourselves to the lower realms? Why on earth would you want to work towards an unfortunate rebirth? That wouldn't be wise at all. No-one else but ourselves can guide us to a higher rebirth, so it is up to us to take the initiative. Likewise, no one can lead us, or drag us down to the lower realm but ourselves. We are the ones who must take the initiative to prevent being reborn in the lower realms. Likewise, one cannot ultimately guide others to the higher realms or lead them to the lower realms. The point here is that we have to take personal responsibility for securing good conditions for ourselves in the future.

Thus, in very simple terms, if the finger is to be pointed, it has to be pointed at ourselves; we need to constantly remind ourselves, 'Don't lead yourself down to the lower realms, but lead yourself up to a higher rebirth'. This is the sort of internal dialogue we need to engage in to ensure that we are creating the causes for higher rebirth.

Even though it is not in the Tibetan root text, the commentary poses a rhetorical question: how am I going to practise when I am in the lower realms? The point here is that one will not be able to practise in the lower realms, because at that time I am miserable because of continuously experiencing the feeling of suffering of the lower realms. There is a Tibetan word here, which has a connotation of intense suffering. The point is that being completely immersed in intense suffering deprives one of the initiative to practise Dharma.

Furthermore, I am confused concerning what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned. As a result, I cannot practise anything. The point here is that because one lacks the intelligence or wisdom to be able to know what is virtue, which is to be adopted, and negativity, which is to be abandoned, one cannot engage in practice. How can you abandon what you don't know? These are actually quite pertinent and pointed points. They are a personal instruction that we really need to apply in our everyday thinking. Hence, Gyaltsab Je concludes, we need to make an effort now when we have obtained the freedoms and endowments.

It is also then good to complement these points with our understanding of the Lam Rim teachings, which explain the need to practise Dharma, and the need to practise Dharma right now.

2.2.1.4.3. It is extremely difficult to be liberated from the lower realms

One might think, 'If I were to go to lower realms, then I would eventually be able to free myself from that'. However, once in the lower realms it is very difficult to leave them.

Again, we need to relate this point to our understanding of the difficulty of finding the freedoms and endowments that we have gained from the Lam Rim teaching. The Lam Rim explains that finding the freedoms and endowments is difficult because accumulating their causes and so forth is extremely difficult.

The relevant verse reads:

19. *One did not generate virtue
And one accumulated negativity easily.
Even for ten million eons
One will not hear even the words 'happy realm'.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

It is extremely difficult to later obtain the freedoms and endowments because in this life one has not generated any virtue, and accumulated negativity easily, and so one will not even hear the words 'happy realm' for ten million eons.

The essential point here is that it is extremely difficult to later obtain the freedoms and endowments. While the explanation in the commentary is quite easy to understand, the main point is that we really need to incorporate it into our minds so that it is a constant source of encouragement. As explained here, the reason why it is extremely difficult to obtain the freedoms and endowments in the future is because in this life one has not generated any virtue and has accumulated negativities. If one has not generated any virtue and accumulated negativities, then it is difficult to obtain the freedoms and endowments in the future. Again, we can relate this to the explanations in the Lam Rim, which say that the cause of obtaining the freedoms and endowments is virtue.

If we have not accumulated the causes then naturally we will not be able to experience the result, specifically the result of the freedoms and endowments. If one is reborn in the lower realms then one will not even hear the words 'happy realms' for ten million eons. This means that if one were to be reborn in the lower realms then, let alone being able to create the causes for the freedoms and endowments, one will not even know what the freedoms and endowments are, just like a creature in the depths of the ocean could not be aware of other types of existence. Without even knowing about them, the chances of creating the causes for a happy existence would be very remote, to the point of being virtually impossible. Again, the main point here is to take this as an encouragement to actually practise the Dharma.

To explain this in practical terms, if we wish to obtain a perfect human rebirth with its freedoms and endowments in the next lifetime, then we need to shun negativity and accumulate virtue. We can wish as much as we want, to obtain good conditions and be born as human beings, but if we continuously create negativity and put little or no effort into accumulating virtue, then we are not creating the causes to enjoy these good conditions again in the future. All too often we fall into a state of procrastination thinking, 'Well, even if I don't do too well this time round I will probably obtain a human rebirth again next time and it might be better the next time round. I will do better then'. However, being able to obtain a perfect a human rebirth again in the future is dependent on the causes and conditions that we need to be creating now.

2.2.1.5. WHY IT IS DIFFICULT TO FIND FREEDOMS AND ENDOWMENTS

The relevant verse reads:

20. *For that very reason the Bhagavan taught That merely becoming human is extremely difficult,
As it is for a turtle
To put its neck through the yoke floating on the great ocean.*

Gyaltsab Je begins his explanation of this verse with:

Because it is very difficult to find a happy rebirth from the lower realms, the Bhagavan taught in his perfect scriptures:

Then Gyaltsab Je quotes the Perfect Sutra:

Bhikkhus, if all this ground were to become a great ocean on which a yoke with one hole is moved by the wind. And in that ocean if there was a blind turtle that only sticks its neck out of the water once a hundred years.

Bhikkhus, what do you think? Is it easy for the turtle to catch the yoke with its neck? 'Tathagata, it is not so'. The Tathagata replied: Bhikkhus, similarly is it difficult merely to attain a human rebirth.

The commentary then continues

If one does not create virtue and accumulates negativity, then one does not even hear the word 'happy migration'. For that reason, the Bhagavan taught that merely to attain a human rebirth is much more difficult than for the blind turtle that comes up only every hundred years, to stick its neck into the single hole of the yoke floating on the surface of the ocean, being moved here and there by the wind.

Therefore one needs to make an effort to practise virtue when one is in the happy migration.

As the commentary explains, the freedoms and endowments are incredibly difficult to find, and even more so when one is in the lower realms. In the Perfect Sutra the Buddha gave a hypothetical example to illustrate the degree of difficulty this entails. We imagine the whole ground becoming an incredibly vast ocean, and on that the ocean is a single yoke with only one hole in it, and this yoke is constantly moved by the wind. At the bottom of the ocean is a blind turtle, which surfaces only once every hundred years. The likelihood of that blind turtle entering its neck into that single hole of the yoke is very remote indeed.

Then the Buddha asked his disciples, 'What is the likelihood of this happening? Is it easy for a blind turtle to enter its neck into the hole?'. They replied, 'It is not so, it is very difficult'. This, said the Buddha, is as difficult as attaining a human rebirth.

As explained in the teachings, each part of this example is an analogy.

- The blind turtle represents ignorant beings who are ignorant of the wisdom as to what to adopt and what to discard.
- Once every hundred years is an analogy to the fact that it is very rare to be reborn as a human being with all the perfect conditions.
- The turtle surfacing is analogous to being reborn in a higher rebirth.
- The yoke on the surface of the ocean represents the Buddha's teachings.

Just as the likelihood of that blind turtle placing its neck into the yoke is a near impossibility, taking a higher rebirth, with the chance of meeting with the Buddha's teaching is very, very remote. One might be reborn as a human, but in the country or place where his teachings are not available, or where there are no conditions for the Dharma to be taught or practised. So one might be born as human, but without the conditions to practise. From this analogy, we can see how extremely difficult it is to find all these freedoms and endowments intact.

Obtaining the freedoms and endowments of a higher rebirth, with all the perfect conditions, is said to be even more remote than this hypothetical example of the chance of a blind turtle sticking its neck into the hole of the yoke. That is how it explained in the teachings.

Then the commentary on this section concludes with, Therefore one needs to make an effort to practise virtue when one is in the happy migration.

2.2.2. Conscientiously meditating on virtue

This section is subdivided into three:

2.2.2.1. It is appropriate to strive in abandoning the infinite negativity accumulated previously

2.2.2.2. Why a single suffering in the lower realm exhausts that karma, but does not exhaust the karma of the lower realm

2.2.2.3. Why it is appropriate to strive in the antidote to negativity

2.2.2.1. IT IS APPROPRIATE TO STRIVE IN ABANDONING THE INFINITE NEGATIVITY ACCUMULATED PREVIOUSLY

This explanation follows on from the earlier explanation that if creating negativity is the cause for one to be born in the lower realm, then it is most appropriate that one strives to purify the infinite non-virtue accumulated previously.

The verse relating to this outline reads:

21. *If one remains in the naraks for eons
Due to one moment of negativity,
Then why even mention that one won't go to the happy realms
Due to the negativity accumulated in beginningless samsara?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

If one has to remain in the hells without respite for eons due to only one moment of anger at a bodhisattva, then what need is there to mention that one will not go to the happy migrations due to the negativity in one's continuum that has been accumulated since beginningless time, and has not been destroyed by an antidote?

One should train in purifying negativity by way of the four powers.

When the commentary says, If one has to remain in the hells without respite due to only one moment of anger at a bodhisattva, it is referring to the impact of just one moment of negative karma. This is in contrast to the intense negative karma that is created over a long period in many previous lifetimes. Here, because the object of one's anger is a bodhisattva, a very superior object, the negativity created is a cause leading to the hells without respite, for a long period of time. We can also relate this to the fact that karma multiplies greatly, which is one of the four characteristics of karma. So the main point here is that even a short moment of negative karma such as anger can have heavy negative consequences.

The duration of the cause might only be a moment of anger at a bodhisattva but the result is that one has to remain in hell without respite for eons. Because of the short duration of the negative deed, one might think, 'Oh, this is a very small negative deed over a short period of time, so the consequences may not be too bad'. However, as explained here, if one were to create negative karma in relation to a supreme object such as a bodhisattva, even if it is of short duration, the consequence is that one will have to experience being born in the hell realms for many eons. Gyaltsab Rinpoche also explains this point very clearly in his other works, where he exhorts us to be mindful and particularly careful not to criticise and be judgemental of others with anger, because we cannot know who is a bodhisattva. So we need to protect ourselves from this grave misdeed lest we end up criticising and becoming angry with a bodhisattva.

The commentary then further explains that if one will remain in hell without respite for eons just from one moment of anger towards a bodhisattva, then what need is there to mention that one will not go to the happy migrations due to the negativity in one's continuum that has been accumulated since beginningless times and has not been destroyed by an antidote? As we have been in samsara since beginningless time, we have accumulated infinite negativities in the past. For as long as those negativities are still within our mental continuum, not destroyed by an antidote, there should be no doubt about the possibility of being reborn in the lower realms. The point here is that these negativities that have been accumulated since beginningless time can be destroyed when the antidote is applied. So one should train in purifying negativity by way of the four powers.

The four opponent powers were explained previously, and we need to take this advice to heart as a personal instruction. We need to remind ourselves again and again that we need to be constantly mindful of purifying the negativities that we have accumulated in the past by applying the four opponent powers. Then we need to guard ourselves from creating even more negativities. When we adopt this as our practice in our daily life then we will definitely be applying the antidote for overcoming these negativities. If we adopt the reverse of that i.e. keep virtues at bay and embrace the negativities, then the price will be rebirth in the lower realms.

However we also need to be mindful about not becoming disheartened because we have accumulated so much negativity in the past, or the fact that we find ourselves continuously engaging in negativities now, seemingly without control, which is due to our habituation with these negativities. While that prospect may seem quite daunting, we do have the ability to purify negativities. We have the knowledge and we have the means to firstly identify what is negativity, and when we find that we have engaged in some negativities, we have the means to purify them by applying the four opponent powers.

So it is not at all a hopeless situation because we do have that opportunity to purify our negativities. As I have mentioned previously, while an immediate negativity may be the trigger for a purification practice, when we actually engage in that practice it is very important that we also bring to mind any negativity that we have created in the past. In relation to this life we can definitely recall negativities that we had created in the earlier part of the day, last night, last week, last month, last year, and in the earlier part of one's life. By recalling them we can inevitably feel strong regret about accumulating those negativities.

As the teachings mention, when one develops a very strong regret then that suffices to purify a great amount of negativity. The four opponent powers entail being profoundly regretful that yet again one has been compelled to engage in these negativities; taking refuge, as a quick way of applying the antidote; and then resolving not to commit these misdeeds again. If we find that we have created negativity in the morning, we try to purify it by noon. If further on in the day one finds one has again created negativity then, towards the evening one again applies the four opponent powers of developing regret and so forth. In this way, by applying mindfulness we are able to apply the measures of purifying negativities through the four opponent powers, by taking refuge and so forth.

In fact, the practice of purification is, by default, also the optimum means for accumulating merit. So purification practice is incredibly worthwhile. When we conduct ourselves in our daily life by regretting negativities we have created in the past, then that regret will be the impetus to purify these negativities. Likewise, when we think about the virtues we have definitely created, we can rejoice. If we conduct our daily life in this way, rejoicing in good deeds and purifying our negative deeds, then we will secure a meaningful life. As we purify negative karma and engage in these practices the mind naturally becomes happier and happier, and there will naturally be more joy in one's mind. That is a practical positive result of the purification practice.

A Dharma practitioner is one who, based on their understanding of karma, understands that virtue results in happiness and non-virtue results in unhappiness. Based on that simple principle, if we find that we have created some non-virtue, then, because we don't want to experience the result, which is unhappiness and suffering, we can take the initiative to purify those accumulated negativities. And then, in every possible way, we try to adopt a virtuous mind, and engage in virtuous deeds, because we wish to experience the positive result of happiness. When we conduct ourselves in that way then that constitutes a real Dharma practitioner.

Put simply, when we apply the purification practice with the four opponent powers then that very practice becomes the means to block the passage or doorway to the lower realms. And then, as when we engage in virtues and accumulate merit it opens the doorway or passage to a higher rebirth.

There are only two doorways and it is up to us to choose which one we want to enter. We have no other choice but these two doorways, so we need to make the right choice.

2.2.2.2. WHY A SINGLE SUFFERING IN THE LOWER REALM EXHAUSTS THAT KARMA, BUT DOES NOT EXHAUST THE KARMA OF THE LOWER REALM

The next verse is explained in the context of overcoming another hypothetical doubt; we might again think, 'If experiencing the sufferings in the lower realms will exhaust one's karma to be in the lower realms, then I will be reborn again in higher realm'. However, by virtue of being in the lower realms one will be continuously creating more causes to remain there, which is why it is not easy to free oneself from the lower realms.

As will be explained, once born in the lower realms one will quite naturally and spontaneously create further negative karmas to remain in the lower realms, continuously propelling one from one unfortunate rebirth to the next. We can avoid that by using our current fortunate rebirth to apply the causes and conditions to be born again in the higher realms. That would be a crucial way to practice, for just experiencing the consequences of one unfortunate rebirth does not mean that the karma to be born in the lower realms will be completely exhausted.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

1 April 2014

When we recite the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer at the beginning of any practice, it is really good to reflect on it as an opportunity to generate the optimum motivation for doing the practice. We need to remember that taking refuge is the essential criteria for ensuring that the practice is a Buddhist practice, whilst generating bodhicitta ensures that the practice is a Mahayana practice.

It seems that every religion has its own form of refuge prayer that is recited at the beginning of every ceremony.

So, based on the motivation we have generated during the recitation of the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in our meditation practice.

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will engage in listening to the teaching, and put it into practice well.

2.2.2.2. WHY A SINGLE SUFFERING IN THE LOWER REALM EXHAUSTS THAT KARMA, BUT DOES NOT EXHAUST THE KARMA OF THE LOWER REALM

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section of the text with this query:

One may think: It is not difficult to become liberated from the lower realms because after the result is exhausted I will take rebirth in the happy migration.

This query is yet another excuse to procrastinate in one's Dharma practice, where one thinks, 'If I were to be reborn in the lower realms, then when that karma is used up I will be able to take a higher rebirth, and I'll be able to achieve liberation then'. This thinking is based on the fact that the karma to be reborn in the lower realms occurs as a result of previous karma, and that karma exhausts itself. Reasoning that rebirth in the lower realms means using up negative karma, thus leaving it possible to be able to take rebirth in the higher realms sooner rather than later, and then achieve liberation, can lead to laziness and procrastination about practising the Dharma.

The verse relating to this outline reads:

22. *Only through the mere experience
One will not be liberated, because
During the experience
One generates other negativities.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

A person will not be liberated from the lower realms merely through experiencing the result of only one negative action, because while one is experiencing the suffering result of previous karma one adventitiously creates other negativity that brings forth powerful suffering.

As explained here, merely experiencing the results of previously created negative karma does not mean one will be liberated from the lower realms. The commentary further explains that while one is experiencing the suffering result of previous karma, one adventitiously creates other negativity that brings forth powerful suffering. In addition to experiencing the sufferings of the lower realms, the conditions there are a cause to repeatedly create even more negative karma, which brings about even more suffering. Here we can use the example of the animal realm, a lower realm with which we are very familiar. We can see that most animals have to constantly engage in negative actions for their very survival. They cannot recognise their actions as negativity, let alone know that they can be purified. Due to their state of ignorance they have no knowledge of the ways to create virtue, or to shun negativity. Even we humans, who do have that intelligence and knowledge, find it difficult to avoid negativity and adopt virtue. Animals have no such choice.

The personal instruction here is that being reborn in the lower realms will be a perpetual cause for creating further negative karma, and thus continuous rebirth in the lower realms over a long period of time. To avoid that situation we need to use the good conditions we have now to avoid the negative causes that will lead to rebirth in a lower realm, and adopt the positive causes or virtue that will ensure that we have a good rebirth. Then we can continuously go from one fortunate rebirth to the next, continuously engaging in creating virtue and merit until we reach the ultimate goal. Just as the result of previous negative karma is to be reborn in the lower realms, rebirth in the fortunate realms is definitely the result of positive, virtuous karma.

Since we have now achieved that fortunate rebirth, we need to ensure that we do not use up our positive karma. Just as the karma of lower realms can be exhausted, our karma in the fortunate realms can also be used up. If we don't seize the opportunity to create further virtuous karma, then there is no other possibility than a lower rebirth. Then the situation of repeatedly creating negative karma will befall us. Therefore, we need to really understand that we are responsible for our own future, and whether we have a fortunate rebirth or an unfortunate rebirth lies entirely within our own hands. So we need to take the initiative if we are to achieve our goal.

On a personal level, the advice here is that we should not relate being reborn in lower realms to external circumstances, i.e. as only happening to others. Rather, we need to personalise this advice and keep in mind the fact that it relates to oneself. So, one needs to be thinking, 'If I were reborn in the lower realms then it will be extremely difficult for me to escape from that'. That will be an impetus to really take this advice to heart for the need to practise the Dharma.

Then Gyaltsab Je concludes his commentary on the verse:

On the basis of the lower realms, virtue is weak and negativity is continuously accumulated. Therefore one should strive to stop the cause of the lower realms.

Here Gyaltsab Je is re-emphasising Shantideva's advice. If one were to be reborn in the lower realms there will be hardly any opportunity to accumulate virtue, because the conditions for accumulating virtue are very minimal. Furthermore, because of the conditions in the lower realms we would be continuously creating negativity. We see the truth of this when we look at the animal realm. What opportunities do they have to accumulate virtue? We might help a pet to create some virtue by taking them around a holy object like a stupa, or say some mantras, but apart from that they don't have any opportunity to willingly create virtue. When we think about the prospect of having to experience those kinds of conditions ourselves, we will see why we need to strive to stop the cause of the lower realms. We need to take this as a personal instruction to constantly remind ourselves, 'Be careful, be careful. Now that I have these good conditions I have to use them wisely and not waste them'.

The crux of the advice is in the words the cause of the lower realms—we need to reflect on the causes for rebirth in the lower realms. Here we consider the ten non-virtues. Killing, such as taking the life of another being, is a cause for the lower realms; taking what belongs to another is a cause for the lower realms; and engaging in sexual misconduct is a cause for the lower realms. We need to take note here that sexual misconduct applies to lay people, who don't have the vow of celibacy.

We can see here how kind and skilful the Buddha was in his advice on accumulating virtue and abandoning non-virtue. It would be extremely difficult for lay people to completely abstain from sexual activity, so here the advice is to abstain from sexual misconduct. If one wishes to practise on a higher level one can take the self-liberation vows of an ordained monk or nun, which include the vow to completely abstain from sexual activity, i.e. the vow of celibacy. So the Buddha meticulously presented many opportunities for engaging in virtue and abstaining from negativity on various different levels, in accordance with the capacity of his followers.

Further causes for rebirth in the lower realms are lying, slander, harsh words, idle gossip, covetousness, ill will and wrong view. Engaging in these non-virtues is a cause to be reborn in the lower realms, whereas willingly abandoning the ten non-virtues and thus adopting the ten virtues is the cause for a fortunate rebirth. None of these ten virtues are beyond our capacity. We can all abstain from killing, stealing, sexual misconduct and so forth, while engaging in virtuous deeds such as protecting the life of others, practicing generosity and so forth.

Here we need to engage in a personal dialogue. 'If you have the choice, would you rather go to the lower realms or take a fortunate rebirth in the next lifetime?' The natural answer should be, 'I definitely want to have a fortunate rebirth'. 'So, if you want to have a fortunate rebirth and avoid an unfortunate one, then you need to create the causes for it. If you just lie back and do nothing, then how could you possibly create the causes for a fortunate rebirth?' Reprimanding oneself with a personal dialogue like this is a good method to encourage oneself to accumulate virtue. It is in this way that we gradually develop more faith in the Dharma and an aspiration to engage in the practice. Adopting a life of accumulating virtue and shunning negativity will gradually become more stable for the sublime Dharma to take root in one's life.

As I mentioned previously, while we acknowledge that we should avoid negativity and adopt virtue, we may still find ourselves uncontrollably engaging in non-virtues. You might find yourself (accidentally or intentionally) taking the life of another sentient being, or taking something without permission, or engaging in sexual misconduct. These things may occur from time to time because we are habituated to them. With a proper understanding of the Dharma that should not become a cause for despondency and feeling that things are hopeless. Rather you should remind yourselves again and again of the teaching that purification is a powerful means to purify negative karma.

When you remember that you can purify negative karma, then the great privilege of understanding the Dharma means that you will be able to apply the antidote to any negativity immediately. When you find you have created some negativity, rather than feeling hopeless and depressed, and thinking, 'Oh, I have created so much negativity I am definitely going to the lower realms. There is no hope for me anymore', one should immediately remember, 'OK, I have created some negativity but negativity can be purified'. That is why the kind Buddha presented us with the means for purification. The first part of purification is feeling regret, and based on regret one applies the appropriate antidotes.

By taking the Dharma to heart in this way, when you do find yourselves unwillingly creating some negativity out of habituation, you can rest assured that you can still purify that negative karma; that will prevent rebirth in the lower realms. We need to also use that as a reminder to ensure that we are creating the causes for a fortunate rebirth.

This is how we need to apply ourselves if we want to take the Dharma practice to heart. If one thinks, 'Oh, I don't care anymore' then one has definitely fallen victim to one's own negativity; one will not purify negativities because one does not care about it. In fact, one may even start to feel joyful about creating negativity and regretful about creating virtue. When we think about it we will see how, even though we have this incredible, fortunate rebirth with the freedoms and endowments intact, somehow there are times when we regret not having been able to create some negativity, and feel hesitant about opportunities to create virtue. Feeling glad that we have had the opportunity to create non-virtue and sad that we have missed an opportunity to create non-virtue or negativity would be a really pitiful situation, to say the least, given the great conditions we have now.

In summary, the main point to consider is that we definitely have the capacity to obtain a fortunate rebirth in the next lifetime. The causes to obtain such a fortunate rebirth, as well as taking another fortunate rebirth from a higher rebirth are not difficult or obscure. What is difficult, is obtaining a higher rebirth from the lower realms. Thus, we must take matters into our own hands. There is no-one who puts us into a lower rebirth but ourselves. Likewise, no-one else can obstruct us from taking a fortunate rebirth except ourselves. Who creates the causes for a fortunate rebirth? Again, it is none other than ourselves. The causes definitely lie within our hands as we have the capacity and we have the means. The main thing to consider is that this explanation is a way to encourage us to use these good conditions we have now to create the appropriate causes for a good rebirth.

In simple terms, Shantideva is saying, 'You have the full capacity and the appropriate conditions to create the causes for a fortunate rebirth. If you go to the lower realms it will be very difficult freeing yourself from that. Now, when you have those good conditions to create a cause for a fortunate rebirth, is the time to create those causes'. These incredible conditions that we all possess right now are such that we can create extensive merit even in just a second. As you would have heard many times, if an ordinary person generates the mind of bodhicitta, even for just a second, the amount of merit they accumulate would be difficult for all the buddhas to articulate.

2.2.2.3. WHY IT IS APPROPRIATE TO STRIVE IN THE ANTIDOTE TO NEGATIVITY

We can relate this section to Nagarjuna's definitions of negativity and non-virtue, which have been explained in past teachings. Nagarjuna defined negativity as that which is an onset to rebirth into the lower realms, whereas non-virtue is defined as that which is shunned by the noble ones. Here Nagarjuna is making a distinction that is very pertinent to this outline.

This outline is subdivided into four:

2.2.2.3.1. If one does not strive in virtue upon having obtained the freedoms and endowments, then one is deceiving oneself

2.2.2.3.2. One will experience suffering in this life

2.2.2.3.3. Later one will be tormented by the sufferings of the lower realms

2.2.2.3.4. Why it is appropriate to abandon negativity and practise virtue

2.2.2.3.1. If one does not strive in virtue upon having obtained the freedoms and endowments, then one is deceiving oneself

The point here is that no-one is depriving us of this opportunity to create virtue but ourselves.

The relevant verse reads:

23. *If, upon having found this freedom,
I do not meditate on virtue,
Then there is no greater deception,
There is no greater ignorance.*

With respect to this verse Gyaltshab Je's commentary reads:

Having found this freedom which is difficult to find, and when found has great meaning, if I do not strive in and meditate on the cause for higher status and liberation, then there is no better method of self-deception.

There is also no greater ignorance than the ignorance concerning what has to be practised and what has to be abandoned.

The commentary gives a very clear explanation of the verse. Having found this freedom which is difficult to find refers to the freedoms and endowments that we enjoy now. We had to create many virtuous causes in the past to obtain these great conditions, and having found this life there is great meaning refers to the great capacity one has to obtain the causes for one's future goals.

This not talking about goals like finding the necessities for survival. Rather, it is referring to the great potential we have to obtain the causes for a fortunate rebirth. Based on the conditions we have now, we have the full capacity and means to avoid the ten non-virtues and to engage in the ten virtues. That then becomes the cause for a fortunate rebirth in the next life. Furthermore, on the basis of the conditions we have now, we have the full capacity and potential to generate renunciation, which becomes a cause to obtain liberation, becoming free from rebirth in cyclic existence. And finally, with these conditions we also have the full capacity to generate bodhicitta and gain the realisation of emptiness, which are the causes to obtain the ultimate goal of enlightenment.

Because we have these freedoms and endowments we can create the causes for these three goals. So, if I do not strive in, and meditate on, the cause for higher status and liberation, which includes enlightenment, then there is no better method of self-deception. As I have mentioned previously, if we do not utilise the good conditions we have now, and just focus on our survival and worldly concerns, then that would be a great deception. Indeed, the greatest deception is to waste this incredible opportunity and potential we have to obtain these supreme goals. Furthermore, there is no greater ignorance than to be ignorant of what is to be adopted and practised, and what is to be abandoned. So we are being encouraged to use these great conditions to ensure that we do not fall victim to self-deception, and apply these good conditions to creating the causes to obtain our goals. While it is easy to understand what is being explained here, we need to take it to heart and really try to implement it in our daily life and practice.

2.2.2.3.2. One will experience suffering in this life

The verse relating

24. *Should I, after having understood this,
Still be indolent due to ignorance,
When the time to die comes Great misery will arise.*

Here Gyaltshab Je's commentary reads,

Should I, after having realised that I have to strive in achieving virtue and abandoning negativity, still be indolent with regard to the mind of enlightenment, the practice of the perfections and so on, then at the time of death, when I know I am going to the lower realms, great misery will arise. Therefore I should strive with great effort.

The meaning of the commentary is quite clear. The significant point is that when, if one has realised that one must adopt virtue and abandon negativity but disregards this and continues to engage in frivolous activities, or if one has not adopted the mind of bodhicitta, not practising the perfections such as generosity and so forth, then at the time of death one will generate great sorrow and misery. Realising at that time, when one reflects upon one's life, that negativity is the cause for rebirth in the lower realms, and that one has mostly engaged in negativity and not accumulated virtue, one will be tormented and have great regret in one's mind.

It is a fact that when people are in the last stages of death appearances occur to them that are linked to what they have done in their life. Some appearances cause them real joy because they have accumulated virtues. However, for those who recognise they've mostly engaged in negativity, the appearances bring great fear and unease in their minds. This definitely occurs. Here in the west, dying people who are in pain are often sedated with morphine which seems to numb their mind and senses, so even if they have some experience of these appearances they may not be able to express it. However, when body and senses are not numbed there are clear signs of anxiety at the time of death from those with strong regret.

For yourself, the advice here is to strive with great effort. By bringing to mind the great misery that will occur at the time of death, and wanting to avoid it, one will create the causes for a fortunate rebirth. One needs to apply great effort to adopt virtues and refrain from negativities. The crucial point is realising that one has to strive to adopt virtue and abstain from negativity. If one does not apply the practice, one becomes complacent. There is a Tibetan term describing this which has the connotation of becoming immune or desensitised to the Dharma. This is a very dangerous situation to be in, and one to avoid, so take it to heart and apply the practice of Dharma sincerely now.

The teachings explain that great practitioners have only joy in going onwards at the time of death. A medium-level practitioner has no hesitation in facing death and the lowest-level practitioner will not have any regrets in their mind. Thus, one needs to ensure that at the very least, one can prevent strong regret arising at the time of death. It would be a good achievement to know one has done one's best to adopt virtues and purify negativities, and that there is no need for regret at the time of death. It is important to ensure that we practise the Dharma wholeheartedly now, when we have the opportunity.

We can see how Nagarjuna's definition of negativity, which is that it is the onset to rebirth in the lower realms, is very relevant here. This means that creating negativity is like being in the state that is one step away from the lower realms. For individuals who have created a lot of negativity, there will be fear, anxiety and sorrow at the time of death, due to the prospect of what will come next. In relation to that, we can see that Nagarjuna's precise definition of negativity is very pertinent. Nagarjuna and Chandrakirti were great masters. His Holiness mentioned recently that Lama Tsong Khapa clearly matched their attributes and their capacity for reasoning and discernment. In both ancient and modern times there are hardly any other masters who equal them. As their explanations and advices are extremely clear and precise, we really need to take heed of them.

The first Dalai Lama said that the real enemies to overcome are the delusions, and these lie within oneself. Take this advice to heart and recognise that the real enemy lies within; as such, the delusions are the main culprit that cause all the turmoil and harm for oneself.

Recognising this means that we need to protect ourselves from the intensity of the negativities. It might be difficult for us to completely prevent negative states of mind such as anger, jealousy or attachment from arising occasionally, but while they are difficult to prevent, we can stop them from escalating. We can stop anger becoming intense anger such as hatred; we can stop intense jealousy that harms our mind and causes harm to others, and we can stop attachment from becoming obsessed with the object.

We have the means to overcome strong emotions, so we can apply antidotes to anger etc. But if one doesn't apply them and holds onto the anger, one is then befriending anger. Again, with attachment, if, rather than applying the antidote, one actually befriends attachment, one makes oneself a slave to attachment, listening to whatever attachment (or anger) says. One might find it hard to listen to the advice of one's gurus, but when it comes to listening to our anger and our attachment we have no hesitation. We become completely submissive to our attachment, anger and ignorance and allow them to be our masters, who we willingly serve. In summary, the delusions, which are the real cause of harm and destruction, lie nowhere else but within oneself, so we need to recognise and overcome this.

Although it will be explained further in the text, I want you to prepare yourself now and to familiarise yourself with identifying the delusions, particularly the six root delusions and the 20 secondary delusions.

2.2.2.3.3. Later one will be tormented by the sufferings of the lower realms

In case one feels that one could enjoy oneself in the lower realms, what is being explained here is that one will be tormented by the sufferings of the lower realms.

The next verse in the outline reads:

25. *When my body is burned by
The difficult to bear fires of hell for a long time,
The fire of terrible regret will light up,
And the mind will be despondent, this is certain.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains :

Through the faults of degenerating the mind of enlightenment and so forth one will take rebirth in the lower realms. When then the difficult to bear fires of hell burn my body for a long time, the fire of terrible regret will light up and my mind will be tormented. Since this is certain, make an effort to not incur any faults and downfalls.

The commentary explains here that the fault of allowing the mind of enlightenment or bodhicitta to degenerate is one of the heaviest of the downfalls. Previously, this was explained extensively. What is being explained here again is that through the faults of degenerating the mind of enlightenment, one will take rebirth in the lower realm. If one were to be born in a hell realm, such as the hot hell realm, one's body and fire become inseparable, and it is as if one's body and the fire is of one entity. So in that kind of situation, how could one even imagine that one's mind will not be tormented; there is no question about how much unceasing torment one would experience in both body and mind. The commentary explains here that this outcome is certain and that such consequences definitely have to be experienced.

What one needs to take to heart now is to make an effort not to incur any faults and downfalls. The main point is that once one takes those pledges of practising, one should ensure that one does not incur faults and downfalls, and that as one has the ability to apply the antidote to negativity, one should do so, as this serves as the means to overcome negativity.

2.2.2.3.4. Why it is appropriate to abandon negativity and practise virtue

Having contemplated the consequences of negativity, what logically follows is that it is appropriate to abandon negativity and practice virtue. So this is again subdivided into two:

2.2.2.3.4.1. Having wasted the freedoms and endowments, if one goes to the lower realms again, then one resembles something mindless

2.2.2.3.4.2. It is appropriate to contemplate the cause of ignorance

2.2.2.3.4.1. Having wasted the freedoms and endowments, if one goes to the lower realms again, then one resembles something mindless

I have elaborated on the fact that if one does not actually put these incredibly good conditions of the freedom and endowments to use, and seize that opportunity to use them optimally to create virtue and abandon negativities, and if one lays back and engages in frivolous worldly activities, then one has wasted those good conditions. Thus, having wasted the freedoms and endowments one goes to the lower realms. It is as if there is no common sense at all. This is what is being reflected here.

The verses under this heading read:

26. *Having found somehow
This extremely difficult to find basis of benefit
If I return to the lower realms later again
Despite having knowledge,*

27ab. *Then, similarly to one confused by mantra,
This makes me someone without mind.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

This basis of benefit, the precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments, is extremely difficult to find and, if found, is of great purpose.

Having found it somehow by chance, should I again go to the lower realms despite having knowledge of what is useful and what is harmful, then that makes me someone without a mind achieving just the purpose of the moment for self, similarly to a person confused by mantra.

The commentary explains here that the basis of benefit is the precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments, and that this is extremely difficult to find. Reflect back on the explanations given in the Lam Rim teachings about why it is difficult to find the freedoms and endowments, where three reasons are given: the causes are difficult to accumulate; explaining with an analogy why it is difficult; and because of the number of precious human rebirths being minimal in comparison to the numbers of living beings in other realms.

As mentioned in the commentary, having found this precious human rebirth is of great purpose. As explained previously, the great purpose is to achieve one's temporary and ultimate goals, and one can achieve all this having found, as if by chance, this precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments. So, if one were to go back again to the lower realms, despite having known what is useful and what is harmful, makes me someone without a mind. This means that it is as if one does not have a rational mind that knows what is good and beneficial and what is harmful to oneself.

Achieving just the purpose on the moment for oneself, refers to being completely immersed in temporary gratification and goals, rather than thinking about virtuous actions, and the necessity for long-term achievements. The analogy for being mindless is that it is similar to a person who is under the spell of a mantra of another person. They would be completely confused, and do things that are completely irrational, because they are completely dominated or influenced by the spell of the mantra. Thus, wasting one's perfect opportunities now with its freedoms and endowments would be similar to one who is mindless (lacking any common sense), like being under the spell of a mantra.

2.2.2.3.4.2. It is appropriate to contemplate the cause of ignorance

In presenting the meaning of the next two lines of verse, Gyaltsab Je opens his commentary with a query:

Query: How did one become confused?

Then as a response to that query the two lines of verse read:

*27cd. I do not know how I got so confused
What is lurking inside of me?*

Then the commentary explains:

Answer: I also do not know due to which cause I got confused and thus deceived. What cause for confusion is lurking inside me? I think there definitely is something.

If one falls into laziness, then one should think in this way.

What is again being reflected upon here is that even though we have all the good conditions such as the eight freedoms and ten endowments, and the knowledge and understanding of what is to be adopted and what is to be shunned, one still finds that one is not taking full opportunity and wastes the opportunities with frivolous worldly activities that focus on oneself. 'What could be causing that? There must definitely be something inside of me that is causing that confusion. What could it be?' This is a means of recognising that it is the delusions within oneself that are causing the confusion.

This introduces the next verse which refers to my enemies of anger, craving and so forth.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

8 April 2014

Based on the motivation we have just generated we can engage in the practice of meditation. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teaching along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to become enlightened myself, and so for that purpose I will engage in the teaching, and put it into practice well.

The tong len meditation practice that we have just attempted to do is, of course, the basis for developing love and compassion, which is the core practice of Buddhism. We cannot possibly assume that we are engaging in any real practice if we leave this essential element aside.

This is in line with an understanding of what it means to be a practising Buddhist. A practising Buddhist is someone who, based on the teachings on non-violence that the Buddha gave, wholeheartedly entrusts themselves to the Three Jewels (the Buddha, the Dharma, the Sangha), seeing the Buddha as their protector and teacher, and following his teachings. It is essential that we, who consider ourselves Buddhists, know what Buddhadharma encompasses. It would be quite pitiful if, when we are asked what Buddhadharma is, we hesitate in giving an answer. Several years ago at one of the Easter courses, I recall that when Vanessa's younger sister was present and showing interest, I told her to take the question 'What is Buddhadharma?' to her discussion session. When she posed that question, no-one seemed to be able to give a succinct and good answer to it.

It is particularly important that those who present Buddhism to newer students respond to questions with succinct answers that encompass the essential points. As I regularly share with those who present the classes for beginners, you need to prepare yourself not only for the presentation, but also be prepared to answer any questions that are asked.

When classes are advertised as an introduction to Buddhism, people will inevitably ask such questions as 'What is Buddhadharma?' It would not be sufficient to answer, 'It is the practice of abandoning the ten non-virtues such as killing and so forth' because the morality of abandoning killing is common to other traditions as well, such as Christianity and so forth. So we cannot present the practice of abandoning negativities and adopting virtue as being unique to Buddhism.

2.2.2.3.4. Why it is appropriate to abandon negativity and practise virtue

2.2.2.3.4.2. It is appropriate to contemplate the cause of ignorance (cont.)

Gyaltsab Je's commentary begins with a query:

Query: How did one become confused?

Why is it that one is not taking the freedoms and endowments, which enable us to engage in the practice, to heart? Why are they not being utilised to engage in practice?

Something must be causing this confusion and inability to act. As the verse states:

*27cd. I do not know how I got so confused,
What is lurking inside of me?*

Then Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

Answer: I also do not know due to which cause I got confused and thus deceived. What cause for confusion is lurking inside me? I think there definitely is something.

If one falls into laziness, then one should think in this way.

The hypothetical query at the beginning is presented as a way to really look into the main culprit that is causing one to not adopt the practices. As the commentary states, I also do not know due to which cause I got confused and thus deceived. What cause for confusion is lurking inside me? I think there definitely is something. Presenting this point in the form of a personal dialogue brings to light the fact that, although we see the value of observing morality, and engaging in the practices of listening, contemplating and meditating, and have the inclination to practice, there seems to be something that is preventing us from really embracing that practice on a continuous basis. So what is it that is preventing us from practising?

We need to take particular note that this presentation is suggesting that we undertake a personal investigation. The very words what cause for confusion is lurking inside me indicates that there is definitely something lurking within that is the cause of our procrastination and hesitation about practising. So, as suggested here, we need to take the measure of checking within to identify the main cause of the confusion that causes the hesitation, laziness and so forth. Then, as emphasised here, lest one falls into laziness and becomes complacent, one should be thinking in this way, again and again, about how there is something within that is causing such confusion.

Then the text presents the causes of that confusion.

2.2.3. Conscientiously abandoning the afflictions

This heading implies that having identified the afflictions, one needs to apply conscientiousness and joyful effort as a way to abandon the afflictions.

This section of the text has three subdivisions:

2.2.3.1. Contemplating the faults of the afflictions

2.2.3.2. How it is unsuitable to tire of the difficulty of abandoning the afflictions

2.2.3.3. Meditating on joy knowing that if one makes an effort it is possible to abandon the afflictions

2.2.3.1. CONTEMPLATING THE FAULTS OF THE AFFLICTIONS

This has three further subdivisions:

2.2.3.1.1. Contemplating how the afflictions harm oneself

2.2.3.1.2. How it is unsuitable to meditate on patience for the afflictions

2.2.3.1.3. Generating courage to destroy them

2.2.3.1.1. Contemplating how the afflictions harm oneself

This is subdivided into four:

2.2.3.1.1.1. They take away our freedom

2.2.3.1.1.2. They generate boundless suffering

2.2.3.1.1.3. They harm over an infinite amount of time

2.2.3.1.1.4. The reason why it is unsuitable to befriend the afflictions

Following the earlier presentation where the great master Shantideva entreated us to look into ourselves and really contemplate the sources of the confusion that cause all of the aforementioned faults - hesitation about practising, procrastination and so forth - when we genuinely and honestly look within we will be able to identify that it is the afflictions that are the main cause. So, as a way of overcoming them, we need to think about the disadvantages of these afflictions. Shantideva then presents four disadvantages.

2.2.3.1.1.1. They take away our freedom

Once we are dominated by the afflictions, they overpower us and we are completely under their control.

The verse that relates to this heading reads:

28. *The enemies of anger, craving and so forth
Do not have legs, arms and so forth,
They are neither brave nor wise,
How did they make me like their slave?*

We need to see this presentation as being related to our own circumstances, right now, and not just as some dry hypothetical presentation. While we are easily able to acknowledge the very good conditions that we enjoy now, we also need to identify what prevents us from fully utilising our potential, and taking full advantage of these conditions. It is not sufficient to look within once or twice, but rather we need to implement this in our regular daily practice, investigating our minds again and again.

The more we analyse our own state of mind, the clearer it becomes that the afflictions, or delusions, are the real cause of all our faults. It is not immediately apparent to us that anger, for example, is a cause of our faults and our mistakes. When it comes to attachment, it is even more difficult for us to recognise attachment as being a fault. Thus it requires careful analysis again and again, and careful attention to fully identifying and recognising these delusions such as anger, attachment and the like as being the real causes of all our problems. When we take initiative to really personalise this investigation in our contemplations, then that, in itself, becomes a very worthwhile and productive object of meditation.

Gyalsab Je's commentary on the verse reads:

My enemies of anger, craving and so forth, which are contained in the root and associated afflictions, do not have legs, arms or weapons in their hands and they are not very brave with great effort, nor are they wise with skilful means.

How did they take away my freedom and make me their slave?

In order to acknowledge the afflictions as being faults, we need to first identify them. To understand what the afflictions are, the Lam Rim presents them under these headings: identifying the delusions; the stages in which the delusions develop; the causes of delusions and the faults of the delusions. Some Lam Rim texts present the delusions under four headings and some under three, however, the main structure is essentially the same: identifying the delusions, understanding how they are developed, and knowing their causes and their faults.

Here, the identification of the delusions is presented in summary form. In order to abandon the afflictions, they definitely need to be identified. If one doesn't even recognise the afflictions for what they are, then there is no way that one can abandon them. For example, if one doesn't acknowledge anger as an affliction then there is no way one will take the initiative to abandon anger; it is the same with attachment and so forth. One will be able to recognise anger as a faulty state of mind when it is clearly identified as a delusion that is not based on reality, but on a faulty perception, and thus has no sound basis. Then the initiative to abandon this affliction can be strongly generated and one will make the effort to abandon anger. It is the same with the rest of the afflictions: first we need to clearly recognise and identify what they are, and then, based on the understanding that they are faulty states of mind, we then take the initiative to abandon them.

The text presents the afflictions identifying two of them, the enemies of anger, craving and so forth—which includes all other afflictions in summary form. As explained clearly in the text, the real enemies that hinder our wellbeing are the delusions or afflictions.

As indicated here, these delusions such as anger, craving and so forth are the real enemies, yet they do not have legs, arms or hold weapons in their hands. The comparison here is with an enemy that has form, such as a well built, muscular person protected by amour and carrying weapons and so forth. It would be difficult to face such a powerful enemy if we are comparatively smaller in size. However, these afflictions are not like that. As they are not form, they don't have legs, arms or weapons and so forth. Again we can take note of how, as explained in the teachings, it is seemingly easier to practise a bit of patience with a powerful figure because of our sheer incapacity to be able to combat or to fight them. So it is no wonder that we show a bit more tolerance toward someone who is more powerful! But practising patience with someone who is weak and meek and thus much easier to defeat, is much harder. So when one is able to practice patience with such weak beings, it is much more admirable.

Unlike a powerful external enemy, the delusions such as anger and craving and so forth are not equipped with any physical protection or intimidating size. Furthermore, it is not as if these delusions are also very brave with great effort, meaning that they are not very persistent. We need to also remind ourselves that one reason why the delusions are not very persistent is that they are aided by another delusion, called laziness. Furthermore, it is not as if these delusions are wise and have skilful means; in fact, they are not based on sound wisdom or intelligence of any sort. That is because they associate with yet another delusion, which is ignorance.

So if the afflictions do not have any of the aforementioned attributes then how did they take away my freedom and make me their slave? This is a significant point, implying, by means of a rhetorical question, that one is essentially enslaved by the afflictions. A powerful master can make his slaves do anything he commands, because the slaves are completely under his control. The slaves have to follow every wish or command of their master, who completely dominates them. Likewise, we are enslaved by our own afflictions. Why else would we do things that we know are not really wise or favourable to our wellbeing? Yet still we find ourselves following the commands of afflictions such as anger and craving and engage in actions that ultimately harms us.

This is a very significant point about why we continue to create negative actions, even though we understand that they are faults, and know the consequences are not favourable. There is no other reason than being dominated by the afflictions that overpower us. It is the same with the faults or misdeeds that others commit. When they see others committing murder or stealing and so forth, some people comment 'Why is there so much violence in the world? Why are people killing each other?' We need to understand that the reason they engage in the negative actions of killing and so forth is because they are completely dominated by the afflictions. When the afflictions compel them to engage in those actions it is as if they don't have any control over their own actions. Analysing things in this way enables us to understand the real motivator behind the negative actions others commit, and thus becoming more tolerant and compassionate towards them, rather than seeing them only as negative and evil. These are important points to keep in mind.

For as long as the delusions have complete control or dominance over us, we don't have much choice. But if we recognise the afflictions for what they are, then we have a chance of not being influenced by them. About two years ago, Maria's daughter, who was sitting in the very place where Maria is sitting right now, commented that having been introduced to the afflictions and their disadvantages, she came to a point in her meditation where she was able to recognise how those afflictions affected her. Even though this recognition did not prevent the afflictions from arising, she felt that recognising them had definitely helped her to become a little more wary, and helped to reduce their intensity. She said that she had been meditating for about a year and found it had been really helpful for her. She was making a really significant point, and had used a lot of intelligence and understanding to come to that conclusion.

In summary, we need to recognise the delusions for what they are. But if we don't do anything once we have recognised them, then the act of recognising afflictions would be quite pointless. As Shantideva has so very precisely presented here, we do have the potential, and we do have the ability to overcome the afflictions. So it is possible not only to identify the delusions, but to apply the antidotes and overcome them as well. Shantideva is giving us really profound advice: we have these great conditions of the freedoms and endowments, so it is definitely possible for us to overcome and abandon the afflictions.

2.2.3.1.1.2. They generate boundless suffering

Having briefly identified the afflictions, the next section presents their disadvantages.

As I have mentioned many, many times, these are very essential points to keep in mind, because this is a profound practice that can really protect your mind. When seeing others engaging in inappropriate deeds or saying inappropriate things, we need to be able to identify that it is the fault of the delusion, rather than a fault of the person per se. That will help to generate a sense of compassion for them rather than agitation and feelings of annoyance and anger. This is a really profound practice that we need to keep in mind. That recognition and understanding in relation to others can only come about when we have fully identified and recognised the delusions within ourselves, and understood how they actually dominate us so that we are then compelled to engage in negative deeds and actions, even though we don't want to. Then, based on our understanding of our own difficulties, we can recognise and apply that to others. It is really important to remember this if we want to maintain a good harmonious relationship with those around us. I have spoken about this many times in the past, and the point cannot be stressed enough.

The following points on the faults or disadvantages of the afflictions will encourage us to really try to overcome the afflictions, and apply the appropriate antidotes. Why should we want to do that? Because delusions generate boundless suffering and so forth.

The verse relating to this heading is:

29. *While they remain in my mind
They harm me joyfully.
Bearing this patiently without anger,
Is unsuitable and this patience is an object of criticism*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of the verse in this way:

To practise patience with regard to those that joyfully create the sufferings of the lower realms whilst they abide in my mind is unsuitable. This patience is an object of criticism and one should regard the afflictions as enemies and strive to abandon them.

Having identified and recognised the delusions or afflictions for what they are, it would be inappropriate to patiently and willingly allow them to remain within us, because not only do the delusions that lurk within us cause immense suffering, but they lead us to the extreme sufferings of the lower realms. Willingly being patient with these causes of immense suffering is not appropriate. As you would recall, not retaliating to the harms and sufferings inflicted by others is one of the classifications of patience. However, willingly enduring the dominance of the afflictions, rather than ensuring that one overcomes them, is inappropriate.

This patience is an object of criticism indicates that the buddhas and bodhisattvas would take a dim view of such patience, and not regard it as an appropriate type of patience. Being patient with anger would mean allowing anger to arise and infest our minds. Even from a worldly perspective we can all see that wrong deeds, such as killing and so forth, come from none other than the influence of delusions such as anger. Such misdeeds arise from being willingly submissive to anger and following its dictates. Just as we recognise this in others, it is exactly the same for ourselves. Being patient here means becoming submissive and allowing anger or attachment to arise and then following every command they give.

As the commentary explains, one should regard the afflictions as enemies and strive to abandon them. This means that as soon as an affliction arises, we need to immediately recognise it as harmful and, rather than willingly becoming submissive and patient with it, apply an antidote to overcome whatever affliction it is.

In order to do that, the commentary further explains:

One should work at understanding the definitions, divisions, causes and functions of the afflictions as they are explained in the Knowledge Treatises and mainly meditate on their disadvantages.

The author of the commentary, Gyaltsab Rinpoche, is explaining that one should know the afflictions in detail and mainly meditate on the disadvantages, which is the key point. For as long as we don't recognise or contemplate the disadvantages of the afflictions, then the need to overcome or abandon them will not arise. Therefore, contemplating the disadvantages of the afflictions again and again is, as explained here, a key point.

This relates back to that very intelligent and wise comment which I related earlier, about the fact that even just recognising the delusions definitely helped that student to become a little more wary, and helped to reduce their intensity. Recognising the afflictions for what they are definitely helps to minimise their intensity.

As presented in the teachings, the definition of an affliction is, that which causes discomfort and unease in our mind as soon as it is developed. We know this from our own experience; we can see that the moment certain kinds of afflictions are generated, we immediately feel weighed down, uncomfortable and unsettled. The fact that there is this discomfort is the sign that it is an affliction.

There are many people who make comments about how they sometimes, without any apparent reason, feel unsettled, unhappy, or disturbed. If we contemplate the real cause of that, it will be understood that is because of the delusions being prevalent in the mind.

As presented earlier in the commentary, there are six root delusions and twenty associate or secondary delusions.

The Lam Rim teachings present six causes of the delusions.

1. Basis: This means having the very seed or imprint of the delusions within one's mental continuum.

2. Object: It is very easy to understand that one develops attachment to an attractive object, and aversion or anger towards an unattractive object.

3. Social context: This refers to the people with whom you associate, where conversations with them can cause delusions such as attachment, anger and so forth to arise.

4. Faulty narration: This refers to faulty treatises and so forth that cause delusions to arise. For example, there are treatises that define sexual positions and so forth, which would cause attachment to arise and manifest themselves within one's mind. Likewise, friends might talk about things that can cause various delusions to arise.

5. Habituation: The more one is familiar with a particular delusion, the more likely it is that the delusion will be generated—and we can be affiliated with certain delusions from a very young age. We see people who are intolerant with the most insignificant and minute things, such as feeling strong attachment when they see an attractive object, or feeling angry and great disappointment when things don't go their way, or feeling despondent and so forth. These are delusions that manifest easily due to long-time habituation.

So we need to use our situation now to try to minimise our familiarity with the delusions as much as possible by applying the appropriate antidotes. If we continuously allow ourselves to become more and more familiar with delusions, then that will be the cause for the delusions to become more dominant and increase even more. Therefore we need to utilise our conditions to de-familiarise ourselves with the delusions.

6. Inappropriate attention: This refers to paying attention to the objects that cause the delusions to arise. We might see something that looks very attractive. If it is a mere glance and we pay no further attention then it may not cause much attachment to arise, however if we pay further attention to the details of that attractive object, then the more attention we pay to the colour, shape and so forth, the more the attachment will increase. If we take the example of a man being attracted to a woman, then the more the man thinks about her attractive figure, the smoothness of her hair, the complexion of her skin and so forth, the more his attachment will increase, to the point where he is obsessed. Likewise with anger, when one thinks about someone who has inflicted harm upon us, the more we pay attention to what they did; and thinking how they have harmed me in the past, 'They used this kind of measure to harm me', 'They harmed me just the other day, and they will harm me again in the future'. So in this way the more we pay attention, thinking again and again about how they harm us, the more reasons we find to become angry with them, to the point where anger becomes intense like a burning fire in one's heart. Many of you would have had the experience of paying attention to past memories of particular incidents and so forth, resulting in feeling sad or angry, despondent and so forth. These, in brief, are the six causes of delusions.

This explanation here is in accordance to the knowledge treatises, the Abhidharma in which three primary causes for delusions to arise are presented. I have explained this to you several times in the past, and they are very significant points to keep in mind. As presented in the Abhidharma, when 1) the delusions are not been abandoned, and 2) one is in close proximity with the objects of delusion, and 3) one applies incorrect attention to those objects, then the causes for the delusions to arise are all intact.

As presented here, for an ordinary being whose afflictions have not been abandoned, even if the delusions are always dormant, even though they are not manifest at present. Thus, the delusions manifest immediately as a result of not having abandoned the delusions, when one is in close proximity to an object that causes delusions to arise coupled with the incorrect attention that one applies whilst perceiving that object. The incorrect or improper attention is a faulty state of mind which taints one's perception to exaggerate the qualities or faults of the objects. So, just recognising a delusion as a fault will help to prevent incorrect attention from overpowering one's perceptions when perceiving any object.

The functions of the afflictions will be presented later on in the text. As I have mentioned previously, it is good for you to be able to identify and understand the six root delusions which are attachment, anger, ignorance, pride, and deluded doubt and wrong views. Wrong views can have a fivefold and a ten-fold classification. Basically there are five wrong views and this becomes ten if you include the five non-views.

The reason the term 'wrong views' is used is that there can also be correct views, such as the view of realising emptiness. Likewise, not all doubts are necessarily afflicted or deluded. There can be some virtuous doubts, so to be included as one of the six root delusions, the doubt must be a deluded or an afflicted doubt. The associated afflictions are belligerence, resentment, concealment, spite and so forth.

As presented in some of the texts I have come across—although not many mention it—the distinction between the root delusions and the associated delusions is that root delusions are generated in many different ways with many different objects whereas secondary delusions are more targeted at specific objects. The associated delusions are described as being closely related to either of the six root delusions¹. When we understand that associate delusions are closely related to one of the six root delusions, we can see how they stem from one of the main root delusions.

It would be good to have a list the six root delusions and the secondary delusions along with the six causes, as such a list is good for those who are not familiar with them. The delusions are clearly explained in the Lam Rim texts and it also good to go to other sources and become more familiar with their explanations.

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

15 April 2014

Based on the motivation we have generated we can now engage in meditation practice.

[Meditation]

For receiving the teachings, we can generate our motivation along these lines: in order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for this purpose I will listen to this Mahayana teaching, and by studying and understanding it, I will put it into practice well.

2.2.3.1.1.2. They generate boundless suffering (cont.)

The two verses under this heading read as follows:

30. *Even if all the gods and demi gods
Arise against me as enemy,
They are not able to guide me into
The fire without respite.*
31. *This enemy of the powerful afflictions
Throws me in an instant into Where even the ashes of Mount Meru
Do not remain upon contact.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains these verses.

Even if all the gods and demi gods arise as my enemies, if I do not fall under the control of the mental afflictions, then they are not able to guide and place me into the fire without respite.

But this powerful enemy of the afflictions in my continuum throws me in an instant into the fire without respite, where even the ashes of Mount Meru do not remain upon contact.

Therefore one should strive to destroy the enemy of the afflictions.

The verses explain that the afflictions which are within oneself are extremely powerful, more so than any kind of external enemy or entity. Powerful enemies could include gods, such as Brahma, who is said to be extremely powerful in terms of might and ability; also demigods and their retinues who have extremely powerful means to engage in combat. Even within humans, there are certain individuals known to be very brave and skilled in combat. There are stories of how one human being was capable of killing thousands of people. So there are definitely powerful humans who could be our enemies.

What is being explained here is that even if all of these powerful enemies: gods, demigods and powerful humans, were all combined together and simultaneously rose up as one's enemy, they cannot place one in the hot hell realms, such as the fire without respite. It is, of course a given that if from one's own side one does not allow the afflictions to overpower oneself, then all those powerful external enemies cannot place us in the hell realms from their side.

Note here that if someone were to kill another living being, then just through the act of taking the other's life they are not placing them in the lower realms. Rather through the negative act of killing, they are creating the karma to go to lower realms themselves.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on the next verse begins with, But this powerful enemy of the afflictions in my continuum.

The main point one needs to reflect upon here is that the powerful enemy of the afflictions are within one's own mental continuum and it is none other than these internal afflictions that lead one to the lower realms. The main instruction here is that the afflictions are not random categories of phenomena that lie outside of oneself. If one thinks 'Yes there is anger, there is attachment, there are delusions' - relating to them as a mere categorical list, then that doesn't help one to identify the delusions within oneself. Even if one is able to list many afflictions and describe them in detail, if one doesn't recognise the afflictions within oneself, one will not be able to take any initiative to overcome them. The emphasis here is that one must look within one's own mental continuum to identify the delusions within oneself, so that one can take the initiative to overcome them.

As mentioned previously, the first step to overcoming the delusions is to identify them, and then to contemplate the causes and the disadvantages etc. As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains, it is these afflictions within one's mental continuum that throw me in an instant into the fire without respite, which is the hot hell realms. Even Mount Meru, the most grandiose of mountains, will be rendered to ashes upon mere contact with the intensity of the heat in the fire without respite. Thus the consequences of being born in such a place of unimaginable suffering is the result of the afflictions. Here, Gyaltsab Je highlights that one must destroy the enemy of the afflictions.

To take on board what is being explained here, it is by engaging in personal reflection to identify the afflictions or delusions within oneself, recognising their causes and particularly their faults, that one can slowly and gradually take the initiative to overcome them. Even the process of identifying them is a gradual process—the afflictions are not something that we are able to recognise right away.

Of course it is easier to recognise delusions in others! It is easy to identify the faults of someone else's anger, attachment and so forth. However, when it comes to one's own faults of anger and so forth, we always have good excuses thinking, 'I am OK, there is no problem.' If we are not able to identify the anger within oneself, then that is a real problem. Even if one recognises it, but rationalises it, and thinks that there is no problem, then that will prolong the process of taking the initiative to abandon it. So one really needs to take to heart the need to recognise the shortcomings of the afflictions within oneself, and that one's own anger and attachment etc. have been the cause of all of then one's problems.

I am not referring to those of you who don't have any delusions. But for those who are able to identify the delusions within yourself, then you need to take careful consideration in recognising how the delusions affect your wellbeing. Harboursing the delusions in one's mind causes turmoil and an unsubdued mind.

The very function of a delusion is to make one's mind unsettled and troubled. Therefore if one aspires to achieve a subdued mind, one definitely needs to take the initiative to recognise and really acknowledge the afflictions within oneself, then one can gradually take the initiative to overcome them. We need to take a gradual approach, the afflictions are not something which can be abandoned quickly. Even the study and understanding of them takes time and needs to be a gradual process. We need to ensure that the study and understanding of Dharma becomes integrated with our mind-set, slowly but steadily transforming our minds.

When studying texts which identify the delusions, the main point is not to treat it as a mere list that one goes over, as if they are not related to oneself. Rather we need to use these explanations as way to identify the delusions within oneself. Having identified and clearly seen the faults of the delusions, one can then take the initiative to slowly abandon them. As Dharma practitioners we need to ensure that whatever we do becomes the means to subdue the mind and overcome the delusions. The great Kadampa master Geshe Potawa said that regardless of whether one is engaged in the Dharma or worldly activities, if the activity becomes an antidote for overcoming the delusions, then it has served its purpose well. This is the kind of advice that the great Kadampa masters give; not many words but really to the point.

If one does not ensure that our so-called Dharma practice is an antidote for overcoming delusions, then the very aspect of the Dharma practice can become a worldly concern. This is because one has not protected one's practice to ensure that it overcomes delusions.

The Lam Rim teachings explain that the way to measure one's progress in studying and practising the Dharma is that if one's practices actually help one to gain more and more confidence, and more faith, and one's mind gradually becomes more subdued, then one can feel confident that one's practice is working (whatever form it may take). However if we find that certain practices or study are making one more and more agitated, more and more deluded, and one is losing one's faith in the Dharma, then that is a sign that it is not making a positive effect within oneself.

In relation to developing love and compassion, particularly in the section of how to develop the superior intention, the Great Lam Rim text explains that meditating just once in a while is not sufficient to develop this mind. Rather one must meditate on love and compassion again and again for the superior intention to develop in one's mind. Quoting from another text the Lam Rim uses an analogy to illustrate this point—it would be like attempting to sweeten a big sour tree with just a few drops of a sweetener. If one wishes to transform a sour tree into a sweet one, one needs to put many, many drops of a sweet substance over a long period of time. Then eventually it is possible for a sour tree to actually become sweet. His Holiness the Dalai Lama uses this analogy in his teachings regularly. The delusions within our mind are like a sour taste which is hard to transform into a sweet taste. If one meditates on love and compassion just once in a while we cannot expect to transform the afflictions in our mind and develop superior intention; we cannot expect a positive outcome from just a few attempts. Rather we need to make a consistent effort in identifying the delusions, seeing their disadvantages, and applying the antidote, whereby we will gradually overcome the delusions within oneself.

It will be good for you to refer to that quotation by reading the section in the Lam Rim that explains how to develop the superior intention. These are important points for us to reflect upon and as way to improve our practice.

We need to consider the fact that we are not deprived of the means—we do know how to engage in Dharma practices. What we need to keep in mind, is that if we leave aside certain practices that we already know how to engage in now, and try to adopt other practices that may well be beyond our reach, then that would be completely missing the mark. It is far more productive to actually implement the practices that we are familiar with now. Lama Tsong Khapa mentions that we do not have the fault of not knowing the practices, but rather we might be incurring the fault of not implementing the practices that we do know. The point is that we need to take the initiative to actually apply the practices with which we are already familiar. Then a gradual but true transformation takes place.

To summarise Shantideva's main points, what he is advising us in simple terms is this:

The trouble maker for all your problems is not something which lies outside, but rather within yourself which are called the afflictions. When you recognise them within yourself, you can then take measures to apply the antidote and abandon them. So, you need to apply effort in doing just that.

If one really uses one's study and practice as a means to combat the real troublemaker within oneself by taking that initiative at the very outset, that motivation can make a tremendous difference in our approach to the study or practice of the Dharma. I am not implying that I have gained great insight or developed realisation from my attempts, but what I can assure you is that I have definitely had a proper motivation from the very outset. Early on when I was studying in the monastery, studying the texts and engaging in the debates, my intention was always, 'When I finish my studies, I definitely want to put what I have learnt into practice by spending time in meditation and doing retreats'. This was definitely my intention. That has not become a reality because I have come to a foreign country to teach instead, so I have not had the opportunities to do long-term retreats. However because the studies were done with that intention, I can definitely say that they have had a positive effect on my mind. What I am sharing here is that if from the very outset one has the proper motivation for doing the studies and practice, then to that extent there will definitely be a positive effect.

2.2.3.1.1.3. They harm over an infinite amount of time

The afflictions are unlike external enemies, which no matter how powerful and mighty they might be, will eventually disintegrate of their own accord, even without us taking many measures to try to vanquish them. Over time that is what will occur. However with the internal enemy, by leaving delusions as they are they will not just disintegrate by themselves. Even after a long period of time they remain intact. If we don't take any measures to apply the antidotes and just leave them as they are, they can become even more powerful rather than disintegrating.

This point is explained in the following verse:

32. *No other enemy has
Such long term ability
Like the enemy of my afflictions,
With extensive time, without beginning or end.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of the verse:

Another drawback of the afflictions to contemplate:

No other worldly enemy has such an ability to live for a long time like the enemy of my afflictions, who abide for extensive time, without beginning or end.

Since meditating on the antidote to the afflictions only for one session at a time does not do anything, one should strive to have an uninterrupted stream of effort in destroying the afflictions.

As the commentary clearly explains here, no other worldly enemy has such an ability to live for a long time like the enemy of my afflictions, who abides for extensive time without beginning or end. Unlike the external enemy which won't live for long, the inner enemy of afflictions abides much longer and harms one to greater extent. The external enemy can give us a certain amount of harm periodically, but because it cannot take us to the lower realms it cannot give us extensive sufferings. However the internal enemy of afflictions is the one that can lead us to the most extreme sort of sufferings.

Following that is, Since meditating on the antidote to the afflictions only for one session at the time, does not do anything, one should strive to have an uninterrupted stream of effort in destroying the afflictions. In relation to the earlier analogy, a big sour tree cannot be expected to become sweet by pouring just one drop of sweetener a few times. But if one were to constantly apply sweeteners then there is a possibility to transform it into a sweet tree. Similarly with the afflictions within oneself: we cannot expect to subdue them by meditating on the antidote just once, or periodically, rather we need to constantly apply vigilance over one's state of mind and apply the antidote whenever the afflictions arise. It should not be as if one aims to go out and have a good time outside, and doing one or two meditation sessions when one feels like it. Otherwise one could spend all the time just going around and having a good time. That sort of attitude will not overcome the delusions.

The analogy also shows that one should strive to have an uninterrupted stream. The Tibetan word actually refers to a stream of water. In the same way as a small stream of water can be consistent and run for a long period of time, our practice should be like that. Even though we might not be able to apply great measures of practice right away, whatever practice we can apply with uninterrupted effort, continuously will have an effect. Where we have a burst of energy and get excited about a certain practice, that is something which we need to be a wary of because it may not last too long and might actually cause discouragement afterwards.

2.2.3.1.1.4. The reason why it is unsuitable to befriend the afflictions

This heading explains that one may attempt to befriend external enemies by being kind to them or generous to them, and with this it is possible that they will start to become friendly to us. However with the internal enemy of afflictions, one cannot expect that by befriending the delusions they will not harm us; the more we befriend the delusions, the more powerful they become in harming us. This is explained in the next verse and commentary.

33. *When agreeably and respectfully relied upon
Then everybody acts beneficial and causes
happiness,
But if one relies on the afflictions
They will retaliate and cause harm.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning:

When one relies on the outer enemy after having honoured them agreeably by serving them food, drink and so forth, then they will benefit us and help us to have happiness.

But if we rely on the enemy of the afflictions and act agreeably to them, then they will increase in strength, retaliate and cause us harm. To destroy them is the only method to attain happiness.

I have summarised this earlier, but to reflect again upon the main point. If you relate to an individual external enemy kindly, followed by giving gifts, food and so forth then it is possible that someone who was once disagreeable to one, or who considered you an enemy, can turn around and actually become a friend. With an external enemy, if we keep our distance and show an attitude of antagonism then that will only cause the rift to become bigger and the dislike greater. Then there is no possibility of befriending them. It is a very significant point that if we don't want enemies we should take the initiative ourselves. The great beings will act in ways that show gratitude and repay harm with kindness, whereas ordinary worldly beings will return harm for harm. Returning kindness for harm inflicted upon oneself is an act of a great being who takes the initiative to engage in this way.

Unlike the external enemy, if one acts kindly to the internal enemy of afflictions, as though they are our masters. By saying 'yes' to whatever the delusion wants, bowing down and not doing anything to confront them or combat them from within oneself, they will increase in strength, retaliate and cause us harm. You will notice through your own experience that certain delusions or afflictions act like adding fuel. If we harbour them and keep contemplating on them, the stronger they become. So if you find yourself in a situation now where the delusions are occurring like a stream of water, continuously affecting you one after another, then that is because we have not applied the antidotes previously and we are not making any attempts to apply them now. If we make an attempt to apply the antidote to whatever extent we are able, during the time we apply it, the delusions will actually stop. In this way one can see that it is possible to begin to overcome an otherwise continuous stream of delusions. If we don't apply the antidotes then the afflictions won't subside naturally by themselves. If destroying the delusions within oneself is the only method to experience genuine happiness and wellbeing, then we have no choice but to apply the antidotes.

2.2.3.1.2. How it is unsuitable to meditate on patience for the afflictions

This has two sub-headings

2.2.3.1.2.1. Contemplating how they harm the mind

2.2.3.1.2.2. Contemplating how they harm the body

2.2.3.1.2.1. Contemplating how they harm the mind

The root text states:

34. *Therefore, if this continual long time enemy,
The singular cause for the increase of the accumulation of harm,
Takes up permanent residence in my heart,
How can cyclic existence be fearless and joyful*

The commentary on this verse reads as follows:

Therefore, if this continual long time enemy, who is the singular unrivalled cause for the strong increase of the accumulation of all harm, takes up permanent residence in my heart, then how can cyclic existence be fearless and joyful?

Since there is no chance for happiness, strive in destroying the afflictions.

Gyalsab Je's commentary states that if this continual long-term enemy (the afflictions), identified here as the singular unrivalled cause for the strong increase of the accumulation of all harm, takes up permanent residence in my heart (meaning that if we don't do anything to overcome the afflictions and therefore maintain them in our heart), then while we abide in cyclic existence, how can we be fearless and how can we be joyful? We need to take this as real personal advice on how to overcome the causes for our own unhappiness. What is being explained here is that the real cause for one's unhappiness, whatever the situation, are the afflictions within one's own mind. So regardless of the external situation, the actual causes of mental agony lie within oneself. If we fail to identify this and constantly try look outside for external causes and so forth, we are completely missing the point.

Harbouring the enemy within, and looking for solutions outside to overcome them will not bring real joy and fearlessness to one's life. Again, one needs to reflect that if we make a genuine attempt to slowly identify the real enemy (the afflictions within) and make genuine attempt to gradually apply the antidote and overcome them, then it is possible for one to gradually experience a real sense of joy regardless of external situations. Wherever one goes, one will be able to maintain some inner sense of tranquillity within one's mind which can definitely have a positive effect upon one's physical body. There are clear signs that a joyful and happy mind can contribute to good health. Take this into considerations for your own benefit.

Practical measures that assist one to develop the inclination to overcome the delusions really rely upon identifying the negative effects the delusions have within oneself. One can reflect upon one's own state of being and ask oneself, 'Would I want to be in a very angry state, or would I rather be free of anger? Would I like to be feeling completely attached, and upset with attachment or would I rather be in a state free from the pangs of attachment?' Likewise with jealousy, would you like to harbour jealousy in your mind, or would you rather be appeased and not have jealousy? Likewise with pride and so forth. By having an internal dialogue with oneself, and clearly and honestly answering that one would rather be free of these negative states of mind (the afflictions), then knowing there is a means to overcome them, one needs to apply the antidotes.

Equally and naturally we would all like to have mental and physical happiness. There might be other measures presented by other traditions, or even worldly means to gain some happiness, but these may or may not contribute to genuine happiness.

We are in the category of people who look internally to attempt to resolve afflictions to develop genuine mental and physical happiness. To recap, to do this one must identify the causes for mental agony and physical suffering which are the result of afflictions. As we can consider ourselves as beings who look internally to deal with our internal world, we might as well actually make that attempt now and put this understanding into practice. This is how to take this explanation as personal instruction.

We can assume that you coming here is a rare opportunity and you can take pride in yourself for coming here. In a normal worldly situation, after work people might say, 'I have gone to work. I have been busy all day so I am tired now, and I'd just like to lie down and relax and take it easy'. So while many of you have gone to work during the day, and are busy and tired, you have still taken the initiative to come to a teaching here and listened to it. So having sacrificed relaxation time at home don't feel that it is a waste of time. Making an attempt here will definitely have a positive effect and will help overcome hardships and difficulties. On a practical level, if you were to stay home, you may not really have a full opportunity to relax and have a good time anyway. You might get into an argument with your partner, or be annoyed by the children, and not have a very relaxed time at home. So you might as well come here to have a genuine relaxing time.

Some have confided in me that even before they leave work, they already feel anxious about what they have to face at home. Some lament saying, 'I have a headache when I think of what I have to do when I get back home.' I tell them, not to worry about the next job before finishing the first one. This is giving oneself extra worries and agony. Some seem to see going home to cook, and do the washing up, and take care of the children as an extra burden. If one thinks about these as a chore then it does present itself in that way, so try to have a proper attitude. It often seems that causes for conflict and argument are based on who is trying to do what in the household. Indeed the outside work may seem harder and more difficult in comparison to someone who is staying home, but I would think that the work involved with staying at home and cleaning up, looking after children etc. is not easy work either. It is very important to look after the wellbeing of children. For example someone that I know has a family of three children, and the mum said 'If I have another child I might go crazy' and she related how difficult it was to care for the young one's. I can relate to that.

Again, I acknowledge you coming here to the teachings. I definitely admire it and am happy about it and appreciate that you take the initiative and sacrifice some time to do the study. While that is incredible and such a fortunate occasion for you, what I am attempting to add on to what you learn here, is to encourage you to try to implement it in your life. Try to put the teachings into practice a bit and that will be really worthwhile and beneficial for you. Even though I am not able to practise extensively, as I mentioned earlier, I do feel there is definitely great benefit to be achieved as a result of practice.

In the material you have already studied, for example the previous text Precious Garland by Nagarjuna, recall how precise and practical the advice was; one verse after another on how to engage in practice. We went through the extensive explanations according to that text: first of all what causes us to achieve high status, then how to achieve the definite goodness. Prior to that was Aryadeva's 400 Verses text which explained the path based on the conventional truth as well the ultimate truth, again these were presented very precisely. We have studied these, we have all heard them and we have created a very, very positive imprint in our mind by going through these texts.

Prior to that we studied Chandrakirti's Madhyamakavatara, where again explanations of the five paths and ten grounds were very clearly presented.

Having the opportunity to study these texts and reflect upon them is a great fortune. We need to acknowledge that, then and now, as we can still derive benefit from these teachings every time we rejoice, and dedicate the merits of the attempts we have made, to the study and practice. Rejoicing helps to increase the virtue, then we can dedicate the virtue we derive, and benefit from that.

Before this was the teaching Liberation on the Palm of your Hand. You indicated that you didn't care how long it took and we actually spent about six years on it. With all this time spent, we were able to go into great detail on this Lam Rim teaching and actually many of you have been able to use it as a basis for presenting and teaching to others. This again is a significant point to recollect as a way to generate joy in one's mind, and to acknowledge the great fortune one has had to be able to study these texts. However one should also make prayers to be able to continuously meet with the conditions to study and practice these teachings, from life to life, in all one's future lifetimes.

Up until now we may all equally assume that we have not had much opportunity to accumulate much external wealth, however we have definitely spent time and energy acquiring some inner wealth. We have obtained something that is indestructible. No matter how much external wealth we might have accumulated, it is not something that we can take with us—not one single dollar can we take with us to our next life. However with the internal wealth of the studies and the practices, and good positive imprints in our mind is something that we can all confidently take with us to our future life. In making a choice between external wealth and internal wealth, we have made the choice to spend more time and energy acquiring internal wealth. So we have definitely made the right choice.

However, I have also regularly said that we do need external means. While we are making attempts to acquire internal wealth, we also need access to external wealth as for our survival, for ongoing, good conditions for our life. It is a reality that without adequate external conditions we will not be able to practise the Dharma.

I recall when I escaped from Tibet, on the route there were certain occasions where we passed some really beautiful areas, like beautiful valleys. When you looked up there were mountainous regions and I could even detect that there might be a cave up there. On a few occasions I definitely thought, 'Oh how nice if I could just go up to the cave and stay there to meditate. Wouldn't that be wonderful?' And even though there was a strong intention to want to do that, immediately the next thought was 'Who would feed me?' 'How would I get anything up there?' There were no villages around, and it was doubtful whether there would be any natural plants that I could eat. In the winter especially there is hardly anything growing in that remote area, up so high. So that was the practical aspect which prevented an otherwise noble thought of wanting to go into the little cave.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

Based on the motivation that we generated during our recitation of the refuge and bodhicitta prayer, we can now engage in the meditation practice. If we ensure our mind is focused on the object of refuge with strong faith, and then generate bodhicitta in relation to all sentient beings, then these two elements will ensure that our practice, even if it is for only a few minutes, will be really meaningful. We need to keep that in mind while engaging in the practice.

[meditation]

As a motivation for receiving the teaching, we can strengthen the earlier bodhicitta motivation by generating this thought:

In order to benefit all sentient beings, to liberate them from all suffering and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching, and put it into practice well.

2.2.3.1.2. How it is unsuitable to meditate on patience for the afflictions

In the text we are up to the section that explains the faults of afflictions and so forth. Rather than treating it as some intellectual understanding, we need to really pay careful attention to these explanations and relate them to our own mental continuum. In this way we will ensure that what we understand from these teachings serves its purpose, which is to reduce the afflictions in one's own mind. Conversely, if our study of the teachings serves to increase afflictions, then it completely defeats the purpose of our study.

We need to pay careful attention to our state of mind, so that our study does not increase the afflictions in our mind, specifically the delusion of pride. If, having understood some points in the teachings, we start to feel pompous, thinking, 'Oh, now I have much better understanding and knowledge of the Dharma than others' and develop a puffed-up superior attitude, then our study has increased the delusion of pride.

Initially when we didn't have much understanding of the Dharma we might not have had much pride in relation to the teaching. But when we gain some understanding then a newly formed pride may arise. It is not that there was no pride to begin with, as the basis of pride is always there. Here we are referring to the pride in thinking, 'Now I have some understanding of the Dharma, I know it better than others'. That is a newly formed pride which comes about as a result of having studied the Dharma.

Likewise, one may not initially have much jealousy in relation to others who are studying the Dharma. In the beginning one didn't have much knowledge of the Dharma, but as one begins to study and gain some knowledge, then that is when a sense of jealousy may arise in relation to others who are also studying and trying to practise the Dharma. Likewise, a sense of competition may arise. This is the classic example of where the Dharma has been completely misused and turned into a poison. Now, of course that doesn't mean that the Dharma itself turns into poison, because the essence of Dharma can never turn into poison. But if the Dharma is completely misused, then it actually becomes a cause for afflictions to increase. In this case, rather than serving as medicine to subdue the mind the Dharma becomes a means to further escalate the poisons in the mind.

These are really important points we need to take into consideration so that whatever study, understanding and practice one has in the Dharma does not become a further means to strengthen the afflictions. That would defeat the whole purpose of studying and practising the Dharma, which would be a disgrace. In sharing this point with you I am not implying that I'm skilled in Dharma practice myself, however I really do feel that these are important points that we need to keep in mind. I share this with you out of a genuine concern for you and your Dharma practice, so that your attempts to study and understand the Dharma do not go astray, and that the Dharma actually fulfils its intended purpose.

It is when the Dharma nourishes the afflictions in the mind rather than benefiting the mind that followers of a tradition will start to squabble and come into conflict. That is a mark of real degeneration. It is not the fault of the Dharma or the religion, but it is the fault of those who follow the religion or the Dharma having not utilised the teachings to really subdue their minds. When that happens amongst the followers of any particular religion or tradition it becomes a disgrace to the religion itself.

It is really important that we relate the faults of the delusions to our own mind and not use them as a means to judge others. The faults of the delusions that are described in the teachings should relate to one's own state of mind. If one is not careful, situations such as those that have occurred in our very own study group can arise. Several times in the past people have brought to my attention that some students who were quite new to the study group had a sense that they were being looked down upon by those who had a little more understanding, and they felt that they were being put down. This problem has now subsided, but there may be occasions where it can happen again. So we need to be really mindful and careful that this doesn't occur.

The faults of the delusions are described in the teachings very meticulously, and the best way to validate this is by relating the teachings to the delusions that we find within ourselves. Seeing the faults of our own delusions is the best reference point to test the truth of the Dharma.

The great master Shantideva mentioned that we need to really protect ourselves against the attitude of jealousy towards those who are higher than oneself, against pride and contempt towards those who are lower than oneself, and competitiveness with those who are on the same level as oneself. When we think about it, these three attitudes are the cause of a lot of distress and turmoil in any society. As Shantideva mentioned, it is very hard to please worldly beings who are completely engrossed with these types of attitudes, for as long as they maintain these attitudes in their mind they will not be able to relate to the truth of the Dharma.

It is not sufficient to merely recognise the faults of the delusions, but rather, having recognised the faults, we need to apply the antidotes to overcome the delusions. That is what we really need to take on board. The process of identifying the delusions and seeing the faults of the delusions is something we need to do on a regular basis in our everyday life. Although we don't have the ability to recollect the faults of delusions that we have committed in previous lifetimes, we can, in our everyday life, do a thorough analysis of the delusions that are affecting us now on a daily basis. If our day begins with feeling unsettled and a particular delusion becomes manifest and prevalent, then we can notice how it affects the rest of the day. We might feel unsettled throughout the day and become prone to even more delusions manifesting in our mind. That is what occurs when we have not really paid attention to the delusions that lie within, and made genuine attempts to apply the antidotes. Whereas if we check our state of mind every morning, and ensure that it is not affected by any strong delusions, and if it is, then make genuine attempts to apply an antidote, then we will find the rest of the day will be quite fine, that there will be no big drama or upheaval taking place. Towards evening we can feel quite content and happy that we've had a good day, a day where we have not been completely overpowered and consumed by negative states of mind. That is how we can feel content and happy that we have had a worthwhile day. We can then rejoice and dedicate our good virtues and merits of the day.

As explained earlier, we need to combat the delusions by applying an antidote, making sure that we don't allow them to overpower us. We need to follow the examples of Kadampa masters such as Geshe Bayen Gun-gyal, who used to have dialogues with the delusions saying, 'If you become relaxed then I will be relaxed too, but if you start becoming powerful then I am going to use force to overcome you'. You will find these quotes in the Lam Rim teachings, and it would be good for you to refer to them. This is the sort of measures that earlier practitioners used as a way of combatting the delusions in their mind; applying the antidote the moment the delusions arise.

If we don't take the initiative to recognise the delusions and apply an antidote, then it is most likely that we will become completely overwhelmed and overpowered by the delusions as they arise. As beginners, even just recognising a delusion for what it is when it manifests will reduce its intensity and strong hold on our mind. It is to that extent that we gain the benefit of recognising the delusions within oneself. That is the measure of how we need to apply our practice on a daily basis. It will take some time before we actually get to the point of being able to apply an antidote to overcome the delusions completely. However we need to begin the process by gradually taking these steps in our everyday life.

The Lam Rim teachings, and indeed all the Buddha's teachings, explain that the purpose of overcoming the delusions and afflictions is to subdue our mind. So we need to ensure that we are taking that onboard, and that we are applying the teachings at a level within our capability. That is where we begin. If we leave that aside and start thinking that there are grander practices that we should be doing, then that is again missing the point. We need to begin with the basis and develop a strong foundation. I am sharing this as a way of reminding you of the essential point of the whole study and practice of the Dharma, so that it benefits you and that you don't miss the point.

There is no way to become a real practitioner without paying attention to death and impermanence. Through logic you will be able to find that this is true, because the focus of all the activities of a person who does not recollect death and impermanence will be merely on the benefits and affairs of this life. Thus they cannot become a true practitioner. Without recollecting death and impermanence, our activities will be those that are focused on staying in this world rather than moving on to the next. We need to be prepared for our inevitable onward journey, rather than thinking that we will remain here for ever.

The last line of verse 34 asks:

How can cyclic existence be fearless and joyful?

There are different interpretations of the meaning of this line. Gyaltsab Je's explanation implies that if one does not combat the afflictions in one's mind, then how could remaining in cyclic existence be fearless and joyful? Other commentaries explain that if one does not have a fear of cyclic existence then one may regard cyclic existence as being joyful. However, regarding cyclic existence as being joyful is completely contrary to how we need to regard cyclic existence. That joy arises because one lacks any fear of cyclic existence. That is a slightly more profound explanation.

2.2.3.1.2.2. Contemplating how they harm the body

The relevant verse is:

35. *If this guardian of the prison of cyclic existence,
Who becomes the executioner and torturer in hell,
Abides within the net of attachment in my mind,
Then how can I have happiness?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

These afflictions do not grant freedom from cyclic existence. Rather they become the guardians of the prison of cyclic existence and the hell realms. They also become the executioners killing in the upper and lower realms.

If these afflictions abide within the net of the mistaken conception, within the net of attachment in my mind, then how can one have a chance for happiness?

There is no chance for mental or physical happiness

These afflictions do not grant freedom from cyclic existence, this identifies the specific cause that imprisons us in cyclic existence, which is none other than the afflictions themselves. It is afflictions that prevent one from being free from cyclic existence. Further, the afflictions become the guardians of the prison of cyclic existence. That which guards us in cyclic existence and keeps us there is none other than the afflictions. Also the torturers in the hell realms that inflict the harms in the hell realms are none other than manifestations of one's own afflictions.

Furthermore they also become the executioners killing in the upper and lower realms. In hell realms, as you would have heard, after the body has been torn apart in every direction the body regenerates itself and has to experience the sufferings all over again, and if one faints one is revived and has to experience the sufferings again. The cause of that is none other the afflictions. Even in the upper realms such as the human realm, as we all know, there are many who take their own life, which is caused none other than the afflictions. As Shantideva mentions in another text, the afflictions in the mind, such as anger, can cause someone to take their own life. With this understanding we can understand the point about the afflictions being like executioners.

The main cause for all the sufferings that will be experienced, regardless of whether one is of higher status or lower status, is none other than the afflictions. What is being implied here in simple terms is that for as long as the afflictions are not abandoned no one is spared by them. The net of mistaken conceptions can apply, on a broader sense, to any kind of delusion that manifests itself in the mind, but more specifically it is applied to self-grasping. So the root of the delusions, grasping at a truly existent self, is the primary root of all our mistaken conceptions. Thus, held within the net of mistaken conceptions we are trapped in samsara. Here net is analogous to the net of a bird cage that prevents the bird from escaping.

How can one have a chance of happiness, implies that for as long as the afflictions abide in one's mind there is no chance at all for mental or physical happiness.

Mistaken conceptions also relates to the inappropriate attention that we place on objects when we perceive them. As I have already explained this in detail previously, we need not elaborate on it again here.

2.2.3.1.3. Generating courage to destroy them

Merely acknowledging the afflictions as being harmful, and seeing their faults is not sufficient. Just thinking about these faults could be overwhelming unless one also thinks about the possibility of overcoming them. Therefore this heading is saying that we need to develop the courage to destroy the delusions.

The verse relating to this outline reads:

36. *Thus, as long as I do not destroy this enemy directly
For that long I shall not give up striving here.
The very proud ones that become angry even due to small harm,
Sleep will elude them until they have destroyed it.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Since everything unwished for is generated by the afflictions, for as long as I have not definitely destroyed this terrifying enemy directly, it is appropriate that I shall not give up even for one moment striving in the antidote to the afflictions while I am here in this migration.

If the very proud worldly people get angry at even small harms such as harsh words, they will be very vengeful, sleep will elude them and they will not rest until they have destroyed their enemy.

Therefore it is appropriate to strive in destroying the enemy of the afflictions.

The commentary begins with since everything unwished for is generated by the afflictions, so we need to apply that understanding to any unwanted or unpleasant experience. These experiences don't occur randomly without any reason or without any causes. Rather, as stated here, every unwanted experience is caused by delusions.

For as long as I have not definitely destroyed this terrifying enemy directly implies that having understood that the cause of unwanted or unwished for experiences is generated by the afflictions will not be sufficient to overcome the manifest level of delusions. Rather, one needs to strive to overcome them from their very root. Here, directly has the connotation of from its very root. Thus what is being explained here is that until and unless one overcomes the afflictions from their very root, it is appropriate that I should not give up for one moment striving in the antidote to the afflictions while I am in this migration. What is being implied here is that one will not experience any real happiness until the afflictions have been completely uprooted.

The intent to not give up even for one moment striving in the antidote explains that having generated the antidote, one should not give up applying that antidote.

When the commentary mentions if the very proud worldly people get angry, it is referring more specifically to the mental factor of spite. Very proud worldly people can become very spiteful. As explained previously, spite is a specific state of anger that escalates to the point where you do not give up on the intention of harming the person who harms you. As stated here, even with small harms, such as harsh words, sleep will elude them and they will not rest until they have destroyed their enemy. Some individuals cannot rest until they have taken revenge on someone who has harmed them, either with actual words or by harbouring ill-will and thinking, 'I have to get back at them'. As mentioned here, they may not even be able to go to sleep until they have been able to take revenge. Some individuals are affected by such strong pride that they are not able to endure even small harms.

This example of very proud individuals who constantly think about how to get back at those who have inflicted even trivial harms is used to indicate how it is far more appropriate to strive to destroy the enemy of the afflictions, who harm us on a constant basis. For as long as we harbour the afflictions in our mind, they constantly harm us and affect us in a negative way. It is far more appropriate and worthwhile to apply the antidote for overcoming the delusions at all times, rather than wasting time trying to take revenge on external enemies. Therefore, day and night, we should be concerned with applying the antidotes to overcome the afflictions.

2.2.3.2. HOW IT IS UNSUITABLE TO TIRE OF THE DIFFICULTY OF ABANDONING THE AFFLICTIONS

Having recognised the afflictions and seen the need to abandon them, one might become discouraged and give up striving to overcome them. This section is explaining why one should not tire in this endeavour.

What is implied here is that abandoning the afflictions is not going to be an easy task. The delusions are powerful and they are very persistent in harming us. When we apply some antidote and reach a point where we may have some control over the delusions, they very sneakily arise in another guise. So the delusions find so many different ways to harm us. We are not dealing with an easy enemy here, so abandoning the afflictions will require farsighted endurance from our side. But we should not tire of the difficulty. As outlined in the heading this is exactly what the following verses encourage us to do.

This heading has three sub-divisions:

2.2.3.2.1. Donning the armour that will enable one to destroy the afflictions, it is unsuitable to tire of the difficulties

2.2.3.2.2. The benefits of striving to destroy the afflictions

2.2.3.2.3. It is appropriate to strive in the trainings that destroy the afflictions

2.2.3.2.1. Donning the armour that will enable one to destroy the afflictions, it is unsuitable to tire of the difficulties

There are two verses under this heading.

37 *The afflicted ones, who suffer anyway due to dying naturally,
At the height of battle, deeply wishing to destroy,
They disregard sufferings inflicted by weaponry, arrows and spears,
And will not retreat until their purpose is achieved.*

38 *What need is there to mention that they who strive
In destroying the natural enemy, which is the continual Cause for all suffering, strive without despondence or laziness,
Despite hundredfold sufferings.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation explains the meaning of the verse:

The afflicted ones, whose nature it is anyway to transform into the suffering of death, even without being killed, are the object of compassion.

When they are doing battle with the strong will to fight and to overcome the enemy, they will disregard the suffering inflicted by weapons such as arrows, spears and so forth, and will not retreat until their aim is achieved.

What need is there to mention that it is appropriate for me, who has taken up austerity, wishing to destroy the enemy of the afflictions, who has treated me as an enemy from the day of my birth, to not give up striving to destroy this enemy, and to not give in to despondency and laziness despite hundredfold sufferings such as cold, hunger and thirst.

As the commentary explains, the afflicted ones refers to the worldly enemies, who are afflicted by the delusions.

Because they are afflicted by the delusions they will naturally experience the consequences of their afflictions in the form of suffering, in particular the suffering of death. In other words, these external enemies, who are afflicted by the delusions, will naturally be vanquished by death, even without someone taking measures to destroy them. So, because they are afflicted by the delusions and will consequently experience the suffering of being completely destroyed by death, they are in fact an object of compassion.

When these afflicted worldly beings try to destroy others, they go into battle with a strong will to fight and to overcome the enemy. With the intention of overcoming their enemy, who will naturally be consumed by death anyway, they will have to experience the suffering inflicted by the enemy's weapons such as arrows, spears and so forth. Yet despite all of the harms inflicted on them by their sworn enemy, they are intent on fighting until the end, and will not retreat until their aim is achieved.

As the commentary explains, those intent on destroying external enemies generate great willpower and thus endure the harms inflicted on them. Despite all the harm inflicted on them, they still face the enemy with the intent of destroying them. That is the measure that worldly beings take. That being the case, the main point being emphasised here is, what need is there to mention that it is appropriate for me, who has taken up austerity, (i.e. one has willingly taken up austerity practices) wishing to destroy the enemy of the afflictions who has treated me as an enemy from the day of my birth. It is not as if the delusions became our enemy later in life, because from the very moment we were born the delusions were there to harm us. That being the case, we should not give up striving to destroy this enemy, and not give in to despondency and laziness despite hundredfold sufferings such as cold, hunger and thirst.

As explained here, based on having seen the faults of the delusions, and understanding how they have harmed us since we were born into this life, we need to develop the courage to not give up striving to destroy this enemy and not give in to despondency. This implies that there are some who, having made few attempts to overcome afflictions, resort to thinking, 'Oh, this is hopeless! I can't overcome the delusions'. Once one makes that decision one falls into despondency and laziness, and will no longer strive to apply the antidote. Lest one falls into despondency, we are urged that despite the sufferings of cold, hunger and thirst that will naturally accompany one's practices of austerity, one should not give up the intent to destroy the enemy of the afflictions.

As the outline presents, we need to don the armour of joyous effort to maintain our enthusiasm. Just as those who go into battle put on armour so that they are not harmed by their enemies' weapons, one needs to put on the armour of joyous effort in order to engage in austerity practices, and overcome the delusions. The Guru Yoga Puja also refers to donning the armour of joyous effort.

So the main point being emphasised here is that we need to apply joyous effort as a way of combatting the delusions.

2.2.3.2.2. The benefits of striving to destroy the afflictions

This is subdivided into three

2.2.3.2.2.1. Being the cause for one's welfare austerities are suitable to bear

2.2.3.2.2.2. Being the cause for other's welfare, austerities are suitable to bear

2.2.3.2.2.3. Why one needs to complete the earlier given promise

2.2.3.2.2.1. Being the cause for one's welfare austerities are suitable to bear

The verse from the root text reads:

39. *They sustain scars from the enemy for no purpose
And wear them on their body like ornaments.
If I strive stridently to achieve the great purpose
Why should sufferings be something that harms me?*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Worldly beings sustain scars for no purpose at all and wear them like ornaments, saying: 'this scar I got at such and such a time'.

As the commentary explains, worldly beings sustain scars for no purpose at all and wear them like ornaments. The scars received in a fight become something to show off to others as a mark of bravery. They take great pride in those scars, saying, 'I got these scars in my fight'. That is how some worldly beings view their scars.

That being the case:

Why would one then be harmed by the sufferings endured while striving stridently in the austerities? They are to achieve the great purpose of complete enlightenment!

Since they are only of benefit one should rely on them.

What is being implied here is that it is worthwhile to endure the hardships of austerity practices to overcome the afflictions, since these practices are a cause to achieve the great purpose of complete enlightenment. Since they are of only benefit for oneself and they cause no harm, one should definitely rely on these practices.

The main point being emphasised here is that when ordinary, worldly people take great pride in their scars and so forth for even small meaningless purposes, one, who has committed to overcome the afflictions, which serves the great purpose of achieving enlightenment, need not be overwhelmed by the difficulties and hardships that one may incur. That is because the hardships serve as the means to achieve a great purpose.

The main point is that it is definitely worthwhile to bear those austerities as a way to obtain one's ultimate welfare. The ultimate result is to achieve the excellence of one's own purpose, which is enlightenment. When one achieves enlightenment, then that fulfils the purpose of obtaining the excellence of one's own welfare.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

13 May 2014

Based on the motivation we have generated during the recitation of our Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, we can now engage in the meditation practice. [meditation]

You have just meditated on the Giving and Taking practice, and I am sure you have done it to the best of your ability. With the 'taking' you imagine taking in three types of phenomena from all sentient beings: all their sufferings; the causes of their sufferings, which are the afflictions and karma; and the imprints or latencies of those afflictions. In the 'giving' part of the practice, in return you imagine giving three of your most valuable objects: your body, your possessions and all your virtues of the three times. It is important to recollect these main points when you engage in the meditation practice and apply them to the best of your ability. That will make the practice really worthwhile.

2.2.3.2.2. The benefits of striving to destroy the afflictions

We have covered the first subdivision Being the Cause for One's Welfare Austerities Are Suitable to Bear. Now comes the second subdivision.

2.2.3.2.2.2. Being the cause for other's welfare, austerities are suitable to bear

The verse reads as below and is accompanied by examples in the root text:

40. *Fishers, butchers, farmers and the like
Are bearing cold, heat and such Solely with thoughts for their livelihood.
Why can one not bear this for the happiness of migrators?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Fishers, butchers, farmers and the like kill fish, do lowly work, work on the fields and so forth, and are bearing difficulties like cold or heat and such, all this solely with the thought of their livelihood.

If that is so, then why can one not bear similar sufferings to accomplish the happiness of all migrators? It would be appropriate to bear them.

The message from the commentary and the verse is quite easy to understand: if one is able to bear hardships to achieve trivial purposes in life, then why shouldn't one strive to bear some hardships to achieve the highest purpose for oneself?

Beings who exert a lot of effort and bear hardships for trivial purposes, like fishers and butchers who take the life of other beings merely to sustain themselves in this life, or farmers who toil year round in the cold, the rain, and in the heat of the sun, do this lowly work and bear difficulties solely to sustain themselves for this life. These examples show how some people have to put in so much time and effort, and endure so many hardships just to sustain their basic needs. When we see examples of this around us, we should be inspired not to complain about our lives and ready to bear some difficulties ourselves for our own welfare.

Individuals who expend effort and bear hardship to achieve their goals, even if they may be temporary ones, do achieve significant results. Of course, whenever one endeavours to achieve something, one should understand that there are always some necessary conditions that are required, as well as some obstructions that need to be overcome. As such, the method for achieving one's goals should encompass strategies for establishing the conducive conditions and eradicating any obstructions. This requires a significant amount of time and effort, and bearing hardships. So we can learn from others who expend energy and bear hardships to achieve their goals. In order to achieve the great purpose, one needs to make this resolve, if that is so, then why can one not bear similar sufferings to accomplish the happiness of all migrators? It would be appropriate to bear them. To accomplish the happiness of all migrators one needs to achieve the ultimate goal of enlightenment. That is the highest aspiration and goal for anyone who has taken bodhisattva vows. Since many of you have taken the bodhisattva vows and promised to work for the welfare of all sentient beings until achieving enlightenment, it is important for you to continue your practices and willingly bear whatever difficulties and hardships that may occur. The phrase it would be appropriate to bear them has the connotation in Tibetan of being patient with them; that means to be patient when facing hardships. So, in order to achieve the great purpose one needs to apply the patience of willingly enduring hardships. This is the resolve we need to make when engaging in Dharma practice.

Of course the advice here is mainly directed at the practices of a bodhisattva. While we aspire to do these practices, in reality we may not be able to apply our practices at a bodhisattva's level right now. However, the personal instruction here is to generate a strong aspiration to be able to practise like a bodhisattva. Bodhisattvas bear hardships with farsightedness, engaging in the practices over long periods of time, withstanding many adversities, and continue to practice whilst not giving up their bodhisattva vows or bodhicitta. This should inspire us to generate a strong veneration and genuine respect for them, along with an aspiration that we may also practise in a similar way.

The point here is that it is most fitting to bear sufferings by applying the patience of willingly enduring hardships. The definition of patience is not to allow one's mind to become disturbed in the face of adversities such as harm and sufferings. We should apply this understanding of willingly bearing hardships, because if one is not able to bear hardships and difficulties, it will affect one's mind negatively, and one will become distraught and overwhelmed. When there is agony in one's mind because of hardships, those feelings will then cause anger to arise. Anger is always preceded by a feeling of discomfort or agony, which one is not able to bear. The best way for our mind not to feel overwhelmed is by willingly accepting and bearing hardships, and to regard them as being worthwhile.

The ultimate result of having born hardships and difficulties on the path is to become an enlightened being. An enlightened being, such as Buddha Shakyamuni, is an individual being who has willingly born many hardships as a practitioner, and having completely traversed the path, finally achieved the state of enlightenment. If we aspire to become like Buddha Shakyamuni, how can we expect to succeed if we easily become distraught and willing give up our practices when faced with the slightest difficulty or hardship? We may not be able to practise on a bodhisattva's level right now, however we can definitely generate the aspiration to practise like a bodhisattva. Admiring the bodhisattva's deeds leaves very positive imprints on our mind, which helps to develop our capacity to practise just like a bodhisattva in the future. So, these are significant points to keep in mind.

2.2.3.2.3. Why one needs to complete the earlier given promise

The verse is preceded by a doubt:

Doubt: One has made the promise to destroy the afflictions in the continuum of others and it is unsuitable to strive in destroying the afflictions in one's own continuum, because one would fall into the extreme of peace.

To explain the hypothetical doubt: having made the promise to destroy the afflictions in the continuum of others, the doubt is that it would be unsuitable to strive in destroying the afflictions in one's own continuum because one would fall into the extreme of peace i.e. the peace of self-liberation or nirvana. The doubt is that if one works towards destroying the afflictions or the delusions in one's own mental continuum then once destroyed this would imply that one would reach the state of self-liberation, with the risk of abiding in a state of personal peace. This reminds me of a similar doubt raised some time ago by Vanessa. She said that as Mahayana practitioners "if we are striving to overcome our personal sufferings, wouldn't that contradict the Mahayana attitude that we should be developing?" These are significant doubts.

When you really think deeply about the meaning of the teachings, doubts will arise. This is significant because they arise as a result of contemplation and investigation of the topic. In relation to the earlier doubt, for someone merely seeking self-liberation the main object of abandonment is the afflictions, and the main purpose for abandoning them is to attain personal liberation. So when the afflictions have been abandoned they reach the state of self-liberation, a state where one abides in perpetual bliss. An arhat or foe destroyer is an individual who has abandoned the afflictions and has reached that blissful state and remains in a blissful state of meditative equipoise. That is what is being referred to here as the extreme of peace.

The corresponding verse and a half read:

41 *When one made the promise to liberate
Migrators equalling the expanse of space
From the afflictions,
Oneself was not free from afflictions.*

42ab *As one did not know one's abilities
How was it not crazy talk?*

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains the meaning:

Answer: At an earlier time when one generated the mind and made the promise to liberate all migrators equalling the expanse of space from their afflictions, if oneself is not free from afflictions, then not to mention the welfare of others, one cannot achieve even one's own welfare. Being under the control of the afflictions one does not know one's own measure. How is it not crazy to say that one will liberate others from their afflictions?

If one is bound by cyclic existence, one cannot complete the welfare of others and therefore one should strive to abandon the afflictions in one's continuum.

What is being explained is that since one has earlier generated the mind of bodhicitta and made the promise to liberate migrators equalling the expanse of space from their afflictions, then in order to fulfil this promise one must abandon one's own afflictions. Otherwise one cannot achieve the welfare of others.

The verse explains that being under the control of the afflictions one does not know one's own measure, or state of mind, so how can one liberate others from the afflictions. What is being presented here is that to claim that one would free all beings from their afflictions while doing nothing about abandoning one's own afflictions would be similar to a crazy person's approach. The commentary goes further: if one is bound by cyclic existence, one cannot complete the welfare of others and therefore one should strive to abandon the afflictions in one's continuum. The conclusion is that one definitely needs to strive to abandon afflictions.

This relates to the meaning of the outline Why One Needs to Complete the Earlier Given Promise, which is that in order to complete an earlier promise to work for the welfare of all sentient beings and ultimately free them from all afflictions and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, one needs to abandon the afflictions within one's own mental continuum. That is why the conclusion here states: one should strive to abandon the afflictions in one's continuum. This is similar to an analogy presented in the Lam Rim teachings of the father of a starving family who finds a piece of meat. He reasons that if he were to share the piece of meat with his family there will be little benefit for each of them. So he decides to eat it all himself in order to gain enough strength and energy to find sufficient food to feed the whole family.

The analogy illustrates the importance of first freeing oneself from the afflictions; otherwise there is no possibility to help free others from the afflictions. This is why one needs to achieve enlightenment and become a buddha oneself before one can lead others to buddhahood. When one practises developing bodhicitta, one first practises developing the aspiration to benefit others, and then based on that, one generates the aspiration to achieve enlightenment oneself in order to achieve that purpose.

This is how one trains one's mind and how the path is traversed; another key point to keep in mind.

2.2.3.2.3. It is appropriate to strive in the trainings that destroy the afflictions

An earlier verse explained that it is appropriate to abandon the delusions or afflictions. The verses below explain the appropriateness of striving in the trainings which destroy the afflictions.

This is subdivided into two:

2.2.3.2.3.1. Strive in the antidote to the afflictions

2.2.3.2.3.2. Strive to never let the mind fall under the control of the afflictions

These are really significant points to apply to our own practices. Striving in the antidote to the afflictions means to work towards developing the antidotes in one's mind to overcome the afflictions. The next point, striving to never fall under the control of the mental afflictions, means working towards control over one's mind, so that one does not fall under the dominance of the afflictions.

In our daily practice bring to mind the importance of applying the antidotes. Whatever antidotes one has not yet developed, one should strive to develop as a means to overcome the afflictions within oneself. And whatever antidotes one has already developed, one should ensure that one further strengthens them. Likewise with the afflictions: whatever afflictions one has not yet abandoned, strive to abandon them. And whatever afflictions one has successfully controlled or has reduced, ensure that one applies continual measures and diligence to keep those delusions at bay so that they don't arise strongly again.

It is similar with virtue: whatever virtues one has not yet developed, strive to develop them, and whatever virtues one has already generated, strengthen and further develop them. Try to bring these to mind as an aspiration: "May I be able to overcome the afflictions which I have not yet overcome and apply the measures to overcome them; and may I be able to develop the virtues that I have not yet developed and maintain the virtues I have already developed".

This becomes a really significant aspiration. When one applies this, the aspiration itself can bring solace and ease to the mind. It is good for us to relate to these seemingly simple practices which we may easily neglect, thinking we should be doing some grander practices. I feel that often our shortcoming is that we neglect practices within our own reach and try to aim for something higher or grander; we need to pay attention to this.

A key point from the outlines is that when an affliction arises in our mind, rather than just leaving it and doing nothing about it, we need to recognise that this only creates a condition for the affliction to increase in intensity. What we are being encouraged to do here is that as soon as an affliction arises, we need to immediately remember to apply an antidote to overcome it. Next, since the afflictions arise at any given moment, when they do arise, we should not allow ourselves to fall under their dominance or control. These are both things that we are able to do. We can take measures to apply antidotes and ensure that we are not under the complete control of the afflictions. These are reasonable practices that we can apply in our daily lives.

2.2.3.2.3.1. Strive in the antidote to the afflictions

The parts of the verse which relate to this are the second two lines of the earlier verse and the first two lines of the next verse.

*42cd Therefore I shall never reverse
From destroying the afflictions.*

*43ab One should hold onto it
And meet them in war with a vengeance.*

The last two lines of verse 43 will be explained later on.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Since they are suitable to be abandoned one should never reverse from the thought and action of abandoning them. One should hold onto the antidote and destroy the afflictions by meeting them in battle with a vengeance.

The commentary highlights that since they are suitable to be abandoned (having given reasons earlier) one should never reverse from the thought and action of abandoning them. One needs to be committed to never reversing from the thought and action of abandoning the afflictions. Having seen their faults and disadvantages, one needs to develop the determination never to reverse, never to waiver from the thought of abandoning the afflictions. The next line explains the extent to which one makes that commitment: one should hold onto the antidote and destroy the afflictions by meeting them in battle with a vengeance. 'Battle' here is used as an example to illustrate the forceful extent to which one needs to engage in the application of an antidote.

A second doubt is raised here:

Doubt: That which is to be abandoned and the antidote are attachment and anger, and revenge for that to be abandoned is an affliction, and therefore to be abandoned too.

The hypothetical doubt raised here is: isn't being attached to the antidote, generating anger and a vengeful attitude towards what has to be abandoned, i.e. the delusions, an affliction in itself? Doesn't that have to be abandoned too? In other words, attachment to the antidote and anger towards that which is to be abandoned would be an affliction in itself, so wouldn't that have to be abandoned as well?

The next two lines of the verse relate to this:

*43cd Afflictions with such an appearance
Are the destroyer of afflictions, nothing else.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Grasping on to the antidote and the vengeance to that which is to be abandoned, appear like afflictions but they actually belong to the side of the antidote that destroys the afflictions. Thus they are not contained in that to be abandoned.

What is being explained here is that grasping at an antidote and generating vengeance towards that which is to be abandoned may appear to be like afflictions, but actually they help to destroy the afflictions. Generating a vengeful attitude towards the afflictions (which are to be abandoned) is having thoughts such as, "I have recognised you, afflictions, to be the one that constantly harms me; I will definitely overcome you now. I will not rest until I have destroyed you". So when one targets the mind at overcoming the afflictions in such a way, that is the type of vengeance needed. As mentioned here, it belongs to the side of the antidote.

2.2.3.2.3.2. Strive to never let the mind fall under the control of the afflictions

The next verse is preceded by this query:

Query: Is it not better to follow the afflictions since to abandon the afflictions brings hundreds of sufferings with it?

These are exactly the kinds of doubts we have when being wary of applying the antidotes to the afflictions. We find that "it is so difficult to overcome these afflictions, so maybe it is better to just follow them". It is this kind of attitude which has kept us in samsara for so long, and which prevents us from making any genuine attempts to overcome the afflictions. A very significant doubt has been raised here.

The verse which relates to this reads as follows:

*44 Dying due to being burned,
Or even being decapitated is easy.
But one should never submit
To the enemy of the afflictions.*

The point to examine here is which is better: the difficulties and hardships in overcoming the afflictions, or waiting for the afflictions to completely control our mind so that we must experience their more serious consequences at a later time? This is the choice we need to make.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of the verse as follows:

Regardless of whether one dies by being burnt or whether one is decapitated, it is still easy, because at that time one is only separated from this life's body.

But one should never submit to the enemy of the afflictions that causes us to take birth in the great sufferings of the hell realms, and is an obstacle to attaining our wishes. We should never fall under their control.

The explanation: regardless of whether one dies by being burnt or whether one is decapitated, 'it is easy', implies that being burnt or consumed by fire or experiencing death from decapitation is merely a suffering one experiences from being separated from this life's body, and this will not in itself lead one to the lower realms e.g. the hell realms. These are regarded as easy in comparison to the great sufferings one would have to experience being under the influence of the afflictions. The commentary continues: but one should never submit to the afflictions that cause us to take birth in the great sufferings of the hell realms and is an obstacle to attaining our wishes. If one were to give power to the enemy (the afflictions), this is what causes one to take birth in the great sufferings of the hell realms and so forth, as well as being an obstacle to attaining our ultimate goal of enlightenment. The conclusion here is that one should never fall under the control of the afflictions.

2.2.3.3. MEDITATING ON JOY KNOWING THAT IF ONE MAKES AN EFFORT IT IS POSSIBLE TO ABANDON THE AFFLICTIONS

This heading presents the meaning of the next few verses, which is that one should generate joy in one's mind; one should not feel daunted by the difficulty of overcoming the afflictions but rather generate joy; and that if one makes an effort, it is definitely possible to abandon the afflictions which should cause some joy. This heading is subdivided into three:

2.2.3.3.1. Once the afflictions are expelled from one's continuum they have no other basis in which to abide

2.2.3.3.2. If one makes an effort they can be abandoned because they arise from a mistaken cause

2.2.3.3.3. If they are abandoned from the root, there is no other basis on which they can abide so they are suitable to abandon!

2.2.3.3.1. Once the afflictions are expelled from one's continuum they have no other basis on which to abide

This verse is preceded by another query:

Query: Afflictions are like worldly enemies in that, after having been expelled from one's place, they find again strength and harm again. So it is appropriate to follow them likewise.

The doubt here is that one may feel daunted in overcoming the afflictions if one perceives them as external enemies, because with external enemies, even if you overpower them for the time being and expel them from your area, they might congregate in another area, regain power and strength and again come back and cause you more harm. So if one uses an external enemy as an example for one's afflictions, one may have that doubt that "even if I were to overcome the afflictions now, they might reoccur later and affect me and harm me, so what is the point in trying to overcome them; I might as well just follow them".

The verse relating to this reads:

45 *When the ordinary enemy gets expelled from one place
They conquer another place and remain there.
Having regained strength they return.
The way of the enemy of the afflictions is not like that.*

The commentary provides an answer to the query:

Answer: It is not the same. When the ordinary enemy gets expelled from one place they conquer another place, regain their strength there and then return to take their revenge. The way of the enemy of the afflictions is not like that. Once they have been expelled from the root they cannot remain in another place and they cannot return.

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains, external worldly enemies and the afflictions do not have the same meaning. When an ordinary enemy gets expelled from one place, they conquer or reside in another place and regain their strength and return to take their revenge. That is what an external enemy is capable of doing. As explained further: the way of the enemy of the afflictions is not like that because once they have been expelled from the very root they cannot remain in another place and they cannot return to harm oneself.

If one makes an effort, afflictions can be abandoned because they arise from a mistaken cause. If the causes were based on a valid basis then one would not be able to abandon them because they would have a substantial base. But because the very causes of the afflictions are mistaken there is no sound basis for them and therefore one is able to abandon them. Understanding this gives one further encouragement to apply the antidotes to overcome the afflictions.

With the cause, we can again reflect upon the explanations in the Abhidharma which outlines three main conditions for afflictions to arise: When the afflictions have not been abandoned; when one is in close proximity to objects; and when concepts based on inappropriate attention is applied then all the conditions for the delusions to arise in one's mind are present. Inappropriate attention is in itself a mistaken consciousness which is one of the causes for afflictions to arise. It is precisely because inappropriate attention arises based on a mistaken consciousness that it can be eradicated, because a mistaken consciousness is not based on a valid basis.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

20 May 2014

The Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer that we have just recited will suffice as our motivation for engaging in our meditation practice. [meditation]

As mentioned many times in the past, prior to engaging in the Giving and Taking meditation practice one needs to first spend some time trying to cultivate a sense of love and compassion towards all beings who we visualise in front of ourselves. As a result of contemplating how beings lack true happiness, one develops a strong wish that they abide in happiness which is how one generates love for all beings. Then, by contemplating the various sufferings sentient beings are experiencing one generates the very strong wish that they be free from all those sufferings. That is where one generates the sense of compassion for all beings.

When one ensures that one has generated the mind of love and compassion for all beings, then to whatever degree one has developed these positive states of mind, to that extent the practice itself becomes really meaningful and fruitful. As a result of having spent some time focusing on these positive attitudes when we come out of the meditation practice we will be able to detect real transformation taking place in our minds. We will notice that the earlier chaotic and negative state of mind has been now replaced with a kinder and gentler state of mind which is a direct benefit of the practice. Generating love and compassion for other beings definitely has a positive effect on our mind, for when love and compassion is prevalent there is no room for any harmful intentions to arise. So, our mind will naturally be calmer and more peaceful because of the lack of harmful intent. It is important that we check whether our meditation practice is contributing to a positive change in our mind or not. It is not sufficient to merely focus on an object single-pointedly if it doesn't contribute to a positive change to one's mind.

As Lama Tsong Khapa said, one must abandon mere calm abiding and strive towards developing the union of calm abiding and special insight. This is a very significant point to bear in mind.

The main point here is that while we may have studied and have accumulated a great deal of knowledge, if we don't put that knowledge into practice it will not help to transform our mind. This point is emphasised at the end of this chapter.

2.2.3.3.2. If one makes an effort, they can be abandoned because they arise from a mistaken cause

The verse relating to this reads:

46. *The deluded afflictions are abandoned by the eye of wisdom
When cleared from the mind where will they go?
Where will they abide to gain strength and return?
The weak mind does not let me strive.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

Once the afflictions have been abandoned from their root they have no other base. Since the afflictions arise from a faulty or mistaken root, one should strive to abandon them with the eye of wisdom that realises emptiness.

Once they are cleared, or what is called abandoned, from the mind, where will they go and find new strength to return and retaliate? It is impossible. Although it is like this, the weak mind does not let me strive to uproot them once and for all.

What is being explained here is that once the afflictions have been abandoned from the very root they will not return. When the manifest afflictions are overcome that does not mean that they will not return. So, the emphasis here is on abandoning the afflictions from their very root so that there is no other base on which they can abide. This also relates to the doubt raised earlier in the text, which says that once afflictions have been overcome wouldn't it be possible for them to return just like an enemy? If you vanquish an enemy temporarily they can regroup and return to harm one again in the future. So, this verse further clarifies the response to the earlier doubt.

When the commentary states, since the afflictions arise from a faulty or mistaken root, the root refers to the self-grasping ignorance that is a faulty state of mind. Some teachings relate this to the misconceptions that arise from inappropriate attention, as presented in the Abhidharma. However, the main root is the grasping at a truly existent self which is the basis for all misconceptions to arise. As explained in other texts as well, it is because of grasping at a truly existent self that all the afflictions manifest themselves.

With this understanding one can see how attachment actually arises from grasping at a truly existent self. It is because of this faulty state of mind which superimposes and causes objects to appear as being truly existent, and further grasps at them as being truly existent, that afflictions such as attachment manifest themselves. Even though self and other phenomena do not exist inherently, it is the misconception that perceives them as being truly existent and inherently existent that makes them appear in that way. So, it is this faulty and mistaken mind that has to be eliminated from its very root.

As mentioned in the commentary, one should start to abandon them with the eye of wisdom that realises emptiness. Having identified the root of the afflictions, the way to strive to abandon them is, as mentioned here, with the eye of wisdom realising emptiness. Just as eyes see things directly, it is the wisdom that realises emptiness directly that overcomes or abandons the afflictions. The implication here is that just as one sees objects nakedly with one's eye, one uses the wisdom that realises emptiness directly as an antidote to abandon the afflictions.

With respect to once that has been cleared or what is called, abandoned from the mind, the Tibetan word sal translated here as cleared has the connotation of separating them from one's mind. So, once they have been cleared or separated from one's mind, the rhetorical question is: where will they go and find new strength and return and retaliate? implies that once abandoned, the afflictions do not and cannot return. What is specifically being explained here is that it is the wisdom realising emptiness directly that serves as the antidote to abandon afflictions from their very root. This wisdom severs the continuum of the afflictions. Thus, because the very continuum of the afflictions has been completely severed, a similar affliction cannot arise in the next moment. Once the afflictions have been completely severed there is no continuity, i.e. they cannot produce the next moment of afflictions. The very meaning of being uprooted means that it cannot produce any more results. Thus, once the afflictions have been completely uprooted there is no way for them to return, and there is no other place for them to abide. To give a contemporary analogy, it is like the Tasmanian tiger which is extinct. It is because there is no continuity of the Tasmanian tiger that it can never return.

However this is not the case with an external enemy. As mentioned previously, when an external enemy is expelled from a place it can regroup and return. When the Communist Chinese took over Tibet many Tibetans left Tibet and relocated in India, and from there into many other countries. At this point Tibetans cannot stand up and fight back because there is no might. However, the fact is that if there was enough might and power then some Tibetans might want to retaliate and try to fight the Communist Chinese and return to Tibet. And it is possible for Tibetans to return to Tibet because even though they have been expelled the continuum of Tibetans has not been severed.

Unlike this example, when the afflictions have been overcome by the wisdom realising emptiness (which is the ultimate method to completely uproot the afflictions) then where would they go and find new strength to return and retaliate? This rhetorical question implies that it is impossible for them to return. Like the earlier analogy with the Tasmanian tiger, they can never return. The wisdom realising emptiness serves as an optimum antidote for overcoming the afflictions at their very root. This point has been explained many times in the past and you have to relate it to those earlier explanations as well. The reason I explain this again and again is so that you can derive the real meaning and gain an unmistakable and clear understanding of emptiness. Though the teachings explain this in many different ways, it all comes down to the same essential point.

When we take this explanation at a personal level then we really need to acknowledge that we have been able to identify the afflictions, i.e. we have a good understanding of what afflictions are. We also have quite a good understanding of what the antidote, the wisdom realising emptiness, implies. So with this understanding we need to try to overcome the afflictions within ourselves to the best of our ability. We have gained some really precious and valuable understandings and it is now up to us to actually apply this by taking measures to overcome the afflictions, in particular the root affliction of grasping at a truly existent self. To the extent that we can recognise and apply some antidote to overcome the grasping at a truly existent self, the strength of the afflictions, such as attachment and anger and so forth, will also be naturally reduced. Conversely, the stronger our grasping at a truly existent self and the more rigidly we hold onto this misconception, the greater the strength of the afflictions will be. So, to the best of our ability we need to apply the antidote for overcoming that grasping at a truly existent self.

When the commentary states although it is like this, it is referring to the fact that it is impossible for the delusions to return once they have been uprooted. However, the weak mind (a mind that lacks wisdom), does not allow one to strive to uproot the afflictions once and for all. Unless and until one has completely uprooted the delusions, they will reoccur. So if we find that we are affected by the continuity of afflictions, it is none other than because we have not applied the antidote—we have not applied a sufficient amount of wisdom to actually uproot the delusions. If we had done that previously, then we would not be affected by afflictions now.

An arhat or foe destroyer is no longer affected by the delusions because of the fact that they have uprooted the delusions through the wisdom realising emptiness. Furthermore, as explained in the teachings, those on the Great Vehicle path of seeing have reached the state where they have the direct realisation of emptiness. The power of that realisation will not allow the grasping at a self to strengthen and to become a means to create a newly formed throwing karma which would propel them into rebirth in cyclic existence once again. As explained in the teachings, what prevents beings on the path of seeing from creating a newly formed karma to be reborn again in cyclic existence is the wisdom realising emptiness directly. Of course, even though they do not create any new throwing karma due to the strength of their wisdom directly realising emptiness, that doesn't mean they are completely free from being reborn in cyclic existence.

When a being realises emptiness directly then, even though the grasping at a truly existent self has not been completely uprooted yet, it is nevertheless overpowered by the wisdom realising emptiness. Thus they do not create any new throwing karma. Likewise, even though we still have afflictions, they will be weakened with whatever wisdom we accumulate. So the more we increase our understanding of emptiness through study and practice, the more we will reduce grasping at a truly existent self. Conversely, the stronger our grasping at the self, the more likely it is that we will continuously create throwing karmas, which perpetuates our cycle in samsara. The stronger our grasping at a truly and inherently existent self, the stronger the notion of 'I' or 'me' will be. And the stronger that sense of 'I', the more likely it is that one will reject anything that opposes the 'I', and be attached to whatever pleases that 'I'. That is how we continuously create karma through aversion and attachment, and this is what we need to understand.

2.2.3.3.3. If they are abandoned from the root, there are no other bases to abide. Thus they are suitable to abandon

The explanation of the meaning of the next two lines of verse is preceded by this doubt:

If you say, the afflictions are also generated from one's own continuum and exist inherently and thus they cannot be abandoned.

In answer to that doubt the next two lines of verse are presented:

47ab. Afflictions do not abide in the object, not in the faculties nor in-between. Since they are also nowhere else, where do they go to harm all sentient beings?

In his commentary Gyalsab Je begins his explanation of the meaning of these lines thus:

Answer: The afflictions do not abide in objects such as form, otherwise arhats would also generate afflictions when they see forms and so forth.

The answer to the doubt is that the afflictions do not abide inherently. If they were to abide in an object such as form, then an arhat (who has in fact abandoned the afflictions) would generate afflictions when they see forms, because they still perceive forms. This implies that the arhats, as a consequence of having interacted with forms, would also generate afflictions. But that is not the case. Furthermore:

They also do not abide in the collections of the sense powers of the eyes and so forth, because when one contemplates the actual mode of existence, the eyes exist, but the afflictions do not.

A being on the non-interrupted path of seeing who has the direct realisation of emptiness still has the sense powers of the eyes and so forth, but because they have the direct realisation of emptiness the afflictions are not manifest. If they were to abide in the collections of the sense powers of the eyes and so forth, then that would imply that afflictions are still manifest in the being on the uninterrupted path of seeing. The commentary further explains:

They also do not exist in-between or somewhere else.

Since it is like this, once abandoned where can the afflictions that were uprooted in this way, and which exist from their own side, go to inflict harm? They do not abide anywhere.

Then the next two lines of verse are presented.

47cd. Since they are like illusions, abandon fear in the heart and rely on striving for wisdom. Why harm myself meaninglessly with the hells and so forth?

The commentary explains the meaning of these two lines as follows:

These afflictions are like illusions. They are empty of inherent existence and yet appear as if they exist from their own side. Therefore, abandon the fear in your heart that they cannot be abandoned because of existing inherently.

Having generated the wisdom that realises emptiness it is suitable to strive in abandoning the mental afflictions. Since one has this ability, why would one create meaninglessly the harm of the lower realms of the hells and so forth? This is unsuitable.

This explanation is quite clear. It follows the earlier explanation that used this analogy of the afflictions being like illusions.

Summary

48. Strive to achieve the trainings, That were thus explained and contemplated. There is no medicine that can cure If one does not listen to the advice of the physician

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Contemplate in the above way repeatedly. Make an effort to strive with conscientiousness in how the Buddha earlier explained bodhicitta, and to protect the trainings. There are no sicknesses that can be cured only by medicine without listening to the instructions of the physician that contain many truths. Strive in abandoning the afflictions according to the instructions of the great physician.

Contemplate in the above way repeatedly refers to all the instructions that were given earlier as well as the advice given by the Buddha in his teachings. So the emphasis here is to make an effort to strive with conscientiousness to protect the trainings which serve as the basis for developing bodhicitta. This is really an exhortation to put into practice the instructions that were given earlier. The analogy which is used here is that there are no sicknesses that can be cured only by medicine without listening to instructions of the physician. The analogy is that when a sick patient goes to see a physician, a skilled physician would give the medicine along with specific instructions on how to take the medicine with possible dietary restrictions. If the patient doesn't take the medicine then they cannot be cured, but if they take it without following the physician's specific instructions then again that will affect the chances of being cured. In this analogy Buddha Shakyamuni is like the skilled doctor, and the holy Dharma, which consists of the practices of hearing, thinking and meditating, is like the medicine. One is like the patient, and the afflictions in one's mind are analogous to sickness.

As mentioned earlier, the Dharma was presented by the Buddha on the basis of the three trainings—training in moral ethics, training in meditation and training in wisdom—and the various different teachings which have been precisely presented along with the unmistakable instruction, is the medicine itself. If we don't put these instructions into practice then there is no way that we can be cured of the sickness of the afflictions. More specifically, without putting these instructions into practice there is no way that we will be able to overcome the root affliction of grasping at the self.

Gyaltsab Je is exhorting us to strive in abandoning the afflictions according to the instructions of the great physician, the Buddha. So the emphasis here is to make every effort to apply conscientiousness to our training.

Then Gyaltsab Je concludes his commentary on this chapter with this verse:

Freedom from the quagmire of faults within one's own continuum,
Increasing virtues without degeneration,
These depend with certainty on meditation on conscientiousness.
Therefore those proficient should always rely on conscientiousness.

So with this verse Gyaltsab Je points out that being free from the quagmire of faults and increasing virtues without degeneration, depends on meditating or maintaining conscientiousness. Therefore, he exhorts the wise need to always depend on conscientiousness. As mentioned here, in order to increase virtue within ourselves and prevent it from degenerating we need to apply conscientiousness. As presented earlier, the definition of conscientiousness includes being constantly mindful of that which needs to be adopted.

Conscientiousness was explained at the very beginning of this chapter so one needs to relate it to that explanation, otherwise we would have to explain it each time it is mentioned again. I don't blame some geshe who seem to be a bit exasperated. Some have said that they put quite bit of effort into explaining things clearly, and at the time it seems that the students have understood it, but after a while they seem to have completely forgotten the points, and it has to be explained all over again.

The importance of remembering the instructions actually leads us into the next chapter, which covers mindfulness and introspection.

II. THE NAME OF THE CHAPTER

This is the fourth chapter of Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas called Applying Conscientiousness

The commentary reads:

This is the commentary on the fourth chapter of the Introduction to the Actions of Bodhisattvas, called Applying Conscientiousness, from The Entrance for the Children of the Conquerors.

Now we come to the fifth chapter, Introspection.

To explain the context of this chapter we need to return to the subdivisions introduced in chapter 1.¹

2. THE ACTUAL EXPLANATION OF THE STAGES OF THE PATH

2.2. The method for taking the essence

2.2.2. Explaining the individual meanings²

2.2.2.2. THE WAY OF TRAINING IN THE PRACTICES OF GENERATING THE TWO MINDS

2.2.2.2.2. The Way of Training in the Actions, the Perfections

2.2.2.2.2.1. The way of meditating on conscientiousness, the limb preventing the degeneration of the training in the mind of enlightenment³

2.2.2.2.2.2. Explaining the way of training in morality, by relating it to introspection and mindfulness, the methods for keeping virtuous dharmas pure⁴

CHAPTER 5: EXPLAINING THE WAY OF TRAINING IN MORALITY BY RELATING IT TO INTROSPECTION AND MINDFULNESS, THE METHODS FOR KEEPING ALL VIRTUOUS DHARMAS PURE

The point here, as in other teachings, is that morality through pure conduct is the very basis for one to keep virtuous Dharma pure.

The importance of mindfulness and introspection is encapsulated in this verse which will come later in the text.

*Those who wish to guard their mind
Definitely need to adopt mindfulness and Introspection and keep that,
I implore you to please keep the heart.*

So Shantideva, putting his palms at his heart, respectfully says, 'I implore you to adopt this'. He is pleading with us to guard and protect our mind with the optimum methods of mindfulness and introspection. So he is showing us the great importance of applying these methods in our practice.

The chapter is in two sections:

1. General Presentation
2. Individual presentation

GENERAL PRESENTATION

This has three parts:

1. Having generated the mind, why it is necessary to cultivate the trainings
2. Training in method and wisdom separately will not lead to enlightenment
3. The sequence of cultivating the trainings

1. HAVING GENERATED THE MIND, WHY IT IS NECESSARY TO CULTIVATE THE TRAININGS.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Merely generating the wishing or aspiring mind has, of course, great benefits, but it is impossible to attain enlightenment without making the perfections the essence of one's practice.

Generating the wishing or aspiring mind to achieve enlightenment definitely has great benefits, and one gains an incredible amount of merit from just generating that aspiration to achieve enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings. However that aspiring mind in itself will not be sufficient to become a cause to achieve enlightenment unless it is accompanied by the commitment to engage in the practice of perfections.

Hence one should engage in the practice of the perfections.

Then Gyaltsab Je provides some quotes:

From the King of Concentration Sutra :

Youth, therefore, make practice the essence. I shall explain why: For someone that makes practice the essence, the attainment of highest enlightenment is not difficult.

Furthermore the Initial or First Stage of Meditation states:

Thus, bodhisattvas that have generated bodhicitta, after having understood the subdued and the unsubdued, need to strongly engage into the trainings of practicing generosity and so forth. Without practice they will not attain enlightenment.

Practice here refers solely to the training concerning the vows, after one has taken them.

This is a reference to the bodhisattva vows.

2. TRAINING IN METHOD AND WISDOM SEPARATELY WILL NOT LEAD TO ENLIGHTENMENT

Under this heading Gyaltsab Je states:

The method for attaining enlightenment that one engages in must be an unmistakable method. A mistaken method will not bring about the desired result although one engages in effort.

This very meticulous explanation is quite clear. A mistaken method will not bring about the desired result although one engages in effort is emphasising that one needs to adopt an unmistakable method from the very beginning.

Then the commentary continues:

One's effort will also not bring about a result if the engaged method is incomplete, even though it is unmistakable. Therefore one needs to train in a complete, unmistakable method.

This is a prelude to what will be presented as the unmistakable and complete method for training.

Next, Gyaltsab Je quotes from the text, Purification of Vairochana,

The transcendental wisdom that knows all, the keeper of the secret, arose from the root of compassion, arose from the cause of bodhicitta, is the culmination of method.

Gyaltsab Je then explains the meaning of that quote:

As quoted, one goes beyond through great compassion, conventional and ultimate bodhicitta, and the method of generosity and the other perfections.

In order to go completely beyond to the state of enlightenment, one first needs develop great compassion. Then one realises conventional bodhicitta, followed by the realisation of ultimate bodhicitta, which is the wisdom realising emptiness. So basically method and wisdom are presented here with conventional bodhicitta and ultimate bodhicitta, and the following methods or trainings of generosity and the other perfections.

3. THE SEQUENCE OF CULTIVATING THE TRAININGS

Having explained the trainings in brief, how does one engage in those trainings sequentially?

¹ See the teaching of 26 March 2013.

² Introduced in the teaching of 2 July 2013.

³ Covered in chapter 4.

⁴ Covered in chapter 5.

Gyaltsab Je explains that:

Upon taking the wishing bodhicitta, one trains in the aspiration to engage into the trainings. Following this, one takes the bodhisattva vows, and then practises the trainings accordingly.

One first develops a wishing or aspiring bodhicitta, and with that one develops the commitment to engage in the trainings. Following this, one takes the bodhisattva vows and practises the trainings accordingly. So having first generated aspirational bodhicitta, one develops the wish to engage in the trainings. That is followed by the development of engaging bodhicitta, where one actually makes a commitment and takes the vows to train in the practices of perfections. That is how the sequence is presented.

Then Gyaltsab Je explains:

If the different types of trainings are summed up in accordance with the Ornament of Mahayana Sutras, then they are the six perfections.

The various practices and the many trainings a bodhisattva engages in can be subsumed into the six perfections. As explained here, this is in accordance with the Ornament of Mahayana Sutra. There is also an extensive explanation of this in the Extensive Lam Rim. It would be good for you to refer to that because having quoted the Ornament of Mahayana Sutra the commentary gives only a general presentation of why the practices of bodhisattvas are subsumed into the six perfections.

Gyaltsab Je begins this brief explanation with:

Six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of:

- Higher status.
- The two purposes
- The complete achievement of the welfare of others
- Containing all the Mahayana
- Complete path or method
- The three higher trainings

So the practice of the six perfections suffices for obtaining higher status, the two purposes and so forth. I have presented this in detail many times in the past.

The commentary presents this classification but does not go into much detail. So it would be good to refer to the explanations in the Extensive Lam Rim which will help to develop a better understanding of these points. If we can relate these classifications to the explanation in the Extensive Lam Rim then they will be quite clear. Otherwise it would take a lot of time to explain them. So it would be beneficial to refer to a more extensive explanation to gain a better understanding of what is being presented here. Those of you who have the Extensive Lam Rim can bring your book to class next week.

Indeed, if the Bodhisattva's Way of Life were to be explained in conjunction with the explanations in the Lam Rim teachings, the Madhyamika text, the tenets (which will be explained in the ninth chapter) and the Prajnaparamita text we could spend our entire life studying it. The Bodhisattva's Way of Life really subsumes all of the other texts, and what is referred to here in passing is explained in greater detail in these other texts. Because it covers all the meaning of all of the other texts, one could spend a very long time going through this text in detail.

It is really good to read and develop a familiarity with the Extensive Lam Rim, which many of you have. It was composed with the intent of subduing the mind, and there is no more supreme text for subduing the mind. If we read it and become familiar with its explanations it will definitely help to settle down and subdue our mind, and we will notice that any sort of upheaval in the mind will naturally subside.

Dr Tony Hammond, who used to come to study group, used to mention that without engaging in studying in this way we might be similar to a long life god. Do you recall why the long life gods are considered to be in a state without leisure? It is because they spend their entire existence absorbed in a worldly meditative concentration and don't have the time to practise Dharma. That is why they are an example of someone who does not have the leisure to practise Dharma.

This indicates that just engaging in some sort of gross or worldly concentration is not sufficient. It will not suffice as engaging in the real practice of holy Dharma as it does not help to subdue the mind. This is an important point.

Shantideva is really exhorting us to engage in the real practice of Dharma. I try to emphasise this essential point again and again, with the intention that you might actually pay heed to this advice and use your understanding and knowledge for the practice of subduing the mind. Otherwise, if we don't make any effort now when we have the opportunity, our mind will remain unruly and unsubdued for an infinite period of time. These are really important points that we need to keep in mind.

If being absorbed in some meditative concentration brings some sort of bliss then we cannot say that it has no benefit at all. It does have some temporary benefit, but it won't help to actually subdue the delusions. So it cannot be a cause for liberation; indeed, it enhances the conditions to remain in cyclic existence for a longer time. I am relating all this to you as a friend who has genuine concern for your wellbeing!

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་པའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

27 May 2014

Based on the motivation that we have already generated during the recitation, we can now engage in the meditation practice. (pause for meditation)

We can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

When one generates this motivation, even as an aspiration, we can see how incredible and expansive the thought: "in order to benefit all sentient beings, I, myself, will need to achieve enlightenment" actually is. One individual being thinking of all sentient beings and meditating for their wellbeing is really wonderful, and a powerful means to accumulate extensive merit.

From our last session we are at the point where it states:

If the different types of trainings are summed up in accordance with the Ornament of Mahayana Sutras, then there are the six perfections.

All the practices of the bodhisattvas can be subsumed into the six perfections. In other words, there is no practice which does not fit into the category of the six perfections.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of higher status.

The six perfections serve as a means for obtaining higher status. If one were to ask: "why do bodhisattvas need to obtain higher status?", then it is because engaging in the bodhisattva's deeds to perfect their practices can take up to many lifetimes. So, in order to be able to practice continuously with the conducive conditions in all future lifetimes, the excellence of high status is needed. There are four excellences of high status: excellent body; excellent resources; excellent entourage; and excellent activities or actions.

The practices of the six perfections serving as causes to obtain these excellences are also referred to in the early parts of the Extensive Lam Rim:

In particular, to obtain complete leisure and opportunity requires many roots of virtue, such as having a foundation of pure ethical discipline, augmenting it with generosity and the like, and when dying making a connection with your next lifetime through stainless aspirational prayers.

For bodhisattvas to continuously train in the practices to achieve enlightenment, they need to have a good basis (sound body) in all successive life times. While we may not yet be able to engage in the practices of the six perfections to the extent of a bodhisattva, we can however practise a similitude of the six perfections. So, as explained in the teachings the specific cause for obtaining a good body is the practice of morality.

Just having the excellent base of a sound body is not sufficient, one also needs good resources to sustain one's body. So, generosity is a specific cause for obtaining good resources such as wealth and so forth.

Furthermore, it is not sufficient just to have good resources, if one lacks good companions. Thus, a good entourage (excellent companions) are also required as a necessary condition to engage in the practices. The specific cause for obtaining excellent companions is the practice of patience.

Finally, in order to obtain what one wishes to achieve, one needs to have the excellence of activities. Because reaping the fruit of any activity is dependent on the completion of that activity, one needs to conduct excellent activities. The cause which for excellence of activities is joyous effort or enthusiasm.

Thus, these four are called the four excellences. Having acquired them one needs to ensure they do not become causes for afflictions to arise, so the next two perfections are presented as a means to prevent that. This is an essential point because for us in our situation, we will find that whenever we acquire these excellences they can very readily become a cause for afflictions to manifest. For a practitioner aspiring to achieve enlightenment, if the excellences become a cause for afflictions to arise, then it will defeat the very purpose of one's endeavours to achieve that state. So the next two perfections, concentration and wisdom become the specific causes that prevent the excellences or good conditions from becoming a cause for afflictions to arise. Concentration is the means to control or subdue the mind and will prevent manifest afflictions from arising. Wisdom (which encompasses analytical wisdom) allows one to recognise and distinguish between what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded and so stops afflictions from developing further; ultimately removing them from their very root.

Each of the six perfections has a specific result. If one were to ask "what is the result of having practiced morality?" the positive result is explained precisely. Likewise this is the case with generosity, patience etc. The specific results to be reaped by engaging in the six perfections are explained in detail in the teachings.

The point here is that we need to be mindful that our practices (e.g. meditation) do not become the means to escalate the afflictions in our mind. A practitioner such as a bodhisattva uses the practice of concentration as the supreme means to overcome the delusions and afflictions in their mind. In our situation, if we are not mindful of our practice of (for example) meditation, it is very easy the delusions, such as pride, competitiveness, jealousy and so forth to escalate. Rather than the practice becoming a means to subdue the mind it becomes the means to further strengthen the delusions, which is a disgrace. This is an important point to bear in mind. Of course if we don't pay heed to this cautionary advice, then it is mere words and we would not get any benefit.

So, if it is possible for practices such as meditation to serve as means to further enhance the eight worldly concerns, then one needs to be really mindful. From when I was quite young I have paid particular attention to the practice of meditation. When I analyse and look back now, I notice that there were definitely taints of worldly concerns in the early years. However these days I can assure you I am quite free from that. I'm declaring to you openly what I feel is true for myself, which is what His Holiness the Dalai Lama has repeatedly encouraged us to do.

Explanations on the six perfections are clearly and extensively explained in Lama Tsong Khapa's Extensive Lam Rim, so please take the initiative to read the text. It specifically covers the way each perfection serves as a specific cause to acquire a specific result, and serves as a good condition to further enhance our practice. It also explains that if one were to be missing any of these good conditions, then that becomes an obstacle for one's practice.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of the two purposes

Bodhisattvas have made the pledge to work for the welfare of all sentient beings, and aspire to achieve enlightenment for that purpose. The bodhisattvas' purpose for engaging in practice is two-fold: to fully actualise one's own ultimate potential and to benefit other sentient beings.

Generosity becomes a most important practice to benefit others. The first means of fulfilling others' purposes is to benefit others by providing material wealth, including food and clothing; then grant them with the wealth of dharma knowledge. Providing material assistance will make them more receptive to receiving the ultimate help of the Dharma. If one is generous to others but harms them at the same time, then while some benefit may remain from the generosity, most of it will be nullified. So while engaging in the practices of generosity, one must refrain from harming the beings to whom one has been generous by using the practice of morality—this is the most essential element for accomplishing pure benefit without harm.

While one may successfully refrain from harming others, they may cause us harm; but if one retaliates, then again, one will be harming them. Even if initially one didn't have any intention to harm them, when one retaliates they will be harmed. So, to prevent oneself from retaliating and bear harms upon oneself, one needs to practise patience. As such the practice of patience is most essential in order to willingly accept harms inflicted by others.

The text explains one must acquire wisdom to obtain liberation and freedom. For wisdom to assist one achieve liberation, one has to be free from a distracted mind because if one is distracted one will not be able to utilise wisdom. The practice which serves as an aid to free oneself from distractions is concentration, which refers here to the concentration of being able to focus on an object for as long as one wishes, i.e. the state of calm abiding. Thus, this level of single-pointed concentration supported by the wisdom realising emptiness becomes the supreme means to achieve liberation.

One cannot possibly develop concentration and cultivate wisdom if one is affected by laziness. So the optimum means to overcome laziness is to practice joyous effort or enthusiasm. This is how the practices of the six perfections are meticulously presented as the means to fulfil both purposes.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of complete achievement of the welfare of others.

The Extensive Lam Rim presents:

You first relieve others' poverty by giving away material goods. Then you do no harm to any living being and, in addition, are patient with harm done to you. Without becoming dispirited you joyously persevere at helping those who harm you. You depend on meditative stabilisation and inspire them through displaying supernormal powers and so forth. When they become suitable vessels for the teachings, you rely on wisdom and give good explanations, cut through their doubts and thereby bring them to liberation. Because you do all this, the perfections are fixed as six in number.

As explained, to relieve others from the suffering of poverty one first helps others with the practice of generosity, by providing them with material goods. To prevent oneself from harming them one needs to practise morality. That which serves as the means to protect oneself from other's harm is patience. As there is the danger of losing one's patience if one feels daunted or overwhelmed when facing the harm by others, one needs to practise joyous effort so that one doesn't give up benefiting others.

When one obtains the ability to perform miraculous feats which is depended on the practice of concentration, one can then enchant others and draw them close to you. Thus when others become the perfect recipients for receiving Dharma teachings, by relying on wisdom, the bodhisattva can then provide the clear explanations that completely eliminates all doubts and leads them to the state of liberation.

This, then, is how the six perfections serve as a means for the complete achievement of the welfare of others.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of containing all the Mahayana

As further presented in the Extensive Lam Rim:

You are indifferent to resources because you are not attached to those you have and do not pursue those you lack. Since you then have the ability to safeguard precepts, you adopt and respect ethical discipline. You are patient with the suffering that comes from living beings and inanimate things, and you are enthusiastic about whatever virtue you set out to cultivate, so you do not get dispirited by either of these. You cultivate a non-discursive yoga of meditative serenity and a non-discursive yoga of insight. These six comprise all the Mahayana practices through which you advance by the six perfections, for you accomplish these practices in stages by means of the six perfections and you do not need any more than these six perfections.

The text explains that when one practices supreme generosity, one can become detached from the resources one already has and will not engage in pursuing resources which one lacks. In other words, one is content with what one has. With that ability one can safeguard one's practices of morality so they become purer. Basically, it becomes a supreme practice for having less desire and being content, hence one becomes an object of respect. Based on the achievements of the earlier practices, when one engages in patience one is able to endure the suffering caused by other sentient beings or inanimate objects. Because one is able to endure these sufferings, that is be enthusiastic or joyous in one's virtues, that is how the practice of patience induces joyous effort.

As explained in the text:

You are enthusiastic about whatever virtue you set out to cultivate so you do not become dispirited by either of these.

Furthermore, you cultivate a non-discursive yoga of meditative concentration, which is the state of clam abiding, and the wisdom of special insight. These six then comprise all the Mahayana practices, through which you advance by the six perfections.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of the complete path or method

The Extensive Lam Rim presents:

The path—i.e., method—for not being attached to the resources that are your possessions is generosity, because you become free from attachment to your things by becoming habituated to giving them away.

The text explains meticulously that the supreme means to overcome attachment to one's own possessions is by actually giving them away. When you are generous with your own possessions it becomes the method for overcoming attachment to them.

The text continues:

The method for restraining yourself from the distraction of trying to possess what you do not possess is ethical discipline, for when you maintain a monk's vows, you do not have all the distractions of making a living.

What is being explained here is that ethics or morality is the best basis for preventing one from having distractions in one's mind.

As mentioned earlier, within the three trainings the first is morality because by engaging in the practice of morality it will reduce the gross levels of our distractions. Then when one is free from the gross distractions, through the practice of concentration one can then further enhance the ability in one's mind, overcoming more subtle distractions.

The text continues:

The method for not abandoning living beings is patience, because you do not despair at the suffering caused by the harm others inflict.

The reason we would feel discouraged and abandon working for the benefit of sentient beings is when we lose our patience. When we are unable to endure hardships, either when others harm us or due to our own sufferings, then that experience may cause us to give up helping beings. So, the practice of patience protects one from this.

The text continues:

The method to increase virtues is joyous perseverance, because you increase them when you joyously persevere at what you undertake.

If someone were to state "I really want to practice meditation", or "I really want to study. How can I best do that? What is the best method?", then the text explains that the best method is to develop joyous effort or enthusiasm, which becomes the supreme method to increase one's ability to practice and study.

The text continues:

The methods for clearing away obscurations are the final two perfections, because meditative stabilisation clears away the afflictions and wisdom clears away the cognitive obscurations. Thus the perfections are fixed as six in number.

As explained, meditative stabilisation clears away the afflictions and wisdom clears away the cognitive obscurations or the obscuration to omniscience. Thus as the text states, the perfections are fixed as six in numbers.

The six perfections are the definite number from the point of view of the three higher trainings

The Extensive Lam Rim explains:

The nature of the training in ethical discipline [the first of the three trainings] is the practice of ethical discipline.

The precondition of the training in ethical discipline is generosity, because once you have generosity that is indifferent to resources, you can properly adopt an ethical discipline.

This is similar to what was explained earlier: through generosity, when one has less attachments and more contentment, it becomes easier for one to actually practice discipline or morality.

The Lam Rim text continues:

The aid to the training in ethical discipline is patience, because the patience of not retaliating when scolded, etc. safeguards your properly adopted ethical discipline.

Patience here refers to an aid to training in ethical discipline. The verse explains how they are all interrelated—to practice one needs the base of the others as well.

The Lam Rim text continues:

Meditative stabilisation is the training of mind [the second training, the training of meditative concentration], and wisdom is the training in wisdom [the third training]. As for joyous perseverance, it is included in all three trainings, so the perfections are fixed at six in number.

This concurs with Gyaltsab Je's commentary of the Bodhicharyavatara which lists the six reasons of why the six perfections are definite in number and we have covered all of them.

CAUSE, NATURE, DIVISION, MEANING OF THE NAME AND RESULT OF THE SIX PERFECTIONS

Gyaltsab Je's commentary presents the six perfections under the headings: Cause, Nature, Division, Meaning of the Name, Result of the Six Perfections. Again, the actual practices of the six perfections are those that only a bodhisattva or true Mahayana practitioners will possess as they are practices which have to be combined with bodhicitta (as explained later). However at our level, even though we have not actually developed bodhicitta, and our practice may not be an actual practice of the perfection of generosity etc., to whatever extent we can engage in the practices, we can say that we have a similitude of the practice of the six perfections within ourselves now.

CAUSE

Under this heading Gyaltsab Je states:

It is bodhicitta that is held by method and wisdom and focuses on the three baskets of the Mahayana teachings and depends on the special Mahayana lineage and the condition of a Mahayana teacher.

Bodhicitta is the cause for the practices of the six perfections. Take the example of generosity, whether our level of generosity becomes a practice of the perfection of generosity or not is dependent on whether we have the conditions in ourselves or not. So if we find that we lack the condition, then of course our practice of generosity will not be an actual perfection of generosity.

NATURE

Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

The nature of generosity is the virtuous mind of giving and all the actions of body and speech that arise from it.

The definition of generosity is the virtuous mind that wishes to give.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Morality is contained in the thought of abandoning harm to others and abandoning sole personal liberation.

Harm here refers to the ten non-virtuous actions. The first seven of these encompass the three of the body (killing, stealing and sexual misconduct), the fourth is speech (allowing harmful or divisive speech and idle gossip), all of which cause direct harm to others. The basis is in the three non-virtues of the mind (covetousness, harmful intent and wrong views).

Morality contains the actual deeds, and the causes of those negative deeds towards others, as well as abandoning sole personal liberation. While sole liberation is not an abandonment for those following the lower vehicle, for a bodhisattva sole liberation is definitely something which has to be abandoned. If bodhisattvas do not protect themselves from the thought of self-liberation they will degenerate their bodhicitta. Therefore protecting themselves from sole liberation is part of their ethical practice.

In brief, the definition of morality is the mind that restrains from harming others.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Patience is a mind that abides in its natural state, unaffected by harm and suffering and also strongly abides in the dharma.

Patience as a mind that abides in its natural state refers to being able to remain in a natural or calm state in the face of harm or suffering. Other texts define patience as a mind which does not become troubled in the face of harm and sufferings. Patience has three types: not being disturbed in the face of harm; or sufferings; and strongly, i.e. definitely, abiding in the Dharma.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Enthusiasm is the joy of accumulating virtue and achieving the purpose of sentient beings and the actions of the three doors which arise from it.

Enthusiasm or joyous effort is the state of mind which takes joy in accumulating virtue. Thus when one derives joy from accumulating virtue, then naturally the actions that arise from the three doors (mainly body, speech and mind) are in accordance with benefitting others and overcoming negativities.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Mental stabilisation is the single pointed abiding on a virtuous object.

To the statement mental stabilisation is the single-pointed abiding on a virtuous object some texts add from its own side, meaning through its own power. This carries more weight.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

Wisdom is the discerning that occurs upon analysing ultimate and conventional objects.

DIVISIONS

Generosity has [three sub-divisions:] generosity of the Dharma; material generosity; and generosity of fearlessness.

The generosity of fearlessness refers to protecting the lives of other beings.

Morality has [three sub-divisions:] the morality of vows (observing vows); accumulating virtue and achieving the welfare of others.

There are actually eleven ways of achieving the welfare of others as the divisions of morality encompass all the virtuous deeds of a bodhisattva. The morality of the vows and the morality of accumulating virtue relates to fulfilling one's own ultimate purpose while the morality of achieving the welfare of others is fulfilling the purpose of other beings. As Lama Tsong Khapa mentions in the prayer Foundation Of All Good Qualities:

Even if I develop bodhicitta, but don't practice the three types of morality,
I will not achieve enlightenment.
With the clear recognition of this,
Please bless me to practice the bodhisattva vows with great energy.

These are really essential points to keep in mind. The morality of vows is also presented as the morality of restraining from faults.

Patience has [three subdivisions:] the patience of thinking nothing of being harmed by others; tolerating one's suffering; and definitely abiding in the Dharma.

In the first division of patience, what is being emphasised is not allowing one's mind to be disturbed when others harm oneself. This implies willingly enduring or willingly accepting harm from others; when one is able to do this then it does not cause one's mind to become disturbed, and thus harm others by retaliating.

In the second division, tolerating one's suffering, again being able to willingly bear or accept the sufferings becomes a means for one's mind not to become disturbed. These are important points for one's practice. Indeed, for whatever one wishes to achieve because whatever one's endeavours, there are bound to be hardships and difficulties, and if one is not able to endure them or accept them, then it can cause the mind to become daunted and the mind can start to get upset and angry.

Enthusiasm has [three divisions:] armour-like enthusiasm; enthusiasm in accumulating virtue; and enthusiasm in achieving the welfare of sentient beings.

Mental stabilisation has [three divisions:] mental stabilisation to abide in happiness in this life; for achieving qualities; and for accomplishing the welfare of sentient beings.

Wisdom has [three divisions:] the wisdom which realises the ultimate; the conventional; and the actions for the benefit of sentient beings.

THE MEANING OF THE NAME

In Sanskrit the word for generosity is dhana. You will notice some temples have dhana written on the donation box as a way to encourage generosity when making offerings. Here:

Dhana means to willingly give up that which is to be offered, hence generosity.

Shila means to cool the heat and misery of the afflictions, hence morality.

Patience because of being patient with aggression. In Tibetan the term sopa has the connotation of bearing or to tolerate aggression.

Enthusiasm because of training for the highest.

Mental stabilisation because of mentally holding.

Wisdom because of knowing the ultimate.

RESULTS

As explained in Precious Garland:

From giving there arises wealth, from ethics happiness,
From patience a good appearance, from joyous effort
[effort in] virtue, brilliance,
From concentration peace, from wisdom liberation,
From compassion all aims are achieved.

The result of generosity is that one will obtain wealth, and the result of morality is that one will obtain the happiness of the high status.

As a result of patience, one will obtain a good complexion,
As a result of practising patience, one obtains lustre and a good appearance.

As a result of joyous effort one obtains virtuous brilliance.

As a result of practising concentration, one obtains a subdued mind.

As a result of practising wisdom, one obtains liberation or a liberated mind.

With compassion one obtains the two purposes which encompass one's own purpose and the purpose of benefitting others.

Having explained how the six perfections serve as a means for obtaining all these excellences, if we were to ask ourselves, "would I like to have these good conditions?", our answer would definitely be "Yes! I would like to have these good conditions, all these excellences".

Again, we might not yet be capable of engaging in the actual perfections of these practices, but we do have the capacity to practice a similitude of them to the best of our ability, so to that extent it is most meaningful and most worthwhile for oneself. When it is accompanied by the right (altruistic) motivation then it definitely becomes a really meaningful practice.

As Gyalsab Je's commentary presents:

The nature, division and so forth of the six perfections should be ascertained more extensively from the Small and Great Stages of the Path. The way of practising them is explained extensively here in this text.

To understand a more extensive presentation of the nature, division and so forth one would need to refer to the Extensive Lam Rim teachings. However as the commentary states, the way to practice is presented in this very text in the following verses.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

3 June 2014

Based on the motivation we generated in the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer that we have just recited we can now engage in the practice of meditation. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

In our last session we covered a general presentation of the way of training in the six perfections. A lot of material was presented then, and it is good to keep it in mind as we cover the individual presentations of each of the perfections.

INDIVIDUAL PRESENTATION

CHAPTER 5 EXPLAINING THE WAY OF TRAINING IN MORALITY BY RELATING IT TO INTROSPECTION AND MINDFULNESS, THE METHODS FOR KEEPING VIRTUOUS DHARMAS PURE

There are two parts to the chapter:

- I. Explaining the text of the chapter
- II. Explaining the name of the chapter

I. EXPLAINING THE TEXT OF THE CHAPTER

This has two subdivisions:

1. Explaining extensively how to practice
2. Concluding summary showing that one has to practice the meaning and not just the words

1. EXPLAINING EXTENSIVELY HOW TO PRACTICE

This is subdivided into four sections.

- 1.1. Guarding the mind as a method for guarding the training
- 1.2. Guarding mindfulness and introspection as methods for guarding the mind.
- 1.3. Practice of guarding the mind with mindfulness and introspection
- 1.4. Method for perfecting the trainings

With these outlines, we need to take note of how meticulously the material is being presented. If we pay particular attention to this, we will notice that we are being presented with a supreme technique for meditation practice. We may assume that we are meditating, but if we fail to apply these points, we are not actually meditating properly.

1.1. Guarding the mind as a method for guarding the training

As most of us have taken many vows and agreed to comply with certain commitments, this section presents the trainings on how to protect our vows and commitments.

There are three sub-divisions:

- 1.1.1. By protecting the mind all will be protected
- 1.1.2. The reason for this
- 1.1.3. Striving in guarding the mind

1.1.1. By protecting the mind all will be protected.

This is again subdivided into three:

- 1.1.1.1. Showing in brief the necessity of protecting one's mind
- 1.1.1.2. The fault of degenerating the mind
- 1.1.1.3. The benefits of protecting the mind

1.1.1.1. SHOWING IN BRIEF THE NECESSITY OF PROTECTING ONE'S MIND

This is presented in the first verse of the chapter:

1. *They who wish to protect the trainings
Protect the mind after focusing it strongly.
Without protecting this mind
It is impossible to protect the trainings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

They who wish to protect the trainings of generosity and the other perfections from degeneration must strongly focus their mind on the trainings, and then protect the mind from wandering off to mistaken objects.

This explanation is in fact a personal instruction. As mentioned here, those who wish to protect the trainings of generosity and the other perfections from degeneration must strongly focus their mind on the trainings, and protect the mind from wandering off to mistaken objects.

Basically, those who wish to engage in the trainings such as the six perfections—generosity and so forth—as well as the three higher trainings—the trainings of morality, training of concentration and the training of wisdom, need to protect their minds. For example, those who wish to train in morality must definitely protect their minds, likewise those who wish to train in concentration and wisdom also need to protect their minds.

One needs to understand what protecting the mind means in this context. Here it specifically relates to protecting the mind from being influenced by the delusions that obstruct one's training. With respect to the six perfections, if one's mind is influenced by the delusion of miserliness then there is no way one can practise generosity. If one's mind is influenced by corrupt ethics, then there is no way one can practise pure ethics or morality. If the mind is influenced by anger then one cannot practise patience. If one's mind is influenced by laziness then again there is no way that one can practise joyous effort. If the mind is influenced by distraction and excitement, then it cannot engage in the training of the perfection of concentration, and if the mind is influenced by corrupt wisdom then one is not able to practise wisdom properly.

This is how we need to understand the need to protect the mind from the delusions. You will have noticed that when I introduce the meditation technique I always emphasise that meditation is a method for protecting the mind, and why it is important to do that. Some of you might wonder why I emphasise this point again and again. The reasons that I share it with you are precisely as presented here. I place great importance on these points because, as explained here, it definitely relates to the core practice.

I have said many times that there is a difference between protecting the mind and restraining the mind. You might have taken notes, although if you just left it on the paper as notes then I don't know if you will recall it. Restraining the mind means to make the effort, from the very beginning, not to allow the mind to be influenced by the delusions. Protecting the mind means to take notice when the mind is being influenced by delusions, at which point one immediately applies antidotes to turn the mind away from them.

As the commentary mentions, if one does not focus the mind strongly on the trainings and protect the mind from wandering off to mistaken objects, then it is impossible to engage in the trainings such as generosity and so forth. We should follow the example of the Kadampa masters who, as mentioned previously, practised protecting the mind in the form of a dialogue with the delusions. 'When you are strong, I will apply the antidote to combat you with great force. When you relax then I will also relax'. That is the scope of one's attack on the delusions. If one relaxes when the delusions are strong they will overpower the mind and, as one has not protected the mind, one will be unable to apply the actual training or practice.

This is a really succinct point about meditation as well as the practice of Dharma. As I have mentioned previously, meditation and the practice of Dharma really come down to the same point. Meditation, as I explain regularly, protects the mind from being influenced by the delusions, by keeping it focussed on a virtuous object. Likewise the practice of Dharma protects the mind from the delusions, by withholding the mind from negativities and mistaken conceptions. That measure of withholding the mind from following misconceptions and mistaken views is called the practice of Dharma. As you can see, my regular explanation on these points is similar to the very point that Shantideva is presenting here—if one does not protect the mind from wondering off and from focusing on mistaken objects then it is impossible to engage in the trainings.

This succinct point is an explanation of the meaning of training or practising Dharma, and the meaning of meditation.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

If one does not protect the mind from wandering off, then it becomes impossible to protect the trainings.

Here wandering off specifically implies that the mind is being influenced by the deluded distractions. If one does not protect the mind from this then the consequence is that it will be impossible to actually protect one's training, meaning that one will not be able to apply the trainings or the practices of the Dharma.

We should keep these explanations in mind whenever we refer to the text or read it, as a way to be mindful and contemplate the main points. The reason to contemplate these points is so that when the delusions arise we will be able to immediately recall that following these delusions will cause one to lapse from one's training and practice. It is when we notice the delusions arising that we need to apply particular attention and apply the methods for protecting one's mind.

The delusions that we need to protect ourselves from were explained in detail in the earlier chapter which identified the delusions, their faults and so forth.

1.1.1.2. The fault of degenerating the mind

This relates to the faults that arise from allowing the trainings to degenerate as a result of the influence of the delusions on the mind. The verse relating to this reads:

2. *Letting the elephant mind wander
Creates harm beyond pain.
The unsubdued crazed elephant
Does not do as much damage here.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation of this verse in his commentary reads:

Letting the crazed elephant mind wander off to mistaken objects creates the harm beyond pain of the naraks [hell realms]. The normal unsubdued and crazed elephant does not create as much suffering here in this world. Hence one should strive in protecting the mind.

The explanation here is quite clear. However to give some further clarification, the state of our mind is presented here as being analogous to a crazed, untamed elephant. If an untamed elephant is let loose it will cause a lot of havoc. Likewise, if we allow our mind to just wander off towards objects of delusion then that will create a lot of harm. The harm that it causes is, of course, not only the sufferings in this life, but also in our future existence, such as the sufferings in the hell realm. Some may think, 'What's wrong in allowing the mind to just wander off and become distracted? How could a distracted mind possibly harm oneself?' This presentation explains that the consequence of allowing the mind to wander off and be distracted by mistaken objects, or objects of delusions, is that it will cause great sufferings, in this life and future lives.

When the commentary states, the normal unsubdued crazed elephant does not create as much suffering here in this world, it is referring to stories about untamed elephants being given intoxicants like alcohol to make them even wilder, and then letting them loose in battle. They cause a lot of damage which can be used to overpower the enemy. In the analogy here, an elephant that is already untamed is given mind-altering substances such as alcohol or drugs. When an elephant in such a crazed state is let loose it can cause lot of damage.

The implication here is that the damage will at worst be physical damage to the environment, the buildings and people, who might be crushed and lose limbs, or even die. However such a crazed elephant cannot bring about the intense sufferings of the hell realm. In comparison, as mentioned previously, the consequences of allowing a mind to become distracted by the delusions are much more severe, not only in this life, but in the immeasurable sufferings of lower realms, such as the hell realm, in future lifetimes.

By reflecting on this illustration, and really thinking about the gravity of the consequences of having an unsubdued distracted mind, the conclusion, as presented here, is that hence one should strive in protecting the mind. We could elaborate on how the mind is like an untamed elephant, but this should be sufficient for now.

1.1.1.3. The benefits of protecting the mind

Having first explained the faults of not protecting the mind, one might wonder, 'Well, what is the benefit of protecting the mind? Does protecting the mind have any benefits?' So we can see that this is a very systematic and logical presentation which relates well to our normal state of mind, with its many queries and doubts. These doubts are being systematically addressed one after another. So we can see that this is a really marvellous presentation.

The benefits of protecting the mind is explained in two subdivisions:

- 1.1.1.3.1. In brief
- 1.1.1.3.2. Extensive

1.1.1.3.1. In brief

The relevant verse reads:

3. *If one tightly fastens the elephant of the mind
Comprehensively with the rope of mindfulness,
All dangers become completely non-existent
And all virtues will come into one's hand.*

This explanation is similar to that in the Essence of the Middle Way.

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Through tying the crazed elephant mind to the virtuous object by tying all one's actions of body, speech and mind comprehensively with the rope of mindfulness, all the general dangers of this life and the next become non-existent, and all the virtues of the practices of the three types of beings of the graduated path to enlightenment fall naturally into one's hand.

Therefore, one should never let one's mindfulness of the virtuous object degenerate.

The mind is analogous to the crazed untamed elephant; The virtuous object is analogous to the pillar to which you would tie the elephant so that it does not cause havoc; The rope to tie the crazed elephant is analogous to mindfulness.

What one is binding to the pillar is one's mind as well the three doors of body, speech and mind.

If one were to apply mindfulness as a means to bind our crazed, untamed mind to a virtuous object then all the general dangers of this life and the next become non-existent, and all the virtues of the practices of the three types of beings of the graduated path to enlightenment fall naturally into one's hand. This is implying that one will naturally be able to engage in all of the practices of the three scopes.

So we can see how wonderful this text really is, as it presents the essential practices for meditation and Dharma practice.

One needs to take particular notice of the essential meaning of this presentation. The object to which one binds one's mind with mindfulness, is not any random object; as specified here it has to be a virtuous object. If it were possible to subdue our mind by being mindful of any object, there would be no need for the text to specify that it needs to be a virtuous object. So the essential point being presented here is that the meditation object has to be a virtuous object if it is to serve as an antidote to overcome negativities.

In summary, the commentary states, therefore one should never let one's mindfulness on the virtuous object degenerate. This is an essential instruction. I regularly emphasise when I introduce meditation that meditation is the optimum means to protect one's mind. The specific emphasis here is that one should never let one's mindfulness of the virtuous object degenerate or lapse. Applying mindfulness means that during the meditation session one will be able to protect one's mind from mistaken conceptions and views, and delusions. Then, through that familiarity with mindfulness during the meditation practice, one will be able to maintain that awareness of the virtuous object, even when one has come out of the formal meditation sessions.

As we familiarise ourselves with the virtuous object throughout the day, and the following days and weeks and months, then due to that familiarity we will naturally be able to recall the virtuous object at the end of our life when we come to our death. As explained in the teachings, if, at the time of death one's mind is in a virtuous state then there is no possibility of taking rebirth in the lower realms. This is how we need to see the way in which our everyday practices are related to the crucial juncture of passing on from this life to the next.

By engaging in practice through being mindful of the virtuous object we are able to take the essence of our precious human life and make it meaningful. Of course the optimum way to make our life meaningful is to create the causes for enlightenment, next best is liberation, and at the very least we take a good rebirth in our next lifetime with all the good conditions.

What we can derive from this explanation is that protecting our mind from delusions lies within our own hands. If we take the initiative to apply mindfulness then we can actually protect our mind from the influence of the negativities, delusions and so forth. Protecting one's mind protects one from immediate external dangers, as well as from future sufferings. That is what is being explained here.

1.1.1.3.2. Extensive

The extensive explanation reads:

4. *Tigers, lions, elephants and evil spirits,
Snakes and all other enemies,
The guard of sentient beings in the hells,
Evil mantras [or sorcerers] and likewise blood drinkers [or blood thirsty demons],*
5. *Simply by fastening this mind
They all become controlled.
Solely by subduing the mind
They all become subdued.*

The commentary on this verse explains:

It is appropriate to fasten the mind to a virtuous object. By subduing the mind one overcomes all dangers such as tigers, lions, crazy elephants, evil spirits, snakes, and all human enemies. One also overcomes the looming danger of the guards of the sentient beings in hell, those that harm others with evil mantras such as sorcerers, as well as the harm of the different types of spirits called blood thirsty demons and the like. Stopping the cause for any threat in this way, solely by fastening the mind with the rope of mindfulness completely to a virtuous meditation object, equals binding all dangers, and one will not be harmed in the least.

Solely subduing the mind with mindfulness and introspection, and thus stopping engagement in negative actions, equals subduing all dangers. Therefore one should strive in subduing the mind.

While this presentation is quite clear, the point that we can derive here is that stopping the cause for any threat in this way solely by fastening the mind with the rope of mindfulness completely to a virtuous meditation object, equals binding all dangers. In other words, fastening our mind to a virtuous object will protect us from all the other dangers mentioned earlier, and one will not be harmed in the least.

Other texts explain that harms, like those mentioned earlier, will not befall upon someone who observes ethics purely. The concluding exhortation is that subduing the mind solely by mindfulness and introspection, and thus stopping engagement in negative actions, equals subduing all dangers. Therefore one should strive in subduing the mind.

1.1.1.2. THE REASON FOR THIS

This is presented in two subdivisions:

- 1.1.1.2.1. Faults depend on the mind
- 1.1.1.2.2. Qualities depend on the mind

1.1.1.2.1. Faults depend on the mind

This is a presentation showing that both faults and qualities are dependent on the mind itself. The way the faults are dependent on the mind is presented under three subheadings:

1.1.1.2.1.1 Quotes

These are unmistakable citations from the sutras, from the teacher himself

1.1.1.2.1.2. Reason

1.1.1.2.1.3. Summary

1.1.1.2.1.1. Quotes

The verse that relates to this section is:

6. *That all dangers
And the boundless sufferings
Arise from the mind
Is shown with faultless quotation.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

One's experiences of dangers and sufferings are created by one's own mind. The reason is because all dangers and the boundless suffering of this life and future lives arise from one's own negative mind; this is said by the Able One, who explained faultlessly and perfectly all objects of knowledge.

Gyaltsab Je first states that one's experiences of dangers and sufferings are created by one's own mind. The reason is that all dangers and the boundless suffering of this life and future lives arise from one's own negative mind. All dangers and sufferings that we experience are created by one's mind, because all the dangers and boundless sufferings of this life and future lives arise from one's own negative mind. This was said by the Able One (Buddha Shakyamuni) who explained faultlessly the objects of knowledge. Then the commentary gives a number of quotations:

As he said in the Sutra of Clouds of Jewels:

If one controls one's mind one controls all phenomena.

He also said:

Whether it is virtue or virtuous karma, it is accumulated by the mind.

He also said:

The mind precedes all phenomena. If one knows the mind well, one knows all phenomena well.

Also from the Perfect Compendium of Phenomena:

All phenomena depend on the mind.

The Buddha also said that a subdued mind is a happy mind.

1.1.1.2.1.2. Reason

7. *The weapons of the hell beings,
Who made them with purpose?
Who made the burning iron ground?
From whence did the burning inferno arise?*

8ab All the likes of these Arose from negativity, taught the Able One.

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning of these lines:

If the sufferings that are experienced by sentient beings in the hells, and elsewhere, do not arise from the person's own preceding negative mind, then who forged purposefully the weapons of the hell guardians, these swords, spears and so on? These were not made purposefully by a creator god, nor were they made purposefully by someone else. Who created the burning iron ground, who created the hosts of females that cause one to climb and fall off the crystal mountain? There is no other cause or creator.

The points at the beginning are quite easy to understand, the emphasis being that these sufferings of the hell realms and elsewhere were not made purposely by a creator god, and nor were they made purposely by someone else. If we were to take the example of this very building, it was created by someone else, and then we partake of the good conditions here. However, unlike the physical conditions that we experience in this world, the various types of hell realms are said to be created by none other than one's own mind. It is not as if someone specifically created the hell realms for someone else to take us there. It is actually the creation of our own mind. The point made in answer to the opening rhetorical question is that there is no such god which created these sufferings realms, nor were they made by someone else.

Then the commentary asks, Who created the burning iron ground, who created the hosts of females that cause one to climb and fall off the crystal mountain? Those of you who are familiar with the explanations presented in the Lam Rim teachings will recall the specific hellish state where, due to one's own negative actions in the past, in particular severe, lustful attachment to women resulting in sexual misconduct, one would have visions of women on top of a mountain calling out to you. As you hear the sirens beckoning, you try to climb up the mountain but there are downward facing swords that cut you. Then, having reached the top, you hear the sirens beckoning you from the ground, but when you try to go down, the swords are facing up at you, and again you are pierced by them.

These suffering experiences arise from a hallucination that there is someone calling you. It is due to familiarity with the object of attachment and, in particular, engaging in sexual misconduct that one really believes the sirens are calling out to you. In the process of listening to that, one experiences immense suffering. When we think about it, this is not too farfetched at all. Even in their dreams, someone who is really affected by strong, lustful desires can have all sorts of unimaginable experiences. This is explained extensively in the Lam Rim teachings, so you can refer to that. As Shantideva emphasises, there is no other cause or creator for such things, other than being the consequence of one's own state of mind.

Then Gyaltsab Je continues in his commentary:

Since it is also incorrect to say that they are generated without cause, the Able One taught in the Close Placement with Mindfulness Sutra and others that they are generated from one's own negative mind.

From Close Placement with Mindfulness Sutra:

The mind is the greatest among all enemies.
There is no enemy like the mind.

We'll just read through the commentary as I have explained the points that are presented here when I taught the Madhyamakavatara.

An allegorical opponent: They were generated from the aggregation of fire, but this is a faulty parable.

An opponent without refined reasoning who wishes to deny karmic cause and effect poses this quailm: Where a pure water stream appears to humans, blood and pus appears to hungry ghosts. This is however only an appearance created by the ripening of previous negative karma, and the blood and pus cannot be used by hungry ghosts in the slightest. Because if it existed, then it would have to also appear to humans.

Answer: This is thoroughly mistaken. That something does not appear is possible of course, but if we accept that it is necessarily non-existent, then also the fires of hell are only mere appearances due to previous negative karmas. If we have to say here also, "Fire does not exist", then it would be the same up to the eons and finally we also say that the hells do not exist. The need to deny karma then arises.

That it is suitable to appear to humans is also not established. According to the view of the nihilists and you, there are no hot or cold sensations when suffering is generated.

As these are points which have been presented earlier you can refer back to those teachings.¹

1.1.1.2.1.3. Summary

*8cd. Thus, in all the three realms
There is nothing as dangerous as the mind*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Since all faults arise from mind, all three realms are created by one's mind. There is no danger apart from this.

What, since all faults arise from the mind, all three realms are created by one's own mind. There is no danger apart from this, means that just as all qualities arise from the mind, all faults also rise from the mind. Therefore, in order to increase one's qualities, one needs to apply one's mind appropriately. To minimise and overcome all faults, one has to apply antidotes and so forth, which are generated within one's own mind. That is the main point.

That covers the verses that specifically explain how the faults depend on the mind.

The main point we need to understand as a personal instruction is that since we all have faults and many shortcomings, the best way to address that is to look within. While we might not be able to detect subtle faults or shortcomings, the grosser levels are not too obscure. At a manifest level we can detect some negative states of mind and the faults that arise from them, and it is up to us to take notice of that, and apply appropriate measures to overcome those shortcomings. That is the most practical approach, because if someone else were to point these faults out to us we might become very angry and defensive, rather than accepting what they say.

Geshe-la says in English that a good mind, which is very pleasant and filled with compassion, does good actions, and is liked by everyone. There's also a bad mind that no-one likes. We need to see them as separate, enemies even, and make sure the good mind works to defeat the bad mind. I always say that a good mind is a good friend. My best friend is my mind of loving kindness and compassion—I don't have much bodhicitta though. I encourage the good mind and say 'go away' to the bad mind. I do this all the time and day-by-day my good mind wins.

It is through applying these measures that we will then become accustomed to right ways of thinking. This is a point that is good for us in the western context to understand. It's good to make a distinction between yourself and the negative state of mind. Then it is more acceptable to point the finger at the fault, 'It's not me that's at fault. It's my negative state of mind that is at fault'.

The point here is that we need to make that distinction between oneself as an individual being who has qualities and good potential, and the faulty negative states of mind. When one is able acknowledge and accept that it is the negative state of mind that is influencing one to engage, seemingly without control, in negative actions that are harmful, and which are not appreciated by others. When we recognise that within ourselves, then when we relate to others it will be easy to accept that it is not the person who is at fault but their negative state of mind that is compelling them to say, or do things that are inappropriate and so forth. Then one will protect oneself against becoming angry at the person. Rather one will feel compassion for them, knowing that they are influenced by their negative states of mind.

In this way we can see for ourselves that one way of looking at things will lead to compassion and love for the other, but a different kind of view of the same object can generate anger and hateful thoughts. Then we can understand how our own state of mind influences our attitudes and perceptions and so forth. When we can detect that for ourselves then we will reach the crucial point of understanding that when we have a wrong perception that causes us angst, and hatred and anger and so forth, then we need to transform and change that perception. These points are the crux of our practices, and are not to be taken lightly.

If two individuals living together are sincerely practising in this way, then there will be no reason to frown at each other—they will always be nice and smile at each other. So even in this life you can see that there are great practical benefits to be had from practising the Dharma.

Based on these mind training practices we can then reach a point where we are capable of feeling love and compassion for the enemy, rather than anger. By using correct ways of perceiving things we can see that there is no real enemy, and that there is no person out there aiming to get us. Rather, the harm that they are inflicting upon us doesn't come from the person themselves but from the influence of their delusions, and negative states of mind. So this is where we can develop real compassion for them, rather than becoming angry with them. When one trains in this way, it is definitely possible to see one's enemy as one's best teacher or best friend.

In fact, this way of training is the subject of the following verses presenting the practices on generosity, morality, patience and so forth.

1.1.1.2.2. Qualities depend on the mind

This relates to the practice of the six perfections, which we will cover in our following sessions.

Basically the presentation is that the six perfections depend on the mind: generosity depends on the mind; morality depends on the mind; patience depends on the mind; joyous effort depends on the mind; and concentration and wisdom depend on the mind.

བྱང་ལྷན་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

10 June 2014

Based on the motivation we generated during the recitation, we can now engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

You can generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: for the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. For that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

1.1. Guarding the mind as a method for guarding the trainings

1.1.1.2. The reason for this (cont.)

1.1.1.2.2. Qualities depend on the mind

Here there are six subdivisions:

1.1.1.2.2.1. Generosity depends on the mind

1.1.1.2.2.2. Morality depends on the mind

1.1.1.2.2.3. Patience depends on the mind

1.1.1.2.2.4. Enthusiasm depends on the mind

1.1.1.2.2.5. Mental stabilisation depends on the mind

1.1.1.2.2.6. Wisdom depends on the mind

So, what is being presented here is that the practices of the six perfections are all dependent on the mind. Actually, the giving and taking meditation practice we engaged in earlier also combines all the essential points of the six perfections. When we visualise giving our body, wealth, merits etc. this includes the practice of generosity. With the sincere intention for other beings not to experience any suffering, when we take their suffering upon ourselves one is naturally refraining from harming them, thus it includes the practice of morality. When we generate a sense of compassion for other sentient beings we naturally refrain from feeling anger towards them, thus it encompasses the practice of patience. When we do the practice willingly and joyfully, then that encompasses joyous effort. Having a focused mind while engaging in the practice includes the practice of concentration. Likewise, because the intelligence of differentiating between what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded—the intelligence of knowing what is beneficial and what is harmful—increases through repetition of this practice, it includes wisdom as well.

Thus when we do this practice sincerely with all the conditions intact it definitely becomes a very profound practice. While we may not be able to incorporate the actual practices of the six perfections in our meditation practice yet, we can, however, still adopt an approximation of the six perfections. Our ability to do this depends on our motivation. As explained in the teachings, three conditions need to be intact for the practice to become a perfection. For example, when the practice of generosity is accompanied with actual bodhicitta, the realisation of emptiness, and sealed with the profound dedication of complete enlightenment, then it becomes the perfection of generosity and so forth. So, if we generate the bodhicitta motivation to the best of our ability, recall the view of emptiness during the practice, and seal our virtues with the dedication towards obtaining enlightenment at the end, this will then ensure that our practice becomes an approximation to the actual perfection of the practices of generosity and so forth.

The Heart Sutra clearly indicates the need for the practice to be accompanied by the understanding of emptiness when Shariputra asks Avalokiteshvara, How should any son or daughter of the lineage train who wishes to practice the activity of the profound perfection of wisdom? and Avalokiteshvara replies Any son or daughter of the lineage who wishes to practise in the activity of the profound perfection of wisdom should look upon it like this, correctly and repeatedly beholding those five aggregates also as empty of inherent nature.

While each of the six perfections are not explicitly mentioned in the Heart Sutra the way the perfection of wisdom is to be practised relates to each of them and this is how we derive an understanding of the teachings. So, if one wonders, 'what is the difference between the individual practices such as generosity and so forth and the perfection of those practices?', then you need to understand it as was explained earlier.

In relation to the three conditions mentioned earlier, we already have the basis of love and compassion, we also have some understanding of emptiness, and we know how to dedicate our virtues. So the reason I emphasise this point again and again is to remind you that you already have a good basis for understanding the teachings. It is now a matter of putting your understanding of the Dharma into practice. Whenever we have any time to engage in a practice it is good to draw upon the understanding we have already gained from the teachings and then actually apply it in our practice. That makes it much more meaningful. For example, with love and compassion the general description is wishing other beings to be happy and to be free from suffering. However, we can make that practice much more profound with the understanding we have gained from the teachings. This is how we can develop the essential practice and make it more meaningful for ourselves. I encourage you in this because you have already received so many teachings and ways of applying these in your practice, and it would be a pity not to utilise that. It is with the intention of benefitting you that I encourage you again and again.

What I am trying to emphasise is that we need to use what we have already received and what we already know. With that serving as a basis we can then endeavour to acquire some new understanding or knowledge. Often we fall short in our practice by not utilising what we already know and keep looking for something new or grander. Often I find that many people fall short in their practice because of this attitude, and don't really advance themselves. I am not saying that gaining more or new knowledge is wrong. I am not implying that and you should not misunderstand me. What I am emphasising here is that we need to utilise what we already have, and if we acquire new understanding or knowledge, based on that, then it can only enhance our practice and will not confuse it.

As I emphasise regularly, love and compassion is the basis, and by maintaining this we can then incorporate other understandings, or knowledge, to enhance that within ourselves. That would be good—otherwise we could completely go astray. If I were to relate something as my personal practice I would say that it is the attempt to adopt love and compassion in my everyday life. This is actually a point I related to the late Khensur Rinpoche when I was in India. I spent about an hour with him, listening and talking, when he asked me, 'What are you meditating on these days?' and I said that I take love and compassion as my main practice and we had a discussion about that for about an hour.

Rinpoche said, 'Oh, that is a simple practice, even lay people and elderly people, who are not monks and nuns, would practice that'. Perhaps Khensur Rinpoche was expecting me to give a much more profound answer. So when he questioned me further I said that I felt that this practice encompasses a lot of other practices. Of course I was sharing what I truly believe. Indeed, when we train our mind more and more on love and compassion, then every time we generate that mind it brings us closer to enlightenment. So this is why I see it as an essential practice. Sadly, Khensur Rinpoche passed away shortly after this meeting.

The three main conditions that help to subdue the mind are love, compassion and concentration (or mental stabilisation). So if we can take these three as our essential practices then there is no question that we can work towards subduing our mind.

With the first perfection of generosity, what is being explained here is that it actually depends on a state of mind which is generated within oneself. This dispels the doubt that if generosity were to depend on material objects then how could one practise generosity if one lacked material objects to give? So, to clarify this point, what is being explained is that the perfection of generosity does not depend on external material objects but actually on one's state of mind.

The worldly perspective is that if someone were to give $100 to another person we would say they are very generous, because they gave $100. We immediately relate to the object they give as a mark of their generosity, as if the giving of that physical money was the actual practice of generosity.

A literal translation of the Tibetan term for the perfections par-chin is gone beyond, which relates to the practices that have gone beyond the states of samsara and nirvana and reached the state of complete enlightenment. The Svatantrika middle-way school gives a very literal explanation of the term gone beyond and says that the perfections of the practices of generosity and so forth are found only in a buddha's mental continuum. However, the Prasangika middle-way school differentiate between that which is actually gone beyond and that which is in the process of going beyond. Thus, the perfected practice of generosity, which has actually gone beyond, is indeed found only in a buddha's mental continuum. However the practice of generosity, which is in the process of going beyond, is in the trainee's (bodhisattva's) mind. According to the Prasangika, it would be a case of applying the name of a result upon the cause: the perfection of generosity is the practice of generosity that is in the process of going beyond in the bodhisattva's mind. It is good to understand the difference in interpretations from the different schools.

1.1.1.2.2.1. Generosity depends on the mind

This heading is subdivided into two:

1.1.1.2.2.1.1. Completing the perfection of generosity does not depend on eliminating the poverty of all migrators.

1.1.1.2.2.1.2. It is perfected through the acquaintance with the mind of giving.

1.1.1.2.2.1.1. Completing the perfection of generosity does not depend on eliminating the poverty of all migrators

The verse reads:

9. *If generosity goes beyond
Through eliminating the poverty of migrators,
Since migrators still have poverty,
How could the previous refuge have gone beyond?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

If it were necessary to eliminate the poverty of all sentient beings to complete the perfection of generosity, then, since impoverished migrators still exist, how could the generosity gone beyond exist?

How could the previous Buddha protectors possibly have completed the perfection of generosity? It would be impossible.

Bringing up this hypothetical query Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains that, if it were necessary to eliminate the poverty of all sentient beings to complete the perfection of generosity then, since there are still impoverished beings in need of things that would imply that the Buddha has not perfected the practice of generosity. This doubt is a way to present that the practice of the perfection of generosity does not depend on eliminating the poverty of all living beings.

We need to understand that our practice of generosity should not depend on the other, whether they are rich or poor, in great need or not. From our own side we need to be able to engage in the practice of generosity that is generated in our own mind.

Another practical illustration is that if the practice of the perfection of generosity depended on being generous with material objects that would mean that ordained Sangha would not be able to perfect the practice of generosity, because they don't have many material possessions to give away.

Another more prominent illustration would be Buddha Shakyamuni's own life. In his early days he would not have given up the wealth of his royal kingdom because that would have deprived him of the means of being able to practice generosity. Later, he actually left behind all his princely wealth, and become completely renounced.

Here again, the point is that the practice of generosity is not dependent on actual material wealth or completely satisfying other's needs. Rather it is dependent on the intent of giving, which is generated with one's own mind.

The means to perfect the practice of generosity is explained under the next heading.

1.1.1.2.2.1.2. It is perfected through the acquaintance with the mind of giving

The verse reads:

10. *Through the mind offering to all sentient beings
All possessions including their results,
Generosity goes beyond it is taught.
Therefore it is only mind.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

It is taught that the generosity gone beyond is perfected through acquainting one's mind with the wish to give away one's body, possessions, roots of virtue including their results, and one's merits to all sentient beings.

For this reason generosity depends on the mind.

The commentary clearly explains that the resultant or perfected state of generosity, which is completely going beyond, which is the mental continuum of an enlightened being, is reached through acquaintance with the mind that wishes to give away, now, one's body, possessions and roots of virtue including the results.

Again, the actual definition of generosity is the mind of giving or the intention to give. So the way to practise generosity is by generating the state of mind of wishing to give away one's body, possessions, roots of virtue etc. Again, we can relate to the giving and taking practice we did earlier. I need not elaborate too much on the importance of this practice, as it is exactly what is being presented here by Shantideva and further explained in the commentary, as being an essential practice. So we can see that our earlier practice, when done fully, encompasses all of these points.

So the way to engage in the practice, for it to become an authentic practice of generosity, we train our mind, gradually and slowly, to increase the intention of giving. To become an actual practice of generosity try to make it free from miserliness and, to the best of our ability, encompass an understanding of emptiness—that oneself, the giver, what is being given, and the action of giving, is empty of inherent existence. Incorporate that understanding as much as possible and then dedicate at the end. In this way our practice of generosity becomes really profound and we get so much merit from engaging in these practices. Giving away these merits as well makes it a profound practice.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

For this reason generosity depends on the mind.

We gain a better understanding of this point after the explanation.

1.1.1.2.2.2. Morality depends on the mind

This is subdivided into two:

1.1.1.2.2.2.1. Completing the morality gone beyond does not depend on the absence of sentient beings that one could kill

1.1.1.2.2.2.2. It is completed by acquainting the mind of abandoning.

1.1.1.2.2.2.1. Completing the perfection of morality does not depend on the absence of sentient beings that one could kill and so forth.

This does not depend on the absence of beings that one could harm. The point explained in the next the verse is that the perfection of morality is actually completed by acquainting the mind with abandoning the intention to harm.

11ab. Fish and so forth, where should they flee to So as not to be killed?

Gyaltsab Je's commentary continues:

It follows that the completion of the morality gone beyond does not depend on removing all sentient beings that could possibly be killed, because it is unfeasible to move all the animals such as fish and so forth to a safe place.

The explanation here is that completing the perfection of morality does not depend on removing all sentient beings that could be possibly killed, because it is not feasible to move all animals such as fish to a safe place where no one could harm them. We may be able to move some fish to a safe place where they would not be killed, but to remove all fish to where no one would be able to kill them is something that cannot possibly be done. Also there is no person who could always guard them, so that no-one comes and harms them.

1.1.1.2.2.2.2. It is completed by acquainting the mind of abandoning

The first two lines of the next verse explain this:

*11cd. Through the mind of abandoning,
Morality goes beyond, it is taught.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary highlights:

For this reason the morality gone beyond is achieved by acquainting the mind of abandoning, such as on the mind abandoning the thoughts of killing or stealing.

The practice of morality, relating to the perfection of morality, is dependent on a mind where from the depths of one's heart one makes the commitment that, 'I will not harm others. I will not kill even if my life is at stake. I will not take the life of other sentient beings'. In the commentary, for this reason, aligns to the earlier point that it is not even possible to find a safe haven for all of the animals and so forth, so they can never to be harmed. The perfection of morality is not dependent on establishing the situation (or place) where no beings will be harmed. Rather, as explained here, the morality gone beyond is achieved by acquainting the mind with abandoning the thoughts of killing and stealing. When one generates the mind of abandoning negativities such as killing and stealing (and likewise the other ten non-virtues), this clearly illustrates that while refraining from killing and stealing etc. is a good deed, doing so when one makes an actual commitment and intentionally generates the mind to refrain from such misdeeds, one gains much more virtue.

Many of you would already have vows which would include these sorts of commitments, but again even with the vows it is good to refresh them. It is much more meritorious to have vows than not, so one gains much more virtue when one actually intentionally develops the mind of refraining from engaging in misdeeds. Whenever one generates the mind of intentionally refraining from the ten non-virtues, such as making a commitment like, 'Today, at all costs, I will not engage in the act of killing or taking others' lives. Likewise I will not engage in the act of taking others' possessions. I will not engage in the act of sexual misconduct. Likewise I will not engage in lying, stealing, harsh words, divisive speech, idle gossip and so forth', then that is acquaintance with abandoning those negative deeds, and what we call the practice of morality. Each time we generate the intention of refraining from these misdeeds we accumulate great merit, much greater merit than if one were to just naturally refrain from these misdeeds.

The quote from a sutra encompasses the definition.

From a sutra:

If the morality gone beyond is explained: It is the intent to give up harming others.

1.1.1.2.2.3. Patience depends on the mind

Patience is the mind which, in the face of harms and sufferings, does not become disturbed. This has three subdivisions:

1.1.1.2.2.3.1. Meaning

1.1.1.2.2.3.2. The example

1.1.1.2.2.3.3. Relating the meaning and the example

1.1.1.2.2.3.1. Meaning

The verse reads:

*12. Unsubdued sentient beings equal space,
Destroying them is impossible.
Merely destroying this mind of anger,
Equals destroying all enemies.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Patience is completed by destroying one's anger, which equals destroying all external enemies. It is not achieved through the extinction of the objects of one's anger.

This is conclusive because unsubdued sentient beings equal space and it is impossible to destroy them all. Therefore patience also depends on the mind.

I have referred to the explanation patience is completed by destroying one's anger which equals destroying all external enemies several times. What is being implied here is that the practice of patience is not trying to overcome all external enemies since that is impossible. The actual practice of patience is dependent on one's own mind.

It is dependent on one's mind as it specifically destroys the anger in one's mind. Completing the perfection of patience is dependent of destroying anger in one's mind, rather than trying to overcome the external enemies. The commentary goes further when it says this is conclusive because unsubdued sentient beings equal space and it is impossible to destroy them all. The commentary concludes, therefore also patience depends on the mind.

1.1.1.2.2.3.2. The example

The verse reads:

13. *To cover the whole earth with leather,
Where should the leather come from?
To cover one's soles with leather
Equals covering the whole earth.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary proceeds:

Where would one find enough leather to cover the whole earth to prevent one's feet from being harmed by thorns and other sharp objects on the ground?

Covering the soles of one's shoes with leather will do the trick and prevent the feet from being harmed by thorns, sharp stones and the like. It equals covering the whole earth.

The verse poses the rhetorical question where would one find enough leather to cover the whole earth?, which implies that it is not possible to find enough leather to cover the whole earth to prevent one being harmed by thorns and other sharp objects. However covering the soles of one's shoes with leather will do the trick and prevent the feet from being harmed by thorns. So that is the method that equals covering the whole earth.

1.1.1.2.2.3.3. Relating the meaning and the example

The verse reads:

14. *Similarly, I do not oppose
External phenomena.
I should reverse this mind of mine,
Where is the need to oppose others?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

Similar to the analogy, it is impossible to oppose all harmful external phenomena. Instead one focuses one's mind on these objects and reverses the mind from generating anger. By acquainting the mind in such a way, patience is completed. Why should I oppose the objects of anger, it is impossible and unnecessary.

The commentary explains that, similar to the analogy of not being able to find enough leather to cover the earth to prevent sharp objects from harming oneself, it is impossible to oppose all external phenomena. The method used to perfect patience is to focus one's own mind on these objects, and reverse the mind from generating anger. This is a very profound point—the actual practice of patience implies overcoming anger within oneself. By acquainting the mind in such a way, patience is completed. The point is emphasised again with another rhetorical question, why should I oppose the other objects of anger since it is impossible to oppose them and actually quite unnecessary. There is no reason to try to oppose all others and objects when it is possible to overcome the anger in one's own mind.

What is being explained here is that the practice of patience implies overcoming anger within oneself, rather than trying to overcome all external enemies. So if one thinks that, 'I can only be patient if all my enemies are overcome', then that is missing the point. If one wishes to overcome enemies then one needs to overcome anger within oneself. That is equivalent to overcoming all the external enemies and will be the mark of perfecting the practice of patience.

That completes the explanation on patience and how it is dependent on the mind. For the practice of patience to become a perfection of patience, again it would have to encompass the three essential conditions of bodhicitta: the altruistic motivation of bodhicitta; understanding the view on emptiness; and the dedication. This applies to all of the practices of the six perfections in order for them to become the actual perfections.

1.1.1.2.2.4. Enthusiasm depends on the mind

The definition of enthusiasm or joyous effort is the mind which takes joy in virtue.

The verse reads:

15. *The results of generating a clear mind
Is Brahma and so forth.
Results of inferior practice endowed
With body and speech are not like that.*

The first part of Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

The complete acquaintance of enthusiasm also depends upon the mind that has completed meditation. A clear mind of joy for meditating on an absorption of the first concentration brings about results contained within the grounds of absorption, such as rebirth in the place of Brahma.

This part of the commentary explains the reason why the complete acquaintance of enthusiasm depends on the mind. A clear mind of joy for meditating on an absorption of the first concentration which is a higher state, brings about results contained within the grounds of absorption, such as rebirth in the place of Brahma. This means that when even a moment of clear mind and joy arises from the absorption in the first concentration, because one applied joyous effort and achieved that state of mind, the result is to be born in the heavens of Brahma. Achieving this state also implies strength of the mind. The emphasis here is that when the mind is clear and strong, accompanied with the joy of practising such a meditation, then it can bring about a great result.

The next part of the commentary reads:

If one's actions are unrelated to such a strong mind, then one's mind is endowed with actions of body and speech, and such actions with lesser enthusiasm do not have the ability to produce a mind of the first concentration and so forth. Such a result depends on a strong mind.

When the mind lacks that strength and there is no joy in practices such as meditation, then one's physical and verbal actions will also carry less potency. So even if one were to attempt to meditate it will not bring about the results of obtaining the first concentration and so forth. Thus, such results depend on joyous effort, which actually depends on the strength of one's mind.

1.1.1.2.2.5. Mental stabilisation depends on the mind

Mental stabilisation is the mind which in its own power has the ability to focus on an object for as long as one wishes.

16. *All recitations and austerities,
Even if practiced for a long time,
Done with a wandering mind
They are meaningless, the Knowledge teaches.*

This is indeed a direct reprimand for ourselves.

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

The completion of mental stabilisation gone beyond depends on a clear mind free from mental excitement and mental sinking and held by the mental application of renunciation.

Although one practices the recitation of mantras and austerities such as Nyung Nye for a long time, the mind is distracted to other objects.

We need to understand that in order for mental stabilisation to be an authentic mental stabilisation it has to be a clear mind that is free from mental excitement and mental sinking, or stupor. This can be helped by the mental application of renunciation.

From the Buddha's sutras,

Bhikhus, austerities, prayers and so forth that distract the mind to the desire realm do not have a result.

They are shown to be meaningless because of not giving the desired result.

We need to understand this quote in relation to recitation of mantras, austerities such as Nyung Nye, practices, retreats etc. which have been shown to be meaningless, because of not getting the desired result.

This explanation does not mean that there is no benefit at all in these practices; there is definitely a benefit even if one's mind is a little distracted. For example, there is still benefit in reciting mantras as you stop any other verbal negativities such as idle gossip etc. So to that extent there is definitely some benefit. However if one's mind is distracted, one will not reap the full benefit of the practice. This applies to any practice including the Nyung Nye practice. If one does a Nyung Nye of course one derives some benefit from merely engaging in the practice, but if the mind is distracted one will not reap the full benefit, just a minimal benefit.

The personal instruction here is that when we are doing any practice it is highly advisable to try and do it without a distracted mind. If one were to do one's practices in this way one will reap the actual intended benefit. Thus, it is good for us to prevent ourselves from being distracted.

1.1.1.2.2.6. Wisdom depends on the mind

- 17 *They who do not know the main supreme Dharma,
This secret of the mind, although wishing
To attain happiness and destroy suffering,
They will wander meaninglessly in the hells without respite.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

Wisdom also depends on the mind. A person that is not a vessel for the main dharma or the supreme meaning, and is thus not shown these, does not know the secret of mind, the ultimate truth.

Although they wish to attain highest happiness and destroy the sufferings of cyclic existence, they naturally wander to the realm without respite, where there is nothing of these things they wish for.

Therefore wisdom depends on the mind.

Again, the definition of wisdom is the mind which is able to clearly differentiate and discriminate between the subtleties of the objects to be examined.

The commentary clearly explains that wisdom depends on the mind, and that a person is not a vessel for the supreme meaning if they do not know the secret of the mind, the ultimate truth. This refers to the nature of the mind which is its non-inherent existence (or emptiness). To perfect wisdom, when the mind realises emptiness of all phenomena it also needs to realise the emptiness of one's own mind. For someone who does not know the ultimate truth of their mind, then although they wish to attain higher status and destroy the suffering of cyclic existence, they can actually wander in the samsaric realm without respite where there are none of the things they wish for. In other words, we could wander in the cycle of samsara, the nature of suffering for limitless time. However, by understanding the ultimate reality of all phenomena in relation to one's mind, one would free oneself from this, and attain liberation, or enlightenment.

Wisdom is perfected to the state of going beyond, to the state of enlightenment, when one understands the ultimate reality of one's mind. The commentary concludes therefore wisdom depends on the mind.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

17 June 2014

Based on the motivation we have just generated we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

Generating this motivation to the best of our ability is really worthwhile.

1.1.3. Striving in guarding the mind

This section of the text is divided into two:

1.1.3.1. Showing, or the presentation

1.1.3.1. Explaining

1.1.3.1. SHOWING

18. *This mind of mine, therefore
I shall hold it well, I shall guard it well.
Apart from the discipline of guarding the mind
What shall one do with many disciplines?*

In his commentary Gyaltzab Je presents the meaning of this verse with the following:

Abandoning faults and achieving qualities depends on the mind. Therefore I shall hold this mind of mine well with mindfulness and introspection, and guard it well, so as to not let it degenerate.

Apart from the discipline of guarding the mind, what shall one do with the many other disciplines of prayers and so forth that don't guard the mind? They are unnecessary.

I have explained the meaning of the line, abandoning faults and achieving qualities depends on the mind many times over in the past. It's a point that I regularly emphasise in my teachings. Abandoning every fault and achieving all qualities depends on none other than one's own mind. Here, faults includes all non-virtues as well as all the delusions, and qualities can range from the simplest qualities up to the greatest qualities that can be achieved. That all of these faults and qualities are dependent on one's own mind is an incisive point, showing that the responsibility for overcoming faults lies with ourselves and that we cannot rely upon others to overcome them for us. Likewise, we cannot rely on someone else to develop qualities for us because they depend solely on our own mind, and thus we need to develop good qualities for ourselves.

Having presented that abandoning faults and achieving good qualities depends on the mind, the commentary goes on to say, I shall hold this mind of mine well, with mindfulness and introspection. This point indicates that the way to abandon faults and achieve qualities is to apply mindfulness and introspection. As mentioned previously, mindfulness in this context relates to constantly keeping in mind what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded. Introspection refers to keeping constant vigilance over the three doors of our body, speech and mind, checking whether one is adequately adopting things that need to be adopted, and discarding what has to be discarded.

Guarding the mind so that it does not degenerate relates to not allowing the virtuous mind to degenerate. In order to protect the qualities of kindness, love and compassion and so forth, so that they don't degenerate, we need to always guard the mind with mindfulness and introspection. This also relates to whatever vows and commitments we have undertaken—we have to guard them so that they don't degenerate. To take that further, when the commentary asks, apart from the discipline of guarding the mind what shall one do with other disciplines and prayers and so forth that don't guard the mind?, it is saying that if one does not apply the discipline of guarding the mind, then practices such as doing prayers and so forth will have minimal effect. That is the main point.

What we need to derive as a personal instruction here is that the main discipline that one needs to apply is to guard the mind from non-virtue and negativities. If our practices such as reciting prayers and mantras are done with mindfulness as a way to create virtue, then they will have a positive effect. But if we don't apply mindfulness then they won't really have much positive effect. This explanation should encourage us to remember this crucial advice and to try to apply mindfulness whenever we engage in our regular commitments and practices. In this way our practice will be intact and we will gradually gain positive effects from it.

What we really need to understand from this presentation is that if we do our prayers and normal commitments with a mind that is distracted by the objects of delusions, then our practices will not have much effect. If we wonder why we are not obtaining any significant result from our practices, then we need to check whether we are applying mindfulness during those practices. We all know from experience that when we engage in practices with a distracted mind we don't derive many results from our practice.

So, as much as we can, we need to apply mindfulness while doing our practice. As I regularly emphasise, it is important to try to ensure that our practices are intact and that we fully utilise our time in practice. It is only by engaging in practices fully with mindfulness that they will bring about significant positive effects. This is exactly the point that is being emphasised here. It is a really significant point and it is appropriate to pay heed to it.

1.1.3.2. EXPLAINING

The previous verse showed that one needs to apply mindfulness. This section explains how to do that in four subdivisions.

1.1.3.2.1. The way of guarding the mind

1.1.3.2.2. The reason why it is necessary to guard the mind

1.1.3.2.3. The benefits of guarding it

1.1.3.2.4. Generating mindfulness to guard the mind wholeheartedly

¹The outline shows us how meticulously the text is presented. The logical and systematic presentation addresses the topic in a way that is suitable for those who wish to follow this practise. Gyaltzab Je's outlines highlight the systematic manner in which Shantideva composed his text. First it shows that it is necessary to guard the mind. We then naturally wonder how we do that, which he explains under these four headings. The way to guard the mind is presented first. That is followed by the reasons why it is necessary to guard the mind. Then, if one wonders what the benefits would be, the benefits are presented. Finally, there is a presentation of how to actually generate mindfulness to guard the mind wholeheartedly. So Gyaltsab Je's commentary shows us how Shantideva very meticulously, and very logically and systematically, presents advice for us to incorporate into our practice.

You can see the significance of this presentation by relating it to taking an interest in meditation. Do we really consider why we need to apply mindfulness? Do we know the manner of actually applying it and the benefits of applying it? Do we really contemplate these points? Probably not. These initiatives don't come about easily. We can see how Shantideva presents his material here in a very systematic way so that we can really understand the significance and take the practice to heart.

1.1.3.2.1. The way of guarding the mind

19. *If one is in the midst of a restless crowd,
One will focus and be conscientious of one's wound.
Similarly, in the midst of unruly people,
One guards continuously the wound of the mind.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

A person with a wound on his body who is in the midst of a restless crowd will apply himself very strongly to protect the wound. Similarly, if one is in the midst of unruly people, who could serve as a condition for afflictions to arise in one's mind, then one needs to continuously guard the wound of one's mind.

If one does not guard one's mind, then it will be the condition that cuts off the life of one's higher status and liberation.

This presentation is quite clear. The essential point is made with an analogy: when a person with a wound goes into a hustling, bustling crowd they would be very vigilant about protecting their wound, so that it isn't further damaged, thus causing more pain. If one is in the midst of unruly people who could serve as a condition for afflictions to arise in one's mind, refers to the way in which others can easily influence us in such a way that we generate delusions in our minds. In such an environment, one needs to continuously guard one's mind, just like the earlier analogy of protecting a wound in a crowd. One needs to pay particular attention to guarding the mind at such times.

Furthermore, if one does not guard one's mind then that would be the condition that cuts off the life of one's higher status and liberation. This means that not guarding the mind will prevent one from achieving one's higher goals. This is a very clear explanation that we really need to take to heart and carefully contemplate in our practice.

It is when one meets with the conditions for afflictions to arise that one needs to pay particular attention to guarding the mind. This is the essential point that is being presented here. Our minds are so easily influenced by the delusions, so we need to always be on guard. We need to guard our wound-like mind against any conditions that will cause delusions to be generated. If we find that delusions such as anger and attachment arise from even the slightest conditions, then that is a sign that we need to pay particular attention to guarding the mind. These are significant points.

If we are easily influenced by objects of delusion, then even minor conditions will cause the delusions to arise. That is a clear sign of a mind that needs to be guarded well. Some people actually get very upset when they can't find an object of delusion, such as an object of attachment. They actively seek out objects of attachment and experience misery and suffering when they can't find them. Craving objects of delusion shows how habituated the mind actually is with the delusions.

On a further note, paying particular attention to guarding the mind applies in all forms of practice. Many of you would have heard the story of the person who was meditating and when asked what they were meditating on they responded, 'I am meditating on patience'. But when some critical remarks were made, they immediately became upset. That is a sign of not guarding the mind. While generally assuming that they were meditating on patience, they failed to guard their mind, lost their temper and were not able to practise patience in that moment. These are examples in the teachings that show how we need to be constantly vigilant. I also remember an instance where someone came up to me and said that he wanted to become a monk. I questioned whether he should consider it more deeply and he said, 'Oh no! I am really adamant about this! I am very sure that I really want to become a monk'. Then two weeks later he found a partner, and moved in with them!

The main point here is to be extremely careful about guarding one's mind when the conditions for the delusions to arise are present. The teachings tell us that when there are no apparent conditions for delusions to arise someone may look like a real Dharma practitioner, but as soon as particular conditions arise they may act as a very ordinary person.

1.1.3.2.2. The reason why it is necessary to guard the mind

This is again a very important point that we need to keep in mind. The reason is presented in the next verse along with an example.

20. *If one is afraid of even the small suffering
Of a wound and guards it,
Then why does one not guard, frightened by the catcher
And crusher mountains, the wound of the mind?*

Again, this is explained quite clearly in the commentary, but the main point here is the need to take it to heart.

If it is suitable to guard a wound due to fearing slight physical pain, then why does one not guard the wound of the mind from negativity and downfalls due to fearing the sufferings of being crushed by the mountains of the Catcher Mountain Hell and the Crusher Mountain Hell? Both of these would be the result of mental degeneration.

One should guard one's mind with the thought: 'It would be a great mistake not to guard it'.

As presented in the commentary, because of the fear of physical pain from further injuring a wound, it is considered reasonable or suitable to guard any wound one may have so that it does not come into contact with anything that would cause physical pain. We pay so much attention to guarding a wound, because of fear about experiencing physical pain, so why do we not guard the wound of the mind from negativity and downfalls out of fear of the suffering of the hells of mass destruction, where, some of you might recall from the teachings, beings are crushed between two giant masses of mountains? These hellish experiences and great suffering are none other than the result of not guarding the mind from negativities and downfalls. So they are the ultimate result of allowing the mind to degenerate. The conclusion, as explained in the commentary, is that one should guard one's mind with the thought that it would be a great mistake not to guard it.

Here it is good to relate this to our understanding of karma, knowing that when one creates negativity the result will be the undesirable result of experiencing suffering. Therefore, if one does not wish to experience suffering it is appropriate that we prevent the cause of suffering, which is guarding the mind from negativity and downfalls.

When we really contemplate the reasons why we need to guard the mind we will be encouraged to actually apply the methods to do so. So contemplating these reasons is a very significant point.

1.1.3.2.3. The benefits of guarding it

This is similar to the very reason why we practise Dharma—simply put, we want happiness and we don't want to experience suffering.

The verse relating to this heading is:

21. *If one lives by such a conduct
One is suitable to abide amongst unruly people
Or amongst women.
The stability of striving in the vows will not degenerate.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

If one continually practises stopping the afflictions, the stability of the mind striving in the vows will not degenerate, regardless of whether one abides in the midst of unruly people with much anger, or whether one abides in the vicinity of women with much attachment.

The point, if one continually practises preventing the afflictions from arising, is something that we can apply to ourselves. If we find that the afflictions are arising quite readily, then perhaps we are not applying the antidotes on a continuous basis. If we apply them sometimes, and relax at other times, then, of course, that will have little effect on the delusions. The point here is that we need to continuously practise preventing the afflictions from arising, and then the stability of the mind striving in the vows will not degenerate.

This is how we protect self-liberation vows, bodhisattva vows, tantric vows, and whatever other vows or commitments we may have made. The way to protect vows is, as mentioned previously, to apply the antidotes to the afflictions on a continuous basis. Then, regardless of whether one abides in the midst of unruly, angry people, or whether one abides in the vicinity of beautiful goddesses, it will not affect one's mind.

Here we need to recall that Shantideva was giving this advice to fully ordained monks, so we need to understand his examples and illustrations in this context. Nevertheless Shantideva's advice applies to all who are striving to guard their mind and practise the Dharma.

The point here concerns guarding the vows and commitments one has taken. Of course, if those who have taken ordination do not guard their minds against the afflictions, then the vows will be given up at a later stage—in some cases very quickly. However, in a broader sense, the point relates to any vows; the layperson's vows, the self-ordination vows, the bodhisattva vows and the tantric vows many of you have taken. The best method to guard and protect these vows from degenerating is to continually practise mindfulness to stop the afflictions, and to apply antidotes to the afflictions when they arise. That will help to stabilise the mind so that the vows do not degenerate.

1.1.3.2.4. Generating mindfulness to guard the mind wholeheartedly

Having mentioned its benefits, we need to use mindfulness to guard the mind wholeheartedly. Therefore mindfulness is specifically presented as a very important element of our practice. The verse relating to that is:

22. *It is easy not to have gain, or praise,
A body, or livelihood.
It is also alright for other virtues to degenerate,
But do not let the mind degenerate at all.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Although one gains no food, clothing and the like, receives no praise such as veneration, and has no livelihood to support body and life, that is easy.

To lose virtue unprotected by the mind is easy as well, but the mind of the Great Vehicle should not be allowed to degenerate under any circumstances.

Again, this is not too difficult to understand. Although one gains no food, clothing and the like, receives no praise such as veneration, and has no livelihood to support body and life, that is easy, refers to the fact that these conditions are not really all that important.

When the commentary states that to lose virtue unprotected by the mind is easy as well, it is referring to virtues that are stained by worldly concerns. While on one hand they are classified as virtues, on the other hand they are stained because they are not protected from the stains of the worldly concerns, or self-interest. So if these virtues were to decline or degenerate, then that is not so important. This relative unimportance is measured in comparison to losing the mind of the Great Vehicle, which is bodhicitta, which should not be allowed to degenerate under any circumstances.

Compared with bodhicitta, virtues that are stained by worldly concerns or self-interest and other basic needs in relation to our immediate needs are quite insignificant. But the bodhicitta mind must be protected under all circumstances, and one should never allow it to degenerate.

While we may not yet have developed bodhicitta, any level of kindness, particularly the mind wishing to benefit others, is, as I regularly emphasise, a really precious mind. When that is further developed, we develop love and compassion, which serves as a cause to develop bodhicitta. The greater the wish to benefit others, the greater the conditions for bodhicitta will be. Once developed, of course, the bodhicitta attitude will be sustained by the continuing wish to benefit others. Therefore, one should not under any circumstances underestimate this state of mind of kindness and wishing to benefit others.

We can develop that wish to benefit others to a certain extent, and the instruction here is to always protect that mind and never lose that wish to benefit others, because that is the most valuable asset that we can ever have. It should be the centrepiece of our practice, like a fortress, and then all of the remaining practices will enhance that bodhicitta. That is the significance of this instruction.

As I have shared before, at our level a substitute for the actual bodhicitta attitude would be generating the attitude, 'I will not harm any living being, even slightly, and I will endeavour to benefit others to the best of my ability'. We can definitely manage to generate such a highly beneficial state of mind on a regular basis. As it is a substitute for bodhicitta for us, it is a highly significant state of mind.

1.2. Guarding mindfulness and introspection, which are the methods for guarding the mind

This section is explained in two subdivisions:

1.2.1. Showing, or the presentation

1.2.2. Explaining

1.2.1. Showing

The relevant verse is:

23. *You who wish to protect your mind,
Guard with wholehearted effort
Mindfulness and introspection,
I request with hands folded.*

The commentary explaining this verse reads.

You, who wish to guard your mind, since one cannot guard one's mind if one is separated from mindfulness and introspection, do not let the mindfulness that does not forget the virtuous object, and the introspection that analyses the situation of the three doors, degenerate, I, called Shantideva, request this with my hands folded.

What is being presented here very clearly is an exhortation. Shantideva is pleading with us, saying, 'You want to guard your mind, but it cannot be guarded without mindfulness or introspection. Therefore you must definitely not let mindfulness, which does not forget the virtuous object, and introspection, which analyses the three doors, degenerate. Having folded hands is a gesture showing that Shantideva is imploring us to adopt mindfulness and introspection. We can see this in everyday life. When we make a specific request to someone there are gestures like putting one's palms together and saying, 'Please do this'. Referring to this gesture is a way of showing the importance of mindfulness and introspection as a method of guarding the mind.

I have already explained the significance of mindfulness, and the actual explanations of what mindfulness is in detail, so we can leave the explanation of this verse at that.

1.2.2. Explaining

This is subdivided into two:

1.2.2.1. The faults of lacking introspection

1.2.2.2. Guarding mindfulness as the method for guarding introspection

1.2.2.1. THE FAULTS OF LACKING INTROSPECTION

This heading is further sub-divided into five:

1.2.2.1.1. Any action devoid of introspection lacks power

1.2.2.1.2. One does not generate pure wisdom

1.2.2.1.3. One does not generate pure morality

1.2.2.1.4. Earlier accumulated virtue is destroyed

1.2.2.1.5. It obstructs the achievement of virtue not accumulated earlier

1.2.2.1.1. Any action devoid of introspection lacks power

Here, action refers specifically to virtuous actions. What is explained under this heading is that when introspection is not applied to any virtuous action then the power of that virtuous action is reduced.

The verse that relates to this is:

24. *A person that is wracked by illness
Does not have energy for any work.
Similarly, a mind disturbed by ignorance
Does not have energy for any work.*

As clearly explained clearly in the commentary:

A person who is wracked by strong illness does not have the ability to work in the fields. Similarly, a mind that is wracked by the ignorance of not knowing what needs to be practised and what needs to be abandoned does not have strength for any type of virtuous action.

The analogy used here is that someone who is weighed down with heavy illness won't have the physical energy to be able to work in the fields of the farm, and so forth. Similarly, a mind that is riddled or wracked with the ignorance of not knowing what needs to be practised and what is to be abandoned, will not have the strength for any virtuous actions.

While wisdom is specifically emphasised in the next verse, this verse refers to the fact that a mind that is dominated by the ignorance of not knowing what is to be practised and what is to be abandoned will not have sufficient strength for any type of virtuous action. If, through ignorance, you don't know what is to be abandoned and what is to be adopted, you won't understand the significance of any virtuous action you may create. So your virtuous activities won't carry as much weight as they would if you understood their significance.

Basically, when the introspection that is particularly vigilant about one's actions of body, speech and mind, is not applied, then whatever virtuous actions one engages in, such as listening, will not have much effect. This even applies to listening to the Dharma. Further, the proper means to contemplate will be affected by the lack of introspection, and thus not carry much weight. As well as this, meditation will not carry much weight if introspection is lacking. That is the point being made in this verse.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

24 June 2014

Based on the motivation we have just generated, we can now engage in our meditation practice. [meditation]

To generate the motivation for receiving the teaching think, “For the sake of all mother sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well”.

1.2.2.1 THE FAULTS OF LACKING INTROSPECTION

1.2.2.1.2. One does not generate pure wisdom

If we lack mindfulness and introspection our ability to generate pure or perfect wisdom will be hindered. The following presentation will be relatively easy to comprehend as the meaning is not too difficult to grasp, but what we need to keep in mind is that it is advice we need to apply to ourselves, in relation to our own practice. All of us have already spent significant time listening to the Dharma, thinking about it and even trying to meditate. What is being presented here is that even though one has spent significant time engaging in this, if one does not continuously apply mindfulness and introspection then it is still possible for one's practice to degenerate. This is a really key point to keep in mind. As I emphasise regularly, we see cases where certain individuals may have spent quite a bit of time and energy studying and so forth, but then after some time they give up the Dharma. What causes them to give up their Dharma practice is not having applied mindfulness and introspection in their regular life.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

25. *Even the listening, contemplation and meditation
Of someone having a mind devoid of introspection,
Like water in a leaking vase,
Will not be kept in mind by memory.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the verse:

If one is separated from introspection, then one will not generate perfect wisdom. A person may even have the wisdoms of listening, contemplating and meditating from before, but if they lack introspection then, like water that does not remain in a broken vase, they do not abide in mindfulness and thus their wisdom degenerates. This is due to degenerated introspection.

The advice here is really succinct, but for us to incorporate its meaning into our life, we need to take this advice as a personal instruction. When we consider the fact that this advice is given by Shantideva—a bodhisattva himself—from his own insight and profound wisdom, illustrating that the most crucial point on the path to enlightenment is to maintain mindfulness and introspection. That should then encourage one to actually take this advice to heart.

The commentary starts with, If one is separated from introspection. Introspection here refers to the mind that is constantly vigilant of the way we conduct ourselves through our mind, through our physical actions, and through our speech. What is being presented here is the result of not applying introspection, which is something we need to recall again and again, for example, ‘What are the thoughts occurring in my mind?’, ‘How am I conducting my physical actions?’, ‘What kind of speech am I uttering?’ One must check on the basis of distinguishing between what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded, then analyse how one is conducting oneself through one's body, speech and mind. In a meditation session, having applied mindfulness and identified the object and focused on it, after a while that which checks whether we are still keeping our focus on the chosen object is done by introspection. So if our mind has wandered off and we've become distracted, then it is through introspection that we will notice that, and then we need to reapply mindfulness. This approach is being explained here in terms of mindfulness with our body, speech and mind in our daily lives.

Thus, as the commentary explains, if one is separated from introspection then the consequence is that one will not generate perfect wisdom. The Tibetan term te implies that a reason is to follow, which is presented here with the example of a broken or cracked vase. In the regular offering prayer that we do here before tea and meals there is also the word te; however some teachers have said the meaning would be more profound if the word nyi (or sole) is used instead, which would reflect that the lama is the sole creator of all.

So, what is being explained is that even if a person has previously gained a certain amount of wisdom through listening, contemplating and meditating, if they lack introspection, then that would affect their mindfulness as well. A lack of mindfulness arises because of not applying introspection, they are mutually supportive of each other—to have good mindfulness one needs to have adequate introspection.

The example of a cracked vase presented here is similar to that given in Lam Rim teachings, in which the analogy extends to three types of vases describing the conditions from which one needs to be free in order to listen to the teachings: the upside down vase; the dirty vase and the leaky vase. As the Lam Rim explains, it is really important to be free from these conditions in order to be a good recipient for the teachings, so they can benefit one's mind. I have emphasised this point previously.

Using the first example, if one were like an upside down vase when listening to teachings, then, just as one cannot pour water into the vase, likewise when one listens one cannot pay attention, and no matter how many teachings are presented they will not go into one's mind. With a dirty vase, if clean food and drink are put into it, then it will spoil the food. In relation to listening to teachings, this analogy shows that one needs to be free from a negative motivation as this will spoil the teachings. Even if the teachings themselves are pure, one will completely misinterpret them and get the wrong meaning. Thirdly, a vase may be upright and clean, but if it has a leak then no matter what is put into it, it will all come out. Common sayings support this, e.g. ‘what goes in one ear comes out the other’. So whatever the teaching one has listened to, one needs to be able to retain it. The point is that we need mindfulness to retain whatever instructions or teachings we receive.

We need to understand the proper manner of listening to the teachings. The Lam Rim states one needs to be free from the three adverse conditions (the analogy of the three vases) and apply the six recognitions. These are important points. Just as water does not remain in a broken vase, someone who lacks introspection will not be able to abide in mindfulness. This again shows how mindfulness is supported by introspection. If one lacks introspection that affects one's mindfulness, and also the wisdom of listening, contemplating and meditating, then whatever wisdom one has gained will degenerate. This is all due to the degeneration of introspection.

1.2.2.1.3. One does not generate pure morality

This indicates that someone who lacks introspection will not be able to generate pure morality.

The verse reads:

26. *A person listening, having faith
And striving strongly in many ways,
Because of having the fault of lacking
introspection,
Becomes sullied by the dirt of downfalls.*

Gyaltsab Je explains this verse as follows:

A person with faith who has listened to many teachings and strives strongly in many different ways to practise virtue, but who has the fault of not having introspection that knows what is right and what is wrong, will be sullied by the pollution of the dirt of the downfalls. Therefore one should strive in guarding introspection.

This explanation is very relevant at this time. If a person already has faith, has listened to many teachings and has striven strongly in many ways to practise virtue but has not maintained the introspection of knowing what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded, then their practice is sullied by the pollution of the stains of the downfalls.

We can see so many examples of this within the Tibetan community itself, with geshe and even lamas giving up their vows. Some have practised significantly for many years and later gave up their vows. We can also see many westerners who were once ordained Sangha, monks and nuns, who have now given up their vows. On a personal note, when I was in India many years ago I met a monk who was from Amdo. I recall I was really taken by his good composure, and apparently he had spent 12 years in retreat. He seemed like a very subdued monk, a very unique and genuine sort of monk at that time. However, at a later stage apparently he gave up being a monk and started living a lay life. This is quite astonishing to see.

I have heard many accounts of otherwise quite learned and good monks who have later disrobed. I recall another instance in the year 2000 at a Kalachakra initiation teaching in Bodhgaya. I was sitting up in front with Geshe Sonam and just in front was another youngish monk. As His Holiness passed by to the throne he would stop and pat me on the back and talk to me. The young monk in front recognised me and called me by name. I asked Geshe Sonam who he was and he told me he was quite a learned monk, actually a geshe from Sera Je who teaches the young monks in Namgyal Monastery, His Holiness' personal monastery in Dharamsala. Apparently His Holiness was fond of him because of his good knowledge and ability to teach other monks. This young geshe was fond of me and started to ask me questions on debate topics. The answers I gave him seemed to satisfy him. He said that if I needed any text books or anything from Dharamsala he could send them to me. He would even help me during the tea breaks to go to the private toilets inside, so I didn't have to go outside. So anyway, we had a good rapport. Then about a year later I heard that he had travelled to Canada, is no longer a monk and is now living a regular life as a lay person. This brought to my awareness how pitiful it is to lose such great teachers to an ordinary life.

At the conclusion of this verse Gyaltsab Je mentions Therefore one should strive in guarding introspection. The implication here is that even if one is quite learned and has gained quite a lot of wisdom from listening to the teachings over many years, contemplating the meanings and even meditated to a certain degree, then, if all of this is not supported with continuous mindfulness and introspection there is still the chance for one to be sullied by stains of the downfall. Thus, introspection is presented as being essential to maintain one's practice.

A commitment that many of you are already doing regularly, called the Six Session Guru Yoga, is structured as a means to maintain mindfulness and introspection continuously. One meditates and reviews the vows and commitments three times in the morning and three times in the afternoon/evening which helps one maintain one's mindfulness and introspection throughout the day.

The Six Session Guru Yoga practice requires not just reciting the words, but recalling the meaning to the best of our ability. Again, we have all spent significant time hearing a lot of teachings, thinking and contemplating so it would be a great pity if we lost whatever wisdom we have gained now, or if it degenerated. So, in order to maintain the understanding we have gained we definitely need to apply mindfulness and introspection. I regularly encourage you by saying 'always protect your mind with mindfulness and introspection'. This includes myself too; I also need to be mindful and careful of my practice. There is a Tibetan expression which says that the teacher shouldn't be like a trumpet. This analogy is used as the opening of the trumpet is faced outward and the sound goes out loudly. So it is for mutual benefit that we need to be reminded of this point.

I acknowledge that you already spend a lot of time studying and paying attention to the teachings, which is great. Now the only thing is to remind you to maintain that by practising with mindfulness and introspection. The main point is to maintain a continuity of practice.

1.2.2.1.4. Earlier accumulated virtue is destroyed

This indicates that earlier accumulated virtue can be destroyed with the lack of introspection.

The verse reads:

27. *The thief of a lack of introspection
Follows degenerated mindfulness.
Although having accumulated merits
The thief steals them and one goes to the lower realms.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning, along with an analogy:

A person without introspection will be robbed by the thief of the afflictions of their earlier accumulated wealth of merits due to degenerated introspection, which forgets the virtuous object.

When earlier accumulated wealth is stolen the person becomes a beggar. Similarly, when earlier accumulated merits are stolen the person becomes destitute of merits and goes to the lower realms.

When a person lacks introspection the afflictions will rob them like a thief. What they are being robbed of is their accumulated merit. Usually a thief would rob someone of their wealth and the analogy here relates to our accumulated merits. This explains that merits accumulated earlier can be taken away due to a degenerated introspection which forgets the virtuous object. The connection here is that if one is not mindful of the virtuous object then one will forget it. Furthermore, with a lack of introspection one does not bring one's mind back to the virtuous object. Thus, because one does not bring one's focus back to the virtuous object, one's earlier accumulated merits will degenerate. Referring to the analogy, when accumulated wealth is stolen a person becomes a beggar, even when a wealthy person is robbed, because their wealth is gone they will be left with nothing and become a beggar. Using this same analogy, when earlier accumulated merit is stolen, the person becomes destitute and goes to the lower realms. The significant point here is that if one forgets the virtuous object, which is all the accumulated virtues that one has accumulated, (and the causes for one to obtain a fortunate rebirth) then, with a lack of introspection, all of those virtues can degenerate, which is the cause for one to go to the lower realms.

So we need to be really careful not to lose the virtues that we have put so much effort into accumulating earlier. In relation to ourselves, we have definitely listened to the teachings, accumulated knowledge and understanding and engaged in practices for accumulating merits. When all that we have acquired does not degenerate then they would be significant causes for a fortunate rebirth. However, if they were to degenerate through forgetting the virtuous object due to lack of mindfulness and introspection, then we actually lose the causes we have already accumulated. That is why we need to take this instruction to heart.

1.2.2.1.5. It obstructs the achievement of virtue not accumulated earlier

This means that lacking introspection will prevent one from accumulating further virtue which one may not have accumulated already.

If one maintains introspection then one's earlier accumulated virtue will not be destroyed, and one will not be obstructed from achieving virtue one has not yet accumulated. In contrast to that, if we were to lack introspection, then earlier accumulated virtue is destroyed and we are further obstructed from achieving virtues that we have not yet accumulated. This is how we need to incorporate the need to apply and always maintain introspection, as opposed to lacking it, and the consequences of that.

The verse relating to this heading reads:

28. *This gang of affliction robbers
Looks for an opportunity.
If they get a chance they steal virtue
And kill off the life of a happy rebirth.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning:

This gang of affliction robbers looks for an opportunity to steal the wealth of virtue. If one does not protect oneself with introspection, and they get a chance, they will steal one's virtue and also destroy the result, happy migrations and the life of liberation, in the progress.

Having contemplated the faults of not having introspection one should strive in introspection that checks the situation of the three doors

The commentary is quite clear and the analogy highlights the main point. Just as a gang of robbers look for an opportunity to steal others' wealth, as soon as there is an opportunity, they will not hesitate—they will rob immediately. Likewise the afflictions we have in our mind are like the gang of robbers who are waiting for an opportunity to steal away our virtues. If one does not protect oneself with introspection and the afflictions get a chance, they will steal one's virtue and also destroy the results of one's virtue, which is a happy migration and the life of liberation which we are in the process of building. In conclusion, having contemplated the faults of not having introspection, one should strive in the introspection that investigates how we conduct ourselves through our three doors. Periodically we should check how we are conducting ourselves through our three doors of body, speech and mind. As mentioned earlier, the explanation here is quite clear: the main point is for one to actually take the advice to heart and put it into practice.

1.2.2.2. GUARDING MINDFULNESS AS THE METHOD FOR GUARDING INTROSPECTION

Mindfulness and introspection are presented as supportive of each other: in order to guard mindfulness one needs to apply introspection and vice versa. To have introspection we need to also apply mindfulness. This heading is divided into two:

1.2.2.2.1. Showing

1.2.2.2.2. Explaining

1.2.2.2.1. Showing

The verse reads:

29. *Therefore, do not send mindfulness
Away from the door of the mind.
Should it happen, place it closely
By recalling the sufferings of the lower realms.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning thus:

Because there are many faults if one does not have introspection, do not send the mindfulness of not forgetting the virtuous object away from the door of the house of the mind. In case mindfulness weakens and does leave, remind yourself of the sufferings of the lower realms, and immediately protect the house of the mind again.

Because of the many faults associated with losing introspection, using the analogy of mind as a house, one should not allow mindfulness (particularly forgetting the virtuous object), to leave from the door.

The commentary further explains 'in case mindfulness weakens' and it does go (because a beginner's mindfulness is hard to maintain all the time), one needs to remind oneself again of the sufferings and the pitiful situation of the lower realms, and that this is the consequence of a lack of mindfulness. Then one will immediately protect the house of the mind again.

1.2.2.2.2. Explaining

Having thus presented how to guard mindfulness, next follows the various conditions for guarding mindfulness as a method of guarding introspection. These are subdivided into three.

1.2.2.2.2.1. Relying on the outer condition of a virtuous friend

1.2.2.2.2.2. How to generate the inner condition of correct mental application

1.2.2.2.2.3. How to generate the inner conditions of mindfulness and introspection

1.2.2.2.2.1. Relying on the outer condition of a virtuous friend

What are the various conditions for guarding mindfulness as a method of guarding introspection? The first is relying on the outer condition of a virtuous friend, or what we call a teacher or guru. The teacher is a virtuous friend, thus relying on the lama is relying on a virtuous friend. This then becomes an external condition for one to be able to maintain one's introspection.

The verse reads:

30. *From following the lama,
Through to advice by the abbot,
Out of fear, the fortunate ones are respectful,
And generate mindfulness easily.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

The fortunate ones respect the trainings and will follow the advice of their abbot, preceptor, friends in pure training and the like out of a feeling of shame and consideration and fear of being degraded by others. These are methods for protecting mindfulness.

Since they generate easily the mindfulness that does not forget the virtuous object, regardless of whether they listen, contemplate or meditate, they base their practice on mastering mindfulness.

The method for protecting mindfulness presented here is that those who are the fortunate ones will respect the trainings and follow the advice of the abbot and the like out of a feeling of shame and consideration. For those in the ordained community the abbot is the one from whom vows are received. A preceptor gives precepts to the lay community who take lay precepts. Friends in pure training would be in the larger sangha community—those who help one accumulate virtue - friends in pure training. As one has taken vows and precepts from a prominent being and made promises to such a prominent being, it would be improper to breach them. It is said that the significance of receiving the vows and commitments from highly accomplished masters is that the mere recollection of them will help one to be more mindful of not breaching the vows. The hesitation to break those vows will be stronger because of the great respect one has for the lama (qualified virtuous friends—teacher, abbot etc.) With the fear of being degraded by others, means that when one has fear of being looked down upon, or where others may say something to put one in a bad light, then through consideration of this one will be able to apply mindfulness. These are the methods for protecting mindfulness since they generate easily the mindfulness that does not forget the virtuous object. The key point here is that since the mindfulness of not forgetting the virtuous object can easily lapse, regardless of whether one has listened, contemplated or meditated, you must base your practice on mastering mindfulness in order to protect your earlier merit and vows etc.

Shame and consideration are two very important virtues we need to maintain. The difference between shame and embarrassment is that the focus of shame is one's commitment to others, such as one's lamas and Buddha etc. If one avoids engaging in faults that would cause disgrace to those others, this is shame. Embarrassment arises because an action is not good for one's own reason i.e. it is not good for me to break these vows. This uses oneself as a reason to avoid faults in consideration of others.

In summary, take relying on outer conditions as a personal instruction to recall the importance of relying on qualified spiritual masters and virtuous friends who encourage us and to help us accumulate virtue. On a wider scale, one can rely on Dharma brothers and sisters in our life, like-minded people who help remind us of the Dharma. Having respect for them and relying upon them is meaningful for oneself as a method to protect one's mindfulness, and as a way to guard introspection.

1.2.2.2.2. How to generate the inner condition of correct mental application

Having explained the outer conditions next the method to generate the inner conditions of correct mental application is presented. This next verse serves as a proclamation, or what we should recall.

The verse reads:

31. *Buddhas and bodhisattvas
Are endowed with unobstructed sight of everything.
Say, 'I am always in the field of vision
Of their five eyes.'*
32ab. *By contemplating this, shame,
And likewise respect and fear are attained.*

As explained by Gyaltsab Je in the commentary:

Further, the buddhas and bodhisattvas can see all phenomena without obstruction, regardless of place or time. So one remains at all times clearly in the sight of their five eyes. Considering this generates shame, which takes oneself as the reason, and because one has respect for the teacher and the Dharma and fear of the fruition, one should take care and practise mindfulness.

The first line presents the extent of the buddhas' omniscient mind, and it is because the buddhas have five wisdom eyes that one is always in their presence. Bringing this to mind, along with the qualities of the buddhas' omniscience and the qualities of the bodhisattvas, one should always feel their presence, because they are in constant awareness of our being.

The way to envision shame is that if one recalls that one is always in the presence of the buddhas and bodhisattvas then one does not want to show disrespect, so one refrains from engaging in misdeeds. This is how one applies mindfulness and introspection in relation to shame.

As the commentary continues, because one has respect for the teacher and the Dharma and fear of the fruition, one should take care and practise mindfulness.

The next point, which is the consideration for others, comes because of the respect one has for the teacher and the Dharma and fear of the results of one's negative consequences (one's misdeeds). By recalling the reason of others, one again applies mindfulness, and it is in this way that one practises mindfulness on a continuous basis. Again, what is being explained is not obscure, it is quite clear. The main thing for one to take to heart as personal instruction is to apply this in our practice.

To summarise the main point: recall that the Buddhas are omniscient. This means that they know all existence completely and entirely; past, present and future. Think, 'I am always in their presence and so I dare not engage in misdeeds, lapse from my commitments etc.' This recollection is how our mindfulness is supported with introspection.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

1 July 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation practice.
[Meditation]

We can generate a positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the benefit of all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment. Therefore I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

I regularly emphasise the importance of the motivation and this is exactly the point which is presented in the next verses. These verses are very poignant explanations about the significance of our state of mind and so forth, so we really need to pay attention to them.

1.2.2.2.3. How to generate the inner conditions of mindfulness and introspection

This has two subdivisions:

1.2.2.2.3.1. How to generate mindfulness

1.2.2.2.3.2. How to generate introspection from mindfulness

1.2.2.2.3.1. How to generate mindfulness

Here, there are two lines:

32cd. They also repeatedly generate Recollection of the Buddha.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on these lines reads

A person who thinks in this way will also recollect the qualities of the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha. Because this happens repeatedly, they will easily generate mindfulness of the Three Jewels.

This explanation follows last week's presentation in that a person who thinks in this way refers to using shame and embarrassment to apply mindfulness. An individual who conducts themselves with shame and embarrassment in mind will recollect the qualities of the Buddha, the Dharma and the Sangha, which are three of the six recollections. In addition to the recollection of the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha, the six recollections also include recollection of the downfalls, recollection of morality and recollection of the deities.

As presented here, the qualities of the Three Jewels are interrelated in the sense that the more one reflects on the enlightened activities of the Buddha, the greater the admiration and faith in the Buddha's words, i.e. the Dharma. Generating strong faith in the Dharma will then naturally bring about a keen admiration and faith in those who actually practise the Dharma, i.e. the Sangha. So in this way one recollects the qualities of the Three Jewels, the Buddha, the Dharma and the Sangha.

Furthermore the more one recollects the qualities of the Three Jewels, the more mindful one will be about not creating the downfalls, and the recollection of morality and so forth will come about as well. Constantly bringing to mind an awareness that one is in the presence of the buddhas and the deities at all times will help one to generate a sense of shame about breaching any vows one has taken, and then through that shame there is a hesitation about incurring the negativities or the downfalls. The same applies to embarrassment with respect to others. So the recollection of the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha helps to generate a sense of shame and embarrassment about incurring the downfalls and so forth.

1.2.2.2.3.2. How to generate introspection from mindfulness

Here again, we take note of the way mindfulness and introspection are interconnected. If one applies mindfulness well, then that will help to generate introspection as well. The verse relating to this is:

*33. When mindfulness remains at the door
Of the mind for the purpose of protection,
At that time introspection is born
And the one that left returns.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse thus:

At the time when one, through mindfulness, remains alert to protect oneself from the afflictions, then introspection, which analyses which action is suitable and which is unsuitable, comes into existence, and that which has degenerated at a time will return.

Since the skill in practice depends on mindfulness and introspection, one should become adept in this.

As the commentary explains, by applying mindfulness one remains alert to protect oneself from the afflictions. Here mindfulness relates to being either mindful of a virtuous object, or mindful of what is to be adopted and what is to be discarded. So mindfulness means being alert to the possibility of afflictions arising and thus protecting oneself from them. This is really the most significant point about applying mindfulness.

Here we can recall one of the great Kadampa masters Geshe Byel Kunkyen who said, 'I always guard my three doors, lest I fall victim to the afflictions'. One really needs to apply mindfulness in this manner, as a means to guard the mind against the afflictions, and thus ensure that they do not take root. That is the positive outcome of applying mindfulness.

As the commentary further explains, the consequence of following the practice of maintaining mindfulness to protect oneself from the afflictions, is that introspection, which analyses what actions are suitable and what are unsuitable, comes into existence. This presentation is systematically showing us how introspection arises by virtue of applying mindfulness. When one applies mindfulness appropriately, and maintains it, then introspection will naturally arise, which in this context is a mind that vigilantly analyses and checks what actions are to be adopted and what actions need to be discarded.

I regularly stress the importance of maintaining mindfulness of one's virtuous object while in meditation. When we have mindfulness of the object, then the introspection that checks whether the mind has become distracted or not will arise naturally. The same applies to mindfulness and introspection about what actions are to be adopted and what are to be abandoned. This is a very systematic explanation that clearly shows how mindfulness and introspection support each other.

When the commentary says, that which is unsuitable comes into existence and that which has degenerated at a time will return, it is referring to the fact that if mindfulness or introspection start to weaken, they can easily be restored. The more one maintains mindfulness about one's activities and actions, the more it will help the development of introspection. In the event that mindfulness or introspection start to degenerate or lapse, then, because of the earlier application, they will easily be able to return. So that is the point being explained here.

Furthermore, as the commentary explains, since the skill in meditation and practice depends on mindfulness and introspection, one should become adept in this. The point here is that becoming skilled in meditation and practice depends on how much mindfulness and introspection is being applied, and held without degeneration.

1.3. The practice of guarding the mind with mindfulness and introspection

Having explained the necessity of applying mindfulness and introspection, the next part of the text deals with the actual practice of guarding the mind with mindfulness.

This is subdivided into three:

- 1.3.1. Training in the morality of restraint
- 1.3.2. The way of training in the morality of accumulating virtuous dharmas
- 1.3.3. Training in the morality that accomplishes the welfare of sentient beings

1.3.1. Training in the morality of restraint

This has two subdivisions:

- 1.3.1.1. Striving to purify the actions of the three doors
- 1.3.1.2. Protecting the three doors from degeneration

1.3.1.1. STRIVING TO PURIFY THE ACTIONS OF THE THREE DOORS

Here there are three sub-headings

- 1.3.1.1.1. Investigating the actions of body and speech
- 1.3.1.1.2. Investigating the actions of the mind
- 1.3.1.1.3. Explaining the permitted and forbidden actions

1.3.1.1.1. Investigating the actions of body and speech

This is subdivided into four:

- 1.3.1.1.1.1. Investigating the motivation before a physical action
- 1.3.1.1.1.2. Advice related to looking and so forth
- 1.3.1.1.1.3. Relating it to other actions
- 1.3.1.1.1.4. Investigating the action of abiding

These are important points that I regularly emphasise. This part of the presentation is also very suitable for beginners, as they will find it systematic and very logical. They are able to relate to this explanation very well, because it relates to normal, everyday activities.

Investigating the motivation before a physical action relates to the fact that the mind is paramount in all our actions. The mind is the forerunner of all physical and verbal activities. Whether we conduct a positive physical activity, or whether it is harmful depends on our motivation prior to engaging in that action. Likewise whatever speech we utter, whether it is positive and beneficial, or harmful or negative, is also dependent on the motivation that precedes the speech. This presentation shows how the mind is the forerunner of all activities.

1.3.1.1.1. Investigating the motivation before a physical action

The verse that relates to this heading is:

34. *Initially investigate
Whether this mind is flawed.
At the time I shall remain
Steady like wood.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains:

Before engaging in any physical action, such as walking, investigate this mind of yours to see whether the motivation for the action is flawed or not.

In case a flawed motivation has arisen, then, while remembering the antidote against the afflictions, remain steady like wood, and not be moved by the motivation.

As the commentary explains, before engaging in any action such as walking, first check or investigate this mind of yours to see whether the motivation for the action is flawed or not. As explained here, prior to engaging in any action such as walking or going about, one checks one's state of mind to see what is motivating this action. 'Is the motivation a positive one? Is it an appropriate motivation for the action I am about to engage in? Or is it tainted with some negativity?' This is how to check one's motivation prior to engaging in the action itself.

As the commentary further explains, if one finds that a flawed motivation has arisen or taken root, then, the moment one notices that the motivation is stained, by remembering the antidote to the affliction, one remains steady like wood.

To understand this analogy it is necessary to know that the Tibetan term shing applies to wood in general, and it is also the term for trees. In this case, as some other commentaries indicate, the example relates to a massive tree that remains steady during a storm and is not moved by gusts of wind. This example is used to illustrate how one needs to apply the antidote to remain steady and not be moved by the afflictions.

When one notices that one's motivation is tainted and applies the antidote to the afflictions, then one will be able to remain steady and not be moved by that tainted motivation or superstitious thoughts and so forth. So the mind itself remains steady and not moved by a faulty motivation or the afflictions.

As I regularly emphasise, whatever the practice we do, particularly with meditation, we need to be mindful that the practice serves its purpose of overcoming the afflictions in one's mind. As I have related to you in the past, I spent a significant amount of time in my youth attempting to meditate. As I have confided in you in the past, despite my earnest efforts to apply the meditation practice, trying to lead a modest life, being content with whatever I had and not concerned about nice clothing and food, these efforts could, at times, have been tainted with some worldly concern, wondering how others would view me and so forth. Nevertheless the attempts I made at that time have definitely had a positive effect on my wellbeing now that I am older. Judging by the positive effects that I experience now, the earlier attempts to meditate and so forth have not been in vain, and may have been focused in the right direction. At this stage in my life I can confidently say that my meditation practice is pure, without the stains of worldly concerns.

Geshe-la in English: When I was 20 years old, 21 years old, 22 years old, 23 years old, at that time when there is good food and bad one, I chose bad one! If there is good cloth and not good one, I choose not good one. At time very, very good learning—now I no attach food, no attach cloth, no attach reputation! That time I learning, now beneficial for me! Normally I say I need small food, easy food, not need many different food; stomach full and good for health that is enough! Some people two hours cooking, eat ten minutes, finished! Important healthy food need, delicious or not delicious not really important, healthy need. Delicious only here [pointing to tongue]—afterwards gone! Some people eat rotten egg, rotten meat, not knowing, say 'yes, yes', then stomach pain and some dead. Most important health!

Coming back to the main point, our motivation is of paramount importance. Whatever activity we engage in we need to first check our motivation. Those of you who live with a partner know from experience how, if you do not check your state of mind and allow negative states of mind such as anger to become prevalent, you can easily engage in inappropriate gestures and behaviours that can upset your partner. Behaving in this way will not be received well, even by someone who is close to you. We see so many examples of the complications, harm and hostility that arise as a result of not having paid attention to one's state of mind, prior to engaging in the activities that affect your companion.

If you take this advice to heart, and really pay attention to your state of mind, then, having contemplated the faults of anger, when you notice anger arising you will know that it is not a really suitable state of mind with which to interact with others. By virtue of recognising that, you will be able to prevent yourselves from mishaps and harming others. This is the practical approach to protecting yourselves.

1.3.1.1.2. Advice related to looking and so forth

Here again we can notice the very practical advice Shantideva is giving to those listening to his teachings. His practical advice on how to conduct oneself and behave properly, just the same as the advice and care that a parent would give to their children.

Having mentioned the importance of checking the mind before engaging in physical actions, now comes advice about how to look with one's eyes.

This has four subdivisions:

- 1.3.1.1.2.1. The general conduct of looking with the eyes
- 1.3.1.1.2.2. How to look when tired
- 1.3.1.1.2.3. How to act when another person comes close
- 1.3.1.1.2.4. How to act after one has rested

1.3.1.1.2.1. The general conduct of looking with the eyes

The verse that relates to this is:

35. *I never allow myself to be distracted
And do not look around meaninglessly.
Rather, with a firm mind,
I always look with my eyes downcast.*

These are quite easy points to understand and the commentary is also quite clear.

I shall never allow myself to be distracted and look around meaninglessly, because this causes the mind to degenerate. With the virtuous object firmly in mind I shall always look with my eyes cast down the length of one yoke in front of me.

As the commentary explains one should never allow oneself to be distracted and look around meaninglessly. This means not looking around without any purpose. One should guard against that sort of conduct. If one were to look around meaninglessly then that would cause the mind to degenerate, through losing its focus on the virtuous object.

Then the commentary further explains that while maintaining the virtuous object firmly in mind I shall always look with my eyes cast down the length of one yoke in front of me. In some texts such as the Vinaya Sutra, the distance is described as the span of one arm's length.

The main point is that one maintains one's focus on the virtuous object, and that when one walks, one looks just at the space in front of oneself. That covers the general conduct of looking with the eyes.

1.3.1.1.2.2. How to look when tired

Next comes how to look when one is tired. This is covered in these two lines:

- 36ab. *To rest one's sight
One should occasionally look around.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

To refresh one's constitution, and if tired, one occasionally lifts one's gaze and looks around.

When one is tired or looking for a resting place, one can occasionally lift one's gaze and look around.

Holding one's gaze at a certain distance for too long might lead to physical discomfort, and mentally one may start to feel a bit tired. So, in order to refresh one's physical constitution, and to revive the mind, we are advised to occasionally lift up our gaze a bit and look around in order to refresh ourselves.

We know that whenever we are engaged in some sort of task, after a while we get a bit tired and we need to look up and stretch out our arms. This is how we normally refresh ourselves. However, this does not imply that we should forget the virtuous object and just look around meaninglessly. The purpose of looking up is just to refresh ourselves, and it should not be a means to become distracted again.

1.3.1.1.2.3. How to act when another person comes close

At this point we can again reflect upon the heart-warming nature of Shantideva's advice. I have heard people say, 'My parents never taught me how to receive guests and how to care for them!' Shantideva is showing us here how to relate to others in appropriate ways.

Some people become very shy when guests arrive, and are not really able to say much. This indicates that they are not really able to interact with and relate to people at a social level.

36cd. When someone appears in the field of your vision

Look up and say, "It is good you came".

37ab. To check whether there are dangers on the road

Look repeatedly in the four directions.

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains the meaning as follows:

If someone comes into one's field of vision, while we have our eyes downcast, once they are in front of us we smile at them and say 'How good you came'.

Also, while walking along a path one needs to repeatedly look around in the four directions to check whether there are any dangers or not.

As explained here in the commentary, if, while you are engaged in gazing downward, someone comes near you, then you look up and greet them with a smile. Even just a smile can make others feel at ease and comfortable. Following this pleasant facial gesture, one utters welcoming pleasant words. That is how to conduct oneself.

Furthermore while walking along the path, the conduct one needs to adopt is to repeatedly look in the four directions, to check whether there are any dangers or not. This is very practical advice. One should always be vigilant as one walks about, otherwise accidents will happen. We can see the very practical nature of this advice. It is also applicable to driving, isn't it? Basically, Shantideva is presenting, with reason and logic, the most suitable way to conduct ourselves virtuously in all our activities, much as parents give advice to their children.

1.3.1.1.1.2.4. How to act after one has rested

This of course is quite easy to understand. Having given advice on how to rest when one is tired, how does one conduct oneself after a rest?

The following four lines explain this:

37cd. Having directed your sight outwards during the break

Look behind your back.

38ab. Having checked in front and behind

Go or come.

The commentary explains the meaning as follows.

Further, after one has rested and set out again, direct your attention outwards and look also behind your back for your possessions. Having checked whether in front or behind are any cliffs and so forth, one either continues along one's path or goes back, as is appropriate.

Having applied the advice on resting, as one sets out again, we are next advised to direct your attention outward, and also behind your back for your possessions. This refers to making sure that there are no obstructions, or dangers, either behind or in front.

Having checked in front and behind that there aren't any cliffs or so forth refers to the fact that some routes can be treacherous, and very dangerous. So one needs to look carefully in front, to see if there are any cliffs or not, and then, ensuring that there is no danger, one proceeds along the path.

Looking backward ensures that it is possible to turn back if needed, as well as ensuring one does not leave one's possessions behind. Again, this is very practical advice.

1.3.1.1.1.3. Relating it to other actions

The relevant two lines are:

38cd. Act in this way at all time

Upon understanding the purpose.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary states:

Having understood the need for the benefit of self and others, act like this with all your physical and verbal actions.

In summary, whatever one's actions, whether verbal or physical, one needs to first check their purpose, whether they benefit oneself or others, and then, if there is a benefit, engage in those actions.

We will recite the King of Prayers for Kim Foon's father who has just passed away in Malaysia. Kim, her sister Kim Yoke, and William are three of our more dedicated students, and it is good for us to do prayers for them at this time.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

8 July 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation practice.
[meditation]

Aim to receive the teachings with a bodhicitta motivation such as:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, in order to free them from all sufferings and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. For that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

Such a motivation is crucial for ensuring that your approach is a proper practice.

We have explained the headings How To Act When One Rests and Relating It To Other Actions. Recall how those explanations gave very practical advice about how to conduct oneself in such situations. In relation to protecting oneself from dangers after resting, when one starts to move about, the advice was about how to be cautious: look behind to make sure no possessions have been left behind; ensure you are not in danger; look in front and make sure there is no precipice or danger points around and then move with caution. This was very practical advice.

This line from Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains what is meant by relating it to other actions and serves as a summary that relates to all of our actions.

Having understood the need for the benefit of self and others, act like this with all your physical and verbal actions.

Whatever actions we engage in, physical or verbal, in all instances first check whether there is a benefit for oneself or a benefit for others. Having thoroughly checked, if one finds there is a benefit for oneself and/or others then engage in the actions. Again, this is immaculate advice as it encourages us to use our own wisdom to assess our actions.

1.3.1.1.4. Investigating the action of abiding

The verse reads:

39. *Initiate your actions thinking:
'I shall abide with my body like this.'
From time to time check
How your body is abiding.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

After having had the thought, 'I shall remain in this position', stop the actions of the body and place it for the time being in the planned position.

Look in the explained way, from time to time to check how the body is abiding, and strive to act without fault.

When engaging in a virtuous deed on a physical level (it can relate to body, speech and mind but here it relates to the physical), and after having the thought 'I shall remain in this position,' an example of an action may be if you decided to engage in a focused meditation. You would think 'Now I will position myself in the seven-point posture of Buddha

Vairochana, and having taken this initiative you would adopt the appropriate posture. Then, having adopted the posture you would strive to maintain it for the duration. You would periodically check how your body is abiding, and whether you have adopted the correct posture or not. This applies to any physical action; sitting, standing or moving about—adopt the physical posture and strive to act without fault. The succinct advice here is to constantly be aware of one's actions, whether physical, verbal or mental state, and be vigilant in checking 'how am I conducting myself?' This ensures that you are conducting yourself without fault and in line with creating virtue. If you find yourself at fault, immediately try to overcome it. This is the main advice. Having given detailed advice on how to conduct oneself physically, next is investigating the state, or conduct, of the mind.

1.3.1.1.2. Investigating the mind

This is subdivided into two

1.3.1.1.2.1. Fastening the mind to the virtuous object

1.3.1.1.2.2. Analyse whether it is single-pointedly focused on virtue or not

1.3.1.1.2.1. Fastening the mind to the virtuous object

The verse reads:

40. *Check with all your effort
That the crazy elephant mind
Does not lose the great Dharma pillar
The way it was fastened to it.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Check with all your effort that the unsubdued and crazy elephant mind does not lose the great pillar of the Dharma object that one accepted to contemplate single-pointedly, the way one fastened the mind to it.

The main point of the explanation here is how to ensure that one's mind is fastened to a virtuous object. The mind here is likened to an unsubdued and crazy elephant which would cause havoc due to its completely wild nature. Firstly, it is untamed, and on top of that it is crazed, so an elephant like that would go on a rampage and cause huge destruction, unless it was secured tightly to a strong pillar.

This analogy illustrates our state of mind, which is untamed from the three poisons of attachment, anger and ignorance, and crazed with different delusions. Such an untamed and crazed mind, if it is not fastened to a pillar like a Dharma object, can cause so much damage and destruction. Therefore the advice here is, in order to prevent one's mind from causing so much damage and destruction, check with all your effort that the unsubdued and crazy elephant mind does not lose the great pillar of the Dharma object. For us, the pillar or object must be a virtuous object, and just as one would tie an elephant to a pillar, one ties the focus of one's mind to the virtuous object, or what the commentary calls the Dharma object that one accepted to contemplate single-pointedly the way one fastened the mind to it. This line indicates that as one has previously determined to contemplate on a chosen object, one needs to constantly ensure one does not lose focus on that virtuous object.

1.3.1.1.2.2. Analyse whether it is single-pointedly focused on virtue or not

After one has fastened one's mind to a virtuous Dharma object (pillar), next one needs to analyse whether it is single-pointedly focused on it or not. This is very succinct advice on how to conduct oneself on a mental level. One can derive so much meaning from just going over the outline and relate to the significance of the meaning of the verse.

The verse reads:

41. *However I strive in concentration
I shall not let loose for even one moment.
'What does this mind of mine do?' I ask.
Analyse the mind in detail in this regard.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of this verse:

I shall not even for one moment lose my concentration on the virtuous object and be distracted to something else. Analyse your mind repeatedly, saying: 'This mind of mine does suitable and unsuitable actions.'

The significant point here is that while the advice is to focus one's mind single-pointedly on the virtuous object to develop concentration, at the same time, internally in one's mind, one should also analyse one's state of mind checking what kind of thoughts are occurring, what kind of actions are being initiated. The mind has the ability to constantly initiate either suitable or unsuitable actions. So there is a need to check what kinds of thoughts are being manifested in one's mind. Note that from the very onset it is extremely crucial to train oneself in meditation, to develop not only calm abiding, but also special insight, because calm abiding, a state of single-pointed concentration on an object for as long as one wishes, in itself is not sufficient to further enhance one's progress along the path to enlightenment. The teachings constantly emphasise this point. So in addition to calm abiding, one needs to develop special insight, and it is with this combination of concentration and special insight that one can start to really engage in an actual meditation practice capable of removing the subtle afflictions and delusions in the mind. This is a crucial point: while engaging in meditation we should not allow ourselves to feel comfortable just focusing single-pointedly on a chosen object, and maintaining just that. Rather we must also constantly investigate our state of mind, which serves as the basis to develop special insight.

The analysis one employs to check one's state of mind is one which is done while maintaining one's focus on the object, not wavering away from it. So while maintaining this single-pointed focus on the object, one must also employ an analysis that investigates one's state of mind, i.e. what thoughts are occurring and whether they are virtuous states of mind or negative states of mind. Employing this sort of analysis enhances one's intelligence and wisdom, and further develops that wisdom, which can later become special insight.

Lama Tsong Khapa advocates abandoning mere single-pointed concentration, and striving to develop the union of calm abiding and special insight. This is a significant and unique point which we really need to understand. We need to make attempts to develop this training now in our meditation so it will leave a positive imprint in our mind. When we apply this technique it becomes a means to sharpen the mind and further enhance wisdom. Otherwise if one only develops single-pointed concentration, and it is not done in an appropriate manner, then there is a danger of the mind becoming duller and duller rather than sharper, clearer and more intelligent. It is crucial that we apply the proper technique.

1.3.1.1.3. Explaining the permitted and forbidden actions

First, to give an idea about what this heading means in relation to explaining the meaning of the verse: the Buddha presented certain actions as being permitted and certain actions which are forbidden. Within those which were forbidden there are certain actions which may be temporarily relaxed a bit, as a way of adopting another practice. This is the meaning of practicing equanimity in this context. Thus here, equanimity means that with certain forbidden actions one may temporarily relax the rules a bit, as the means to adopt another virtuous practice.

The verse reads:

42. *If, in the context of dangers or prayer
You are unable, be as comfortable as you can.
In the same vein, at the time of generosity
Morality is treated with equanimity, it is taught.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the verse:

If one is unable to perform certain extremely subtle actions of body and mind at the time of:

- Danger to one's life,
- Making offering to the Triple Gem with prayers,
- Actions for the superior purpose of others,

At such times it is permissible to relax one's state or being, even if one is not able to engage those subtle forbidden actions.

From the Sutra Requested by Inexhaustible Wisdom:

Thus, at the time of generosity, contain morality and practise equanimity.

The commentary explains that at a time when there is either danger to one's life, or when one is making extensive offerings to the Triple Gem, or particularly when one is engaging in superior actions of benefiting or helping other beings, if one is unable to perform certain extremely subtle actions of body and mind at that time, then 'one should practice equanimity and put one's mind at ease.'

The citation to qualify this presentation is from the Sutra Requested by Inexhaustible Wisdom.

Thus, at the time of generosity, contain morality and practice equanimity.

This is saying that at a time when one is not able to practise both simultaneously, and it is the time for mainly practising generosity, then one should practice equanimity, and leave one's subtle practice of morality. The purpose is to be skilful in accomplishing the path sequentially.

Further down, the commentary explains:

This is to achieve the proper sequence of the path, because if one mistakes the sequence then one will not achieve the former or the latter.

The points of the path should be practised sequentially. In order to practise the points sequentially, first adopt those which are initially presented and relatively easy to practise before engaging in a more difficult practice. The quote from the sutra indicates this point.

The commentary presents a hypothetical doubt which may occur:

Query: How can one regard it with equanimity since morality is greater than generosity?

This is a reasonable doubt, for it is indeed a greater virtue to practise morality than generosity, because morality is harder to practise. Generosity can be practiced by lay as well as ordained practitioners, while certain practices of morality, like observing the self-liberation vows, can only be practised by ordained Sangha. Therefore morality is said to be harder to practise than generosity.

Thus, if we had to identify the main focus of the practice and who is appropriate to do those practices, lay people would focus mainly on generosity, and ordained Sangha would need to practise primarily on morality as their main practice.

So, as the query states, if morality is more virtuous, how can one leave that in equanimity, meaning how can one relax the practice of morality?

The next two verses serve as an answer to the query and read:

43. *After initiating the intended action
Do not think about anything else.
For the time being accomplish that very action
With your thoughts focused on it.*
44. *In this way all is accomplished well.
Otherwise neither will be accomplished.
The secondary afflictions, which are nonintrospection,
Will not increase in this way.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains exactly why:

One does not divert mentally from the first practice in a series that have to be practised sequentially. Generosity, which has to be practised first, is practised alone with a firm mind for the time being. This is to achieve the proper sequence of the path, because if one mistakes the sequence, then one will not achieve the former or the latter.

In relation to the first part - One does not divert mentally from the first practice in a series that have to be practised sequentially - this highlights that some practices are presented in sequential order. When practices are presented in a sequential manner it is important to primarily focus on the first practice as a way to establish a firm basis to engage in the next practice of the sequence. As explained here, This is to achieve the proper sequence of the path, because if one mistakes the sequence, then one will not achieve the former or the latter.

Take the analogy of constructing a wall: the foundation must be firm and stable. If it is not stable, when you start building the wall and putting the next layer on top it can very easily topple over. The consequence is that you neither have a good foundation nor a wall which comes on top of it. With this analogy it is very clear that when a practice is presented sequentially one needs to focus on the first practice to serve as a basis to practise the rest.

Hence the commentary continues:

By knowing and following the stages of the path the secondary afflictions, which are not introspection and which do not know the sequence, will not increase. Hence, one should strive to become proficient in the sequence of the path.

So this is all very clear.

1.3.1.2. PROTECTING THE THREE DOORS FROM DEGENERATION

This is divided into two subdivisions:

1.3.1.2.1. Protecting the training of the body from degeneration

1.3.1.2.2. Protecting the training of the mind from degeneration

1.3.1.2.1. Protecting the training of the body from degeneration

This is further divided into three meticulously presented subdivisions:

1.3.1.2.1.1. Not letting the body fall under the control of distractions

1.3.1.2.1.2. Abandon meaningless activities

1.3.1.2.1.1. Not letting the body fall under the control of distractions

45. *Various types of idle gossip
And many great plays,
If one becomes involved in any of these,
Abandon attachment to them.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the verse:

Do not engage in meaningless talk, such as gossip about kings or robbers, and also do not engage in dance or one of the many other kinds of spectacular performances. If there is a purpose or if it is to harmonise with someone, then one should abandon attachment for the action.

This succinct and practical advice is good for us, as it explains how to conduct ourselves in our daily life. The advice is that, whenever possible, one should not engage in meaningless talk such as idle gossip. The text cites gossip about kings or robbers, however for us it would be like gossiping about politics etc. There are sayings that express sentiments like, 'when one engages in gossip the whole day can just pass by', and one has just squandered a whole day gossiping. Engaging in gossip can increase delusions such as anger or attachment. According to the ten non-virtuous actions, by nature gossip is said to pose the least heavy negative karma. But if one is not mindful, it can end up being the worst as it wastes one's time. Because one may not perceive it to be very severe, one thinks it is OK to gossip. But if in fact one spends most of one's time just gossiping, then this will deprive you of your precious time to engage in other practices. So, while by nature gossiping is said to be the least heavy in negative karma, by doing it habitually we can actually waste our whole life. Furthermore, the advice extends to not engaging in dance or one of the many other kinds of spectacular performances, which would include watching movies etc. Again, such performances can cause delusions to arise in one's mind.

An exception is presented: If there is a purpose or if it is to harmonise with someone one may engage in an action. Here harmonise means 'if it is in accordance with someone else's wishes'. For example if someone said 'Please come to the movies with me. You definitely have to come with me', if you had a choice you would not go because you wouldn't want to waste your time. However, in order to please the other, and not to go against their wishes, you may find yourself sometimes having to comply and say, 'OK, I will go with you'. In situations like this, the advice is to do so without strong attachment—one should abandon attachment to the action.

There are certain categories within the Vinaya vows which are forbidden actions, but which are, under certain circumstances, permitted. For example, singing is actually a forbidden action for ordained Sangha because it can create attachment and distraction. However, if it seems necessary to sing to benefit others, then under those circumstances it is permitted. There are also other categories of actions which a Sangha member maybe permitted to engage in, if it is for the sole purpose of benefiting others. This shows the great kindness of the Buddha in presenting the vows in a way where, under certain circumstances, if it is beneficial to sentient beings, the actions are allowed. In summary, we can see how meticulously the Buddha presented vows which say: 'avoid such actions normally but if there is a benefit for others then you can engage in it'.

1.3.1.2.1.2. Abandon meaningless activities

The next verse provides advice on how to conduct appropriate physical actions.

The verse reads:

46. *Meaningless digging, cutting of grass,
And drawing in dirt: if one does these,
Upon remembering the trainings of the Tathagata,
Out of fear, abandon them immediately.*

As Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Even if one is not a bhikhu, when one is engaged in meaningless activities such as digging, cutting grass, drawing in the dirt etc., then one should remember the trainings of the Tathagata and, being afraid of the shortcomings of one's actions, stop them right there.

The definitions of meaningless activities are contained within the vows of a fully ordained monk, and they are not to engage in them. For example, digging, cutting grass and drawing in the dirt. However, the commentary indicates that even if you are not a bhikhu or a fully ordained monk—not all bodhisattva trainees are ordained—you should also avoid engaging in meaningless activities such as digging, cutting grass or drawing in the dirt. By remembering why the Buddha actually presented these activities as needing to be avoided, and being afraid of the shortcomings of one's actions, one needs to refrain from such activities. Activities are meaningless not just because they don't have any specific purpose. Some can harm other beings, such as cutting grass. At certain times of the year there are lots of bugs on the grass so by cutting grass, you would actually harm the lives of many insects.

1.3.1.2.1.3. Analysing the motivation at the time of the action

Similar advice was presented earlier. Basically, whatever action one engages in, really check and investigate one's motivation for engaging in the activity first.

This point has three subdivisions:

- 1.3.1.2.1.3.1. Showing
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2. Explaining
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.4. Summary

1.3.1.2.1.3.1. Showing

The verse reads:

47 *If you wish to move
Or wish to speak
First analyse your mind
And then be smart through steadfastness.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

At the time when one wishes to move one's body or wishes to speak, one should first investigate one's mind to make sure it has not fallen under the control of the afflictions or self-cherishing, and then engage accordingly in what has to be practiced and what has to be abandoned.

While the explanation is quite clear, the commentary further explains that at all times when one wishes to move one's body, or wishes to speak (i.e. any physical or verbal actions), one should first check one's state of mind to ensure that it is not influenced by delusions, particularly the self-cherishing mind. Then when one is sure that it is not influenced by any of these negative states of mind, one can engage in the action according to what is to be practised, and what is to be abandoned.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2. Explaining

This is subdivided into five categories:

- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2.1. What to do when one wishes to generate afflictions
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2.2. What to do at the time of mental excitement
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2.3. What to do at the time of praise and so forth
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2.4. What to do when one thinks about the welfare of others
- 1.3.1.2.1.3.2.5. What to do when one wishes to generate anger or sadness

If there is a wish for anger to be generated, or if sadness occurs, then what can we do at that time? We can notice the manner of how to conduct oneself in such circumstances will be presented very meticulously and succinctly. So we can leave the explanations for our next session.

I would like to thank those who organised the lunch for His Holiness' birthday last Sunday again. Everyone really enjoyed and appreciated the lunch, and I feel that our requesting prayers for His Holiness' long life was fruitful. So, our efforts have been really worthwhile. On a personal note, that night I had a very auspicious dream with His Holiness. His Holiness was present at an offering ceremony, so after some conversations I took the initiative to go up to him to offer a khatag, but he indicated that it was not necessary. He then proceeded to consecrate a big jug full of inner-offering nectar, and afterwards indicated that I could have some. When I presented a small container in which I normally keep my inner-offering, he commented 'Oh, that is such a small container, while my jug is really big'. However, when he poured some nectar into my small container, miraculously a really tiny flow of nectar came down to fill my container just to the brim.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱུང་རྒྱུ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

15 July 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation.

[meditation]

Generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all mother sentient beings, I need to achieve enlightenment. So for that purpose I will listen to the teaching and put it into practice well.

1.3.1.2.1. Protecting the training of the body from degeneration

1.3.1.2.1.3. Analysing the motivation at the time of the action (cont.)

1.3.1.2.1.3.2. Explaining

This has five sub-divisions which we listed last week.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2.1. What to do when one wishes to generate afflictions

This heading refers to the actions to take when afflictions are about to be generated. The relevant verse reads:

48. *When one's mind wants to be attached
Or when it wants to be angry
Do not move and do not speak,
Abide like a tree.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary on the verse is quite clear:

When the mind wishes to get attached or wishes to become angry, do not engage in a physical action and do not speak. Rather, abide like a tree and be able to hold the antidote.

As the commentary explains, the moment the mind generates that thought of attachment or anger, one should avoid engaging in any physical or verbal actions. Rather, as the analogy explains, one should abide like a tree. The analogy is referring to a big tree, which cannot be moved by gusts of wind. Thus, one needs to remain unshakeable like a tree, being able to hold the antidote in the face of afflictions arising in the mind, not engaging in anything but remaining firm and stable.

The analogy of remaining unshakeable like a tree refers particularly to the times when afflictions such as attachment and anger are prevalent. One knows from one's own experience that when strong attachment or anger are prevalent any physical actions will be inappropriate actions. So at those times one's actions could not be virtuous actions. This is obviously the case with anger. We all know that any physical actions during a moment of anger cannot be a constructive or virtuous one. Likewise, we all know through experience that when our mind is influenced by strong anger our speech will not be appropriate. Likewise, any words uttered when strong attachment is arising will be flawed and inappropriate, and not virtuous speech. So, as presented here, the moment one notices the afflictions arising one should remain firm and steady, and temporarily not engage in any activity.

This is really very practical and personal advice that we need to take on board. From our own experiences, we know that whenever we have acted out of moments of intense anger our physical actions have not been appropriate; likewise, our speech has been hurtful and inappropriate. The consequence of acting either physically or verbally in moments of intense anger is clearly undesirable, and we can all easily relate to that. It may be a little bit harder for you to accept and understand that physical actions and verbal speech in moments of intense attachment are also inappropriate. Nevertheless the fact remains that when one acts out of strong attachment those actions also become tainted and faulty.

However, as indicated previously, some of the advice about avoiding some inappropriate actions out of attachment is intended for those who have ordination vows. So you also need to understand this advice in its proper context.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2.2. What to do at the time of mental excitement

The verses relating to this heading read:

49. *Having mental excitement or mocking,
Having pride or conceit,
Or thinking about criticising,
Being cunning or thinking about deceit,*
50. *When being ready to praise oneself
And belittle others,
Telling others off or being argumentative,
Then one should remain like a tree.*

[The English commentary we have presents the following explanation in point form, although it reads as straight text in the Tibetan version.]

- When there is mental excitement with an object;
- When mocking others in jest;
- When full of pride due to qualities;
- When being conceited due to youth and other reasons;
- When thinking about criticising others;
- When one is cunning, and wants profit out of discontentment;
- When one thinks about deceiving others with pretension and dishonesty;
- When one praises oneself wholeheartedly by expressing one's qualities, and puts others down by mentioning their faults;
- When scolding others and being argumentative and quarrelling.

At these times one should remain unshakeable like a tree while being self-supporting with the antidote.

First is mental excitement with an object. You will recall that one of the main obstacles during meditation is excitement, which is when the mind waivers away from the meditation object and starts to focus on another object. Thus, diverting one's focus from the object of meditation to another object is called excitement.

Next is mocking others in jest. This refers to ridiculing someone for the amusement of others. Putting down someone else in this form is a fault. Again we are being given practical advice about what to avoid.

Third is how to counteract pride due to being puffed up about certain qualities one may have. Such pride manifests itself in the form of feeling pompous, thinking 'I know better than others. I have more knowledge than they do'. With an attitude like that, one is putting down others while making oneself seem more important. We have discussed this delusion in detail in the past.

As mentioned previously, we should be really careful that whatever knowledge we gain from the Dharma, or from the teachings we study, does not become a cause to further strengthen one's pride. One needs to remember that all of the Buddha's teachings were intended to overcome pride, and not strengthen it. Bearing that in mind, if one is feeling a bit pompous about knowing more than others, and has the tendency to look down upon others, one should immediately remember that the purpose of having knowledge of the Dharma is to overcome one's own pride.

We need to take these verses as personal advice, remembering that Shantideva is giving this kind of advice for our benefit. When excitement occurs we can remember his advice to apply an antidote for overcoming excitement. If one finds oneself mocking or making fun of others, one should again remember, 'Shantideva has cautioned me against this negative tendency, so I need to counteract it'. And it is the same with pride and so forth.

Fourth is when being conceited due to youth and other reasons. [Some translations use the word, haughtiness, for the translation of the Tibetan word gyakpa.]

There are five conditions that can lead to conceit or haughtiness. These are youth, having a good form or physique, wealth, status or a good lineage, and an abundance of hearing.

There is a distinction between haughtiness and pride. When we studied Nagarjuna's *Precious Garland*¹, we went into detail about the different kinds of pride, so we won't go over that again. In relation to the earlier mentioned five conditions i.e. being youthful, having a good physique, having sufficient wealth, being from a good family and having good knowledge, pride is a state of mind that has the tendency to look down upon others because one has these conditions and they don't. Whereas conceit or haughtiness² entails a sense of satisfaction about having these good conditions. So conceit or haughtiness has an element of attachment to one's good conditions and feeling a sense of joy or satisfaction about that.

Nagarjuna also highlighted the significant point that haughtiness is the root of a lack of conscientiousness. Feeling conceit about having these good conditions can lead to a lack of conscientiousness about one's Dharma practice. Nagarjuna supported this significant point with a quote from the sutras.

The sense of conceit in relation to an abundance of hearing refers to the knowledge one may have gained from hearing, which can lead to thinking 'I have a significant amount of knowledge now'. In relation to wealth, there is both material wealth and the wealth of knowledge. So here it refers to being conceited about the wealth of knowledge one has. One must be wary about that.

So we can clearly see how being conceited over having these five conditions is related to attachment. It is because of strong attachment to these favourable conditions that one generates that sense of conceit about having obtained them. Hence the teachings say that conceit fits into the realm of attachment.

Fifth is thinking about criticising others. This may easily come about when we are dealing with others, so we need to be very mindful about that.

Next is when one is cunning and wants profit out of discontentment. This refers to being discontented and because of that discontentment seeking to profit from others. The advice here is to apply an antidote to overcome and counteract that discontentment, which basically means practising less desire and more contentment. As I mention regularly, I can personally vouch for the fact that anyone who practises less desire and has more contentment will not have any real worries. The person who practises having less desire and contentment is the person who has no worries!

This is really the prime practice for ordained Sangha. As His Holiness the Dalai Lama has indicated, monks from other traditions such as Christianity definitely adopt this practice, and show clear signs of their success with it.

If there is no contentment with whatever wealth one has, then that will naturally give rise to worry, being constantly anxious and wanting to acquire more profit and more gain. When one practises contentment with whatever one has, the mind will naturally be more subdued, and definitely less anxious. However, practising contentment needs to be understood in the proper way. It doesn't necessarily mean to avoid having possessions and wealth entirely, and that one should give away everything. Practising poverty and having nothing is not necessarily practising contentment.

The real meaning of practising contentment is to have less attachment to one's wealth and so forth. The main thing one needs to understand here is that being content, or not, is a mental state related to attachment to one's wealth.

Indeed, without strong attachment one can actually utilise one's wealth to better one's conditions, and really enjoy them. With strong attachment, on the other hand, there's always that thought of, 'oh I am spending too much!' so there is always that sense of unease. Despite using one's wealth in trying to improve one's conditions, there is always a little bit of unease. However, although such miserliness has many faults, one of its qualities could be that it does contribute to saving money.

Geshe-la speaks in English: People save money but not happy. Same job, same money, but always 'I no get money ... I no get money, I no get job... Money is hidden away.

There are similar stories among the Tibetans about people having hidden money somewhere!

Seventh is when one thinks about deceiving others with pretention and dishonesty. As the teachings explain, the two ways to deceive others are pretence and dishonesty. Pretence refers to pretending that one actually has certain qualities in order to impress others, when in fact one lacks those qualities. Dishonesty is trying to hide one's faults, so that one is not seen in a bad light by others. As I regularly emphasise, one needs to be really mindful of the danger that one's own Dharma practices, such as meditation and so forth, don't become a means for pretence and dishonesty.

Next is praising oneself wholeheartedly by expressing one's qualities, and putting others down by mentioning their faults. This immoral practice is a breach of one of the bodhisattvas' commitments, and counted as one of the downfalls. We need to really take this to heart and see how easily our actions can become tainted with our views about our qualities. Whenever one talks about one's practice, one needs to be constantly mindful that one is not boasting about it. We must also be just as mindful about not putting others down.

² See teaching of 19 June 2012

There's a particular word in Tibetan kurdep, which has the connotation of uttering things that are not true, such as proclaiming that one has qualities when one does not have them. Another example of an untrue proclamation is to hide the qualities of others, ridiculing and finding fault in them.

Lastly, scolding others and being argumentative and quarrelling.

Gyaltsab Je concludes his commentary on this section of the text with:

At these times one should remain unshakeable like a tree, while being self-supporting with the antidotes

With respect to at these times, it is said that whenever one finds oneself engaging in one of these eight activities, then, in order to counteract them, one should remain firm and stable like a tree, while applying the self-supporting antidotes. Then one will not be influenced by these negative tendencies, and one will be able to remain steadfast.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2.3. What to do at the time of praise and so forth

The verse relating to this heading is:

51. *When wishing for gain, honour and fame
Wishing for servants and entourage,
If one's mind wishes for service,
At these times remain like a tree.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

- When wishing for gain of wealth and so forth.
- When seeking the honour for others to put down one's mat and so forth.
- Wishing for a good reputation.
- Wishing to acquire servants and entourage.
- If one's mind wishes for service such as treatments for the body and so forth.

Also at these times one should remain like a tree, while having the power of the antidote.

This is a clear presentation of what to do about wishes such as wanting material gain such as wealth and so forth. The Tibetan word kurte can read as either honour or service, indicated here with the example of others putting down one's mat and so forth. One might also wish for a good reputation so that others talk well about one and so forth, or to acquire servants and entourage.

Wishing for service such as treatments for the body and so forth includes massages and so forth. The advice here is to avoid seeking such treatments merely out of attachment. The Vinaya text indicates that with some physical ailments it is necessary to apply oil to the body and to massage it in order to restore one's vitality, in which case it is permissible and accepted. This advice also needs to be understood in its proper context.

We need to take this as practical advice. If one completely immerses oneself in wishing for gain or wealth, seeking honour and a good reputation and so forth, then one's whole life can be preoccupied with trying to achieve this. We can spend a whole lifetime being completely immersed just thinking about how to gain these things. We may not actually put much effort into really doing anything practical to achieve our wishes, but we just go around thinking about it over and over again. That sort of daydreaming can be a distraction that wastes your life. So the advice here is to remain like a tree, referring back to the earlier analogy of an unshakeable tree, while having the power of the antidote.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2.4. What to do when one thinks about the welfare of others

The verse relating to this is:

52. *When casting aside the welfare of others,
And desiring one's selfish aims,
And having a mind wishing to speak,
At these times remain like a tree.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

When one considers the welfare of self and others, ...

This refers to the bodhisattva training, the aspiration to benefit others. Having made that aspiration,

... if one casts aside the welfare of others, wishes to work only for one's own welfare, and has a mind wishing to speak, such a person should remain like a tree.

If one casts aside the welfare of others, and wishes to work only for one's own welfare, at that time if one has a mind wishing to speak, then it is better not to speak or act. Such a person should remain like a tree.

When someone who is committed to working for the welfare of others actually casts aside the welfare of others then that is, without doubt, a grave fault. While that aspiration to benefit others remains in one's mind, if the wish to work only for one's own welfare occurs, then whatever one says will be tainted with a desire to gain something for oneself. Thus, whatever words one utters will not have the effect of benefitting others. Therefore the advice here is that when one has selfish motives, or is thinking about only one's own welfare, then it is better not to speak and remain like a tree.

From the perspective of an ordinary person, the normal way of thinking is to cast aside the welfare of others and think only about one's own welfare. So this is what one needs to avoid. If we really think about how we normally conduct ourselves, and do a thorough self-evaluation of how we normally think, it will become quite apparent that we neglect others by default, because we think only about our own achievements and accomplishments. This is only apparent when we actually stop to think about it. This is how we begin to transform ourselves, noticing how our normal habituated mind thinks. Understanding that leaves room for real transformation, and then we can actually change.

1.3.1.2.1.3.2.5. What to do when one wishes to generate belligerence or despondency

The verse relating to that is as follows:

53. *When being impatient, lazy and afraid,
Likewise, when stubbornness, incoherence
And a partisan attitude arise,
At these times remain like a tree.*

This section relates counteracting belligerence and despondency when they occur.

The commentary reads:

- When being impatient due to belligerence or suffering;
- When being afraid of practising virtue and so forth, due to laziness that is not joyful about virtue;
- When one is stubborn because of being unrestrained or incoherent;
- When the mind favours one's own side, friends and so forth.

At these times one should remain like a tree while practising the antidote.

In Tibetan the words for anger and belligerence are similar. As presented previously, belligerence is one of the secondary mental factors. As you will recall, there is a difference between anger and belligerence. Anger is one of the root afflictions, while belligerence is listed as a proximate or secondary affliction. When anger targeted towards a living being becomes more intense, it then turns into belligerence. So belligerence is a more intense form of anger.

The object of belligerence, as presented previously, is an animate object, not inanimate objects, whereas anger can be focussed on any object. There are the three types of objects of anger: suffering, sentient beings and inanimate objects. You can generate anger towards all three objects, whereas belligerence is targeted only towards living beings.

Thus the first situation is being impatient due to belligerence or suffering.

Next is being afraid of practising virtue and so forth due to laziness that is not joyful about virtue. When the mind is in a heightened state, one is more prone to feeling belligerent. When the mind is feeling despondent then that is when laziness occurs. Therefore, as presented here in the commentary, being impatient due to belligerence or suffering, and being afraid of practising virtue and so forth due to laziness that is not joyful about virtue are at the opposite ends of the spectrum. At one end, if one's mind is feeling very heightened, then it is more likely that belligerence will arise, and at the other, laziness can occur when the mind is feeling despondent.

In relation to feeling despondent with a sense of, 'I can't do it, I can't manage', on a recent visit to the Drolkar centre, Carol came up to me and conveyed, 'I don't really have a strong inclination to go to the Kalachakra. I feel hesitant to taking a lot of commitments. If I am not able to observe them, then that will be a cause for me to go to the lower realms and I wouldn't wish that for myself. I would rather stay here with you Geshe Doga and be on a safer plain'. She was teary when she relayed that to me.

However she had already organised to travel with Geshe Sonam, who was encouraging her to go. Of course I wouldn't stop Carol from going—after all, she had decided to go anyway. Therefore I encouraged her to go and receive the blessing 'and take on as much as you can do'. However, her intention of taking the commitments seriously was a good sign.

Carol was expressing her hesitation even in taking the lay-person's vows, saying that 'I might not be able to keep them'. Of course, the way to take vows is to first establish the basis by taking the self-liberation vows. Then based on that, one can take the bodhisattva vows and later the tantric vows. That is the sequence of how one takes these vows.

The next situation is when one is stubborn because of being unrestrained or incoherent. The Tibetan term chetol has the connotation of someone who is not able to really think things out clearly, and just does things randomly. It is used to refer to someone who doesn't really have many values, and who does anything they want. Even in the everyday world such a person would not be considered as reliable or trustworthy, because they just do whatever they want. Incoherence refers to the lack of a relationship between what is said earlier and what is said later.

The final example is when the mind favours one's own side, friends and so forth, which means to favour taking the side of one's friends and colleagues and so forth, and abandoning all others.

In summary, the commentary states:

At these times one should remain like a tree, while practising the antidote.

1.3.1.2.1.2.4. Summary

The verse relating to the summary reads as follows:

54. *Having thus analysed the strong afflictions
And the mind striving in meaninglessness,
The brave person will then guard
The mind steadfastly with antidotes.*

Here Gyaltsab Je explains:

Thus, having investigated the mind that strives in the afflictions and meaninglessness, one should not allow this mind to engage in negative actions with the antidote that is like a powerful hero, but keep it steady.

Having presented all of the conditions where one needs to practice applying the antidotes appropriately, and having investigated the mind that wishes to engage in the afflictions and meaningless activities, one should not allow this mind to engage in negative actions with the antidote that is like a powerful hero. Here, the antidote is likened to a very powerful person, who is not easily overcome by foes and so forth. One applies powerful antidotes against the delusions or afflictions and thus keeps it steady.

This summary verse encapsulates all of the earlier points about afflictions, and summarises how to actually apply the antidotes.

At the conclusion of our regular prayers, we can do the Eight Verses of Mind Training which we also did last week. Mary-Lou's father passed away yesterday, so we can dedicate the practice for her late dad.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྡོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བལྟགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

22 July 2014

Based on the refuge and bodhicitta we have generated as a motivation for the practice we can now engage in the meditation.

[meditation]

We can set the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines: for the purpose of benefiting all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will engage in this teaching and put it into practice well.

At this point please remember the verses we covered in our last session. Recall how meticulously that advice was presented and how really applicable it is to our daily situation. It is very important to keep that essential meaning in mind.

1.3.1.2.2. Protecting the training of the mind from degeneration

This is subdivided into three:

1.3.1.2.2.1. Protecting with the individual antidotes

1.3.1.2.2.2. The common antidote

1.3.1.2.2.3. The way of training in meditating on the antidote

1.3.1.2.2.1. Protecting with the individual antidotes

The verse reads as follows:

55. *Strong ascertainment and strong faith
Stability, respect and politeness,
Knowing shame and having fear,
Peaceful and striving to please others.*

There are two verses under this heading. Gyaltsab Je's commentary addresses verse 55 first. It reads:

If one were to ask 'how does one protect the mind'? Strongly ascertain the points of advice by abandoning doubt and wrong consciousnesses with regards to them; generate strong faith through belief in the Three Jewels and the points of advice, faith and aspiration; stable intent and practice; being polite by being respectful and humble with everybody; shame that is fearful of negativity by reason of oneself; being afraid of the ripened result by contemplating the shortcomings; having pacified senses and striving for the purpose of making others happy.

The five senses are normally engaged in objects of distraction, so to protect the mind is to protect it from being completely drawn into the objects of distraction through the five senses. Take note of the distinction between protection and restraint. The very term 'protection' infers that in the likelihood of the mind becoming distracted, it should withdraw from the object of distraction (withdrawal implying protection of the mind). However 'restraint', suggests not allowing the mind to become distracted with the objects of distraction from the very beginning.

The emphasis here is to protect the training of the mind from degeneration. If one does not protect the mind it is likely that degeneration from one's training or practices would occur. The heading of the verse is explicit here: 'Protecting with individual antidotes'. In relation to the degeneration that occurs in the mind, the cause is distraction through the five senses. Primarily we need to be cautious of our eye sense, mental sense, the mind itself which generates thoughts, and the ear sense. As you can notice, these cause most distractions.

Our thoughts present distraction on a more continuous basis as the object of our mental faculty. One must be cautious and protect the mental faculty from engaging in distracting, discursive thoughts, because they can occur randomly at any time. The next main distraction comes through our eye sense, and because there are so many external objects, we naturally become influenced by them. Likewise we hear a lot of things through our ear sense, and are very easily influenced by them, and thus become distracted.

Indeed when the eye sense comes into contact with beautiful objects it causes the mind of attachment to arise. Conversely, when it comes into contact with unappealing visual objects, anger arises. Likewise jealousy can arise when we see with our eyes the prosperity and good things others have. It is similar with objects of the ear sense; when we hear praise etc. this easily provides the means for attachment and ego to arise. However when we hear unpleasant things, these can immediately cause distress, agitation and anger to arise in our mind. So we do know from experience that a lot of our emotions, particularly the delusions in our mind, are very much influenced by the objects we encounter through our senses.

Again, protection here means being able to withdraw our mind from our engagement with objects as soon as we notice distraction occurs. Protection is really important for us because we are easily influenced by our senses. Our eye sense sees a beautiful object and then grasping starts to develop. It is this grasping at beautiful objects that causes attachment to increase in our mind. That in turn can cause the sense of wanting to own or to possess the object, and if one is not able to possess it, distress arises in the mind due to strong grasping. As the term itself suggests, grasping is holding onto, and not being able to let go of certain objects, whether they be objects of attachment or objects of anger. When we come into contact with certain objects we immediately grasp onto them and don't let go, which causes the delusions in our mind to become intense and strong.

Whether it is our eye sense or other senses that come into contact with objects of distraction, if we protect our mind by not interacting with them, then the delusion and its consequences will not arise strongly and affect us in a negative way. So, we must sever the connection with that object. While this specifically applies in our meditation session, it also relates to our everyday life.

In explaining how to protect the mind the commentary says: Strongly ascertain the points of advice. Advice here means upholding the commitments or vows one may have taken. In relation to the practices, we need to apply the measures explained forcefully. If we do not protect our mind we will degenerate or lapse from the commitments and pledges we have taken and thus fail to engage in the advice or the practice. The commentary continues: by abandoning doubt and wrong consciousnesses with regards to them. This very clearly states that one needs to abandon doubt and the wrong consciousnesses which come to wrong conclusions about this advice. The way to do this is to engage in thorough investigation, gain a thorough understanding of the practices in the beginning, during the actual practice and at the end. You need to investigate and understand at all three times to remove doubts and wrong consciousnesses (leading to mistaken understanding or conclusions) in relation to this advice.

Abandoning doubt refers to abandoning the mind that wavers in two directions. In this state one cannot confirm anything and one is unable to gain the necessary conviction.

In relation to the advice and instructions to be followed, if we have qualms about it, if we start to hesitate or become influenced by other possibilities that are maybe not valid and so forth, then as soon as this doubt arises in the mind, we are very vulnerable to giving up the practices or allowing them to degenerate. As mentioned earlier, thorough investigation needs to be employed to completely remove any doubt. This first requires hearing about the advice extensively, then we use the wisdom and understanding gained from hearing to contemplate or investigate what we have heard. Having thoroughly investigated and thought about it, we can apply the meditation, and once experience is gained from this, a firm conviction develops in the validity of the practices such that it will not degenerate.

This is how an intelligent trainee engages in the study of the practices: thorough investigation and analysis, again and again, then conviction is established. Engaging in one's practice then becomes very firm and stable. This is why the method employed by intelligent trainees is said to be the most suitable.

The commentary then explains: generate strong faith through belief in the Three Jewels and the points of advice. Generating strong faith in the Three Jewels indicates gaining an understanding that the Three Jewels are infallible in protecting you, thus they are suitable as your refuge and will not deceive you. The method of gaining conviction in the Three Jewels arises first from investigating the Dharma Jewel and understanding its qualities. When you develop a good understanding and see the qualities of the Dharma Jewel, you can then naturally generate admiration, faith and conviction in the one who taught it, which is the Buddha Jewel. Then having developed faith in the Buddha and Dharma Jewel, since the ones who follow these are the Sangha Jewels you naturally develop faith in them as well. This is how one generates conviction in the Three Jewels.

One needs to have strong faith and aspiration in the Three Jewels and the points of advice, and stable intent, which means developing a firm and stable intention toward the practices and advice. Furthermore, one needs to adopt a conduct where one is polite by being respectful and humble with everybody. These are all methods to protect one's training and adopt the advice.

Continuing with the commentary's explanation, the next part expands upon engaging in the practice by maintaining shame that is fearful (afraid of committing) negativity by reason of oneself. Shame was explained earlier. The commentary continues with: being afraid of the ripened result by contemplating the shortcomings, which refers to being afraid of the ripened results of the negativities by contemplating their shortcomings. It continues: having pacified senses and striving for the purpose of making others happy. A bodhisattva has intention only to benefit others, so for the purpose of benefitting others needs to engage in conduct which will inspire them, not cause them to lose faith or be critical etc. If a bodhisattva were to cause others to lose faith in the Dharma, or feel critical towards them that would cause the others to create huge negative karma. So, as a means to protect others from the negative mind of losing faith or criticising a bodhisattva, a bodhisattva needs to ensure that they are engaging in the means and conduct of making others happy.

When others are made happy with your good conduct then there is no reason for them to criticise you, because they are happy and inspired with what you are doing, your behaviour etc. This is a very important point to take as personal instruction: when we have the means to make others happy, which we all do, why would we intentionally engage in behaviours and conduct that would make them unhappy? It would be totally inappropriate to intentionally engage in the means to make others unhappy or cause unnecessary discomfort and sorrow in their minds. This behaviour will make others unhappy with you, criticise you etc. Therefore, taking this on a personal level, we need to try to employ means for making others happy in all situations.

The next verse under this same heading:

56. *Do not be put off by the desires
Of the childish that strive with each other
And think with affection, "They have these minds
Due to their generation of afflictions."*

Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

Do not be put off by the contradicting desires of childish people where, having benefitted one, the other one gets angry. Have compassion for them thinking, 'this mind is generated within them due to afflictions and without them having any control over themselves. I will liberate them from their afflictions.'

In such a way do not fall under the control of the afflictions.

Again this is relevant advice for us in our daily lives as these sorts of occasions occur quite regularly. When in the commentary it explains, do not be put off by contradicting desires of childish people where, having benefitted one, the other one gets angry, relate it to when you take the measure of being kind to someone, then even without an intention to hurt them, the others get upset. We can see this happening readily in a circle of relatives: if you are nice to one relative then another might start feeling jealous about that and may start to complain.

In relation to beings who act childishly towards you, the advice says not to be put off by their behaviour. 'Put off' here means you should not be put off the intent of benefiting them nor generate a negative mind towards them. Instead you should have compassion towards them, thinking that this mind is generated within them due to afflictions and without them having any control over themselves. You can see the advice here is very true; that when certain beings are under the influence of the delusions e.g. intense anger, even one individual can create so much destruction and kill so many others out of an angry mind. We have examples right here. In Tasmania an individual killed 32 people, and in another coastal place again some other killings occurred, and many people were killed. This was done by one individual—out of his mind, the cause was being obsessed, or completely dominated by delusions such as anger. When we witness this sort of account our natural response might be to become appalled, condemn the person and become angry with them. But in fact when one thinks about what compelled them to engage in such grave negative acts, it is none other than the delusion in their own mind, mainly anger. And when one contemplates that, one sees reason to feel great compassion for them rather than condemning them, seeing how under the influence of the delusion they have no control over their own actions.

We can see too that there are certain individuals who, if they are at a trial say, 'I was given the order to kill so I had no control'. These are examples of how when one engages in negative actions such as the act of killing etc., one does not have control over oneself. Normally we would think that someone is independent and has control over whatever they want to do. If they had control they would not commit the act, but the implication of having no control over their actions is that they are compelled to do that act. Normally we would feel reason to condemn them if we thought they had control, like they had a choice and did it anyway, but the implication here is to feel compassion for them because they have no choice and control over their own actions. That is the main point.

With this understanding one should find oneself resolving to liberate them from their afflictions, rather than condemning them and becoming agitated with them. In understanding such situations, the next piece of advice says: 'In such a way do not fall under the control of the afflictions' oneself. So when relating to others who have engaged in great misdeeds, one needs to protect oneself from the influence of the afflictions. If one doesn't protect oneself then we fall short and become agitated and angry towards the other. So therefore this is a direct instruction for oneself to be responsible for one's own state of mind.

In order to back up this explanation of how one needs to practice in such a way, the commentary presents a citation:

From the Ornament of Mahayana Sutras,

By thinking how they are without power due to constant faults,
Possessing the mind, do not hold it against beings.

As clearly presented in this quote, when someone is afflicted by the faults or the delusions, they don't have the power to control what they do. Thus, one should not hold their negative actions against them. It is really important to understand how every action one engages in, be it positive or negative, there is always a state of mind that compels one to engage in those actions.

The commentary then cites another text.

From the Four Hundred Verses:

Just as a physician is not upset with,
Someone who rages while possessed by a demon,
Subduers see disturbing emotions as the enemy,
Not the person who has them.

The verse from the Four Hundred Verses clearly explains with the analogy of a physician. A physician will not be upset with someone who is possessed by, for example, a demon, because when someone is possessed they might do things which a normal, rational person would not do, such as fighting back, doing wild things like hitting etc. However the physician knows they are affected by their ailments and will not be upset, rather they will be intent on treating them. Likewise the buddhas see disturbing emotions as the enemy. They do not consider the person who has anger as negative, rather it is the afflictions within them that need to be overcome. That is because it is the afflictions in the mind that cause them to engage in actions which are harmful.

As I regularly advise, when someone is really angry you should be cautious around them; they might do anything, they might hit you or hurt you because in intense moments of anger they are not able to act rationally. With the recent unfortunate circumstances of the Malaysian Airlines plane being shot down, my comment was, when the plane is in an area where rebels are carrying their weapons with an agitated mind and angry, and just want to kill, then an accident on such a scale can occur. They would not analyse well and would see no reason to not to use their weapons to shoot anything down. This is an example of how we need to be very wary and cautions around people who are really agitated because we might get hurt ourselves. So if your partner is really upset and angry, you must be careful and cautious.

With this unfortunate event of the plane being shot down, why would the aeroplane go in that direction? Why would they take that route when it is so dangerous? Damien was looking at a map and said that it is actually the normal flight path. Even though I wasn't looking at any map, and I didn't exactly know the location, it was my assumption that the plane pathway shouldn't go that far off in the north of Europe. Apparently they are still investigating how it actually might have gone off route. The routes should be the same for Singapore Airlines and Malaysian Airlines.

Anyhow the main point is that when people are agitated and angry they will have no qualms, they will not hold back in using their weapons, and that is when disasters can occur.

1.3.1.2.2.2. The common antidote

What is being referred to here are common antidotes which could be applicable to all afflictions.

The verse reads:

57. *Objects free from the unutterable
Are for self and sentient beings.
Without ego, always protect this mind,
Like an emanation.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

The engagement in virtuous actions, which are free from forbidden and natural misdeeds, is for the purpose of oneself not degenerating and for the benefit of sentient beings. Engage in actions as if they are illusions or magical apparitions by holding them with the wisdom realising emptiness.

Thus always protect your mind without pride or exaggeration.

In The engagement in virtuous actions which are free from forbidden and natural misdeeds, the term used to reflect misdeeds is also translated as 'unutterable' and 'unmentionable'. We'll use 'unmentionable' as it refers to misdeeds of a certain kind where the consequences are so grave that they cannot even be mentioned by the supreme beings, let alone engaged in. We have discussed the forbidden and natural misdeeds earlier. Forbidden misdeeds specifically relates to the misdeeds laid down by decree, and natural misdeeds are negative regardless of context. So engaging in virtuous actions which are free from such misdeeds is done for the purpose of oneself, not to degenerate from that advice etc. and for the benefit of sentient beings. That being the case, the advice here is that one needs to engage in actions while remembering that they are like illusions or like magical apparitions, as a means to prevent the delusions from arising. That is how we need to view things, seeing them as not truly existent, by holding them with the realisation of emptiness, realising that they are empty of inherent existence, then that understanding will prevent strong negative minds of delusions such as anger and attachment etc. from arising. When one has an understanding of how things are not truly existent this serves as an antidote to overcome all afflictions and thus all misdeeds. In this way always protect your mind without pride or arrogance.

As explained in other texts, a being who has a realisation of emptiness during meditative equipoise will view all existence like the sky, empty like space, and when they are in a post-meditative state they will be able to see all phenomena as being like mere illusions. This is how one needs to maintain one's view of phenomena as a way of not being affected by the afflictions in the mind.

1.3.1.2.2.3. The way of training in meditating on the antidote

The verse reads:

*58. Having repeatedly contemplated one's attainment
Of supreme freedom after a long time,
Hold on to that mind
As immovable as Mount Meru.*

Think: After a great accumulation, which lasted for a long time, I have attained the precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments. By contemplating repeatedly the great purpose and rarity of the precious human rebirth, generate the intent to definitely achieve the great purpose. Then firmly hold that mind, as immovable as Mount Meru.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary clearly explains here that having engaged in a great accumulation, incurred over a long period of time, as a result one attains a precious human rebirth with freedoms and endowments. Contemplating on the difficulty of obtaining a precious human rebirth, obtaining something which has been so difficult to obtain, repeatedly contemplating the great purpose and rarity of the precious human rebirth, one generates the intent to definitely achieve the great purpose. One needs to hold this intent firmly in the mind, as immovable as Mount Meru.

The main point of the advice is that one needs to repeatedly contemplate the precious human rebirth one has obtained. One aspect of this advice can be how we should not feel discouraged, even if it takes a long time to accumulate certain merits, the results are definitely achieved. So by relating to the good consequences we have obtained now, it can encourage us to further develop and engage in the practices to gain further good results in the future. This is how we need to maintain a mind which is free from despondency and have a courageous mind to continue with the practices and hold our mind firm and stable.

1.3.2. The way of training in the morality of accumulating virtuous dharmas

This is subdivided into two:

1.3.2.1. Abandoning attachment for the body which is the cause not to train in morality

1.3.2.2. To be skilful in practising virtue

1.3.2.1. ABANDONING ATTACHMENT FOR THE BODY WHICH IS THE CAUSE NOT TO TRAIN IN MORALITY

The meaning of morality here specifically refers to accumulating virtuous Dharma. Generally the definition of morality is the mind which employs restraint; restraint is presented as the definition of morality. However this refers mainly to restraint from a particular misdeed. In relating to this morality, accumulating virtuous Dharma, it is explained specifically in Lam Rim teachings how all virtues of a bodhisattva's conduct encompasses morality. In other words, all virtuous Dharma can be an aid to further enhancing a bodhisattva's morality. In a broader sense, all virtues engaged in by bodhisattvas are said to be morality.

The general definition of morality as the mind of restraint may be more suitable for that: for the morality of restraining from misdeeds.

Under the first subheading there are five subheadings.

We can leave this explanation for the next teaching session.

As you are aware the next session will be the discussion followed by the exam. So as usual it will be good to engage in the discussion with a proper motivation and proper conduct and also the exam as well.

And then also for the seminar which is coming up at the end of next month, you need to have a good discussion amongst yourselves as how to conduct that.

As usual we can spend some time in meditation.
[meditation]

Generate the positive motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

For the sake of all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

1.3.2. The way of training in the morality of accumulating virtuous dharmas

In our last session we identified what the morality of accumulating virtuous dharmas means.

This section of the text has two sub-headings:

1.3.2.1. Abandoning attachment to the body, which is the cause not to train in morality

1.3.2.2. To be skilful in practising virtue

1.3.2.1. ABANDONING ATTACHMENT TO THE BODY, WHICH IS THE CAUSE NOT TO TRAIN IN MORALITY

Here we need to understand that this refers to abandoning attachment to the body, and that it is not suggesting in any way that one should abandon caring for and looking after the body. This distinction will be explained in more detail later on.

What we need to understand here is that attachment to the body needs to be abandoned because it is a cause to prevent one from training in morality. In order to practise morality we need to overcome the obstacles that prevent us from training in morality. Here, the obstacle that needs to be overcome is attachment to the body. This text, as well as other teachings, tells us that the method for abandoning attachment to the body is to contemplate and meditate on the imperfections of the body.

First of all we need to understand how attachment to the body arises. One perceives the body as attractive or appealing, and when that perception is overlaid with attachment, it sees qualities superimposed on the body, which make it more appealing than it actually is.

We have presented this distinction many times in the past. If the question is whether there are some appealing features of the body, then of course the body does have attractive and appealing features. However the mind of attachment exaggerates those qualities and then superimposes those exaggerated qualities on the perception of the body. So the perception goes beyond the limits of the reality, and one becomes attached to the body. Hence we need to overcome the wrong perception that exaggerates the qualities of the body by focussing on its natural imperfections.

We need to reflect on the shortcomings of being attached to the body, because it can lead to a lot of unethical behaviour. Thus, being overly attached to the body causes one to not practise morality. While this section presents the impurities of the body and how to overcome attachment, more detailed explanations will be given in the eighth chapter on concentration.

We have a very strong sense of cherishing our body due to our attachment to it, and the stronger the sense of cherishing and clinging to the body, the more likely it is that we will experience the shortcomings of this attachment. So training our mind in overcoming strong attachment to the body will reduce our clinging to and cherishing of the body, which will definitely have a significant impact on our practice, particularly at the time of death.

It is possible to experience great agony and suffering at the time of death—not so much on the physical level but mental suffering. Therefore, if we train our mind now so that we don't have strong attachment to the body, then that will really help at the time of death. Even though there might be some physical discomfort, there will definitely be less mental agony, because of our mental training and practice of reducing attachment to the body. Then one will not experience the intense sufferings of being separated from one's body.

As mentioned in the teachings, by training now to reduce strong attachment and cherishing of the body, at best one will experience great joy in discarding this body and moving on to the next existence. That of course occurs at the highest levels of this practice. But even at our level, if we can secure a mind where at least we have no regrets at the time of death, then that would be a significant achievement. These are really important points for us to consider—if we practise now we will definitely reap great results later on.

To the extent that we have trained our mind to reduce attachment to our body, then, at the time of death, fear and anxiety about having to leave the body will not be experienced. Otherwise there can be great suffering at the prospect of having to be separated from one's physical body. Through understanding the Dharma one develops the understanding that naturally the body will be discarded at the time of death, and that what continues on is the individual self, and the mind that accompanies that self or 'I'. Thus, whatever merits and virtues we have accumulated will accompany the mind and self.

Thus, as I emphasise regularly, our real protector is the positive state of mind of virtue, and it is this positive state of mind that will protect us at the time of death. So if at that time we recollect the Three Jewels, thinking about the essence of the Buddha's qualities of love, compassion, and wisdom, then there is no doubt that one will be saved from an unfortunate rebirth in the next lifetime.

We really need to contemplate and understand these essential points. The benefits of doing the tong len (giving and taking) practice now will also be reaped at that most crucial time. If, at the last stages of our life we experience any physical ailment or difficulties, or mental suffering at the prospect of having to discard our body, and we apply the tong len practice, taking in the sufferings of all beings, and giving our virtues and merits to them, then what a wonderful state of mind to be in at that time! That would be the best preparation for our transition to the next life.

As the teachings explain, at that time we leave behind everything that we are familiar with in this life. Our physical body will not protect us at that crucial time; whatever possessions we have will not be able to protect us at that time; even our relatives, close and dear ones will not be able to protect us at that time. The only thing that can help us at that time is, as explained in the teachings, Dharma practice. Therefore we need to identify the essence of the practice that will help us at that time.

This is important not just as preparation for the time of death, but the practice we engage in now will also be a great solace as we age. The best preparation for old age, as well as for the time of death, is to familiarise ourselves with these practices now.

As I regularly emphasise, if we were to boil all the teachings down to their essence, then it is love and compassion. That practice of generating love and compassion and trying to implement it in our daily lives is, as I regularly mention, our unfailing friend and companion, and our real protector. It helps to protect us in this life, it helps and protects us at the time of death, and it will help and protect us in our future lives. In all aspects of our existence—now, at the time of death, and in future lifetimes—kindness, love and compassion are our unfailing friend and protector.

We need to understand that, as the teachings mention, death can occur at any time. We have just heard the news that Robin Williams was found dead this morning. He was someone who brought a lot of laughter and joy to others by being humorous, and was really appreciated by many people. Apparently he was also a nice person too. He was not even very old, just sixty-three, but his life ended suddenly and abruptly. However he definitely had a worthwhile life because he made many people happy. He made people laugh and feel joyful, so he made a really significant contribution to the happiness of others. Even the American president seemed shocked and was struggling with words when he was giving his condolence speech. So, it would be appropriate that we repay Robin William's kindness by doing some prayers for him.

This is a reminder that age does not determine the time of death. The point here is that one cannot hold on to the body forever. Inevitably, we have to discard it. What we need to derive from the advice given here is that while we need to abandon attachment to the body, we still need to protect it and put it to good use by practicing the Dharma. This of course will be explained in more detail later on.

The presentation here is about how to contemplate the natural imperfections of the body. By following these methods of reason and logic one is able to overcome the mind of being overly attached to the body by seeing it as an overly appealing or attractive object.

There are five sub-divisions under this heading:

1.3.2.1.1. An example of why it is unsuitable to be attached to the body

1.3.2.1.2. Meditating on the impurity of the body

1.3.2.1.3. Contemplating the lack of essence of the body

1.3.2.1.4. The reason why it is unsuitable to be attached to the body

1.3.2.1.5. Because the body disintegrates quickly it is suitable to practise virtue

1.3.2.1.1. An example of why it is unsuitable to be attached to the body

*59. Vultures, out of their attachment for flesh,
Push and pull it back and forth amongst them.
If you do not have any dislike then,
Why do you cherish it now?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

When one is dead, although the vultures push and pull the body back and forth amongst them out of attachment to it, if you mind do not generate dislike at that time, then why are you attached to your body and cherish it now? It is unsuitable to be attached.

This explanation is, of course, quite clear. However, to reflect on some of the main points, what is being explained here is that when one is dead, the body becomes food for vultures, who tear it open and pull it around. It becomes quite repulsive, so nothing remains of the body that the mind could be attached to. If that is the case, then 'why do you have strong attachment and cherish your body now?' The conclusion is that it is not suitable to be strongly attached, because the nature of the body is the same as that of a corpse. The impermanence of our body is a really significant point to contemplate.

When we really think about it, the body that we seem so attached to now will, in the end, become a repulsive corpse. Contemplating that now will help to reduce attachment to our body.

Next comes the reason for that attachment, which is presented in these two lines:

*60ab. Having claimed the body as mine
Why mind do you guard it?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Hence, why mind do you guard it, having claimed the body as mine and cherishing it, since much that is unwanted arises from attachment to the body?

As presented here, it is through our strong familiarity with the body as being 'mine' that we have a strong sense of our body as being our prized possession. Amongst all our possessions we consider our body as being the most intimate and cherished possession. We have an instinctive notion of the body as being 'mine', and with that strong attachment the strong sense of clinging to the body arises.

This point is presented in the commentary as a dialogue with one's own mind:

Why mind are you so attached to this body when so many unwanted things arise out of that attachment?

The hypothetical response as presented in the commentary is:

Because I definitely require it.

Of course this response is not unreasonable, because we are attached to our body, and when that is challenged then we might instinctively feel 'but I really do need my body'. The rejoinder to that is contained in the next two lines of verse:

*60cd. Since both of you are distinct
What is it doing for you?*

The commentary presents a very logical point in its explanation of these two lines:

Answer: Since both you and this body are distinct from each other, you will leave this body behind very quickly, and the body will also abandon you. Hence, what is it doing for you? It is unsuitable to hold it as 'mine'.

Here, further reasons as to why it is not suitable to be attached to the body are presented. The fact is that the body and oneself are not the same; at death your mind leaves the body, and when you leave the body behind, it will disintegrate.

Since you will be abandoning the body, and the body will in effect be abandoning you, then what is it doing for you? As one has to eventually discard it, the body gives no real lasting benefit. So it is unsuitable to hold the body with a very strong mind of possession, viewing it as 'mine'. So the point of impermanence is being presented once again. It is inevitable that one will have to be separated from one's body, so reduce strong attachment to the body from now on.

We need to familiarise our mind with these significant points, and incorporate them into our practice.

1.3.1.1.2. Meditating on the impurity of the body

A further means to overcome attachment to the body is to contemplate the natural defects of the body. This particularly relates to attachment to the bodies of others, such as when men are attached to a woman's body or a woman to a man's body. This attachment seems to arise purely by focusing on attractiveness of the body itself. One needs to bear in mind however that it is possible to see the qualities and perfections of the person while also contemplating the natural imperfections of their body, as a way to overcome attachment to that body. In most cases the attachment to a member of the opposite sex seems mostly related to the appearance of their body. Some even make comments such as 'they don't really love me, they just like my body'. This can be very true! In this case there is no real concern about the individual, just attraction to the appearance of their body.

In this context one needs to understand that while one overcomes attachment to the body by seeing its natural defects and impurities, that does not in any way undermine seeing the person themselves as being warm-hearted and appealing, and feeling love and compassion for them. So here the training is to reduce attachment to the body, whilst still cherishing the person. This is important to understand.

As I regularly relate, when two people come together and wish to live together, their initial reason may well be out of attachment. In fact, it is attachment that causes the initial attraction to one another and then a feeling of fondness for each other develops. Having decided to live together in a committed relationship, if they start to practise genuine love and compassion for each other, then this is the key to a genuine relationship.

Even in the event that attachment for each other ceases or differences in opinions arise, and a couple consider to live separately, if genuine love and compassion was practised mutually, then a good relationship can still be maintained. While the intimate physical relationship ceases, they can still have a mutual fondness for each other. In fact, some have confided in me that their relationship had improved after separation took place and they were better friends.

As lay Dharma practitioners, you really need to take this important point into consideration. When you have a relationship with another you really need to go beyond mutual attraction and attachment, and develop a genuine sense of love and compassion for each other. That will then be a significant relationship.

These are really important points that you need to take into consideration. As many of you are in committed relationships it is really important to have a genuine harmonious relationship with your partners. If, as mentioned previously, one takes initiative to really base the relationship on genuine concern, love and compassion for each other, then that will definitely contribute to less arguments, and fewer reasons to become angry and upset with one another. The fewer the occasions of anger, the more it helps to protect the virtue in one's mind. A relationship maintained with a virtuous frame of mind, where one does not have to become angry, argue, bicker and so forth, will be a worthwhile relationship.

[Geshe Doga says in English, 'If I'm happy, with love and kindness, then angry less and argue less. Together less angry, then more happy! More angry, more arguments, then lose all happiness'.]

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section with a hypothetical argument:

Argument: It is unsuitable to give it up because I have held it to me as 'mine' for a long time.

The argument is that it is unsuitable to give the body up because it has been 'mine' for a long time. This is another significant point. Because we have had this body for as long as we remember, it is our prized possession. So giving up our body seems to be quite unthinkable. It's hard to even contemplate that one can give up attachment to the body.

61. *Deluded mind, why do you
Not grasp at the clean form of wood?
This machine that is an accumulation of filth,
These bones, to guard this now, how is it appropriate?*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Answer: If you, the deluded mind that holds that which lacks a self as having a self, holds the impure as 'mine' then why do you not hold a clean piece of wood as 'I' as well?

Instead you guard this machine, which is an accumulation of filth and bones. How can this be suitable?

It is unsuitable to be attached.

The point here is that it is a deluded mind that holds something that lacks a self as having a self. Similarly, it is also a deluded mind that holds something as pure when in fact it is impure. So if the mind were to hold something that is impure by nature as pure or clean, then why do you not hold a clean piece of wood as 'I' as well? This is the significant point being made here.

Then as further explained, instead you guard this machine of the body, which is an accumulation of filth and bones. How can this be suitable? This implies that it is not suitable.

Our bodies are, in effect, like a machine that produces filth. We can understand this when we think about the clean substances going in, and how what comes out is foul, putrid, and rotten. As this is the natural condition of the body, how can we consider it as being pure? Therefore it is not suitable to be attached to it.

1.3.1.1.3. Contemplating the lack of essence of the body

This has two sub-headings

1.3.1.1.3.1. If one separates the different parts of the body and analyses them one will not find any essence

1.3.1.1.3.2. It is unsuitable to be attached to that without essence.

What we need to derive from this explanation is that it is a logical presentation of the way to contemplate the natural defects and imperfections of the body. Rather than giving a general instruction to meditate on the impurities of the body, the instruction is to analyse the natural circumstances of the body. Then through that analysis one comes to understand and accept that the body is indeed impure. By meditating on the natural defects and imperfections of the body in this way one will be able to implement it into one's practice.

1.3.1.1.3.1. If one separates the different parts of the body and analyses them one will not find any essence

Here essence refers to the essence of purity. The relevant verse is:

62. *First peel off this sheath of skin
With your awareness.
Then also separate the flesh from the grid of bones
And place it apart with the scalpel of wisdom.*

Gyaltsab Je's explanation of the meaning of this verse is:

First of all, if you mentally peel off this sheath of skin from the rest of the body, then it does not have any essence. Then remove the flesh from the grid of bones with the scalpel of wisdom, and analyse whether there is any essence.

This is another very logical and systematic presentation of the way of looking into the body. Where is its essence?

What is being suggested is that the analysis begins with first peeling off the skin that covers the body and then looking at what is beneath that. In most cases attachment arises through being attracted to a beautiful face, in which case you would start the analysis by removing the skin from the face, and then look beyond that.

The way to investigate the essence of an appealing nature is to begin with the attraction to the skin, which is indeed what you are looking at when you are attracted to the body. However the skin is of course not the body. So when one goes beyond the skin one looks at the flesh. If one feels there might be some essence beyond that, one goes further and takes the flesh away, leaving the grid of the bones. Then, when one goes further into the bones, there is marrow.

This analysis is done with the scalpel of wisdom. Just as a scalpel is able to dissect these layers of the body, one uses the wisdom of analysis like a scalpel to look through these layers to find whether there is any essence. Then one will find that there is no essence at all.

The next verse shows how to further analyse with the scalpel of wisdom. It reads:

63. *Then divide the bones as well
And scan all the way down to your feet.
Analyse and ask yourself,
'Where is the essence in this?'*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Then divide up the bones as well, scan all the parts down to your feet and ask yourself, 'Where is there the essence that could bear analysis?'

Analyse like this with your own wisdom. There is not the slightest essence that can be relied upon.

This second verse is also quite clear. Even when the bones have been divided and one looks into the inner parts of the body from the feet upwards then one asks where is the essence that could bear the analysis?, which implies that there is no real essence to be found. So as the commentary says analyse like this with your own wisdom. There is not the slightest essence that can be found and relied upon.

This meditation is a means to contemplate the natural impurities and defects of the body. The fundamentally unclean nature of the body will help one to reduce attachment to one's own body. And, when one applies this to others who appear attractive and thus an object of attachment, this is a way to reduce attachment to the bodies of others as well. So it is more practical to train our mind by first looking into our own body and accept its natural defects, and then we will understand that it's the same with the bodies of others. If one trains the mind in this way, it will definitely help to reduce strong attachment.

These verses present an analysis that can be used to look for the essence of the body, leading to the conclusion that there is no essence to be found.

1.3.1.1.3.2. It is unsuitable to be attached to that without essence

The verse relating to this reads:

64. *If, even when looking with effort
You cannot find any essence in this,
Then why do you persist
In guarding this body with attachment?*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

If, even when looking for any essence with effort, you mind, do not see any essence, then for what reason do you mind, continue to guard this body due to being attached to it and grasping at it?

This excessive grasping is unsuitable.

This reflects on the fact that if one has not given up the object of attachment from the depth of one's heart, then attachment will continue to exist despite employing these methods of analysis. Having a theoretical understanding that, 'Yes, it is obvious that the nature of the body is impure', is not enough if one does not actually give up attachment to the body. Even with that analysis and understanding, one could still be holding on to the object of attachment. That is because deep inside, one still holds the object of attachment and sees it as appealing and having essence.

These points are quite clear.

1.3.2.1.4. The reason why it is unsuitable to be attached to the body

Again, this heading begins with a hypothetical argument.

Argument: However, if you say that it is suitable to be slightly attached to this body?

One may question, 'Is it OK to have a little bit of attachment to the body?' So as a way to overcome this doubt the next one and a half verses say:

*65. You are unable to eat filth
As well as unable to drink blood,
And unable to suck the innards.
What is the body doing for you?*

*66ab. At second best, it is suitable to be guarded
As food for foxes and vultures.*

The commentary to these lines reads:

Answer: It is unsuitable to be attached to the body because the body is an impure aggregate. You cannot eat the impure substances of the body and you can also not drink the blood. Likewise you cannot suck the innards, so what action is the body doing for you that is of use? If you were to protect it then at second best the body is only suitable to be guarded as food for foxes and vultures.

As the commentary explains, it is unsuitable to be attached to the body because it is an impure aggregate. Further reasons for the body's impurity are that we do not have any use of this body for ourselves: we cannot consume our own body to nourish ourselves; we cannot drink our blood; and we cannot suck our innards. So what real benefit does the body give us?

As one would not consider consuming one's own body, the only other good reason to protect it would be that the body is suitable as food for foxes and vultures. This means that if our body can help other beings such as foxes, vultures and so forth, then it might be worthwhile to protect it. Otherwise it has no personal benefit.

A significant point being made here is, while it is inappropriate to protect one's body merely out of attachment to it, if it can be used for the benefit of others then it is worthwhile to protect the body.

We conclude here for the evening. Let us recite the Eight Verses of Mind Training, and dedicate it to the late Robin Williams. I have seen some of his shows which were very funny; they made me laugh and laugh. Some people have that natural gift of being amusing and funny just by the virtue of being seen. Whatever the circumstances of his death, it is sad to lose a person who has benefited others. So it is appropriate that we dedicate some prayers for him.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

19 August 2014

If, prior to taking refuge, you generate the following motivation, 'in order to liberate all beings from all sufferings and lead them to the ultimate state of happiness I need to achieve enlightenment myself, so for this purpose I take refuge in Buddha, Dharma and Sangha', this then becomes what is called 'special refuge'.

When we add to this special refuge the intention to achieve enlightenment quickly, very quickly, then it becomes what is called a 'special bodhicitta' intention.

I convey this to you now so that when you come across practices where it indicates taking special refuge and generating special bodhicitta, you will know what it means.

So, based on the refuge and bodhicitta motivation we generated earlier, along with this profound understanding, we can now engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

We can now generate the following motivation for receiving the teachings: In order to free all sentient beings from all sufferings and lead to them to the ultimate state of happiness, I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So, for this purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

The very meditation practice that we engaged in earlier is a practice to further enhance and develop the love and compassion within ourselves. If we were to really take the initiative to put this into practice rather than leave it as a mere wish, and really develop practising love and compassion within ourselves, the benefit would be unimaginable. It is incredible benefit for oneself as well as for others. There is only a positive result to be gained from developing love and compassion in one's heart.

You might find it hard to detect how extending love and compassion to all living beings actually directly benefits them or yourself. The positive effects take place over a long period of time, so the benefits are experienced more in an indirect way. However we can relate to the more direct experiences with our immediate relations, who we deal with on a daily basis. If one has really taken the initiative to cultivate genuine love and compassion, then due to familiarity with the practice, and the positive impact it has on one's mind, it will definitely contribute to less agitation and less anger—particularly with our close relationships.

In relation to close relationships we have now, or from the past, we are easily affected by what they say and what they do. As such, anger can arise if we have not taken the initiative to develop a genuine sense of love and compassion towards them. The way to develop love and compassion towards them is to really understand that when they express inappropriate gestures or words etc. it is because they are influenced by the delusions, and thus affected by a troubled state of mind. When one understands that they don't have control over what they are saying and doing, and that their mind is completely confused (which is why they are expressing inappropriate gestures and so forth), one doesn't take it too personally. Instead one can feel a sense of love and compassion towards them.

We can notice that when inappropriate gestures are laid upon oneself, or vice versa, it is because of the fact that we have a close relationship with the other, now or from the past. It would be quite unlikely that we would express our feelings openly, especially feelings of agitation etc., to strangers. If we were to approach strangers and start relating what we have on our mind, we might even get punched and start a fight. So we usually express what's on our mind to those with whom we are closest, which at times may be agitation and unease, and this can create discomfort between oneself and the other.

Knowing that it is because we have a close relationship with the other, it is most appropriate that one generates genuine understanding based on a sense of love and compassion. If one practises in this way then it becomes a supreme method to transform agitation and anger into love and compassion. If one takes the initiative to practise love and compassion then, if the other was to utter inappropriate words or make inappropriate gestures, one would not take it personally and it would be able to express even more understanding and concern for them. This is how their negative attitudes or gestures can be transformed into something more positive due to the love and compassion in our heart.

As we know from the Buddha's life story, when the Buddha was in the indestructible concentrated state of meditation, and evil forces such as demons attempted to harm the Buddha out of jealousy, their arrows and spears transformed into flowers. The deep concentration and love and compassion in the Buddha's heart overpowered the destructive weapons, and transformed them into something beautiful. We need to understand the significance of the Buddha's great feats, and be encouraged to practise similarly oneself.

When we really take the initiative to practise in this way, with the understanding that inappropriate gestures and words are due to the negative emotions or delusions in the other's mind, one should not take it personally but rather think of the other as an object of compassion, because of the afflictions in their mind. When we practise in this way, what would otherwise be a very uncomfortable situation can be transformed into something more meaningful, and becomes a means to enhance our love and compassion towards them. So turning unwanted things, such as difficulties and problems into the path means precisely this practice. Otherwise what other practice would there be? Beginning with the hardships and unwanted things we experience now, we can learn to transform anger into love and compassion. This is the practice: in a situation where one would have otherwise reacted out of anger, one feels love and compassion instead. Doing that shows how our mind has been transformed.

We need to understand that this is the very foundation of the mind training teachings. The main emphasis here is turning unwanted situations, difficulties and problems into the path. So we need to understand that.

It is as presented in this verse from the Guru Puja practice:

Should even the environment and the beings therein
Be filled with the fruits of their negative actions
And unwished-for sufferings pour down on me like rain,
I seek your blessings to take these miserable conditions as a path
By seeing them as causes to exhaust the results of my negative karma.

So when one next recites these lines from the Guru Puja, it is good to reflect on the meaning.

1.3.2.1.5. Because the body disintegrates quickly it is suitable to practise virtue

From the heading itself we can derive a sense of the profound advice being presented here. Since death is inevitable, and our body disintegrates and nothing is left behind, then while we have this body, it is suitable to employ it in order to accumulate virtue as much as possible.

The practice here is to contemplate the certainty of death. The time of death is uncertain, and that time our body can't help us, as it will be destroyed. The Lam Rim teachings explain in detail that when death occurs none of the things we cherish now can protect us, e.g. our body, our possessions and relatives. None of that can help us at that time. So if we can really contemplate on death and impermanence, and take it to heart, then the practical benefit will be that our attachment to our body, possessions and relatives will reduce to the point of having no attachment to them at all. If one has not even the slightest attachment to these cherished objects, then this will be a cause for so much relief and ease in our mind—not only at the time of death but even in our daily lives now. If we don't take the initiative to let go of the attachment to our body, possessions and relatives, then this can cause a lot of mental agony. When one has strong attachment to close and dear ones in particular, and if they let go of us first, prior to us having trained our own mind to let go of the attachment to them, then that will cause so much agony in one's mind. So to prevent a painful situation like this from happening, you need to take the initiative to train your mind to let go of attachment to these objects. Then you will have great solace.

Most of you would have the experience of being abandoned at one time or another by someone who is close and dear to you. If you can recall the pain and hurt you felt at that time this will be a good impetus to practice the Dharma.

Apparently psychologists have stated that one of the greatest sufferings someone can undergo is the suffering of being abandoned by loved ones. This suffering can be so great that someone who is experiencing that kind of hurt would even consider taking their own life, because they are not able to bear it. Many of you might already be familiar with psychology, and may have heard those explanations. I would say that it is definitely true. The suffering of being abandoned and unloved is a great suffering. So if situations like this were to occur, then the best way to avoid experiencing the sufferings is to train our mind now to let go of the attachment to others. It is in this way that we can see how we can derive practical benefit from these practices: letting go of the attachment to these objects and possessions (particularly other beings) will be of benefit even in this very life.

The point of this subheading is that the body disintegrates quickly and death occurs quickly. Reflecting on the inevitability of death is something which really becomes a strong impetus for one's practice of Dharma. As the teachings and some of the great masters have mentioned, we need to practise to the extent that we generate fear of death now as a way to prevent fear of death at the actual time of death. In other words, cultivating a fear of death now can become the impetus for us to practise the Dharma in a way that actively prepares us for the actual time of death. When there is no fear at that time then there is no hesitation in our mind, and we will be able to joyfully or peacefully go on to the next existence. The fact and reality is that none of us will survive forever—death will definitely occur. The longest one could possibly hope to live for would be 120. Apparently in the past some have lived up to 140. I am not sure of this, but no-one could live much longer than that.

We might aspire to live up to 100, but even that is not a very long time. In terms of the number of years we live, no matter whatever significant older age we might hope to live for, the reality is that the years go by very quickly. In relation to my own experience, it doesn't seem long since I arrived in Australia. When I look back, the time seems to have gone quite quickly, but it is over 30 years. As a reminder of that, someone came to a Geelong teaching last month and showed me pictures saying 'Remember this picture?' It was a picture of this individual taken with me 30 years ago. He told me that the photo was taken in his kitchen, and he has it with him all the time. When he showed the picture, I actually couldn't even recognise the person right away, and that was a reminder of how much time has passed since then.

He had lived in Japan for many years and that is why he was not around here. Apparently he had come to His Holiness' event last year at the Quang Minh temple and he said that he noticed me from a distance, and immediately remembered 'Oh, that is Geshe Doga'. He said he could recognize me right away from a distance.

Referring back to the point about generating fear of death as an impetus to practise the Dharma, if we can really improve our Dharma practice so that we are prepared for the time of death, then this will be of great benefit at the inevitable time of death. In the number of years that I have associated with others here, there have been a few examples of individuals who have faced death with great ease and peace of mind. So there is real significance in this point that we need to pay attention to.

Under this heading Because the body disintegrates quickly it is suitable to practise virtue there are four subheadings.

1.3.2.1.5.1. A body that will soon be destroyed by death is suitable to be ordered to practise virtue

1.3.2.1.5.2. An example of how it is inappropriate to do nothing and procrastinate due to grasping

1.3.2.1.5.3. Having given a wage one should get what one wants

1.3.2.1.5.4. It is appropriate to work for sentient beings by adapting the recognition of a boat

1.3.2.1.5.1. A body that will soon be destroyed by death is suitable to be ordered to practise virtue

The verse reads:

*66cd. This human body
Is only to be used.*

*67. Even if you protect it,
The lord of death, without any mercy,
Will take it away and give it to the birds and dogs.
At that time what can you do?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of the verse.

There is no real purpose of the body from the point of view of its nature. This human body that is intact with its freedoms and endowments is only suitable to be put to work to accumulate virtuous karma.

Although you protect it without achieving this purpose, the merciless lord of death will take it from you and, having separated it from life, will offer it to the birds and dogs. Mind, at such a time what will you do, as you do not have the slightest power to prevent that separation.

The main point the commentary expresses is that there is no real purpose for the body from the point of view of its nature. Its actual composition is a contaminated aggregate so there is no real, substantial pure nature. However the human bodies that we have obtained are intact with the freedoms and endowments, enabling one to pursue the Dharma. Only this kind of body is suitable to put to work to accumulate virtuous karma. This is the only purpose of having obtained a precious human body.

Verse 67 explains that if we were to try to protect our body, without trying to achieve a virtuous purpose, the reality is that the Lord of Death, (which is a mythological being used as a euphemism for death) is merciless and will separate our consciousness from our body. One has to experience death, and once our bodies are separated from this life, it will be offered to the birds and dogs. The point is that our bodies will naturally decompose and be of no use for oneself. So, if we don't reflect on this now, then at the time of death we won't have the power to do anything.

We put great measures into protecting our body by feeding and clothing it etc. If the body didn't age, decay and eventually disintegrate, then perhaps there would be some point to protect it in such a way. However the reality is that our body naturally starts to decay no matter how much we protect it. It will gradually fail us and eventually completely disintegrate, and we will have to separate from it. Taking this natural decay of our body into account, putting in all that time and energy just to protect it, without using it for any great purpose, would be meaningless.

The personal instruction to derive here is to contemplate the inevitability of death and really take the initiative to engage in a greater purpose. The mind, or the individual self will go on, while the body will be left behind at the time of death. This is something that will definitely occur and trying to ignore it will not prevent it. It is better to acknowledge it and actually prepare for the time when it occurs by practising to the best of our ability. Then, when the actual event takes place, it will definitely lessen unnecessary anxiety and fears and benefit us at that time.

1.3.2.1.5.2. An example of how it is inappropriate to do nothing and procrastinate due to grasping

It is natural that we experience birth, aging, sickness and death. This is part and parcel of our existence. Ignoring this and not acknowledging it will not prevent it from happening. The very fact that we are born means that we have to experience death. This is part of our natural existence of suffering.

We can derive the meaning from the heading itself: An example of how it is inappropriate to do nothing and to procrastinate due to grasping. Doing nothing here refers to doing nothing to practice the Dharma, not doing nothing in general. This can be misunderstood if people think 'I am not just doing nothing and sitting around, I am actually very busy, I have a job and so forth, so I am really busy – this advice does not apply to me'. So to clarify, here, doing nothing means doing nothing to generate the causes for one's liberation and enlightenment, or more immediately, doing nothing to prepare for our future life. At the very least, Dharma practice involves practices to prepare oneself for one's next life. If we don't engage in any practice towards achieving the goals of our future lives, ultimately liberation and full enlightenment, then this would be referred to as doing nothing from the Dharma point of view, and this is inappropriate.

The verse reads:

*68. You would not give cloth and so forth
To servants that cannot be ordered around.
Hence, if this body leaves you despite your care,
Why do you build up your flesh to make it firm?*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary quite clearly explains the meaning of this verse.

If in the world, for example, slaves and entourage are not able to do the work or if they do not serve food, clothing and so forth to their master, then they are punished.

As this body will leave you, without your control, despite having nourished and cared for it with effort, then why do you build up its flesh to make it firm?

It is unsuitable.

The example presented here refers back to ancient times when great kings or masters had slaves and an entourage of people (for example a king would have an entourage of ministers and so forth). If slaves who worked for the lords were not actually able to do the work, such as serving food or making clothing etc., then they would be punished or even expelled. Similarly if the ministers didn't do the work required of them, they could be punished or even expelled from their position. Even these days we can see people fired from their jobs if they don't work properly, so we can relate to this example.

The commentary further explains that: as this body will leave you, without your control, despite having nourished and cared for it with effort, then why do you build up its flesh to make it firm?, implying this is unsuitable. What is being explained here again reflects the reality that we have to discard this body. No matter how much we nourish it and care for it, it will have to be discarded and left behind. With no intention to achieve a greater purpose with this body, merely eating and consuming as a way of protecting its flesh is futile and of no real benefit. The personal instruction here is that while we do need to protect our body by consuming, eating, clothing it, drinking and finding shelter for it etc., we should do it with the intention that the very purpose of feeding and clothing our bodies etc. is so that we can engage in the practice of the Dharma to benefit other sentient beings. With a sense of love and compassion in one's heart, one can perform the numerous normal daily activities as a practice of Dharma, by remembering to make appropriate offerings each time one eats or drinks. After that one should generate the mind that thinks, 'May consuming this now become a means to nourish my body so that I can use it to engage in Dharma practices to benefit other sentient beings'.

With this intention in our mind, our normal activities of drinking and eating become a great means to accumulate merit to further enhance love and compassion. In this way you can see that by just changing one's attitude towards normal activities, it can turn them into a great practice. These are the instructions for those who really want to take the initiative to try and engage in the practice of Dharma. Make it part of your life: turn whatever you do into a Dharma practice. This instruction is very, very valuable. I personally definitely try to remind myself of this point each time I drink and eat. I don't eat mindlessly, I try and use it for this purpose.

If we can remind ourselves of these points, then whatever activity we engage in to sustain ourselves will become an activity that acquires the conditions for the practice of Dharma. When we talk about the conditions for Dharma practice, we might think of something grand, or something which is beyond our normal activities, but if we can understand that the appropriate conditions for practising Dharma begins with a sound body, then whatever helps to nourish a healthy body definitely becomes the conditions for practising Dharma.

1.3.2.1.5.3. Having given a wage one should get what one wants

Again, using the example of work and wages, if you give a wage to someone to work for you then you expect them to do their service.

The verse reads:

*69. After giving the body its wage,
Put it to work for your purpose.
Without any return
Do not offer everything to it.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary clarifies the meaning.

Having given the body its wage of food, clothing and so forth one should put it to work now for one's purpose of creating virtuous karma. Without the slightest benefit one should not offer the body all this food, clothing and so forth, without getting any benefit in return.

The commentary explains that when we feed and clothe our body it is as if we are giving it its wage. For example, when you pay workers a wage you expect the work to be completed. Similarly, feeding one's body with food and clothing it, the body should then work for one's intended purpose—to create virtuous karma. Creating virtuous karma is in direct contrast to creating non-virtuous karma. Non-virtues of the physical body include killing, stealing and sexual misconduct, and if one used one's body to create non-virtue, then that would definitely have defeated the purpose of having such a body.

However, if one can refrain from these negative deeds and employ the body to create virtuous karma as a means to obtain a good rebirth next life, or better still, to become a cause to obtain liberation and ultimately enlightenment for the purpose of all living beings, then the benefit ranges from a temporary benefit to the ultimate benefit that one can use one's body to achieve. Without the slightest benefit one should not offer the body all this food and clothing without getting any benefit in return means if we were not to get anything in return, then it is meaningless to serve this body. There is another connotation here too. If, instead of benefit, one generates harm with one's body then there is no point supporting it. In this case it would be better not to feed it and give it care. A contemporary example of this may be individuals who have fed their body to the point where it becomes so obese that they can't even stand up or walk around. What benefit is the body in this situation? This is an implication that one needs to also understand.

1.3.2.1.5.4. It is appropriate to work for sentient beings by adapting the recognition of a boat

This heading presents the example of a boat as a means of ferrying passengers from one side of a river to the other. Similarly, we need to use our perfect conditions to bring ourselves from the shore of samsara across to the other shore, which is the state of liberation and ultimately enlightenment—just like the boat.

The verse reads:

*70. Regard the body as a boat
Merely for coming and going.
Transform it into a wish fulfilling body
To accomplish the welfare of sentient beings.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the concept further.

This body is here, in this life, merely as a basis for striving in virtue as it is the basis for coming and going. In such a way, view it with the recognition of it being a like boat for crossing the ocean of cyclic existence, and transform it into the precious wish-fulfilling jewel of a Buddha's body, so as to achieve the welfare of all sentient beings.

The point explained here is to regard our body as the basis for striving in virtue. We use our body to come and go, but it should be the basis for actually striving in virtue. The analogy presented here: In such a way, view it with the recognition of it being like a boat for crossing the ocean of cyclic existence, which uses the boat as an example. Just as a boat is used to ferry passengers from one side of a river to the other, so we should use our body to cross the ocean of samsara, from cyclic existence to the shore of enlightenment.

As the commentary highlights, by using our body like a boat to cross the ocean of cyclic existence, having crossed to the other shore of enlightenment, we need to transform our body into the precious wish-fulfilling body of a buddha's body. By engaging in the practice and having generated the altruistic mind of bodhicitta, then the practice one engages in is the six perfections. So, through the combination of the altruistic mind of bodhicitta and the actions of the six perfections, we engage in the practices on the path to reach enlightenment. Thus we need to use our body now as a means to achieve a complete transformed state, where one achieves the two bodies of a buddha: the wisdom truth body and the form body of a buddha. This becomes the means to fulfil one's aspiration to benefit all sentient beings.

1.3.2.2. TO BE SKILFUL IN PRACTISING VIRTUE

The presentations under this heading are very practical and applicable advice for our everyday life, which we really need to take on board. There are three subheadings:

1.3.2.2.1. Making ordinary actions beautiful

1.3.2.2.2. Skilfully interacting with others in a virtuous way. The literal explanation is being skilled about engaging with others as a way to be free from misdeeds.

1.3.2.2.3. Being skilful in the actions of the three doors

1.3.2.2.1. Making ordinary actions beautiful

This is subdivided into three:

1.3.2.2.1.1. How to act when meeting others

1.3.2.2.1.2. How to handle one's possessions

1.3.2.2.1.3. Always perform actions in a courteous manner

1.3.2.2.1.1. How to act when meeting others

This addresses how to act when you encounter others. It reflects on what kind of gestures to express and so forth.

The verse reads:

71. *Thus those possessing control
Should always wear a smile,
Clear away wrathful grimaces and frowns,
Be migrators' friend and be honest.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary expands upon this:

Thus one should take control of one's body and mind and always smile at others. Clear away wrathful grimaces and frowns and be a good friend to migrators. When talking be gentle and truthful.

The line from the verse which says: Thus those possessing control, means having control over one's body and mind, particularly one's own mind. When one encounters others one should always have a smiling face and a pleasant gesture, and refrain from wrathful grimaces, like a dark face or frowns. By taking the initiative to be a good friend to migrators, one will always be close to others and have affection towards others. Further, the advice when talking is to be gentle and truthful. The Tibetan word translated here as gentle has the connotation of using words which are likeable and suitable for the others to hear. How to act when meeting others is something we need to take on board and try to put into practice.

1.3.2.2.1.2. How to handle one's possessions

This relates to handling things in our area, in our room, in our surroundings. It is very practical advice about how to take things out from somewhere and how to put them back in an appropriate way. This affects immediate neighbours or people that live next to you. The main point is that we need to be considerate and not to disturb them in any way.

The verse reads:

- 72ab. *Do not throw beds and so forth
Around noisily without consideration.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary adds:

Do not throw possessions like beds and so forth noisily around because this harms others.

While the explanation here is quite clear, the verse relates to being considerate to others who are living with you, next to you, or close by, such as neighbours,. When the commentary says do not throw it means do not handle possessions roughly. For example, when you are opening doors, or when you are taking things out, be considerate. One might unintentionally have no consideration, but apparently there are those who actually do things noisily, like banging the doors or taking things noisily, as a way to annoy their neighbours or roommates. If you see them also showing a dark or sullen face, these are inappropriate gestures in relation to the handling of things.

1.3.2.2.1.3. Always perform actions in a courteous manner

The third subdivision refers to always being mindful not to disturb others when engaging in any activity. This means to be considerate of others' needs and acting appropriately in any given situation.

The verse reads:

- 72cd. *Also, do not open the door roughly
And always delight in being quiet.*
73. *Water fowl, cats and thieves
Go quietly and are inconspicuous
Thus achieving their goals.
The able ones always act in such a way.*

While this is quite clear we can go into a little bit more detail in our next session. Here we need to reflect on how Shantideva is presenting really practical ways of being considerate, and how to behave appropriately in accordance with others' needs and space and time. This is very appropriate practical advice that we need to apply in our daily life.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ཆུབ་སེམས་དཔའི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

26 August 2014

Based on the motivation that has been generated during the recitation of the Refuge and Bodhicitta Prayer, let us now engage in the practice of meditation.

[meditation]

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I need to achieve enlightenment myself. So for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

1.3.2.2. BEING SKILFUL IN PRACTISING VIRTUE

1.3.2.2.1. Making ordinary actions beautiful

1.3.2.2.1.3. Always perform actions in a courteous manner (cont.)¹

73cd. *Also, do not open the door roughly
And always delight in being quiet.*

74. *Water fowl, cats and thieves
Go quietly and are inconspicuous
Thus achieving their goals.*

The able ones always act in such a way.

These lines give us examples showing how, when we engage in any kind of activities we need to be courteous and mindful of the needs and space of others. Basically, the advice comes down to how to be polite with others.

In this and the following verses, Shantideva exhorts us to practise in a manner that is courteous and pleasing to others, and which will bring them joy. I regularly emphasise the importance of being considerate to others and the need to relate to others in a proper way. We can see here that Shantideva is presenting the very points that I regularly emphasise, so I have very good support from him.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the last two lines of verse 72 in this way:

Because it harms those that are also at home, do not open doors roughly. Always delight in being quiet and in actions that make others happy.

As presented here, when you come in or leave a room be mindful about not shutting the door loudly, as it will disturb the person inside. This is particularly important when there are lamas, such as our own teachers and so forth, meditating and doing their practices. And, of course, shutting the door noisily will definitely upset ordinary people who are easily irritated. Therefore we need to be mindful about not disturbing others in this way.

When Gyaltsab Je states Always delight in being quiet and in actions that make others happy, he is exhorting us to have a quiet demeanour, and to engage in actions that always make others happy.

Thus far the presentation has been on how to engage in actions out of consideration for others. Next comes a presentation of how acting in a gentle manner becomes a means to achieve one's own purpose. Gyaltsab Je gives us these examples:

Examples for achieving one's purpose with gentle actions: water fowl, cats and thieves go quietly and inconspicuously and in such a way achieve what they desire. The Able One, or otherwise the disciplined bodhisattvas always conduct themselves in this manner.

The literal translation uses the term 'water birds', referring to birds that rely on rivers and lakes to catch fish, such as storks. When they are hunting for fish they stand in the water very quietly and still so that they don't disturb the surroundings and frighten the fish. In this way they are able to catch any fish that come close to them.

Likewise when cats go about catching mice they are quietly inconspicuous and move in a very, very gentle and quiet manner. And, of course, in order to be successful, thieves have to move about quietly if they are to achieve their purpose.

Furthermore, the commentary explains, the Able One or bodhisattvas following the discipline always act in this way. When bodhisattvas engage in actions to benefit others they always do it in a very quiet, dignified manner. They are always gentle with their speech and actions, engaging with others in a very gentle and pleasing way.

This is how bodhisattvas, with their intention to benefit sentient beings, act in ways that are completely in accordance with the wishes of others, in order to please them and give them joy. By reflecting upon this, we need to be inspired to always act in the same manner. Even as an aspiration we need to generate thoughts such as, 'May I also be able to practise just like the bodhisattvas'. Thus, by appreciating the gentle ways and manners of bodhisattvas, we should aspire to be like them.

On a personal level we need to reflect upon the great significance of engaging in our everyday actions so that they don't affect others in a negative way. Of course there are times when we have a bad day, where we might act or speak in a less than courteous manner. While we might not have immediate control over our behaviour, in hindsight we can think, 'Oh, that was not proper'. Then, in order to prevent them from escalating further, we can remind ourselves, 'I have listened to Shantideva's advice from this precious text, so acting in this way is not at all appropriate for me now. As there is no benefit for me and it definitely harms others, I shall definitely overcome such behaviour'. When you remind yourself in this way, it will help to prevent negative behaviour from escalating ¹ Last week 'Achieve all in a quiet way' was used as the heading.

Chapter 5

1.3.2.2.2. *Be skilled in interacting with others, free of misdeeds*²

This refers to ensuring that, when we interact with others, we are not engaging in negative deeds. There are five sub-divisions:

1.3.2.2.2.1. How to act in relation to well-meant advice

1.3.2.2.2.2. How to act in relation to speaking the truth

1.3.2.2.2.3. How to act in relation to creating merit

1.3.2.2.2.4. How to act when the qualities of others are praised

1.3.2.2.2.5. The benefit of making others happy

Here we can see how Shantideva is presenting very practical advice relating to our normal, everyday actions. We often encounter others who offer well-meant advice with the best intentions, and we need to know how to respond to that. Likewise, when others speak the truth, we also need to know how to act in that situation. Another situation is how to react when one sees others creating merit. Then there is the situation of knowing how to act when the qualities of others are praised. This section of the text concludes with a discussion of the actual benefit of making others happy. These are very practical points of advice that we really need to take on-board and implement in our lives.

1.3.2.2.2.1 How to act in relation to well-meant advice

74. *Skilful in inducing others and,
Through placing unsought beneficial
Words respectfully on your crown
Become the student of all.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

Be skilful in inducing others to practising virtue.

Although one didn't ask for it, if someone gives well-meant unsolicited advice, one should place that advice joyfully and respectfully on one's crown. Without pride one should always become the student of all that have provided good advice.

The first point is to be skilful in inducing others to practise virtue. This has two elements.

- When one intends to present advice to others about accumulating virtue one should be skilled in knowing what is right and wrong. Then, based on that clear understanding, one should encourage others to practise virtue.
- The second element relates to receiving advice from others about engaging in virtue. One should have the discriminating wisdom to analyse what is correct and right, and then apply the advice according to that understanding. As the commentary clearly presents, when well-meant unsought advice is presented by others, one should take that advice joyfully and respectfully place it on one's crown. This means that when the advice is presented in accordance to the Dharma then, without pride one should always become the student of all who have provided good advice.

There might be situations where some may feel, 'I have much more knowledge than you. Who are you to give me that kind of advice?' Rather than accepting that advice one may be offended, thinking, with a sense of pride, 'I know better than you'. That would be an inappropriate response to well-meant advice.

Here we are being presented with some very, very practical advice. As a matter of fact, advice may come from any of these three sources: someone who has greater knowledge than oneself, someone who one considers one's equal, or from someone normally considered to have less knowledge than oneself, such as a youngster. In any of these situations, the bodhisattva's practice is to really welcome well-meant advice, receiving it very graciously and without a sense of pride, generating the attitude of seeing all as one's teachers. Although these are specific instructions relating to receiving Dharma advice, we can also apply this to worldly affairs as well.

Normally the instruction is to really check and investigate whether the advice one receives is appropriate and whether one should accept it. This section, however, refers to well-meant advice, where the practice is to take and appreciate such advice. The implication is that one should willingly appreciate advice that is meaningful and useful and place it on top of one's crown with respect, and thus regard oneself as a student of all.

1.3.2.2.2.2. How to act in relation to speaking the truth

The first two lines from the next verse are presented here:

*75ab. Everything that is said well
Should be commented on as virtue.*

Here the commentary states:

Everything well said as the truth should be commented on as virtuous speech.

Of course the meaning of these lines and the following verses is quite clear. Everything well said as the truth should be commented on as virtuous speech refers particularly to all speech on the Dharma, which is of course based on truth and reality. Whenever others speak about the Dharma one should comment on that as being really wonderful and virtuous speech. So one should praise the well-spoken truth of Dharma words, and, in that way show appreciation, rather than scorn or ridicule. This also prevents jealousy from arising.

When others are presenting the Dharma, or sharing advice with others, we should rejoice, and praise them, saying, 'That is really wonderful virtuous speech'. Such comments are the opposite of comments one might make out of jealousy. If one's mind is affected by jealousy then one could not make such nice comments. So we need to take this advice on-board, and when others are presenting the words of truth of the Dharma, comment on that as being virtuous. It is said that when we praise others without any sense of jealousy, it is a really meritorious deed. So conducting ourselves in this manner is a way to accumulate virtue or merit.

We need to relate this point about speaking the truth without jealousy to the earlier heading which is to Being Skilled in Interacting With Others, Free Of Misdeeds.

² This subdivision was first mentioned on 22 July 2014, as Skillfully Acting with Others in a Virtuous Way.

1.3.2.2.3. How to act in relation to creating merit

This relates to witnessing others creating merit. The next two lines read:

75cd. When seeing somebody being meritorious Inspire joy through praise.

Here Gyaltsab Je explains:

When seeing somebody being meritorious, making offerings and so forth to the Triple Gem, inspire joy and happiness in their minds by directly praising them.

Of course these points were explained extensively in the third chapter on the virtue that is accumulated from rejoicing in the deeds of others.

These lines of verse make the same point. When one sees others engaging in meritorious deeds, such as making offerings and so forth to the Three Jewels, then, if appropriate, one comments on what great deeds they are doing. And if it is not possible to do that, the main thing is to rejoice, and mentally praise them. That will prevent negative minds such as jealousy, pride and so forth from arising.

As presented earlier, when one rejoices in the good deeds of someone who has greater realisations than oneself, then one gets nearly half of that merit oneself. If the one who is generating that virtue and merit is of lower status than oneself, then one gains even more merit. This is how the teachings present the great benefits of rejoicing.

1.3.2.2.4. How to act when the qualities of others are praised

The verse from the text reads:

*76. Comment on qualities secretly,
When qualities are mentioned, agree.
If one's qualities are mentioned,
Check whether there are qualities.*

Here Gyaltsab Je explains:

As it may cause doubts of flattery if one expresses them directly, secretly praise the qualities of others. When others praise the qualities of a third then agree by saying, 'It is like that'.

If your qualities are praised, then without conceit analyse whether the mind really has these qualities or not. If you have, then simply recognise that you have that quality without becoming proud.

The first part of the explanation in the commentary is that if there is a doubt that one's praise might be perceived as flattery, then in order to prevent that possibility, one should practise praising others in secret. If one were to praise others just to flatter them, then that wouldn't be genuine praise, because one is expecting something in return.

If you are not mindful when you praise someone, it may cause them to feel, 'Oh, I wonder why they are praising me. Maybe they want something from me and are just saying that to make me think well of them'. Because of this danger the safest practice is to praise others in secret.

The next point presented in the commentary is also very, very significant and relevant to our normal dealings with others. When others praise the qualities of another person, then we should agree with that praise by saying, 'Yes, it is like that, just as you say'.

The reason why this practice is emphasised here is that if the person being praised is someone who is likeable, then, even if it is not fitting praise, we might say, 'Yes, that is true. They have a lot of qualities'. Whereas if it is someone one doesn't like, then even though they are being rightly praised, we might say, 'Oh, I'm not sure about them'. The main point here is that whether the person to whom the praises are offered is agreeable to oneself or not, the best practice is to acknowledge that praise and say, 'It is like that'. Adopting such conduct not only prevents one from engaging in misdeeds, but we also accumulate great merit by acknowledging the qualities of others.

Furthermore, agreeing in that way also makes the one who is offering the praise joyful too.

The next point in the commentary is also very relevant and significant advice. It relates to when others praise your qualities: If your qualities are praised, then without conceit analyse whether the mind really has these qualities or not.

If someone were to talk about qualities they may see in you and so forth, then reacting with a sense of, 'Oh, I might be great. Oh, they have mentioned my qualities so I might be someone special', would be only increasing one's pride. To assess whether what they say is true, one should first check as to whether one does actually have those qualities, and that the praise is fitting. If one does have those qualities, accept that praise but without any conceit or pride.

1.3.2.2.5. The benefit of making others happy

What are the benefits of making others happy?

*77. Because all efforts are to bring joy,
It is so precious that it is priceless.
Thus, enjoy the blissful happiness
That comes from the virtue of working for others.*

*78. In this life one will be peerless
And also on the other side will be great happiness.
Faults cause unhappiness and suffering
And also on the other side will be great suffering.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

All the actions of the three doors of bodhisattvas are to make others happy. Because this happiness of others is so precious, it is priceless, like a rare object that cannot be bought even with great wealth.

As presented in the commentary, all the actions of the bodhisattvas through their three doors—physical, speech and mental intentions—are performed as a means to make others happy and bring them joy. Bodhisattvas are always engaged in actions that make others happy, because they are aware that the happiness others experience is priceless, like a rare object that cannot be bought. No matter how much money or wealth you may have, you cannot use it to purchase the happiness of others.

Thus, bodhisattvas always use the most appropriate ways and means to make others joyful. As mentioned here, that is because the joy and happiness of others is priceless. I regularly emphasise that we need to engage in actions that will make others joyful and happy. We all have that potential, so it is worthwhile to actually utilise it to bring about joy and happiness to others.

As much as possible, we need to minimise, and try to rid ourselves of any gestures, mannerisms, and behaviours that cause misery to others. If we notice our actions are bringing about misery and agony, then we need to definitely refrain from those actions. Conversely, we need to engage in actions that bring joy to others.

The second paragraph of the commentary reads:

Therefore, with the quality of making others happy, others will not be jealous of one in this life. By practising making others happy, joy in this life will not decline, and one will without doubt also receive possessions and so forth, and in the life beyond one will also attain great happiness.

There are unintentional benefits from making others happy.

- The commentary explains that with the quality of making others happy, others will not be jealous of one in this life. When, from one's own side, one sincerely engages in making others joyful and happy, then that will prevent others from being jealous. That is because one is actively engaged in making them happy.
- One also creates the causes for possessions and wealth to increase.
- The happiness and so forth of this life will not decline, rather it will be restored and established well.
- As a positive consequence of making others happy, one will also attain great happiness in the life beyond, meaning the next life. Here, happiness can range from attaining the happiness of the humans or gods, to obtaining the happiness of liberation and the ultimate happiness of full enlightenment.

So these are the great benefits of making others happy.

Next, Gyalsab Je explains a very significant point:

Otherwise, [meaning if we practise contrary to the aforementioned conduct] as the shortcomings of being angry at the qualities of others, one will experience in this life mental unhappiness and physical suffering, and also in the next life one will experience great suffering.

Having mentioned the benefits of making others happy, if one were to practise the opposite, which is being angry at others' qualities, then, rather than rejoicing in them then, one will immediately experience mental unhappiness and physical suffering in this life.

Generally, being unhappy is the basis on which one generates anger. Anger and mental unhappiness usually support each other. If you check, you will notice that anger usually arises when the mind is unhappy. So when one is not happy with someone else's qualities, then that is the basis for starting to become upset and angry. The main point here is if we generate anger about qualities of others, then that will cause further mental agony, as well as physical suffering. So, here again we find some very pertinent advice, which is that being angry affects our mental health, as well as causing us physical harm.

Through their investigations, scientists have come to the conclusion that those with a very temperamental nature, who are always irritated and angry, are more likely to have physical ailments such as strokes. Apparently anger can induce the blood clots that cause strokes. I have also heard that a perpetually angry attitude suppresses the immune system, making the person much more prone to illness and disease.

The main point mentioned in the text is that if we adopt a mind of joy, make others happy, and praise the qualities of others and so forth, we will receive benefits both in this life and the lives to come.

Conversely, if we practise being angry and upset with the qualities of others, then it will cause mental agony as well as physical suffering in this life and future lives.

That is really the main point. We are being encouraged to practise in accordance with the benefits for oneself.

1.3.2.2.3. Being skilful in the actions of the three doors

The three subdivisions under this heading are:

- 1.3.2.2.3.1. How to act while one speaks
- 1.3.2.2.3.2. How to act while one looks
- 1.3.2.2.3.3. Relating oneself only to virtuous actions

1.3.2.2.3.1. How to act while one speaks

79. *When speaking it should be agreeable and coherent,
Clear and pleasant.
Without attachment or anger,
One should speak gently and appropriately.*

Gyalsab Je's commentary explains:

As it is explained in the Sutra of the Ten Grounds, when speaking with others it should be agreeable from the heart, coherent, easily understandable, clear and pleasant, in order to be acceptable to their mind.

Having abandoned the motivations of attachment and anger, one should speak gently and appropriately in regard to time and amount.

As explained in the commentary, when speaking with others, one should speak from the heart. One should use only truthful words and say them in an agreeable way.

In the Tibetan version the word translated in the commentary as coherent has the meaning of there being a consistent connection between the first and second parts, making it easily understandable. The point about being clear and consistent in what you are saying is so that others can trust your words.

Next, speech should be clear and pleasant, and acceptable to the minds of others. Here clear has the significance of serving to clear away doubts that others might have. If one is not clear, then even after explanation people will still have doubts about what you said. If you are clear in your speech then that will remove any potential doubts from their mind.

Furthermore, the motivation of one's words or speech to others should be one that is removed from attachment and anger, thus ensuring that whatever words one relays to others are not based on attachment or anger.

One should speak gently as opposed to speaking harshly. Speaking appropriately in regard to time and amount refers to making the length of the presentation in accordance to what is acceptable to others.

As the commentary states, this is as explained in 'The Sutra of the Ten Grounds'.

1.3.2.2.3.2. How to act while one looks

This explains how to look at others and how to act in such a way.

80. *When looking at sentient beings say,
"In dependence on this very sentient being
I will become a buddha",
And look at them honestly and lovingly.*

Extracts from Entrance for the Child of the Conquerors used with the kind permission of Ven. Fedor Stracke

Here, Gyaltsab Je explains:

When we look at sentient beings then, similar to the happiness we receive from drinking a refreshing drink after having been thirsty, we think, 'In dependence on this very sentient being I will attain enlightenment', and look at them with a clear mind in a loving manner.

As explained in the commentary, the analogy is that if one is really thirsty any drink that quenches our thirst will be really refreshing and rejuvenating.

The point of the illustration is that being thirsty is an unpleasant experience and that the suffering of thirst is removed when one quenches one's thirst with water. Similarly, that which relieves the overall suffering in our life is, of course, reaching the state of enlightenment. So when we encounter sentient beings, we can remind ourselves, 'Through this very sentient being I will achieve enlightenment'.

From the accounts in the Buddha's life stories and so forth, the very first stage in the generation of bodhicitta is in relation to developing love and compassion for sentient beings. And of course all the practices in which the bodhisattvas engage in the middle are also in relation to sentient beings. Finally, the ultimate state of enlightenment is attained in relation to sentient beings. Therefore, all the stages, from the beginning to the end result of enlightenment, relate to sentient beings.

The thought to generate in our mind as soon as we encounter any sentient being is, in dependence on this very sentient being I will attain enlightenment. With that thought in mind we look at others with a clear mind and a loving attitude, thus generating love and compassion toward the sentient being. If, when we encounter sentient beings we can adopt this advice then we will only have a positive state of mind, free from judgement and prejudice and so forth. Having such a clear state of mind recognises this person in front of us as the very sentient being who will help us to become enlightened.

1.3.2.2.3.3. Relating oneself only to virtuous actions

This is subdivided into three. The three subdivisions under this heading are:

- 1.3.2.2.3.3.1. Practising generosity to the special field of offering
- 1.3.2.2.3.3.2. Creating virtue out of one's own power
- 1.3.2.2.3.3.3. Increasing one's virtue evermore and thinking about the purpose.

We can go through the explanations of these subheadings in the next session.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེས་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་ལྷན་པ་ལ་འཇམ་པ་བཞུགས་སོ་

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

2 September 2014

As usual we can spend some time in meditation.

(pause for meditation)

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines—in order to benefit all sentient beings I will strive to achieve enlightenment, so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings and put them into practice well.

1.3.2.2.3.3. Relating oneself only to virtuous actions (cont.)

This has three subheadings:

1.3.2.2.3.3.1. Practising generosity to the special field of offering

1.3.2.2.3.3.2. Creating virtue out of one's own power

1.3.2.2.3.3.3. Virtues are progressively superior, therefore think about the purpose before the action

1.3.2.2.3.3.1. Practising generosity to the special field of offering

This is similar to the explanation we covered in Precious Garland by Nagarjuna.

The verse reads:

81. *Whether arising continually through a clear wish
Or through the antidote itself, in dependence
On the fields of qualities, benefit and suffering,
Great virtue is generated.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains the meaning of the verse as follows:

Engaging in virtue on a continual basis motivated by a clear wish, i.e. a strong aspiration; and an antidote against the opposing side—such as attachment and so forth; in relation to the three supreme fields:

- Field of qualities: The Triple Gem and so forth.
- Field of benefit: One's parents and so forth.
- Field of misery: The destitute, sick, disenfranchised and so forth.

Making offerings to these objects in this manner creates great virtue, thus one should strive in it.

As the commentary explains, accumulating virtue is not to be done sporadically, but rather on a continual basis. There shouldn't be times when one accumulates virtue and other times where one leaves it out. If one wonders when the appropriate time to engage in virtue is, the answer presented here is, at all times, on a continual basis.

Furthermore, engaging in virtue must be accompanied with a clear wish, which is a strong aspiration, and serve as an antidote against the opposing side i.e. the delusions such as attachment and so forth. Thus, the accumulation of virtue has to be accompanied with a strong aspiration, and ensure that it serves as an antidote to overcome the opposing side. For example, when one engages in practising the virtue of generosity, one needs to ensure that it becomes an antidote for overcoming miserliness, and when practising morality ensure that it serves as an antidote to overcome corrupt ethics and so forth. The emphasis here is that when one accumulates virtue, one needs to ensure that it actually becomes an antidote to overcome an opposing non-virtuous state of mind, specifically the delusions. If you do not apply the practice in this way, you will find that there is not much transformation taking place in your mind. As the great Kadampa master advised: one needs to engage continuously in practising virtue and ensure that it serves as a means to subdue one's mind, by overcoming the delusions in one's mind. So that should be the main purpose of accumulating virtue.

In this explanation three particulars are being pointed out:

- The particular of time or duration for accumulating virtue—which is on a continual basis;
- The particular of an antidote—which is to overcome delusions in one's mind; and
- The particular of relying on the three supreme fields—which are the fields of qualities i.e. the objects of refuge; the fields of benefit i.e. one's parents; and the fields of misery i.e. the destitute, sick, disenfranchised.

One should strive to make offerings to these objects in the manner described, thus accumulating great virtue. You need to also understand that in relation to the three supreme fields the opposite is also true; that if you create negativity in relation to any of these objects then it will be a grave negativity. You need to be mindful when relating to the three supreme fields, so that you protect yourself from creating heavy negativities.

As you have noticed, I regularly emphasise the need to be kind to one's parents, particularly one's aging parents. So, you can see that this presentation is supporting me.

1.3.2.2.3.3.2. Creating virtue out of one's own power

This indicates that engaging in virtue should occur from one's own side. In other words, one needs to take the initiative to create virtue oneself and not rely on others to create virtue for you.

The root text and commentary both present the meaning for this heading, which is quite clear and easy to understand. However the emphasis is that we need to take the initiative—to try and put this into practice by being mindful in our daily life.

The verse reads:

82. *Having become proficient and faithful
I will continuously engage in the actions.
In all my actions I will not Depend on anyone.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Having become proficient in what has to be adopted and what has to be abandoned, and in what one should engage in and what one should not, as well as having generated faith in virtue, I shall now continuously practise virtue.

I shall not depend on anybody in my actions of virtue in the sense that I will not order others to do them.

In relation to having to become proficient in what has to be adopted and what has to be abandoned, one needs to know the clear distinction between what is to be adopted and what is to be abandoned. Without a clear understanding, one will not be able to adopt certain necessary qualities and abandon certain detrimental faults. This would be a drawback to our spiritual progress. Although on the one hand one may be putting some effort into adopting virtues, on the other hand one could be failing to discard certain faults detrimental to our progress (e.g. negative behaviours and so forth). If one fails to recognise what the faults are from the very beginning, then it will be hard to take the initiative to overcome them. While adopting positive qualities ensures progress in one's Dharma practice, this can only happen when the opposing faults and negativities within oneself begin to decrease. When, by adopting qualities the faults naturally decrease, then that is a true mark of one's Dharma progress, and a sign that a real transformation is taking place.

Again, a clear distinction between what one should engage in (virtues), and the negativities one should avoid should be clearly understood. This, along with generating faith in virtue, becomes a proper way to engage in the practice of accumulating virtue. Generating faith in virtue specifically means having faith in the infallibility of virtue; that by engaging in virtue positive consequences are definitely experienced. In contrast, if one were to engage in non-virtue, then the infallibility of the consequences of an unwanted result, such as various types of sufferings, also occur. Basically the infallibility of karma is applied here. So, when one has faith and a strong conviction in the infallibility of virtue, then one will develop a natural, keen wish to generate virtue. One will actually be motivated to create virtue, because one has a strong conviction in the positive consequences, so one is inspired to continuously engage in virtue.

The essential points here are twofold: to become proficient, that is to gain a good, clear understanding of what is to be adopted and what is to be abandoned; and on top of that, generating strong faith in the very virtue that one wishes to engage in. When sound faith and conviction are developed, one will develop a strong, keen initiative to continuously practise virtue. The commentary states the resolve one needs to develop: I shall now continuously practise virtue. Again this is not a casual approach, but rather taking the personal responsibility and resolving to accumulate virtue at all times. These points are really pertinent guides for our practice. I find these verses very helpful for my mind. When you read these verses and pay attention to their meaning, not just to gain an intellectual understanding, but with the intention to implement them in one's practice, then they will be very helpful for your mind.

The commentary emphasises: I shall not depend on anybody in my actions of virtue. This implies that one will not order others to accumulate the virtue for oneself; rather, accumulating virtue is dependent on one's own resolve. This is similar to other sutra teachings where Buddha says that liberation is dependent entirely upon oneself.

That means attaining liberation is not dependent on someone else but entirely dependent on oneself.

1.3.2.2.3.3.3. Virtues are progressively superior, therefore think about the purpose before the action

In relation to the six perfections, the later practices are progressively superior than the earlier, which means the later practices are of greater virtue than the earlier ones. However when engaging in the practices, one needs to be mindful to adopt practices of greater purpose in accordance to the time and need to benefit other sentient beings. The verse reads:

83. *The perfections of giving and so forth
Increase them one after the other.
Do not abandon the big for the small,
Mainly think towards the purpose of others.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

The perfections of generosity and so forth up to the perfection of wisdom, are progressively developed and increased.

Do not give up the practices of generosity, morality and so forth that are smaller from the point of view of purpose and virtue, to the generosity and so forth that are bigger. Strive in the bigger.

This shows implicitly that if we cannot practice both together and have to choose, then we should abandon the smaller for the bigger.

Query: How does one posit small and big?

Answer: For example, if in this life, out of the purpose of self and the purpose of other, practising one affects the other to decline, then one should make the purpose of other the main practice.

In relation to the six perfections, Gyaltsab Je states that the practice of morality for example, would be of higher virtue than the practice of generosity. With this explanation, one would create far more virtue practising morality for one day, than practising generosity for many days or weeks.

Those who have done the nyung nye practice would have noticed the description of the merit for keeping the eight Mahayana precepts even for one day or 24 hours, is incredibly high.

The commentary explains: Do not give up the practices of generosity, morality and so forth that are smaller from the point of view of purpose and virtue to the generosity and so forth that are bigger. Strive in the bigger.

Practising morality in the sequence of the six perfections would generally be considered a greater virtue than generosity. However, when there is a greater purpose for practising generosity to benefit others, then one should not pass up this opportunity in favour of the practice of morality. To understand it in its proper context, if one were to practise morality with a strong self-interest, then if an opportunity arose to practice generosity with total dedication to the benefit for others, then the practice of generosity would be greater than the practice of morality which is contrived or stained with mere personal interest.

The commentary explains that if we cannot practise both together and have to choose, then we should abandon the smaller for the bigger. The emphasis is that one should abandon the smaller practice and adopt a bigger practice. The hypothetical query is How does one posit small and big?

The answer asks you to consider two choices: engaging in the practice merely for one's own purpose and concern for this life, and engaging in the practice for the purpose of others. If by practising one the other declines because they oppose each other, then one should make the purpose of others the main practice. The emphasis here is that if one engages in practices with the intention to benefit just oneself, such as benefit for this life, compared to a practice where the main focus is for the purpose of other beings, then the practice focusing on other beings is the greater practice. One needs to make the distinction between the two, and adopt the practice which is for the purpose of others. As other teachings have emphasised, when one fully dedicates a practice for the purpose of others, then one's own purpose will be fulfilled naturally.

What is being emphasised here is that one needs to ensure that the practice one does is really for the purpose of others. Otherwise, if it is done merely for one's own interest or short-term goal, it will not ultimately fulfil even one's own purpose. One needs to have a clear understanding to derive the main point here. We can see how skilful the advice is here in making the clear distinction between what is a great practice and what is a small practice. And of course, when there is a choice, we would naturally want to choose something which is of greater benefit.

We need to think about our own practice; we might be in the category of those who are choosing small practices instead of bigger ones. Practices that involve mere self-interest for this life's benefit, and practices where the sole intention is to benefit others, are mutually exclusive, and cannot be practised at the same time. If these two practices were presented to you, which one would you choose? As they cannot be practised together, which one would you choose? If one has a bodhisattva motivation one needs to choose the practice which is for the purpose of others. This is also in the motivation for tantric practices.

1.3.3. Training in the morality that accomplishes the welfare of sentient beings

This subdivision has three subcategories:

1.3.3.1. Diligence in the welfare of others

1.3.3.2. The action of gathering others without incurring a fault

1.3.3.3. Protecting sentient beings' minds and training in the action of not incurring fault

1.3.3.1. DILIGENCE IN THE WELFARE OF OTHERS

The two first lines of the next verse relate to this heading.

The verse reads:

84ab. Having understood this, they abide always Striving for the welfare of others.

Gyaltsab Je's commentary presents the meaning by beginning with a query:

Query: Bodhisattvas strive to always abide in working for others, on the basis of having understood what needs to be practised and what needs to be abandoned. But since they need to engage into a variety of actions to achieve the welfare of others, do they not receive faults?

This reflects a question raised previously in a Wednesday night teaching which asked whether bodhisattvas incur faults or not. This is exactly the same point.

The query is a reasonable doubt which comes when one witnesses a bodhisattva engage in various different kinds of actions. The question raised a few weeks ago by Vanessa was about the example of when a bodhisattva had to kill someone in order to save the other four hundred and ninety-nine people.

An answer is presented in the next two lines of the verse:

84cd. Those with compassion have the long view and allow them the forbidden

Gyaltsab Je's commentary explains:

Answer: The compassionate buddhas also see directly the phenomena hidden very far in the future. Out of this knowledge they permit the seven non-virtuous actions of body and speech, which they prohibited for hearers and self-liberators who work primarily for their own purpose, for bodhisattvas when necessary. As a result, bodhisattvas do not only not incur a fault, but for them it becomes a great accumulation when they engage in these actions.

Within the ten non-virtues, the first seven, i.e. the three of the physical and four of the speech, were completely forbidden for hearers and solitary realisers. Under no circumstances were practitioners of the Lower Vehicle permitted to do these actions. However, bodhisattvas are permitted to do these actions when it is deemed necessary for the benefit of other sentient beings. What will be presented next is a story where, if it were necessary to benefit a greater number of sentient beings, even engaging in an action of killing does not incur negativity, but in fact becomes a means to accumulate large amounts of merit.

As an example the commentary quotes from the Sutra of Being Proficient in the Great Secret, which reads:

From the Sutra of Being Proficient in the Great Secret it is taught that because the captain killed the evildoer, his time in cyclic existence was reduced by many eons. It is also like it was taught to the Brahmin's son Karma'i Jungwa.

This refers to the bodhisattvas who were permitted the seven of body and speech by those with great compassion, who see far ahead.

This story is from ancient times when merchants had to travel on ships for long distances. The earlier part of the story tells that a ship was carrying 500 traders and merchants with an evil person amongst them, referred to here as an evildoer who had the intention of taking the lives of the rest of the merchants as a way to gain the profits for himself. The captain of the ship, who happened to be a practising bodhisattva, understood the evildoer's intention. So out of great compassion, as a way to protect the evildoer, and out of great compassion for the rest of the merchants whose lives would be taken, the captain of the boat took upon himself the action of taking the life of the evildoer. This protected the evildoer himself from committing a negative act, which would result in him being reborn in the hell realms, as well as saving the lives of the rest of the merchants. It was said that instead of creating negative karma, the Captain's act became a means for him to accumulate a great amount of merit, to lessen his time in samsara by many aeons. The benefit was to protect the four hundred and ninety-nine merchants from imminent death and protect the evildoer person from incurring negative karma.

One should note that while this is one example of where the seven non-virtues forbidden for practitioners of the Lesser Vehicle whose main practice is for self-liberation are permitted for practitioners of the Great Vehicle, who only have the intention to benefit other sentient beings. So whatever activity they engage in is solely for the benefit of other sentient beings; even acts such as killing—otherwise a great misdeed—are permitted and become a means to accumulate great virtue. However, bodhisattvas with the ability to engage in such negativity only with the intention to benefit other beings with understanding and clairvoyance, would only be high-level bodhisattvas, not lower-level bodhisattvas.

Another example is an account of the Brahmin's son Karma'i Jungwa. In this story the Brahmin's son had adopted the practice of abstaining completely from sexual intercourse. For 12 years he had practised chastity, but there was a young maiden whose life was endangered because of a condition which could be cured only by sexual intercourse. Apparently, with this condition if sexual intercourse was not done the lady would have died. So out of great compassion for this young maiden, he broke his vow of chastity to save her life.

So the example of misdeeds such as killing, forbidden for practitioners of lower vehicles, becomes a means for accumulating great merit when done with the sole intention to benefit other sentient beings. For a lower-vehicle practitioner, sexual activity would be a misdeed, but when engaged in by a bodhisattva with the intention to protect someone from imminent death, it becomes a means to accumulate great merit. These are particular examples from accounts in the past and there are likely other accounts of stealing and lying etc. done solely for the benefit of others, out of compassion.

These accounts are presented in answer to the query as examples of acts actually becoming a means for them to accumulate great amounts of merit, rather than incur negativity.

Gyalsab Je's commentary highlights that:

This refers to the bodhisattvas who were permitted the seven of body and speech by those with great compassion, who see far ahead.

It explains that permission to act on the seven of body and speech are only to bodhisattvas who are practising great compassion and who have farsightedness.

One needs to understand committing these acts in the proper context. Non-virtues are permitted to bodhisattvas with the ability to practice extensive benefit for other sentient beings, but beginner bodhisattvas who do not yet have the ability to engage in such extensive benefits for others would not be permitted to do them.

1.3.3.2. THE ACTION OF GATHERING OTHERS WITHOUT INCURRING A FAULT

This is divided into two subcategories.

1.3.3.2.1. Gathering with the mundane

1.3.3.2.2. Gathering with the Dharma

1.3.3.2.1. Gathering with the mundane

This in turn is subdivided into three:

1.3.3.2.1.1. The difference between offering food and not offering food

1.3.3.2.1.2. Do not harm the body for small actions

1.3.3.2.1.3. Explaining the time and necessity for offering the body

1.3.3.2.1.1. The difference between offering food and not offering food

The verse reads:

*85. Share with those fallen into the wrong direction,
With the protectorless and those abiding within austerities.
Eat only in a measured fashion and Offer everything apart from the three robes.*

In response, Gyalsab Je's commentary reads:

Whilst using food, share with those fallen into the wrong direction, i.e. animals and hungry ghosts, with the protectorless sick, and with those that practice pure action and abide in austerities, if they are there as well.

As it is said, It is appropriate for oneself to measure everything, oneself should eat just enough according to the correct portion, without incurring faults in relation to food, and with the motivation for eating that is explained in the Letter to a Friend.

An ordained bodhisattva should offer everything apart from the three robes or nam-jar, la-go and tang-go. If one has more of the three robes then one should also offer these, but if one has only one set, then one should not offer one's robes. It becomes an obstacle to the practice of pure action.

The literal translation of the distinction between when to offer food and not to offer might relate more to sharing food with those falling into the wrong directions i.e. animals and hungry ghosts etc. In the normal practice of eating, a fully ordained monk separates some of their food, offers it to the objects of refuge, then a portion to the hungry ghost, and a portion to the animals, and dedicates it. In this way one actually divides the food to be consumed with the intention to offer it to others as well.

Having presented how to divide one's food with others such as animals and those who abide in austerities, in relation to oneself, the text quotes Precious Garland:

It is appropriate for oneself to measure everything,

The right measure of what one can consume should be likened to prescription medicine: if one takes too much, then rather than curing one's disease it could actually aggravate it and create harm. But if one does not take enough of the medicine, it will not help to cure the disease. Likewise, when consuming food, if one eats too much one can make one's body feel heavy and bring about a feeling of slothfulness and the onset of sleep, thus not being productive for one's practice. Whereas if one eats too little, and the body is not well nourished, it can become weak and one will not be able to engage in it properly.

Gyalsab Je's commentary further explains that:

...oneself should eat just enough according to the correct portion without incurring faults in relation to food,

Without incurring faults means ensuring that one does not incur misdeeds in relation to food, e.g. eating food just for the sake of vanity, of beautifying oneself (e.g. I might look beautiful if I eat this kind of food), or just for the sake of filling oneself up for the pleasure of feeling full with food etc. In accordance with the explanation from the Letter to a Friend, one should avoid such motivations when eating and consuming food, and eat the correct portion: not too much, not too little and for the purpose of sustaining one's body to practise the Dharma.

Gyaltshab Je's commentary provides more explanation in relation to knowing the distinction between what is to be given and what is not to be given:

An ordained bodhisattva should offer everything apart from the three robes or nam-jar, da-go and tang-go. [which are particular robes for the fully ordained] If one has more of the three robes then one should also offer these, but if one has only one set, [that means if one has like two or three sets then one could offer the extra set to others] however if one has only one set then one should not offer one's robes. It becomes an obstacle to the practice of pure action.

It becomes an obstacle to practice pure action or pure conduct would be in relation to e.g. an ordained monk who has these robes intact. If one gave away everything there would be a fault from a fully ordained monk's perspective, as they should not be separated from one particular robe, even for a day, as being separated from it incurs a fault. But in terms of maintaining oneself e.g. if one is too cold etc. then it would harm one's practice as one would not be able to continue to practise. So it is important to know the distinction between what to give and what portion, how much to give and when not to give. Of course, how to offer the food was also explained clearly in the Letter to the King or Precious Garland as well by Nagarjuna. So it would be good for you to familiarise yourselves with this explanation, and read other commentaries as well. It is not too obscure and hard to understand, but to get a better understanding it is good to refer to other commentaries as well.

As presented earlier, there were particular ways of offering the food, and the intention held when offering it. These you can also revise. You also need to be mindful of ensuring that you are free from misdeeds in relation to consuming food, because if one is not mindful, the very process of consuming and acquiring food to sustain oneself, one may incur misdeeds. One needs to be mindful of that as well.

We can see how the advice presented here is very practical. In terms of consuming food, how to consume it when sharing with others. When consuming by oneself: how to consume it; knowing the right portion; not having too much or too little as it can harm oneself. This advice is given like a parent would give their child; very detailed advice on how to conduct oneself properly. Here, this advice is given to us by Shantideva.

In summary, the presentation is about how to engage in normal daily activities such as eating and drinking, and use them to serve as a means to accumulate virtue, and not become a cause for non-virtue, and incurring misdeeds. This is the value of the advice that we need to take in.

Shantideva's Bodhisattvacharyavatara

བྱང་ལྷན་མེད་མཁའ་འགྲུབ་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་པ་ལ་འཇུག་པ་བཞུགས་སོ།

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga

Translated by the Venerable Michael Lobsang Yeshe

9 September 2014

As usual, we can spend some time in meditation.

(pause for meditation)

We can now generate the motivation for receiving the teachings along these lines:

In order to benefit all sentient beings I will strive to achieve enlightenment, and so for that purpose I will listen to the teachings, and put them into practice well.

1.3.3.2.1. Gathering with the mundane (cont.)

1.3.3.2.1.2. Do not harm the body for small actions

The verse relating to this heading is:

86. *Do not harm for insignificant actions
This body that practises the supreme Dharma.
If one acts in this way, the wishes of sentient beings
Will be accomplished swiftly.*

Gyaltsab Je's commentary on this verse reads:

One's body, which is the basis for practice of the holy Dharma that accomplishes extensive benefit for self and others, if it is guarded well, should not be harmed for a small benefit of others. Rather it should be guarded like a wound.

If one does this, then by way of completing the three higher trainings on the basis of the precious human rebirth, one will be able to quickly accomplish the wish of sentient beings.

From the Four Hundred Stanzas,

Although one of course views the body as enemy
One still protects it.
If one lives for a long time with discipline
Great merit will arise from it.

In this context, the precious human body, which is the basis for the practice of the holy Dharma that accomplishes extensive benefit for self and others, refers to a bodhisattva's body with all those conditions intact. However we can also relate this to the good conditions that we have now, such as having access to the Dharma teachings and so forth.

Here we are being advised that guarding the body means that we should not harm this precious human body, which accomplishes the ultimate wish of sentient beings, for the sake of small gains or benefits for others. The commentary uses the analogy of guarding a wound to illustrate how the body should be protected; just as one would guard a wound from further damage and harm, likewise we need to protect and guard our body at all times. This analogy was presented in earlier teachings and I also explained the meaning at that time.

As the commentary explains, if one protects one's body well, then because of having all the right conditions for one's practice by way of completing the three higher trainings on the basis of this precious human rebirth, one will be able to quickly accomplish the wishes of sentient beings. When one fulfils one's ultimate goal of the practice of the three higher trainings, which is to achieve enlightenment, then one will naturally be able to fulfil the wish of other sentient beings as well.

In the first two lines of the Four Hundred Stanzas verse, Although one of course views the body as enemy, One still protects it, one refers to the one who sees reality, such as the noble bodhisattvas who understand ultimate truth. They see this contaminated body, which is the basis for external and internal harms and so much suffering, as an enemy. Even so, one still needs to protect this body.

The next two lines of the quote from the Four Hundred Stanzas, If one lives for a long time with discipline Great merit will arise from it, indicate that if one lives for a long time by protecting one's body with the discipline of observing morality, then one will accumulate great merit. Here, great merit refers to both the accumulation of wisdom as well as the accumulation of merit.

If I recall correctly, this verse is presented as a response to this doubt: if the body is to be seen as an enemy, then why would one want to protect it? You can also check the commentary on the explanation of this verse.

While the earlier explanations are quite clear it is good for us to reflect on their meaning and try to implement it in our practice.

1.3.3.2.1.3. Explaining the time and necessity for offering the body

When practising generosity with one's body one needs to know the appropriate time and necessity or purpose. This explanation follows the earlier indication that one shouldn't harm one's body, such as giving one's arms or legs to others, for a very minor purpose. Now the text explains the right time and purpose for offering one's body.

87. *Do not offer this body with Impure thoughts of compassion.
Offer it in any way to accomplish
Great purpose here and yonder.*

Here Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

Although from the very beginning bodhisattvas have offered everything including their body, to sentient beings from the depth of their mind.

However, if one feels despondent with the prospect of being asked for the flesh of one's body and the like, and generates feelings of regret afterwards and so forth, then until the pure mind of compassion that cherishes others more than oneself has been developed, one should not give this body.

Although from the very beginning refers to the time when a trainee first becomes a bodhisattva by entering the path of accumulation. Although bodhisattvas on the preliminary stages of the path of accumulation and preparation have developed the courageous mind of offering everything for the sake of sentient beings, which would include their body and so forth, they are nevertheless still on the preliminary stages of the practices. Because there is a probability that bodhisattvas at the initial levels of practice could feel despondent at the prospect of having others ask for their flesh or body parts and so forth, the practice of offering one's body parts is not advised. Furthermore, it is possible that one will later feel regret, rather than rejoice in giving one's body.

Until the pure mind of compassion which cherishes others more than oneself has been fully developed refers to the development of ultimate bodhicitta, which is within the mental continuum of those who have reached the first of the ten grounds and above. Thus, what is being explained here is that until bodhicitta has been fully developed one should not give this body.

The text backs this up with reference to the Compendium of Trainings.

This is extensively explained in the Compendium of Trainings, where the untimely offering of one's body is described as an action of mara.

As explained here, giving one's body before one has fully developed bodhicitta is considered an action influenced by mara or demons, which indicates that it is not a completely pure practice.

Next the commentary explains the appropriate time, which is:

One should offer it when one is really free from the obstacles to generosity, such as miserliness and so forth, and the offering becomes a faultless completion of great accumulation, and most certainly when it becomes a cause to achieve a great purpose in this life and beyond.

Thus, the appropriate time to offer this body is when the bodhisattva develops ultimate bodhicitta from the first ground onwards, when they are completely free from the obstacles to generosity and so forth. The necessity or purpose of offering one's body is when it becomes a cause to achieve a great purpose in this and future lives.

This encompasses the two main points of the appropriate time, and the necessity or purpose.

1.3.3.2.2. Gathering with the Dharma

The previous section referred to gathering others as disciples and so forth, through being generous with material aid and so forth. Now comes the explanation on gathering others through offering the Dharma.

This section is subdivided into three:

1.3.3.2.2.1. The physical behaviour of an audience that one should not teach

1.3.3.2.2.2. Analysing the distinction of the motivation of a vessel

1.3.3.2.2.3. Do not lead those with the wish for the great to the small

1.3.3.2.2.1. The physical behaviour of an audience that one should not teach

The physical behaviour of an audience that one should not teach refers to the inappropriate physical gestures of those who are not suitable to receive the Dharma teachings.

So as the verse reflects here:

88. *Do not teach the Dharma to the disrespectful.
Not to those who, while healthy, wear
headbands,
Umbrellas, sticks, carry weapons,
Or cover their heads.*

In his commentary Gyaltsab Je explains:

One should not explain the Dharma to those that do not have respect for the Dharma and the teacher, or to those whose behaviour is unsuitable, such as wearing headbands when not sick, carrying umbrellas, sticks, weapons or covering their heads with cloth and so forth.

The first part of the commentary is that one should not explain the Dharma to those who don't show respect for the Dharma and the teacher. This refers to not respecting the qualities of the Dharma. Because the Dharma has such highly esteemed qualities, it would be inappropriate to present the profound and sacred Dharma to someone who does not respect it. Those who do not have respect for the Dharma are by default not suitable vessels to receive the Dharma. Furthermore, teaching the Dharma to those who do not respect the teacher or the Dharma would cause them to incur the negativity of disrespecting the Dharma. In this way, rather than bestowing benefit it becomes the cause for them to experience harm from the negative consequences. So, the first part of the explanation, one should not explain the Dharma to those that do not have respect for the Dharma and the teacher, refers to those whose minds are not pure enough to receive the Dharma.

The second part of the explanation refers to those whose physical behaviours are unsuitable. They might have a pure intention to receive the Dharma, respecting both the Dharma and the teacher, but it would be inappropriate to present the Dharma to them because of their inappropriate behaviour. The text lists some examples.

Unsuitable behaviours include wearing headbands when not sick. This implies that while it is permitted to wear a headband because one is not well, wearing a headband for no particular reason would be a sign of disrespect. Likewise, carrying umbrellas, or sticks, or weapons, or covering their heads with cloth and so forth are examples of disrespectful conduct when listening to a Dharma teaching.

For example, as monks we are not allowed to put our zen (upper robe) over our heads while listening to the teachings. During His Holiness' teachings, when there is no roof and it is quite hot and sunny, he gives the Sangha permission by saying, 'Put your zens on top of your head to protect yourself from the hot sun'. The usual practice however is not to cover the head, out of respect for the teachings.

1.3.3.2.2.2. Analysing the distinction of the motivation of a vessel

This refers to further checking the intention or motivation of those who are coming to listen to a teaching. The relevant verse is:

89. *To those holding the lesser to be great and profound,
To women without their spouse,
Hold equal respect for the lesser and supreme Dharma
And practise it all.*

Here, Gyaltsab Je explains:

One does not teach the profound and extensive Dharma to those who are not a vessel due to a lesser motivation and also not to women alone, without their spouse.

It is taught that if one discriminates between the superior Mahayana and the lesser Hinayana on the basis of being wholesome or bad, suitable or unsuitable, becoming the method for enlightenment or not and so forth, is abandoning the Dharma.

One should therefore have equal respect for all paths and practice them all.

This explanation mentions that one should not teach the profound and extensive Dharma to those who are not a suitable vessel, due to a lesser motivation. Another way of explaining this is that it would not be suitable to teach the profound and extensive Dharma to those who have the motivation of the Lesser Vehicle. Because of their intention or motivation they are not ready to hear the profound and extensive Dharma, so one should not teach it to them.

With respect to women alone without their spouse we need to understand the specific context of the advice, which applies to those who are presenting the Dharma. For example, it is said to be very dangerous for their vows for a fully ordained monk to teach a woman while they are alone; others might also form negative views about the propriety of that. Likewise, if the teacher is a nun then it would be inappropriate if they were to teach a man alone, without their spouse being present. We need to understand that while one gender is mentioned here it refers equally to the other gender. It is important to understand these points in their proper context.

Furthermore, as mentioned here, one will incur the fault of abandoning the Dharma if one discriminates between the superior Mahayana and the Lesser Vehicle, on the basis that one is wholesome and the other is not wholesome; that one is suitable and the other is not; that one has the method to become enlightened and the other does not. It is said that the karma of abandoning the Dharma is a heavy negative karma.

Therefore, as Gyaltsab Je emphasises, one should have equal respect for all paths and practise them all. So Gyaltsab Rinpoche is definitely sharing some really profound advice with us.

1.3.3.2.3. Do not lead those with the wish for the great to the small

This heading indicates that it would be totally inappropriate to suggest to those who have a genuine, keen interest in practising the Great Mahayana Vehicle, would be better practising the Lesser Vehicle.

The verse that relates this is:

90. *Do not bring those that are a vessel
For the extensive Dharma to the lesser Dharma.
Do not cause them to give up the training,
Do not mislead with sutra and mantra.*

As Gyaltsab Je explains in his commentary:

Do not lead someone with Mahayana lineage that is a suitable vessel for the extensive Dharma to a lesser Dharma, such as the hearer's path. It is taught that this becomes a downfall.

One should not lead someone with a Mahayana lineage, meaning someone who has the actual capacity of mind to practise the Mahayana, and who is a suitable vessel, from the extensive Dharma to the lesser Dharma, such as the hearer's path. As such that would be a downfall.

The next part of the commentary reads:

Also do not cause someone that is a suitable vessel for the morality of restraint to give up their practice of morality while they are suitable vessels, through misleading them with sutra and mantra, saying that they will become pure merely by reading sutras and mantras.

In this way do not mislead others with sutra and mantra.

The point being emphasised here is that while someone may be a suitable vessel to study and practice morality, telling them that to become liberated it will be sufficient for them to purify their mind by merely reading sutras and mantras would be very misleading advice.

This reminds me of the comments made by someone I met from Singapore who was one of the co-founders of an institute in the Kagyu tradition. He commented to me that while the advice to recite, for example, 100,000 Vajrasattva mantras, or do 100,000 prostrations without any further explanation and saying that it will lead one to reach enlightenment, may have some significant purpose, he was not really sure about the actual benefit. I felt that his comments on how doing extensive practices without the basis of a proper understanding could be misleading were valid.

The emphasis here is that misleading suitable vessels who are capable of understanding the teachings by saying that they will become pure just by reading sutras and reciting mantras, is inappropriate. If they are not suitable vessels and lack the capacity and intelligence to understand the teachings and fully grasp their meaning, then it would be skilful to present practices for them to do at their level. However, if trainees who have the intelligence and capacity and are thus suitable vessels were to be given tasks of merely reciting mantras or reading sutras, then that would be misleading them.

Those who have that approach may be presenting it in that way because they don't have much knowledge of the teachings themselves, and cannot present them thoroughly. Saying, 'You don't need to study much; you don't need to understand much. That's OK, just do these mantras and recite these practices and everything will be fine' would be the act of misleading others.

1.3.3.3. PROTECTING SENTIENT BEING'S MINDS BY TRAINING IN THE ACTION OF NOT INCURRING FAULTS

This is definitely a very important point for bodhisattvas. Because they are such noble beings, engaging in inappropriate actions could cause others to generate a negative mind, and if they were to cause others to be critical of the bodhisattva, then that would be a cause for them to create really heavy negative karma. Therefore bodhisattvas have a great responsibility to engage in appropriate conduct and behaviour to protect the minds of other beings from the faults of criticism and so forth. This is an important point for us also to keep in mind.

This heading has two sections

1.3.3.3.1. Extensive explanation

1.3.3.3.2. Summary

1.3.3.3.1. Extensive explanation

The extensive explanation is subdivided into three:

1.3.3.3.1.1. Abandoning faulty behaviour that causes others to lose faith

1.3.3.3.1.2. How to act when showing the path

1.3.3.3.1.3. How to do the action of sleeping

1.3.3.3.1.1. Abandoning faulty behaviour that causes others to lose faith

Gyaltsab Je begins his commentary on this section of the text with these words:

Ordained bodhisattvas must apply restraint, which is explained in the general basket of teachings on morality, unless there is an exemption that permits them otherwise. As it will cause a loss of faith in the minds of others, even lay bodhisattvas must apply this restraint.

As mentioned here, there are certain forms of conduct that are specifically prescribed for the ordained. There are some circumstances where there are exemptions, but otherwise ordained bodhisattvas have to abide by all of those vows, because not doing so can cause others to lose faith. For the same reason, even lay bodhisattvas have to abide by certain forms of conduct. This was also explained in Precious Garland, which we have previously studied.

Then comes the verse relating to this:

91. *If one leaves behind tooth woods and spittle
Then they should be covered.
To urinate and the like, on water and ground
Used by all is inferior.*

92ab. *Do not eat with a full mouth noisily,
Or with an open mouth*

Then the commentary continues:

If one leaves behind the wood used to clean the teeth and leaves one's spittle on the ground, then these should be covered up with earth and the like. One should also not pollute commonly used water or land with faeces, urine, and mucus as this is frowned upon by the gods and others.

Traditionally in India they use wood from a nim tree as a substitute for toothbrushes. They chew on a piece of the wood to make it like a bristle, which they use to clean their teeth. Having cleaned the teeth in such a way, the advice is that one should not just throw the piece of wood down on the ground for it to be seen by others; likewise one should not just spit onto the ground. Both should be covered up. This of course doesn't really apply in Australia where there is a good tradition of putting the garbage into the garbage can, and you don't see people spitting on the street at all. This is an excellent system.

In general however, one needs to be careful not to cause others to feel disgust, or a bit uncomfortable, when they see behaviour such as spitting out food after one has eaten it. That would be considered as very disgusting. At the moment someone sees that, and thinks it is disgusting, then they become critical of the person who has done that. So if a bodhisattva were to engage in such behaviour, it would cause disgust in others, and if, out of that disgust, they are critical of the bodhisattva, then that will be the cause to create the negative karma of being critical of bodhisattvas. Therefore the advice is that the bodhisattva always needs to engage in conduct and behaviour that protects the minds of others.

Likewise, one should also not pollute commonly used water or land with faeces, urine and mucus as this is frowned upon by the gods and others. This is not only a cause of disgust, but is also a cause of harm for others.

Furthermore:

Do not eat with a full mouth, making noises like chag-chag and so forth while eating, or eat with an open mouth.

Again, these explanations are for monks with vows. When eating one should not eat with one's mouth open, or make sounds such as indicated here, or have too much food in one's mouth, or eat noisily, or with an open mouth. This sort of behaviour will disgust others and is inappropriate.

The next six lines of verse are:

92cd. *Do not sit with the legs stretched out,
Do not rub your hands together.*

93. *When riding or sitting on a mattress or place,
Do not be together with another woman.
Abandon anything that causes worldly beings to lose faith,
That observed and that to enquire about.*

The explanation in the commentary is quite clear.

While sitting on a bed or the like, do not sit with both legs stretched out on the ground. One does not rub both hands together at the same time, but there is no fault if one rubs them sequentially.

One does not ride together with someone else's women on a horse and so forth, or sit together with them on the same seat or place. Lay bodhisattvas also should not sit together with another woman who is not a relative.

In short, one should abandon any inappropriate behaviour that causes the worldly to lose faith, either by observing directly what is done or not done, or through informing oneself by enquiring what is appropriate and inappropriate according to that place and time.

In some cultures and traditions it is considered disrespectful to point your feet out towards others. It is also seemingly disrespectful to rub your hands in front of others, although there is no fault if one rubs them sequentially.

One does not ride together with someone else's women on a horse and so forth, or sit together with them on the same seat or place. Lay bodhisattvas also should not sit together with another woman who is not a relative. These are quite clear instructions.

In summary, as explained by Gyaltsab Je, one should abandon inappropriate behaviour that causes worldly beings to lose faith. One does this either by observing directly what is done or not done, or through informing oneself by enquiring what is appropriate and inappropriate according to that place and time. This means that if you are in a place where you don't know the traditions, and you don't know what is appropriate and what is inappropriate, you should ask about the proper ways to act.

This reminds me that prior to coming to Australia Pam, one of the teachers who taught English to the young monks at Kopan, gave me some instructions on things such as how to use cutlery and so forth. She said that in the West if you are invited to a place, there are different types of cutlery for different parts of the meal. Indeed, whenever we go to a new place, it is appropriate to know the traditions and customs of that place so that we act appropriately.

1.3.3.3.1.2. How to act while showing the path

This refers to acting in the appropriate way when you are showing the path to others. This is very pertinent and practical advice for our daily lives. The relevant verses read:

94. *Do not point with a finger,
But respectfully, with your Full right hand,
Show the way.*
95. *Do not move your hand excessively
But only just enough, with some words.
Snap your fingers and so forth,
Otherwise it becomes unrestrained.*

The explanation in Gyaltsab Je's commentary reads:

When indicating the way for somebody, do not do so with individual fingers from the left hand because this is regarded as insulting. One respectfully points in the right direction with the full right hand outstretched.

One does not wave unnecessarily with one's hand, as this would become excitement and be unconscientious. Instead wave with your hand a little bit, say something and snap your fingers. Otherwise, if one is too loud, then it becomes unrestrained.

This explanation is also quite relevant to our tradition here, where raising your fingers inappropriately is a very bad, even dangerous thing!
